

1. ОСНОВЫ КОНСТИТУЦИОННОГО ПОРЯДКА

1.1. ОСНОВНЫЕ ПРИНЦИПЫ ГОСУДАРСТВА ЛИТВА: НЕЗАВИСИМОСТЬ ГОСУДАРСТВА, НАЦИОНАЛЬНЫЙ СУВЕРЕНИТЕТ И ДЕМОКРАТИЯ, ФОРМА УПРАВЛЕНИЯ - РЕСПУБЛИКА

1.1.1. Основные принципы Литовского государства

1.1.2. Суверенитет нации

1.1.3. Демократия

1.1.4. Форма государственного управления

1.2. ЦЕЛОСТНОСТЬ ГОСУДАРСТВЕННОЙ ТЕРРИТОРИИ

1.3. ОТКРЫТОЕ, СПРАВЕДЛИВОЕ, УСТОЙЧИВОЕ ГРАЖДАНСКОЕ ОБЩЕСТВО И ЗАКОНОДАТЕЛЬСТВО

1.4. ПРИОРИТЕТ КОНСТИТУЦИИ

1.5. ПОДРАЗДЕЛЕНИЕ ВЛАСТИ

1.6. ВЛАСТЬ ВЛАСТИ ОГРАНИЧИВАЕТСЯ КОНСТИТУЦИЕЙ

1.7. ГОСУДАРСТВЕННЫЙ ЯЗЫК - ЛИТОВСКИЙ ЯЗЫК

1.8. ОСНОВА ЗАКОНОДАТЕЛЬСТВА И ПРИМЕНЕНИЯ

1.8.1. Общие положения

1.8.2. Толкование закона

1.8.3. Правовые пробелы

1.8.4. Иерархия законодательства

1.8.4.1. Общие положения. Конституция

1.8.4.2.1. Верховенство Конституции

1.8.4.2.2. Целостность, прямое применение и толкование Конституции

1.8.4.2.3. Неотъемлемая часть Конституции

1.8.4.2.4. Вступление в силу Конституции

1.8.4.2.5. Поправки к Конституции; Стабильность Конституции

1.8.4.3. Международное право и право Европейского Союза

1.8.4.4. Конституционные законы

1.8.4.5. Законы

1.8.4.5.1. Понятие и сила закона

1.8.4.5.2. Приоритет законов над подзаконными актами

1.8.4.5.3. Отношения, регулируемые законом

1.8.4.5.4. Статут Сейма

1.8.4.6. Подзаконные акты

2. КОНСТИТУЦИОННЫЙ СТАТУС ЛИЧНОСТИ

2.1. ОСНОВНЫЕ ПОЛОЖЕНИЯ

2.1.1. Понятие естественных прав и свобод человека, их защита

2.1.2. Принцип равноправия лиц

2.1.3. Ограничения прав и свобод личности

2.1.4. Конституционные обязанности человека

2.1.5. Гарантии прав личности

2.1.5.1. Общие положения. Право на справедливое судебное разбирательство

2.1.5.2.1. Право на обращение в суд

2.1.5.2.2. Право на справедливое судебное разбирательство

2.1.5.2.3. Право на защиту

2.1.5.3. Конституционный принцип возмещения убытков

2.2. ГРАЖДАНСКИЕ ПРАВА И СВОБОДЫ

2.2.1. Право на жизнь

2.2.2. Человеческое достоинство и личная неприкосновенность

2.2.3. Неприкосновенность свободы человека

2.2.4. Конфиденциальность

2.2.5. Имущественные права

2.2.5.1. Защита прав собственности

2.2.5.2. Возмещение

2.2.5.3. Особые объекты собственности

2.2.5.4. Исключительная собственность Литовской Республики

2.2.5.5. Приватизация

2.2.6. Неприкосновенность жилища человека

2.2.7. Свобода слова и информации

2.2.7.1. Защита свободы слова и информации

2.2.7.2. Свобода СМИ

2.2.7.3. Свобода рекламы

2.2.8. Свобода мысли, веры и совести

2.2.8.1. Защита свободы мысли, совести и совести

2.2.8.2. Отношения между государством и церквями и другими религиозными организациями. Светский характер государственных и муниципальных образовательных учреждений

2.2.9. Свобода передвижения

2.2.10. Свобода ассоциации

2.2.11. Свобода собраний

2.3. ПОЛИТИЧЕСКИЕ ПРАВА И СВОБОДЫ

2.3.1. Право участвовать в управлении своей страной

2.3.2. Право референдума

2.3.3. Право голоса

2.3.4. Право на поступление на государственную службу

2.3.5. Право критиковать работу государственных учреждений или должностных лиц, обжаловать их решения

2.3.6. Право на подачу петиции

2.3.7. Право объединяться в политические партии

2.4. ЭКОНОМИЧЕСКИЕ, СОЦИАЛЬНЫЕ И КУЛЬТУРНЫЕ ПРАВА

2.4.1. Имущественные права

2.4.1.1. Свобода экономической деятельности и инициативы

2.4.1.2. Право на работу

2.4.1.2.1. Право на свободный выбор работы и бизнеса

2.4.1.2.2. Требования к профессиональной компетентности

2.4.1.2.3. Право на достойные, безопасные и здоровые условия труда

2.4.1.2.4. Право на справедливое вознаграждение за труд

2.4.1.2.5. Право на социальное обеспечение в случае безработицы

2.4.1.2.6. Страхование принудительного труда

2.4.1.2.7. Право на отдых и досуг, ежегодный оплачиваемый отпуск

2.4.1.2.8. Профсоюзы

2.4.2. Социальные права

2.4.2.1. Право на социальное обеспечение

2.4.2.2. Право на охрану здоровья

2.4.2.3. Право на здоровую окружающую среду

2.4.2.4. Государство обязано обеспечивать защиту семьи, материнства, отцовства и детства. Регистрация брака

2.4.3. Культурные права

2.4.3.1. Право на образование

2.4.3.1.1. Общие положения. Право на получение высшего образования

2.4.3.2. Свобода культуры, науки, исследований и обучения

2.4.3.3. Культурные права граждан, принадлежащих к национальным общинам

2.5. ГРАЖДАНСТВО

3. ЮРИДИЧЕСКАЯ ОТВЕТСТВЕННОСТЬ

3.1. ОБЩИЕ ПОЛОЖЕНИЯ. ВОЗБУЖДЕНИЕ УГОЛОВНОГО ДЕЛА

4. ГОСУДАРСТВО И ЕГО УЧРЕЖДЕНИЯ

4.1. ПОНЯТИЕ И ФУНКЦИИ ГОСУДАРСТВА

4.2. ГОСУДАРСТВЕННЫЕ ОРГАНЫ

4.3. ГРАЖДАНСКОЕ ОБСЛУЖИВАНИЕ

4.4. ОБЩЕСТВЕННАЯ ОТВЕТСТВЕННОСТЬ ПЕРЕД ОБЩЕСТВОМ. КОНСТИТУЦИОННАЯ ОТВЕТСТВЕННОСТЬ ВЫСШИХ ГОСУДАРСТВЕННЫХ ЛИЦ

4.5. НАЦИОНАЛЬНЫЕ НАГРАДЫ

5. СЕЙМАС

5.1. СЕЙМ КАК ПРЕДСТАВИТЕЛЬСТВО НАРОДОВ

5.2. ФУНКЦИИ И ПОЛНОМОЧИЯ СЕЙМА

5.2.1. Общие положения. Законодательство

5.2.2.1. Полномочия Сейма по принятию законов

5.2.2.2. Прерогативы законодательной власти

5.2.3. Бюджетная функция

5.2.4. Парламентский контроль

5.2.5. Создание учреждений и назначение должностных лиц

5.2.6. Прочие полномочия

5.2.7. Процесс импичмента

5.3. КОНСТИТУЦИОННЫЙ СТАТУС ЧЛЕНА СЕЙМАС

5.4. СТРУКТУРА СЕЙМАС

5.5. ПОРЯДОК СЕЙМАС

5.5.1. Общие положения

5.5.2. Законодательный процесс

5.5.3. Иные правовые акты Сейма и их принятие

6. ПРЕЗИДЕНТ РЕСПУБЛИКИ

7. ПРАВИТЕЛЬСТВО

7.1. КОНСТИТУЦИОННЫЙ СТАТУС ВЛАСТИ

- 7.2. СТАНОВЛЕНИЕ ПРАВИТЕЛЬСТВА. ВОЗВРАТ РАЗРЕШЕНИЯ. ВОССТАНОВЛЕНИЕ
- 7.3. ПОЛНОМОЧИЯ ВЛАСТИ
- 7.4. ОРГАНИЗАЦИОННАЯ ФОРМА ДЕЯТЕЛЬНОСТИ ВЛАСТИ И ПРИНЯТОЕ ЗАКОНОДАТЕЛЬСТВО
- 7.5. ЧЛЕНЫ ПРАВИТЕЛЬСТВА. МИНИСТЕРСТВА
- 7.6. ДРУГИЕ ВОПРОСЫ ПРАВИТЕЛЬСТВА

8. КОНСТИТУЦИОННЫЙ СУД

8.1. КОНСТИТУЦИОННЫЙ СУД - УЧРЕЖДЕНИЕ КОНСТИТУЦИОННОГО ПРАВОСУДИЯ

8.2. КОНСТИТУЦИОННЫЙ СТАТУС СУДЕЙ КОНСТИТУЦИОННОГО СУДА

8.3. ПОЛНОМОЧИЯ КОНСТИТУЦИОННОГО СУДА

8.3.1. Полномочия Конституционного суда по контролю конституционности правовых актов

8.3.2. Полномочия Конституционного суда по вынесению заключений

8.3.3. Полномочия Конституционного суда по официальному толкованию Конституции; Преемственность судебной практики Конституционного суда; разработка и переосмысление (корректировка) официальной конституционной доктрины

8.3.4. Пределы подсудности Конституционного Суда

8.3.4.1. Полномочия Конституционного суда по расследованию конституционных пробелов в законодательстве

8.3.4.2. Полномочия Конституционного суда по расследованию конституционности устаревших правовых актов

8.4. ОСНОВАНИЯ ДЛЯ ПРАВОСУДИЯ В КОНСТИТУЦИОННОМ СУДЕ

8.4.1. Лица, имеющие право обращаться в Конституционный суд, и требования к обжалованию

8.4.2. Вопросы, не подлежащие рассмотрению в Конституционном Суде, и другие основания для отказа в рассмотрении жалобы

8.5. АКТЫ КОНСТИТУЦИОННОГО СУДА

8.5.1. Понятие и виды заключительных актов Конституционного Суда

8.5.2. Юридическая сила актов Конституционного Суда

8.5.3. Объявление актов Конституционного суда

8.5.4. Толкование актов Конституционного суда

8.5.5. Обзор актов Конституционного Суда

9. СУДЫ. ПРОКУРАТУРА

9.1. СУДЫ

9.1.1. Конституционное назначение судебной власти

9.1.2. Судебные системы

9.1.3. Независимость судьи и судов, его гарантии

9.1.4. Конституционный статус судьи. Назначение, профессиональная карьера и увольнение судей. Органы самоуправления судебной власти

9.1.5. Полномочия судов при отправлении правосудия

9.1.6. Судебные разбирательства и судебные решения

9.2. ПРОКУРАТУРА

10. МЕСТНОЕ УПРАВЛЕНИЕ И УПРАВЛЕНИЕ

10.1. ГОСУДАРСТВЕННОЕ УПРАВЛЕНИЕ И МЕСТНОЕ УПРАВЛЕНИЕ - ДВЕ СИСТЕМЫ ГОСУДАРСТВЕННОГО УПРАВЛЕНИЯ

10.2. МЕСТНОЕ УПРАВЛЕНИЕ

10.3. МЕСТНОЕ УПРАВЛЕНИЕ

11. ГОСУДАРСТВЕННЫЙ БЮДЖЕТ И ФИНАНСЫ

11.1. БЮДЖЕТ ГОСУДАРСТВА. ОБЯЗАТЕЛЬСТВА ГОСУДАРСТВЕННОГО ИМУЩЕСТВА. НАЛОГИ

11.2. УПРАВЛЕНИЕ, ИСПОЛЬЗОВАНИЕ И РЕАЛИЗАЦИЯ ГОСУДАРСТВЕННОЙ СОБСТВЕННОСТИ. СОБСТВЕННОСТЬ В ИСКЛЮЧИТЕЛЬНОЙ СОБСТВЕННОСТИ ЛИТОВСКОЙ РЕСПУБЛИКИ

11.3. ЛИТОВСКИЙ БАНК

12. ГОСУДАРСТВЕННЫЙ КОНТРОЛЬ

13. ВНЕШНЯЯ ПОЛИТИКА И ГОСУДАРСТВЕННАЯ ОБОРОНА

13.1. ВНЕШНЯЯ ПОЛИТИКА

13.2. ГОСУДАРСТВЕННАЯ ОБОРОНА

FOREWORD

In order to make the living, or jurisprudential, Constitution, which is set out in numerous final acts of the Constitutional Court, more easily encompassable and more convenient to apply, the Constitutional Court of the Republic of Lithuania presents the second supplemented compilation of the selected provisions of the official constitutional doctrine. These provisions are presented in a systematised way, without repeating those that were consequently considerably developed or became irrelevant following the entry into force of the respective constitutional amendments.

The official constitutional doctrine developed by the Constitutional Court, as a source of the perception of the Constitution, gradually and consistently reveals the essence and content of the text of the Constitution. In this way, the constitutional jurisprudence ensures the necessary dynamics of constitutional relationships, in other words, the viability of the Constitution and, at the same time, its stability. Assessing the compliance of legal acts with the Constitution and performing other constitutional powers conferred on it, the Constitutional Court has interpreted the Constitution and developed the broad official constitutional doctrine, revealing the content of various constitutional provisions, their interrelations, the balance of constitutional values, and the essence of the constitutional regulation as a whole. The formation and development of the official constitutional doctrine will never be fully completed. This doctrine has continued to be considerably developed over the last four years since the first compendium Selected Official Constitutional Doctrine (1993–2016) was published.

Thus, this book – Selected Official Constitutional Doctrine (1993–2020) – supplements the preceding compilation with the most significant official constitutional doctrine developed in the final acts of the Constitutional Court adopted from 2017 to 31 August 2020. During this period, 1 September 2019 was of particular significance for the development and even modification of the official constitutional doctrine – since this date, the institution of individual constitutional complaints has been consolidated in the Constitution. As of 1 September 2019, every person has the right to apply to the Constitutional Court in order to contest the laws of the Republic of Lithuania or other acts adopted by the Seimas, the acts of the President of the Republic, or the acts of the Government if a decision adopted on the basis of these acts has violated the constitutional rights or freedoms of the person and the person has exhausted all other effective legal remedies. During the first year of the application of the institution of individual constitutional complaints, the Constitutional Court managed to reveal the purpose and content of this institution as an effective instrument for the protection of human rights, as well as developed the practice of the admissibility of individual constitutional complaints. The interpretation of the conditions and procedure for application by natural and legal persons to the Constitutional Court is undoubtedly important not only for the legal practice, but also to the general public.

The period of the last almost four years is also memorable because of the equally significant development of the official constitutional doctrine in other directions. The Constitutional Court has more than once dealt with various issues that are not unequivocally assessed in society and the legal community and are important both to the state as a whole and to every citizen. Developing the official constitutional doctrine on such issues, the Constitutional Court has been a leader in the advancement of society and an arbitrator in specific disputes. Such a role of the Constitutional Court derives from its constitutional mission to protect not only the letter of the Constitution, but also the values consolidated therein, as well as to administer constitutional justice and ensure constitutional lawfulness.

In recent years, the ruling of 30 July 2020 has undoubtedly been the act of the Constitutional Court of most significance for Lithuanian constitutional law and the foundations of the statehood of Lithuania. In that ruling, the Constitutional Court, for the first time, clarified the nature of the fundamental constitutional acts of the State of Lithuania, which are the Resolution of the Council of Lithuania of 16 February 1918 – the Act of Independence of Lithuania (along with the Resolution of the Constituent Assembly (Seimas) of 15 May 1920 on the re-established democratic State of Lithuania), the Act of the Supreme Council of the Republic of Lithuania of 11 March 1990 on the Re-establishment of the Independent State of Lithuania, and the Declaration of the Council of the Lithuanian Freedom Fight Movement of 16 February 1949, as well as interpreted the significance of these acts for the Constitution. From the point of view of the Constitution of 25 October 1992, the fundamental constitutional acts of the State of Lithuania are pre-constitutional constituent (restorative) acts, adopted by the supreme institutions that represented the People and expressed the will of the People to establish (restore) the independent democratic State of Lithuania; therefore, the Constitution itself arises from these acts. As the primary sources of Lithuanian constitutional law, the fundamental constitutional acts of the State of Lithuanian may never be altered or repealed. They consolidate the fundamental principles of the constitutional order of Lithuania – independence, as well as democracy, from which the innate nature of human rights and freedoms is inseparable; these principles are unamendable and have supra-constitutional force.

It is with one of the said fundamental principles of the constitutional order, i.e. democracy, that also other most prominent acts of the Constitutional Court that were adopted in recent years and enriched the official constitutional doctrine can be associated. Democracy is inconceivable without respect for human dignity. In its conclusion of 19 December 2017 and ruling of 11 January 2019, the Constitutional Court emphasised that only a state that respects the dignity of each person can be considered genuinely democratic. The Constitution is an anti-majoritarian act; it protects the individual, regardless of the attitudes or stereotypes prevailing in a certain period of time among the majority of members of society. Therefore, the Constitution prohibits such discriminatory conduct degrading human dignity (no matter how it would at times be tolerated in society) as harassment, including sexual harassment. Moreover, it would be impossible to ensure respect for the dignity of every person (and, at the same time, the equality of all persons) if the list of the grounds of prohibited discrimination in the text of the Constitution were to be seen as exhaustive. Therefore, under the Constitution, discrimination cannot be justified, including on such grounds not specified in the text of the Constitution as the age, gender identity, or sexual orientation of a person. In view of this, private and family life under the Constitution is defended in the same way, regardless of whether the family is created by opposite-sex or same-sex persons. This jurisprudence of the Constitutional Court can provide a solid basis for cultivating western-level tolerance in Lithuania.

As already previously emphasised by the Constitutional Court on more than one occasion, under the Constitution, Lithuania is a pluralistic democracy. Without political pluralism, democracy would turn into the dictatorship of the majority. Over recent years, the concept of a pluralistic democracy has been supplemented with several elements.

First, freedom of the media, which is guaranteed under the Constitution, has been noted to be one of the necessary foundations of a pluralistic democracy (ruling of 16 May 2019). This freedom, however, is incompatible with the dissemination of information disrupting the foundations of a pluralistic democracy, including with constitutionally prohibited disinformation, which has intensified in recent years (dissemination of false or misleading information organised, among others, abroad in order to manipulate the public, thus inflicting damage on the values protected and defended by the Constitution), as well as with war propaganda (incitement, again often by foreign media, to aggression in the area of international relations). It is no coincidence that fight against disinformation and war propaganda is today on the agenda of the European Union and NATO and many of their member states. In its ruling of 16 May 2019, the Constitutional Court held that, also under the Constitution of Lithuania, the state has the duty to take effective measures, including through the national public broadcaster, against the dissemination of the above-mentioned information.

Second, Lithuania has been defined as a pluralistic parliamentary democracy (ruling of 18 December 2019), the essential element of which is the parliamentary minority (opposition). The mission of the parliamentary opposition is to propose an alternative political programme, compared to that of the parliamentary majority, and political decisions based on this programme, as well as to monitor the political activity of the parliamentary majority and criticise it, thereby guaranteeing political pluralism in the parliament of a democratic state under the rule of law and creating the preconditions for such a parliament to fulfil its functions. Therefore, the effective protection of the rights of the parliamentary opposition and the guarantees of its activity are necessary, while certain decisions on organising the work of the parliament cannot be dictated by the majority alone.

In addition, democracy is impossible without lawmaking consistent with the principles of democracy, especially without publicity and transparency in legislation. Only a legislative procedure that meets the said requirements can involve the public in the governance of the state, ensure the proper consideration of the opinion of specialists in the fields concerned, and thus create the preconditions for guaranteeing the legitimacy and quality of the adopted laws. Therefore, the adoption of laws under urgency or special urgency procedure, where the possibilities of ensuring the proper deliberation of draft laws are minimal, is possible under the Constitution only in exceptional cases in the absence of any other possibility of avoiding greater damage to constitutional values. This is the essence of the ruling of the Constitutional Court of 16 April 2019, after which the conveyor belt of the adoption of laws under urgency and special urgency procedure was halted. Before this ruling of the Constitutional Court, displeasingly, Lithuania had stood out from other European states as a result of the number of laws adopted under the said simplified procedure.

Furthermore, democracy is incompatible with corruption, which is the opposite to the transparency and publicity of the activity of state institutions and officials. The Constitutional Court had to note that corruption, among other things, has a negative material and moral effect on the political and economic system of the state, undermines the authority of state institutions and the authority of all state service, encourages disrespect for laws, creates the preconditions for violating human rights, and erodes the trust of the public in the state, its institutions, the democratic governance of the state, and law; thus, corruption destroys the constitutional foundations of a democratic state under the rule of law. Therefore, under the Constitution, the state must take all possible measures to prevent corruption and the abuse of power in state service (ruling of 18 April 2019). One of such measures can be responsibility provided for in the criminal law for illicit enrichment (ruling of 15 March 2017).

As more than once emphasised by the Constitutional Court, democracy is also incompatible with privileges. The Constitutional Court had to reiterate in at least a few cases in recent years that the Constitution is an act on the equality of citizens, but not on privileges. For instance, it was held in the ruling of 4 July 2017 that the neutrality and secularity of the state means, among other things, that, under the Constitution, the religion professed by a person may not constitute a basis for exempting the person from the constitutional duties of a citizen to the state; therefore, under Paragraph 2 of Article 139 of the Constitution, the status of a priest of a church or religious organisation does not provide a basis for exempting the person from his constitutional duty as a citizen to perform military or alternative national defence service. In its ruling of 8 March 2018, the Constitutional Court held that, in the absence of the provisions of the Constitution that would be other than those that provide for the immunity of ministers where criminal responsibility or the restriction of their liberty is applied and would establish the exclusive status of ministers compared with other subjects, there is no reason to hold that, under the Constitution, ministers are subject to the rules of legal responsibility that are different from those applied to other persons. In similar vein, it was held in the ruling of 9 March 2020 that judges may not be unreasonably singled out from society and have privileges prohibited under the Constitution: the purpose of the constitutionally consolidated immunity of judges is to guarantee the independence of judges so that the administration of justice is ensured; the immunity of judges is not consolidated for the purpose of creating the preconditions for judges to avoid criminal or other legal responsibility for criminal acts or other violations of law. Therefore, the procedural measures that are provided for by means of laws and do not in themselves restrict the physical liberty of a person and are necessary for the speedy disclosure and thorough investigation of criminal acts and other violations of law should be applied to judges on the same grounds as with respect to other persons. In other words, the immunity of judges established by means of a law cannot be broader than that consolidated in the Constitution, which requires the consent of the Seimas or the President of the Republic in order to hold a judge criminally responsible or detain him/her, or to restrict his/her liberty otherwise.

These are just a few examples showing the relevance and diversity of the cases decided by the Constitutional Court in recent years. It is important to note that, if some of the provisions of the official constitutional doctrine are not included in this publication, this should not in itself inspire the idea that their significance is constitutionally less considerable or that they are not relevant at all. Only the Constitutional Court itself can state in its acts that the interpretation of the Constitution may no longer be based on a certain previously developed official constitutional doctrine.

This volume maintains a structure that has already become common and is based on the structure of the Constitution itself and the order in which the constitutional legal institutions are conventionally arranged in constitutional legal science. The parts of the book (chapters, subchapters) and the fragments of the official constitutional doctrine are given the headings reflecting the content they introduce, and the provisions of this doctrine are set out in chronological order. It is also important to know that the provisions collected in the book are excerpts from the acts of the Constitutional Court and cannot be considered official texts of these acts.

I hope that this book will be interesting and useful not only to lawyers working in various fields or future lawyers, but also to everyone wishing to gain greater knowledge and understanding of the living Constitution.

Prof. Dr. Dainius Žalimas
President of the Constitutional Court

1. THE FOUNDATIONS OF THE CONSTITUTIONAL ORDER

The foundations and protection of the constitutional order of the Republic of Lithuania

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 23 November 1999

The constitutional order of the Republic of Lithuania is based on the priority of the rights and freedoms of individuals and citizens as the ultimate value, as well as on the principles establishing the sovereignty of the Nation, the independence and territorial integrity of the state, democracy, the republic as the form of government, the separation of powers, their independence and balance, local self-government, etc. The protection of the constitutional order means that it is not permitted that the social, economic, and political relations established in the Constitution, which constitute the foundations of the life of individuals, society, and the state, be encroached upon.

[...]

... the Constitution does not assign the function of protecting the constitutional order to any single institution of state power. This is a constitutional obligation of all the institutions of state power (Seimas, the President of the Republic, the Government, and the judiciary) and other state establishments and organisations. This obligation derives not only from particular laws, but primarily from the constitutionally established principle of a state under the rule of law and the requirement that the Constitution must be followed, complied with, not violated, and protected. Of course, every institution of state power protects the constitutional order only by means of the activity forms characteristic of it and only on the grounds of the powers assigned to it by the Constitution and laws.

1.1. THE FUNDAMENTAL PRINCIPLES OF THE STATE OF LITHUANIA: NATIONAL INDEPENDENCE, THE SOVEREIGNTY OF THE NATION, DEMOCRACY, AND THE REPUBLIC AS THE FORM OF GOVERNMENT

1.1.1. The fundamental principles of the State of Lithuania

The fundamental principles of the State of Lithuania (Article 1 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's decision of 19 November 2012

Article 1 of the Constitution prescribes: “The State of Lithuania shall be an independent democratic republic.” It needs to be noted that Article 1 of the Republic of Lithuania’s Constitutional Law on the State of Lithuania – a constituent part of the Constitution – stipulates that the phrase “The State of Lithuania shall be an independent democratic republic”, i.e. the provision of Article 1 of the Constitution, is a fundamental principle of the state.

While interpreting the provision of Article 1 of the Constitution, the Constitutional Court has held that this article of the Constitution consolidates the fundamental principles of the State of Lithuania: the State of Lithuania is an independent democratic republic; the republic is the form of government of the State of Lithuania; state power must be organised in a democratic way; and there must be a democratic political regime in this country (rulings of 23 February 2000, 18 October 2000, 6 December 2000, 25 January 2001, 19 September 2002, the conclusion of 5 November 2004, and the rulings of 13 December 2004 and 21 June 2011); the provisions of Article 1 of the Constitution, as well as the principle of a state under the rule of law, established in the Constitution, determine the main principles of the organisation and activities of the state power of the State of Lithuania (rulings of 18 October 2000, 25 January 2001, 29 March 2012, and 2 May 2012).

Thus, Article 1 of the Constitution consolidates the fundamental constitutional values – the independence of the state, democracy, and the republic. They are inseparably interrelated and form the foundation of the State of Lithuania as the constitutionally consolidated common good of all society; therefore, they may not be denied under any circumstances.

The continuity of the State of Lithuania and its constitutional identity

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 22 February 2013

The Act of the Supreme Council of the Republic of Lithuania of 11 March 1990 on the Re-establishment of the Independent State of Lithuania, inter alia, established that the execution of the sovereign powers of the State of Lithuania, abolished by foreign forces in 1940, is re-established, and henceforth Lithuania is again an independent state; the Act of Independence of 16 February 1918 of the Council of Lithuania and the Resolution of the Constituent Seimas of 15 May 1920 on the re-established democratic State of Lithuania have never lost their legal power and comprise the constitutional foundation of the State of Lithuania; the territory of Lithuania is integral and indivisible, and the constitution of no other state is valid on it.

It needs to be noted that:

– from the provisions “the execution of the sovereign powers of the State of Lithuania, abolished by foreign forces in 1940, is re-established, and henceforth Lithuania is again an independent state” of the Act of 11 March 1990, it is obvious that the restoration of the independence of the State of Lithuania was based on the continuity of the State of Lithuania, which means that the aggression that the USSR began against the Republic of Lithuania on 15 June 1940 (inter alia, the occupation and annexation of the territory of the Republic of Lithuania) did not end the existence of the State of Lithuania as a subject of international law or its sovereign powers; due to the occupation of the territory of Lithuania and the destruction of its state institutions, the implementation of the sovereign powers of the State of Lithuania, inter alia, its international rights and obligations, was suspended; the annexation of the territory of the Republic of Lithuania perpetrated by the USSR on 3 August 1940, as a continuation of the aggression, was an act that was null and void; thus, from the viewpoint of international law, the territory of the Republic of Lithuania was occupied by another state and it was never a legal part of the USSR;

– from the provisions “the 16 February 1918 Act of Independence of the Council of Lithuania and the 15 May 1920 Resolution of the Constituent Seimas on the re-established democratic State of Lithuania have never lost their legal power and comprise the constitutional foundation of the State of Lithuania” of the Act of 11 March 1990, it is obvious that not only the continuity of the State of Lithuania, but also its identity, is stated: having restored its independence, the Republic of Lithuania, from the viewpoint of international law and constitutional law, is a subject of law identical to the State of Lithuania against which the aggression of the USSR was perpetrated on 15 June 1940; such constitutional identity of the State of Lithuania is confirmed, inter alia, by the Republic of Lithuania's Law of 11 March 1990 on the Reinstatement of the Constitution of Lithuania of 12 May 1938;

– from the provision of the Act of 11 March 1990 that the constitution of no other state is valid on the territory of the Republic of Lithuania, it is obvious that the introduction of the validity of the constitution of any other state (inter alia, the USSR), inter alia, the imposition of the duties established by such a constitution on the citizens of the Republic of Lithuania, was unlawful.

The constitutional values that form the foundation of the State of Lithuania

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 24 January 2014

Article 1 of the Constitution consolidates the fundamental constitutional values – the independence of the state, democracy, and the republic; they are inseparably interrelated and form the foundation of the State of Lithuania as the constitutionally consolidated common good of all society; therefore, they must not be denied under any circumstances (decision of 19 December 2012).

In its decision of 19 December 2012, the Constitutional Court noted that the principle of the recognition of the innate nature of human rights and freedoms should also be regarded as a fundamental constitutional value that is inseparably related to the constitutional values – the independence of the state, democracy, and the republic – that constitute the foundation of the State of Lithuania as the constitutionally consolidated common good of all society; the innate nature of human rights and freedoms may not be denied, either.

... under the Constitution, it is not permitted to make any such amendments to the Constitution that would deny at least one of the constitutional values that constitute the foundation of the State of Lithuania as the constitutionally consolidated common good of all society – the independence of the state, democracy, the republic, and the innate nature of human rights and freedoms, with the exception of the cases where Article 1 of the Constitution would be altered in the manner prescribed by Paragraph 1 of Article 148 of the Constitution, or Article 1 of the Constitutional Law on the State of Lithuania, which is a constituent part of the Constitution, would be altered in the manner prescribed by Article 2 of this law.

It should be noted that the fundamental constitutional values consolidated in Article 1 of the Constitution – the independence of the state, democracy, and the republic – are closely interrelated with the geopolitical orientation of the State of Lithuania, which is consolidated in the Constitution and implies European and transatlantic integration pursued by the Republic of Lithuania.

The continuity of the State of Lithuania and its constitutional identity

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 18 March 2014

... in its ruling of 22 February 2013, the Constitutional Court emphasised that the provisions “the execution of the sovereign powers of the State of Lithuania, abolished by foreign forces in 1940, is re-established, and henceforth Lithuania is again an independent state” of the Act of 11 March 1990 make it clear that the restoration of the independence of the State of Lithuania was based on the continuity of the State of Lithuania, which means that the aggression that the USSR began against the Republic of Lithuania on 15 June 1940 (inter alia, the occupation and annexation of the territory of the Republic of Lithuania) did not end the existence of the State of Lithuania as a subject of international law or its sovereign powers; due to the occupation of the territory of Lithuania and the destruction of its state institutions, the implementation of the sovereign powers of the State of Lithuania, inter alia, its international rights and obligations, was suspended; the annexation of the territory of the Republic of Lithuania perpetrated by the USSR on 3 August 1940, as a continuation of the aggression, was an act that was null and void; thus, from the viewpoint of international law, the territory of the Republic of Lithuania was occupied by another state and it was never a legal part of the USSR. In the same ruling, the Constitutional Court also held that, from the provisions “the 16 February 1918 Act of Independence of the Council of Lithuania and the 15 May 1920 Resolution of the Constituent Seimas on the re-established democratic State of Lithuania have never lost their legal power and comprise the constitutional foundation of the State of Lithuania” of the Act of 11 March 1990, it is obvious that not only the continuity of the State of Lithuania, but also its identity, is stated: having restored its independence, the Republic of Lithuania, from the viewpoint of international law and constitutional law, is a subject of law identical to the State of Lithuania against which the aggression of the USSR was perpetrated on 15 June 1940; from the provision of the Act of 11 March 1990 that the constitution of no other state is valid on the territory of the Republic of Lithuania, it is obvious that the introduction of the validity of the constitution of any other state (inter alia, the USSR), inter alia, the imposition of the duties established by such a constitution on the citizens of the Republic of Lithuania, was unlawful.

In its ruling of 22 February 2013, the Constitutional Court also noted that the continuity of the State of Lithuania gives rise to the continuity of citizenship of the Republic of Lithuania, which, inter alia, implies that, from the viewpoint of international law and Lithuanian constitutional law, the imposition of USSR citizenship on the citizens of the Republic of Lithuania in 1940, as a consequence of the aggression of the USSR, was an act that was null and void; thus, this act was not a legal ground to lose citizenship of the Republic of Lithuania; consequently, during the years of the Soviet occupation, the citizens of the Republic of Lithuania (persons who held citizenship of the Republic of Lithuania on 15 June 1940 and their descendants) were also not bound by the unlawfully imposed obligations related to USSR citizenship. In addition, the Constitutional Court recalled that the imposition of citizenship of an occupying state on the population of the occupied territory and the forced conscription of this population into the military service of the occupying state is forbidden under the universally recognised norms of international law ...

Thus, in this context, it should also be noted that, according to the universally recognised norms of international law, the citizens of the Republic of Lithuania had an inalienable right to resist the aggression of another state, inter alia, the Soviet occupation; the organised armed fight by the citizens of the Republic of Lithuania in 1944–1953 against the Soviet occupation should be assessed as the self-defence of the State of Lithuania.

Consequently, in view of the fact that the aggression of the USSR was carried out against the Republic of Lithuania, also in view of the continuity of the State of Lithuania and the continuity of citizenship of the Republic of Lithuania, the organised armed partisan forces should be regarded as the armed forces of the Republic of Lithuania that resisted the occupation, i.e. as volunteer forces of a party to an international armed conflict, whose members have the status of a combatant. ...

In this context, it should be noted that, in its ruling of 22 February 2013, the Constitutional Court held that service to the State of Lithuania was possible only in the structures (inter alia, in the Lithuanian Freedom Fight Movement) of the organised armed resistance against the occupation, which took place for a certain time in the occupied territory of the Republic of Lithuania.

The prohibition on denying the constitutional provisions consolidating the constitutional values that form the foundation of the State of Lithuania

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 11 July 2014

... the innate nature of human rights and freedoms, democracy, and the independence of the state are such constitutional values that constitute the foundation for the Constitution as a social contract, as well as the foundation for the Nation's common life, which is based on the Constitution, and for the State of Lithuania itself. No one may deny the provisions of the Constitution consolidating these fundamental constitutional values, since doing so would amount to the denial of the essence of the Constitution itself. Therefore, even where regard is paid to ... limitations on the alteration of the Constitution, which stem from the Constitution itself, it is not permitted to adopt any such amendments to the Constitution that would destroy the innate nature of human rights and freedoms, democracy, or the independence of the state; if the Constitution were interpreted in a different way, it would be understood as creating the preconditions for abolishing the restored "independent State of Lithuania, founded on democratic principles", as proclaimed by the Act of Independence of Lithuania of 16 February 1918.

The fundamental constitutional acts of the State of Lithuania (Act of Independence of 16 February 1918 of the Council of Lithuania, the Act of the Supreme Council of the Republic of Lithuania of 11 March 1990 on the Re-establishment of the Independent State of Lithuania, and the Declaration of the Council of the Lithuanian Freedom Fight Movement of 16 February 1949)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 30 July 2020

... from the point of view of the Constitution of 25 October 1992, the fundamental constitutional acts of the State of Lithuania – the Resolution of the Council of Lithuania of 16 February 1918 – the Act of Independence (along with the Resolution of the Constituent Assembly (Seimas) of 15 May 1920 on the re-established democratic State of Lithuania), the Act of the Supreme Council of the Republic of Lithuania of 11 March 1990 on the Re-establishment of the Independent State of Lithuania, and the Declaration of the Council of the Lithuanian Freedom Fight Movement of 16 February 1949 – are pre-constitutional constituent (restorative) acts, adopted by the supreme institutions that represented the People and expressed the will of the People to establish (restore) the independent democratic State of Lithuania. Therefore, these fundamental constitutional acts of the State of Lithuania, as the primary sources of Lithuanian constitutional law, may never be altered or repealed.

... the provisions of the fundamental constitutional acts of the State of Lithuania that consolidated and implemented the unamendable fundamental constitutional principles – independence, democracy, and the innate nature of human rights and freedoms – have supra-constitutional force; they may not be denied by any constitution of the State of Lithuania. On the contrary, the Constitution, as supreme law, enshrines and unconditionally protects these constitutional values. If the Constitution were interpreted in a different way, as mentioned before, the preconditions would be created for abolishing the restored “independent State of Lithuania, founded on democratic principles”, as proclaimed by the Act of Independence of 16 February 1918.

It should be noted that other fundamental provisions that are consolidated in the fundamental constitutional acts of the State of Lithuania and express the constitutional traditions of the State of Lithuania are implemented in the Constitution adopted in the referendum of 25 October 1992, after the People had chosen the specific content and specific verbal form for the provisions of this Constitution. The constitutional traditions of the State of Lithuania, which are reflected in the Constitution, may be developed and altered in accordance with the procedure laid down in the Constitution for amending its provisions.

As held by the Constitutional Court, from the date of the entry into force of the Constitution, the Lithuanian national legal system had to be created and developed only on the basis of the Constitution (inter alia, the rulings of 13 May 2005, 7 September 2010, and 15 March 2011). Thus, the Lithuanian legal system must be created and developed, inter alia, on the basis of those provisions of the Constitution adopted by the citizens of Lithuania in the referendum of 25 October 1992 that derive from the fundamental constitutional acts of the State of Lithuania and reflect the constitutional traditions of the State of Lithuania, expressed in these fundamental acts. When these provisions of the Constitution are interpreted, account should be taken, inter alia, of their nature – the will and aspirations of the People, expressed in the fundamental constitutional acts of the State of Lithuania, which are the source of this will and aspirations.

A fundamental constitutional act of the State of Lithuania – the Act of Independence of 16 February 1918 of the Council of Lithuania

The Constitutional Court’s ruling of 30 July 2020

The main fundamental constitutional act of the above-mentioned fundamental constitutional acts of the State of Lithuania is the Resolution of the Council of Lithuania of 16 February 1918 (Act of Independence), which is of a constituent nature and by which the Council of Lithuania, acting “as the sole representative of the Lithuanian nation, in conformity with the recognised right to national self-determination”, proclaimed “the restoration of the independent state of Lithuania, founded on democratic principles, with Vilnius as its capital”, and declared “the termination of all state ties that formerly bound this State to other nations”.

The Constitutional Court has held that the Act of Independence of 16 February 1918 of the Council of Lithuania is the constitutional foundation of the State of Lithuania (rulings of 22 February 2013 and 18 March 2014). It should be underlined that the Act of Independence of 16 February 1918 established the modern State of Lithuania as a subject of international law; it also consolidates the unamendable fundamental principles of the constitutional order of Lithuania – independence, as well as democracy, from which the innate nature of human rights and freedoms is inseparable. As stressed by the Constitutional Court, the innate nature of human rights and freedoms, democracy, and the independence of the state are such constitutional values that constitute the foundation for the Constitution as a social contract, the foundation for the People’s common life, which is based on the Constitution, and the foundation for the State of Lithuania itself; no one may deny the provisions of the Constitution that consolidate these fundamental constitutional values, since doing so would amount to the denial of the essence of the Constitution itself; therefore, it is not permitted to adopt any such amendments to the Constitution that would destroy the innate nature of human rights and freedoms, democracy, or the independence of the state; if the Constitution were interpreted in a different way, it would be understood as creating the preconditions for abolishing the restored “independent State of Lithuania, founded on democratic principles”, as proclaimed by the Act of Independence of 16 February 1918 (ruling of 11 July 2014).

Thus, the constitutions of the State of Lithuania, inter alia, the Constitution adopted by the citizens of Lithuania in the referendum of 25 October 1992, derive from the Act of Independence of 16 February 1918. It should be noted that the unamendable fundamental constitutional principles of the Act of Independence of 16 February 1918 – independence, democracy, as well as the innate nature of human rights and freedoms, which is inseparable from democracy, are consolidated in Article 1 of the Constitution.

It should be noted in this context that, along with the Act of Independence of 16 February 1918, the Resolution of the Constituent Assembly (Seimas) of 15 May 1920 on the re-established democratic State of Lithuania, which declared the State of Lithuania a democratic republic, also forms the constitutional foundation of the State of Lithuania. Moreover, this Resolution of the Constituent Assembly (Seimas) implemented the provision of the Act of Independence of 16 February 1918 that the foundation of the State of Lithuania must be finally determined by the Constituent Assembly (Seimas).

Thus, the Resolution of the Constituent Assembly (Seimas) of 15 May 1920 on the re-established democratic State of Lithuania derives from the Act of Independence of 16 February 1918. This Resolution consolidates the fundamental provision that the form of government of the State of Lithuania is a republic. It should be pointed out that this fundamental provision and the unamendable fundamental principles of the constitutional order of Lithuania as they are enshrined in the Act of Independence of 16 February 1918 are laid down in Article 1 of the Constitution, stipulating that “The State of Lithuania shall be an independent democratic republic”.

In addition, it should be noted that the Act of Independence of 16 February 1918 contains the fundamental provision that the capital of the State of Lithuania is Vilnius. This fundamental provision, expressing the constitutional tradition of the State of Lithuania, is set out in Article 17 of the Constitution, which stipulates that “The capital of the State of Lithuania shall be the city of Vilnius, the long-standing historical capital of Lithuania”.

A fundamental constitutional act of the State of Lithuania – the Act of the Supreme Council of the Republic of Lithuania of 11 March 1990 on the Re-establishment of the Independent State of Lithuania

The Constitutional Court’s ruling of 30 July 2020

Another fundamental constitutional act of the State of Lithuania is the Act of the Supreme Council of the Republic of Lithuania of 11 March 1990 on the Re-establishment of the Independent State of Lithuania, which is a restorative act, by which the Independence of the Republic of Lithuania was restored.

By the Act of 11 March 1990 on the Re-establishment of the Independent State of Lithuania, the Supreme Council of the Republic of Lithuania, expressing the will of the People, decreed and solemnly proclaimed that “the execution of the sovereign powers of the State of Lithuania abolished by foreign forces in 1940 is re-established, and henceforth Lithuania is again an independent state”; in this Act, it is stated that “The Act of Independence of 16 February 1918 of the Council of Lithuania and the Resolution of 15 May 1920 of the Constituent Assembly (Seimas) on the re-established democratic State of Lithuania never lost their legal effect and comprise the constitutional foundation of the State of Lithuania”.

Thus, the Act of 11 March 1990 on the Re-establishment of the Independent State of Lithuania derives from the Act of Independence of 16 February 1918 and implements the unamendable fundamental constitutional principles enshrined therein – independence, democracy, and the innate nature of human rights and freedoms; the Act of 11 March 1990 on the Re-establishment of the Independent State of Lithuania also derives from the Resolution of the Constituent Assembly (Seimas) of 15 May 1920 on the re-established democratic State of Lithuania and implements the fundamental provision consolidated in this Resolution that the State of Lithuania is a democratic republic. The Constitutional Court has held that the provisions of the Act of 11 March 1990 on the Re-establishment of the Independent State of Lithuania make it clear that this Act states not only the continuity of the State of Lithuania, but also its identity (rulings of 22 February 2013 and 18 March 2014).

In view of this, it should be held that the Constitution adopted by the citizens of Lithuania in the referendum of 25 October 1992 derives not only from the Act of Independence of 16 February 1918 (along with the Resolution of the Constituent Assembly (Seimas) of 15 May 1920 on the re-established democratic State of Lithuania), but also from the Act of 11 March 1990 on the Re-establishment of the Independent State of Lithuania. It should be noted that, implemented by the Act of 11 March 1990 on the Re-establishment of the Independent State of Lithuania, the unamendable fundamental constitutional principles – independence, democracy, and the innate nature of human rights and freedoms, as enshrined in the Act of Independence of 16 February 1918, and the fundamental provision that the State of Lithuania is a democratic republic, as proclaimed in the Resolution of the Constituent Assembly (Seimas) of 15 May 1920 on the re-established democratic State of Lithuania, are consolidated in Article 1 of the Constitution, which provides that “The State of Lithuania shall be an independent democratic republic”. It should also be noted that Article 1 of the Constitution must be interpreted in the light, inter alia, of the continuity of the state and its constitutional identity with the modern State of Lithuania founded by the Act of Independence of 16 February 1918, as expressed in the Act of 11 March 1990 on the Re-establishment of the Independent State of Lithuania.

By the Act of 11 March 1990 on the Re-establishment of the Independent State of Lithuania, the State of Lithuania also declared its adherence to the universally recognised principles of international law and committed itself to guaranteeing human, civil, and ethnic community rights. The Constitutional Court has held that the observance of international obligations undertaken by the State of Lithuania of its own free will and respect for the universally recognised principles of international law are a legal tradition and a constitutional principle of the restored independent State of Lithuania (inter alia, the rulings of 14 March 2006, 5 September 2012, and 24 January 2014). It should be pointed out that the adherence of the State of Lithuania to the universally recognised principles of international law, as declared in the Act of 11 March 1990 on the Re-establishment of the Independent State of Lithuania, is reflected, inter alia, in Paragraph 1 of Article 135 of the Constitution: as held by the Constitutional Court, this provision of the Constitution consolidates the constitutional principle of respect for international law (ruling of 24 January 2014).

The Act of 11 March 1990 on the Re-establishment of the Independent State of Lithuania also contains the fundamental provision that “The territory of Lithuania is whole and indivisible”. It should be noted that this fundamental provision is reflected in Article 10 of the Constitution, which stipulates that “The territory of the State of Lithuania shall be integral and shall not be divided into any state-like formations”.

A fundamental constitutional act of the State of Lithuania – the Declaration of the Council of the Lithuanian Freedom Fight Movement of 16 February 1949

The Constitutional Court’s ruling of 30 July 2020

The Declaration of the Council of the Lithuanian Freedom Fight Movement of 16 February 1949 (hereinafter also referred to as the Declaration of the LFFM Council of 16 February 1949) is also a fundamental constitutional act of the State of Lithuania; it was adopted by the LFFM Council as “the supreme political body of the Nation, in charge of the political and military fight for the liberation of the Nation”, expressing the will of the Nation (Item 1 of the Preamble to the Declaration of the LFFM Council of 16 February 1949).

It should be noted that the principles of the restoration of the Independence of the Republic of Lithuania, laid down in the Declaration of the LFFM Council of 16 February 1949, are based on the continuity of the State of Lithuania and its constitutional identity with the modern State of Lithuania founded by the Act of Independence of 16 February 1918 (inter alia, Items 3, 5, 6, 8, and 14).

It should be noted in this context that, as held by the Constitutional Court, the restoration of the Independence of the Republic of Lithuania was based on the continuity of the State of Lithuania, which means that the aggression started by the USSR against the Republic of Lithuania on 15 June 1940 (inter alia, the occupation and annexation of the territory of the Republic of Lithuania) did not end the existence of the State of Lithuania as a subject of international law or its sovereign powers (rulings of 22 February 2013 and 18 March 2014). The Constitutional Court has also held that the organised armed fight of the citizens of the Republic of Lithuania during 1944–1953 against the Soviet occupation should be regarded as the self-defence of the State of Lithuania; in view of the aggression carried out by the USSR against the Republic of Lithuania, also in view of the continuity of the State of Lithuania and the continuity of citizenship of the Republic of Lithuania, the organised armed partisan forces should be regarded as the armed forces of the Republic of Lithuania that resisted the occupation, i.e. as volunteer forces that should be regarded as a party to an international armed conflict (ruling of 18 March 2014).

Therefore, it should be stressed that the Declaration of the LFFM Council of 16 February 1949 was adopted by the LFFM Council as the then supreme institution of the Republic of Lithuania that fought against the occupation and expressed the will of the People to restore the Independence of the State of Lithuania on the basis of its continuity. It should be mentioned in this context that, as held by the Constitutional Court, by Item 22 of the Declaration of the LFFM Council of 16 February 1949, the State of Lithuania expressed its commitment to the Universal Declaration of Human Rights (rulings of 18 March 2014 and 20 October 2015).

It should also be noted that the Declaration of the LFFM Council of 16 February 1949 derives from the Act of Independence of 16 February 1918 (along with the Resolution of the Constituent Assembly (Seimas) of 15 May 1920 on the re-established democratic State of Lithuania): by adopting the Declaration of the LFFM Council of 16 February 1949, it was sought to implement the unamendable fundamental constitutional principles of the Act of Independence of 16 February 1918 – independence, democracy, and the innate nature of human rights and freedoms, as well as the fundamental provision that the State of Lithuania is a democratic republic, as proclaimed in the Resolution of the Constituent Assembly (Seimas) of 15 May 1920 on the re-established democratic State of Lithuania. As mentioned before, these unamendable fundamental constitutional principles and the said fundamental provision are consolidated in Article 1 of the Constitution, which provides that “The State of Lithuania shall be an independent democratic republic”.

The Declaration of the LFFM Council of 16 February 1949 laid down the foundations and principles for the future constitutional order of the restored independent State of Lithuania, which express the constitutional traditions of the State of Lithuania: a democratic republic (Items 3, 14, and 16); the sovereignty of the People (Item 4); a parliamentary republic (Item 14); free, democratic, universal, equal, and secret suffrage (Item 5); respect for human rights and freedoms (Items 14 and 22); the equality of the rights of citizens (Item 15); respect for religion (Item 18); the social orientation of the state (Items 19 and 20); the western geopolitical orientation of the State of Lithuania (Item 22); legal responsibility for actions against the State of Lithuania and the prohibition of totalitarian regimes (Items 16 and 17).

It should be noted that these constitutional traditions of the State of Lithuania are reflected in the provisions of the Constitution adopted by the citizens of Lithuania in the referendum of 25 October 1992, inter alia, in Articles 1, 2, 4, 18, 25, 26, 29, 33, 35, 43, 52, 55, and 135 thereof, also in the Constitutional Act of 8 June 1992 on the Non-Alignment of the Republic of Lithuania to Post-Soviet Eastern Unions and the Constitutional Act of 13 July 2004 on Membership of the Republic of Lithuania in the European Union, which are a constituent part of the Constitution.

The Constitution is supreme law; the source of the Constitution is the national community itself – the civil People (rulings of 25 May 2004, 24 January 2014, and 11 July 2014). As held by the Constitutional Court, it is entrenched in the Preamble to the Constitution, inter alia, that the Lithuanian People for centuries staunchly defended their freedom and independence, embodied the innate right of the human being and the People to live and create freely in the land of their fathers and forefathers, and preserved the striving and the right to reside in the independent State of Lithuania (ruling of 13 November 2006). Thus, the Constitution adopted by the citizens of Lithuania in the referendum of 25 October 1992 also derives from the will of the People to have the independent democratic State of Lithuania, and this will is expressed, inter alia, in the Declaration of the LFFM Council of 16 February 1949, which is derived from the Act of Independence of 16 February 1918 (along with the Resolution of the Constituent Assembly (Seimas) of 15 May 1920 on the re-established democratic State of Lithuania).

The continuity of the State of Lithuania and its constitutional identity

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 30 July 2020

... Article 1 of the Constitution must be interpreted in the light, inter alia, of the continuity of the state and its constitutional identity with the modern State of Lithuania founded by the Act of Independence of 16 February 1918, as expressed in the Act of 11 March 1990 on the Re-establishment of the Independent State of Lithuania.

[...]

... as held by the Constitutional Court, the restoration of the Independence of the Republic of Lithuania was based on the continuity of the State of Lithuania, which means that the aggression started by the USSR against the Republic of Lithuania on 15 June 1940 (inter alia, the occupation and annexation of the territory of the Republic of Lithuania) did not end the existence of the State of Lithuania as a subject of international law or its sovereign powers (rulings of 22 February 2013 and 18 March 2014). The Constitutional Court has also held that the organised armed fight of the citizens of the Republic of Lithuania during 1944–1953 against the Soviet occupation should be regarded as the self-defence of the State of Lithuania; in view of the aggression carried out by the USSR against the Republic of Lithuania, also in view of the continuity of the State of Lithuania and the continuity of citizenship of the Republic of Lithuania, the organised armed partisan forces should be regarded as the armed forces of the Republic of Lithuania that resisted the occupation, i.e. as volunteer forces that should be regarded as a party to an international armed conflict (ruling of 18 March 2014).

1.1.2. The sovereignty of the Nation

The right of the civil Nation to create the State of Lithuania

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 30 December 2003

Article 2 of the Constitution prescribes: “The State of Lithuania shall be created by the Nation. Sovereignty shall belong to the Nation.” Under Article 4 of the Constitution, “The Nation shall execute its supreme sovereign power either directly or through its democratically elected representatives”. Paragraph 1 of Article 33 of the Constitution stipulates that “Citizens shall have the right to participate in the governance of their State both directly and through their democratically elected representatives”; under Paragraph 2 of Article 3 of the Constitution, “The Nation and each citizen shall have the right to resist anyone who encroaches on the independence, territorial integrity, and constitutional order of the State of Lithuania by force”.

It follows from these and other provisions of the Constitution that only the citizens of the Republic of Lithuania, i.e. the national community – the civil Nation, have the right to create the State of Lithuania, i.e. only citizens have the right to decide what the State of Lithuania must be like, to establish the constitutional order of the State of Lithuania, the organisation of institutions implementing state power, the grounds of legal relationships between a person and the state, the system of the economy of the country, etc. When implementing their rights and freedoms, citizens participate in executing the sovereignty of the Nation.

The civil Nation and its right to create the State of Lithuania

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 13 November 2006

The institution of citizenship entrenched in the Constitution is inseparable from the State of Lithuania and from the constitutional concept of the civil Nation – the national community.

The State of Lithuania came into being on the basis of an ethnical nation – the Lithuanian nation. This is reflected in the Preamble to the Constitution, which states that it is the Lithuanian nation (i.e. an ethnical nation) that created the State of Lithuania many centuries ago, for centuries staunchly defended its freedom and independence, preserved its spirit, native language, writing, and customs, embodied the innate right of the human being and the Nation to live and create freely in the land of their fathers and forefathers and preserved the striving and the right to reside in the independent State of Lithuania.

The states created on the basis of ethnical nations are national states. In particular, a national state is a political form of the common life of a certain ethnical nation. A national state ensures the possibility of fostering the identity, culture, mentality, language, traditions, and customs of an ethnical nation, helps to accumulate the experience of statehood and to pass it on to the posterity, as well as to gain maturity, and provides the necessary guarantees of historical survival. The fully fledged life of an ethnical nation would be particularly burdened or even impossible without a national state.

The fact that the State of Lithuania came into being on the basis of the Lithuanian nation is reflected not only in the Preamble to the Constitution, but also in other provisions of the Constitution: Lithuanian is the state language (Article 14); and everyone who is Lithuanian may settle in Lithuania (Paragraph 4 of Article 32). The provision of Paragraph 4 of Article 32 of the Constitution, under which everyone who is Lithuanian may settle in Lithuania, means that all Lithuanians who reside abroad, wherever their permanent residence, have the right to come back to Lithuania, their ethnical homeland, at any time. Under the Constitution, it is not allowed to establish any such a legal regulation that would separate Lithuanians living abroad from the Lithuanian nation. Lithuanians who reside abroad may not be deprived of the possibility of participating in the life of the Lithuanian nation if they so request. Lithuanians residing abroad are an inseparable part of the Lithuanian nation.

[...]

Persons who identify themselves with the Lithuanian nation as an ethnical nation compose the absolute majority of the population of the modern State of Lithuania. In this respect, as well as by the name of the state and by the recognition of the status of Lithuanian as the state language, the Lithuanian nation meets the generally recognised definition of a titular nation.

On the other hand, non-Lithuanians – people of other ethnical nations – have also resided in the lands of Lithuania for centuries. Together with Lithuanians, they created and defended the State of Lithuania and cared about its future. Thus, throughout the ages, the pattern of the life of the Lithuanian nation has been based on the peaceful coexistence between the Lithuanian nation, as a titular nation, and other national communities living in the territory of Lithuania, as well as on the forbearance and tolerance of the people of various nations towards each other. Fostering national concord in the land of Lithuania is a historical tradition of the State of Lithuania. This tradition was violated only in such periods of the history of Lithuania when the State of Lithuania itself was occupied by foreign states and when the Lithuanian nation could not authentically create its political life by itself.

The Lithuanian nation fosters national concord in the land of Lithuania (Preamble to the Constitution). In this context, it needs to be emphasised that, under the Constitution, the citizens (as a whole) of the State of Lithuania compose the civil Nation – the national community. In Article 2 of the Constitution, whereby the State of Lithuania is created by the Nation and sovereignty belongs to the Nation, and in Article 4 thereof, according to which the Nation executes its supreme sovereign power either directly or through its democratically elected representatives, the notion “Nation” is used precisely in this sense.

In this context, it should be emphasised that the notions “Lithuanian nation” and “Nation” used in the Constitution may not be opposed. The Lithuanian nation is the basis and the necessary precondition for the existence of the civil Nation – the national community.

... citizenship ... expresses the legal membership of a person in the state and reflects the fact that a person legally belongs to the civil Nation – the national community. The Lithuanian civil Nation – the national community – unites the citizens of the State (irrespective of their ethnical origin); the citizens, as a whole, compose the Lithuanian civil Nation. All citizens of the Republic of Lithuania belong to the Lithuanian civil Nation, regardless of whether the said citizens belong to the titular nation (they are Lithuanians) or to national minorities (ruling of 10 May 2006). All citizens of the Republic of Lithuania, irrespective of their ethnical origin, are equal under the Constitution; they may not be discriminated against or granted any privileges on the grounds of their ethnical origin and nationality. On the other hand, the Constitutional Court has held that integration into the society of Lithuania, as well as becoming a fully fledged member of the national community – the civil Nation – is related, inter alia, to making an effort to learn the state language, i.e. Lithuanian (ruling of 10 May 2006).

Namely, the Lithuanian civil Nation, the citizens of the reborn State of Lithuania, adopted and proclaimed the Constitution of the Republic of Lithuania in the referendum of 25 October 1992. It is the Lithuanian civil Nation that is the source of the Constitution. The Constitutional Court has held that, “having adopted the Constitution, the civil Nation formed the normative basis for its own common life, as the national community – the civil Nation, and consolidated the state as the common good of all society” (rulings of 25 May 2004 and 19 August 2006).

The Constitutional Court has also held that “only the citizens of the Republic of Lithuania, i.e. the national community – the civil Nation, have the right to create the State of Lithuania, i.e. only citizens have the right to decide what the State of Lithuania must be like, to establish the constitutional order of the State of Lithuania, the organisation of institutions implementing state power, the grounds of legal relationships between a person and the state, the system of the economy of the country, etc. When implementing their rights and freedoms, citizens participate in executing the sovereignty of the Nation” (rulings of 30 December 2003 and 10 May 2006).

The forms of executing the supreme sovereign power of the Nation (Articles 2 and 4 and Paragraph 1 of Article 55 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court’s ruling of 11 July 2014

Article 2 of the Constitution, inter alia, stipulates that sovereignty belongs to the Nation; under Article 4 of the Constitution, the Nation executes its supreme sovereign power either directly or through its democratically elected representatives.

The Constitutional Court has held that the Nation directly executes its supreme sovereign power through two main organisational forms: national elections and referendums. The principles and main conditions for organising national elections and referendums are consolidated in constitutional norms, and the procedures for conducting national elections and referendums are regulated by the respective laws. The legal grounds for the aforesaid forms of democracy derive from Articles 2 and 4 of the Constitution, as well as from the electoral rights of citizens (Articles 33 and 34 of the Constitution) (decision of 11 July 1994). As the Constitutional Court noted in its ruling of 1 December 1994, the Nation, as a rule, directly expresses its will during referendums or direct general elections, i.e. the will of the Nation with regard to a concrete issue becomes known only after a referendum or direct general election has been held.

Thus, under the Constitution, a referendum is a form of the direct execution of the supreme sovereign power of the Nation; the Nation may also execute its supreme sovereign power indirectly – through its democratically elected representatives. It should be emphasised that there are not any such subjects that may be equated with the Nation, which enjoys sovereignty (Article 2 of the Constitution) and executes its supreme sovereign power either directly or through its democratically elected representatives (Article 4 of the Constitution). ... in its ruling of 1 December 1994, the Constitutional Court held that no initiative group for a referendum may be equated with the Nation or speak on behalf of the Nation.

In this context, it should be noted that, under Paragraph 1 of Article 55 of the Constitution, the members of the Seimas are representatives of the Nation. Thus, under the Constitution, only the Seimas is the representation of the Nation, through which the Nation executes its supreme sovereign power. As noted by the Constitutional Court, under the Constitution, there may not be and there is no confrontation between the supreme sovereign power executed by the Nation directly and the supreme sovereign power executed by the Nation through its democratically elected representatives – the members of the Seimas. Thus, under the Constitution, there may not be and there is no confrontation between the Nation and its representation – the Seimas: the Seimas implements those powers that have been assigned to it by the Nation in the Constitution, adopted by the Nation (ruling of 25 May 2004).

Consequently, when the Constitution is interpreted, it is not allowed to create opposition between the direct (through a referendum) and indirect (through the representation of the Nation – the Seimas) forms of the execution of the supreme sovereign power of the Nation.

The supreme sovereign power of the Nation may be executed only in observance of the Constitution

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 11 July 2014

... the Constitution is supreme law. The source of the Constitution is the national community – the civil Nation (ruling of 25 May 2004).

The Constitution reflects a social contract – the obligation democratically assumed by all citizens of the Republic of Lithuania to the current and future generations to live under the fundamental rules consolidated in the Constitution and to obey those rules in order to ensure the legitimacy of state power and the lawfulness of its decisions, as well as human rights and freedoms, so that concord would exist in society (ruling of 25 May 2004 and the decision of 20 April 2010). As the highest-ranking legal act and a social contract, the Constitution is based on universal and unquestionable values, such as the sovereignty belonging to the Nation, democracy, the recognition of human rights and freedoms and respect for them, respect for law and the rule of law, the limitation of the scope of powers, the duty of state institutions to serve the people and their responsibility to society, civic consciousness, justice, and the striving for an open, just, and harmonious civil society and a state under the rule of law (rulings of 25 May 2004, 19 August 2006, and 24 September 2009, the decision of 19 December 2012, and the ruling of 24 January 2014).

In view of the foregoing, it should be emphasised that the Constitution reflects the obligation of the national community – the civil Nation to create and reinforce the state by following the fundamental rules consolidated in the Constitution; the Constitution lays down the legal foundation for the common life of the Nation – the national community. Thus, it should also be emphasised that the Constitution equally binds the national community – the civil Nation itself; therefore, the supreme sovereign power of the Nation may be executed, inter alia, directly (by referendum) only in observance of the Constitution.

The requirement that the Constitution must be observed in executing supreme sovereign power by the Nation may not be assessed as a limitation or restriction on the sovereignty of the Nation (Article 3 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 11 July 2014

... under Article 3 of the Constitution, no one may restrict or limit the sovereignty of the Nation or arrogate to himself/herself the sovereign powers belonging to the entire Nation (Paragraph 1); the Nation and each citizen have the right to resist anyone who encroaches on the independence, territorial integrity, and constitutional order of the State of Lithuania by force (Paragraph 2).

Since the Constitution also binds the national community – the civil Nation itself, the requirement that the Constitution must be observed when the Nation, inter alia, directly (by referendum), executes its supreme sovereign power may not be assessed as a restriction or limitation, referred to in Article 3 of the Constitution, on the sovereignty of the Nation, or as the taking over of the sovereign powers belonging to the entire Nation. It should be emphasised that the purpose of the provisions of Article 3 of the Constitution is to protect the constitutional values referred to in this article (sovereignty of the Nation; the independence, territorial integrity, and constitutional order of the State of Lithuania); therefore, these provisions may not be invoked for the purpose of denying the said constitutional values. The provisions of Article 3 of the Constitution may not be interpreted, inter alia, in such a way that, purportedly, they imply the right of the Nation to disregard the Constitution, adopted by the Nation itself, or the right of any citizen or any group of citizens to equate themselves with the Nation and act on behalf of the Nation while seeking to violate the aforementioned constitutional values.

The forms of executing the supreme sovereign power of the Nation (Articles 2 and 4 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 15 February 2019

The Nation directly exercises its supreme sovereign power through two main organisational forms: national elections and referendums; the principles and main conditions for organising national elections and referendums are consolidated in constitutional norms, and the procedures for conducting national elections and referendums are regulated by the respective laws; the legal grounds for these forms of democracy derive from Articles 2 and 4 of the Constitution, as well as from the electoral rights of citizens (Articles 33 and 34 of the Constitution) (decision of 11 July 1994 (case no 5/94) and the ruling of 11 July 2014).

In this context, it should be noted that Article 2 of the Constitution, inter alia, stipulates that sovereignty belongs to the Nation; under Article 4 of the Constitution, the Nation executes its supreme sovereign power either directly or through its democratically elected representatives. It should also be noted that Article 33 of the Constitution establishes, inter alia, the right of citizens to participate in the governance of their state both directly and through their democratically elected representatives (Paragraph 1); Article 34 of the Constitution consolidates the constitutional grounds for the active and passive electoral rights of citizens.

Since both forms of the execution of the supreme sovereign power of the Nation and direct democracy – national elections and referendums – are based on the same constitutional grounds (inter alia, the sovereignty of the Nation, democracy, and electoral rights), it needs to be emphasised that no interpretation of the Constitution may lead to confrontation between them. As held by the Constitutional Court in its ruling of 11 July 2014, referendums, as well as elections, constitute a form of the direct execution of the supreme sovereign power of the Nation, as citizens express their will through national voting; the right to initiate a referendum and to vote in a referendum is granted only to citizens who have the electoral right; referendums are held according to the principles of electoral law.

In this context, it should be noted that the Constitution consolidates the following universally recognised democratic principles of elections to political representative institutions: elections must be conducted on the basis of universal, equal, and direct suffrage, and the ballot must be secret; under the Constitution, only such elections are allowed where there is free and fair competition for the mandate, where voters have the right and a real opportunity to choose from several candidates, and where at the time of voting they can express their will freely and without being subjected to control; the requirements of transparency and publicity must be applied to the formation of a representative political institution (ruling of 9 November 2010, the conclusion of 10 November 2012, and the ruling of 13 October 2014); the fairness of the electoral process must be ensured (inter alia, the conclusions of 5 November 2004, 7 November 2008, and 10 November 2012).

In this context, it should also be noted that the constitutionally consolidated democratic principles (universal, equal, and direct suffrage, secret ballot, free and fair elections, a transparent and public electoral process) governing elections to political representative institutions stem not only from the constitutional grounds for electoral rights, which are explicitly entrenched in Paragraph 1 of Article 33 and Article 34 of the Constitution, and from the principles of elections of the Seimas, the President of the Republic, and members of municipal councils, which are explicitly laid down in Paragraph 1 of Article 55, Paragraph 2 of Article 78, and Paragraph 2 of Article 119 of the Constitution. It needs to be emphasised that the said democratic principles of elections to political representative institutions are also derived from the imperatives implied by the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law; these imperatives should be taken into account when the democratic principles of elections to political representative institutions are interpreted. As held by the Constitutional Court, in a constitutional democracy, special requirements are raised for the formation of political representative institutions; these institutions may not be formed in such a way that would raise doubts as to their legitimacy or legality, inter alia, doubts as to whether the election of persons to political representative institutions was in compliance with the principles of a democratic state under the rule of law (inter alia, the conclusion of 5 November 2004, the ruling of 9 November 2010, and the conclusion of 26 October 2012).

The Constitutional Court has held on more than one occasion that the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law is a universal principle on which the entire legal system of Lithuania and the Constitution itself are based. The constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law is an especially broad constitutional principle and it comprises a wide range of interrelated imperatives; the content of this principle should be revealed by taking into account the content of various other constitutional principles such as the supremacy of the Constitution, the sovereignty of the Nation, democracy, responsible governance, the limitation of the scope of powers, and the principle that state institutions must serve the people (rulings of 13 December 2004 and 17 November 2011). Thus, the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law is related, inter alia, to such constitutional principles as the sovereignty of the Nation and democracy, which form the basis of the forms of direct democracy – national elections and referendums.

1.1.3. Democracy

Democratic elections as one of the essential features of a democratic state (as regards the doctrine of electoral rights, see 2. The constitutional status of persons, 2.3. Political rights and freedoms, 2.3.3. Electoral rights)

The Constitutional Court's conclusion of 23 November 1996

One of the fundamental characteristics of a democratic state is democratic elections to the representative institutions of state power. It is through elections that every citizen implements his/her right to participate, together with other citizens, in the governance of his/her country.

The State of Lithuania is democratic (Article 1 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 19 September 2002

Article 1 of the Constitution states that the State of Lithuania is an independent democratic republic. The provision that the State of Lithuania is democratic means that it is necessary in the state to ensure the supremacy of the Constitution, the protection of human rights and freedoms, the equality of all persons before the law and the court, the right to judicial protection, free and periodic elections, the separation and balance of powers, the responsibility of the authorities to citizens, the democratic process of decision-making, political pluralism, possibilities for the development of civil society, etc. It needs to be noted that the provision that the State of Lithuania is democratic is the constitutional obligation not to deviate from the requirements of democracy; the said obligation is applicable to all state institutions, including the legislature.

Laws or other legal acts that are in conflict with the Constitution violate the principle of the supremacy of the Constitution and other constitutional values; such laws and legal acts might also infringe on the elements of democracy consolidated in the Constitution. However, in itself, the statement that a law or another legal act is in conflicts with the Constitution does not mean that the provision of Article 1 of the Constitution that the State of Lithuania is democratic is violated. The Constitutional Court must assess in every individual case whether a legal regulation declared to be unconstitutional denies the provision of Article 1 of the Constitution, under which the State of Lithuania is democratic.

Democratic state governance; the responsibility of the authorities to society; and the principle of responsible governance

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 13 December 2004

The constitutional requirement that the state power of the State of Lithuania must be organised in a democratic way and that the democratic political regime must be in place in the country is inseparable from the provision of Paragraph 3 of Article 5 of the Constitution, under which state institutions serve the people, as well as from the provision of Paragraph 2 of the same article, under which the scope of powers is limited by the Constitution. The nature of the democratic institutions of power is such that all persons who implement the political will of the people are controlled in various forms so that this will would not be distorted (decision of 29 May 1996). In its ruling of 1 July 2004 and conclusion of 5 November 2004, the Constitutional Court held that the Constitution consolidates the principle of responsible governance. The responsibility of the authorities to society is a principle found in a state under the rule of law, and it is established in the Constitution by providing that state institutions serve the people, that citizens have the right to govern the country either directly or through democratically elected representatives, to criticise the work of state institutions or that of their officials, and to file complaints against their decisions, also by guaranteeing citizens the possibility of defending their rights in a court and the right of petition, as well as by regulating the procedure for considering requests and complaints filed by citizens, etc. (ruling of 11 May 1999 and the conclusion of 5 November 2004).

The formation of political representative institutions in a democratic state

The Constitutional Court's conclusion of 10 November 2012

When emphasising the importance of elections to representative institutions, the Constitutional Court has held on more than one occasion that, in a constitutional democracy, the formation of political representative institutions is subject to special requirements. These institutions may not be formed in such a way that would raise doubts as to their legitimacy or lawfulness, inter alia, doubts as to whether the principles of a democratic state under the rule of law were upheld in the course of the election of persons to political representative institutions. Otherwise, the trust of people in representative democracy, state institutions, and the state itself would be undermined. Democratic elections are an important form of the participation of citizens in the governance of the state, as well as a necessary element of the formation of state political representative institutions. Elections may not be regarded as democratic or their results as legitimate and lawful if elections are held by infringing on the principles of democratic elections established in the Constitution and violating democratic electoral procedures (conclusion of 5 November 2004, the ruling of 1 October 2008, the conclusion of 7 November 2008, the rulings of 9 November 2010 and 29 March 2012, as well as the conclusion of 26 October 2012). In consolidating the provisions of electoral law in concrete laws, the legislature is obliged to follow these imperatives of the legal regulation that are consolidated in the Constitution (rulings of 1 October 2008 and 29 March 2012 and the conclusion of 26 October 2012).

Only a state that respects the dignity of each person can be considered democratic

The Constitutional Court's conclusion of 19 December 2017

... only such a state that has respect for the dignity of each person can be considered to be genuinely democratic.

Freedom of the media as a foundation of a pluralistic democracy

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 16 May 2019

... under the Constitution, Lithuania is a pluralistic democracy (ruling of 21 December 2006). It should be noted that freedom of the mass media, which is enshrined in the Constitution, inter alia, in Article 25 thereof, is one of the foundations of a pluralistic democracy.

A parliamentary minority as a necessary element of a pluralistic parliamentary democracy

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 18 December 2019

The provisions of Article 1 of the Constitution, as well as the principle of a state under the rule of law, which is established in the Constitution, determine the main principles of the organisation and activities of the state power of the State of Lithuania (rulings of 18 October 2000, 25 January 2001, and 29 March 2012); the provision of Article 1 of the Constitution that the State of Lithuania is democratic implies, inter alia, that the supremacy of the Constitution, the democratic decision-making process, and political pluralism must be ensured in the state (ruling of 19 September 2002); the majority principle is among the democratic principles of decision making (rulings of 22 July 1994, 4 April 2006, and 2 March 2018); the multi-party system creates the preconditions for ensuring political pluralism (ruling of 29 March 2012).

The Constitutional Court has noted that the Constitution consolidates parliamentary democracy; the model of parliamentary democracy, established in the Constitution, is rational and moderate (decisions of 21 November 2006 and 16 January 2014 and the ruling of 30 December 2015).

[...]

As emphasised by the Constitutional Court, under the Constitution, Lithuania is a pluralistic democracy (ruling of 21 December 2006, the conclusion of 22 December 2017, and the ruling of 16 May 2019); a necessary element of a pluralistic democracy is the recognition of the parliamentary opposition (rulings of 25 January 2001 and 4 April 2006 and the conclusion of 22 December 2017).

The Constitutional Court has noted that the Constitution implies the defence of the parliamentary minority and the minimum requirements for the protection of the opposition of the Seimas (rulings of 26 November 1993, 25 January 2001, and 4 April 2006); the Statute of the Seimas must lay down the guarantees for the functioning of the opposition (ruling of 25 January 2001).

... under the Constitution, Lithuania is a pluralistic parliamentary democracy, whose conditio sine qua non is the parliamentary minority, inter alia, the parliamentary opposition. It should be emphasised that the mission of the parliamentary minority, inter alia, that of the parliamentary opposition, is to reflect the diversity of political views in the parliament, thus ensuring political pluralism in the parliament of a democratic state under the rule of law and creating the preconditions for such a parliament to fulfil its functions; the mission of the parliamentary opposition is, inter alia, to propose a political programme alternative to the parliamentary majority and put forward political decisions based on this programme, as well as to monitor the political activities of the parliamentary majority, inter alia, to criticise it.

1.1.4. The form of government of the state

The form of government of the State of Lithuania

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 10 January 1998

On the basis of the competence of the institutions of state power as established by the Constitution of the Republic of Lithuania, the model of government of the State of Lithuania should be categorised as a parliamentary republican form of government. At the same time, it should be noted that the form of government of our state also has certain characteristics of the so-called mixed (semi-presidential) form of government. This is reflected in the powers of the Seimas, the powers of the Head of State – the President of the Republic, and the powers of the Government, as well as in the legal arrangement of their reciprocal interaction. The Lithuanian constitutional system lays down the principle of the responsibility of the Government to the Seimas, which determines the respective manner of forming the Government.

1.2. THE TERRITORIAL INTEGRITY OF THE STATE

The territorial integrity of the state (Article 10 of the Constitution) (on the administrative division of the state, see 10. Local self-government and governance)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 18 February 1998

Article 10 of the Constitution provides that the territory of the State of Lithuania is integral and is not divided into any state-like formations. It is this provision that contains the constitutional consolidation of the unitary state system and expresses the idea of the united and indivisible state.

1.3. AN OPEN, JUST, AND HARMONIOUS CIVIL SOCIETY AND A STATE UNDER THE RULE OF LAW

Justice as one of the main objectives of law and as the foundation of a state under the rule of law

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 22 December 1995

One of the main objectives of law as a means of regulating social life is justice. Justice is one of the most important moral values and it is [the foundation] of a state under the rule of law. The striving for justice and a state under the rule of law is consolidated in the Preamble to the Constitution. Justice may be implemented by ensuring a certain balance of interests and by avoiding contingencies and arbitrariness, the instability of social life, and clashes of interests. It is impossible to attain justice by recognising the interests of only one group or one person and by denying the interests of others at the same time.

The principles of a state under the rule of law in the area of the legal regulation governing the activity and responsibility of state officials

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 11 May 1999

In the area of the legal regulation of the activities of state institutions and officials, the principles of a state under the rule of law are implemented, among other things, by combining trust in state officials with public control over their activities and with their responsibility to society.

In a democratic state, officials and institutions must follow law. When carrying out the functions that are important to society and the state, officials must not be subject to any threats if they perform their duties without violating laws. ...

... The responsibility of the authorities to society is a principle found in a state under the rule of law. The principle of the responsibility of the authorities to society is constitutionally consolidated by providing that state institutions serve the people, that citizens have the right to govern the country either directly or through democratically elected representatives, that citizens have the right to criticise the work of state institutions or that of their officials, and to file complaints against their decisions; the said principle is constitutionally consolidated by guaranteeing citizens the possibility of defending their rights in a court, the right of criticism, and the right of petition, also by regulating the procedure for considering requests and complaints of citizens, etc.

Impeachment is one of the instruments of the self-protection of civil society. In the constitutions of democratic states, impeachment is considered a special procedure when the question of the constitutional responsibility of an official is decided. Providing for a special procedure for removing the top-ranking officials from office or that for the revocation of their mandate, public and democratic control over their activities is ensured; at the same time, such officials are granted additional guarantees that they would perform their duties on the basis of legislation and law.

[...]

One of the essential features of a state under the rule of law is the protection of the rights and freedoms of individuals. The norms regulating impeachment must not only create the possibility of removing a person from office or revoking his/her mandate, but also ensuring the rights of impeached persons. Impeachment proceedings can be recognised to be in line with the principles of a state under the rule of law when they are fair. This means that individuals must be equal before both the law and the institutions carrying out impeachment; they must have the right to be heard and the legally guaranteed possibility of defending their rights. If the principles of fair legal proceedings were not observed in the course of impeachment, this would indicate failure to meet the requirements of a state under the rule of law.

[...]

... the Seimas, exercising its discretion to establish a differentiated procedure for impeachment proceedings, is bound by the constitutional concept of impeachment. This concept implies fair legal proceedings, in which priority is given to the protection of the rights of the person. When guaranteeing the protection of the rights of individuals, it is necessary to pay regard to the fundamental principles of a state under the rule of law; such principles require that jurisdictional and other law-applying institutions be impartial and independent, that they seek to establish the objective truth, and that they adopt their decisions only on the grounds of law. This is possible only if the proceedings are public, the parties to the proceedings have equal rights, and the legal disputes, in particular those regarding the rights of the person, are decided by ensuring that the particular person has the right and possibility of defending those rights. In a state under the rule of law, the right of individuals to defend their rights is unquestionable. Since the Seimas, deciding the question of removing a person from office or that of revoking his/her mandate, acts as a jurisdictional institution, impeachment proceedings are subject to the same requirements.

When the question of constitutional or any other responsibility is decided, the aforesaid principles of a state under the rule of law are implemented both through the procedural rights of the person against whom this sanction is applied and through the guarantees of such rights. The recognition of the rights of an individual is a necessary element of the rule of law.

... the procedural rights must be ensured when the question of criminal or that of constitutional responsibility is decided. In the course of impeachment in the Seimas, it is necessary to ensure the right of the person whose constitutional responsibility is decided to take part in the proceedings and to defend himself/herself. Before adopting its decision, the Seimas must also hear the other party (audi alteram partem).

The principle of a state under the rule of law (in the sphere of state governance, it is allowed to give instructions only to a subordinate subject)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 23 November 1999

... [the principle of a state under the rule of law] also means that it is possible, in the sphere of state governance, to stipulate in a law or another legal act that a certain subject has the right to give instructions to another subject only if the relations of subordination between them are present. In other words, instructions may only be given to a subordinate.

The principle of a state under the rule of law

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 23 February 2000

The Preamble to the Constitution consolidates the striving for an open, just, and harmonious civil society and a state under the rule of law. It needs to be noted that the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law is a universal principle on which the entire legal system of Lithuania and the Constitution of the Republic of Lithuania itself are based, that the content of the principle of a state under the rule of law reveals itself in various provisions of the Constitution, and that this principle should be interpreted inseparably from the striving, declared in the Preamble to the Constitution, for an open, just, and harmonious civil society and a state under the rule of law. The principle of a state under the rule of law, which is consolidated in the Constitution, also implies, among other requirements, that human rights and freedoms must be ensured, that all institutions exercising state power and other state institutions must act on the basis of law and in compliance with law, that the Constitution is the supreme legal act, and that laws, government resolutions, and other legal acts must be in compliance with the Constitution.

The duty of the participants of the legislation process to bring in line with the Constitution all legal acts that they draft and adopt

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 18 October 2000

The Seimas and other participants of the legislation process must bring in line with the Constitution all legal acts that they draft and adopt. This is one of the main measures ensuring the constitutional order and one of the fundamental requirements of a state under the rule of law.

The principle of a state under the rule of law gives rise to the requirement for the proportionality of legal responsibility

See 3. Legal responsibility, 3.1. General provisions, the ruling of 2 October 2001 (proportionality of responsibility for violations of law).

The legal force of legal acts is prospective; law must be public

See 1.8. The foundations of lawmaking and of the application of law, 1.8.1. General provisions, the ruling of 29 November 2001.

The principle of the protection of legitimate expectations

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 18 December 2001

The principle of the protection of legitimate expectations is linked with the duty of all state institutions to observe the undertaken obligations. The said principle also means the protection of acquired rights, i.e. persons have the right to reasonably expect that they will retain their rights, acquired under effective legal acts, for the established period of time and will be able to implement these rights in reality. In its ruling of 12 July 2001, the Constitutional Court held that, under this principle, a legal regulation may be amended only in accordance with the procedure established in advance and without violating the principles and norms of the Constitution; when amending a legal regulation, it is necessary, inter alia, to comply with the principle of lex retro non agit and it is not permitted to deny the legitimate interests and legitimate expectations of persons by means of amendments to a legal regulation.

The balance among the values consolidated in the Constitution

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 4 March 2003

... the values consolidated in the Constitution constitute a harmonious system; there is a balance among them. In the event of a clash between the values protected by the Constitution, it is necessary to reach decisions ensuring that not a single of the said values is denied or unreasonably limited. Otherwise, the balance among the values protected by the Constitution, the constitutional imperative of a harmonious and civil society, as well as the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law, would be denied (ruling of 23 October 2002).

Legal certainty and legal clarity

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 30 May 2003

Legal certainty and legal clarity are among the essential elements of the principle of a state under the rule of law, which is consolidated in the Constitution. The imperative of legal certainty and legal clarity implies that any legal regulation must meet certain obligatory requirements. A legal regulation must be clear and harmonious; legal norms must be formulated precisely; and they may not contain ambiguities. Legal acts must be published in accordance with the established procedure; all subjects of legal relationships must have the possibility of access to such acts.

The principle of a state under the rule of law also means that a legal regulation may be amended only in accordance with the procedure established in advance and without violating the principles and norms of the Constitution; when amending a legal regulation, it is necessary, inter alia, to comply with the principle of lex retro non agit (ruling of 12 July 2001).

It was held in the Constitutional Court's ruling of 29 November 2001 that the requirement that only published legal acts are effective is also an essential element of the principle of a state under the rule of law. Law must be public. The constitutional requirements that only published legal acts are effective and that they must be prospective are an important precondition for legal certainty.

The hierarchy of legal acts

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 30 December 2003

... the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law also implies the hierarchy of legal acts, inter alia, it implies that substatory legal acts may not be in conflict with laws, with constitutional laws, and with the Constitution, that substatory legal acts must be adopted on the basis of laws, and that a substatory legal act is an act of the application of the norms of a law irrespective of whether that act has one-off (ad hoc) application or permanent validity.

The framework of state institutions and the procedure for forming state institutions in a state under the rule of law

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 25 May 2004

Justice, an open and harmonious civil society, and a state under the rule of law would not be possible if all state power were held by a certain single state authority institution. The Constitution consolidates such a framework of institutions exercising state power and such a procedure of their formation whereby a balance among state authority institutions is ensured, the powers of certain state authority institutions are balanced by the powers of other state authority institutions, all institutions exercising state power act in harmony and carry out their constitutional obligation to serve the people, the Constitutional Court resolves disputes related to the powers vested by the Constitution in the institutions of state power, all institutions exercising state power – the Seimas, the President of the Republic, the Government, and the judiciary, as well as other state institutions, are formed only from such citizens who, without reservations, obey the Constitution adopted by the Nation and who, while in office, unconditionally observe the Constitution and law, and act in the interests of the Nation and the State of Lithuania.

The principle of a state under the rule of law

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 13 December 2004

The striving for an open, just, and harmonious civil society and a state under the rule of law is declared in the Preamble to the Constitution. The said striving is one of the strivings of the Nation, who adopted the Constitution of the Republic of Lithuania by the referendum of 25 October 1992 precisely for implementing these strivings. In its ruling of 11 July 2002, the Constitutional Court held that the striving for an open, just, and harmonious civil society and a state under the rule of law, declared in the Preamble to the Constitution, is enshrined from various aspects and in various provisions of the Constitution, that the striving for a state under the rule of law, enshrined in the Constitution, should be interpreted inseparably from other provisions of the Constitution in which the principle of a state under the rule of law is consolidated, and that the striving for a state under the rule of law is expressed by the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law.

When interpreting the content of the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law, the Constitutional Court has held more than once in its rulings that the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law is a universal principle on which the entire legal system of Lithuania and the Constitution of the Republic of Lithuania itself are based, that the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law should be interpreted inseparably from the striving for an open, just, and harmonious civil society and a state under the rule of law, as declared in the Preamble to the Constitution, and that the content of the said constitutional principle reveals itself in various provisions of the Constitution.

The essence of the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law is the rule of law. The constitutional imperative of the rule of law means that freedom of state power is limited by means of law, which must be obeyed by all subjects of legal relationships, including law-making subjects. It should be stressed that the discretion of all law-making subjects is limited by supreme law – the Constitution. All legal acts, as well as decisions of all state and municipal institutions and officials, must comply with and not contradict the Constitution.

The Constitutional Court has held that the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law must be followed both in making and in implementing law (ruling of 6 December 2000). The compliance of each legal institution with the Constitution must be assessed according to how such an institution complies with the constitutional principles of a state under the rule of law (ruling of 11 May 1999).

The constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law is an especially broad constitutional principle and comprises a wide range of various interrelated imperatives. Thus, it should be stressed that the content of the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law should be revealed by taking account of various provisions of the Constitution and by assessing all values consolidated, defended, and protected by the Constitution, and by having regard to the content of various other constitutional principles as, for instance: the principle of the supremacy of the Constitution, its integrity and direct application; the sovereignty of the Nation; democracy; responsible governance; the limitation of the scope of powers and the principle that state institutions serve the people; the publicity of law; justice (comprising, inter alia, natural justice); the separation of powers; civic consciousness; the equality of persons before the law, courts, state institutions, and officials; respect for and the protection of human rights and freedoms (comprising, inter alia, the recognition that human rights and freedoms are innate); the balancing of the interests of a person and society; the secularity of the state and its neutrality in world-view matters; the social orientation of the state; social solidarity (combined with the responsibility of everyone for their own fate); and other constitutional principles of no less importance. The constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law is consolidated not only by the striving for an open, just, and harmonious civil society and a state under the rule of law, as declared in the Preamble to the Constitution, but, from various aspects, also by all other provisions of the Constitution. In its ruling of 19 September 2002, the Constitutional Court held that the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law also embodies the striving for an open, just, and harmonious civil society and a state under the rule of law, as enshrined in the Preamble to the Constitution. The constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law integrates various values consolidated, protected, and defended by the Constitution, including those that are expressed by the aforementioned striving.

Thus, the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law may not be interpreted as a principle that is consolidated only in the Preamble to the Constitution, nor may it be identified only with the declared therein striving for an open, just, and harmonious civil society and a state under the rule of law. On the other hand, since the content of the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law should be interpreted without denying any single provision of the Constitution, none of the provisions of the Constitution – not a single constitutional principle or constitutional norm – may be interpreted in such a way that would deviate from the requirements of a state under the rule of law that arise from the Constitution, since the content of the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law and, thus, also the constitutional concept of a state under the rule of law would be distorted or even denied. All provisions of the Constitution should be interpreted in the context of the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law and the constitutionally consolidated concept of a state under the rule of law. The function of the constitutional doctrine is to disclose the content of the concept of a state under the rule of law (ruling of 11 May 1999).

[...]

... an investigation into the compliance of legal acts (parts thereof) with the striving for an open, just, and harmonious civil society and a state under the rule of law, as enshrined in the Preamble to the Constitution, implies an investigation into their compliance with the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law. It should also be noted that the non-compliance of a legal act (part thereof) with any imperative (any element of the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law) dictated by the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law – a universal constitutional principle integrating various values consolidated, protected, and defended by the Constitution – means that the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law is also violated.

Legal certainty, legal security, and the protection of legitimate expectations

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 13 December 2004

... Legal certainty, legal security, and the protection of legitimate expectations are inseparable elements of the principle of a state under the rule of law. The principle of legal security is one of the essential elements of the principle of a state under the rule of law, which is consolidated in the Constitution; the principle of legal security means the duty of the state to ensure the certainty and stability of a legal regulation, to protect the rights of the subjects of legal relationships, including acquired rights, as well as to respect legitimate interests and legitimate expectations. If legal certainty, legal security, and the protection of legitimate expectations are not ensured, the trust of persons in the state and law will not be ensured, either. The state must fulfil its obligations undertaken to a person.

In its rulings of 4 July 2003 and 3 December 2003, the Constitutional Court held that one of the elements of the principle of legitimate expectations is the protection of such rights that were acquired under the Constitution and under those laws and other legal acts that were not in conflict with the Constitution. It should be noted that, under the Constitution, in the relationships of a person with the state, only those expectations of a person are protected and defended that arise from the Constitution itself or from the laws and other legal acts that are not in conflict with the Constitution. Only such expectations of a person in relationships with the state are considered legitimate.

The constitutional protection of legitimate interests of a person should be interpreted inseparably from the principle of justice, which is consolidated in the Constitution, from the protection of acquired rights, which is also consolidated in the Constitution, and from the necessity to ensure the trust of a person who obeys law and follows the requirements of laws in the state and law. The trust of a person in the state and law, as well as the protection of legitimate interests, as constitutional values, are inseparable from the presumption of the constitutionality and legitimacy of legal acts. Legal acts (parts thereof) are considered to be in compliance with the Constitution and legitimate until the moment when, according to the procedure established by the Constitution and the Law on the Constitutional Court, they are ruled to be in conflict with the Constitution (or in conflict with the Constitution and/or laws if the said legal acts are substatutory). Thus, until the moment when legal acts (parts thereof), according to the procedure established by the Law on the Constitutional Court, are ruled to be in conflict with the Constitution (or in conflict with the Constitution and/or laws if the said legal acts are substatutory) or until the moment when, according to the established procedure, they are declared no longer effective, the legal regulation established therein is binding on the respective subjects of legal relationships. The Constitution protects and defends a person who obeys law and follows the requirements of laws. Failure to pay regard to this provision would also mean derogation from the principle of justice, which is consolidated in the Constitution.

It should be stressed that there may be such factual situations where a person who met the conditions established in legal acts, under the said legal acts, acquired particular rights and, therefore, gained expectations that could be considered by this person to be reasonably legitimate during the period of the validity of the said legal acts; therefore, such a person could reasonably expect that, if he/she obeyed law and fulfilled the requirements of laws, his/her expectations would be held legitimate by the state and would be defended and protected. Such expectations may arise even from those legal acts that, on the basis and according to the procedure established in the Constitution and laws, are later ruled to be in conflict with the Constitution (or in conflict with the Constitution and/or laws if the said legal acts are substatutory). In this context, it should be noted that there may also be such factual situations where a person had already implemented his/her rights and obligations arising from a legal act that was later ruled to be in conflict with the Constitution (or in conflict with the Constitution and/or laws if the said legal act was substatutory) with regard to other persons and, due to this, under legal acts, those other persons also gained the respective expectations and could reasonably expect that the state would defend and protect such expectations. It should be especially stressed that, in certain cases, quite a long period of time may pass from the moment when such expectations emerge until the relevant legal acts are ruled to be in conflict with the Constitution (or in conflict with the Constitution and/or laws if the said legal acts are substatutory). The imperative of a balance among constitutional values, the constitutional requirements of legal certainty and legal security, the protection of acquired rights, which is enshrined in the Constitution, and the presumption of the constitutionality and legitimacy of legal acts determine, inter alia, the fact that the Constitution generally does not preclude protecting and defending, in certain special cases, also such acquired rights of a person that arise from the legal acts that are later ruled to be in conflict with the Constitution (or in conflict with the Constitution and/or laws if the said legal acts are substatutory), because failure to defend or protect such acquired rights would result in greater harm to such a person, other persons, society, or the state than the harm sustained by such a person, other persons, society, or the state [if the aforesaid rights were completely or partially protected and defended]. When deciding whether the acquired rights gained by the person during the period of the validity of a legal act that is later ruled to be in conflict with the Constitution (or in conflict with the Constitution and/or laws if the said legal act is substatutory) should be protected and defended (and if so, to what extent such acquired rights should be protected and defended), it is necessary to find out in each case whether, in the event of failure to protect and defend such acquired rights, other values protected by the Constitution would be violated and whether the balance among the values consolidated, protected, and defended by the Constitution would be disturbed. After certain legal acts are ruled to be in conflict with the Constitution (or in conflict with the Constitution and/or laws if the said legal acts are substatory) and, due to this, certain persons who obeyed law, followed the requirements of laws, and trusted the state and its law may suffer negative consequences, the legislature has the constitutional obligation to assess all the related circumstances and, if necessary, to establish such a legal regulation that would create the possibility in the aforementioned special cases to fully or partially protect and defend the acquired rights of the persons who obeyed law and followed the requirements of laws, where such acquired rights arose from legal acts that were later ruled to be in conflict with the Constitution (or in conflict with the Constitution and/or laws if the said legal acts were substatory), in order that the principle of justice, enshrined in the Constitution, would not be derogated from, either.

At the same time, it should be emphasised that the Constitution does not protect and does not defend any such rights acquired by a person that are privileges in terms of their content; the defence and protection of privileges would mean the violation of the constitutional principles of the equality of the rights of persons and justice, as well as the violation of the imperative of harmonious society, consolidated in the Constitution, and, thus, also the violation of the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law.

The right to judicial protection as an element of the principle of a state under the rule of law

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 13 December 2004

The jurisprudence of the Constitutional Court has on more than one occasion pointed to the imperative, arising from the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law and from other provisions of the Constitution, according to which a person who believes that his/her rights and freedoms have been violated has an absolute right to access an independent and impartial court that would settle a dispute. The right of a person to apply to a court also implies his/her right to the due process of law; the latter right is a necessary condition for the administration of justice. It should be emphasised that the constitutional right of a person to apply to a court may not be artificially restricted and the implementation of this right may not be unreasonably burdened.

The requirements stemming from the principle of a state under the rule of law for law-making subjects

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 13 December 2004

The constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law implies various requirements for the legislature and other law-making subjects: law-making subjects are allowed to pass legal acts only without exceeding their powers; the requirements established in legal acts must be based on general provisions (i.e. certain legal norms and principles) that could be applied to all envisaged subjects of certain legal relationships; any differentiated legal regulation must be based only on the objective differences in the situation of the subjects of certain social relationships regulated by the respective legal acts; in order to ensure that the subjects of legal relationships are aware of the requirements set with respect to them by law, legal norms must be established in advance, legal acts must be published officially, and such acts must be public and accessible; a legal regulation established in laws and other legal acts must be clear, comprehensible, and coherent; the formulations in legal acts must be precise; the consistency and internal harmony of the legal system must be ensured; and legal acts may not contain provisions simultaneously regulating the same social relationships in a different manner; in order that the subjects of legal relationships could act in accordance with the requirements of law, a legal regulation must be relatively stable; legal acts may not demand impossible things (lex non cogit ad impossibilia); the effect of legal acts is prospective, whereas the retroactive effect of laws and other legal acts is not permitted (lex retro non agit), unless the situation of a subject of legal relationships would be alleviated without prejudice to other subjects of legal relationships (lex benignior retro agit); those violations of law for which responsibility is established in legal acts must be clearly defined; when imposing legal restrictions and responsibility for violations of law, regard must be paid to the requirement of reasonableness and the principle of proportionality; according to the principle of proportionality, the established legal measures must be necessary in a democratic society and suitable for achieving legitimate and universally important objectives (there must be a balance between such objectives and measures); these measures may not restrict the rights of persons more than necessary in order to achieve the said objectives and, if those legal measures are related to sanctions for a violation of law, in such a case, the said sanctions must be proportionate to the committed violation of law; when legally regulating certain social relationships, it is obligatory to pay regard to the requirements of natural justice, comprising, inter alia, the necessity to ensure the equality of persons before the law, courts, state institutions, and officials; legal acts must be passed in accordance with the established procedural law-making requirements, including the requirements established by the law-making subject itself; etc.

The requirement stemming from the principle of a state under the rule of law for law-making subjects to respect the hierarchy of legal acts

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 13 December 2004

The constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law and other constitutional imperatives give rise to the requirement for the legislature to pay regard to the hierarchy of legal acts, which stems from the Constitution. This requirement means, inter alia, that lower-ranking legal acts are prohibited from regulating such social relationships that may be regulated only by means of higher-ranking legal acts, also that lower-ranking legal acts are prohibited from laying down such a legal regulation that would compete with that established in higher-ranking legal acts. ... through a substatory legal act the norms of a law are realised; therefore, a substatory legal act may not replace a law or create any new legal norms of a general nature that would compete with the norms of a law, because the supremacy of laws over substatory legal acts, which is consolidated in the Constitution, would thus be violated (ruling of 21 August 2002); it should also be stressed that substatory legal acts may not be in conflict with laws, constitutional laws, and the Constitution; substatory legal acts must be adopted on the basis of laws, because a substatory legal act is an act of the application of the norms of a law irrespective of whether such a substatory legal act has one-off (ad hoc) application or permanent validity (ruling of 30 December 2003).

There is no delegated legislation in Lithuania (rulings of 26 October 1995, 19 December 1996, 3 June 1999, and 5 March 2004); therefore, the Seimas – the legislature – cannot assign the Government or other institutions to regulate, by means of substatory legal acts, the legal relationships that, under the Constitution, must be regulated by means of laws; while the Government may not accept such powers. The said relationships may not be regulated by means of substatory acts of the Seimas, either.

... according to the Constitution, a legal regulation related to defining the content of human rights and freedoms or consolidating the guarantees of their implementation may be established only by means of a law. On the other hand, in cases where the Constitution does not require that particular relationships linked with human rights and with their implementation be regulated by means of a law, such relationships may also be regulated by means of substatory acts – acts that regulate the process (procedural) relationships of implementing human rights, the procedure for implementing individual human rights, etc.; however, under no circumstances may substatory acts establish such a legal regulation of the relationships linked with human rights and with their implementation that would compete with the one established in a law.

It should also be stressed that such failure to adhere to the form of a legal act where the Constitution requires that certain relationships must be regulated by means of a law, but they are regulated by means of a substatory act (irrespective of whether such relationships are, from any aspect, additionally regulated in a law the legal regulation established in which is challenged by the legal regulation laid down in a substatory act, or irrespective of the fact that no law regulates such relationships at all), may provide the sufficient grounds for declaring such a substatory legal act unconstitutional. Under the Constitution, it is the Constitutional Court that decides whether the substatory legal acts of the Seimas, the President of the Republic, or the Government, according to their form, are in conflict with the Constitution. When making such a decision, in every case, the Constitutional Court assesses all circumstances of the case, inter alia, the place of the reviewed legal regulation in the entire legal system, its objective, as well as the intentions of the law-making subject, the development of the legal regulation of the respective relationships and its changes before the legal act at issue was passed (legislative history), etc.

It should also be stressed that, in cases where substatory legal acts are ruled to be in conflict with the Constitution according to their form (due to the fact that they regulated such relationships that can be regulated only by means of a law) and may no longer be applied, it is necessary to pay regard to the requirement, arising from the Constitution, to assess whether other values protected by the Constitution will be violated, or whether the balance among the values consolidated, protected, and defended by the Constitution will be disturbed, in the event of failure to protect and defend those rights of persons that were acquired during the period of the validity of the said substatory legal acts. In these special cases, the legislature is under the constitutional obligation, having assessed all circumstances and having found that this is necessary, to establish such a legal regulation that would provide for the possibility of protecting and defending, fully or partially, the acquired rights of persons who obeyed law, followed the requirements of laws, and had trust in the state and its law in cases where those rights were acquired under the legal acts that were later ruled to be in conflict with the Constitution according to their form (due to the fact that they regulated such relationships that can only be regulated by means of a law); such a legal regulation established by the legislature must ensure that the principle of justice, enshrined in the Constitution, would not be derogated from.

The requirements stemming from the principle of a state under the rule of law for law-applying subjects

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 13 December 2004

The constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law must also be followed in applying law. When law is applied, inter alia, it is necessary to pay regard to the following requirements arising from the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law as, for instance: law-applying institutions must comply with the requirement of the equality of the rights of persons; it is not permitted to punish anyone twice for the same violation of law (non bis in idem); responsibility (sanction, punishment) for any violations of law must be established in advance (nulla poena sine lege); no act is criminal unless it is defined as such by means of a law (nullum crimen sine lege), etc. In this context, mention should be made of the fact that the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law requires that jurisdictional and other law-applying institutions be impartial and independent, that they seek to establish the objective truth, and that they adopt their decisions only on the basis of law (rulings of 11 May 1999, 19 September 2000, and 24 January 2003).

Article 110 of the Constitution provides that judges may not apply any laws that are in conflict with the Constitution. In the light of the hierarchy of legal acts, which stems from the Constitution, this provision of the Constitution also means that judges may not apply any such substatory legal acts that are in conflict with the Constitution. Moreover, judges may not apply any such substatory legal acts that are in conflict with a law. On the other hand, the aforementioned provision of the Constitution reflects the constitutional principle – one of the essential elements of the constitutionally consolidated principle of a state under the rule of law – that a legal act that is in conflict with a higher-ranking legal act may not be applied.

It should be noted that laws must be executed until the moment when they are amended or repealed or, according to the procedure established by the Law on the Constitutional Court, ruled to be in conflict with the Constitution (or in conflict with the Constitution and/or laws if the acts declared unconstitutional are substatory). ... it should be especially emphasised that, until the moment when laws are amended or, according to the procedure established by the Law on the Constitutional Court, are ruled to be in conflict with the Constitution, all subjects of legal relationships, consequently, including the Government, must execute and apply such laws within their competence; it is not allowed that the Government, which must itself apply laws and/or ensure that other state and municipal institutions and officials apply them, instead of performing the duties established for it by laws and/or ensuring that other state and municipal institutions and officials perform the duties established by laws for them, by means of its substatory legal acts establish such a legal regulation that would compete with the one laid down in laws and would completely or partially exempt the Government and/or other state and municipal institutions and officials from the performance of the aforementioned duties.

[...]

One of the numerous aspects of the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law (directly related to the constitutional principle of the equality of the rights of persons) is that similar cases must be decided in a similar manner. Therefore, the discretion of jurisdictional institutions, when they resolve disputes and apply law, is limited. In its rulings of 21 July 2001 and 30 May 2003, as well as in its decision of 13 February 2004, the Constitutional Court held that the principle of a state under the rule of law, which is enshrined in the Constitution, implies, inter alia, the continuity of jurisprudence.

The proportionality of responsibility for violations of law

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 3 November 2005

While interpreting the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law, the Constitutional Court has held that this principle implies various requirements for the legislature and other law-making subjects, inter alia: those violations of law for which responsibility is established in legal acts must be clearly defined; when legal restrictions and responsibility for violations of law are imposed, regard must be paid to the requirement of reasonableness and the principle of proportionality; according to the principle of proportionality, the established legal measures must be necessary in a democratic society and suitable for achieving legitimate and universally important objectives (there must be a balance between such objectives and measures); these measures may not restrict the rights of persons more than necessary in order to achieve the said objectives and, where these legal measures are related to sanctions for a violation of law, in such a case, the said sanctions must be proportionate to the committed violation of law; when social relationships are legally regulated, it is obligatory to pay regard to the requirements of natural justice, comprising, inter alia, the necessity to ensure the equality of persons before the law, courts, state institutions, or officials (ruling of 13 December 2004).

Thus, the constitutional principles of justice and a state under the rule of law also mean that there must be a fair balance (proportionality) between, on the one hand, the pursued objective to punish the violators of law and to ensure the prevention of violations of law and, on the other hand, the chosen measures to achieve this objective; the sanctions (penalties, punishments) that are established for violations of law must be proportionate to such violations. The constitutional principles of justice and a state under the rule of law do not permit establishing such penalties for violations of law and such amounts of fines that would clearly be disproportionate (inadequate) to the violation of law and the objective pursued (rulings of 6 December 2000, 2 October 2001, and 26 January 2004). The amounts of fines established for violations of laws must be such that are necessary for the pursued legitimate and universally important objective – to ensure that laws are observed and the established duties are carried out (ruling of 26 January 2004).

The principle of bona fides

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 27 June 2007

Under the Constitution, the subjects of legal relationships are under the duty to behave in good faith and without violating law. They have the duty to make effort by themselves to find out the requirements of law. This is required by the general legal principle of bona fides, which is inseparable from the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law.

The principle of the protection of legitimate expectations

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 5 July 2007

The protection of legitimate expectations is one of the elements of the principle of a state under the rule of law, which is consolidated in the Constitution. The said protection implies, inter alia, that the state is under the duty to ensure the certainty and stability of a legal regulation, to protect the rights of the subjects of legal relationships, including acquired rights, and to respect legitimate interests. ...

The principle of the protection of legitimate expectations implies the duty of the state, as well as the duty of institutions implementing state power and other state institutions, to observe the obligations assumed by the state. The said principle also means the protection of acquired rights, i.e. persons have the right to reasonably expect that they will retain their rights acquired under effective laws or other legal acts that are not in conflict with the Constitution for the established period of time and will be able to implement these rights in reality.

Trust in the state and in law (state and municipal institutions must fulfil their obligations)

The Constitutional Court's decision of 13 November 2007

... state and municipal institutions must fulfil their obligations. If state and municipal institutions could decide not to fulfil their obligations, for instance, by justifying such a decision by the fact that the entire state was facing particularly serious economic and financial difficulties, even after the said difficulties have been dealt with, it would have to be stated that those institutions are likely to ignore the legitimate expectations of various persons where such expectations arise from the obligations undertaken by the said institutions, and that the same institutions are likely to violate the rights of the said persons. Thus, the trust of people in the state and in law would be undermined. State and municipal institutions may not arbitrarily refrain from the fulfilment of obligations undertaken by them. The Constitution does not tolerate this.

Legal certainty and legal clarity

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 24 December 2008

... The imperative of legal certainty and legal clarity implies that a legal regulation must meet certain obligatory requirements: a legal regulation must be clear and harmonious; legal norms must be formulated precisely and may not contain any ambiguities (rulings of 30 May 2003 and 26 January 2004). ... the notions (formulations) that are related to the implementation and limitation of constitutional human rights must be very clear, defined, and comprehensible.

A legal act that is in conflict with a higher-ranking legal act may not be applied

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 2 March 2009

One of the essential elements of the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law is the principle whereby a legal act that is in conflict with a higher-ranking legal act must not be applied. The Constitutional Court has held that, while administering justice, courts must invoke only those laws and legal acts that are not in conflict with the Constitution; courts may not apply a law that is in conflict with the Constitution (rulings of 13 December 2004, 16 January 2006, and 27 June 2007).

Justice as one of the main objectives of law and as the foundation of a state under the rule of law

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 29 November 2010

In its acts, the Constitutional Court has also held on more than one occasion that the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law is inseparable from the principle of justice and vice versa (inter alia, the rulings of 17 March 2003, 3 December 2003, 24 December 2008, 8 October 2009, and 28 May 2010). Thus, the constitutional principle of justice is an inseparable element of the content of the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law.

In its acts, the Constitutional Court has also held on more than one occasion that justice is one of the main objectives of law, as a means of regulating social relationships; justice is one of the most important moral values and [the foundation] of a state under the rule of law; justice may be implemented by ensuring a certain balance of interests and by escaping fortuity and arbitrariness, the instability of social life, and clashes of interests (rulings of 22 December 1995, 6 December 2000, 17 March 2003, 17 November 2003, 3 December 2003, and 24 December 2008, the decision of 20 April 2010, and the ruling of 29 June 2010).

The duty of the legislature to provide for a proper vacatio legis

See 5. The Seimas, 5.5. The procedure of activities of the Seimas, 5.5.2. The legislation process; the ruling of 15 February 2013.

The principle of a state under the rule of law

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 1 July 2013

... the essence of the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law is the rule of law. The constitutional imperative of the rule of law means that freedom of state power is limited by means of law, which must be obeyed by all subjects of legal relationships, including law-making subjects (ruling of 13 December 2004).

Paragraph 2 of Article 5 of the Constitution provides that the scope of powers is limited by the Constitution.

Interpreting Paragraph 2 of Article 5 of the Constitution, the Constitutional Court has noted on more than one occasion that the Seimas, as the legislative institution that passes laws and other legal acts, is autonomous inasmuch as its powers and its wide discretion are not limited by the Constitution, inter alia, by the constitutional principles of a state under the rule of law, the separation of powers, responsible governance, the protection of legitimate expectations, legal clarity, as well as by other principles.

It needs to be emphasised that, when it passes laws, the Seimas is bound not only by the Constitution, but also by its own laws. This is an essential element of the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law (inter alia, the rulings of 24 January 2003 and 24 September 2009).

The principle of a state under the rule of law (requirement to ensure human rights and freedoms; the principles of proportionality, justice, legal certainty, legal security, and the protection of legitimate expectations; the link with the principle of the equality of the rights of persons)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 14 April 2014

The Constitutional Court has held that the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law is a universal principle on which the entire legal system of Lithuania and the Constitution itself are based. The constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law is especially broad and comprises a wide range of various interrelated imperatives.

The Constitutional Court has held on more than one occasion that the principle of a state under the rule of law, which is consolidated in the Constitution, in addition to other requirements, also implies that human rights and freedoms must be ensured (inter alia, the rulings of 23 February 2000, 22 December 2010, 16 May 2013, and 9 October 2013).

The Constitutional Court has also held in its acts on more than one occasion that the constitutional principle of proportionality is one of the elements of the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law; the principle of proportionality means that the measures provided for by law must be in line with the legitimate objectives that are important to society, that such measures must be necessary in order to reach the said objectives, and that such measures must not restrict the rights and freedoms of a person clearly more than necessary in order to reach the said objectives (inter alia, the rulings of 11 December 2009, 15 February 2013, 16 May 2013, and 9 October 2013).

The requirement, in accordance with the constitutional principle of proportionality, not to limit the rights and freedoms of a person more than necessary in order to reach the legitimate objectives that are important to society, inter alia, implies the requirement for the legislature to establish a legal regulation that would create the preconditions for the sufficient individualisation of limitations on the rights and freedoms of a person: a legal regulation limiting the rights and freedoms of a person, as provided for in a law, must be such that would create the preconditions for assessing, to the extent possible, an individual position of each person and, in view of all important circumstances, for individualising, accordingly, the specific measures that are applicable to and limit the rights of that person (ruling of 7 July 2011).

The Constitutional Court has noted that the content of the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law should be revealed by taking account of the content of various other constitutional principles, including the principle of justice (which comprises, inter alia, natural justice). Any disregard of the principle of justice, which is consolidated in the Constitution, would also mean disregard of the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law (rulings of 3 November 2005, 22 December 2010, and 9 October 2013). Justice may not be achieved through the satisfaction of the interests of exclusively one group and the simultaneous denial of the interests of others (rulings of 4 March 2003 and 9 October 2013).

The Constitutional Court has held on more than one occasion that legal certainty, legal security, and the protection of legitimate expectations are inseparable elements of the principle of a state under the rule of law. The constitutional principles of legal certainty, legal security, and the protection of legitimate expectations imply the duty of the state to ensure the certainty and stability of a legal regulation, to protect the rights of persons, and to respect legitimate interests and legitimate expectations. These principles, inter alia, imply that the state must fulfil all its obligations undertaken to a person. If legal certainty, legal security, and the protection of legitimate expectations are not ensured, the trust of persons in the state and in law will not be ensured, either.

The constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law is also inseparable from the principle of the equality of the rights of persons, which is consolidated in the Constitution, inter alia, in Article 29 thereof. A violation of the constitutional principle of the equality of the rights of persons is, at the same time, a violation of the constitutional imperatives of justice and harmonious society; thus, such a violation is also a violation of the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law (inter alia, the rulings of 6 February 2012, 14 December 2012, 30 April 2013, and 1 July 2013).

[...]

... the mere fact that, in view of a certain legal regulation, an exception is made does not mean that the principles of legal certainty, legal security, and the protection of legitimate expectations of a person are violated.

The principle of ex injuria jus non oritur

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 12 June 2020

... as stated by the Constitutional Court, the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law gives rise to the requirement that the general legal principle of ex injuria jus non oritur (illegal acts cannot create law) must be respected (inter alia, the rulings of 30 December 2003, 27 May 2014, and 25 November 2019).

1.4. THE SUPREMACY OF THE CONSTITUTION

See 1.8. The foundations of lawmaking and of the application of law, 1.8.4. The hierarchy of legal acts, 1.8.4.2. The Constitution, 1.8.4.2.1. The supremacy of the Constitution.

1.5. THE SEPARATION OF POWERS

The principle of the separation of powers (Article 5 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 6 December 1995

Paragraph 1 of Article 5 of the Constitution prescribes: "In Lithuania, state power shall be executed by the Seimas, the President of the Republic and the Government, and the Judiciary." The content of this norm is revealed in other articles of the Constitution. The competence of each institution of state power is established in accordance with its mission; such competence is determined by the place of that branch of power in the general system of the branches of power and by its relationship with the other branches of power.

The Seimas passes laws, considers the programme of the Government presented by the Prime Minister, supervises the activities of the Government, appoints judges in the cases provided for by the Constitution, and decides other issues prescribed in Article 67 of the Constitution. The President of the Republic, who is the Head of State, represents the State of Lithuania and performs everything that he/she is assigned to perform by the Constitution and laws. The Government manages national affairs, executes laws and resolutions of the Seimas, prepares a draft state budget and executes the state budget when it is approved by the Seimas, and implements other powers of the Government. Courts administer justice. Thus, the independence of separate branches of power, as well as a balance among them, is established in the Constitution.

The principle of the separation of powers; cooperation among state institutions (Article 5 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 10 January 1998

Article 5 of the Constitution prescribes: "In Lithuania, state power shall be executed by the Seimas, the President of the Republic and the Government, and the Judiciary." This norm, the content of which is particularised in other articles of the Constitution, consolidates the principle of the separation of powers in the state. This is the fundamental principle of the organisation and functioning of a democratic state under the rule of law. As it was noted in the Constitutional Court's ruling of 26 October 1995, this principle means that legislative power, executive power, and judicial power must be separated, sufficiently autonomous, but, at the same time, these branches of power must be balanced. Every institution of state power is conferred competence in accordance with its mission; the concrete content of such competence depends on the place of that institution among other institutions of state power and on the relation of its powers with the powers of other institutions.

Every branch of state power occupies a certain place in the system of state power and performs the functions characteristic of only that branch of power. The Seimas, which is composed of the representatives of the Nation – the members of the Seimas, passes laws, supervises the activity of the Government, approves the state budget and supervises its execution, and decides other issues provided for in the Constitution. The President of the Republic – the Head of State – represents the state and performs everything that he/she is assigned to perform by the Constitution and laws; while the Government is an executive institution of this country, which executes laws and other legal acts and manages national affairs. Courts administer justice.

Paragraph 2 of Article 5 of the Constitution provides that the scope of powers is limited by the Constitution. In the implementation of the general tasks and functions of the state, the activities of state institutions are based on their cooperation; therefore, their interrelations should be defined as interfunctional partnership. One of the ways to ensure cooperation among state institutions is the principle of the responsibility of the government to the parliament; the said principle is consolidated in the constitutions of most European states.

The principle of the separation of powers; the reciprocal control and balance of the institutions of state power, as well as partnership among the institutions of state power; the prohibition on taking over, transferring, waiving, and changing or limiting, by means of a law, the powers of a state authority institution that are directly established in the Constitution

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 21 April 1998

The main principles of the organisation and activities of the state authorities of the State of Lithuania are determined by the fundamental provision "The State of Lithuania shall be an independent democratic republic" of Article 1 of the Constitution and by the striving for a state under the rule of law, which is consolidated in the Preamble to the Constitution.

Paragraph 1 of Article 5 of the Constitution prescribes: "In Lithuania, state power shall be executed by the Seimas, the President of the Republic and the Government, and the Judiciary." ...

In its rulings of 26 October 1995 and 10 January 1998, as well as in its decision of 13 November 1997, the Constitutional Court noted that the principle of the separation of powers means that legislative power, executive power, and judicial power must be separated, sufficiently autonomous, but, at the same time, these branches of power must be balanced. Every institution of state power is conferred competence in accordance with its mission; the concrete content of such competence depends on the form of government of the state.

The status of the state supreme institutions is, first of all, based on the powers directly consolidated in the Constitution: the powers of the Seimas are consolidated in Article 67, those of the President of the Republic are consolidated in Article 84, and those of the Government are laid down in Article 94 of the Constitution. The status of the Constitutional Court is consolidated in Chapter VIII, and the status of courts is enshrined in Chapter IX of the Constitution.

Other articles of the Constitution also contain the directly consolidated powers of the state supreme institutions (e.g. decisions concerning state loans and other basic property liabilities of the state are adopted by the Seimas (Paragraph 1 of Article 128); the Seimas hears a conclusion submitted by the Auditor General concerning the report on the annual execution of the budget (Paragraph 2 of Article 134); in the period between the sessions of the Seimas, the President of the Republic decides in concrete cases whether to give his/her consent for bringing a judge to criminal responsibility, or for detaining him/her, or for restricting his/her liberty otherwise (Paragraph 2 of Article 114); the President of the Republic is the Commander-in-Chief of the Armed Forces of the State (Paragraph 2 of Article 140); the Government appoints representatives to supervise the observance of the Constitution and laws by municipalities (Paragraph 2 of Article 123); the Government prepares a draft state budget (Article 130)).

In defining the functions and powers of the state supreme institutions, the Constitution also provides for their reciprocal control and balance, as well as for their partnership. For example, the President of the Republic is entitled to appoint the Prime Minister; however, he/she may implement this right only after the assent of the Seimas is given (Item 6 of Article 67, Items 4 and 5 of Article 84, Paragraph 1 of Article 92 of the Constitution); the Seimas appoints the judges and the President of the Supreme Court (Item 10 of Article 67 of the Constitution); however, this requires the proposal of the President of the Republic (Item 11 of Article 84 of the Constitution); the Seimas establishes and abolishes the ministries of the Republic of Lithuania; however, this requires the proposal of the Government (Item 8 of Article 67 of the Constitution).

The direct establishment of powers in the Constitution means that a state authority institution may not take over any powers from another authority institution, nor may it transfer or waive the said powers. Such powers may not be changed or limited by means of a law by establishing additional conditions for their implementation. In order to change or limit such powers, an amendment to the Constitution must be adopted.

In addition to the powers directly consolidated in the Constitution, the state supreme institutions also have the powers that are established in laws. For instance, on the basis of Item 10 of Article 84 of the Constitution, wherein it is prescribed that the President of the Republic “shall, according to the established procedure, appoint and release state officials provided for by law”, it is possible to judge about the possibility of such powers of the President of the Republic. When such powers are established, consideration must be taken of the provisions and principles of the Constitution that consolidate the nature of the institutions of state power and the nature of their interaction.

The principle of the separation of powers (independence of legislative power and judicial power in deciding the issues of constitutional and criminal responsibility)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 11 May 1999

... In a state under the rule of law, every branch of state power (legislative, executive, or judicial) fulfils the functions vested in it and realises its competence. Paragraph 1 of Article 109 of the Constitution provides that, in Lithuania, justice is administered only by courts; whereas, under Article 74 of the Constitution, the Seimas is assigned to carry out impeachment. When a vote on impeachment takes place at the Seimas, the question of the constitutional responsibility, but not that of the criminal responsibility, of a person is decided. The removal of a person from office or the revocation of his/her mandate of a member of the Seimas through impeachment proceedings because of the suspicion that he/she has committed a crime is not binding on a court. In its turn, the constitutionally established independence of legislative power and judicial power determines that a judgment handed down by a court is not binding on the Seimas, which adopts a decision on the constitutional responsibility of a person. Otherwise, the constitutional principle of the separation of powers would be violated.

The powers of the Seimas to establish and abolish ministries (Item 8 of Article 67 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 3 June 1999

Establishing the functions and powers of the legislature and the executive, the Constitution also provides for their reciprocal interaction. Such a norm is consolidated in Item 8 of Article 67 of the Constitution: the Seimas “shall, upon the proposal of the Government, establish and abolish the ministries of the Republic of Lithuania”. ...

[...]

Item 8 of Article 67 of the Constitution consolidates the right of the Seimas to establish and abolish ministries. The implementation of such powers of the Seimas is bound by the concrete powers of the Government, which are consolidated in the Constitution: if the Government does not present a particular proposal, the Seimas may not adopt a decision whether to establish or abolish a ministry. Thus, this norm of the Constitution ensures a balance between the legislative and executive branches.

The judiciary as the only branch of power that is formed on a professional basis

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 21 December 1999

... According to the principle of the separation of powers, all branches of power are autonomous, independent, and capable of counterbalancing one another. The judiciary, being autonomous, may not be dependent on the other branches of power also because of the fact that it is the only branch of power formed on a professional, but not a political basis.

The principle of the separation of powers; the judiciary (Article 5 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 12 July 2001

Article 5 of the Constitution states that, in Lithuania, state power is executed by the Seimas, the President of the Republic and the Government, and the judiciary. In this and other articles of the Constitution, the principle of the separation of powers is enshrined. The judiciary is the only branch of state power that is assigned the function of administering justice. No other state institution or official may carry out this function. Only the autonomous and fully fledged judiciary may successfully fulfil this function assigned to it.

The fact that the judiciary is autonomous and fully fledged is inseparable from the principle of the independence of judges and courts, which is consolidated in the Constitution.

[...]

... the principle of the separation of powers is inseparable from the independence of judges and courts; such independence is characteristic of the organisation and activities of the judiciary.

The principle of the separation of powers; the principle of the accountability of executive bodies to the representation

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 24 December 2002

Under the Constitution, the organisation and activities of state power are based on the principle of the separation of powers. The Constitutional Court has held in its rulings on more than one occasion that the constitutional principle of the separation of powers implies, among other requirements, that legislative power, executive power, and judicial power must be separated and sufficiently autonomous; however, at the same time, there must be a balance among them. The Constitutional Court has also held that every state institution of power is conferred competence in accordance with its mission; the concrete content of such competence depends on the place of that branch of power in the general system of the branches of power and on its relationship with the other branches of power; once the Constitution directly provides for the powers of a particular state authority institution, no authority institution may take over such powers from another authority institution, nor may it transfer or waive the said powers; such powers may not be changed or limited by means of a law.

It also needs to be noted that the system of the branches of state power comprises legislative power, executive power, and judicial power; the constitutional principle of the separation of powers determines the relationships of the said three branches of state power. There are no such three branches of power on the level of local self-government; the Constitution provides only for municipal councils – representations of territorial communities and executive bodies that are formed by and are accountable to municipal councils. The Constitution consolidates the principle of the supremacy of municipal councils over the executive bodies that are accountable to them.

... the constitutional principle of the separation of powers is not identical to the constitutional principle of the accountability of executive bodies to the representation, on which, inter alia, the relationships of state legislative power and executive power, as well as the organisation and activities of self-government institutions, are based.

Under the Constitution, the Seimas exercises parliamentary control over the Government. At the request of the Seimas, the Government or individual ministers must give an account of their activities to the Seimas (Paragraph 1 of Article 101 of the Constitution). Thus, the separation of powers in the Constitution also implies the accountability of the Government, a collegial institution of executive power, to the legislature, the representation of the Nation.

Municipal councils are formed on the basis of universal, equal, and direct suffrage by secret ballot (Paragraph 2 of Article 119 of the Constitution); municipal councils form executive bodies that are accountable to them (Paragraph 4 of Article 119 of the Constitution). Thus, the relationships of municipal councils and their executive bodies are also based on the constitutional principle of the accountability of executive bodies to the representation.

At the same time, it needs to be noted that the constitutional principle of the accountability of executive bodies to the representation has certain particularities on the state governance level and on the local self-government level. For instance, under Paragraph 2 of Article 60 of the Constitution, a member of the Seimas (i.e. the representation of the Nation) may be appointed either as the Prime Minister or a minister (i.e. as a member of a collegial institution of executive power that is accountable to the Seimas). Meanwhile, an analogous reservation on the self-government level, whereby a member of the representation could be a member of an executive body that is accountable to the respective municipal council, is not provided for in the Constitution.

Thus, the constitutional principles of the separation of powers and of the accountability of executive bodies to the representation are not identical as regards the content of the said principles and the sphere of their application. The relationships of municipal councils and their executive bodies are based on the constitutional principles of the accountability of executive bodies to the representation and the supremacy of municipal councils over the executive bodies accountable to them; however, the said relationships are not based on the principle of the separation of powers.

There is no delegated legislation in Lithuania

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 5 March 2004

The constitutional principle of the separation of powers determines the absence of delegated legislation in Lithuania (rulings of 26 October 1995, 19 December 1996, and 3 June 1999). Therefore, according to the Constitution, the Seimas has no right to assign, inter alia, the Government to realise the constitutional competence of the Seimas, while the Government may not accept or carry out such an assignment.

The principle of the separation of powers; the scope of powers is limited by the Constitution (Article 5 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 13 May 2004

In its rulings, the Constitutional Court has held on more than one occasion that Article 5 of the Constitution consolidates, inter alia, the principle of the separation of powers.

The constitutional principle of the separation of powers is the fundamental principle of the organisation and functioning of a democratic state under the rule of law; it is consolidated not only in Article 5 of the Constitution, but also in other articles of the Constitution (rulings of 10 January 1998, 5 February 1999, 3 June 1999, 9 July 1999, 26 April 2001, and 12 July 2001). In interpreting the legal regulation established in Article 5 of the Constitution, it should be noted that the constitutional principle of the separation of powers is consolidated in Paragraphs 1 and 2 of this article (ruling of 23 April 2002); this principle is specified in greater detail in other articles of the Constitution from various aspects. On the other hand, Paragraph 2 of Article 5 of the Constitution reflects not only the constitutional principle of the separation of powers, but also the principle of the supremacy of the Constitution and the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law (rulings of 12 July 2001, 24 December 2002, and 24 January 2003); if such a legal regulation were established under which not only the powers of a state authority institution specified in Paragraph 1 of Article 5 of the Constitution, but also the powers of some other authority institution, were expanded unreasonably from the constitutional standpoint, it would have to be held that the provision of Paragraph 2 of Article 5 of the Constitution, whereby the scope of powers is limited by the Constitution, is also violated (ruling of 24 December 2002).

The principle of the separation of powers

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 1 July 2004

In its rulings, the Constitutional Court has held on more than one occasion that the Constitution consolidates the principle of the separation of powers. The constitutional principle of the separation of powers means, inter alia, that persons performing functions in implementing the powers of a certain branch of state power may not, at the same time, perform functions in implementing the powers of another branch of state power, i.e. persons performing functions in implementing legislative power, or executive power, or judicial power may not simultaneously perform functions in implementing respectively both executive power and judicial power, or legislative power and judicial power, or legislative power and executive power, save the exceptions provided for in the Constitution itself. It needs to be noted that the provision of Paragraph 2 of Article 60 of the Constitution, whereby a member of the Seimas may be appointed only either as the Prime Minister or a minister, is an exception established in the Constitution where the same person may simultaneously perform functions in implementing both legislative power (as a member of the Seimas) and executive power (as a member of the Government – the Prime Minister or a minister).

The reciprocal control and balance of the institutions of state power, as well as cooperation among the institutions of state power

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 9 May 2006

... The Constitutional Court has held that, when the general functions and tasks of the state are performed, there exists interfunctional partnership, as well as reciprocal control and balance, among state institutions (rulings of 10 January 1998 and 21 April 1998).

It should be emphasised that interaction among the branches of state power may not be treated as their conflict or competition; thus, the checks and balances that the judicial branch (institutions thereof) and other branches of state power (institutions thereof) have towards each other may not be seen as the mechanisms of the opposition of the branches of power. The constitutionally consolidated model of interaction among the branches of state power is also defined by the reciprocal control and balance of the branches of state power (institutions thereof); such reciprocal control and balance does not allow a certain branch of state power to dominate in respect of another branch of state power (or in respect of the other branches of state power); the said model of interaction is also defined by cooperation among the branches of state power, of course, where such cooperation does not overstep the limits established in the Constitution, i.e. does not interfere in the implementation of the powers of another branch of state power.

Parliamentary democracy; interaction among the branches of state power; and parliamentary control

The Constitutional Court's decision of 21 November 2006

The Constitution consolidates parliamentary democracy. However, parliamentary democracy is not “the convent rule”; it is not a system where the parliament directly organises the work of other state or municipal institutions or may, at any time, interfere with the activities of any state or municipal institutions (officials thereof) that implement public power. Nor is parliamentary democracy a system where the parliament, at the slightest pretext, may exert control over any decisions of such institutions (officials thereof), initiate the application of sanctions against certain persons, let alone adopt decisions by itself for the state or municipal institutions (officials thereof) that have particular competence, i.e. adopt such decisions that can be adopted only by the state institutions (officials thereof) that have particular competence as, for example, courts, prosecutors, the National Audit Office, the institutions of pretrial investigation, or the subjects of operational activity provided for in laws.

The model of parliamentary democracy consolidated in the Constitution is rational and moderate. Such a model is not based exclusively on the control exercised by the parliament or on interinstitutional checks and balances; in parliamentary democracy, interfunctional partnership, which is based, inter alia, on trust, plays a role of no less importance. It has been held in the acts of the Constitutional Court that, when the general functions and tasks of the state are performed, there exists interfunctional partnership among state institutions, as well as reciprocal control and balance (rulings of 10 January 1998, 21 April 1998, and 9 May 2006). The Constitutional Court has also held that “interaction among the branches of state power may not be treated as their conflict or competition; thus, also the checks and balances that the judicial branch (institutions thereof) and other branches of state power (institutions thereof) have towards each other may not be treated as the mechanisms of the opposition of the branches of power” (ruling of 9 May 2006).

A different interpretation of the provisions of the Constitution that consolidate the control function performed by the Seimas (inter alia, the provisions substantiating the possibility of forming ad hoc investigation commissions of the Seimas) would unavoidably deny the constitutional principles of responsible governance, the separation of powers, a state under the rule of law, and democracy, as well as the striving for an open, harmonious, and just civil society, as proclaimed in the Preamble to the Constitution; such a different interpretation would create the preconditions for instability in the governance of the state and in the management of public affairs, as well as the preconditions for violating the rights and freedoms, as well as the legitimate interests and legitimate expectations, of a person and for violating other values consolidated, defended, and protected by the Constitution.

The assignment to regulate certain relations that is given by the legislature to the Government or to an institution authorised by it

See 1.8. The foundations of lawmaking and of the application of law, 1.8.1. General provisions, the ruling of 5 May 2007.

The principle of the separation of powers

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 13 May 2010

Paragraph 1 of Article 5 of the Constitution provides that, in Lithuania, state power is executed by the Seimas, the President of the Republic and the Government, and the judiciary.

This provision of the Constitution constitutes the basis for the separation and balance of the branches of state power (ruling of 20 April 1999).

[...]

In its rulings, the Constitutional Court has held on more than one occasion that Article 5 of the Constitution (as well as other articles of the Constitution that establish the powers of state institutions exercising state power) consolidates the principle of the separation of powers.

[...]

... those particularities of the constitutional status of the Seimas, the President of the Republic, the Government, and the judiciary that are related to the exercise of state power and the separation of state powers imply, inter alia, that these institutions may not take over the constitutional powers that belong to other institutions; thus, also courts, to which persons concerned apply with petitions requesting an investigation into the acts adopted by the Seimas, the President of the Republic, or the Government or into activities otherwise expressed by these institutions, may not take over the constitutional powers of the Seimas, the President of the Republic, or the Government, i.e. courts may not adopt decisions for these institutions of state power and may not obligate the said institutions of state power to pass acts related to the exercise of state power.

The principle of the separation of powers

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 29 September 2015

The constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law is related to the constitutional principle of the separation of powers, which is consolidated, inter alia, in Paragraph 2 of Article 5 of the Constitution. The said paragraph provides that the scope of powers is limited by the Constitution. The Constitutional Court has noted in its acts on more than one occasion that the constitutional principle of the separation of powers is the fundamental principle of the organisation and functioning of a democratic state under the rule of law (inter alia, the rulings of 10 January 1998, 13 May 2004, and 24 September 2009); the constitutional principle of the separation of powers means, among other things, that, if the Constitution directly establishes the powers of a concrete state authority institution, such an institution may not waive these powers and may not transfer them to some other institution, while other state authority institutions may not take over such powers; the said powers may not be changed or limited by means of a law (inter alia, the rulings of 23 August 2005 and 26 February 2010). The Constitutional Court has also emphasised on more than one occasion that the Seimas has no right to assign the Government or any other institution to exercise the constitutional competence of the Seimas (inter alia, the rulings of 14 January 2002, 2 March 2009, and 26 May 2015). The provision “The scope of power shall be limited by the Constitution” of Paragraph 2 of Article 5 of the Constitution is violated if such a legal regulation is established whereby the powers of a state authority institution specified in Paragraph 1 of Article 5 of the Constitution or those of any other authority institution are broadened in a constitutionally unreasonable manner (inter alia, the rulings of 13 December 2004, 2 March 2009, and 26 May 2015).

1.6. THE SCOPE OF POWERS LIMITED BY THE CONSTITUTION

The scope of powers is limited by the Constitution; the prohibition on taking over, transferring, waiving, and changing or limiting, by means of a law, the powers of a state authority institution that are directly established in the Constitution (Paragraph 2 of Article 5 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 21 December 1999

Paragraph 2 of Article 5 of the Constitution prescribes: “The scope of power shall be limited by the Constitution.”

This norm consolidates an important constitutional principle, which must be taken into account when the powers of state authority institutions are established both in the sphere of relationships between state authorities and a person and in the sphere of interrelations among state authority institutions. Interpreting the principle established in Paragraph 2 of Article 5 of the Constitution from the said aspect, in its ruling of 3 June 1999, the Constitutional Court held that this constitutional principle also means that, “in cases where the powers of a particular state authority institution are directly established in the Constitution, no other institution may take over such powers from it; while an institution whose powers are defined in the Constitution may neither transfer nor waive these powers. Such powers may not be changed or limited by means of a law”. It is necessary to observe these requirements in order to ensure harmony in the functioning of state authority institutions.

The scope of powers is limited by the Constitution (Paragraph 2 of Article 5 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 24 January 2003

Paragraph 2 of Article 5 of the Constitution provides that the scope of powers is limited by the Constitution.

Interpreting this provision of Paragraph 2 of Article 5 of the Constitution, the Constitutional Court noted: “When drafting and adopting legal acts, institutions of state power must comply with the principle of a state under the rule of law, which is consolidated in the Constitution. Paragraph 2 of Article 5 of the Constitution provides that the scope of powers is limited by the Constitution. This means that the Seimas, as the legislator of laws and other legal acts, is autonomous inasmuch as its powers are not limited by the Constitution” (ruling of 12 July 2001).

The scope of powers is limited by the Constitution (Paragraph 2 of Article 5 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court’s ruling of 13 May 2004

... Paragraph 2 of Article 5 of the Constitution reflects not only the constitutional principle of the separation of powers, but also the principle of the supremacy of the Constitution and the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law (rulings of 12 July 2001, 24 December 2002, and 24 January 2003).

The scope of powers is limited by the Constitution (Paragraph 2 of Article 5 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court’s ruling of 13 December 2004

The constitutional principle of the separation of powers is also inseparable from the provision of Paragraph 2 of Article 5 of the Constitution, whereby the scope of powers is limited by the Constitution, which is binding not only on the state power institutions specified in Paragraph 1 of Article 5 of the Constitution, but also on other institutions that have authoritative powers, but are not categorised as belonging to the legislative, the executive, or the judicial branch, including on all state servants employed in these institutions.

The scope of powers is limited by the Constitution (Paragraph 2 of Article 5 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court’s ruling of 29 September 2015

... The provision “the scope of power shall be limited by the Constitution” of Paragraph 2 of Article 5 of the Constitution is violated if such a legal regulation is established whereby the powers of a state authority institution specified in Paragraph 1 of Article 5 of the Constitution or those of any other authority institution are broadened in a constitutionally unreasonable manner (inter alia, the rulings of 13 December 2004, 2 March 2009, and 26 May 2015).

The scope of powers is limited by the Constitution and state institutions serve the people; the principles of responsible governance and transparency (Paragraphs 2 and 3 of Article 5 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court’s ruling of 12 April 2018

The constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law is also reflected in Paragraphs 2 and 3 of Article 5 of the Constitution, which stipulate that the scope of powers is limited by the Constitution and that state institutions serve the people and which consolidate the constitutional principles of responsible governance and the responsibility of state authorities to society.

As the Constitutional Court has held on more than one occasion, the constitutionally consolidated principle of responsible governance implies that all state institutions and officials are obliged to follow the Constitution and law while performing their functions and must properly implement the powers granted to them by the Constitution and laws while acting in the interests of the People and the State of Lithuania (inter alia, the rulings of 19 November 2015, 8 July 2016, and 2 March 2018).

It should be noted that the constitutional principle of responsible governance, interpreted in conjunction with the imperative obliging state institutions to serve the people, as consolidated in Paragraph 3 of Article 5 of the Constitution, implies the publicity and transparency requirements for law-making procedures; these requirements must be followed, inter alia, by institutions exercising state power (ruling of 8 July 2016).

In its ruling of 8 March 2018, interpreting, among other things, the content of one of the principles governing the activity of public authorities and officials – the principle of transparency, arising from the Constitution, inter alia, Paragraphs 2 and 3 of Article 5 thereof, the Constitutional Court noted that this principle implies accountability to the respective community and the responsibility of decision-making officials for their decisions; adopted decisions must be reasoned and clear so that, if the need arises, it would be possible to provide rational reasons for them. Transparency is a necessary precondition, inter alia, for preventing the abuse of power; therefore, it is also a necessary precondition for people to have trust in public authorities and the state in general (rulings of 22 January 2008 and 8 March 2018).

1.7. LITHUANIAN AS THE STATE LANGUAGE

The constitutional status of the state language (Article 14 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 21 October 1999

Under Article 14 of the Constitution, Lithuanian is the state language. The establishment of the status of the state language in the Constitution means that Lithuanian is a constitutional value. The state language protects the identity of the nation, it integrates the civil nation, it ensures the expression of national sovereignty, the integrity and indivisibility of the state, and the smooth functioning of state and municipal establishments. The state language is an important guarantee of the equality of the rights of citizens, as it enables all citizens under the same conditions to communicate with state and municipal establishments and to implement their rights and legitimate interests. The constitutional establishment of the status of the state language also means that the legislature must, by means of laws, establish how the use of this language is ensured in public life and, in addition, it must provide for the means of the protection of the state language. Lithuanian, after it has acquired the status of the state language under the Constitution, must be used in all state and local government institutions and in all establishments, enterprises, and organisations that are in Lithuania; laws and other legal acts must be published in the state language; clerical work, accounting, accountabilities, and financial papers must be in Lithuanian; state and local government institutions, establishments, enterprises, and organisations correspond with each other in the state language.

The Constitutional Court emphasises that the constitutional status of the state language means that Lithuanian is compulsory only in the public life of Lithuania. In other spheres of life, persons may use any language acceptable to them without restrictions.

Taking account of the fact that the passport of a citizen of the Republic of Lithuania is an official document certifying a permanent legal link between an individual and the state, i.e. the citizenship of an individual, and the fact that citizenship relationships belong to the sphere of the public life of the state, the name and family name of a person must be written in the passport of a citizen in the state language. Otherwise, the constitutional status of the state language would be denied.

The knowledge of the state language is a condition for the fully fledged participation of citizens in the governance of the state

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 10 May 2006

... according to the Constitution, the Lithuanian language, as the state language, is a means of public expression and internal communication of state and municipal institutions, as well as a means of communication with members of society. It is an important element of statehood, a factor uniting all citizens of the Republic of Lithuania, integrating the national community – the civil Nation, because it ensures equal opportunities for all citizens of the state to participate in the governance of their country and in making decisions of national importance, also the right to enter state service on equal terms. The knowledge of the state language is a prerequisite and a necessary condition for the fully fledged participation of citizens in the governance of the state.

Using the state language in adopting the decisions of national importance

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 10 May 2006

Making the decisions of national importance, inter alia, when citizens of the Republic of Lithuania vote in referendums, during which, as established in Paragraph 1 of Article 9 of the Constitution, the most significant issues concerning the life of the State and the Nation are decided, is an exceptional sphere of the use of the state language. The knowledge of the state language is also a precondition for implementing the constitutional right of every citizen of the Republic of Lithuania to vote in referendums. The Constitution does not imply that citizens who do not know the state language must be or can be provided with any special or facilitated conditions for participating in the governance of their country, inter alia, that such citizens must, in some way, be even additionally and artificially encouraged to participate in referendums or other votes in which the decisions of national importance are made.

Due to this, referendum ballot-papers must be printed only in the state language. Otherwise, the constitutional concept of the state language, which presupposes precisely the use of the state language when making the decisions of national importance, would be ignored; in addition, the imperative of civic consciousness, which stems from the Constitution, and the concept of the national community – the civil Nation, which is established in the Constitution, would be deviated from.

Moreover, it is generally recognised that, in referendum ballot-papers, no matter on what issue a referendum is conducted, questions must be formulated in the manner ensuring that they are understandable to every voter. ... it should be noted that, as regards the linguistic expression, these questions are not complicated or confusing and do not require voters to possess any special language knowledge. During referendums, voters are presented a certain question, which, from the linguistic point of view, is neither complicated nor confusingly formulated and must be answered only by “yes” or “no”. If there is more than one question, each question in a referendum ballot-paper must be formulated separately and every question must be answered separately. It is very doubtful whether a citizen who does not understand a question (questions) that is (are) formulated in such a simple way, precisely because he/she does not know the state language, has enough information about the public life in the Republic of Lithuania so that he/she could make a rational decision on how to answer a referendum question; in fact, it would be hardly possible or impossible at all to argue that such a citizen (maybe save certain exceptions) is capable of understanding the goals of the Nation and is ready to take responsibility for the present and future of the State of Lithuania. Encouraging such citizens artificially and additionally so that they participate in referendums or other votes during which the decisions of national importance are made (also creating the possibilities for them during a referendum to express their will not in the state language, which they do not know) would be equivalent to entrusting, to a certain extent, decision making on the particular issues of national significance to the people who ... are not sufficiently integrated into the society of Lithuania, are not fully fledged members of the national community – the civil Nation (and do not make effort to become such members), and lack civic consciousness.

The interpretation of Article 14 of the Constitution provided in this ruling of the Constitutional Court (and based on, inter alia, the jurisprudence of the Constitutional Court formulated in the previous constitutional justice cases) and the requirement, arising from such interpretation (and from the constitutional concept of civic consciousness and the national community – the civil Nation), to print referendum ballot-papers only in the state language are completely compatible with the provision of Article 37 of the Constitution, whereby citizens belonging to ethnic communities have the right to foster their language, culture, and customs, as well as with the provisions of Article 45 of the Constitution, which state that ethnic communities of citizens independently manage the affairs of their ethnic culture, education, charity, and mutual assistance, and that ethnic communities are provided support by the state, because these provisions, establishing the right of ethnic communities to foster their culture, customs, and language, and to be provided support by the state, do not mean that their interests and the common interests of the State of Lithuania, in the territory of which the respective ethnic communities reside, or the common interests of all society and the civil Nation, may be opposed. The constitutional consolidation of the state language, as well as the requirement to pay regard to the constitutional imperative of the state language, inter alia, when the decisions of national importance are made, may not be interpreted as violating the rights of national minorities. On the contrary ... the knowledge of the state language ensures the equality of the rights of all citizens of the state. As it was stated in the Constitutional Court's ruling of 13 December 2004, "the nationality of an individual (including in the relationships with the officials or state servants of a state or municipal institution) may not serve as a basis for him/her to demand that the rules arising from the status of the state language be not applied as far as he/she is concerned; otherwise, the constitutional principle of the equality of all persons before the law, courts, state institutions, and officials would be violated".

The entry of the name and family name of an individual in the state language in his/her passport is the official confirmation of the identity of the individual

The Constitutional Court's decision of 6 November 2009

... the name and family name of an individual must be written in the state language in the passport of the Republic of Lithuania, and ... only the entry of the name and family name of an individual in the state language is the official confirmation of the identity of the individual, which gives rise to particular legal effects linked to the use of the name and family name of the individual in public life in Lithuania.

It is generally known that, in addition to the section wherein the data confirming the identity of an individual are entered (first of all, the name and family name of an individual), there are sections designed for entering additional data about the individual or for placing required markings (in fact, in these sections, often not only the state (official) language is used). This is also characteristic of the passport of a citizen of the Republic of Lithuania.

It needs to be noted that, if, in the passport of a citizen of the Republic of Lithuania, the name and family name of an individual were entered in non-Lithuanian characters and in non-grammaticised form in the section designed for other entries in cases where the said individual so requests, the official confirmation of the identity of this individual in the state language would remain in the passport of this citizen. At the same time, it needs to be noted that the entry of the name and family name of an individual in non-Lithuanian characters in the section designed for other entries in his/her passport should not be made equal to the entry regarding the identity of this individual in the state language.

In the said cases, there would be no grounds for maintaining that entering the name and family name of an individual in non-Lithuanian characters and in non-grammaticised form in the section designed for other entries in his/her passport in cases where the individual so requests would deny the imperatives requiring that "the name and family name of an individual must be written in the state language" and that the state language must be used in public life, which arise from the Constitution.

Thus, the legislature, on stipulating that the name and family name of an individual are written in Lithuanian characters in the passport of a citizen of the Republic of Lithuania, also has the discretion to stipulate that it is allowed to enter the name and family name of an individual in non-Lithuanian characters and in non-grammaticised form in the section designed for other entries in his/her passport in cases where the individual so requests. In such a case, the legislature should establish the grounds for writing names and family names in a non-state language in the section designed for other entries in the passport of a citizen of the Republic of Lithuania, inter alia, as to what objective criteria should be followed in order that the name and family name of an individual can be entered in non-Lithuanian characters and in non-grammaticised form in the section designed for other entries in the passport of a citizen of the Republic of Lithuania.

When establishing the grounds for writing the name and family name of an individual in a non-state language in the section designed for other entries in the passport of a citizen of the Republic of Lithuania, the legislature should pay regard to the fact that ... the basis of the characters of the Lithuanian language, as the state language of Lithuania, as well as of an absolute majority of the state (official) languages of European countries, is Latin characters.

Writing names and family names in the passports of citizens

The Constitutional Court's decision of 27 February 2014

In its decision of 6 November 2009, the Constitutional Court, interpreting its [ruling of 21 October 1991], noted that, “under the Constitution, Lithuanian characters and essential issues related to their use, inter alia, the principles of a particular transcription, must be defined by the legislature or a state institution authorised by it”.

In this context, it should be mentioned that, under [the law] ... the State Commission of the Lithuanian Language (Valstybinė lietuvių kalbos komisija, hereinafter also referred to as the VLKK) is such an authorised state institution.

[...]

... where, in establishing the legal regulation in relation to writing the name and family name of a person in the passport of a citizen of the Republic of Lithuania, the legislature requires expert knowledge, it must receive an official conclusion, inter alia, an explicit position and clear proposals, from persons (institutions) having special knowledge or special (professional) competence, inter alia, from a state institution, composed, under the laws of the Republic of Lithuania, of professional linguists – Lithuanian language specialists (and, to the extent permitted by laws, also of representatives of other branches of linguistics), which has the powers to take care of the protection of the state language, to establish, within its competence, the guidelines on the state language policy (or to propose that the respective legislative and executive institutions establish the said guidelines by means of legal acts they adopt), and to carry out the state language policy (at present, from the VLKK – the institution specified in the law). When deciding on how the name and family name of a person must be written in the passport of a citizen of the Republic of Lithuania, the legislature may not disregard the received official conclusions, including the official conclusion of the VLKK and its position (proposals).

[...]

... under the Constitution, the legislature or a state institution authorised by it, when defining the essential issues concerning the use of the state language, inter alia, when establishing the rules of writing the names and family names of citizens of the Republic of Lithuania in the passports of citizens of the Republic of Lithuania, must pay regard to the constitutional imperative of the protection of the state Lithuanian language and assess any potential danger for the common Lithuanian language and the distinctiveness of the Lithuanian language. Under the Constitution, it should not be tolerated that these rules, inter alia, consolidating the writing of non-Lithuanian personal names (name and family name) in the passport of a citizen of the Republic of Lithuania, would be established without having assessed their impact on the common Lithuanian language and the distinctiveness of the Lithuanian language, inter alia, on the writing of Lithuanian personal names.

[...]

... the VLKK must submit an official conclusion on whether it is also possible to establish such rules of writing the name and family name of a person in the passport of a citizen of the Republic of Lithuania that are ... other than [those whereby the name and family name of a person is written in the passport of a citizen in Lithuanian characters and according to pronunciation], inter alia, on whether the formulation “in the state language” in the constitutional requirement that “the name and family name of a person must be written in the passport of a citizen in the state language” and the expression “in Lithuanian characters” may be understood as meaning that, in certain cases, when writing non-Lithuanian names and family names in the passports of citizens of the Republic of Lithuania, it is possible to use not only the letters of the Lithuanian alphabet, but also other exclusively Latin-based characters to the extent that they are consistent with the tradition of the Lithuanian language and do not violate the system of the Lithuanian language and the distinctiveness of the Lithuanian language.

It should be noted that the VLKK must submit an official conclusion also in those cases where legal acts prepared by other law-making subjects in relation to writing the name and family name of a person in the passport of a citizen of the Republic of Lithuania are under deliberation.

In this context, it should also be noted that the Constitutional Court has held on more than one occasion that, under the Constitution, a legal regulation related to defining the content of human rights and freedoms or consolidating the guarantees of their implementation may be established only by means of a law.

Therefore, the essential rules of writing the name and family name of a person in the passport of a citizen of the Republic of Lithuania must be established by means of a law.

... following the requirements stemming from the Constitution, inter alia, Article 14 thereof, it is also possible to establish, by means of a law, such rules of writing the name and family name of a person in the passport of a citizen of the Republic of Lithuania that are ... other than [those whereby the name and family name of a person is written in the passport of a citizen in Lithuanian characters and according to pronunciation] in cases where a change in these rules is proposed by a state institution composed, under the laws of the Republic of Lithuania, of professional linguists – Lithuanian language specialists (and, to the extent permitted by laws, also of representatives of other branches of linguistics), which has the powers to take care of the protection of the state language.

1.8. THE FOUNDATIONS OF LAWMAKING AND OF THE APPLICATION OF LAW

1.8.1. General provisions

The official publication of laws; laws do not have retroactive effect (Paragraph 2 of Article 7 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 11 January 2001

Paragraph 2 of Article 7 of the Constitution prescribes: "Only laws that are published shall be valid."

This constitutional norm means that laws are not valid and may not be applied unless they are officially published. The official publication of laws in accordance with the procedure established in the Constitution and laws is a necessary condition not only in order that laws would come into force, but also in order that subjects of legal relationships would know which laws are valid and what their content is and would comply with these laws. There may not be any non-published laws in a democratic state.

Paragraph 2 of Article 7 of the Constitution also reflects the legal principle that the effect of published laws is prospective and that these laws do not have retroactive effect (lex retro non agit). Thus, laws are applied to the facts and consequences that take place after these laws come into force. The requirement that the effect of published laws must be prospective and that these laws must not have retroactive effect is an important precondition for legal certainty and an essential element of [the principle of a state under the rule of law].

At the same time, it needs to be noted that the legal principle that the effect of published laws is prospective and that these laws do not have retroactive effect should be linked with the constitutional principles of justice and humanism. The Constitutional Court has held that the adopted laws abolishing the criminalisation of a certain act or mitigating responsibility for a certain act have retroactive effect (lex benignior retro agit) (ruling of 25 March 1998).

The legal force of legal acts is prospective; law must be public

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 29 November 2001

The principle of a state under the rule of law is consolidated in the Constitution. One of the elements of the principle of a state under the rule of law is that the legal force of legal acts is prospective. In its ruling of 16 March 1994, the Constitutional Court held the following: "The legal force of a law or another legal act is prospective. It is not allowed to require that a certain person obey such rules that did not exist at the time when he/she performed the respective actions; therefore, such a person was unable to know the requirements that could be imposed in the future." The requirement that only published legal acts are effective is also an essential element of the principle of a state under the rule of law. Law must be public. The constitutional requirements that only published legal acts are effective and that they must be prospective are an important precondition for legal certainty.

The publication of legal acts is a necessary condition for their validity (Paragraph 2 of Article 7 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 29 October 2003

According to Paragraph 2 of Article 7 of the Constitution, the publication of laws must allow legal subjects to be certain that the published law is exactly the law that has been adopted by the Seimas or by referendum. Such publication of laws is considered to be their official publication.

[...]

Laws must be published so that all legal subjects could have access to them. The constitutional requirement that only laws that are published can be valid is an important precondition for legal certainty. This constitutional requirement is inseparable from the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law.

The constitutional principle that law must be public is reflected in Paragraph 2 of Article 7 of the Constitution.

[...]

... only those legal acts that are published according to the requirements of official publication and publicity, which are consolidated in the Constitution, as well as according to the constitutional requirement that an entire legal act (all its constituent parts) must be published and the constitutional requirement that legal acts must be published in the Lithuanian state language, may be declared to be in compliance with the requirements of Paragraph 2 of Article 7 of the Constitution and, therefore, valid.

The presumption of the constitutionality and legitimacy of legal acts*The Constitutional Court's ruling of 13 December 2004*

... The trust of a person in the state and law and the protection of legitimate interests, as constitutional values, are inseparable from the presumption of the constitutionality and legitimacy of legal acts. Legal acts (parts thereof) are considered to be in compliance with the Constitution and legitimate until the moment when, according to the procedure established by the Constitution and the Law on the Constitutional Court, they are ruled to be in conflict with the Constitution (or in conflict with the Constitution and/or laws if the said legal acts are substatutory). Thus, until the moment when legal acts (parts thereof), according to the procedure established by the Law on the Constitutional Court, are ruled to be in conflict with the Constitution (or in conflict with the Constitution and/or laws if the said legal acts are substatutory) or until the moment when, according to the established procedure, they are declared no longer effective, the legal regulation established therein is binding on the respective subjects of legal relationships. The Constitution protects and defends a person who obeys law and follows the requirements of laws. Failure to pay regard to this provision would also mean derogation from the principle of justice, which is consolidated in the Constitution.

The requirements stemming from the principle of a state under the rule of law for law-making subjects*The Constitutional Court's ruling of 13 December 2004*

The constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law implies various requirements for the legislature and other law-making subjects: law-making subjects are allowed to pass legal acts only without exceeding their powers; the requirements established in legal acts must be based on general provisions (i.e. certain legal norms and principles) that could be applied to all envisaged subjects of certain legal relationships; any differentiated legal regulation must be based only on the objective differences in the situation of the subjects of certain social relationships regulated by the respective legal acts; in order to ensure that the subjects of legal relationships are aware of the requirements set with respect to them by law, legal norms must be established in advance, legal acts must be published officially, and such acts must be public and accessible; a legal regulation established in laws and other legal acts must be clear, comprehensible, and coherent; the formulations in legal acts must be precise; the consistency and internal harmony of the legal system must be ensured; and legal acts may not contain provisions simultaneously regulating the same social relationships in a different manner; in order that the subjects of legal relationships could act in accordance with the requirements of law, a legal regulation must be relatively stable; legal acts may not demand impossible things (lex non cogit ad impossibilia); the effect of legal acts is prospective, whereas the retroactive effect of laws and other legal acts is not permitted (lex retro non agit), unless the situation of a subject of legal relationships would be alleviated without prejudice to other subjects of legal relationships (lex benignior retro agit); those violations of law for which responsibility is established in legal acts must be clearly defined; when imposing legal restrictions and responsibility for violations of law, regard must be paid to the requirement of reasonableness and the principle of proportionality; according to the principle of proportionality, the established legal measures must be necessary in a democratic society and suitable for achieving legitimate and universally important objectives (there must be a balance between such objectives and measures); these measures may not restrict the rights of persons more than necessary in order to achieve the said objectives and, if those legal measures are related to sanctions for a violation of law, in such a case, the said sanctions must be proportionate to the committed violation of law; when legally regulating certain social relationships, it is obligatory to pay regard to the requirements of natural justice, comprising, inter alia, the necessity to ensure the equality of persons before the law, courts, state institutions, and officials; legal acts must be passed in accordance with the established procedural law-making requirements, including the requirements established by the law-making subject itself; etc.

The requirements stemming from the principle of a state under the rule of law for law-applying subjects

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 13 December 2004

The constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law must also be followed in applying law. When law is applied, inter alia, it is necessary to pay regard to the following requirements arising from the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law as, for instance: law-applying institutions must comply with the requirement of the equality of the rights of persons; it is not permitted to punish anyone twice for the same violation of law (non bis in idem); responsibility (sanction, punishment) for any violations of law must be established in advance (nulla poena sine lege); no act is criminal unless it is defined as such by means of a law (nullum crimen sine lege), etc. In this context, mention should be made of the fact that the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law requires that jurisdictional and other law-applying institutions be impartial and independent, that they seek to establish the objective truth, and that they adopt their decisions only on the basis of law (rulings of 11 May 1999, 19 September 2000, and 24 January 2003).

Article 110 of the Constitution provides that judges may not apply any laws that are in conflict with the Constitution. In the light of the hierarchy of legal acts, which stems from the Constitution, this provision of the Constitution also means that judges may not apply any such substatutory legal acts that are in conflict with the Constitution. Moreover, judges may not apply any such substatutory legal acts that are in conflict with a law. On the other hand, the aforementioned provision of the Constitution reflects the constitutional principle – one of the essential elements of the constitutionally consolidated principle of a state under the rule of law – that a legal act that is in conflict with a higher-ranking legal act may not be applied.

It should be noted that laws must be executed until the moment when they are amended or repealed or, according to the procedure established by the Law on the Constitutional Court, ruled to be in conflict with the Constitution (or in conflict with the Constitution and/or laws if the acts declared unconstitutional are substatutory). ... until the moment when laws are amended or, according to the procedure established by the Law on the Constitutional Court, are ruled to be in conflict with the Constitution, all subjects of legal relationships, consequently, including the Government, must execute and apply such laws within their competence; it is not allowed that the Government, which must itself apply laws and/or ensure that other state and municipal institutions and officials apply them, instead of performing the duties established for it by laws and/or ensuring that other state and municipal institutions and officials perform the duties established by laws for them, by means of its substatutory legal acts establish such a legal regulation that would compete with the one established in laws and would completely or partially exempt the Government and/or other state and municipal institutions and officials from the performance of the aforementioned duties.

[...]

One of the numerous aspects of the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law (directly related to the constitutional principle of the equality of the rights of persons) is that similar cases must be decided in a similar manner. Therefore, the discretion of jurisdictional institutions, when they resolve disputes and apply law, is limited. In its rulings of 21 July 2001 and 30 May 2003, as well as in its decision of 13 February 2004, the Constitutional Court held that the principle of a state under the rule of law, which is enshrined in the Constitution, implies, inter alia, the continuity of jurisprudence.

Establishing exceptions to the general legal regulation

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 12 December 2005

... the establishment of exceptions to a certain general legal regulation may be constitutionally justifiable if these exceptions are aimed at ensuring a constitutionally justifiable and universally important interest, as well as the values protected and defended by the Constitution, and only to the extent sought by these exceptions. The said exceptions must be proportionate to the pursued constitutionally justifiable objective and must not restrict the rights of the subjects concerned more than it is necessary to ensure the said constitutionally justifiable and universally significant interest.

Using legal terminology in legal acts

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 16 January 2006

... the Constitution does not prevent the usage of the words or formulations in laws and other legal acts that are different from those used in the text of the Constitution.

The Constitution, as a legal act, is expressed in a certain textual form and it has certain linguistic expression; however, as law cannot be treated as a mere text, thus, in the same way, the Constitution cannot be treated only as its textual form (ruling of 25 May 2004). In this context, it should be mentioned that language, inter alia, legal terminology, is constantly developing. Thus, the requirement that laws and other legal acts must define the same phenomena by always using only the same words and formulations that are found in the Constitution, if such a requirement were made absolute, would mean that, on the one hand, attempts are made to artificially restrict or even stop such development of language, inter alia, legal terminology, when laws and other legal acts use not only the words (formulations) other than those used in the text of the Constitution to define the same phenomena, but also new terms (formulations) in general, which did not exist at the time when the text of the Constitution was drafted. On the other hand, such a requirement, if it were made absolute, might provoke the modification of the text of the Constitution according to the terminology (words, formulations) consolidated in laws and other legal acts even in cases where an intervention into the text of the Constitution, which, as supreme law, must be a stable act, is not legally necessary.

Using notions in legal acts

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 24 January 2006

... in legal acts, notions must be used without deviating from the meaning that is typical of them; if they are given specific content, this must be specially discussed in the respective legal act.

The assignment given by the legislature to the Government or to an institution authorised by it to regulate certain relationships

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 5 May 2007

In cases where the Constitution does not require that certain relationships indicated therein be regulated specifically by means of a law and where, under the Constitution, the regulation of such relationships is not within the exclusive competence of other institutions exercising state power, inter alia, the Government, the legislature may also provide in a law that certain relationships are regulated by the Government or an institution authorised by it. In the Lithuanian legislation, such law-making practice where a law prescribes that certain relationships are regulated by the Government or an institution authorised by it is quite widespread.

If the legislature consolidates, in a law, the provision that certain relationships “are regulated by the Government or an institution authorised by it”, this provision means that: the Government has the powers to regulate the relationships specified in the law either by itself or to establish, by its resolution, which institution has the powers to regulate (i.e. which institution may and must regulate) the relationships specified in the law; the Government has the powers to regulate by itself a certain part of the relationships specified in the law; however, the Government may authorise another institution to regulate certain relationships specified expressis verbis in the law, as well as those relationships that stem from the relationships specified expressis verbis in the law; the Government, when authorising a certain institution to regulate certain relationships, may not assign it also to regulate such relationships that, under the Constitution and laws, may be regulated only by legal acts whose legal force is not less than that of government resolutions.

If regard is paid to the principle of the separation of powers and the requirements that stem from it, inter alia, the requirement not to regulate certain relationships by means of substatutory legal acts if, under the Constitution, such relationships must be regulated only by means of a law, if regard is paid to the prohibition on transferring to other institutions the powers that, under the Constitution, are the exclusive competence of the Government, and if regard is paid to the prohibition on transferring to other institutions the regulation of such relationships that, under the Constitution and laws, must be regulated by legal acts whose legal force is not less than that of government resolutions, then the aforementioned law-making practice as such is not inconsistent with the Constitution. However, in this context, it should be noted that the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law also means that, if the legislature stipulates in a law that certain relationships are regulated by the Government or an institution authorised by it, then the Government, when adopting a resolution by which it authorises a particular institution to regulate certain relationships, may authorise that the said relationships be regulated only by such an institution that performs such functions and/or has such other powers that are linked to the regulation of the relationships assigned to it by the government resolution (or are closely related to such a regulation). Also, a legal regulation would not be in conflict with the Constitution if, under that legal regulation, the Government, while complying with the requirements and procedure established by laws, would establish (if a necessity arises) a state institution and would assign it to regulate the relationships envisaged in the law, provided that the Government or the institution authorised by it has, under the law, the powers to regulate such relationships. It should also be noted that, in cases where the legislature consolidates in a law that certain relationships are regulated by the Government or an institution authorised by it and where such a need for a substatutory regulation of relationships is determined by the necessity to rely on special knowledge or special (professional) competence in the course of lawmaking, the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law also implies that, when the Government adopts a resolution whereby it authorises the respective institution to regulate certain relationships, such an institution must be the one that has this special (professional) competence necessary for regulating the relationships assigned to it by the government resolution.

The official publication of legal acts (Paragraph 2 of Article 7 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 27 June 2007

In its acts, when interpreting Paragraph 2 of Article 7 of the Constitution, the Constitutional Court held that: laws are not valid and may not be applied unless they are officially published (ruling of 11 January 2001); the official publication of laws is a necessary condition of their entry into force (ruling of 19 June 2002); there must be established, by means of a law, the procedure for publishing laws and the source of the publication of laws (ruling of 29 October 2003); the publication of laws must allow legal subjects to be certain that the published law is exactly the law that has been adopted by the Seimas or by referendum; such publication of laws is their official publication (ruling of 29 October 2003); the official publication of laws in accordance with the procedure established in the Constitution and laws is a necessary condition not only in order that laws would come into force, but also in order that subjects of legal relationships would know which laws are valid and what their content is and would comply with these laws (rulings of 11 January 2001 and 29 October 2003); there may not be any non-published laws in a democratic state under the rule of law (rulings of 11 January 2001 and 29 October 2003); laws must be officially published (ruling of 29 October 2003); law must be public (rulings of 29 November 2001, 30 May 2003, and 29 October 2003).

The Constitutional Court has also held that, taking account of the constitutional requirement that law must be public, the notion “laws”, which is employed in Paragraph 2 of Article 7 of the Constitution, should not be interpreted only literally – it should be interpreted in an expanding manner as the notion that includes not only legal acts that have the legal force of a law, but also other legal acts (ruling of 29 October 2003). It was also held that the constitutional requirement that only legal acts that are published can be valid is also inseparable from the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law and is one of the essential elements of the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law and an important precondition for legal certainty (rulings of 29 November 2001, 30 May 2003, and 29 October 2003).

The text of a legal act may include various elements – not only normative provisions (norms, principles), which consolidate the rules of the conduct and the limits of freedom of the conduct of legal subjects, but also descriptive statements or graphic images (pictures or other visual information), which fix the existing situation and state certain legally significant facts.

[...]

Government resolutions, as well as other legal acts, may differ according to the form, content, structure, or volume and may have various constituent parts (appendices). A legal act may include not only textual, but also graphical parts (tables, drawings, schemes, plans, cartograms, symbols, emblems, etc.). As the Constitutional Court held in its ruling of 29 October 2003, all parts of a normative legal act (including appendices) constitute a whole; they are inseparably interconnected and have equal legal force; a legal act and its appendices may not be separated, because, on changing the content specifically established in appendices, the content of the entire normative legal act is also changed; an entire legal act with all its constituent parts must be published; only those legal acts that are published according to the requirements of official publication and publicity, which are consolidated in the Constitution, as well as according to the constitutional requirement that an entire legal act (all its constituent parts) must be published, may be declared to be in compliance with the requirements of Paragraph 2 of Article 7 of the Constitution and, therefore, valid.

The official publication of an entire legal act is not an objective in itself – this is necessary in order that legal subjects would know what a particular legal act is and that they could have access to an entire legal act and could comply with it. Thus, the purpose and essence of the official publication of an entire legal act is that it becomes accessible to legal subjects and no doubts remain regarding the authenticity of its content. The legislature must, by means of a law, establish such a legal regulation of the relationships in connection with the official publication of legal acts that ensures that legal acts are accessible to all legal subjects. When doing so, the legislature has broad discretion: taking account of the content, particularities, and variety of legal acts, as well as of other significant circumstances, it may establish various sources and ways of the official publication of legal acts. In this context, it needs to be mentioned that, as the Constitutional Court held in its ruling of 29 October 2003, the Constitution does not expressis verbis establish any sources of the official publication of legal acts, nor all possible ways of their publication – the legislature must establish this by means of a law; in regulating these relationships, the legislature may establish a differentiated legal regulation; when establishing it, the legislature must, in all cases, pay regard to the Constitution.

... when establishing the sources and ways of the official publication of legal acts, the legislature must take account of the technical possibilities of publishing legal acts in a certain way. In this context, it also needs to be mentioned that, as it was held by the Constitutional Court, fast technological development determines the dynamism of the legal acts regulating the respective social relationships (ruling of 21 December 2006) and that “electronic communications and telecommunications are undergoing particularly fast development”; thus, “the possibilities of seeking, obtaining, and disseminating information by means of electronic information technologies, inter alia, the internet, are constantly expanding”; “therefore, it is necessary that legislation does not fall behind the progress of information technologies and changes determined by such progress in the respective social relationships” (rulings of 19 September 2005 and 21 December 2006). These provisions are also mutatis mutandis applicable to the publication of legal acts.

Whatever advanced technologies are applied in the official publication of legal acts, in all cases not only the authenticity of the content of such legal acts must be ensured (thus, it must also be guaranteed that the content of a legal act will not be deleted, changed, etc.), but also it is necessary to ensure its accessibility to legal subjects. For instance, the mere fact that legal acts are published on the internet may not guarantee their accessibility, thus, also the publicity of law, if the technical possibilities of using the internet for the widest possible strata of society are not ensured or if it costs too much for people.

... when establishing the sources and ways of the official publication of legal acts, the legislature may take account of the expenses of the publication of legal acts and the financial capacities of the state. In this connection, regard must be paid to the arguments of rationality.

On the other hand, legal acts must not be officially published in such a manner that, for the purpose of saving taxpayers' funds necessary in order to officially publish them as widely as possible, the accessibility of certain legal acts to legal subjects would become restricted, let alone that the access of some legal acts to them would altogether become difficult.

The discussed and other circumstances that determine the necessity to establish a differentiated legal regulation of the official publication of legal acts may imply that there is no necessary need to officially publish an entire legal act (with all constituent parts thereof) in the same source (publication), even though it must be published in its entirety (with all constituent parts thereof). However, it should be emphasised that this does not mean that a certain part of the said legal act may remain not published (non-public) at all or that a certain part (parts) thereof may be published in such a way that its accessibility (thus, also the accessibility of the entire legal act as a whole) to legal subjects would be restricted. The possibility of the official publication of the constituent parts of a legal act not in the same source must be based on a legal regulation established by means of a law. It also needs to be noted that, in order to ensure the clarity and comprehensibility of law and, thus, also the clarity and comprehensibility of the system of legal acts, it is required that every case where the constituent parts of a legal act are officially published not in the same source could be constitutionally justifiable.

Thus, in cases where legal acts include not only textual (written), but also graphical parts (drawings, etc.), especially if such legal acts are of a large volume and complex structure and serious technical problems occur regarding the publication (printing, reproduction) of their graphical parts (also if the expenses of their publication (printing, reproduction) are groundlessly high (taking account of the financial capacities of the state, as well as of the fact for what circle of legal subjects the respective legal regulation establishes particular rights and duties)), the legislature may establish, by means of a law, such a procedure of the official publication of these legal acts that differs from the general (regular) official procedure of the publication of legal acts that are composed only of written text. In itself, the Constitution does not prohibit it. For instance, a law may prescribe that the graphical parts (or certain parts thereof) of such legal acts are officially published separately from their textual part (in a different source), or that the graphical parts (or certain parts thereof) are officially published in a way that is different from that of the publication of the textual part. The specified reasons (especially large volume of a legal act, its complex structure, technical problems that arise due to the publication of the graphical part of such a legal act) should be regarded as sufficiently solid and, thus, also as giving the constitutionally justifiable grounds (as the Constitution does not require unreasonable things) for the separate official publication of the textual and graphical parts of a legal act and/or for their official publication in different ways.

It needs to be especially emphasised that, when the graphical part of a legal act is officially published (irrespective of whether it is published in the same source as the textual part or in a different one), it is very important to ensure that it is clear and legible. It is obvious that the minimum printing requirements for the official publication of the textual part of a legal act are often less strict than the corresponding requirements for the official publication of its graphical part (drawings, etc.) (if attempts are made to make this graphical part clear and legible). The quality of the official gazette (publication) in which legal acts are officially published under the general procedure is usually (not only in Lithuania) oriented to the minimum printing requirements for the publication of the textual part of a legal act (thus, to smaller publishing expenses, which, taking account, inter alia, of the extent of publishing, is naturally understandable), and not to the far higher requirements set for the publication of its graphical part (drawings, etc.), all the more so because legal acts are mostly comprised of written text only.

It was held in this ruling of the Constitutional Court that the official publication of an entire legal act is not an objective in itself. The mere formal publication of the graphical part of a legal act in the official gazette, where, because of not very high printing quality, it is impossible to read drawings, tables, graphs, schemes, maps, or other parts and, due to this, the possibility for legal subjects to understand (find out) its content in an adequate way is not ensured, may not be considered constitutionally justifiable; such printing would not comply with the constitutional concept of the official publication of legal acts and with the requirements for the clarity and comprehensibility of law, which stem from the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law.

In this context, it needs to be noted that the notion “published” in Paragraph 2 of Article 7 of the Constitution may not be interpreted as meaning that, purportedly, the official publication of legal acts is only the printing of the text of such legal acts in a traditional “paper” publication (official gazette, etc.) or that, in general, their official publication is necessarily related only to their printing in a certain publication. The legislature may (but, under the Constitution, it is not obliged to) establish that legal acts, including those that have graphical parts, are officially published in a certain printed publication. Where it is constitutionally justifiable, such legal acts (their graphical parts) may be officially published also in other ways.

It should be emphasised at the same time that the necessity to ensure the clarity and comprehensibility of law, thus, also the clarity and comprehensibility of the system of legal acts, implies that the discussed official publication of the graphical part of certain legal acts separately from their textual part (in a different source) and/or in a way that is different from the publication of their textual part should be considered not a rule, but an exception. Such exceptions must expressis verbis be provided for in a law. Otherwise, the preconditions would be created for the emergence of disharmony in the legal system; it would be difficult for legal subjects to find out the requirements of law.

It should also be emphasised that, in cases where the graphical part of a legal act is published separately from its textual part (in a different source) and/or in a way that is different from that of the publication of its textual part, the requirements, which stem from the Constitution, for the formality and publicity of the publication of legal acts must be followed, and it is necessary to ensure that, due to the separate publication of the textual and graphical parts of legal acts, no preconditions would emerge for questioning the authenticity of their content.

First of all, it is necessary that, in accordance with the general (regular) procedure of the official publication of legal acts, it would be published in a certain source that a particular legislative decision has been adopted regarding a certain question. Second, it should be clear from the legal acts published in this source that a certain constituent part (constituent parts) of this legal act has (have) not been published therein. Third, it must be clear where the constituent part (constituent parts) of a legal act that was (were) not published in the said source could be accessible. Finally, fourth, the accessibility of the respective part of a legal act (thus, also the entire legal act as a whole) to legal subjects must be ensured in practice; moreover, no reasonable doubts as to the authenticity of the content of the constituent part (constituent parts) of a legal act that was (were) not published in the said source can arise for those legal subjects. If these conditions are followed and, indeed, if the non-publishing of a certain constituent part (constituent parts) of a legal act in the said source can be constitutionally justifiable, naturally, there will be no grounds for stating that such a legal act is “not published” or that it is “published”, but this has been done neither publicly nor officially, i.e. by failing to meet the requirements of Paragraph 2 of Article 7 of the Constitution and by failing to pay regard to the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law. Such ensuring (in the specified cases) of the possibilities of access to the content of the constituent part (constituent parts) of a legal act that was (were) not published in the said source, thus, also access to the content of the entire legal act as a whole, if there are enough solid reasons for that, does not in itself give grounds for questioning the compliance of such a legal act with the Constitution.

The provision that, due to certain (sufficiently solid) reasons, the textual and graphical parts of a legal act may be officially published separately and/or in different ways is also mutatis mutandis applicable to situations where two or more textual parts of a legal act are officially published separately and/or in different ways.

Under the Constitution, the subjects of legal relationships are under the duty to behave in good faith and without violating law. They have the duty to make effort to find out the requirements of law by themselves. This is required by the general legal principle of bona fides, which is inseparable from the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law.

Thus, if the non-publishing of a certain constituent part (constituent parts) of a legal act in the aforesaid source can be constitutionally justifiable and if the discussed conditions are followed (i.e. it is published in the official (regular) source of the publication of legal acts that a particular legislative decision has been adopted regarding a certain question; it is clear from the legal acts published in this source that a certain constituent part (constituent parts) of a legal act is (are) not published in this source; it is clear where the constituent part (constituent parts) of a legal act that is (are) not published in the said source can be accessible; the accessibility of the respective legal regulation to legal subjects is ensured in a practical way and no reasonable doubts can arise for them regarding the authenticity of the content of the constituent part (constituent parts) of a legal act that was (were) not published in the said source), no legal subject can decide not to follow the requirements of law only because these requirements arise from such part of a legal act where the said part was published separately from other parts.

An especially large volume of a legal act, its complex structure, technical problems that occur due to the publication of its graphical part – these are not the only reasons that can be regarded as solid enough, thus, also as giving the constitutional grounds for the separate official publication of the textual and graphical parts of a legal act and/or their publication in different ways. In general, the legislature may also regulate the official publication of legal acts in a differentiated manner on other grounds and establish alternative (in comparison with the general procedure of the official publication of legal acts) sources, ways, and procedure of the official publication of legal acts.

For instance, such situations are also possible where a certain legal act must come into force immediately, right after it has been issued. In such cases, the immediate official publishing of legal acts as promptly as possible must be ensured.

It is also possible to adopt such legal acts that contain information constituting a state secret or other classified information. The Constitutional Court has held that, under the Constitution, the state has the duty to guarantee the secrecy of information that constitutes a state secret; the disclosure of a state secret may pose a threat to or even inflict damage on the sovereignty of the state, its territorial integrity, or other important state interests or the foundations of the life of society and the state; when the relationships linked with state secrets (or other classified information) and their protection are regulated by means of laws, it must be established what persons and under what procedure and conditions can handle state secrets (or other classified information) (ruling of 15 May 2007). The legislature has the duty to establish such ways and procedure of the official publication of legal acts that contain information constituting a state secret or other classified information where the said ways and procedure would guarantee the protection of the secrecy of such information and, at the same time, would not deny the imperatives of the publication of legal acts, which arise from the Constitution, inter alia, would ensure the accessibility of legal acts to the respective legal subjects whose rights and duties are enshrined in those legal acts. On the other hand, the Constitutional Court has held that the legal normative acts regulating the relationships linked with constitutional human rights and freedoms and with their implementation may not bear any classification markings at all (ruling of 5 April 2000).

Thus, such legal situations are also possible where, on establishing, in a law, the only source and the only way of the official publication of legal acts, such a legal regulation would be not only unreasonable, but also legally deficient and constitutionally unfounded, as it would not allow the law laid down in the respective legal acts to reach its goals, since it would be impossible to implement certain legislative decisions immediately and as promptly as possible, the protection of the secrecy of the respective information would not be guaranteed, and the provisions of a legal act (e.g. its graphical parts) would be understood inadequately due to not very high quality of printing, etc. Accordingly, the constitutional concept of the official publication of legal acts would be deviated from (moreover, the expenses of such publishing could be unreasonably high).

Consequently, the Constitution – Paragraph 2 of Article 7 thereof together with the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law – not only allows, but also requires, the establishment of not only the general procedure for the official publication of legal acts, but also such a differentiated legal regulation where, due to an especially large volume of a legal act, its complex structure, and technical problems that arise due to the publication of its graphical part, or other sufficiently solid reasons that constitutionally justify the separate publishing of the textual and graphical parts of a legal act and/or their publishing in different ways, certain legal acts (parts thereof) are published in accordance with an alternative procedure (compared with the general procedure) for the official publication of legal acts, i.e. in other sources and/or in other ways. It has been mentioned that the official publication of certain graphical parts of legal acts separately from their textual part (in a different source) and/or in a way that is different from the official publication of their textual part should be considered not a rule, but an exception; such an exception must expressis verbis be provided for in a law.

All this is also mutatis mutandis applicable to the situations where two or more textual parts of a legal act must be published separately and/or in different ways.

[...]

Under the Constitution, legal acts must be officially published in accordance with the procedure of their official publication; the said procedure must be valid precisely at the moment when such legal acts are passed.

The suspension of the validity of laws

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 5 July 2007

... as the Constitutional Court held in [its decision of 13 November 1997], “the suspension of the validity of laws is not characteristic of lawmaking and, as a rule, is linked with the situations specified in the Constitution”. It should be mentioned that such a situation is provided for in Paragraph 4 of Article 106 of the Constitution, which states that “An application by the President of the Republic to the Constitutional Court, or a resolution of the Seimas, asking for an investigation into the conformity of an act with the Constitution shall suspend the validity of the act”.

The quoted provision of the official constitutional doctrine means, inter alia, that the Constitution does not permit the legislature to adopt such laws whereby the validity of effective laws is suspended; that, as long as a law is valid, it is applicable; that, if it is necessary not to apply a law (parts thereof), it must be recognised that it (parts thereof) is (are) no longer valid, but not that the validity of that law (parts thereof) is suspended. On the other hand, the Seimas can establish from when a law, which has been adopted by it and has come into force, must be applied; thus, the date of the entry into force of a law and that of its application may not necessarily coincide (ruling of 24 December 2002).

Competing general and special legal norms (lex specialis derogat legi generali)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 21 January 2008

... The essence of the principle of lex specialis derogat legi generali is that, if there are competing general and special norms, special norms should be applied (ruling of 18 October 2000) ...

Legal acts do not have retroactive effect (lex retro non agit); the date when a legal act comes into force may not precede the date when this legal act is published (Paragraph 2 of Article 7 and Paragraph 1 of Article 70 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 29 June 2012

Under the Constitution, only laws that are published are valid (Paragraph 2 of Article 7); laws adopted by the Seimas come into force after they are signed and officially promulgated by the President of the Republic, unless the laws themselves establish a later date for their entry into force (Paragraph 1 of Article 70).

The Constitutional Court has held on more than one occasion that the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law implies various requirements for the legislature and other law-making subjects, inter alia, the requirement that the effect of legal acts is prospective; the retroactive effect of laws and other legal acts is not allowed (lex retro non agit), unless the situation of a subject of legal relationships could be alleviated without prejudice to other subjects of legal relationships (lex benignior retro agit) (inter alia, the ruling of 25 October 2011); it is not allowed to violate the legitimate interests and legitimate expectations of a person by amendments to a legal regulation, since the persons who have acquired certain rights under a law have the right to reasonably expect that these rights will be retained and implemented for the established time period (inter alia, the ruling of 2 September 2009).

It needs to be noted that, in its rulings of 29 November 2007 and 25 October 2011, the Constitutional Court held that it is not permitted to establish such a legal regulation that would interfere in legal relationships that have already ended; such a regulation that could change the particular legal norms when the regulated relationships have already ended would create the preconditions for denying the legitimate expectations of persons, legal certainty and legal security, as well as the constitutional principle of justice.

It should also be noted that the principles of legal certainty, legal security, and legitimate expectations give rise to the prohibition on establishing such a date of the entry into force of a legal act that would precede the date of the publication of that legal act.

The protection of legitimate expectations in cases where a legal regulation is amended (on the principle of the protection of legitimate expectations, see 1.3. An open, just, and harmonious civil society and a state under the rule of law)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 25 January 2016

Amendments to a legal regulation must be made in such a manner that the persons whose legal status is affected by those amendments would have a real possibility of adapting to a new legal situation. Therefore, in order to create the conditions for persons not only to have access to a new legal regulation prior to the beginning of its validity, but also to adequately prepare for the envisaged changes, it might be necessary to establish a later date of its entry into force. The time period that should be left for adaptation in each concrete situation must be assessed in view of a number of circumstances: the purpose of a law in the legal system and the nature of the social relationships regulated by that law, the circle of subjects to whom it is applied and their possibilities of preparing for the entry into force of the new legal regulation, as well as other important circumstances (rulings of 15 February 2013 and 16 May 2013).

When essential amendments are made to a valid legal regulation, where such amendments lead to unfavourable consequences for the legal position of persons, it may also be necessary to establish a certain transitional legal regulation. The legal situation of persons to whom a new legal regulation is applicable should be regulated by means of transitional provisions in such a manner that those persons would be given enough time to finish the actions that they started on the basis of the previous legal regulation while expecting that the said previous legal regulation would be stable, and that such persons would be given enough time to implement their rights acquired under the previous legal regulation (ruling of 15 February 2013).

The presumption of the constitutionality of legal acts and of the lawfulness of the consequences resulting from the application of legal acts (Paragraph 1 of Article 107 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 27 April 2016

When interpreting Paragraph 1 of Article 107 of the Constitution, the Constitutional Court revealed the content of the presumption (stemming from the said paragraph of the Constitution) of the constitutionality of legal acts and of the constitutionality of the consequences resulting from the application of legal acts: the provision of Paragraph 1 of Article 107 of the Constitution, whereby a law (part thereof) may not be applied from the day of the official publication of the decision of the Constitutional Court that the act in question (part thereof) is in conflict with the Constitution, means that, as long as the Constitutional Court has not adopted a decision that a certain legal act (part thereof) is in conflict with the Constitution, it is presumed that such a legal act (part thereof) is in compliance with the Constitution and that the legal consequences that have appeared on the basis of the act in question are lawful (inter alia, the rulings of 30 December 2003 and 25 October 2011 and the decision of 19 December 2012).

Consequently, under Paragraph 1 of Article 107 of the Constitution, until the moment when the decision of the Constitutional Court is officially published that a certain legal act (part thereof) is in conflict with the Constitution, it is presumed that the legal act (part thereof) in question is in compliance with the Constitution and that the legal consequences (as, for instance, where, on the basis of a decision adopted by an institution in accordance with the said legal act (part thereof), a person has acquired certain rights or a certain legal status or, on the basis of the said decision adopted by an institution, a person was not granted certain rights or a certain legal status) that have appeared on the basis of the legal act in question are lawful (ruling of 25 October 2011).

The publicity and transparency requirements for law-making procedures

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 8 July 2016

... the constitutional principle of responsible governance, which should be interpreted in conjunction with the imperative obliging state institutions to serve the people, as consolidated in Paragraph 3 of Article 5 of the Constitution, implies the publicity and transparency requirements for law-making procedures; such requirements must be followed, inter alia, by institutions implementing state power. Compliance with such requirements in the course of adopting legal acts is an essential condition for the trust of society in the state and law, as well as for the responsibility of state authorities to society; this compliance creates the preconditions for involving the public in the decision-making process related to public interests, inter alia, while providing the possibility of access to the drafted legislation and other related information and, thus, implementing, inter alia, the rights guaranteed to citizens under Article 33 of the Constitution to participate in the governance of the state, to criticise the work of state institutions or their officials, and to file complaints against their decisions.

... also such constitutionally justifiable cases are possible where a law may provide for a non-public process of adopting legal acts where legal acts are adopted by the Government as, for instance, in order to protect information constituting a state secret or to avoid a threat to the constitutional order, defensive power, or other important interests.

A law requiring the impossible cannot produce legal consequences (lex non cogit ad impossibilia)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 19 June 2018

... under the Constitution, inter alia, the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law, a law requiring the impossible (i.e. which is incompatible with the requirement of lex non cogit ad impossibilia, arising from the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law) cannot produce legal consequences for the subjects of the legal relationships regulated under this law, since they would be obliged to do what could not be done by them at all (i.e. no regard would be paid to the requirement of impossibilium nulla obligatio est).

Accordingly, under the Constitution, inter alia, the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law, no legal consequences for the subjects of the legal relationships regulated under a law that is incompatible with the requirement of lex non cogit ad impossibilia, arising from the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law, can be produced by attempts to implement the provisions of the said law by means of statutory acts, inter alia, those of the application of law.

1.8.2. The interpretation of law

As regards the doctrine of the interpretation of the Constitution, see 1.8.4. The hierarchy of legal acts, 1.8.4.2. The Constitution, 1.8.4.2.2. The integrity, direct application, and interpretation of the Constitution.

The methods of the interpretation of law

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 23 June 1999

As a rule, in order to disclose the content of legal norms, it is not enough to apply only the linguistic method of interpretation. Various methods of the interpretation of law are known in the legal theory, i.e. linguistic, systematic, historical, comparative, etc. It is possible to disclose the meaning of individual notions used in a law by elucidating the purpose of the law, the nature and scope of the relationships regulated by it, the particularities of the regulation, etc. It is possible to do so by applying various methods (including the systematic one) of the interpretation of laws, as every legal norm is a constituent part of an integral legal act ... and is linked with other norms of that legal act.

The interpretation of law

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 28 March 2006

... the application of the linguistic method of the interpretation of law, as well as the strict following of the letter of the law in general in the course of applying law, is most often justifiable; it is not possible to deny the significance of this method of the interpretation of law; when the linguistic method of the interpretation of law (together with other methods) is applied, the observance of the formal requirements of law and the uniform understanding of the content of a particular legal regulation are ensured.

On the other hand, the linguistic method of the interpretation of law is not the only one or universal, and its significance should not be exaggerated. In this context, it should be noted that, as the Constitutional Court has held in its acts (inter alia, in the rulings of 25 May 2004 and 13 December 2004) more than once, the Constitution may not be interpreted only literally, by applying only the linguistic (verbal) method; while interpreting the Constitution, it is necessary to apply various methods of the interpretation of law: systemic, the one of general legal principles, logical, teleological, the one of the intentions of the legislature, the one of precedents, historical, comparative, etc. It should also be held that the same applies to the interpretation of all lower-ranking legal acts (ruling of 16 January 2006).

1.8.3. Legal gaps

As regards the doctrine of the assessment of the constitutionality of legal gaps, see 8. The Constitutional Court, 8.3. The powers of the Constitutional Court, 8.3.4. The limits of the jurisdiction of the Constitutional Court, 8.3.4.1. The powers of the Constitutional Court to investigate the constitutionality of legal gaps.

A legal gap (lacuna legis), inter alia, a legislative omission

The Constitutional Court's decision of 8 August 2006

The absence of explicit legal provisions regulating certain social relationships in a legal act (part thereof), if a certain legal regulation is neither explicitly nor implicitly established in other legal acts (or in other parts of the same legal act), should be treated as a legal gap – a lacuna legis. ... Such legal gaps may occur due to various reasons, inter alia, due to mistakes in the course of lawmaking, also due to the fact that a particular law-making subject did not regulate those social relationships deliberately. Such gaps, both serious and minor, may also occur after, by its ruling, the Constitutional Court declares a legal regulation (part thereof) implicitly or explicitly established in a certain legal act (articles (parts thereof) of legal acts) to be in conflict with a higher-ranking legal act, inter alia (and, first of all), with the Constitution; however, it needs to be emphasised that this does not mean that legal gaps occur after the entry into force of each ruling of the Constitutional Court whereby a certain lower-ranking legal act (part thereof) is ruled to be in conflict with a higher-ranking legal act, inter alia (and, first of all), with the Constitution: such legal situations are also possible where the removal of provisions conflicting with the provisions of higher-ranking legal acts, inter alia, with the Constitution, from the legal system by means of a ruling of the Constitutional Court, with respect to the application of law, virtually amounts to changing the overall legal regulation, i.e. the establishment of a different overall legal regulation that contains no gaps.

At the same time, it needs to be noted that any legal gap, no matter in what way it occurred, means that, although certain social relationships must be legally regulated (there is a need for their legal regulation), they are not legally regulated. All such gaps should be regarded as indeterminacies or shortcomings in a legal regulation, or as deficiencies of the legal system, which should be removed. In cases where the entire area of social relationships is not regulated, there are even grounds for stating the existence of the so-called vacuum in a particular legal regulation.

A legal gap, inter alia, a legislative omission, as one of the varieties of the non-establishment of an explicit legal regulation, is essentially different from such non-establishment of an explicit legal regulation that means that, in a certain legal act (part thereof), there is an implicitly established legal regulation that supplements and extends an explicit legal regulation (inter alia, a legal regulation that consolidates conduct opposite to the one established explicitly) and ... may potentially be in conflict with a certain higher-ranking legal act, inter alia, with the Constitution. In cases where a certain legal regulation implicitly established in a legal act (part thereof) lays down certain conduct and thereby supplements and extends an explicit legal regulation, there are no grounds for asserting that, purportedly, that legal act (part thereof) does not regulate certain social relationships at all, since those social relationships are, in fact, legally regulated; however, the said legal regulation is consolidated in particular legal acts not explicitly, expressis verbis, but implicitly, and is derived from explicit legal provisions in the course of the interpretation of law. Meanwhile, a legal gap, inter alia, a legislative omission, always means that the legal regulation of certain social relationships is, in general, established neither explicitly nor implicitly, neither in the particular legal act (part thereof) nor in any other legal acts, even though there exists a need for the legal regulation of those social relationships; in the event of a legislative omission, the said legal regulation must, while paying regard to the imperatives, stemming from the Constitution, of the consistency and inner non-contradiction of the legal system and taking into account the content of those social relationships, be established precisely in the particular legal act (part thereof), since this is required by a certain higher-ranking legal act, inter alia, the Constitution itself.

Some legal gaps ... may be regarded as such indeterminacies in a legal regulation that do not compete with the legal regulation established in higher-ranking legal acts and, as such, do not create the preconditions for violating the said acts. ...

In other cases, if a certain legal regulation is neither explicitly nor implicitly established also in other legal acts (or in other parts of the same legal act) and if the non-establishment of the explicit legal regulation in the reviewed legal act (part thereof) cannot be regarded as the above-mentioned implicit legal regulation that supplements and extends an explicitly established legal regulation, the absence of explicit legal provisions regulating the respective social relationships in a reviewed lower-ranking legal act (part thereof) should be treated as such a legal gap that is prohibited by the Constitution (or by a certain other higher-ranking legal act), i.e. as a legislative omission. A legislative omission means that a certain legal regulation is not established in the particular legal act (part thereof), although, under the Constitution (or under some other higher-ranking legal act against which the compliance of the lower-ranking legal act (part thereof) is assessed by the Constitutional Court), it must be established precisely in that particular legal act (part thereof). It needs to be especially emphasised that a legislative omission differs from other legal gaps also from the aspect that it is always the consequence of an action made by the law-making subject that issued a particular legal act, but not that of its failure to act; moreover, it is not the consequence of an action (especially, a lawful one) or failure to act by any other subject; for instance, such a legal gap where certain social relationships are not even begun to be regulated by certain legal acts, although there exists a need for their legal regulation, should not be regarded as a legislative omission; in the same way, a legislative omission cannot occur after the Constitutional Court, by its ruling, finds in a constitutional justice case that a certain legal act (part thereof) is in conflict with a higher-ranking legal act, inter alia, with the Constitution.

Thus, it is necessary to distinguish a legislative omission as the consequence of an action by the law-making subject that passed a particular legal act from legal gaps that occurred due to the fact that the necessary law-making actions were not undertaken at all, where no law-making subject passed a legal act designated for regulating certain social relationships and, due to this, those social relationships remained legally unregulated. Under certain circumstances, especially when the Constitution demands that those social relationships be legally regulated (and sometimes it explicitly indicates that they must be regulated not by means of a legal act of any type, but by means of a constitutional law or a law), the absence of law-making actions actually may create the preconditions for the occurrence of an anti-constitutional situation – such a state of social relationships where these relationships are developing not on the basis of law, although, as mentioned before, the Constitution demands that they be legally regulated. However, such a legal regulation or, to be more precise, its absence, is not a legislative omission.

Removing legal gaps and filling them ad hoc (for more on the powers of courts to fill legal gaps ad hoc, see 9.1. Courts, 9.1.5. The powers of courts related to the administration of justice)

The Constitutional Court's decision of 8 August 2006

The removal of legal gaps (without excluding a legislative omission) is a matter of the competence of the respective (competent) law-making subject. However, it is also possible, to a certain extent, to fill legal gaps that are in lower-ranking legal acts in the course of the application of law (inter alia, by making use of legal analogy, by applying general legal principles, as well as higher-ranking legal acts, first of all, the Constitution), thus, also in the course of the interpretation of law (inter alia, when this is done by the courts of general jurisdiction and specialised courts (established under Paragraph 2 of Article 111 of the Constitution), which administer justice and decide, within their competence, individual cases and have to interpret law so that they would be able to apply it). At the same time, it needs to be emphasised that a court can fill a legal gap that is in a lower-ranking legal act only ad hoc, i.e. by this way of the application of law, a legal gap is removed only as regards the individual social relationship due to which a concrete dispute is decided in the respective case investigated by that court. On the other hand, the judicial (ad hoc) removal of legal gaps creates the preconditions for forming the same case law in deciding cases of a certain category – the law entrenched in judicial precedents; undoubtedly, the law entrenched in judicial precedents can be substantially changed or modified otherwise later by the legislature (or another competent law-making subject) after it regulates certain social relationships by means of a law (or another legal act) and, thus, removes a particular legal gap already not ad hoc, but by a prospectively directed legal regulation of a general character.

Thus, it is possible to completely remove legal gaps (as well as legislative omissions) only when the law-making institutions issue the respective legal acts. Courts cannot do this. They can fill legal gaps that are in lower-ranking legal acts only ad hoc, since courts administer justice, but they are not legislative institutions (in the positive and broadest sense of this term); such restrictiveness of the possibilities of courts in this area is especially evident when gaps in substantive law are confronted. However, in all cases, there is an undeniable possibility for courts to fill ad hoc a legal gap that is in a lower-ranking legal act. If such powers of courts were denied or not recognised, if the possibilities of courts to apply law, first of all, supreme law – the Constitution, depended on whether a certain law-making subject did not leave gaps in a legal regulation (laid down by it in legal acts), and if courts were able to decide cases only after these legal gaps are filled by way of lawmaking, then it would have to be stated that courts, when they decide cases, apply not law and, first of all, not supreme law – the Constitution, but only a law (in the general sense of this term), that they do not administer justice according to law, but only formally apply articles (parts thereof) of legal acts, that constitutional values, inter alia, the rights and freedoms of a person, may be injured (and may be neither compensated nor redressed) solely because a particular law-making subject has failed to legally regulate certain relationships (or has legally regulated them, but not intensively enough), i.e. that, although certain values are entrenched in the Constitution, they, under the Constitution, are not properly defended and protected. This would not be in line with the social and constitutional mission of courts. Besides, this would mean that law is treated only as its textual form and is identified with its textual form.

Removing legal gaps and filling them ad hoc

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 7 June 2007

... the said possibility for courts to fill legal gaps ad hoc does not mean that the legislature does not have the duty, paying regard to the Constitution and within a reasonable time period, to establish the proper legal regulation of particular relationships by means of a law.

A legal gap, inter alia, a legislative omission

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 11 December 2009

The Constitutional Court has held more than once that a legal gap, inter alia, a legislative omission, always means that the legal regulation of certain social relationships is established neither explicitly nor implicitly, neither in a certain legal act (part thereof) nor in any other legal acts, even though there exists a need for the legal regulation of those social relationships; as regards a legislative omission, such a legal regulation must, while paying regard to the imperatives, stemming from the Constitution, of the consistency and inner non-contradiction of the legal system and taking into account the content of those social relationships, be established precisely in the particular legal act (part thereof), since this is required by a certain higher-ranking legal act, inter alia, the Constitution itself (decisions of 8 August 2006 and 5 November 2008 and the rulings of 2 March 2009 and 22 June 2009).

Removing legal gaps and filling them ad hoc

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 25 November 2019

... as held by the Constitutional Court, the removal of legal gaps is a matter within the competence of the respective (competent) law-making entity; it is also possible to fill legal gaps to a certain extent in the course of applying law and, thus, also in the course of interpreting law, inter alia, by courts, which administer justice and decide individual cases within their competence and are obliged to interpret law in order they could apply it; courts can fill legal gaps on an ad hoc basis, i.e. they can remove them with regard to an individual social relationship due to which a dispute is decided in the proceedings before the court; it is possible to completely remove legal gaps only when the law-making institutions adopt the respective legal acts; the possibility of filling legal gaps on an ad hoc basis does not mean that the legislature does not have the duty, paying regard to the Constitution and within a reasonable time period, to establish the proper legal regulation of particular relationships by means of a law (inter alia, the decision of 8 August 2006 and the ruling of 7 June 2007). The constitutional duty to establish the proper legal regulation of particular relationships by means of legal acts in accordance with the Constitution and within a reasonable time period also applies mutatis mutandis to other law-making entities.

Removing legal gaps and filling them ad hoc

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 8 July 2020

... the possibility for courts to fill legal gaps on an ad hoc basis does not mean that the legislature does not have the duty, paying regard to the Constitution and within a reasonable time period, to establish the proper legal regulation of particular relationships by means of a law (ruling of 7 June 2007). It should be noted that such a duty is also binding on other law-making entities in cases where a legal gap, inter alia, a legislative omission, is in a legal act ranking lower than a law.

1.8.4. The hierarchy of legal acts

1.8.4.1. General provisions

The requirement stemming from the principle of a state under the rule of law for law-making subjects to respect the hierarchy of legal acts

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 13 December 2004

The constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law and other constitutional imperatives give rise to the requirement for the legislature and other law-making subjects to pay regard to the hierarchy of legal acts, which stems from the Constitution. This requirement, inter alia, means that lower-ranking legal acts are prohibited from regulating such social relationships that may be regulated only by means of higher-ranking legal acts, also that lower-ranking legal acts are prohibited from laying down such a legal regulation that could compete with a legal regulation established in higher-ranking legal acts. ... through a statutory legal act, the norms of a law are realised; therefore, a statutory legal act may not replace a law itself or create any new legal norms of a general character that would compete with the norms of a law, because the supremacy of laws over statutory legal acts, which is consolidated in the Constitution, would thus be violated (ruling of 21 August 2002); it should also be stressed that statutory legal acts may not be in conflict with laws, constitutional laws, and the Constitution; statutory legal acts must be adopted on the basis of laws, because a statutory legal act is an act of the application of the norms of a law, irrespective of whether such a statutory legal act has one-off (ad hoc) application or permanent validity (ruling of 30 December 2003).

There is no delegated legislation in Lithuania (rulings of 26 October 1995, 19 December 1996, 3 June 1999, and 5 March 2004); therefore, the Seimas – the legislature – cannot assign the Government or other institutions to regulate, by means of statutory legal acts, the legal relationships that, under the Constitution, must be regulated by means of laws; while the Government may not accept such powers. The said relationships may not be regulated by means of statutory acts of the Seimas, either.

... under the Constitution, a legal regulation related to defining the content of human rights and freedoms or consolidating the guarantees of their implementation may be established only by means of a law. On the other hand, in cases where the Constitution does not require that particular relationships linked with human rights and with their implementation be regulated by means of a law, such relationships may also be regulated by means of statutory acts – acts that regulate the process (procedural) relationships of implementing human rights, the procedure for implementing individual human rights, etc.; however, under no circumstances may statutory acts establish such a legal regulation of the relationships linked with human rights and with their implementation that would compete with the one established in a law.

It should also be stressed that such failure to adhere to the form of a legal act where the Constitution requires that certain relationships must be regulated by means of a law, but they are still regulated by means of a statutory act (irrespective of whether such relationships are, from any aspect, additionally regulated in a law the legal regulation established in which is challenged by the legal regulation laid down in a statutory act, or irrespective of the fact that no law regulates such relationships at all), may provide the sufficient grounds for declaring such a statutory legal act unconstitutional. Under the Constitution, it is the Constitutional Court that decides whether statutory legal acts of the Seimas, the President of the Republic, or the Government, according to their form, are in conflict with the Constitution. When making such a decision, in every case, the Constitutional Court assesses all circumstances of the case, inter alia, the place of the reviewed legal regulation in the entire legal system, its objective, as well as the intentions of the law-making subject, the development of the legal regulation of the respective relationships and its changes before the legal act at issue was passed (legislative history), etc.

It should also be stressed that, in cases where substatutory legal acts are ruled to be in conflict with the Constitution according to their form (due to the fact that they regulated such relationships that can be regulated only by means of a law) and may no longer be applied, it is necessary to pay regard to the requirement, arising from the Constitution, to assess whether other values protected by the Constitution will be violated, or whether the balance among the values consolidated, protected, and defended by the Constitution will be disturbed, in the event of failure to protect and defend those rights of persons that were acquired during the period of the validity of the said substatutory legal acts. In these special cases, the legislature is under the constitutional obligation, having assessed all circumstances and having found that this is necessary, to establish such a legal regulation that would provide for the possibility of protecting and defending, fully or partially, the acquired rights of persons who obeyed law, followed the requirements of laws, and had trust in the state and its law in cases where those rights arose from the legal acts that were later ruled to be in conflict with the Constitution according to their form (due to the fact that they regulated such relationships that can only be regulated by means of a law); the said legal regulation established by the legislature must ensure that the principle of justice, enshrined in the Constitution, would not be derogated from.

The hierarchy of legal acts

The Constitutional Court's decision of 20 September 2005

The Constitutional Court has held on more than one occasion that the principle of a state under the rule of law, which is consolidated in the Constitution, implies the hierarchy of legal acts, in which the Constitution takes an exceptional place; in a state under the rule of law, it is prohibited to establish such a legal regulation that might compete with a legal regulation established in higher-ranking legal acts, inter alia, with that established in the Constitution itself.

Thus, under the Constitution, such legal situations are impermissible where it would not be possible to verify in a court whether legal acts (parts thereof) whose review in terms of their compliance with the Constitution does not fall within the jurisdiction of the Constitutional Court, inter alia, legal acts issued by ministers, other lower-ranking legal acts, as well as legal acts issued by municipalities, are in conflict with the Constitution and laws.

The time of the entry into force or the loss of the validity of higher-ranking legal acts may not depend on the time of the adoption, the entry into force, or the loss of the validity of lower-ranking legal acts

The Constitutional Court's decision of 29 December 2006

... as the Constitutional Court held in its ruling of 29 October 2003, under the Constitution, the Government may not establish, by its resolutions, any such a legal regulation whereby the time of the entry into force or the loss of the validity of a government resolution would depend on the entry into force of a lower-ranking legal act that is passed by another subject. This doctrinal provision formulated in the Constitutional Court's ruling of 29 October 2003 should be interpreted as expressing the general constitutional imperative that the time of the entry into force or the loss of the validity of a higher-ranking legal act must not and may not be made dependent on the adoption, the entry into force, or the loss of the validity of a lower-ranking legal act, etc. Thus, the time of the entry into force of a law must not and may not be made dependent on the issuance and entry into force of a decree of the President of the Republic, which is a lower-ranking legal act.

The hierarchy of legal acts

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 9 May 2014

The principle of a state under the rule of law, which is consolidated in the Constitution, implies the hierarchy of legal acts. In its acts, the Constitutional Court has held on more than one occasion that this constitutional principle does not permit that substatutory legal acts (thus, also government resolutions) establish any such a legal regulation that would compete with that established by means of a law, that substatory legal acts may not be in conflict with laws, constitutional laws, and the Constitution, that substatory legal acts must be adopted on the basis of laws, and that a substatory legal act is an act of the application of the norms of a law, irrespective of whether that act has one-off (ad hoc) application or permanent validity (inter alia, the rulings of 6 September 2007, 9 March 2010, 18 April 2012, 20 February 2013, and 9 May 2013). The Constitution prohibits lower-ranking legal acts from regulating the relationships that may be regulated only by means of higher-ranking legal acts (inter alia, the rulings of 29 November 2007, 2 September 2009, and 18 April 2012). The Constitutional Court has held on more than one occasion that laws establish rules of general nature, while substatory legal acts may particularise them and regulate the procedure for their implementation (rulings of 26 October 1995, 19 December 1996, and 5 March 2004). In the constitutional jurisprudence, it has been noted that the duty of the Government to adopt substatory acts that are necessary for the implementation of laws stems directly from the Constitution and, in cases where there is the assignment by the legislature to do so, it also stems from laws and the resolutions of the Seimas concerning the implementation of laws. Among other things, the Constitutional Court, when interpreting the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law, also held that, in cases where the Constitution does not require the regulation of certain relationships that are indicated therein specifically by means of a law and where, under the Constitution, the regulation of such relationships is not assigned to the exclusive competence of other institutions exercising state power, inter alia, the Government, the legislature may also establish in a law that certain relationships are regulated by the Government or an institution authorised by it (ruling of 5 May 2007).

1.8.4.2. The Constitution

The Constitution as the highest-ranking legal act and a social contract

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 25 May 2004

The Constitution of the Republic of Lithuania was adopted by referendum – the vote of the entire Nation – on 25 October 1992. The referendum in which the Constitution was adopted was organised according to the democratic legal tradition of the State of Lithuania (ruling of 22 July 1994). The source of the Constitution is the national community, the civil Nation, itself.

The Constitution is the highest-ranking legal act. The Constitution reflects a social contract – the obligation democratically assumed by all citizens of the Republic of Lithuania to the current and future generations to live under the fundamental rules consolidated in the Constitution and to obey those rules in order to ensure the legitimacy of state power and the lawfulness of its decisions, as well as human rights and freedoms, so that concord would exist in society. As the highest-ranking legal act and a social contract, the Constitution is based on universal and unquestionable values, such as the sovereignty belonging to the Nation, democracy, the recognition of human rights and freedoms and respect for them, respect for law and the rule of law, the limitation of the scope of powers, the duty of state institutions to serve the people and their responsibility to society, civic consciousness, justice, and the striving for an open, just, and harmonious civil society and a state under the rule of law. The Constitution provides for the grounds of legal relationships between a person and the state, the formation and functioning of public power, the national economy, local self-government, as well as other major relationships in the life of society and the state. Having adopted the Constitution, the civil Nation, as the national community, formed the normative basis for its own common life and consolidated the state as the common good of all society. The Nation amends the Constitution directly or through its democratically elected representatives and only according to the rules established in the Constitution itself. The Constitution is supreme law. The Constitution provides for the guidelines for the entire legal system – the entire legal system is created on the basis of the Constitution.

The Constitution as the normative basis of the life of the national community

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 24 January 2014

Having adopted the Constitution, the highest-ranking legal act, by referendum, the Lithuanian nation formed the normative basis for its own common life, as the national community – the civil Nation, and consolidated the state as the common good of all society (inter alia, the rulings of 25 May 2004, 19 August 2006, and 24 September 2009). One of the most important obligations of a democratic state based on law and justice is to respect, defend, and protect the values, as well as human rights and freedoms, upon which the Constitution itself adopted by the Nation is based and whose actual consolidation, defence, and protection is the raison d'être of the state itself; otherwise, it would not be possible to regard the state as the common good of all society (rulings of 19 August 2006 and 24 September 2009 and the decision of 19 December 2012).

The Constitution as the highest-ranking legal act and a social contract; the Constitution is binding on the national community – the civil Nation itself

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 11 July 2014

... the Constitution is supreme law. The source of the Constitution is the national community – the civil Nation (ruling of 25 May 2004).

The Constitution reflects a social contract – the obligation democratically assumed by all citizens of the Republic of Lithuania to the current and future generations to live under the fundamental rules consolidated in the Constitution and to obey those rules in order to ensure the legitimacy of state power and the lawfulness of its decisions, as well as human rights and freedoms, so that concord would exist in society (ruling of 25 May 2004 and the decision of 20 April 2010). As the highest-ranking legal act and a social contract, the Constitution is based on universal and unquestionable values, such as the sovereignty belonging to the Nation, democracy, the recognition of human rights and freedoms and respect for them, respect for law and the rule of law, the limitation of the scope of powers, the duty of state institutions to serve the people and their responsibility to society, civic consciousness, justice, and the striving for an open, just, and harmonious civil society and a state under the rule of law (rulings of 25 May 2004, 19 August 2006, and 24 September 2009, the decision of 19 December 2012, and the ruling of 24 January 2014).

In view of the foregoing, it should be emphasised that the Constitution reflects the obligation of the national community – the civil Nation – to create and reinforce the state by following the fundamental rules consolidated in the Constitution; the Constitution lays down the legal foundation for the common life of the Nation – the national community. Thus, it should also be emphasised that the Constitution equally binds the national community – the civil Nation itself; therefore, the supreme sovereign power of the Nation may be executed, inter alia, directly (by referendum) only in observance of the Constitution.

The concept, nature, and purpose of the Constitution

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 30 July 2020

... the Constitution is supreme law; the source of the Constitution is the national community itself – the civil People. The Constitution reflects a social contract – the obligation democratically assumed by all citizens of the Republic of Lithuania to the current and future generations to live under the fundamental rules consolidated in the Constitution and to obey those rules in order to ensure the legitimacy of state power and the lawfulness of its decisions, as well as human rights and freedoms, so that concord would exist in society (inter alia, the ruling of 25 May 2004, the decision of 20 April 2010, and the ruling of 11 July 2014). As the highest-ranking legal act and a social contract, the Constitution is based on universal and unquestionable values – the sovereignty belonging to the People, democracy, the recognition of human rights and freedoms and respect for them, respect for law and the rule of law, the limitation of the scope of powers, the duty of state authority institutions to serve the people and the responsibility of these institutions to society, civic consciousness, justice, and the striving for an open, just, and harmonious civil society and a state under the rule of law (inter alia, the rulings of 25 May 2004, 24 September 2009, and 11 July 2014). Having adopted the Constitution, the civil People, as the national community, laid down the normative basis for the common life and consolidated the state as the common good of all society (inter alia, the rulings of 25 May 2004, 24 September 2009, and 24 January 2014). The Constitution equally binds the national community itself – the civil People; therefore, the supreme sovereign power of the People may be executed, inter alia, directly (by referendum), only in observance of the Constitution (ruling of 11 July 2014).

Thus, the Constitution, whose source, like in the case of the fundamental constitutional acts of the State of Lithuania, is the national community itself – the civil People, is the highest-ranking constituent act, which forms the normative basis for the common life of the civil People, while giving meaning to and consolidating the state as the common good of all society. The basis of the Constitution as supreme law is comprised of those provisions of the fundamental constitutional acts of the State of Lithuania that consolidated and implemented the unamendable fundamental constitutional principles – independence, democracy, and the innate nature of human rights and freedoms; the Constitution as supreme law is also based on other fundamental provisions laid down in the fundamental constitutional acts of the State of Lithuania and on the constitutional traditions of the State of Lithuania expressed in those provisions. In view of this, like the fundamental constitutional acts of the State of Lithuania, the Constitution adopted by referendum is the primary source of Lithuanian constitutional law. ...

1.8.4.2.1. The supremacy of the Constitution

The principle of the supremacy of the Constitution (Paragraph 1 of Article 7 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 17 October 1995

The legal system of the Republic of Lithuania is based on the requirement that any law or other legal act, as well as any international treaty of the Republic of Lithuania, may not be in conflict with the Constitution, since Paragraph 1 of Article 7 of the Constitution prescribes: “Any law or other act that contradicts the Constitution shall be invalid.” As such, this constitutional provision cannot render any law or international treaty invalid, but it requires that the provisions of laws and international treaties be not in conflict with the provisions of the Constitution.

The principle of the supremacy of the Constitution

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 24 December 2002

The principle of the supremacy of the Constitution is a fundamental requirement for a democratic state under the rule of law.

The principle of the supremacy of the Constitution is consolidated in Paragraph 1 of Article 7 of the Constitution, which provides that any law or other act that contradicts the Constitution is invalid; the same principle is also consolidated from various aspects in Paragraph 2 of Article 5 of the Constitution, which provides that the scope of powers is limited by the Constitution, in Paragraph 1 of Article 6 thereof, which provides that the Constitution is an integral and directly applicable act, in Paragraph 2 of Article 6 thereof, which provides that everyone may defend his/her rights by invoking the Constitution, in Paragraph 1 of Article 30 thereof, which provides that a person whose constitutional rights or freedoms are violated has the right to apply to a court, in Paragraph 1 of Article 102 thereof, which provides that the Constitutional Court decides whether the laws and other acts of the Seimas are in conflict with the Constitution and whether the acts of the President of the Republic and the Government are in conflict with the Constitution or laws, in Paragraph 1 of Article 110 thereof, which provides that judges may not apply any laws that are in conflict with the Constitution, etc.

The principle of the supremacy of the Constitution means that the Constitution takes an exceptional, the highest, place in the hierarchy of legal acts, that no legal act may be in conflict with the Constitution, that no one is permitted to violate the Constitution, that the constitutional order must be protected, and that the Constitution itself consolidates the mechanism making it possible to determine whether legal acts (parts thereof) are in conflict with the Constitution. In this respect, the principle of the supremacy of the Constitution, which is established in the Constitution, is inseparably linked with the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law, which is a universal constitutional principle upon which the entire Lithuanian legal system and the Constitution itself are based. The violation of the principle of the supremacy of the Constitution would mean that the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law is also violated.

The duty of law-making subjects to revise the legal acts that were passed before the entry into force of the Constitution (Paragraph 1 of Article 7 of the Constitution and Article 2 of the Law on the Procedure for the Entry into Force of the Constitution of the Republic of Lithuania)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 29 October 2003

... the principle of the supremacy of the Constitution implies the duty of the legislature and other law-making subjects to revise, while taking account of the norms and principles of the Constitution, the legal acts that were passed before the entry into force of the Constitution and to ensure a harmonious hierarchical system of the legal acts that regulate the same relationships.

[...]

It should be noted that the phrase “inasmuch as they are not in conflict with the Constitution and this Law” of Article 2 [which provides that laws, as well as other legal acts or parts thereof, that were in force in the territory of the Republic of Lithuania prior to the adoption of the Constitution of the Republic of Lithuania are effective inasmuch as they are not in conflict with the Constitution and this law, and remain in force until they are either declared null and void or brought in line with the provisions of the Constitution] of the Law on the Procedure for the Entry into Force of the Constitution of the Republic of Lithuania, to the extent that the said phrase is related to the principle of the supremacy of the Constitution and, in particular, to the provision of Paragraph 1 of Article 7 of the Constitution, whereby any law or other act that contradicts the Constitution is invalid, means that the Constitution stipulates that the legal acts that were adopted before the entry into force of the Constitution may not be valid if they are inconsistent with the Constitution and if it is established, on the basis and according to the procedure established in the Constitution, that those legal acts are in conflict with the Constitution.

Under the Constitution, the phrase “shall remain in force until they are either declared null and void or brought in line with the provisions of the Constitution” of Article 2 of the Law on the Procedure for the Entry into Force of the Constitution of the Republic of Lithuania means that the legislature and other law-making subjects have the duty to revise all legal acts that were passed by them prior to the entry into force of the Constitution and are still in force, including such legal acts that were passed by no longer existing institutions of the State of Lithuania after the entry into force of the Constitution and still remain in force and regulate the relationships that belong to the sphere of regulation by the respective law-making subject, as well as such legal acts that were adopted before the restoration of the independent State of Lithuania but remained in force after the restoration of the independent State of Lithuania and, after the entry into force of the Constitution, regulate the relationships that belong to the sphere of regulation by the respective law-making subject, and the duty to assess whether those legal acts, in the opinion of that law-making subject, are in conflict with the Constitution.

The legislature or another law-making subject, having assessed that, in its opinion, a legal act that was passed by it before the entry into force of the Constitution and is still in force, or a legal act that was passed by no longer existing institutions of the State of Lithuania and is still in force and, after the entry into force of the Constitution, regulates the relationships that belong to the sphere of regulation by the respective law-making subject, or a legal act that was passed before the restoration of the independent State of Lithuania but remained in force after the restoration of the independent State of Lithuania and, after the entry into force of the Constitution, regulates the relationships that belong to the sphere of regulation by the respective law-making subject, is in conformity with the Constitution, may leave such a legal act in force. On the other hand, if the legislature or another law-making subject has assessed that, in its opinion, a legal act (or part thereof) that was adopted by it before the entry into force of the Constitution and is still in force, or a legal act (or part thereof) that was passed by no longer existing institutions of the State of Lithuania and is still in force and, after the entry into force of the Constitution, regulates the relationships that belong to the sphere of regulation by the respective law-making subject, or a legal act (or part thereof) that was passed before the restoration of the independent State of Lithuania but remained in force after the restoration of the independent State of Lithuania and, after the entry into force of the Constitution, regulates the relationships that belong to the sphere of regulation by the respective law-making subject, is not in conformity with the Constitution, the legislature or another law-making subject has the constitutional duty to bring this act in line with the Constitution, i.e. to pass a new legal act that would amend the legal act (or part thereof) that, in the opinion of that law-making subject, is not in conformity with the Constitution, or to declare such a legal act that, in its opinion, is not in conformity with the Constitution, no longer valid.

The constitutionality of those legal acts (or parts thereof) that were not brought in line with the Constitution by the respective law-making subject (by passing a new legal act amending, in the opinion of that law-making subject, a legal act (or part thereof) that was not in conformity with the Constitution) and that were not declared to be no longer valid may be verified through constitutional review. Under the Constitution, the Constitutional Court decides regarding the constitutionality of the Republic of Lithuania's laws, other acts of the Supreme Council, and government acts that were adopted prior to the entry into force of the Constitution, as well as regarding the constitutionality of legal acts of the respective legal force that were passed before the restoration of the independent State of Lithuania but remained in force after the restoration of the independent State of Lithuania and regulate the relationships that belong to sphere of regulation by the Seimas or the Government. In its ruling of 30 May 2003, the Constitutional Court held that, according to the Constitution, only the Constitutional Court has the powers to officially interpret the Constitution.

... the duty of the legislature and other law-making subjects to revise all legal acts that were adopted by them before the entry into force of the Constitution and are still in force, also the legal acts that were passed by no longer existing institutions of the State of Lithuania and still remain in force and, after the entry into force of the Constitution, regulate the relationships that belong to the sphere of regulation by the respective law-making subject, as well as the legal acts that were passed before the restoration of the independent State of Lithuania but remained in force after the restoration of the independent State of Lithuania and, after the entry into force of the Constitution, regulate the relationships that belong to the sphere of regulation by the respective law-making subject, as well as the duty to assess whether those legal acts, in the opinion of that law-making subject, are in conflict with the Constitution, also implies their duty to ensure that those legal acts are brought in line with the provisions of the Constitution not only in terms of the content and scope of the legal regulation established in such legal acts, including the form of such legal acts, but also in terms of the publication of those legal acts as required by Paragraph 2 of Article 7 of the Constitution.

It should be noted that the process of the revision and assessment of the constitutionality of the legal acts that were adopted before the entry into force of the Constitution is not a one-off act; however, this process may not last for a groundlessly long time period. The principle of the supremacy of the Constitution and the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law give rise to the duty of the legislature and other law-making subjects to revise all legal acts that were passed by them before the entry into force of the Constitution and are still in force, also the legal acts that were passed by no longer existing institutions of the State of Lithuania and are still in force and, after the entry into force of the Constitution, regulate the relationships that belong to the sphere of regulation by the respective law-making subject, as well as the legal acts that were passed before the restoration of the independent State of Lithuania but remained in force after the restoration of the independent State of Lithuania and, after the entry into force of the Constitution, regulate the relationships that belong to the sphere of regulation by the respective law-making subject, as well as the duty to assess the conformity of the said legal acts with the Constitution within a reasonably short time period. This also applies to the revision and assessment of the above-mentioned legal acts with respect to the manner of their publication.

It is not allowed to interpret the Constitution on the basis of lower-ranking legal acts

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 1 July 2004

The norms and principles of the Constitution may not be interpreted on the basis of acts adopted by the legislature and other law-making subjects, as the supremacy of the Constitution in the legal system would, thus, be denied (ruling of 12 July 2001).

The principle of the supremacy of the Constitution

The Constitutional Court's decision of 19 November 2012

The principle of the supremacy of the Constitution is consolidated not only in Paragraph 1 of Article 7 of the Constitution, but it is also entrenched from various aspects in other articles of the Constitution (rulings of 24 December 2002, 29 October 2003, 5 March 2004, 20 March 2007, 29 March 2012, and 5 September 2012). Various aspects of this principle should be revealed while taking account of ... Articles 1, 5, 6, 18, 30 and Paragraph 1 of Article 102 of the Constitution, in the context of which the content of Paragraph 1 of Article 107 of the Constitution should be interpreted. Thus, for instance, the principle of the supremacy of the Constitution and the constitutional imperative of the rule of law are implied, inter alia, by the provision of Article 1 of the Constitution that the State of Lithuania is democratic, by the principle of the separation of powers, which is consolidated in Paragraph 1 of Article 5, by the provision of Paragraph 2 of Article 5, whereby the scope of powers is limited by the Constitution, as well as by the principle related to this provision, which is consolidated in Article 18, according to which human rights and freedoms are innate; inter alia, the provision of Paragraph 1 of Article 6 of the Constitution, according to which the Constitution is a directly applicable act (i.e. the principle of the direct application of the Constitution), the provision of Paragraph 2 of this article, whereby everyone may defend his/her rights by invoking the Constitution, as well as the related provision of Paragraph 1 of Article 30, whereby a person whose constitutional rights or freedoms are violated has the right to apply to a court, are designated for ensuring the supremacy of the Constitution.

The principle of the supremacy of the Constitution; the constitutional imperative prescribing that it is not permitted to put to a referendum any such possible decisions that are non-compliant with the requirements of the Constitution

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 11 July 2014

In the Constitutional Court's ruling of 19 August 2006, it is noted that one of the most important obligations of a democratic state based on law and justice is to respect, defend, and protect the values upon which the Constitution, adopted by the Nation, is based and whose actual consolidation, defence, and protection is the raison d'être of the state itself; otherwise, it would not be possible to regard the state as the common good of all society.

A fundamental requirement for a democratic state under the rule of law is the principle of the supremacy of the Constitution, which is consolidated in Paragraph 1 of Article 7 of the Constitution, where it is prescribed that any law or other act that contradicts the Constitution is invalid; this principle is, from various aspects, also consolidated in other articles of the Constitution, inter alia, Paragraph 1 of Article 6 thereof, which stipulates that the Constitution is an integral and directly applicable act (rulings of 24 December 2002, 29 October 2003, 5 March 2004, and 20 March 2007). The principle of the supremacy of the Constitution means that the Constitution takes an exceptional, the highest, place in the hierarchy of legal acts; no legal act may be in conflict with the Constitution; no one is permitted to violate the Constitution; the constitutional order must be protected (rulings of 24 December 2002, 29 October 2003, 5 March 2004, and 20 March 2007, the decision of 20 November 2009, and the ruling of 29 March 2012). The Constitutional Court has also held that all provisions of the Constitution should be interpreted by taking into account the principle of the supremacy of the Constitution (ruling of 5 March 2004). In its ruling of 13 December 2004, the Constitutional Court emphasised that the Constitution is the highest-ranking legal act, supreme law, and the measure of the lawfulness and legitimacy of all other legal acts; the discretion of all law-making subjects is limited by supreme law – the Constitution; all legal acts, as well as the decisions of all state and municipal institutions and officials, must comply with and not contradict the Constitution.

... in its ruling of 1 December 1994, the Constitutional Court held that the norms of the Constitution are equally binding on all legal subjects, including initiative groups for referendums and groups of citizens of any size. In its ruling of 22 July 1994, the Constitutional Court noted that the Seimas, as well as other participants of the legislation process, while drafting and adopting legal acts, must bring them into line with the Constitution; this is one of the main measures ensuring the constitutional order and one of the fundamental principles of a state under the rule of law; this rule must equally be observed by any group of citizens expressing an initiative to call a referendum; a draft law or the draft provisions of a law proposed to be put to a referendum must be brought in line with the Constitution.

... the Constitution is also binding on the national community – the civil Nation itself. ... all other legal subjects, inter alia, law-making subjects, the institutions organising elections (referendums), initiative groups for referendums, as well as other groups of citizens, are equally bound by the Constitution and must observe and not violate the Constitution. In addition, it should be noted that the principle of the supremacy of the Constitution, inter alia, gives rise to the imperative that it is not permitted to put to a referendum any such possible decisions that would not comply with the requirements of the Constitution.

1.8.4.2.2. The integrity, direct application, and interpretation of the Constitution

The system of constitutional values

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 23 October 2002

The values consolidated in the Constitution constitute a harmonious system; there is a balance among them. ... in its ruling of 16 March 1999, the Constitutional Court held that, in the event of a clash between the values protected by the Constitution, it is necessary to find decisions ensuring that none of these values will be denied or unreasonably limited.

The principle of the integrity of the Constitution (Paragraph 1 of Article 6 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 25 November 2002

The Constitution is an integral and directly applicable act (Paragraph 1 of Article 6 of the Constitution); the principles and norms of the Constitution constitute a harmonious system. No provision of the Constitution may be interpreted in such a way that the content of another constitutional provision would be distorted or denied, since thereby the essence of the whole constitutional regulation would be distorted and the balance of the constitutional values would be disturbed.

The Constitution is a directly applicable act (Paragraph 1 of Article 6 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 24 December 2002

Paragraph 1 of Article 6 of the Constitution prescribes: "The Constitution shall be an integral and directly applicable act."

The discretion of the legislature to pass laws, including those that regulate the procedure for the application of the provisions of the Constitution, is limited by the Constitution; the legislature must pay regard to the norms and principles of the Constitution.

Thus, under the Constitution, the legislature does not have the right to establish such a legal regulation that would limit or deny the possibility of applying the Constitution directly.

The principle of the integrity of the Constitution (Paragraph 1 of Article 6 of the Constitution); the Constitutional Court investigates the compliance of impugned legal acts with the Constitution as an integral and harmonious system

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 30 May 2003

The Constitution is an integral act (Paragraph 1 of Article 6 of the Constitution). The constitutional norms are interrelated and constitute a single and harmonious system. No provision of the Constitution may be opposed to other provisions of the Constitution; no provision of the Constitution may be interpreted in a manner that would deny or distort the substance of other constitutional norms.

In cases where, following a received petition, the Constitutional Court investigates whether an impugned legal act (part thereof) is in conflict with the articles of the Constitution (parts thereof) indicated in the petition, it at the same time investigates whether the impugned legal act (part thereof) is in conflict with the Constitution – an integral and harmonious system (ruling of 24 December 2002).

In its ruling of 13 June 2000, the Constitutional Court held that particular norms set out in the articles (parts thereof) of the Constitution indicated by the petitioner may not be interpreted separately from other norms of the Constitution, as well as that the Constitutional Court, having found that the impugned legal act (part thereof) is in conflict with the articles (parts thereof) of the Constitution not indicated by the petitioner, has the powers to state this fact.

The interpretation of the Constitution in the jurisprudence of the Constitutional Court

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 30 May 2003

Under the Constitution, only the Constitutional Court has the powers to officially interpret the Constitution. The Constitutional Court does so by deciding whether laws are in conflict with the Constitution, whether other acts passed by the Seimas are in conflict with laws and the Constitution, and whether the acts of the President of the Republic and the Government are in conflict with laws and the Constitution. ...

... The principle of a state under the rule of law, which is consolidated in the Constitution, implies, inter alia, the continuity of the jurisprudence (ruling of 12 July 2001). This means that the Constitutional Court, while deciding analogous constitutional disputes, follows the doctrine that was formed in previous cases and reveals the content of the Constitution. When considering the compliance of laws and other legal acts (parts thereof) with the Constitution, the Constitutional Court develops the concept of constitutional provisions that was presented in its previous rulings and other acts, and it reveals new aspects of a particular regulation established by the Constitution, where such aspects are necessary for the consideration of the specific case.

The principle of the integrity of the Constitution (Paragraph 1 of Article 6 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 29 October 2003

The Constitution is an integral and directly applicable act (Paragraph 1 of Article 6 of the Constitution).

When interpreting the principle of the integrity of the Constitution, the Constitutional Court has held more than once in its rulings that norms set out in different articles of the Constitution are harmonised with one another and constitute a single whole, a harmonious system; no provision of the Constitution may be opposed to other provisions of the Constitution; no provision of the Constitution may be interpreted in a manner that would deny or distort the substance of other constitutional norms.

The Constitution has certain structural particularities. The Constitution consists of the Preamble, fourteen chapters, final provisions, as well as other constituent parts of the Constitution.

The integrity of the Constitution; the Constitution as legal reality; the Constitution as law without gaps; the spirit of the Constitution

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 25 May 2004

The Constitution as a legal act is expressed in a certain textual form and it has a certain linguistic expression. However, since law cannot be treated solely as a text which expressis verbis sets out certain legal provisions and rules of conduct, thus, also the Constitution as legal reality cannot be treated solely on the basis of its textual form. The Constitution cannot be understood as only the aggregate of explicit provisions. The Constitution is an integral act (Paragraph 1 of Article 6 of the Constitution). The nature of the Constitution itself as the highest-ranking legal act and the idea of constitutionality imply that the Constitution may not have and does not have any gaps; thus, there cannot be and there is not such a legal regulation established in lower-ranking legal acts that could not be assessed in terms of its compliance with the Constitution. The Constitution as legal reality is comprised of various provisions, constitutional norms, and constitutional principles, which are directly consolidated in various formulations of the Constitution or are derived from them. Some constitutional principles are entrenched in constitutional norms formulated expressis verbis; others, although not entrenched expressis verbis, are reflected in them and are derived from constitutional norms, from other constitutional principles reflected in these norms, from the entirety of the constitutional legal regulation, as well as from the meaning of the Constitution as the act that consolidates and protects the system of major values of the national community – the civil Nation, and provides for the guidelines for the entire legal system. There may not exist and there is no contradiction between constitutional principles and constitutional norms; all constitutional norms and constitutional principles form a harmonious system. It is constitutional principles that organise all provisions of the Constitution and make them a harmonious whole; constitutional principles do not allow the existence of any internal contradictions in the Constitution or any such interpretation of the Constitution that could distort or deny the meaning of any provision thereof or any value consolidated and protected by the Constitution. The constitutional principles reveal not only the letter of the Constitution, but also the spirit of the Constitution – the values and objectives entrenched in the Constitution by the Nation, once it chose a certain textual form and verbal expression of its provisions, defined certain norms of the Constitution, and explicitly or implicitly established a certain constitutional legal regulation. Thus, there may not exist and there is no contradiction not only between constitutional principles and constitutional norms, but also between the spirit of the Constitution and the letter of the Constitution: the letter of the Constitution may not be interpreted or applied in the manner that would deny the spirit of the Constitution; it is possible to understand the spirit of the Constitution only when the constitutional legal regulation is perceived as a whole and only upon the assessment of the purpose of the Constitution as a social contract and the highest-ranking legal act. The spirit of the Constitution is expressed by the entirety of the constitutional legal regulation, i.e. it is expressed by all provisions of the Constitution: by the norms of the Constitution directly set out in the text of the Constitution and by the principles of the Constitution, including those that stem from the entirety of the constitutional legal regulation and the meaning of the Constitution as an act that consolidates and protects the system of the major values of the Nation, as well as provides for the guidelines for the entire legal system.

The Constitutional Court has held more than once that all provisions of the Constitution are interrelated and constitute a single and harmonious system, that there is a balance among the values consolidated in the Constitution, and that it is not permitted to interpret any provision of the Constitution in such a way that would distort or deny the content of another provision of the Constitution, since the substance of the entire constitutional legal regulation would thereby be distorted and the balance of constitutional values would be disturbed (rulings of 24 September 1998, 23 October 2002, 25 November 2002, 4 March 2003, 4 July 2003, 30 September 2003, 3 December 2003, and 15 April 2004).

The Constitution may not be interpreted only literally, by applying the sole linguistic (verbal) method, precisely due to the fact that the Constitution is an integral act and it is comprised of various provisions – constitutional norms and constitutional principles, among which there may not exist and there is no contradiction and which constitute a harmonious system, also due to the fact that the constitutional principles are derived from the entirety of the constitutional legal regulation expressing the spirit of the Constitution and from the meaning of the Constitution as the act that consolidates and protects the system of the major values of the national community – the civil Nation and provides for the guidelines for the entire legal system, as well as due to the fact that the letter of the Constitution may not be interpreted or applied in a manner that denies the spirit of the Constitution. When interpreting the Constitution, various methods of the interpretation of law must be applied: systemic, the one of general legal principles, logical, teleological, the one of the intentions of the legislature, the one of precedents, historical, comparative, etc.

Only such comprehensive interpretation of the Constitution may provide the conditions for the realisation of the purpose of the Constitution as a social contract and the highest-ranking legal act, and for ensuring that the meaning of the Constitution will not be deviated from, that the spirit of the Constitution will not be denied, and that the values on which the Constitution, adopted by the Nation itself, is based will be upheld in life.

The interpretation of the Constitution

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 13 December 2004

... none of the provisions of the Constitution may be interpreted in a manner whereby a certain constitutional principle would be denied or distorted, since the aspirations and/or values that were consolidated by the Nation in the Constitution adopted by it would also be denied and/or distorted, whereas the Nation, the sovereign founder of the State of Lithuania (Article 2 of the Constitution), constitutionally obligated the state (created by the Nation) to protect and defend those aspirations and values.

[...]

The interpretation of all provisions of the Constitution in the context of the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law is a necessary precondition for the exhaustive interpretation of the Constitution.

The interpretation of the Constitution

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 28 March 2006

... if the Constitution were interpreted only literally, by applying the linguistic method, it could not be the supreme law of Lithuania, as it would virtually be identified with its textual form – the letter of the Constitution would be made absolute and the spirit of the Constitution would be ignored.

[...]

... the Constitutional Court has held that constitutional norms and principles may not be interpreted on the basis of legal acts adopted by the legislature and other law-making subjects, since thereby the supremacy of the Constitution in the legal system would be denied (rulings of 12 July 2001, 1 July 2004, and 13 December 2004 and the decision of 10 February 2005).

The interpretation of the Constitution in the jurisprudence of the Constitutional Court

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 9 May 2006

Under the Constitution, only the Constitutional Court has the powers to officially interpret the Constitution and to form the official constitutional doctrine. The provisions – norms and principles – of the Constitution are interpreted in the acts of the Constitutional Court. The Constitution is an integral act (Paragraph 1 of Article 6 of the Constitution); thus, the official constitutional doctrine is formed on the basis of the fact that all provisions of the Constitution are interrelated not only formally, but also by their content: the content of some provisions of the Constitution determines the content of its other provisions. The Constitutional Court has held in its acts more than once that all provisions of the Constitution constitute a harmonious system, that there is a balance among the values consolidated in the Constitution, that no provision of the Constitution can be interpreted only literally, that no provision of the Constitution may be opposed to other provisions of the Constitution, that no provision of the Constitution may be interpreted in such a way that the content of another constitutional provision would be distorted or denied, since thereby the essence of the whole constitutional regulation would be distorted and the balance of constitutional values would be disturbed. The official constitutional doctrine reveals, inter alia, the content of and interrelations among various constitutional provisions, a balance among constitutional values, and the essence of the constitutional legal regulation as a whole.

The interpretation of the Constitution

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 27 February 2012

... the Constitutional Court has held in its jurisprudence more than once that the Constitution may not be interpreted only literally, by applying the sole linguistic (verbal) method (inter alia, the rulings of 25 May 2004, 16 January 2006, and 24 September 2009); if the literal (linguistic, verbal) interpretation of the Constitution were made absolute, the content of the overall constitutional legal regulation would also be devalued and, if not all, then at least some values consolidated, defended, and protected by the Constitution would be ignored, and, possibly, the preconditions would be created for undermining the aspirations consolidated by the Nation in the Constitution adopted by referendum (ruling of 6 June 2006); it is not permissible to make absolute not only the literal (linguistic, verbal) method of the interpretation of the Constitution, but also any other method of the interpretation of the Constitution; when interpreting the Constitution, various methods of the interpretation of law must be applied: systemic, the one of general legal principles, logical, teleological, the one of the intentions of the legislature, the one of precedents, historical, comparative, etc.; only such comprehensive interpretation of the Constitution may provide the preconditions for the realisation of the purpose of the Constitution as a social contract and the highest-ranking legal act, and for ensuring that the meaning of the Constitution will not be deviated from, that the spirit of the Constitution will not be denied, and that the values on which the Constitution, adopted by the Nation itself, is based will be upheld in life (rulings of 25 May 2004, 13 December 2004, and 6 June 2006).

The principle of the integrity of the Constitution (Paragraph 1 of Article 6 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 24 January 2014

... amendments to the Constitution change the content of the provisions of the Constitution and interrelations between those provisions; also, the balance of the values consolidated in the Constitution might be changed; if some provisions of the Constitution are amended, there might be changes in the content of other provisions thereof, as well as in the content of the overall constitutional legal regulation. However, when amendments to the Constitution are made, the imperative that the Constitution is an integral act must be complied with (Paragraph 1 of Article 6 of the Constitution). The Constitutional Court has held on more than one occasion that all provisions of the Constitution are interrelated to the degree that the content of some provisions of the Constitution determines the content of other provisions thereof; the provisions of the Constitution constitute a single and harmonious system; no provision of the Constitution may be opposed to other provisions of the Constitution. The nature of the Constitution as the highest-ranking legal act and the idea of constitutionality imply that there are not, nor can there be, any gaps or internal contradictions in the Constitution (rulings of 25 May 2004, 13 December 2004, and 28 March 2006).

In view of this, it should be noted that, by means of amendments to the Constitution, the provisions of the Constitution or the values consolidated in those provisions may not be opposed against one another, inter alia, the legal regulation established in the chapters and articles of the Constitution and the constitutional legal regulation established in the constituent parts of the Constitution may not be opposed against each other. No amendment to the Constitution may create any such a new constitutional regulation under which a certain provision of the Constitution would deny or contradict another provision of the Constitution and it would be impossible to interpret those provisions as in harmony one with another. Thus, the imperative stems from Paragraph 1 of Article 6 of the Constitution whereby no amendments to the Constitution may violate the harmony of the provisions of the Constitution or the harmony of the values consolidated in those provisions.

1.8.4.2.3. The constituent part of the Constitution

The Law on the Procedure for the Entry into Force of the Constitution of the Republic of Lithuania is a constituent part of the Constitution and has the legal force of the Constitution

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 29 October 2003

... the provisions of the Law on the Procedure for the Entry into Force of the Constitution of the Republic of Lithuania are inseparably related to other provisions of the Constitution. The provisions consolidated in some articles of this law supplement other provisions of the Constitution, without which the former could not be implemented. Other articles of this law establish the particularities related to the implementation of the provisions of the Constitution during the period when the state institutions provided for by the Constitution were in the course of establishment and when the legal regulation required by the Constitution was still in the process of creation.

The Law on the Procedure for the Entry into Force of the Constitution of the Republic of Lithuania, which was adopted together with the Constitution by the Nation by referendum, may not itself be a non-constituent part of the Constitution, since the provisions of this law are inseparably related to the norms and principles of the Constitution and supplement other provisions of the Constitution, or establish the particularities of the implementation of particular provisions of the Constitution.

Thus, the Law on the Procedure for the Entry into Force of the Constitution of the Republic of Lithuania is a constituent part of the Constitution and the provisions of this law have the legal force of the Constitution.

The constitutional confirmation of membership in the European Union (Article 150 of the Constitution and the Constitutional Act on Membership of the Republic of Lithuania in the European Union)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 14 March 2006

... the Republic of Lithuania became a Member State of the European Union on 1 May 2004.

On 13 July 2004, the Seimas adopted the Law on Supplementing the Constitution of the Republic of Lithuania with the Constitutional Act on Membership of the Republic of Lithuania in the European Union, and Supplementing Article 150 of the Constitution of the Republic of Lithuania; by Article 1 of this law, the Seimas supplemented the Constitution with the Constitutional Act of the Republic of Lithuania on Membership of the Republic of Lithuania in the European Union, which is a constituent part of the Constitution (Article 150 of the Constitution). The said Constitutional Act came into force on 14 August 2004. By means of it, membership of the Republic of Lithuania in the European Union was constitutionally confirmed (ruling of 13 December 2004).

The Constitutional Act on the Non-Alignment of the Republic of Lithuania to Post-Soviet Eastern Unions is a constituent part of the Constitution (Article 150 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 15 March 2011

On 8 June 1992, the Supreme Council, while invoking the acts of 16 February 1918 and 11 March 1990 on the restoration of the independent State of Lithuania and the will of the entire Nation expressed on 9 February 1991, adopted the Constitutional Act of the Republic of Lithuania on the Non-Alignment of the Republic of Lithuania to Post-Soviet Eastern Unions.

On 25 October 1992, by referendum, the Nation adopted the Constitution of the Republic of Lithuania, which came into force on 2 November 1992.

[...]

Under Article 150 of the Constitution, inter alia, the Constitutional Act on the Non-Alignment of the Republic of Lithuania to Post-Soviet Eastern Unions became a constituent part of the Constitution.

The constitutional acts forming a constituent part of the Constitution (Article 150 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 30 July 2020

Article 150 (wording of 13 July 2004) of the Constitution prescribes:

“The constituent part of the Constitution of the Republic of Lithuania shall be:
the Constitutional Law ‘On the State of Lithuania’ of 11 February 1991;

the Constitutional Act ‘On the Non-Alignment of the Republic of Lithuania to Post-Soviet Eastern Unions’ of 8 June 1992;

the Law ‘On the Procedure for the Entry into Force of the Constitution of the Republic of Lithuania’ of 25 October 1992;

the Constitutional Act ‘On Membership of the Republic of Lithuania in the European Union’ of 13 July 2004.”

Thus, according to Article 150 of the Constitution, the constitutional acts specified therein – the Constitutional Law of 11 February 1991 on the State of Lithuania, the Constitutional Act of 8 June 1992 on the Non-Alignment of the Republic of Lithuania to Post-Soviet Eastern Unions, the Law of 25 October 1992 on the Procedure for the Entry into Force of the Constitution of the Republic of Lithuania, and the Constitutional Act of 13 July 2004 on Membership of the Republic of Lithuania in the European Union – are a constituent part of the Constitution. Therefore, the provisions of these constitutional acts have the force of the Constitution and their alteration is subject to the procedure, explicitly and implicitly prescribed in the Constitution itself, for amending the provisions of these constitutional acts.

The Constitutional Act on Membership of the Republic of Lithuania in the European Union

The Constitutional Court’s ruling of 30 July 2020

The Constitutional Act on Membership of the Republic of Lithuania in the European Union, which is a constituent part of the Constitution, constitutionally confirmed membership of the Republic of Lithuania in the European Union.

As it is clear from the preamble to this constitutional act, it was adopted, inter alia, in executing “the will of the citizens of the Republic of Lithuania, as expressed in the referendum on membership of the Republic of Lithuania in the European Union, held on 10–11 May 2003”, and “seeking to ensure the fully fledged participation of the Republic of Lithuania in the European integration, as well as the security of the Republic of Lithuania and welfare of its citizens” (ruling of 24 January 2014). The Constitutional Court has emphasised that the fully fledged participation by the Republic of Lithuania, as a Member State, in the European Union is a constitutional imperative based on the expression of the sovereign will of the People; full membership by the Republic of Lithuania in the European Union is a constitutional value (inter alia, the rulings of 24 January 2014, 11 January 2019, and 6 February 2020).

The procedure for amending the constitutional acts forming a constituent part of the Constitution

See 1.8.4.2.4. Amendments to the Constitution and the stability of the Constitution, the ruling of 30 July 2020.

1.8.4.2.4. Amendments to the Constitution and the stability of the Constitution

The entry into force of a law on the alteration of the Constitution (Article 149 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court’s ruling of 24 December 2002

Paragraph 1 of Article 149 of the Constitution prescribes that the President of the Republic signs an adopted law on the alteration of the Constitution and officially promulgates it within five days. Paragraph 2 of the same article provides that, if the President of the Republic does not sign and promulgate such a law within the specified time, this law comes into force when the Speaker of the Seimas signs and promulgates it. The Constitution does not provide that the President of the Republic has the right of a delaying veto over laws amending the Constitution (ruling of 19 June 2002).

In addition, under Paragraph 3 of Article of 149 of the Constitution, a law on the alteration of the Constitution comes into force not earlier than one month after its adoption.

Thus, under Paragraph 3 of Article 149 of the Constitution, in a law amending the Constitution, the Seimas may set the date when the law amending the Constitution comes into force; however, it is not permitted to set an earlier date than one month after the adoption of the law amending the Constitution. While adopting a law amending the Constitution, the Seimas may establish that a law amending the Constitution comes into force only at a later date than one month after the adoption of this law. If a law amending the Constitution does not set a date for its entry into force, then, under the Constitution, such a law amending the Constitution comes into force one month after its adoption.

The norm whereby the date for the entry into force of a law on the alteration of the Constitution is established must have the constitutional force and must be a norm of the Constitution itself; under the Constitution, it is not permitted that the date for the entry into force of a law on the alteration of the Constitution be established by a lower-ranking legal act. It should be noted that the date for the entry into force of a legal act and the date for the beginning of the application of its particular norms need not necessarily coincide: it may be stipulated that certain provisions of the legal act become applicable at another (later) date. This may not be established by means of a legal act whose force is lower than that of the Constitution, as thereby the hierarchy of legal acts established in the Constitution and the supremacy of the Constitution would be violated.

Thus, the fact that certain provisions of a law on the alteration of the Constitution become applicable not from the moment of the entry into force of that law, but at another (later) date, must expressis verbis be established in the law on the alteration of the Constitution.

Thus, if a law on the alteration of the Constitution does not establish another (later) date of the beginning of the application of its certain provisions, the said law on the alteration of the Constitution (its all provisions) must be applied as of the day of its entry into force. This means that as of the said day in question the respective amendment (its all provisions) to the Constitution must be applied.

The stability of the Constitution

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 28 March 2006

The Constitutional Court has held that the Constitution, as supreme law, must be a stable act (rulings of 16 January 2006 and 14 March 2006). The stability of the Constitution is such its feature that, together with its other features (inter alia, and, first of all, with the special, supreme, legal force of the Constitution) makes the constitutional legal regulation different from the legal (ordinary) regulation established by means of lower-ranking legal acts (ruling of 14 March 2006) and makes the Constitution different from all other legal acts. The stability of the Constitution is a great constitutional value. The Constitution should not be altered if there is no legal necessity to do so. This is guaranteed by a more difficult and more complex procedure for making amendments to the Constitution compared with constitutional and ordinary laws (ruling of 14 March 2006), in particular by the fact that special procedural requirements are established for the alteration of certain provisions of the Constitution (Article 1, Chapter I "The State of Lithuania", Chapter XIV "The Alteration of the Constitution"). The stability of the Constitution is one of the preconditions for securing the continuity of the state and respect for the constitutional order and law, as well as for ensuring the implementation of the objectives that are declared in the Constitution by the Lithuanian nation and upon which the Constitution itself is founded.

One of the conditions ensuring the stability of the Constitution as legal reality is the stability of its text. ... the nature of the Constitution and the idea of constitutionality imply that the Constitution may not have, nor does it have, any gaps or internal contradictions. Thus, the text of the Constitution must not be modified, for example, upon a mere change in terminology, inter alia, legal terminology (ruling of 16 January 2006). The meaning of the Constitution as a particularly stable legal act would also be ignored if interventions into its text were made every time when certain social relationships that must be legally regulated undergo changes (e.g. when technological possibilities of certain kinds of activity expand to the extent that was perhaps impossible to predict at the time when the text of the Constitution was drafted).

In this context, it should be particularly emphasised that the further interpretation and development of the official constitutional doctrine, inter alia, the reinterpretation of the official constitutional doctrinal provisions, including such reinterpretation where the official constitutional doctrine is modified, in the acts of the Constitutional Court adopted in new constitutional justice cases makes it possible to disclose the deep potential of the Constitution without changing its text and, in this respect, to adjust the Constitution to changes in social life and to the constantly changing conditions of the life of society and the state, as well as to ensure the viability of the Constitution as the legal basis of the life of society and the state. The formation and development of the official constitutional doctrine is a function of constitutional justice. In the acts of the Constitutional Court adopted in new constitutional justice cases, the further interpretation and development, inter alia, reinterpretation, of the official constitutional doctrinal provisions, including where reinterpretation modifies the official constitutional doctrine, makes it possible not to make any intervention into the text of the Constitution where such intervention is not legally necessary. The said acts adopted by the Constitutional Court thereby contribute to ensuring the stability of the text of the Constitution and the constitutional order.

Reinterpreting (modifying) the official constitutional doctrine after amending the Constitution

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 28 March 2006

In cases where amendments to the Constitution are made, it is necessary (or it may be necessary) to reinterpret the official constitutional doctrinal provisions so that the official constitutional doctrine would be modified.

On the entry into force of an amendment to the Constitution that amends (or repeals) a certain provision of the Constitution on the basis of which (i.e. in the course of the interpretation of which) the previous constitutional doctrine was formed (on a particular issue of the constitutional legal regulation), the Constitutional Court, under the Constitution, has the exceptional powers to state whether it is still possible (and to what extent) to invoke the official constitutional doctrine formulated by the Constitutional Court on the basis of the previous provisions of the Constitution, or whether it is no longer possible to invoke it (and to what extent) in the course of interpreting the Constitution (rulings of 13 May 2004, 16 January 2006, 24 January 2006, and 14 March 2006).

... it may also be necessary to reinterpret the official constitutional doctrinal provisions so that the official constitutional doctrine would be modified when such an amendment to the Constitution is made (certain provision of the Constitution is amended or repealed or a new provision is consolidated in the Constitution) by which the content of the overall legal regulation is modified in substance, even though the specific provision of the Constitution on the basis of which (i.e. in the course of interpreting which) the previous official constitutional doctrine on a certain issue of the constitutional legal regulation was formulated is not formally altered. In such cases, the Constitutional Court also has the exceptional powers to state whether it is still possible (and to what extent) to invoke the previous official constitutional doctrine (both as a whole and on each individual issue of the constitutional legal regulation) or whether it is no longer possible to invoke it (and to what extent) in the course of interpreting the Constitution.

Amendments to the Constitution do not bring a legal act that was declared unconstitutional back to the legal system and do not provide the grounds for reviewing the acts of the Constitutional Court

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 28 March 2006

No amendments or supplements made to a higher-ranking legal act (including the Constitution) after the Constitutional Court declared, referring to the previous provisions of the Constitution, a certain legal act (part thereof) passed by the Seimas, the President of the Republic, or the Government or adopted by referendum to be in conflict with a certain higher-ranking legal act, inter alia (and, first of all), with the Constitution, may bring back the legal act (part thereof) that was declared to be in conflict with a certain higher-ranking legal act, inter alia (and, first of all), with the Constitution, to the Lithuanian legal system. Under the Constitution, the Constitutional Court does not have the powers to bring back such legal acts (parts thereof) to the Lithuanian legal system, either. In the same vein, no amendments or supplements made to a higher-ranking legal act (including the Constitution) after the Constitutional Court declared, referring to the previous provisions of the Constitution, a certain legal act (part thereof) passed by the Seimas, the President of the Republic, or the Government or adopted by referendum to be in compliance with a certain higher-ranking legal act, inter alia (and, first of all), with the Constitution, mean that the decision on the said legal act can or must be changed with retroactive effect. On the other hand, when an amendment to the Constitution is made, the legislature and other law-making subjects must harmonise the legal acts that they have passed and that are still valid with the amended legal regulation; however, this does not imply that the examined constitutional justice cases on the compliance of a certain previous legal regulation with a certain higher-ranking legal regulation, inter alia (and, first of all), with the Constitution, must be renewed or that the decisions adopted therein must be reviewed and changed.

This is also mutatis mutandis applicable to such cases where the Constitutional Court, referring to the previous provisions of the Constitution, presents a conclusion on any of the questions specified in Paragraph 3 of Article 105 of the Constitution ...: such a conclusion remains valid even if the provisions of the Constitution on the basis of which the respective conclusion was made and presented are amended or repealed. Moreover, this is mutatis mutandis applicable to decisions of the Constitutional Court that are adopted without investigating on the merits the compliance of an impugned legal act (part thereof) with the Constitution (another higher-ranking legal act), but by properly (clearly and rationally) refusing, by means of a reasoned decision, to consider a petition or by dismissing the instituted legal proceedings (case) (if a particular petition has been received at the Constitutional Court and the preparation of a constitutional justice case for a hearing at the Constitutional Court has begun or if it has already been considered in a hearing at the Constitutional Court).

Thus, the Constitution does not give grounds for bringing back retroactively a legal regulation that was declared to be in conflict with a certain higher-ranking legal regulation, inter alia (and, first of all), with one established in the Constitution, to the Lithuanian legal system, or for questioning and annulling the respective rulings, conclusions, or decisions of the Constitutional Court that were constitutionally justifiable at the moment when they were adopted. A different interpretation would not only result in the disregard of the provisions of the Constitution consolidating the institution of constitutional justice – constitutional judicial control, inter alia, the fact that the decisions of the Constitutional Court are final and not subject to appeal, but also would lead to the denial of the stability of the Constitution, the predictability of decisions adopted by the Constitutional Court, and the legitimate expectations of various legal subjects where the said expectations are created by the aforementioned decisions.

The alteration of the Constitution; amendments to the Constitution may not violate the harmony of the provisions of the Constitution

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 24 January 2014

The constitutional legal regulation governing the alteration of the Constitution is determined by the concept, nature, and purpose of the Constitution itself.

[...]

... amendments to the Constitution change the content of the provisions of the Constitution and interrelations between those provisions; also, the balance of the values consolidated in the Constitution might be changed; if some provisions of the Constitution are amended, there might be changes in the content of other provisions thereof, as well as in the content of the overall constitutional legal regulation. However, when amendments to the Constitution are made, the imperative that the Constitution is an integral act must be complied with (Paragraph 1 of Article 6 of the Constitution). The Constitutional Court has held on more than one occasion that all provisions of the Constitution are interrelated to the degree that the content of some provisions of the Constitution determines the content of other provisions thereof; the provisions of the Constitution constitute a single and harmonious system; no provision of the Constitution may be opposed to other provisions of the Constitution. The nature of the Constitution as the highest-ranking legal act and the idea of constitutionality imply that there are not, nor can there be, any gaps or internal contradictions in the Constitution (rulings of 25 May 2004, 13 December 2004, and 28 March 2006).

In view of this, it should be noted that, by means of amendments to the Constitution, the provisions of the Constitution or the values consolidated in those provisions may not be opposed against one another, inter alia, the legal regulation established in the chapters and articles of the Constitution and the constitutional legal regulation established in the constituent parts of the Constitution may not be opposed against each other. No amendment to the Constitution may create any such a new constitutional regulation under which a certain provision of the Constitution would deny or contradict another provision of the Constitution and it would be impossible to interpret those provisions as in harmony one with another. Thus, the imperative stems from Paragraph 1 of Article 6 of the Constitution whereby no amendments to the Constitution may violate the harmony of the provisions of the Constitution or the harmony of the values consolidated in those provisions.

The ... concept, nature, and purpose of the Constitution, the stability of the Constitution as a constitutional value, and the imperative of harmony among the provisions of the Constitution imply certain substantive and procedural limitations on the alteration of the Constitution. The substantive limitations on the alteration of the Constitution are the limitations consolidated in the Constitution regarding the adoption of constitutional amendments of certain content; the procedural limitations on the alteration of the Constitution are related to the special procedure for the alteration of the Constitution, which is provided for in the Constitution.

The substantive limitations on the alteration of the Constitution

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 24 January 2014

The substantive limitations on the alteration of the Constitution stem from the overall constitutional legal regulation and they are designed to defend universal values upon which the Constitution as supreme law and as a social contract and the state as the common good of all society are based, as well as to protect the harmony of these values and the harmony of the provisions of the Constitution.

[...]

It has been mentioned that the imperative stems from the Constitution whereby no amendments to the Constitution may violate the harmony of the provisions of the Constitution or the harmony of the values consolidated in those provisions. In view of this, it should be noted that, under the Constitution, it is not permitted to make any such amendments to the Constitution that would deny at least one of the constitutional values that constitute the foundation of the State of Lithuania as the constitutionally consolidated common good of all society – the independence of the state, democracy, the republic, and the innate nature of human rights and freedoms, with the exception of the cases where Article 1 of the Constitution would be altered in the manner prescribed by Paragraph 1 of Article 148 of the Constitution, or Article 1 of the Constitutional Law on the State of Lithuania, which is a constituent part of the Constitution, would be altered in the manner prescribed by Article 2 of this law.

[...]

... under the Constitution, the provisions of the Constitutional Act on the Non-Alignment of the Republic of Lithuania to Post-Soviet Eastern Unions should have the same protection as the provision “The State of Lithuania shall be an independent democratic republic”, which is stipulated in Article 1 of the Constitution and Article 1 of the Constitutional Law on the State of Lithuania. In view of this, it needs to be held that, although Article 148 of the Constitution does not explicitly regulate the procedure for the alteration of the constituent parts of the Constitution, inter alia, the procedure for the alteration of the provisions of the Constitutional Act on the Non-Alignment of the Republic of Lithuania to Post-Soviet Eastern Unions, the requirement stems from the very essence of the provisions of the Constitutional Act on the Non-Alignment of the Republic of Lithuania to Post-Soviet Eastern Unions to amend those provisions under the same procedure as established for the alteration of the constitutional provision “The State of Lithuania shall be an independent democratic republic”, i.e. under the same procedure as established in Article 2 of the Constitutional Law on the State of Lithuania.

It has been mentioned that the imperative stems from Paragraph 1 of Article 6 of the Constitution whereby no amendments to the Constitution may violate the harmony of the provisions of the Constitution or the harmony of the values consolidated in those provisions. In view of this, it should be noted that, under the Constitution, no amendments may be made to the Constitution that would deny the provisions of the Constitutional Act on the Non-Alignment of the Republic of Lithuania to Post-Soviet Eastern Unions, with the exception of the cases where the respective provisions of this constitutional act would be altered under the same procedure as provided for in Article 2 of the Constitutional Law on the State of Lithuania.

[...]

... The Constitutional Act on Membership of the Republic of Lithuania in the European Union establishes, inter alia, the constitutional foundations of membership of the Republic of Lithuania in the European Union. If these constitutional foundations were not consolidated in the Constitution, the Republic of Lithuania could not be a full member of the European Union It needs to be emphasised that these constitutional foundations of membership of the Republic of Lithuania in the European Union were consolidated in the Constitution by acting upon the will of the Nation that the Republic of Lithuania would be a member of the European Union.

In view of this, it needs to be held that these foundations in themselves and the expression of the sovereign will of the Nation, as the source of the said foundations, determine the requirement that the provisions of Articles 1 and 2 of the Constitutional Act on Membership of the Republic of Lithuania in the European Union be altered or annulled only by referendum.

It has been mentioned that ... amendments to the Constitution may not violate the harmony of the provisions of the Constitution or the harmony of the values consolidated in those provisions. In view of this, it should be noted that, under the Constitution, as long as the aforesaid constitutional foundations of membership of the Republic of Lithuania in the European Union, which are consolidated in Articles 1 and 2 of the Constitutional Act on Membership of the Republic of Lithuania in the European Union, are not annulled by referendum, it is not permitted to make any such amendments to the Constitution that would deny the obligations of the Republic of Lithuania arising from its membership in the European Union.

Respect for international law, which is also a constitutional value, is related to the geopolitical orientation of the State of Lithuania, which is consolidated in the Constitution.

It should be noted that, under Paragraph 1 of Article 135 of the Constitution, in implementing its foreign policy, the Republic of Lithuania follows the universally recognised principles and norms of international law. The constitutional principle of respect for international law, i.e. the principle of pacta sunt servanda, as consolidated in this provision, means the imperative of fulfilling in good faith the obligations assumed by the Republic of Lithuania under international law, inter alia, international treaties.

[...]

It has been mentioned that amendments to the Constitution may not violate the harmony of the provisions of the Constitution or the harmony of the values consolidated in those provisions. In view of this, it should be noted that, under the Constitution, it is not permit to make any such amendments to the Constitution that would deny the international obligations of the Republic of Lithuania (inter alia, the obligations of the Republic of Lithuania arising from its membership in NATO, which is implied by the ... geopolitical orientation of the State of Lithuania) and, at the same time, would deny the constitutional principle of pacta sunt servanda, as long as the said international obligations are not renounced in accordance with the norms of international law.

It should be noted that, along with Article 1 of the Constitution, the alteration of the other provisions of Chapter I “The State of Lithuania” of the Constitution, as well as of those of Chapter XIV “The Alteration of the Constitution”, is also subject to a special requirement: according to Paragraph 2 of Article 148 of the Constitution, they may be altered only by referendum. Thus, the values and principles consolidated in these provisions of the Constitution have greater protection compared with those consolidated in other provisions of the Constitution, which may also be amended by the Seimas (Paragraph 3 of Article 148 of the Constitution).

It has been mentioned that amendments to the Constitution may not violate the harmony of the provisions of the Constitution or the harmony of the values consolidated in those provisions. In view of this, it should be noted that, under the Constitution, the Seimas is not permitted to introduce any such amendments to the Constitution that would deny the provisions of Chapter I “The State of Lithuania” and Chapter XIV “The Alteration of the Constitution” of the Constitution. If the Seimas adopted such amendments to the Constitution, it would also violate the principle, consolidated in Paragraph 2 of Article 5 of the Constitution, that the scope of powers is limited by the Constitution.

It should also be noted that, in view of the imperative of harmony among the provisions of the Constitution, it is also not permitted to make, by referendum, any such amendments to the Constitution that would, in the absence of the respective amendments to the provisions of Chapter I “The State of Lithuania” and Chapter XIV “The Alteration of the Constitution” of the Constitution, lay down the constitutional legal regulation contradicting the provisions of Chapters I and XIV of the Constitution.

The procedural limitations on the alteration of the Constitution are a special procedure for the alteration of the Constitution (Chapter XIV of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court’s ruling of 24 January 2014

As mentioned before, the procedural limitations on the alteration of the Constitution are related to the special procedure for the alteration of the Constitution, which is provided for in the Constitution. This procedure is established in Chapter XIV “The Alteration of the Constitution” of the Constitution.

... the stability of the Constitution constitutes such a feature of the Constitution that, together with its other features, inter alia, and, primarily, together with the special, supreme, legal force of the Constitution, makes the constitutional legal regulation different from the legal (ordinary) regulation laid down in lower-ranking legal acts. On the other hand, the stability of the Constitution does not deny the possibility of making amendments to the Constitution when this is objectively necessary (ruling of 14 March 2006); the Constitution should not be altered if there is no legal necessity to do so (ruling of 28 March 2006). As the Constitutional Court has noted, this is guaranteed, inter alia, by a more difficult and more complex procedure for making amendments to the Constitution compared with the procedure for amending constitutional and ordinary laws (rulings of 14 March 2006 and 28 March 2006).

In this context, it should be mentioned that Items 1 and 2 of Article 67 of the Constitution establish the separate powers of the Seimas to consider amendments to the Constitution and to adopt them, as well as to pass laws. It also needs to be mentioned that the adoption of laws, inter alia, the adoption of constitutional laws, is regulated in Articles 68–72 of the Constitution, while the alteration of the Constitution is regulated in the separate Chapter XIV “The Alteration of the Constitution” (Articles 147–149); the provisions of Chapter XIV “The Alteration of the Constitution” of the Constitution have greater protection: as mentioned before, under Paragraph 2 of Article 148 of the Constitution, these provisions may be amended only by referendum, while the provisions of Articles 68–72 of the Constitution can also be amended by the Seimas.

Thus, under the Constitution, different procedures for amending constitutional law and ordinary law are established. The special procedure for the alteration of the Constitution may not be equated with the adoption of laws (inter alia, constitutional ones); in order to secure the stability of the constitutional legal regulation governing the alteration of the Constitution, a special procedure for amending this regulation is established. It should be noted that such a constitutional legal regulation is established, inter alia, in an attempt to ensure that the Constitution would be amended only when it is necessary and that any hasty amendments to the Constitution could be prevented.

The special procedure for making amendments to the Constitution, which is established in the Constitution, includes, inter alia, the following special requirements.

Under Paragraph 2 of Article 147 of the Constitution, during a state of emergency or martial law, the Constitution may not be amended. No such prohibition is established for the adoption of laws.

Under Paragraphs 1 and 2 of Article 148 of the Constitution, the powers of the Seimas to amend the Constitution are limited: the provisions of Article 1 and the other provisions of Chapter I “The State of Lithuania”, as well as the provisions of Chapter XIV “The Alteration of the Constitution”, may be altered only by referendum.

Paragraph 1 of Article 147 of the Constitution specifies the special subjects that have the right to submit a motion to alter or supplement the Constitution to the Seimas: a group of not less than 1/4 of all the members of the Seimas or not less than 300 000 voters; the said subjects are, in principle, different from the subjects that have the legislative initiative to adopt laws – the members of the Seimas, the President of the Republic, the Government, and 50 000 citizens – which are established in Article 68 of the Constitution.

Paragraph 3 of Article 148 of the Constitution establishes a special procedure for the adoption of amendments to the Constitution at the Seimas: amendments to the Constitution must be considered and voted on by the Seimas twice; there must be a break of not less than three months between the votes. No such requirement that laws must be considered and voted on by the Seimas twice is established in the Constitution with respect to the adoption of laws.

Paragraph 3 of Article 148 of the Constitution establishes the requirement of a special qualified majority of votes of the members of the Seimas if a law amending the Constitution is adopted: a draft law on the alteration of the Constitution is deemed adopted by the Seimas if, during each of the votes, not less than $\frac{2}{3}$ of all the members of the Seimas vote in favour thereof. No such requirement of a special qualified majority of votes is established as regards the adoption of laws: according to Article 69 of the Constitution, laws are deemed adopted if the majority of the members of the Seimas participating in the sitting vote in favour thereof (Paragraph 2); constitutional laws are adopted if more than half of all the members of the Seimas vote in favour thereof and they are altered by not less than a $\frac{3}{5}$ majority vote of all the members of the Seimas (Paragraph 3).

Paragraph 3 of Article 148 of the Constitution establishes a special limitation on submitting a failed constitutional amendment to the Seimas for reconsideration: it may be submitted not earlier than after one year. The Constitution establishes no such limitation as regards the adoption of laws.

Paragraphs 1 and 2 of Article 149 of the Constitution establish a special procedure for the promulgation of a law amending the Constitution: the President of the Republic signs an adopted law on the alteration of the Constitution and officially promulgates it within five days; if the President of the Republic does not sign and promulgate such a law within the specified time, the Speaker of the Seimas signs and promulgates it. Under Article 71 of the Constitution, within ten days of receiving a law adopted by the Seimas, the President of the Republic either signs and officially promulgates the law or, on reasonable grounds, refers it back to the Seimas for reconsideration (Paragraph 1); if the law adopted by the Seimas is neither referred back nor signed by the President of the Republic within the specified period, the law comes into force after it is signed and officially promulgated by the Speaker of the Seimas (Paragraph 2).

Thus, when the President of the Republic promulgates a law amending the Constitution, his/her powers are restricted to a larger extent in comparison with the promulgation of other laws: the Constitution does not provide that the President of the Republic has the right of a delaying veto in connection with laws amending the Constitution (rulings of 19 June 2002 and 24 December 2002). The alteration of the Constitution by the Seimas only when it is necessary to do so and the prevention of any hasty amendments to the Constitution are ensured by other special requirements established in the Constitution (inter alia, the Constitution establishes the special subjects who have the right to submit a motion to alter or supplement the Constitution to the Seimas, the requirement that amendments to the Constitution must be considered and voted on by the Seimas twice, and the requirement of a special qualified majority of votes of $\frac{2}{3}$ of all the members of the Seimas if amendments to the Constitution are adopted).

Paragraph 3 of Article 149 of the Constitution establishes a special procedure for the entry into force of a law amending the Constitution: a law amending the Constitution comes into force not earlier than one month after its adoption. No such time limit of the entry into force of a law is established with respect to the entry into force of other laws adopted by the Seimas: under Paragraph 1 of Article 70 of the Constitution, laws adopted by the Seimas come into force after they are signed and officially promulgated by the President of the Republic, unless the laws themselves establish a later date for their entry into force.

It should be noted that the provision of Paragraph 3 of Article 149 of the Constitution is also applied to the situation specified in Paragraph 2 of the same article, where the Speaker of the Seimas officially promulgates a law amending the Constitution: the provision of Paragraph 2 of Article 149 of the Constitution, under which, if the President of the Republic does not sign and promulgate a law amending the Constitution within five days, this law comes into force “when the Speaker of the Seimas signs and promulgates it”, must be interpreted in conjunction with the provision of Paragraph 3 of this article and cannot deny that provision.

The concept of a motion to alter or supplement the Constitution (Paragraph 1 of Article 147 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court’s ruling of 24 January 2014

Paragraph 1 of Article 147 of the Constitution prescribes: “A motion to alter or supplement the Constitution of the Republic of Lithuania may be submitted to the Seimas by a group of not less than 1/4 of all the Members of the Seimas or not less than 300 000 voters.”

The notion “a motion to alter or supplement the Constitution of the Republic of Lithuania”, as employed in Paragraph 1 of Article 147 of the Constitution, should not be interpreted only literally as meaning an abstract proposal or idea, lacking clarity and concreteness, to alter or supplement the Constitution. Such interpretation of this notion would be constitutionally unfounded, since it would mean that the subjects that are provided for in Paragraph 1 of Article 147 of the Constitution and have the right to submit a motion to amend the Constitution would be able to submit any proposal to amend or supplement the Constitution to the Seimas, inter alia, such a proposal that would contain only an idea or purpose of the motion to amend or supplement the Constitution, but not a concrete text of an amendment to the Constitution, and the Seimas would have to consider such a proposal; if such a proposal to amend or supplement the Constitution that contains no specific formulated provision amending or supplementing the Constitution were submitted to the Seimas for consideration, inter alia, such a proposal to amend or supplement the Constitution that contains no indication of a specific article (paragraph or item thereof) of the Constitution that is being proposed to be amended or supplemented, there would be no object for consideration at the Seimas.

Thus, the notion “a motion to alter or supplement the Constitution of the Republic of Lithuania” of Paragraph 1 of Article 147 of the Constitution means that this is a draft amendment to the Constitution, i.e. a draft law amending the Constitution.

The subjects that propose a motion to alter or supplement the Constitution (Paragraph 1 of Article 147 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court’s ruling of 24 January 2014

It has been mentioned that Paragraph 1 of Article 147 of the Constitution specifies the special subjects that have the right to submit a motion to alter or supplement the Constitution to the Seimas: a group of not less than 1/4 of all the members of the Seimas or not less than 300 000 voters; the said subjects are, in principle, different from the subjects that have the legislative initiative to adopt laws – members of the Seimas, the President of the Republic, the Government, and 50 000 citizens – which are established in Article 68 of the Constitution.

It should be noted that, under Paragraph 1 of Article 147 of the Constitution, the subjects specified therein that propose a motion to alter the Constitution, i.e. a group of not less than 1/4 of all the members of the Seimas or not less than 300 000 voters, have the same right to submit a motion for amending the Constitution to the Seimas. It should also be noted that this right of the said subjects, i.e. a group of not less than 1/4 of all the members of the Seimas or not less than 300 000 voters, who propose a motion to alter the Constitution under Paragraph 1 of Article 147 of the Constitution is an exclusive right, i.e. only these subjects have the right to submit to the Seimas a concrete draft amendment to the Constitution – a concrete draft law amending the Constitution. Under the Constitution, the said right is not conferred on any other subjects. Such a right is not conferred on, inter alia, the subjects with the legislative initiative to adopt laws – individual members of the Seimas, the President of the Republic, the Government, and 50 000 citizens, which are specified in Article 68 of the Constitution.

It should also be noted that the exclusive right to submit a motion to alter or supplement the Constitution to the Seimas, as established in Paragraph 1 of Article 147 of the Constitution for the subjects that have the right to submit a motion to alter the Constitution, i.e. a group of not less than 1/4 of all the members of the Seimas or not less than 300 000 voters, means that, first of all, these subjects, when they submit their amendment to the Constitution, have the right to assess the objective legal necessity of such an amendment; this right also means that only the authorised representatives of the said subjects can submit a draft law amending the Constitution to the Seimas for consideration, i.e. to present such a draft at a sitting of the Seimas.

The consideration of a motion to alter or supplement the Constitution at the Seimas (Paragraph 1 of Article 147 and Paragraph 3 of Article 148 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 24 January 2014

... Paragraph 1 of Article 147 of the Constitution should be interpreted in conjunction with Paragraph 3 of Article 148 thereof, which provides for a special procedure for the adoption of amendments to the Constitution at the Seimas – the requirement of a special qualified majority of votes of the members of the Seimas in order to adopt a law amending the Constitution: amendments to the Constitution concerning the provisions of the chapters of the Constitution other than its Chapters I and XIV must be considered and voted on by the Seimas twice; there must be a break of not less than three months between the votes; a draft law on the alteration of the Constitution is deemed adopted by the Seimas if, during each of the votes, not less than 2/3 of all the members of the Seimas vote in favour thereof.

It has been mentioned that, under Paragraph 1 of Article 147 of the Constitution, the subjects specified therein that propose a motion to alter the Constitution, i.e. a group of not less than 1/4 of all the members of the Seimas or not less than 300 000 voters, have the same right to submit a motion for amending the Constitution to the Seimas; this right is an exclusive one, i.e. only the said subjects have the right to submit to the Seimas a concrete draft amendment to the Constitution – a draft law amending the Constitution. Thus, under the Constitution, only those draft laws amending the Constitution that are submitted by a group of not less than 1/4 of all the members of the Seimas or not less than 300 000 voters may be considered and voted on by the Seimas; the Seimas may not consider and vote on any such a motion to alter or supplement the Constitution that would be proposed by subjects other than those specified in Paragraph 1 of Article 147 of the Constitution.

If the Constitution were interpreted in a different manner (inter alia, that, in the course of considering a motion to amend or supplement the Constitution at the Seimas, a subject other than those provided for in Paragraph 1 of Article 147 of the Constitution could submit a new motion to amend or supplement the Constitution – a new draft law amending the Constitution – to the Seimas for further consideration), the exclusive right established in Paragraph 1 of Article 147 of the Constitution for a group of not less than 1/4 of all the members of the Seimas or not less than 300 000 voters to submit a motion to alter or supplement the Constitution to the Seimas would be denied, as well as the preconditions would be created for making use of a motion submitted by a subject specified in Paragraph 1 of Article 147 of the Constitution to alter or supplement the Constitution as a pretext for adopting an amendment to the Constitution with a virtually different content. In addition, such interpretation would be incompatible with the ... purpose of the constitutional legal regulation governing the procedure for the alteration of the Constitution – to ensure that the Constitution would be altered only when this is necessary and that any hasty amendments to the Constitution could be prevented.

It should be noted that the exclusive right established in Paragraph 1 of Article 147 of the Constitution for the subjects specified therein, i.e. a group of not less than 1/4 of all the members of the Seimas or not less than 300 000 voters, to submit a motion to alter or supplement the Constitution to the Seimas does not mean that the Seimas, when considering the submitted motion, is not allowed at all to change the text of a draft law amending the Constitution. However, changes in the text of a draft law amending the Constitution cannot deny the exclusive right to submit a motion to alter or supplement the Constitution to the Seimas, which is established in Paragraph 1 of Article 147 of the Constitution for a group of not less than 1/4 of all the members of the Seimas or not less than 300 000 voters; as mentioned before, under the Constitution, only those draft laws amending the Constitution that are submitted by a group of not less than 1/4 of all the members of the Seimas or not less than 300 000 voters may be considered and voted on by the Seimas; the Seimas may not consider and vote on any such a motion to alter or supplement the Constitution that would be proposed by subjects other than those specified in Paragraph 1 of Article 147 of the Constitution. Therefore, under the Constitution, when the Seimas considers the draft laws amending the Constitution that have been submitted by the subjects specified in Paragraph 1 of Article 147 of the Constitution, it may introduce only such modifications to the proposed draft laws that do not affect the content of those draft laws in substance, i.e. non-substantial modifications that are aimed at editing the proposed draft amendments to the Constitution in order to improve the texts of those draft laws in terms of the Lithuanian language and legal technique or that make the proposed draft formulations more accurate or concrete without changing the scope of the proposed constitutional legal regulation.

In view of this, it should be noted that Paragraph 1 of Article 147 of the Constitution gives rise to the prohibition on changing in substance, during the consideration in the Seimas, the content of a proposed draft law amending the Constitution, submitted by a group of not less than 1/4 of all the members of the Seimas or not less than 300 000 voters, inter alia, in such a way that would distort the objective of the proposed constitutional legal regulation, would alter the scope of the proposed constitutional legal regulation, would introduce the essentially different means to achieve the objective sought by the proposed constitutional legal regulation, or would propose that a different provision of the Constitution be altered.

In this context, it should also be noted that a substantially changed draft law amending the Constitution must be regarded as a new draft law – a new motion to alter or supplement the Constitution, which can be submitted, according to Paragraph 1 of Article 147 of the Constitution, by a group of not less than 1/4 of all the members of the Seimas or not less than 300 000 voters.

[...]

... under the Constitution, structural subunits of the Seimas, inter alia, its committees, as well as individual members of the Seimas, do not have the right to submit a draft law amending the Constitution that would be different in substance from a draft law amending the Constitution that was submitted by a group of not less than 1/4 of all the members of the Seimas, inter alia, where the difference constitutes a different scope of the proposed constitutional legal regulation, or virtually different means of the constitutional legal regulation in order to achieve the objective sought, or a proposal for an amendment of a different provision of the Constitution.

... under the Constitution, when a draft law amending the Constitution submitted by a group of not less than 1/4 of all the members of the Seimas is considered at the Seimas, the structural subunits of the Seimas, inter alia, its committees, as well as individual members of the Seimas, have the right to propose non-substantial amendments to the draft law under consideration by the Seimas, to propose that the draft law be rejected, also to propose that the group of not less than 1/4 of all the members of the Seimas that has submitted the draft law for consideration submit a new and substantially changed draft law amending the Constitution.

The substantive limitations on the alteration of the Constitution; the provisions of the Constitution that may not be denied (for more on the requirements for the alteration of the Constitution by referendum, see 2. The constitutional status of persons, 2.3. Political rights and freedoms, 2.3.2. The right to a referendum, the ruling of 11 July 2014)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 11 July 2014

In its ruling of 24 January 2014, the Constitutional Court noted that, when introducing amendments to the Constitution, it is necessary to pay regard to the imperative that the Constitution is an integral act (Paragraph 1 of Article 6 of the Constitution); by means of amendments to the Constitution, the provisions of the Constitution or the values consolidated in those provisions may not be opposed against one another, inter alia, the legal regulation established in the chapters and articles of the Constitution and the constitutional legal regulation established in the constituent parts of the Constitution may not be opposed against each other; no amendment to the Constitution may create any such a new constitutional legal regulation under which a certain provision of the Constitution would deny or contradict another provision of the Constitution and it would be impossible to interpret those provisions as in harmony one with another; the imperative stems from Paragraph 1 of Article 6 of the Constitution whereby no amendments to the Constitution may violate the harmony of the provisions of the Constitution or the harmony of the values consolidated in those provisions.

In its ruling of 24 January 2014, the Constitutional Court also held that the concept, nature, and purpose of the Constitution, the stability of the Constitution as a constitutional value, and the imperative of the harmony of the provisions of the Constitution imply, inter alia, substantive limitations on the alteration of the Constitution; the substantive limitations on the alteration of the Constitution are the limitations consolidated in the Constitution in relation to the adoption of constitutional amendments of certain content; these limitations stem from the overall constitutional legal regulation; and they are designed to defend the universal values upon which the Constitution, as supreme law and as a social contract, and the state, as the common good of all society, are based, as well as to protect the harmony of these values and the harmony of the provisions of the Constitution.

In the Constitutional Court's ruling of 24 January 2014, the following substantive limitations, stemming from the Constitution, on the alteration of the Constitution were defined:

- it is not permitted to make any such amendments to the Constitution that would deny at least one of the constitutional values that constitute the foundation of the State of Lithuania as the constitutionally consolidated common good of all society – the independence of the state, democracy, the republic, and the innate nature of human rights and freedoms, with the exception of the cases where Article 1 of the Constitution would be altered in the manner prescribed by Paragraph 1 of Article 148 of the Constitution, or Article 1 of the Constitutional Law on the State of Lithuania, which is a constituent part of the Constitution, would be altered in the manner prescribed by Article 2 of this law;

- it is not permitted to make any such amendments to the Constitution that would deny the provisions of the Constitutional Act on the Non-Alignment of the Republic of Lithuania to Post-Soviet Eastern Unions, with the exception of the cases where the respective provisions of this constitutional act would be altered in the same manner as provided for in Article 2 of the Constitutional Law on the State of Lithuania;

- as long as the constitutional foundations of membership of the Republic of Lithuania in the European Union, which are consolidated in Articles 1 and 2 of the Constitutional Act on Membership of the Republic of Lithuania in the European Union, are not annulled by referendum, it is not permitted to make any such amendments to the Constitution that would deny the obligations of the Republic of Lithuania arising from its membership in the European Union;

- it is not permitted to make any such amendments to the Constitution that would deny the international obligations of the Republic of Lithuania (inter alia, the obligations of the Republic of Lithuania arising from its membership in NATO, which is implied by the geopolitical orientation of the State of Lithuania) and, at the same time, would deny the constitutional principle of pacta sunt servanda, as long as the said international obligations are not renounced in accordance with the norms of international law;

- the Seimas is not permitted to make any such amendments to the Constitution that would deny the provisions of Chapter I “The State of Lithuania” and Chapter XIV “The Alteration of the Constitution” of the Constitution; it is also not permitted to introduce by referendum any such amendments to the Constitution that would, without respectively amending the provisions of Chapter I “The State of Lithuania” and Chapter XIV “The Alteration of the Constitution” of the Constitution, lay down the constitutional legal regulation contrary to the provisions of Chapters I and XIV of the Constitution.

It should be emphasised that the innate nature of human rights and freedoms, democracy, and the independence of the state are such constitutional values that constitute the foundation for the Constitution as a social contract, the foundation for the Nation's common life, which is based on the Constitution, and the foundation for the State of Lithuania itself. No one may deny the provisions of the Constitution consolidating these fundamental constitutional values, since doing so would amount to the denial of the essence of the Constitution itself. Therefore, even where regard is paid to the aforementioned limitations on the alteration of the Constitution, which stem from the Constitution itself, it is not permitted to adopt any such amendments to the Constitution that would destroy the innate nature of human rights and freedoms, democracy, or the independence of the state; if the Constitution were interpreted in a different way, it would be understood as creating the preconditions for abolishing the restored “independent State of Lithuania, founded on democratic principles”, as proclaimed by the Act of Independence of Lithuania of 16 February 1918.

It should be noted that the aforementioned substantive limitations imposed on the alteration of the Constitution are equally applicable in the event of the alteration of the Constitution by referendum. ... the principle of the supremacy of the Constitution, inter alia, gives rise to the imperative according to which it is not permitted to put to a referendum any such possible decisions that would not comply with the requirements stemming from the Constitution. Thus, according to the Constitution, it is also not permitted to put to a referendum any such a draft amendment to the Constitution that disregards the substantive limitations set on the alteration of the Constitution. Otherwise, the preconditions would be created for denying the principle of the supremacy of the Constitution and for disregarding the imperative, stemming from Paragraph 1 of Article 6 of the Constitution, that no amendments to the Constitution may violate the harmony of the provisions of the Constitution and the harmony of the values consolidated in those provisions.

The procedure for amending the constitutional acts forming a constituent part of the Constitution

The Constitutional Court’s ruling of 30 July 2020

The procedure, explicitly and implicitly prescribed in the Constitution, for amending the constitutional acts specified in Article 150 of the Constitution, which are a constituent part of the Constitution, is different from the procedure, laid down in Paragraph 3 of Article 69 of the Constitution, for amending constitutional laws.

The procedure for amending the Constitutional Law on the State of Lithuania, which is a constituent part of the Constitution

The Constitutional Court’s ruling of 30 July 2020

As held by the Constitutional Court, Article 1 of the Constitutional Law on the State of Lithuania, which is a constituent part of the Constitution, stipulates that the statement “The State of Lithuania shall be an independent democratic republic”, i.e. the provision of Article 1 of the Constitution, is a fundamental principle of the state (decision of 19 December 2012).

Under Article 2 of the Constitutional Law on the State of Lithuania, the provision “The State of Lithuania shall be an independent democratic republic” of Article 1 of this constitutional law, as well as Article 1 of the Constitution, may be altered only by referendum if not less than 3/4 of the citizens of Lithuania with the electoral right vote in favour thereof, i.e. the alteration of the provisions of the Constitutional Law on the State of Lithuania is subject to greater protection than other provisions of the Constitution. However ... it is not permitted to adopt any such amendments to the Constitution that would abolish the innate nature of human rights and freedoms, democracy, or the independence of the state; if the Constitution were interpreted in a different way, it would be understood as creating the preconditions for abolishing the restored “independent State of Lithuania, founded on democratic principles”, as proclaimed by the Act of Independence of Lithuania of 16 February 1918. Therefore, it should be stressed that the provision “The State of Lithuania shall be an independent democratic republic” of Article 1 of the Constitutional Law on the State of Lithuania, as well as Article 1 of the Constitution, may not be altered in such a way as to deny the fundamental constitutional values – the independence of the state, democracy, or the innate nature of human rights and freedoms.

The procedure for amending the Constitutional Act on the Non-Alignment of the Republic of Lithuania to Post-Soviet Eastern Unions, which is a constituent part of the Constitution

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 30 July 2020

The Constitutional Court has held that the same procedure as provided for in Article 2 of the Constitutional Law on the State of Lithuania may be applied to altering the provisions of the Constitutional Act on the Non-Alignment of the Republic of Lithuania to Post-Soviet Eastern Unions, which is a constituent part of the Constitution (rulings of 11 July 2014 and 15 February 2019), i.e. these provisions may be altered only if not less than 3/4 of the citizens of Lithuania with the active electoral right vote in favour thereof (ruling of 11 July 2014).

It should be noted that such a procedure for altering the Constitutional Act on the Non-Alignment of the Republic of Lithuania to Post-Soviet Eastern Unions is determined by the special nature of its provisions. The Constitutional Court has held that, as it is clear from the preamble to this constitutional act, it was adopted by “invoking the 16 February 1918 and 11 March 1990 Acts on the Restoration of the Independent State of Lithuania and acting upon the will of the entire Nation, as expressed on 9 February 1991”, and that the basis of the provisions of this constitutional act is the same fundamental principle of the state that is based on the expression of the sovereign will of the People and is consolidated in Article 1 of the Constitutional Law on the State of Lithuania – the State of Lithuania is an independent democratic republic (ruling of 24 January 2014). Therefore, the provisions of the Constitutional Act on the Non-Alignment of the Republic of Lithuania to Post-Soviet Eastern Unions should have the same protection as the provision “The State of Lithuania shall be an independent democratic republic”, which is consolidated in Article 1 of the Constitution and Article 1 of the Constitutional Law on the State of Lithuania (rulings of 24 January 2014 and 11 July 2014).

The procedure for amending the Law on the Procedure for the Entry into Force of the Constitution of the Republic of Lithuania, which is a constituent part the Constitution

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 30 July 2020

Under Article 152 of the Constitution, the Law of 25 October 1992 on the Procedure for the Entry into Force of the Constitution of the Republic of Lithuania, which is a constituent part of the Constitution, is intended to regulate the procedure for the entry into force of the Constitution and its separate provisions.

According to Article 1 of this law, upon the entry into force of the Constitution, the Provisional Basic Law became null and void; since then, the Lithuanian national legal system has been created and developed only on the basis of the Constitution (inter alia, the rulings of 13 May 2005, 7 September 2010, and 15 March 2011). In the jurisprudence of the Constitutional Court, it is also noted that the provisions of the Law on the Procedure for the Entry into Force of the Constitution of the Republic of Lithuania are inseparably related to other provisions of the Constitution: the provisions contained in some articles of this law supplement other provisions of the Constitution, without which the former could not be implemented; other articles of this law specify the particularities related to implementing the provisions of the Constitution during the period when the state institutions provided for by the Constitution were in the course of establishment and when the legal regulation required by the Constitution was still in the process of creation (rulings of 29 October 2003 and 7 September 2010); the Law on the Procedure for the Entry into Force of the Constitution of the Republic of Lithuania consolidates the principle of the taking over of law (ruling of 14 February 1994) and the procedure for bringing in line the acts in force with the Constitution after the entry into force of the Constitution (decision of 5 July 1995).

Thus, the provisions of the Law on the Procedure for the Entry into Force of the Constitution of the Republic of Lithuania, with the exception of Article 5 thereof, consolidate the transitional constitutional regulation related to the entry into force and implementation of the provisions of the Constitution, i.e. the provisions of the Law on the Procedure for the Entry into Force of the Constitution of the Republic of Lithuania, with the exception of Article 5 thereof, are not of continuing validity and can no longer be applied after they have been implemented (it should be mentioned that the provisions of Articles 1, 3, 4, and 6 to 8 of the Law on the Procedure for the Entry into Force of the Constitution of the Republic of Lithuania have already been implemented). In view of this, the provisions of the Law on the Procedure for the Entry into Force of the Constitution of the Republic of Lithuania, with the exception of Article 5 thereof, may not be altered.

It should be noted that Article 5 of the Law on the Procedure for the Entry into Force of the Constitution of the Republic of Lithuania, which contains the text of the oath of a member of the Seimas of the Republic of Lithuania, may be amended in accordance with the procedure, laid down in Chapter XIV of the Constitution, for amending the provisions of the Constitution.

The procedure for amending the Constitutional Act on Membership of the Republic of Lithuania in the European Union, which is a constituent part of the Constitution

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 30 July 2020

As held by the Constitutional Court, the provisions of Articles 1 and 2 of the Constitutional Act on Membership of the Republic of Lithuania in the European Union laid down the constitutional foundations of membership of the Republic of Lithuania in the European Union; if these constitutional foundations were not consolidated in the Constitution, the Republic of Lithuania could not be a full member of the European Union; these constitutional foundations of membership of the Republic of Lithuania in the European Union were consolidated in the Constitution by acting upon the will of the People, expressed in the referendum, that the Republic of Lithuania would be a member of the European Union (rulings of 24 January 2014 and 11 July 2014). In view of this, the Constitutional Court also held that the said foundations in themselves and the expression of the sovereign will of the People, as the source of these foundations, determine the requirement that the provisions of Articles 1 and 2 of the Constitutional Act on Membership of the Republic of Lithuania in the European Union be altered or repealed only by referendum (rulings of 24 January 2014 and 11 July 2014).

It should be noted that Articles 3 and 4 of the Constitutional Act on Membership of the Republic of Lithuania in the European Union may be altered in accordance with the procedure, laid down in Chapter XIV of the Constitution, for amending the provisions of the Constitution.

Laws amending the Constitution (amendments to the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 30 July 2020

Laws amending the Constitution are special acts of constitutional law: by means of them, amendments to the Constitution are incorporated into the text of the Constitution. As held by the Constitutional Court, amendments to the Constitution change the content of the provisions of the Constitution and the interrelations between these provisions; they can also change the balance of the values consolidated in the Constitution; amendments to some provisions of the Constitution can result in changes in the content of other provisions thereof, as well as in the content of the overall constitutional regulation (ruling of 24 January 2014). Therefore, laws amending the Constitution, which introduce amendments to the Constitution, i.e. alter the provisions of the Constitution and, at the same time, usually modify the overall constitutional regulation, have the force of the Constitution.

Laws amending the Constitution (amendments to the Constitution) must comply with the substantive and procedural limitations on the alteration of the Constitution

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 30 July 2020

... laws amending the Constitution (amendments to the Constitution) are not acts of a constituent nature, because they are adopted only in accordance with the rules laid down in the Constitution itself, which bind both the civil People and the representation (Seimas) of the People, established under the Constitution. As acts adopted either directly by the People or through their representation (Seimas), laws amending the Constitution (amendments to the Constitution) must comply with the substantive and procedural limitations on the alteration of the Constitution, which arise from the Constitution. ...

The substantive limitations on the alteration of the Constitution

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 30 July 2020

The Constitutional Court has noted that the substantive limitations on the alteration of the Constitution are the limitations consolidated in the Constitution in relation to the adoption of constitutional amendments of certain content; the substantive limitations on the alteration of the Constitution stem from the overall constitutional regulation and they are designed to defend the universal values on which the Constitution, as supreme law and as a social contract, and the state, as the common good of all society, are based, as well as to protect the harmony of these values and the harmony of the provisions of the Constitution (rulings of 24 January 2014 and 11 July 2014).

In this context, the following substantive limitations on the alteration of the Constitution, which stem from the Constitution, should be mentioned:

- it is not permitted to adopt any such amendments to the Constitution that would abolish the innate nature of human rights and freedoms, democracy, or the independence of the state (ruling of 11 July 2014); this, inter alia, means that ... Article 1 of the Constitution, as well as the provision “The State of Lithuania shall be an independent democratic republic” of Article 1 of the Constitutional Law on the State of Lithuania, may not be amended in such a way as to deny the fundamental constitutional values – the independence of the state, democracy, or the innate nature of human rights and freedoms;

- it is not permitted to make any such amendments to the Constitution that would deny one of the constitutional values that constitute the foundation of the State of Lithuania as the constitutionally consolidated common good of all society – the republic, except in the case where Article 1 of the Constitution would be altered in the manner prescribed by Paragraph 1 of Article 148 of the Constitution, or Article 1 of the Constitutional Law on the State of Lithuania, which is a constituent part of the Constitution, would be altered in the manner prescribed by Article 2 of this law (rulings of 24 January 2014 and 11 July 2014);

- it is not permitted to make any such amendments to the Constitution that would deny the provisions of the Constitutional Act on the Non-Alignment of the Republic of Lithuania to Post-Soviet Eastern Unions, except in the case where the respective provisions of this constitutional act would be altered in accordance with the same procedure as provided for in Article 2 of the Constitutional Law on the State of Lithuania (rulings of 24 January 2014 and 11 July 2014);

- as long as the constitutional foundations of membership of the Republic of Lithuania in the European Union, which are consolidated in Articles 1 and 2 of the Constitutional Act on Membership of the Republic of Lithuania in the European Union, are not annulled by referendum, it is not permitted to make any such amendments to the Constitution that would deny the obligations of the Republic of Lithuania under its membership in the European Union (rulings of 24 January 2014 and 11 July 2014);

- it is not permitted to make any such amendments to the Constitution that would deny the international obligations of the Republic of Lithuania (inter alia, the obligations of the Republic of Lithuania under its membership in NATO, which is implied by the geopolitical orientation of the State of Lithuania) and, at the same time, would deny the constitutional principle of pacta sunt servanda, as long as the said international obligations are not renounced in accordance with the norms of international law (rulings of 24 January 2014 and 11 July 2014);

- the Seimas is not permitted to make any such amendments to the Constitution that would deny the provisions of Chapter I “The State of Lithuania” and Chapter XIV “The Alteration of the Constitution” of the Constitution; it is also not permitted to introduce by referendum any such amendments to the Constitution that would, without respectively amending the provisions of Chapter I “The State of Lithuania” and Chapter XIV “The Alteration of the Constitution” of the Constitution, establish the constitutional regulation contrary to the provisions of Chapters I and XIV of the Constitution (rulings of 24 January 2014 and 11 July 2014).

... the provisions of the Law on the Procedure for the Entry into Force of the Constitution of the Republic of Lithuania, with the exception of Article 5 thereof, may not be altered, in view of the fact that they consolidate the transitional constitutional regulation related to the entry into force and implementation of the provisions of the Constitution.

The procedural limitations on the alteration of the Constitution

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 30 July 2020

The Constitutional Court has noted that the procedural limitations on the alteration of the Constitution are related to the special procedure for the alteration of the Constitution, which is provided for in the Constitution; under the Constitution, different procedures for amending constitutional law and ordinary law are established; the constitutionally consolidated special procedure for the alteration of the Constitution may not be equated with the adoption of laws (inter alia, constitutional laws) (ruling of 24 January 2014).

The procedures for submitting, deliberating, and adopting laws amending the Constitution are regulated by Chapter XIV “The Alteration of the Constitution”; the provisions of this chapter have greater protection – according to Paragraph 2 of Article 148 of the Constitution, they may be altered only by referendum (ruling of 24 January 2014).

Under Paragraph 2 of Article 147 of the Constitution, the Constitution may not be amended during a state of emergency or martial law; no such prohibition is established with respect to the adoption of laws (ruling of 24 January 2014), inter alia, the adoption or amendment of constitutional laws.

Under Paragraphs 1 and 2 of Article 148 of the Constitution, the powers of the Seimas to amend the Constitution are limited: the provisions of Article 1 of the Constitution, the other provisions of Chapter I “The State of Lithuania”, as well as the provisions of Chapter XIV “The Alteration of the Constitution”, may be altered only by referendum (ruling of 24 January 2014).

In addition ... the provisions of the Constitutional Law on the State of Lithuania, the Constitutional Act on the Non-Alignment of the Republic of Lithuania to Post-Soviet Eastern Unions, and the provisions of Articles 1 and 2 of the Constitutional Act on Membership of the Republic of Lithuania in the European Union can be altered only by referendum.

Paragraph 1 of Article 147 of the Constitution specifies the special subjects who have the right to submit a motion to alter or supplement the Constitution to the Seimas: a group of not less than 1/4 of all the members of the Seimas or not less than 300 000 voters; these subjects are, in principle, different from the subjects that, under Article 68 of the Constitution, have the legislative initiative to adopt laws – the members of the Seimas, the President of the Republic, the Government, and 50 000 citizens (ruling of 24 January 2014). ...

Paragraph 3 of Article 148 of the Constitution provides for the special procedure for adopting amendments to the Constitution at the Seimas: amendments to the Constitution must be considered and voted on by the Seimas twice; there must be a break of not less than three months between the votes; no such requirement that laws must be considered and voted on by the Seimas twice is established in the Constitution with respect to the adoption of laws (ruling of 24 January 2014). ...

Paragraph 3 of Article 148 of the Constitution establishes the requirement of a special qualified majority vote of the members of the Seimas in order to adopt a law amending the Constitution: a draft law on the alteration of the Constitution is deemed adopted by the Seimas if, during each of the votes, not less than 2/3 of all the members of the Seimas vote in favour thereof; no such requirement of a special qualified majority of votes is established with respect to the adoption of laws: according to Article 69 of the Constitution, laws are deemed adopted if the majority of the members of the Seimas participating in the sitting vote in favour thereof (Paragraph 2); constitutional laws are adopted if more than half of all the members of the Seimas vote in favour thereof and they are altered by not less than a 3/5 majority vote of all the members of the Seimas (Paragraph 3) (ruling of 24 January 2014).

Paragraph 3 of Article 148 of the Constitution lays down a special limitation on submitting anew a failed constitutional amendment to the Seimas for reconsideration: it may be submitted to the Seimas not earlier than after one year; the Constitution contains no such limitation with respect to the adoption of laws (ruling of 24 January 2014). ...

Paragraphs 1 and 2 of Article 149 of the Constitution provide for a special procedure for promulgating a law amending the Constitution: the President of the Republic signs an adopted law on the alteration of the Constitution and officially promulgates it within 5 days; if the President of the Republic does not sign and promulgate such a law within the specified time, the Speaker of the Seimas signs and promulgates it (ruling of 24 January 2014).

It should be noted that, when the President of the Republic promulgates a law amending the Constitution, his/her powers are restricted to a greater extent than in the event of the promulgation of other laws (ruling of 24 January 2014): the Constitution does not provide that the President of the Republic has the right of a delaying veto over laws on the alteration of the Constitution (rulings of 19 June 2002 and 24 December 2002). Under Article 71 of the Constitution, the President of the Republic has the right of a delaying veto over laws, inter alia, constitutional laws, adopted by the Seimas: within ten days of receiving a law, inter alia, a constitutional law, adopted by the Seimas, the President of the Republic either signs and officially promulgates the law or, on reasonable grounds, refers it back to the Seimas for reconsideration (Paragraph 1); if a law, inter alia, a constitutional law, adopted by the Seimas is neither referred back nor signed by the President of the Republic within the specified period, such a law, inter alia, a constitutional law, comes into force after it is signed and officially promulgated by the Speaker of the Seimas (Paragraph 2).

Paragraph 3 of Article 149 of the Constitution provides for a special procedure for the entry into force of a law amending the Constitution: a law on the alteration of the Constitution comes into force not earlier than one month after its adoption; no such time limit for the entry into force of a law is established with respect to the entry into force of other laws adopted by the Seimas: under Paragraph 1 of Article 70 of the Constitution, laws adopted by the Seimas come into force after they are signed and officially promulgated by the President of the Republic, unless the laws themselves establish a later date for their entry into force (ruling of 24 January 2014). Thus, constitutional laws adopted by the Seimas come into force in accordance with the procedure laid down in Paragraph 1 of Article 70 of the Constitution.

1.8.4.3. International and EU law

The Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms in the legal system of Lithuania

The Constitutional Court's conclusion of 24 January 1995

The Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms is a special source of international law, the purpose of which is different from that of numerous other acts of international law. This purpose is universal, i.e. to strive for universal and effective recognition of the rights declared in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and to achieve the observance of the said rights in the protection and further implementation of human rights and fundamental freedoms. With respect to its purpose, the Convention performs the same function as the constitutional guarantees for human rights, because the Constitution consolidates those guarantees in this country, whereas the Convention provides for such guarantees on the international level. ...

[...]

The legal system of the Republic of Lithuania is based on the fact that any law or other legal act, as well as any international treaty of the Republic of Lithuania (in this case, the Convention), may not be in conflict with the Constitution. Otherwise, the Republic of Lithuania would not be able to ensure the legal protection of the rights and freedoms recognised under the Convention

[...]

Paragraph 3 of Article 138 of the Constitution prescribes: “International treaties ratified by the Seimas of the Republic of Lithuania shall be a constituent part of the legal system of the Republic of Lithuania.” With respect to the Convention, this constitutional provision implies that, after it is ratified and comes into force, the Convention will become a constituent part of the legal system of the Republic of Lithuania and will be applied in the same way as the laws of the Republic of Lithuania. In the system of legal sources of the Republic of Lithuania, the provisions of the Convention are equalled to laws ...

... Paragraph 1 of Article 7 of the Constitution prescribes: “Any law or other act that contradicts the Constitution shall be invalid.” Although this constitutional provision in itself cannot render an international treaty, the Convention in this case, invalid, but it requires the compliance of the provisions of an international treaty with the constitutional provisions, because, otherwise, it would be problematic to implement the Convention in the domestic law of the Republic of Lithuania.

Ensuring the fulfilment of the international obligations of the state; the legal force of international treaties in the legal system of Lithuania (Paragraph 3 of Article 138 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court’s ruling of 17 October 1995

The legal system of the Republic of Lithuania is based on the fact that any law or other legal act, as well as any international treaty of the Republic of Lithuania, may not be in conflict with the Constitution, since Paragraph 1 of Article 7 of the Constitution prescribes: “Any law or other act that contradicts the Constitution shall be invalid.” As such, this constitutional provision cannot render any law or international treaty invalid, but it requires that the provisions of laws and international treaties be not in conflict with the provisions of the Constitution. Otherwise, the Republic of Lithuania would not be able to ensure the legal protection of the rights of the parties of international treaties, which arise from those treaties, and this would in turn hinder the fulfilment of the obligations according to the concluded international treaties. ... it is important that a consistent procedure for concluding, executing, and terminating international treaties would be established and that it would be in conformity with the provisions of the Constitution concerning international treaties ...

[...]

Paragraph 3 of Article 138 of the Constitution prescribes: “International treaties ratified by the Seimas of the Republic of Lithuania shall be a constituent part of the legal system of the Republic of Lithuania” ...

[...]

... [The Constitutional Court’s conclusion] of 24 January 1995 ... noted the following: “With respect to the Convention, this constitutional provision implies that, after it is ratified and comes into force, the Convention will become a constituent part of the legal system of the Republic of Lithuania and will be applied in the same way as the laws of the Republic of Lithuania.” The same applies not only to the said Convention, but also to all ratified international treaties of the Republic of Lithuania ...

... Only one type of international treaties is mentioned in Article 138 of the Constitution, i.e. treaties ratified by the Seimas Under the Constitution, only the legislature may decide by way of ratification which act of international law is a constituent part of the legal system of the Republic of Lithuania and has the legal force of a law. The Seimas has the right to adopt laws and the adoption of laws may not be delegated to any other institution of state power. The recognition that non-ratified international treaties have the legal force of a law would lead to the denial of the prerogative of the Seimas to pass laws.

The State of Lithuania recognises the principles and norms of international law (Paragraph 1 of Article 135 and Paragraph 3 of Article 138 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court’s ruling of 9 December 1998

Paragraph 1 of Article 135 of the Constitution states that, in implementing its foreign policy, the Republic of Lithuania follows the universally recognised principles and norms of international law, seeks to ensure national security and independence, the welfare of its citizens and their fundamental rights and freedoms, and contributes to the international order based on law and justice.

Paragraph 3 of Article 138 of the Constitution provides that international treaties ratified by the Seimas of the Republic of Lithuania are a constituent part of the legal system of the Republic of Lithuania.

In the context of interpreting these articles of the Constitution, it needs to be noted that the State of Lithuania, while recognising the principles and norms of international law, may not apply essentially different standards to the people of this country. Regarding itself as a full member of the international community, the State of Lithuania, of its own free will, adopts and recognises these principles and norms, the customs of the international community, naturally integrates itself into the world culture, and becomes its natural part.

The jurisprudence of the European Court of Human Rights as a source for the interpretation of law

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 29 December 2004

In its rulings, the Constitutional Court has held on more than one occasion that the jurisprudence of the European Court of Human Rights, as a source for the interpretation of law, is also important for the interpretation and application of Lithuanian law.

The legal force of international treaties in the legal system of Lithuania (Paragraph 1 of Article 135 and Paragraph 3 of Article 138 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 14 March 2006

... under Paragraph 3 of Article 138 of the Constitution, international treaties ratified by the Seimas are a constituent part of the legal system of the Republic of Lithuania.

Under Paragraph 1 of Article 135 of the Constitution, in implementing its foreign policy, the Republic of Lithuania follows the universally recognised principles and norms of international law, seeks to ensure national security and independence, the welfare of its citizens and their fundamental rights and freedoms, and contributes to the creation of the international order based on law and justice.

It also needs to be mentioned that the adherence of the State of Lithuania to the universally recognised principles of international law was declared in the Act of the Supreme Council of the Republic of Lithuania on the Re-establishment of the Independent State of Lithuania, which was adopted on 11 March 1990. Consequently, the observance of international obligations undertaken of its own free will and respect for the universally recognised principles of international law (as well as the principle of pacta sunt servanda) are a legal tradition and a constitutional principle of the restored independent State of Lithuania.

It needs to be noted that the Constitutional Court has held that the international treaties ratified by the Seimas acquire the legal force of a law (conclusion of 24 January 1995, the ruling of 17 October 1995, and the decisions of 25 April 2002 and 7 April 2004).

This doctrinal provision cannot be interpreted as meaning that it is permitted for the Republic of Lithuania not to observe its international treaties where its laws or constitutional laws establish a different legal regulation if compared with that established in the international treaties. On the contrary, the principle consolidated in the Constitution that the Republic of Lithuania observes international obligations undertaken of its own free will and respects the universally recognised principles of international law implies that, in cases where national legal acts (inter alia, laws or constitutional laws) establish such a legal regulation that competes with the one established in an international treaty, the international treaty is to be applied.

The legal force of EU legislative acts in the legal system of Lithuania (Paragraph 2 of the Constitutional Act on Membership of the Republic of Lithuania in the European Union)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 14 March 2006

Under Paragraph 2 of the Constitutional Act on Membership of the Republic of Lithuania in the European Union, the norms of European Union law are a constituent part of the legal system of the Republic of Lithuania; where it concerns the founding Treaties of the European Union, the norms of European Union law are applied directly, while in the event of the collision of legal norms, they have supremacy over the laws and other legal acts of the Republic of Lithuania.

Thus, the Constitution consolidates not only the principle that, in cases where national legal acts establish such a legal regulation that competes with that established in an international treaty, the international treaty must be applied, but also expressis verbis establishes the collision rule concerning EU law, consolidating the priority of the application of EU legislative acts in cases where the provisions of EU law arising from the founding Treaties of the European Union compete with the legal regulation established in Lithuanian national legal acts (regardless of their legal force), with the exception of the Constitution itself.

The jurisprudence of the Court of Justice of the European Union as a source for the interpretation of law

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 21 June 2011

... the jurisprudence of the Court of Justice of the European Union, as a source for the interpretation of law, is also important for the interpretation and application of Lithuanian law (rulings of 21 December 2006, 15 May 2007, 4 December 2008, and 27 March 2009).

The harmonisation of international and domestic law; the legal force of international treaties (inter alia, the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms and its protocols) in the legal system of Lithuania; the jurisprudence of the European Court of Human Rights as a source for the interpretation of law; the State of Lithuania recognises the principles and norms of international law (Paragraph 1 of Article 7, Paragraph 1 of Article 135, and Paragraph 3 of Article 138 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 5 September 2012

The Convention and some of its protocols, inter alia, Protocol No 1, are international treaties of the Republic of Lithuania, which were ratified by the Seimas and came into force ...

... the Convention and its protocols were drafted, inter alia, on the grounds of the principle of the sovereign equality of states; the Convention system of human rights protection is subsidiary to the national legal systems.

In this context, it needs to be noted that the main responsibility for the effective implementation of the Convention and its protocols falls on the states, the parties to the Convention and its protocols; therefore, they have a broad discretion to choose the ways and measures for the application and implementation of the Convention and its protocols, inter alia, the execution of judgments delivered by the European Court of Human Rights. However, such discretion is limited by the particularities (related to the established system of the harmonisation of national (domestic) and international law) of the legal systems of states, inter alia, their constitutions, as well as by the nature of the human rights and freedoms guaranteed under the Convention and its protocols ...

[...]

... the European Court of Human Rights has a subsidiary role in the implementation of the Convention and its protocols; it does not replace the competence and jurisdiction of national courts, nor is it an appeal or cassation instance with regard to judgments of the latter. Even though the jurisprudence of the European Court of Human Rights, as a source for the interpretation of law, is also important for the interpretation and application of Lithuanian law, the jurisdiction of the European Court of Human Rights does not replace the powers of the Constitutional Court to officially interpret the Constitution.

... in Lithuania, the system of parallel harmonisation of international and domestic law is applied, which is based on the rule that international treaties are transformed in the legal system of the country (i.e. they are incorporated into it) (rulings of 17 October 1995 and 18 December 1997). Under Paragraph 3 of Article 138 of the Constitution, international treaties ratified by the Seimas are a constituent part of the legal system of the Republic of Lithuania. Interpreting this provision of the Constitution, the Constitutional Court has held that it means that international treaties ratified by the Seimas acquire the legal force of a law (conclusion of 24 January 1995, the rulings of 17 October 1995 and 14 March 2006, and the decisions of 25 April 2002 and 7 April 2004). Thus, in the legal system of Lithuania, the Convention has the legal force of a law (ruling of 16 January 2007). Protocol No 1 to the Convention also has the legal force of a law.

It also needs to be noted that, as held by the Constitutional Court, the doctrinal provision that international treaties ratified by the Seimas acquire the legal force of a law cannot be interpreted as meaning that it is permitted for the Republic of Lithuania not to observe its international treaties where its laws or constitutional laws establish a different legal regulation if compared with that established in the international treaties (ruling of 14 March 2006). In addition, the Constitution consolidates the principle that, in cases where a national legal act (except the Constitution itself) establishes such a legal regulation that competes with that established in an international treaty, the international treaty is to be applied (rulings of 14 March 2006 and 21 December 2006). Thus, in cases where the legal regulation consolidated in an international treaty ratified by the Seimas competes with the legal regulation established in the Constitution, the application of the provisions of such an international treaty does not take priority.

Consequently, when the international obligations of the Republic of Lithuania are implemented in domestic law, account must be taken of the principle of the supremacy of the Constitution, which is consolidated in Paragraph 1 of Article 7 thereof. As emphasised by the Constitutional Court, the legal system of the Republic of Lithuania is based on the fact that any law or other legal act, as well as international treaties of the Republic of Lithuania, may not be in conflict the Constitution, since Paragraph 1 of Article 7 of the Constitution prescribes: “Any law or other act that contradicts the Constitution shall be invalid.” As such, this constitutional provision cannot render any law or international treaty invalid, but it requires that the provisions of laws and international treaties be not in conflict with the provisions of the Constitution (conclusion of 24 January 1995 and the ruling of 17 October 1995); otherwise, the Republic of Lithuania would not be able to ensure the legal protection of the rights of the parties of international treaties, which arise from those treaties, and this would, in its turn, hinder the fulfilment of the obligations under the concluded international treaties (ruling of 17 October 1995). This also applies to the Convention (and its protocols); otherwise, the Republic of Lithuania would not be able to ensure the legal protection of the rights and freedoms recognised under the Convention (conclusion of 24 January 1995).

[...]

... as such, a judgment of the European Court of Human Rights may not serve as the constitutional grounds for the reinterpretation (modification) of the official constitutional doctrine (provisions thereof) in cases where such reinterpretation, in the absence of the respective amendments to the Constitution, would change the overall constitutional legal regulation ... in substance, also where it would disturb the system of the values consolidated in the Constitution and would diminish the guarantees of the protection of the supremacy of the Constitution in the legal system.

On the other hand, it needs to be emphasised that respect for international law, i.e. the observance of international obligations undertaken by the Republic of Lithuania of its own free will and respect for the universally recognised principles of international law (as well as the principle of pacta sunt servanda) are a legal tradition and a constitutional principle of the restored independent State of Lithuania (ruling of 14 March 2006). The Republic of Lithuania must follow the universally recognised principles and norms of international law, inter alia, under Paragraph 1 of Article 135 of the Constitution.

The legal force of international treaties in the legal system of Lithuania; the duty of the state to remove incompatibilities between an international treaty and the provisions of the Constitution (Paragraph 1 of Article 7, Paragraph 1 of Article 135, and Paragraph 3 of Article 138 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 18 March 2014

... under Paragraph 3 of Article 138 of the Constitution, international treaties ratified by the Seimas are a constituent part of the legal system of the Republic of Lithuania. In this context, it should be noted that the said provision should be interpreted in the light of the principle of the supremacy of the Constitution. As the Constitutional Court emphasised in its rulings of 25 May 2004 and 24 January 2014, the Constitution is supreme law.

As held by the Constitutional Court on more than one occasion, international treaties ratified by the Seimas acquire the legal force of a law. It should also be noted that the doctrinal provision that international treaties ratified by the Seimas acquire the legal force of a law may not be interpreted as meaning that, purportedly, it is permitted for the Republic of Lithuania not to observe its international treaties where its laws or constitutional laws establish a different legal regulation if compared with that established under international treaties (rulings of 14 March 2006 and 5 September 2012). The Constitution also consolidates the principle that, in cases where a national legal act (obviously, with the exception of the Constitution itself) establishes such a legal regulation that competes with that established in an international treaty, the international treaty must be applied (rulings of 14 March 2006, 21 December 2006, and 5 September 2012). Thus, in those cases where the legal regulation consolidated in an international treaty that has been ratified by the Seimas and has come into force competes with the legal regulation established in the Constitution, the application of the provisions of such an international treaty does not take priority (ruling of 5 September 2012).

As the Constitutional Court noted in its ruling of 5 September 2012, in the course of implementing, in domestic law, the international obligations of the Republic of Lithuania, it is necessary to take account of the principle of the supremacy of the Constitution, which is consolidated in Paragraph 1 of Article 7 of the Constitution; the legal system of the Republic of Lithuania is based on the fact that any law or other legal act, as well as any international treaty of the Republic of Lithuania, may not be in conflict with the Constitution, since Paragraph 1 of Article 7 of the Constitution prescribes: “Any law or other act that contradicts the Constitution shall be invalid”; this constitutional provision cannot in itself render any law or international treaty invalid, but it requires that the provisions of laws and international treaties be not in conflict with the provisions of the Constitution; otherwise, the Republic of Lithuania would not be able to ensure the legal protection of the rights of the parties of international treaties, which arise from those treaties, and this would, in its turn, hinder the fulfilment of the obligations under the concluded international treaties.

On the other hand ... under Paragraph 1 of Article 135 of the Constitution, the Republic of Lithuania is obliged to follow the universally recognised principles and norms of international law; the constitutional principle of pacta sunt servanda, which is consolidated in the said provision, means the imperative of fulfilling, in good faith, the obligations assumed by the Republic of Lithuania under international law, inter alia, international treaties. In view of this, it should be noted that, in the event of an incompatibility between an international treaty of the Republic of Lithuania and the provisions of the Constitution, the duty arises, under Paragraph 1 of Article 135 of the Constitution, for the Republic of Lithuania to remove the said incompatibility, inter alia, either by renouncing the international obligations established under the international treaty in the manner prescribed by the norms of international law or by making the respective amendments to the Constitution.

EU law is a source of the interpretation of the law of the Republic of Lithuania, inter alia, the Constitution, in those areas in which the Republic of Lithuania shares with or confers on the European Union the competences of its state institutions (Article 1 of the Constitutional Act on Membership of the Republic of Lithuania in the European Union)

The Constitutional Court’s decision of 20 December 2017

... the constitutional imperative of the full participation of the Republic of Lithuania in the European Union also implies the constitutional obligation of the Republic of Lithuania to properly implement the requirements of European Union law. European Union law is a source of the interpretation of the law of the Republic of Lithuania, inter alia, the Constitution, in those areas in which, under Article 1 of the Constitutional Act on Membership of the Republic of Lithuania in the European Union, the Republic of Lithuania shares with or confers on the European Union the competences of its state institutions. ... there are no grounds for interpreting the provisions of the Constitution linked to the areas [of shared competence between the European Union and the Member States] ... differently from the manner in which the specified areas are regulated under European Union law.

1.8.4.4. Constitutional laws

Constitutional laws and the procedure for their adoption and amendment (Paragraph 2 of Article 47 (wording of 20 June 1996) and Paragraph 3 of Article 69 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 24 December 2002

Paragraph 3 of Article 69 of the Constitution prescribes: "Constitutional laws of the Republic of Lithuania shall be adopted if more than half of all the Members of the Seimas vote in favour thereof, and they shall be altered by not less than a 3/5 majority vote of all the Members of the Seimas. The Seimas shall establish the list of constitutional laws by a 3/5 majority vote of the Members of the Seimas."

In its ruling of 2 April 2001, the Constitutional Court held that constitutional laws differ from other laws as regards the procedure for their adoption and amendment. The special place of constitutional laws in the system of legal acts is determined by the Constitution itself. Constitutional laws may not be amended or repealed by means of laws. Thus, it is ensured that the social relationships regulated by means of constitutional laws would not be regulated in a different manner and that the greater stability of the social relationships regulated by means of constitutional laws would be guaranteed. Constitutional laws may not be in conflict with the Constitution, and laws may not be in conflict with the Constitution and constitutional laws.

Thus, in the hierarchy of legal acts, constitutional laws have the legal force that is lower than that of the Constitution itself. A constitutional law may not limit the legal force of the Constitution or of its certain provisions; such a law may not lay down, inter alia, any such a legal regulation that would limit or deny the possibility of applying the Constitution directly.

In its ruling of 8 November 1993, when interpreting the legal regulation established in Paragraph 3 of Article 69 of the Constitution, the Constitutional Court held that, only after the list of constitutional laws is approved in accordance with the procedure laid down in the said paragraph, the laws included in the aforesaid list may be treated as constitutional laws, and the rule of their adoption by a qualified majority of votes (which is established in the Constitution) would have to be applied only to these laws. In the absence of such a list of constitutional laws, the aforesaid procedure for the adoption of constitutional laws may not be applied to the adoption of any law, except the adoption of the law establishing the list of constitutional laws.

Due to the fact that, under the Constitution, constitutional laws may not be altered or repealed by laws other than constitutional laws (i.e. constitutional laws may not be altered or repealed by ordinary laws) and due to the fact that laws may not be in conflict with the Constitution and constitutional laws, the list of constitutional laws may, under the Constitution, be established only by means of a constitutional law. According to Paragraph 3 of Article 69 of the Constitution, such a constitutional law must be adopted by a 3/5 majority vote of the members of the Seimas.

In its ruling of 22 December 1994, the Constitutional Court held that the Constitution does not prescribe another procedure for adopting constitutional laws, save the procedure established in Article 69 of the Constitution.

The constitutionally consolidated concept of constitutional laws changed after the adoption of the Republic of Lithuania's Law on Amending Article 47 of the Constitution ...

... in Paragraph 2 of Article 47 of the Constitution it is expressis verbis prescribed that certain relationships indicated in this paragraph of Article 47 are to be regulated by means of a constitutional law.

In its ruling of 2 April 2001, the Constitutional Court held that, under the Constitution, such laws that are directly referred to as constitutional laws in the Constitution and are adopted in accordance with the procedure established in Paragraph 3 of Article 69 of the Constitution, as well as such laws that are included in the list of constitutional laws and are adopted in accordance with the procedure established in Paragraph 3 of Article 69 of the Constitution, are constitutional laws.

The fact that certain constitutional laws can be directly indicated in the Constitution implies the constitutional duty of the Seimas to adopt these constitutional laws by paying regard to the requirement, established in Paragraph 3 of Article 69 of the Constitution, that these constitutional laws may be adopted if more than half of all the members of the Seimas vote in favour thereof and that they may be altered by not less than a 3/5 majority vote of all the members of the Seimas.

... Under the Constitution, as long as the constitutional law establishing the list of constitutional laws is not adopted, the Seimas does not have any powers to adopt any constitutional law, unless such a constitutional law is indicated directly in the Constitution itself, or unless it is the constitutional law whereby the list of constitutional laws is established.

[...]

... the constitutional concept of constitutional laws implies that only the constitutional laws included in the list of constitutional laws, save those directly indicated in the Constitution itself and the constitutional law establishing the list of constitutional laws, may be treated as constitutional laws, and the adoption of only such laws may be subject to the rules established in Paragraph 3 of Article 69 of the Constitution.

The fundamental constitutional acts of the State of Lithuania cannot be equated with constitutional laws

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 30 July 2020

... the fundamental constitutional acts of the State of Lithuania – the Resolution of the Council of Lithuania of 16 February 1918 (Act of Independence), the Act of the Supreme Council of the Republic of Lithuania of 11 March 1990 on the Re-establishment of the Independent State of Lithuania, and the Declaration of the Council of the Lithuanian Freedom Fight Movement of 16 February 1949 – are not constitutional laws and cannot be equated with them.

The constitutional acts forming a constituent part of the Constitution cannot be equated with constitutional laws

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 30 July 2020

The constitutional acts indicated in Article 150 of the Constitution are not constitutional laws and cannot be equated with them ...

Laws amending the Constitution (amendments to the Constitution) cannot be equated with constitutional laws

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 30 July 2020

... under the Constitution, laws amending the Constitution (constitutional amendments) are not constitutional laws and cannot be equated with them ...

Constitutional laws are not a constituent part of the Constitution

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 30 July 2020

... under the Constitution, constitutional laws are not its constituent part. ...

Constitutional laws in the system of legal acts; the legal force of constitutional laws

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 30 July 2020

The special place of constitutional laws in the system of legal acts is determined by the Constitution itself (rulings of 2 April 2001, 24 December 2002, and 14 March 2006). ... in the hierarchy of legal acts, constitutional laws have the legal force that is lower than that of the Constitution itself. A constitutional law may not limit the legal force of the Constitution or the legal force of its certain provisions; a constitutional law, inter alia, may not lay down any such a legal regulation that would limit or deny the possibility of applying the Constitution directly (ruling of 24 December 2002). Constitutional laws may not be in conflict with the Constitution, and laws may not be in conflict with the Constitution and constitutional laws ...

Thus, under the Constitution, constitutional laws have the legal force that is lower than that of the Constitution but higher than that of laws. It should be noted that, under the Constitution, all constitutional laws adopted in accordance with the procedure laid down in Paragraph 3 of Article 69 of the Constitution, regardless of whether they are the constitutional laws directly specified in the Constitution or the constitutional laws included in the list of constitutional laws, have equal legal force; the constitutional law establishing the list of constitutional laws has the same legal force.

Constitutional laws may not contradict the constitutional acts forming a constituent part of the Constitution

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 30 July 2020

... constitutional laws adopted in accordance with the procedure laid down in Paragraph 3 of Article 69 of the Constitution may not contradict, inter alia, the Constitutional Law of 11 February 1991 on the State of Lithuania, the Constitutional Act of 8 June 1992 on the Non-Alignment of the Republic of Lithuania to Post-Soviet Eastern Unions, the Law of 25 October 1992 on the Procedure for the Entry into Force of the Constitution of the Republic of Lithuania, and the Constitutional Act of 13 July 2004 on Membership of the Republic of Lithuania in the European Union, which all are a constituent part of the Constitution under Article 150 thereof.

Constitutional laws must regulate particularly significant issues in the life of the state and society

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 30 July 2020

... the Constitution does not directly establish which criteria the Seimas should follow when including concrete constitutional laws in the list of constitutional laws, which is adopted under Paragraph 3 of Article 69 of the Constitution. However, the Constitution, inter alia, the provisions of Paragraph 3 of Article 69 and Paragraph 2 of Article 72 thereof, which lay down a more complex procedure for adopting and amending constitutional laws, makes it clear that constitutional laws should govern the constitutionally important areas of social relationships and particularly significant issues in the life of the state and society.

Constitutional laws and the procedure for their adoption and amendment

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 30 July 2020

Article 69 of the Constitution prescribes:

“Laws shall be adopted at the Seimas according to the procedure established by law.

Laws shall be deemed adopted if the majority of the Members of the Seimas participating in the sitting vote in favour thereof.

Constitutional laws of the Republic of Lithuania shall be adopted if more than half of all the Members of the Seimas vote in favour thereof, and they shall be altered by not less than a 3/5 majority vote of all the Members of the Seimas. The Seimas shall establish the list of constitutional laws by a 3/5 majority vote of the Members of the Seimas.

The provisions of laws of the Republic of Lithuania may also be adopted by referendum.”

Thus, Paragraph 3 of Article 69 of the Constitution provides for the institution of constitutional laws, as well as for the procedure for adopting and amending constitutional laws, which is different from the procedure, provided for in Paragraph 2 of this article, for adopting laws. It should be noted that constitutional laws are expressis verbis also mentioned in other provisions of the Constitution, inter alia, in Articles 47 and 72 of the Constitution.

[...]

Interpreting these provisions of the Constitution, the Constitutional Court has held that, under the Constitution, constitutional laws are: (1) constitutional laws directly specified in the Constitution and adopted in accordance with the procedure laid down in Paragraph 3 of Article 69 of the Constitution;

(2) constitutional laws included in the list of constitutional laws and adopted in accordance with the procedure laid down in Paragraph 3 of Article 69 of the Constitution (rulings of 2 April 2001, 24 December 2002, and 14 March 2006).

It should be noted that a constitutional law is directly specified in Paragraph 3 of Article 47 (wording of 23 January 2003) of the Constitution, which stipulates the following: “In the Republic of Lithuania, foreign entities may acquire the ownership of land, internal waters, and forests according to a constitutional law.” Thus, Paragraph 3 of Article 47 (wording of 23 January 2003) of the Constitution expressis verbis provides that certain social relationships indicated in this paragraph are to be regulated by means of a constitutional law (ruling of 24 December 2002).

As held by the Constitutional Court, the fact that certain constitutional laws can be directly indicated in the Constitution implies the constitutional duty of the Seimas to adopt these constitutional laws by paying regard to the requirements, established in Paragraph 3 of Article 69 of the Constitution, that these constitutional laws may be adopted if more than half of all the members of the Seimas vote in favour thereof and that they may be altered by not less than a 3/5 majority vote of all the members of the Seimas (rulings of 24 December 2002 and 14 March 2006).

The constitutional law establishing the list of constitutional laws; the list of constitutional laws

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 30 July 2020

... the provision “The Seimas shall establish the list of constitutional laws by a 3/5 majority vote of the Members of the Seimas” of Paragraph 3 of Article 69 of the Constitution implies that the list of constitutional laws must be established by means of a constitutional law. As held by the Constitutional Court, given that, under the Constitution, constitutional laws may not be altered or repealed by means of laws other than constitutional (i.e. they may not be altered or repealed by means of ordinary laws) and, given that laws may not be in conflict with the Constitution and constitutional laws, the list of constitutional laws may, under the Constitution, be established only by means of a constitutional law (ruling of 24 December 2002).

... such a constitutional law must be adopted by a 3/5 majority vote of the members of the Seimas (ruling of 24 December 2002). Therefore, under Paragraph 3 of Article 69 of the Constitution, the constitutional law establishing the list of constitutional laws must be adopted by a higher majority vote of the members of the Seimas than other constitutional laws. Such a higher majority vote of the members of the Seimas for adopting the constitutional law establishing the list of constitutional laws is prescribed in Paragraph 3 of Article 69 of the Constitution in view of the special significance of this constitutional law. As held by the Constitutional Court, the inclusion of a law in the list of constitutional laws, under the Constitution, means that such a law must be adopted and the legal regulation laid down therein must be amended under a more complex procedure (compared with the procedure for adopting and amending other laws), thereby seeking to create the preconditions for ensuring the stability of this legal regulation (ruling of 15 February 2019); thus, in this way, it is ensured that the social relationships governed by means of constitutional laws will not be regulated by laws in a different manner and that the greater stability of the social relationships governed by means of constitutional laws will be guaranteed (rulings of 2 April 2001, 24 December 2002, and 14 March 2006).

The Constitutional Court has also held that, only after the list of constitutional laws is approved in accordance with the procedure laid down in Paragraph 3 of Article 69 of the Constitution, the laws included in this list may be treated as constitutional laws, and only these laws must be subject to the procedure established in the Constitution for their adoption and amendment (rulings of 8 November 1993 and 22 December 1994); under the Constitution, as long as the constitutional law establishing the list of constitutional laws is not adopted, the Seimas has no powers to adopt any constitutional law, unless such a constitutional law is directly indicated in the Constitution itself or it is the constitutional law whereby the list of constitutional laws is established (ruling of 24 December 2002).

Thus, the constitutional concept of constitutional laws implies that only the constitutional laws included in the list of constitutional laws, except those directly indicated in the Constitution itself and the constitutional law establishing the list of constitutional laws, may be treated as constitutional laws and the adoption of only these laws may be subject to the rules laid down in Paragraph 3 of Article 69 of the Constitution (ruling of 24 December 2002). If a law is not included in the list of constitutional laws, the procedure for adopting constitutional laws, as defined in Paragraph 3 of Article 69 of the Constitution, may not be applied to its adoption (ruling of 18 October 2000); amendments and supplements to an ordinary law may not be adopted according to the rules for adopting constitutional laws (ruling of 8 November 1993).

In view of this, it should be noted that, under Paragraph 3 of Article 69 of the Constitution, the constitutional law establishing the list of constitutional laws is not an objective in itself: it establishes a list of laws governing those social relationships with respect to which greater stability should be ensured compared with social relationships to be governed by ordinary laws.

The duty of the Seimas to adopt the constitutional laws included in the list of constitutional laws

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 30 July 2020

It should be emphasised that, according to Paragraph 3 of Article 69 of the Constitution, the list of constitutional laws may not be meaningless. As mentioned before, the inclusion of a law in the list of constitutional laws, under the Constitution, means that, in this way, it is ensured that the social relationships governed by means of constitutional laws will not be regulated by laws in a different manner and that the greater stability of the social relationships governed by means of constitutional laws will be guaranteed.

In this context, it should be noted that, as held by the Constitutional Court more than once, when, under the Constitution, the Seimas adopts laws, it is bound not only by the Constitution, but also by laws adopted by itself; this is an essential element of the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law (inter alia, the rulings of 11 July 2002, 24 September 2009, and 1 July 2013).

Thus, according to Paragraph 3 of Article 69 of the Constitution, interpreted in the context of the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law, the constitutional law establishing the list of constitutional laws, when adopted by the Seimas, implies the obligation of the Seimas to adopt the constitutional laws specified in this constitutional law, i.e. to regulate the respective social relationships by means of constitutional laws. In other words, upon the adoption by the Seimas of the constitutional law establishing the list of constitutional laws in accordance with Paragraph 3 of Article 69 of the Constitution, i.e. after the Seimas decides by a 3/5 majority vote of the members of the Seimas what social relationships, due to their particular importance and the need to ensure the greater stability of their regulation, should be regulated by constitutional laws, these social relationships may not be governed by means of lower-ranking legal acts – laws and substatutory legal acts. However, this does not mean that, under the Constitution, the Seimas may not adopt laws designed for implementing constitutional laws, or that substatutory legal acts may not specify in detail the general rules laid down in constitutional laws.

In this context, it should be noted that Paragraph 3 of Article 69 of the Constitution does not stipulate when the Seimas must adopt the constitutional laws included in the list of constitutional laws.

As mentioned before, under the Constitution, constitutional laws are those laws that are included in the list of constitutional laws and are adopted in accordance with the procedure laid down in Paragraph 3 of Article 69 of the Constitution. Therefore, under the Constitution, the mere fact that a constitutional law, which must regulate certain social relationships governed until then by means of an ordinary law, is included in the list of constitutional laws does not mean that the ordinary law governing those social relationships naturally becomes a constitutional law as a result of the inclusion of the constitutional law that will regulate those relationships in the list of constitutional laws. Thus, under the Constitution, upon the adoption of the constitutional law establishing the list of constitutional laws, the Seimas has the duty to adopt, in accordance with the procedure laid down in Paragraph 3 of Article 69 of the Constitution, inter alia, the constitutional laws included in this list, which would regulate social relationships governed by means of ordinary laws prior to the adoption of the constitutional law establishing the list of constitutional laws.

It should also be noted that, under the Constitution, as long as a constitutional law included in the list of constitutional laws is not adopted in accordance with the procedure laid down in Paragraph 3 of Article 69 of the Constitution, the ordinary law governing those social relationships is in force; such an ordinary law may be amended by the Seimas in accordance with the procedure laid down in Paragraph 2 of Article 69 of the Constitution. However, such discretion of the Seimas is bound by the above-mentioned obligation of the Seimas, stemming from Paragraph 3 of Article 69 of the Constitution, interpreted in the context of the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law, upon the adoption of the constitutional law establishing the list of constitutional laws, also to adopt the constitutional laws specified therein, i.e. to regulate the respective social relationships by means of constitutional laws. In view of this ... under the Constitution, in cases where the Seimas decides to establish a new overall legal regulation of the respective social relationships that are governed by an ordinary law but, according to the constitutional law establishing the list of constitutional laws, must be regulated by means of a constitutional law, such a new overall legal regulation, under Paragraph 3 of Article 69 of the Constitution, must be established by means of a constitutional law. If Paragraph 3 of Article 69 of the Constitution were interpreted differently, i.e. that, purportedly, the Seimas has unlimited discretion to adopt the constitutional laws included in the list of constitutional laws at any time, the list of constitutional laws, in the same way as the above-mentioned obligation of the Seimas, stemming from Paragraph 3 of Article 69 of the Constitution, interpreted in the context of the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law, to adopt the constitutional laws specified in this constitutional law, would be meaningless.

The procedure for the adoption and amendment of constitutional laws

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 30 July 2020

In the jurisprudence of the Constitutional Court, it is noted that constitutional laws differ from other laws primarily in terms of the procedure for their adoption and amendment (ruling of 2 April 2001); the procedure for adopting and amending constitutional laws is related to their special place in the legal system and the specific relations between the norms of constitutional laws and constitutional norms (ruling of 1 December 1994).

... the subjects that are specified in Article 68 of the Constitution and have the right of the legislative initiative to adopt laws – members of the Seimas, the President of the Republic, the Government, and 50 000 citizens – have the right of the legislative initiative to adopt constitutional laws. However ... under Paragraph 3 of Article 69 of the Constitution, constitutional laws, except for the constitutional law establishing the list of constitutional laws, are adopted if more than half of all the members of the Seimas vote in favour thereof; the constitutional law establishing the list of constitutional laws is adopted by a 3/5 majority vote of the members of the Seimas. Thus, the majority vote required under Paragraph 3 of Article 69 of the Constitution to adopt constitutional laws is higher than the majority vote – of the members of the Seimas participating in the sitting of the Seimas – required under Paragraph 2 of Article 69 of the Constitution to adopt ordinary laws.

Constitutional laws may not be altered or repealed by ordinary laws – under the Constitution, they may be altered only by means of constitutional laws (rulings of 2 April 2001 and 14 March 2006). Under Paragraph 3 of Article 69 of the Constitution, constitutional laws, inter alia, the constitutional law establishing the list of constitutional laws, are altered by not less than a 3/5 majority vote of all the members of the Seimas. Thus, the majority vote required under Paragraph 3 of Article 69 of the Constitution to alter constitutional laws is higher than the majority vote – of the members of the Seimas participating in the sitting of the Seimas – required under Paragraph 2 of Article 69 of the Constitution to amend ordinary laws.

Paragraph 1 of Article 71 of the Constitution prescribes that, within ten days of receiving a law adopted by the Seimas, the President of the Republic either signs and officially promulgates the law or, upon reasonable grounds, refers it back to the Seimas for reconsideration. ... under Paragraph 1 of Article 71 of the Constitution, the President of the Republic has the right of a delaying veto, inter alia, over constitutional laws. Paragraph 2 of Article 72 of the Constitution prescribes that “The law reconsidered by the Seimas shall be deemed adopted if the amendments and supplements submitted by the President of the Republic are adopted, or if more than 1/2 of all the Members of the Seimas vote for the law, or, in cases where such a law is a constitutional law, if not less than 3/5 of all the Members of the Seimas vote in favour thereof”.

Thus, under Paragraph 2 of Article 72 of the Constitution, the Seimas may overturn a veto of the President of the Republic, inter alia, over constitutional laws. It should be noted that this paragraph provides for a higher majority vote of the members of the Seimas (not less than 3/5 of all the members of the Seimas) required to overturn a veto of the President of the Republic over constitutional laws, compared to the majority vote required to overturn a veto of the President of the Republic over ordinary laws, which are adopted and amended in accordance with the procedure laid down in Paragraph 2 of Article 69 of the Constitution. It should also be noted that such a higher majority vote of the members of the Seimas (not less than 3/5 of all the members of the Seimas) is necessary in order to overturn a veto of the President of the Republic in connection to both constitutional laws adopted by the Seimas in accordance with the procedure laid down in Paragraph 3 of Article 69 of the Constitution and constitutional laws amended by the Seimas in accordance with the procedure laid down in Paragraph 3 of Article 69 of the Constitution.

Constitutional laws, with the exception of the constitutional law establishing the list of constitutional laws, may be adopted and amended by referendum

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 30 July 2020

The Constitutional Court has held that, under the Constitution, the list of constitutional laws is established only by the Seimas (rulings of 1 December 1994 and 11 July 2014); the list of constitutional laws may not be adopted by referendum (ruling of 11 July 2014). However, this does not mean that the constitutional laws included in the list of constitutional laws in accordance with the Constitution, as well as the constitutional laws directly indicated in the Constitution, may not be adopted or amended by referendum. In other words, the above-mentioned requirement that constitutional laws, except the constitutional law establishing the list of constitutional laws, must be adopted and amended in accordance with the procedure established in Paragraph 3 of Article 69 of the Constitution, cannot be made absolute.

In this context, it should be noted that, under Paragraph 4 of Article 69 of the Constitution, the provisions of laws of the Republic of Lithuania may also be adopted by referendum. Interpreting this provision of the Constitution, the Constitutional Court has noted that the concept “the provisions of laws” used in the Constitution can be understood both as an integral law and as separate norms thereof (ruling of 22 July 1994). The Constitutional Court has held in its jurisprudence more than once that the Constitution may not be interpreted only literally, by applying the sole linguistic (verbal) method (inter alia, the rulings of 25 May 2004, 24 September 2009, and 27 February 2012); if the literal (linguistic, verbal) interpretation of the Constitution is made absolute, then, at the same time, the content of the overall constitutional legal regulation is downgraded and, if not all, then at least some values consolidated, defended, and protected by the Constitution are ignored, as well as the preconditions can be created for undermining the aspirations consolidated by the People in the Constitution, adopted by referendum (rulings of 6 June 2006 and 27 February 2012).

In view of this, it should be noted that, under Paragraph 4 of Article 69 of the Constitution, not only ordinary laws or provisions thereof, but also the constitutional laws included in the list of constitutional laws or directly specified in the Constitution, may be adopted, as well as their provisions may be amended, by referendum. As mentioned before, constitutional laws should govern the constitutionally important areas of social relationships and particularly significant issues in the life of the state and society. Thus, a different interpretation of the Constitution, according to which, purportedly, the adoption and amendment of all constitutional laws is the exclusive competence of the Seimas, would be incompatible, inter alia, with: Paragraph 1 of Article 9 of the Constitution, under which the most significant issues concerning the life of the State and the People are decided by referendum; Article 4 of the Constitution, under which the People execute supreme sovereign power, inter alia, directly; and Paragraph 1 of Article 33 of the Constitution, under which citizens have the right to participate in the governance of their state, inter alia, directly; thus, the said different interpretation of the Constitution would also be incompatible with the above-mentioned universal and unquestionable values on which the Constitution is based: such as the sovereignty belonging to the People, democracy, and the recognition of and respect for human rights and freedoms.

It should also be noted that constitutional laws adopted by referendum and constitutional laws amending those laws should be subject to the procedure for signing and official promulgation laid down in Paragraphs 3 and 4 of Article 71 of the Constitution: a constitutional law adopted by referendum must, within 5 days, be signed and officially promulgated by the President of the Republic; if the President of the Republic does not sign and promulgate such a law within the specified period, such a law comes into force after it is signed and officially promulgated by the Speaker of the Seimas.

The legal force of constitutional laws adopted by referendum

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 30 July 2020

It should be mentioned that, as held by the Constitutional Court, under the Constitution, there may not be and there is no confrontation between the supreme sovereign power executed by the People directly and the supreme sovereign power executed by the People through their democratically elected representatives – members of the Seimas; the direct (through a referendum) and indirect (through the representation of the People – the Seimas) forms of the execution of supreme sovereign power by the People may not be opposed against each other (ruling of 11 July 2014).

In view of this, it should be noted that constitutional laws adopted by referendum have the same legal force as constitutional laws adopted by the Seimas in accordance with the procedure laid down in Paragraph 3 of Article 69 of the Constitution; the Seimas has the powers, in accordance with the procedure laid down in Paragraph 3 of Article 69 of the Constitution, i.e. by not less than a 3/5 majority vote of all the members of the Seimas, to amend constitutional laws adopted by referendum.

1.8.4.5. Laws

The supremacy of laws over substatutory acts

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 5 March 2004

A law passed by the Seimas is a primary legal act adopted in accordance with the procedure laid down in the Constitution and the Statute of the Seimas (rulings of 19 January 1994, 26 October 1995, and 29 May 1997). A law can be amended or its validity can be nullified only by the adoption of another law or by the Constitutional Court when it declares the law unconstitutional. Laws must not be in conflict with the Constitution and constitutional laws.

All other legal acts are substatutory legal acts. They are acts of the application of laws and may not replace laws, be in conflict with laws, or amend the content of the norms of laws, and they may not establish any legal regulation that would compete with that established in laws.

In its ruling of 26 October 1995, the Constitutional Court held that laws establish rules of a general character, while substatutory legal acts may particularise these rules and regulate the procedure for their implementation.

It is not allowed to interpret the content of laws on the basis of the interpretation of their content provided in substatutory legal acts

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 12 December 2005

... the content of the legal regulation established in laws may not be interpreted on the basis of the interpretation of their content provided by the Government or other institutions when they, within their competence, pass substatutory legal acts in order to implement the provisions of particular laws.

The supremacy of laws over substatutory acts; there is no delegated legislation in Lithuania

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 28 September 2011

Substatutory acts passed by the Seimas may not regulate those [social] relationships that, under the Constitution, must be regulated by means of a law (ruling of 13 December 2004). The Seimas, while resolving the issues that are the subject matter of regulation by means of laws, may not choose the form of a resolution, because a resolution is a lower-ranking legal act (ruling of 19 January 1994). Substatutory legal acts may not replace laws and may not create any norms of a general character that would compete with the norms established in laws, because the supremacy of laws over substatutory acts, which is consolidated in the Constitution, would thus be violated (rulings of 21 August 2002 and 13 December 2004).

The Constitutional Court has held that the legislature may define the content of the notions used in laws; however, the requirement to pay regard to the hierarchy of legal acts, which stems from the Constitution, inter alia, from the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law, implies that the content of the notions used in laws may be defined (inter alia, interpreted) only by means of a law and not by means of a lower-ranking legal act (ruling of 13 November 2006).

[...]

The Constitutional Court has held that there is no delegated legislation in Lithuania (rulings of 26 October 1995, 19 December 1996, 3 June 1999, 5 March 2004, and 13 December 2004); therefore, the Seimas – the legislature – may not assign the Government or other institutions to regulate, by means of substatutory legal acts, those [social] relationships that, under the Constitution, must be regulated by means of laws, and the Government may not accept any such powers. The said relationships may not be regulated by means of substatutory legal acts passed by the Seimas, either (ruling of 13 December 2004). It is clear from the competence of the Seimas, which is established in Article 67 of the Constitution, as well as from the principle of the separation of powers, which is consolidated in Article 5 of the Constitution, that the Seimas may not give the Government any direct instructions of a normative character otherwise than under the legislative procedure for the adoption of laws (ruling of 19 January 1994).

In its ruling of 13 December 2004, the Constitutional Court held that failure to follow the form of a legal act where the Constitution requires that certain relationships be regulated by means of a law, but they are regulated by means of a substatutory act (irrespective of whether such relationships are, from any aspect, additionally regulated in a law the legal regulation established in which is challenged by the legal regulation laid down in a substatutory act, or irrespective of the fact that no law regulates such relationships at all), may provide the sufficient grounds for declaring such a substatutory legal act unconstitutional.

The most important social relationships must be regulated by means of laws

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 29 September 2015

The jurisprudence of the Constitutional Court follows the principled position that the most important social relationships must be regulated by means of laws. The Constitutional Court has also noted on more than one occasion that, under the Constitution, a legal regulation related to defining the content of human rights and freedoms or consolidating the guarantees of their implementation may be established only by means of a law (rulings of 26 October 1995, 19 December 1996, 13 December 2004, 5 May 2007, and 28 September 2011). Under no circumstances is it allowed to establish any conditions for the rise of the right of a person or to limit the scope of his/her right by means of substatutory legal acts (ruling of 5 May 2007).

1.8.4.6. Substatutory legal acts

Substatutory legal acts; a government resolution is a substatutory legal act

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 21 August 2002

In its rulings, the Constitutional Court has held on more than one occasion that the norms of a law are implemented by means of a substatutory legal act; however, such an act may not replace the law itself and create new general legal norms the legal force of which would compete with the norms of the law.

Otherwise, the supremacy of laws over substatutory acts, which is established in the Constitution, would be violated.

A government resolution is a substatutory legal act. It may not contain any legal norms competing with those established in a law.

A government resolution must be in compliance with the norms of a law

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 29 October 2003

In its rulings, the Constitutional Court has held on more than one occasion that, in cases where a government resolution that contains norms conflicting with a law is adopted before the said law is passed, such a government resolution must be brought in line with the norms of the law adopted later, or it must be declared to be no longer valid.

The acts of the President of the Republic are substatutory legal acts

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 30 December 2003

Legal acts passed by the President of the Republic are substatutory legal acts; therefore, in the same way as all other substatutory legal acts, they may not be in conflict with the Constitution, constitutional laws, and laws.

The resolutions of the Seimas on the implementation of laws are substatutory legal acts

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 5 March 2004

The Seimas also has the powers to pass resolutions, specified in Item 2 of Article 94 of the Constitution, on the implementation of laws. In these resolutions, the assignments for other state institutions to take legal and/or organisational action to ensure the implementation of laws may be formulated. However, it needs to be stressed that the resolutions of the Seimas on the implementation of laws are substatutory legal acts; they may not provide for any legal regulation that would compete with that established in laws. Otherwise, they would not meet the constitutional concept that the resolutions of the Seimas on the implementation of laws are substatutory legal acts.

Substatutory legal acts

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 5 May 2007

The Constitutional Court has held in its acts (inter alia, the rulings of 30 December 2003, 5 March 2004, 13 December 2004, and 7 February 2005) more than once that the principle of a state under the rule of law consolidated in the Constitution also implies the hierarchy of legal acts, inter alia, the fact that substatutory legal acts may not be in conflict with laws, constitutional laws, and the Constitution, that substatutory legal acts must be adopted on the basis of laws, that a substatutory legal act is an act of the application of the norms of a law irrespective of whether that act has one-off (ad hoc) application or permanent validity.

At the same time, it needs to be noted that, in certain cases – directly provided for in the Constitution, if particular relationships are not regulated by means of laws (which detail and specify the constitutional legal regulation), the substatutory legal acts whereby particular institutions implement their respective powers, expressis verbis established and clearly defined in the Constitution, must be passed by directly invoking the Constitution.

Substatutory legal acts

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 9 October 2014

The Constitutional Court has held on more than one occasion that the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law implies the hierarchy of all legal acts and does not permit that substatutory legal acts regulate the relationships that may be regulated only by means of a law, nor does it permit that substatutory legal acts establish any such a legal regulation that would compete with that established in a law or that such a legal regulation would not be based on laws (rulings of 14 March 2006, 22 June 2009, 6 November 2013, and 11 December 2013). Substatutory legal acts may not replace a law and may not create any such norms of a general character that would compete with the norms of a law, because the supremacy of laws over substatutory acts, which is consolidated in the Constitution, would thus be violated (rulings of 21 August 2002, 13 December 2004, and 28 September 2011). ...

The Constitutional Court has also held in its acts that laws establish rules of a general character, while substatutory legal acts may particularise them and regulate the procedure for their implementation (rulings of 26 October 1995, 5 March 2004, and 9 May 2014).

2. THE CONSTITUTIONAL STATUS OF PERSONS

2.1. GENERAL PROVISIONS

2.1.1. The concept and protection of innate human rights and freedoms

The innate nature of human rights and freedoms (Article 18 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 9 December 1998

Article 18 of the Constitution prescribes: "Human rights and freedoms shall be innate." The innate nature of human rights means that they are inseparable from an individual and are linked with neither a territory nor a nation. An individual possesses his/her innate rights regardless of whether they are consolidated in legal acts of the state or not. Every individual has these rights; this means that the best and worst people have them.

[...]

... Innate human rights are the innate possibilities of an individual that ensure his/her human dignity in the spheres of social life.

The duty of the state to ensure the protection of human rights and freedoms (Article 18 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 30 June 2000

Article 18 of the Constitution states: "Human rights and freedoms shall be innate."

Under the Constitution, the state is obligated to respect human rights and freedoms and, by making use of legal, material, or organisational means, to guarantee their protection from any unlawful attempt or limitation.

State institutions and their officials must protect and defend human rights and freedoms; in particular, it is important that, while fulfilling the functions entrusted to them, they themselves would not violate human rights and freedoms.

One of the main ways of protecting violated rights and freedoms is compensation for damage inflicted as a result of unlawful actions.

The principle of the recognition of the innate nature of human rights and freedoms (Article 18 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 29 December 2004

Article 18 of the Constitution provides that human rights and freedoms are innate.

The principle of the recognition of the innate nature of human rights and freedoms is consolidated in this article of the Constitution. At the same time, it should be noted that this article of the Constitution does not specify particular innate human rights and freedoms – they are consolidated in other articles (parts thereof) of the Constitution.

The principle of the recognition of the innate nature of human rights and freedoms, which is consolidated in the Constitution, means that an individual has the rights and freedoms that are inseparable from his/her person and may not be taken from him/her, as well as that an individual has them ipso facto.

In its 9 December 1998 ruling, the Constitutional Court stated: "The innate nature of human rights means that they are inseparable from an individual and are linked with neither a territory nor a nation. An individual possesses his/her innate rights regardless of whether they are consolidated in legal acts of the state or not. Every individual has these rights; this means that the best and worst people have them." The constitutional recognition of the innate nature of human rights and freedoms implies that it is not allowed to establish such a procedure for implementing the said rights and freedoms that would make their implementation dependent on decisions adopted by state institutions, officials, or other persons where such decisions are not based on law.

The principle of the recognition of the innate nature of human rights and freedoms is also revealed in various articles (parts thereof) of the Constitution, which consolidate certain human rights and freedoms. This principle is also part of the foundations of the constitutional order of the Republic of Lithuania as a democratic state under the rule of law: one of the major tasks of a democratic state under the rule of law is to defend and protect these rights and freedoms. The consolidation of human rights and freedoms in the Constitution implies the duty of the legislature and other law-making subjects, when adopting legal acts that regulate the relationships of an individual and the state, to follow the priority of human rights and freedoms, to establish sufficient measures of protecting and defending human rights and freedoms, never to violate these rights and freedoms, and not to allow others to violate them.

It should also be noted that it is impossible to make the interpretation that any human right or freedom that is consolidated in the Constitution is innate only due to the fact that it is consolidated in the Constitution. A violation of a certain human right or freedom consolidated in the Constitution in itself does not mean that the principle of the recognition of the innate nature of human rights and freedoms, consolidated in Article 18 of the Constitution, is violated.

The human rights and freedoms consolidated in the Constitution comprise a single and harmonious system. The Constitution consolidates such a concept of human rights and freedoms whereby the rights and freedoms of one person coexist with the rights and freedoms of other persons. ... when exercising his/her rights and freedoms, everyone must observe the Constitution and the laws of the Republic of Lithuania and must not restrict the rights and freedoms of other people (Article 28 of the Constitution). In its 13 February 1997 ruling, the Constitutional Court stated that conflicts often arise and sometimes even contradictions originate between the rights and freedoms of an individual, on the one hand, and the interests of society, on the other hand, that such contradictions in a democratic state are solved by harmonising different interests and by seeking not to disturb their balance, and that one of the ways to harmonise interests is the limitation of the implementation of the rights and freedoms of an individual.

The principle of the recognition of the innate nature of human rights and freedoms does not deny the fact that the implementation of human rights and freedoms may be subject to limitation. ... according to the Constitution, the implementation of constitutional human rights and freedoms may be subject to limitation if the following conditions are observed: the limitations are established by means of a law; the limitations are necessary in a democratic society in order to protect the rights and freedoms of other persons, the values consolidated in the Constitution, and the constitutionally important objectives; the limitations do not deny the nature and essence of rights and freedoms; and the constitutional principle of proportionality is followed.

The duty of the state to ensure the protection and defence of human rights and freedoms

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 19 August 2006

The Constitution is an anti-majoritarian act; it protects the individual. The Constitutional Court has held that the state is constitutionally obliged to ensure, by making use of legal, material, or organisational means, the protection of human rights and freedoms from any unlawful attempt or limitation and to establish sufficient means for the defence and protection of human rights and freedoms (rulings of 30 June 2000 and 29 December 2004).

Under the Constitution, the state must not only ensure the protection of human rights and freedoms from unlawful attempts made by other persons, but also must not, in any manner, permit any unlawful infringements on or violation of human rights and freedoms by state institutions or officials themselves (rulings of 30 June 2000, 13 December 2004, and 29 December 2004). In this context, it should be emphasised that people may reasonably consider that state institutions and officials express or execute the will of the state (both, when they execute the functions entrusted to them and when they do not implement any of their powers). State institutions and officials may, in no circumstances, act ultra vires, nor may they violate human rights and freedoms by unlawful actions. Otherwise, the trust of people in state power, laws, and law would be ruined and legal nihilism would flourish. Tolerance towards the unlawful actions of state institutions and officials by which human rights and freedoms are violated and failure to prevent them would lead to a huge social disbalance; the fundamental balance would be violated where an individual virtually has no means and possibilities of resisting the arbitrariness of the powerful mechanism – the state. When an individual is left with no effective institutionalised help, he/she is suppressed by the whole power of the state mechanism.

The principle of the recognition of the innate nature of human rights and freedoms

The Constitutional Court's decision of 19 November 2012

... one of the constitutional foundations of the Republic of Lithuania, as a democratic state under the rule of law, is the principle of the recognition of the innate nature of human rights and freedoms (rulings of 29 December 2004 and 22 December 2010). This principle should also be regarded as a fundamental constitutional value that is inseparably related to the constitutional values – independence, democracy, and the republic – that constitute the foundation of the State of Lithuania as the constitutionally consolidated common good of all society; the innate nature of human rights and freedoms may not be denied, either.

2.1.2. The principle of the equality (of the rights) of persons

The principle of the equality of persons (Paragraph 1 of Article 29 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 18 April 1996

Paragraph 1 of Article 29 of the Constitution prescribes: “All persons shall be equal before the law, courts, and other state institutions and officials.”

The principle of the equality of all persons before the law is the basis of democratic society. The constitutional provision “all persons shall be equal before the law” requires that fundamental rights and freedoms for every person should, equally with others and with no exceptions, be consolidated in the legal system of the country. In this provision, the formal equality of all persons is proclaimed. In its ruling of 28 February 1996, the Constitutional Court held the following: “... As such, the constitutional principle of the equality of persons does not deny the possibility of establishing, by means of a law, a legal regulation that is differentiated with respect to certain categories of persons who are in different situations. This should also be applied not only to natural persons, but also to legal persons ...” ...

The provision “all persons shall be equal before courts” of the principle of the equality of all persons, which is consolidated in Paragraph 1 of Article 29 of the Constitution, is a constituent part of this principle. In a democratic state, a court is the main institutional guarantee of human rights and freedoms. Paragraph 1 of Article 30 of the Constitution prescribes: “A person whose constitutional rights or freedoms are violated shall have the right to apply to a court.” This is the principle of the priority and universality of constitutional judicial protection, the effectiveness of which is directly linked with the constitutional principle “all persons shall be equal before courts”.

The principle of the equality of persons (Paragraph 1 of Article 29 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 23 February 2000

Paragraph 1 of Article 29 of the Constitution provides that “All persons shall be equal before the law, courts, and other state institutions and officials”.

In its ruling of 28 February 1996, the Constitutional Court held that the constitutional principle of the equality of persons should be applied not only to natural persons, but also to legal persons.

The principle of the equality of persons

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 30 June 2000

... the constitutional principle of the equality of all persons before the law, courts, and other state institutions and officials obligates the state to defend the rights and freedoms of every person by equally effective means.

The principle of the equality of persons (Article 29 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 4 July 2003

Paragraph 1 of Article 29 of the Constitution consolidates the formal equality of all persons and Paragraph 2 of this article lays down the principle prohibiting the discrimination of persons and the granting of privileges. The constitutional principle of the equality of persons before the law means the innate right of an individual to be treated equally with others.

In its rulings, the Constitutional Court has held on more than one occasion that this principle should be followed in the course of both the adoption and application of laws. The said principle imposes the obligation to assess homogenous facts in the same manner and prohibits any arbitrary assessment of essentially the same facts in a different manner. It should also be noted that, on the other hand, the constitutional principle of the equality of persons before the law does not deny the possibility of establishing, by means of a law, a legal regulation that is differentiated with respect to certain categories of persons who are in different situations. The diversity of social life may determine the manner and content of the respective legal regulation.

[...]

The principle of the equality of all persons, which is consolidated in Article 29 of the Constitution, includes the prohibition of both discrimination and privileges. Discrimination is most often understood as a restriction on human rights on the basis of gender, race, nationality, language, origin, social status, religion, convictions, opinions, or other indications. However, a differentiated legal regulation where it is applied to certain groups of persons that are characterised by the same features and if, in this way, it pursues positive and socially meaningful goals is not regarded as discrimination or privileges. It was noted in the Constitutional Court's conclusion of 24 January 1995 that the so-called "positive discrimination" may not be interpreted as the granting of privileges. Special requirements or certain conditions are not categorised as discriminative limitations, either, if their establishment is related to the particularities of the regulated relationships.

The principle of the equality of persons (Article 29 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 30 December 2003

Article 29 of the Constitution consolidates the principle of the equality of all persons before the law, courts, and other state institutions and officials. In its rulings, the Constitutional Court has held on more than one occasion that this is the principle of the formal equality of persons. When interpreting the content of Article 29 of the Constitution, the Constitutional Court has held more than once in its rulings that this principle must be followed in the course of the adoption and application of laws. This principle imposes the obligation to legally assess homogenous facts in the same manner and prohibits any arbitrary assessment of essentially the same facts in a different manner.

The principle of the equality of all persons also means that the subjects of a certain type of relationships – all persons (groups thereof) identified by the same features – must be subject to the same law or another legal act – the same measure, common and equal to all subjects of that category. The legal norms of substantive law and of procedural law must be applied in an equal manner.

The constitutional principle of the equality of all persons before the law would be violated if a certain group of persons addressed by a particular legal norm, compared with other addressees under the same norm, were treated differently, although between them there would be no differences of such a nature or scope that could objectively justify their uneven treatment (ruling of 20 November 1996).

The principle of the equality of persons (Article 29 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 13 December 2004

In interpreting the provisions of Article 29 of the Constitution, the Constitutional Court has held more than once that the constitutional principle of the equality of all persons, which must be followed both in adopting laws and applying them, as well as in administering justice, imposes the obligation to legally assess homogenous facts in the same manner and prohibits any arbitrary assessment of essentially the same facts in a different manner, also that the constitutional principle of the equality of all persons means the innate human right to be treated equally with others, that it consolidates the formal equality of all persons, and that it does not allow any discrimination of persons or granting them any privileges. In addition, the Constitutional Court has noted on more than one occasion that the constitutional principle of the equality of all persons does not deny a different (differentiated) legal regulation, established by means of a law, with respect to certain categories of persons who are in different situations; the diversity of social life may determine the manner and content of the respective legal regulation. The constitutional principle of the equality of persons does not deny the possibility of treating individuals in a different manner where account is taken of their status or situation (ruling of 30 December 2003). However, the constitutional principle of the equality of all persons before the law would be violated if a certain group of persons addressed by a particular legal norm, compared with other addressees under the same norm, were treated differently, although between them there would be no differences of such a nature or scope that could objectively justify their uneven treatment (rulings of 20 November 1996 and 30 December 2003).

The principle of the equality of persons in criminal procedure law and in criminal law

See 3. Legal responsibility, 3.2. Criminal proceedings, the ruling of 8 January 2009.

The connection of the principle of the equality of persons with other provisions of the Constitution

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 9 November 2010

The principle of the equality of persons, which is consolidated in Article 29 of the Constitution, should be interpreted inseparably from other provisions of the Constitution, inter alia, from the provisions consolidating the rights and freedoms of a person, as well as from the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law, which, as held by the Constitutional Court in its rulings more than once, is a universal principle on which the entire legal system of Lithuania and the Constitution itself are based.

It should be noted that the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law implies that the legislature and other law-making subjects are subject to various requirements: law-making subjects are allowed to pass legal acts only without exceeding their powers; when legally regulating certain social relationships, it is obligatory to pay regard to the requirements of natural justice, comprising, inter alia, the necessity to ensure the equality of persons before the law, courts, state institutions, or officials, etc. (rulings of 13 December 2004, 16 January 2006, and 22 March 2010).

The principle of the equality of persons

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 6 February 2012

The Constitutional Court has held on more than one occasion that the constitutional principle of the equality of persons should be followed both in the adoption and application of laws; the constitutional principle of the equality of persons before the law means the innate right of an individual to be treated equally with others and it imposes the obligation to assess homogenous facts in the same manner and prohibits any arbitrary assessment of essentially the same facts in a different manner.

The constitutional principle of the equality of the rights of persons would be violated if certain persons or groups of such persons were treated in a different manner even though between them there would be no differences of such a nature or scope that could objectively justify their uneven treatment. The Constitutional Court has held on more than one occasion in its acts that this principle does not in itself deny the possibility of establishing, by means of a law, an uneven and differentiated legal regulation with respect to certain persons that belong to different categories if there are differences between the said persons of such a nature that can objectively justify that differentiated regulation. However, as noted by the Constitutional Court, as such, a differentiated legal regulation where it is applied to certain groups of persons that are characterised by the same features and if it pursues positive and socially meaningful goals, or if the establishment of certain limitations or conditions is linked to the particularities of the regulated social relationships, should not be regarded as discriminatory. The Constitutional Court has emphasised on more than one occasion in its acts that, where a different legal regulation is assessed whether it is established reasonably, account must be taken of concrete legal circumstances; first of all, consideration must be given to differences in the legal situation of the subjects and objects to which a certain differentiated legal regulation is applied.

The connection of the principle of the equality of persons with the principle of a state under the rule of law (Article 29 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 30 April 2013

The Constitutional Court has ... held that the principle of the equality of the rights of persons, which is consolidated in the Constitution, inter alia, Article 29 thereof, is inseparable from the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law, which is a universal principle on which the entire Lithuanian legal system and the Constitution itself are based (inter alia, the rulings of 28 May 2010 and 15 February 2013). The Constitutional Court has also held that ... the content of the [constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law] reveals itself in various provisions of the Constitution, inter alia, Article 29 thereof, in which the principle of the equality of the rights of persons is consolidated. Any violation of the constitutional principle of the equality of the rights of persons is, at the same time, a violation of the constitutional imperatives of justice and harmonious society and, thus, also a violation of the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law (inter alia, the rulings of 6 February 2012, 14 December 2012, and 22 February 2013).

The Constitution does not protect and does not defend privileges

The Constitutional Court's ruling (no KT26-N13/2016) of 5 October 2016

As held by the Constitutional Court on more than one occasion, the Constitution does not protect and does not defend any such rights acquired by a person that are privileges in terms of their content; the defence and protection of privileges would mean the violation of the constitutional principles of the equality of the rights of persons and justice, as well as the imperative of harmonious society, consolidated in the Constitution, and, thus, also the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law (inter alia, the rulings of 13 December 2004 and 5 July 2007 and the decision of 2 July 2010).

The principle of the equality of persons (Article 29 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling (no KT28-N14/2016) of 27 October 2016

The Constitutional Court has held on more than one occasion that the constitutional principle of the equality of persons, which is consolidated in Article 29 of the Constitution, should be followed both in the adoption and application of laws; the constitutional principle of the equality of persons before the law means the right of an individual to be treated equally with others, it imposes the obligation to assess homogenous facts in the same manner and prohibits any arbitrary assessment of essentially the same facts in a different manner. The constitutional principle of the equality of the rights of persons would be violated if certain persons or groups of such persons were treated in a different manner even though between them there would be no differences of such a nature or scope that could objectively justify their uneven treatment. As such, a differentiated legal regulation where it is applied to certain groups of persons that are characterised by the same features and if it pursues positive and socially meaningful goals, or if the establishment of certain limitations or conditions is linked to the particularities of the regulated social relationships, should not be regarded as discriminatory. The Constitutional Court has noted on more than one occasion in its acts that, where a different legal regulation is assessed whether it is established reasonably, account must be taken of concrete legal circumstances; first of all, consideration must be given to differences in the legal situation of the subjects and objects to which a certain differentiated legal regulation is applied.

The constitutional principle of the equality of the rights of persons is inseparable from the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law, which integrates various values consolidated, protected, and defended under the Constitution.

The prohibition of discrimination – one of the elements of the constitutional protection of human dignity (Article 29 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's conclusion of 19 December 2017

The prohibition of discrimination against persons on the grounds of gender, race, nationality, language, origin, social status, belief, convictions, or views, which arises from Article 29 of the Constitution and consolidates the principle of the equality of the rights of persons, should also be considered an element of the constitutional protection of human dignity.

The Constitutional Court has noted that discrimination is most often understood as the restriction of the rights of an individual or as the granting of certain privileges based on one's gender, race, nationality, language, origin, social status, belief, convictions, or views (ruling of 11 November 1998). Paragraph 2 of Article 29 of the Constitution is a derivative of Paragraph 1 of the same article, because Paragraph 2 of Article 29 of the Constitution does not allow violations of the equality of rights, by stipulating that "Human rights may not be restricted; no one may be granted any privileges on the grounds of gender, race, nationality, language, origin, social status, belief, convictions, or views" (conclusion of 24 January 1995).

... dignity is an inalienable characteristic of a human being as the greatest social value. All people by nature should be deemed equal in terms of their dignity and rights. Thus, discrimination prohibited under Article 29 of the Constitution in cases where human rights are restricted on the grounds of gender, race, nationality, language, origin, social status, belief, convictions, or views also degrades the dignity of the discriminated individual.

Harassment as one of the forms of discrimination

The Constitutional Court's conclusion of 19 December 2017

... one of the forms of discrimination (including the degrading of human dignity), prohibited under Article 29 of the Constitution, is harassment, which is understood as offensive, unacceptable, or unwanted conduct that has the purpose or effect of violating the dignity of a person, or creating a hostile, intimidating, humiliating, or offensive environment for a person on the grounds of gender, race, nationality, language, origin, social status, belief, convictions, or views, as well as other attributes such as disability, age, or sexual orientation. It should be noted that harassment is also inevitably an infringement on the physical or mental inviolability of a person, inter alia, it disturbs the physical, mental, or spiritual state of the person, restricts the expression of his/her freedom of physical activity, as well as intellectual and creative freedoms and, thus, also the expression of his/her free personality, and can make the relationships of the person with other persons more complicated. Harassment can lead to long-term or even permanent consequences that adversely affect the private and social life of the person.

In view of this, it should be held that harassment violates the human rights to the protection of dignity and to the inviolability of the human person and private life, as well as the right of non-discrimination, which are protected under Paragraphs 1, 2, and 3 of Article 21, Paragraphs 1 and 4 of Article 22, and Article 29 of the Constitution.

[...]

... in order to identify the facts of harassment, it is not necessary that a harassed person should clearly and categorically oppose such conduct where it is obvious that this person found such conduct unacceptable and objectively offensive; in assessing whether certain conduct should be considered harassment, including harassment based on gender (inter alia, sexual harassment), consideration should be given to the fact how the harassed person perceived such conduct (inter alia, it is not necessary to establish that an individual who possibly committed harassment did so with the purpose of degrading the dignity of the person or with the purpose of creating an intimidating, hostile, humiliating, or offensive environment for him/her).

It should also be noted that, in the light of the said nature and consequences of harassment, inter alia, harassment based on gender and sexual harassment, and in view of the fact that, under Paragraph 4 of Article 22 of the Constitution, inter alia, courts protect everyone from arbitrary or unlawful interference with his/her private and family life, as well as from infringement on his/her honour and dignity, in order to deny the facts of the committed harassment, the mere denial of them by a person who has possibly committed harassment is not sufficient, but it is obligatory to take into account all other circumstances that are significant for identifying the committed harassment.

The principle of the equality of the rights of persons and the prohibition of discrimination; the restriction of the rights of a person on the grounds of gender identity and/or sexual orientation as one of the forms of discrimination (Article 29 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 11 January 2019

Article 29 of the Constitution consolidates the principle of the equality of the rights of persons, which prohibits discrimination against anyone on the grounds of gender, race, nationality, language, origin, social status, belief, convictions, or views; discrimination prohibited under Article 29 of the Constitution in cases where human rights are restricted on the grounds of gender, race, nationality, language, origin, social status, belief, convictions, or views also degrades the dignity of the discriminated individual (conclusion of 19 December 2017).

The Constitutional Court has held that discrimination is most often understood as the restriction of the rights of an individual based on gender, race, nationality, language, origin, social status, belief, convictions, views, or other characteristics (rulings of 4 July 2003, 17 November 2003, and 3 December 2003). Paragraph 2 of Article 29 of the Constitution is a derivative of Paragraph 1 of the same article, as it does not allow the violations of the equality of the rights of persons – the general rule, set out in Paragraph 1 of Article 29 of the Constitution: “All persons shall be equal before the law, courts, and other state institutions and officials” (conclusion of 24 January 1995).

In view of this, the content of the constitutional principle of the equality of the rights of persons may be revealed only by interpreting Paragraphs 1 and 2 of Article 29 of the Constitution in conjunction with each other. Therefore, Paragraph 2 of Article 29 of the Constitution may not be understood as consolidating an exhaustive list of the grounds of non-discrimination; otherwise, the preconditions would be created for denying the equality of all persons before the law, courts, and other state institutions, i.e. the very essence of the constitutional principle of the equality of the rights of persons, as guaranteed under Paragraph 1 of Article 29 of the Constitution.

... one of the forms of discrimination, prohibited under Article 29 of the Constitution, is the restriction of the rights of a person on the grounds of gender identity and/or sexual orientation; such restriction should also be regarded as degrading human dignity.

... only a state that has respect for the dignity of every human being can be considered to be truly democratic. It needs to be emphasised that, as noted by the Constitutional Court, the Constitution is an anti-majoritarian act, which protects the individual (ruling of 19 August 2006).

In view of this ... it should be noted that, in a democratic state under the rule of law, the attitudes or stereotypes prevailing in a certain period of time among the majority of the members of society may not, based on the constitutionally important objectives, inter alia, ensuring public order, serve as the constitutionally justifiable grounds for discriminating against persons solely on the basis of their gender identity and/or sexual orientation, inter alia, for limiting the right, ensured under Paragraphs 1 and 4 of Article 22 of the Constitution, to the protection of private and family life, among other things, the protection of relationships with other family members.

The restriction of the rights of a person on the basis of age as one of the grounds of discrimination (Article 29 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 10 February 2020

... one of the grounds of discrimination, prohibited under Article 29 of the Constitution, is the restriction of the rights of a person on the basis of age.

2.1.3. Limitations on the rights and freedoms of persons

Conditions for limiting human rights and freedoms

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 6 May 1997

The Constitutional Court ... in its ruling of 13 February 1997, held that limitations on human rights and freedoms are possible, i.e. they are regarded as justifiable if they meet two conditions: (1) they are legitimate and (2) they are indispensable in a democratic society. The requirement of legitimacy indicates that the limitations must be set only by means of a law, which is published; the norms of such a law must be sufficiently clearly formulated. When the limits of the implementation of rights are defined by means of laws, it is necessary to take account of the purpose and meaning of a particular right (or freedom) and the possibilities and conditions for its limitation established in the Constitution. Regarding the question whether a concrete limitation is indispensable in a democratic society, firstly, the aims and purpose of the limitation must be ascertained and, secondly, it is necessary to determine whether the limitation measures are proportionate to the legitimate objective sought.

Conditions for limiting human rights and freedoms

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 29 December 2004

Article 28 of the Constitution provides that, while implementing his/her rights and exercising his/her freedoms, everyone must observe the Constitution and laws of the Republic of Lithuania and must not restrict the rights and freedoms of other people. The constitutional consolidation of human rights and freedoms does not mean that their implementation may not be subject to limitation. In its rulings, the Constitutional Court has held more than once that, according to the Constitution, it is allowed to limit the implementation of human rights and freedoms if the following conditions are followed: the limitations are established by means of a law; the limitations are necessary in a democratic society in order to protect the rights and freedoms of other persons, the values consolidated in the Constitution, and the constitutionally important objectives; the limitations do not deny the nature and essence of rights and freedoms; and the constitutional principle of proportionality is observed.

... when deciding whether a law limiting the implementation of the rights and freedoms of a person infringes the constitutional principle of proportionality as one of the elements of the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law, it is necessary to assess whether the measures established in the law are in compliance with the legitimate objectives important to society, whether these measures are necessary in order to reach the said objectives, and whether these measures restrict the rights and freedoms of a person clearly more than necessary in order to reach the said objectives.

[...]

... in its ruling of 13 February 1997, the Constitutional Court stated that conflicts often arise and sometimes even contradictions originate between the rights and freedoms of an individual, on the one hand, and the interests of society, on the other hand, that such contradictions in a democratic state are solved by harmonising different interests and seeking not to disturb their balance, and that one of the ways to harmonise interests is the limitation of the implementation of human rights and freedoms.

The principle of the recognition of the innate nature of human rights and freedoms does not deny that the implementation of human rights and freedoms may be subject to limitation.

A limitation on human rights may not violate the essence of such rights

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 5 March 2013

... the jurisprudence of the Constitutional Court takes the position that, under the Constitution, a limitation on human rights may not violate the essence of such rights; if a right is limited to the extent that its implementation becomes impossible, if a right is restricted to the extent that reasonable limits are exceeded, or if the legal protection of a right is not be ensured, this constitutes grounds for asserting that the very essence of such a right is violated, which would be tantamount to denying the said right (rulings of 18 April 1996 and 23 February 2000).

Individualising limitations on human rights and freedoms

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 14 April 2014

The requirement, while complying with the constitutional principle of proportionality, not to limit the rights and freedoms of a person more than necessary in order to reach the legitimate objectives important to society, inter alia, implies the requirement for the legislature to establish a legal regulation that would create the preconditions for the sufficient individualisation of limitations on the rights and freedoms of a person: a legal regulation limiting the rights and freedoms of a person, as provided for in a law, must be such that would create the preconditions for assessing, to the extent possible, an individual position of each person and, in view of all important circumstances, for individualising accordingly the specific measures that are applicable to and limit the rights of that person (ruling of 7 July 2011).

The limitation of human rights and freedoms acquired under the law

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 8 November 2019

In its rulings, the Constitutional Court has also held on more than one occasion that, under the Constitution, the rights and freedoms of a person may be subject to limitation if the following conditions are observed: the limitations are established by means of a law; the limitations are necessary in a democratic society in order to protect the rights and freedoms of other persons, the values consolidated in the Constitution, and the constitutionally important objectives; the limitations do not deny the nature and essence of rights and freedoms; and the constitutional principle of proportionality is followed (inter alia, the rulings of 26 January 2004, 9 May 2014, and 18 April 2019). The constitutional principle of proportionality, as one of the elements of the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law, means that the measures provided for in legal acts must be in line with the legitimate objectives important to society and that these measures must be necessary in order to reach the said objectives and may not restrict the rights and freedoms of the person clearly more than necessary in order to reach the said objectives (inter alia, the rulings of 7 July 2011, 14 February 2014, and 17 February 2016).

It should be noted that these conditions in relation to limiting the exercise of the rights and freedoms of persons should be mutatis mutandis applied to limit the exercise of the rights of persons acquired under the law implementing the duty of the state, stemming from Paragraph 2 of Article 38 and Paragraph 3 of Article 39 of the Constitution, to defend the interests of children in cases where their parents (one of their parents) fail(s) to fulfil their constitutional duty to support their children.

The individualisation of limitations on the rights acquired under the law

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 5 June 2020

The principle of proportionality is an element of the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law; the principle of proportionality means that the measures provided for in legal acts must be in line with the legitimate objectives important to society and that these measures must be necessary in order to reach the said objectives and must not restrict the rights and freedoms of the person clearly more than necessary in order to reach the said objectives (inter alia, the rulings of 31 October 2012, 1 July 2013, and 25 June 2019). The requirement not to limit the rights and freedoms of a person more than necessary in order to reach the legitimate objectives important to society, inter alia, implies the requirement for the legislature to establish such a legal regulation that creates the preconditions for the sufficient individualisation of limitations on the rights and freedoms of a person: a legal regulation, provided for in a law, on limiting the rights and freedoms of a person must be such that creates the preconditions for assessing, to the extent possible, the individual position of each person and, in view of all important circumstances, for individualising accordingly the specific measures that are applicable to and limit the rights of that person (inter alia, the rulings of 7 July 2011, 17 February 2016, and 25 June 2019).

It should be noted that these provisions of the official constitutional doctrine, under which the legislature must establish such a legal regulation that creates the preconditions for the sufficient individualisation of limitations on the rights and freedoms of a person, are mutatis mutandis applicable to the right acquired under a law to acquire and possess certain weapons and ammunition.

2.1.4. The constitutional duties of persons

The duty of persons not to restrict the rights and freedoms of other people (Article 28 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 8 May 2000

Article 28 of the Constitution states: "While implementing his rights and exercising his freedoms, everyone must observe the Constitution and laws of the Republic of Lithuania and must not restrict the rights and freedoms of other people."

This article of the Constitution establishes one of essential principles, which means that the lawful conduct of an individual is not without limitations and absolutely free. An individual, as he/she is a social being, lives in society among similar individuals, who are equal in terms of their dignity and rights. Each individual has duties to society; it is only in society that his/her personality may develop freely and fully; and the principal duty among the said duties is not to restrict the rights and freedoms of other people.

The constitutional duty of parents to bring up their children to be honest people and faithful citizens and to support them until they reach the age of majority

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 13 June 2000

... The purposefulness, quality, and diversity of education must be guaranteed not only by the state and municipal establishments of teaching and education that are pointed out in the Constitution, but also by parents (legal guardians), who have the constitutional right to take care of the religious and moral education of their children (wards) in conformity with their own convictions, also the constitutional duty to bring them up to be honest people and faithful citizens, as well as to support them until they reach the age of majority. Implementing these constitutional rights and freedoms, parents (legal guardians) may not refuse to cover part of the expenses for the education of their children.

The constitutional duty to pay taxes

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 15 February 2013

The duty to pay taxes is a constitutional duty (inter alia, the rulings of 10 July 1997 and 24 January 2006). It needs to be noted that, when such a duty is established by means of a law, regard must be paid to the Constitution, inter alia, the constitutional principles of justice, proportionality, legal certainty, and the protection of the legitimate expectations of persons.

The constitutional duty of parents to support their children

See 2.4.2.4. The duty of the state to ensure the protection of family, motherhood, fatherhood, and childhood, the ruling of 8 November 2019.

2.1.5. The guarantees of the rights of persons

2.1.5.1. General provisions

The protection of the rights and freedoms of persons

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 11 May 1999

One of the essential features of a state under the rule of law is the protection of the rights and freedoms of individuals. ...

[...]

... When the protection of the rights of individuals is guaranteed, it is necessary to pay regard to the fundamental principles of a state under the rule of law; such principles require that jurisdictional and other law-applying institutions be impartial and independent, that they seek to establish the objective truth, and that they adopt their decisions only on the grounds of law. This is possible only if proceedings are public, the parties to proceedings have equal rights, and legal disputes, in particular those regarding the rights of a person, are decided by ensuring that a particular person has the right and possibility of defending those rights. In a state under the rule of law, the right of individuals to defend their rights is unquestionable. ...

... The recognition of the rights of an individual is a necessary element of the rule of law.

Persons have the right to defend their violated rights by invoking the Constitution*The Constitutional Court's ruling of 12 April 2001*

The Constitutional Court notes that a person must have the right, by invoking the Constitution, to defend his/her violated rights and that, according to the Constitution, the possibility of defending the violated rights must be real.

The implementation of a certain constitutional right may not result in the loss of the possibility of implementing another constitutional right*The Constitutional Court's ruling of 25 November 2002*

In its ruling of 30 June 2000, the Constitutional Court held that, under the Constitution, it is not allowed to establish any such a legal regulation by which a person, in implementing a certain constitutional right, would lose the possibility of implementing another constitutional right.

A legal regulation related to defining the content of human rights and freedoms and to the guarantees of their implementation must be established by means of a law*The Constitutional Court's ruling of 5 May 2007*

As already held more than once by the Constitutional Court in its acts, according to the Constitution, a legal regulation related to defining the content of human rights and freedoms and to consolidating the guarantees of their implementation may be established only by means of a law; however, in cases where the Constitution does not require that certain relationships related to human rights and their implementation (inter alia, the procedural relationships of the implementation of human rights, etc.) be regulated by means of a law, it is also possible to regulate them by means of substatutory legal acts. For example, in certain cases, the need that a legal regulation laid down in laws be specified and particularised by more details in substatutory legal acts can be determined by the necessity in lawmaking to rely on special knowledge or special (professional) competence (ruling of 7 February 2005). However, as the Constitutional Court held in its rulings on more than one occasion, under no circumstances is it allowed to establish any conditions for the rise of the right of a person or to limit the scope of his/her right by means of substatutory legal acts; substatutory legal acts may not establish such a legal regulation of the relationships linked with human rights and their implementation that would compete with the legal regulation established in laws.

Legal acts regulating the relationships linked with constitutional human rights may not bear any security classification markings*The Constitutional Court's ruling of 27 June 2007*

... the Constitutional Court has held that the legal normative acts regulating the relationships linked with constitutional human rights and freedoms and with their implementation may not bear any security classification markings (ruling of 5 April 2000).

2.1.5.2. The right to fair proceedings

The right to fair legal proceedings

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 10 November 2005

According to the Constitution, every person who is held legally liable has the right to fair legal proceedings. The Constitutional Court has stated that, according to the Constitution, a person who believes that his/her rights and freedoms are violated has the right to defend his/her rights and freedoms in a court (rulings of 2 July 2002, 4 March 2003, 17 August 2004, and 7 February 2005); the right of a person to an independent, impartial, and fair court, which would solve a dispute, may not be denied (ruling of 13 December 2004).

The right to the due process of law

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 9 July 2015

The Constitutional Court has held on more than one occasion that the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law, as well as the right of a person to apply to a court (Paragraph 1 of Article 30 of the Constitution), implies the right of a person to the due process of law, inter alia, to the due court process.

2.1.5.2.1. The right of access to a court

The principle of judicial protection (Paragraph 1 of Article 30 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 2 July 2002

The constitutional principle of judicial protection is consolidated in Paragraph 1 of Article 30 of the Constitution. In its ruling of 18 April 1996, the Constitutional Court held that, in a democratic state, a court is the main institutional guarantee of human rights and freedoms and that the constitutional principle of judicial protection is universal.

It should be noted that, under the Constitution, the legislature has the duty to establish such a legal regulation on the basis of which all disputes concerning the violation of the rights or freedoms of individuals could be resolved in a court. A prelitigation procedure for settling disputes may also be provided for. However, it is not permitted to establish any such a legal regulation that would deny the right of an individual who believes that his/her rights or freedoms are violated to defend his/her rights and freedoms in a court.

In its ruling of 8 May 2000, the Constitutional Court held that a person is guaranteed the protection of his/her violated rights in a court regardless of the legal status of this person and that the violated rights and legitimate interests of persons must be protected in a court irrespective of whether they are directly consolidated in the Constitution or not.

The right of access to a court (Paragraph 1 of Article 30 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 4 March 2003

The constitutional right to apply to a court means that, in a state under the rule of law, everyone is given the possibility of defending their rights in a court against unlawful actions of other persons and those of state institutions or officials. The provision of Paragraph 1 of Article 30 of the Constitution that a person whose constitutional rights or freedoms are violated has the right to apply to a court consolidates the constitutional right of a person to have an impartial arbiter of a dispute (rulings of 1 October 1997 and 12 July 2001). The provision of Paragraph 1 of Article 30 of the Constitution consolidates the constitutional principle of the priority and universality of judicial protection; the effectiveness of the said principle is directly related to the provision of Article 29 of the Constitution, whereby all persons are equal before the law (ruling of 18 April 1996). The right of a person to apply to a court may not be limited or denied; otherwise, a threat would arise to one of the most significant values of a state under the rule of law.

The right of access to a court (Paragraph 1 of Article 30 of the Constitution)The Constitutional Court's ruling of 17 August 2004

Paragraph 1 of Article 30 of the Constitution provides that a person whose constitutional rights or freedoms are violated has the right to apply to a court.

In a state under the rule of law, everyone is given the possibility of defending their rights in a court against unlawful actions of other persons and those of state institutions or officials (ruling of 1 October 1997). Under Paragraph 1 of Article 30 of the Constitution, a person must be guaranteed the right to an independent and impartial arbiter of a dispute, who would settle a legal dispute on its merits on the basis of the Constitution and laws; each person has this right; the defence of violated rights in a court is guaranteed to persons regardless of their legal status; the violated rights and legitimate interests of persons must be defended in a court irrespective of whether or not they are directly established in the Constitution; the rights of a person must be defended not formally, but in reality and effectively against unlawful actions of private persons, as well as against those of state institutions or their officials (rulings of 1 October 1997, 8 May 2000, and 12 July 2001). The guarantee of the judicial protection of the rights and freedoms of persons is a guarantee of a procedural nature and an essential element of the constitutional institution of the rights and freedoms of persons (ruling of 30 June 2000), as well as a necessary condition for administering justice and an inseparable element of the content of the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law.

The right to apply to a court is absolute (ruling of 30 June 2000). It is not permitted to limit or deny this right. Under the Constitution, the legislature has the duty to lay down such a legal regulation on the basis of which all disputes concerning the violation of the rights and freedoms of persons could be resolved in a court. A prelitigation procedure for settling disputes may also be provided for in legal acts. However, it is not permitted to establish any such a legal regulation that would deny the right of a person who believes that his/her rights or freedoms are violated to defend his/her rights or freedoms in a court (rulings of 2 July 2002 and 4 March 2003).

The right of access to a court (Paragraph 1 of Article 30 of the Constitution)The Constitutional Court's ruling of 16 January 2006

The provision of Paragraph 1 of Article 30 of the Constitution, according to which a person whose constitutional rights or freedoms are violated has the right to apply to a court, means that, in Lithuania, as in a state under the rule of law, everyone must be given the possibility of defending their rights in a court against unlawful actions of other persons, as well as against those of state institutions or officials (rulings of 1 October 1997, 4 March 2003, and 17 August 2004). A person is guaranteed the right to an independent and impartial arbiter of a dispute, who would settle a legal dispute on its merits on the basis of the Constitution and laws; each person who believes that his/her rights or freedoms are violated has the right to defend his/her rights and freedoms in a court – the implementation of the right to apply to a court is determined by the fact that the person himself/herself understands that his/her rights or freedoms are violated; the defence of violated rights in a court is guaranteed to persons regardless of their legal status; the violated rights, inter alia, acquired rights, and legitimate interests of a person must be defended in a court regardless of whether they are directly consolidated in the Constitution; the rights of a person must be defended not formally, but in reality and effectively against unlawful actions of private persons, as well as against those of state institutions or officials (rulings of 1 October 1997, 8 May 2000, 12 July 2001, 17 August 2004, and 7 February 2005). The constitutional right of a person to apply to a court, when interpreted in the context of other provisions of the Constitution, also implies that a law must establish such a legal regulation that would make it possible to file an appeal with a court of at least one higher instance against a final act adopted by a first instance general jurisdiction court or specialised court established under Paragraph 2 of Article 111 of the Constitution.

The guarantee of the judicial protection of the rights and freedoms of a person is a guarantee of a procedural character, an essential element of the constitutional institution of the rights and freedoms of the person and an inseparable element of the content of the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law (rulings of 30 June 2000, 17 August 2004, and 13 December 2004). The right of a person to apply to a court also implies his/her right to the due process of law (rulings of 13 December 2004 and 29 December 2004).

The right to apply to a court is absolute; the constitutional right of a person to apply to a court cannot be artificially restricted and the implementation of this right may not be unreasonably burdened (rulings of 30 June 2000, 17 August 2004, 13 December 2004, and 7 February 2005). Otherwise, it would have to be stated that this constitutional right is a mere declaration (rulings of 14 February 1994 and 22 February 2001).

Thus, under the Constitution, the legislature has the duty to lay down, by means of a law, such a legal regulation on the basis of which all disputes concerning the violation of the rights and freedoms and acquired rights of a person could be resolved in a court (rulings of 2 July 2002, 4 March 2003, 17 August 2004, 29 December 2004, and 7 February 2005). At the same time, it needs to be noted that the constitutional right of a person to apply to a court cannot be interpreted as meaning that, purportedly, the legislature may establish only such a legal regulation under which a person seeking to defend his/her rights and freedoms that, in his/her opinion, have been violated would be able in all situations to apply to a court only directly. In its acts, the Constitutional Court has held on more than one occasion that legal acts can also establish a prelitigation procedure for settling disputes; however, it is not permitted to establish any such a legal regulation that would deny the right of a person who believes that his/her rights or freedoms are violated to defend his/her rights or freedoms in a court (rulings of 2 July 2002, 4 March 2003, 17 August 2004, 29 December 2004, and 7 February 2005).

The right of access to a court in criminal proceedings (i.e. the right of persons who believe that their rights have been violated because of a criminal act to defend their rights in a court) (Paragraph 1 of Article 30 of the Constitution)

See 3. Legal responsibility, 3.2. Criminal proceedings, the ruling of 16 January 2006.

The right of a party to a case to request the court that considers the case to apply to the Constitutional Court

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 28 March 2006

Interpreting Paragraph 2 of Article 6 and Paragraph 1 of Article 30 of the Constitution in the context of Paragraph 1 of Article 109 and Article 110 of the Constitution, as well as in the context of the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law, it needs to be noted that the right of each person to defend his/her rights on the basis of the Constitution and the right of a person whose constitutional rights or freedoms are violated to apply to a court also imply that each party to a case under consideration by a court, when such a party has doubts regarding the compliance of a law or another legal act (part thereof) with the Constitution (with another higher-ranking legal act) where such a law or another legal act (part thereof) may be applied in that case and where an investigation into its compliance with the Constitution (with another higher-ranking legal act) falls within the jurisdiction of the Constitutional Court (i.e. when such a party doubts the compliance of a certain act (part thereof) of the Seimas, the President of the Republic, or the Government or an act (part thereof) adopted by referendum with the Constitution (with another higher-ranking legal act)), has the right to apply to the respective court of general jurisdiction or specialised court (established under Paragraph 2 of Article 111 of the Constitution) that is considering the case and request such a court to suspend the consideration of the case and to apply to the Constitutional Court with a petition to investigate and decide whether the legal act (part thereof) that was passed by the Seimas, the President of the Republic, or the Government or adopted by referendum and is applicable in the case is in conflict with a higher-ranking legal act, inter alia (and, first of all), with the Constitution.

The right to the judicial protection of the rights and freedoms of a person that are violated by the inaction of law-making subjects (non-adoption of law-making decisions)

The Constitutional Court's decision of 8 August 2006

The jurisprudence of the Constitutional Court has more than once pointed to the imperative, arising from the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law and other provisions of the Constitution (inter alia, from Paragraph 1 of Article 30 of the Constitution, whereby a person whose constitutional rights or freedoms are violated has the right to apply to a court), according to which a person who believes that his/her rights or freedoms are violated has the absolute right to access an independent and impartial court – an arbiter, which would settle a dispute. ... If the constitutional right of persons to apply to a court were not ensured, the universally recognised legal principle of ubi ius, ibi remedium – if there is a certain right (freedom), there must be a measure for its protection – would also be disregarded. Under the Constitution, a legal situation where it is impossible to defend a certain right or freedom of persons (also before a court), even though those persons believe that such a right or freedom has been violated, is impermissible; the Constitution does not tolerate such a legal situation.

Therefore, the fact that the subjects specified in the Constitution may not challenge before the Constitutional Court such failure of a law-making subject to act where the said law-making subject has not passed a legal act (acts) (parts thereof) to establish a new (different) legal regulation harmonised with a higher-ranking legal act, inter alia, with the Constitution, in order to replace a legal regulation ruled by the Constitutional Court to be in conflict with a higher-ranking legal act, inter alia, with the Constitution, and where the Constitutional Court has no powers to investigate failure to adopt such law-making decisions, does not mean that the aforementioned persons cannot altogether defend their rights and freedoms (also before a court) that have been violated because the aforementioned law-making decisions have not been adopted. The general legal principle of ubi ius, ibi remedium, the provision of Paragraph 1 of Article 6 of the Constitution, whereby the Constitution is a directly applicable act, the constitutional principle of responsible governance, the provision of Paragraph 3 of Article 5 of the Constitution, according to which state institutions serve the people, the provision of Article 18 of the Constitution, whereby human rights and freedoms are innate, as well as the constitutional right of a person who believes that his/her constitutional rights or freedoms are violated to apply to a court, imply not only that, in such cases, the rights, freedoms, legitimate interests, and legitimate expectations must and may be defended by means of interpreting the Constitution and by directly applying its provisions, but also that such protection must be guaranteed by courts.

The right of a party to a case to request the court that is considering the case to apply to the Constitutional Court or the respective administrative court

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 24 October 2007

... the right of each person to defend his/her rights on the basis of the Constitution and the right of a person whose constitutional rights or freedoms are violated to apply to a court also imply that each party to a case under consideration by a court, when such a party has doubts regarding the compliance of a law or another legal act (part thereof) with the Constitution (with another higher-ranking legal act) where such a law or another legal act (part thereof) may be applied in that case and where an investigation into its compliance with the Constitution (with another higher-ranking legal act) falls within the jurisdiction of the Constitutional Court (i.e. when such a party doubts the compliance of a certain act (part thereof) of the Seimas, the President of the Republic, or the Government or an act (part thereof) adopted by referendum with the Constitution (with another higher-ranking legal act)), has the right to apply to the respective court of general jurisdiction or specialised court (established under Paragraph 2 of Article 111 of the Constitution) that is considering the case and request such a court to suspend the consideration of the case and to apply to the Constitutional Court with a petition to investigate and decide whether the legal act (part thereof) that was passed by the Seimas, the President of the Republic, or the Government or adopted by referendum and is applicable in the case is in conflict with a higher-ranking legal act, inter alia (and, first of all), with the Constitution; this is also mutatis mutandis applicable to those legal situations where a certain party to a case under consideration by a court has doubts regarding the compliance of a legal act (part thereof) with the Constitution (with another higher-ranking legal act) where such a legal act (part thereof) may be applied in that case and where an investigation into its compliance with the Constitution

(with another higher-ranking legal act) does not fall within the jurisdiction of the Constitutional Court (i.e. the said act was not passed by the Seimas, the President of the Republic, or the Government or it was not adopted by referendum) – the said party, under the Constitution ... has the right to request the court considering its case to apply to the respective administrative court regarding the compliance of such a legal act (part thereof) with the Constitution (with another higher-ranking legal act) ...

The right to file an appeal against a final act of a court of first instance

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 24 January 2008

... as it has been held by the Constitutional Court, the constitutional right of a person to apply to a court and the instance system of courts imply that a law must establish such a legal regulation that would make it possible to file an appeal with a court of at least one higher instance against a final act adopted by a first instance general jurisdiction court or specialised court established under Paragraph 2 of Article 111 of the Constitution (rulings of 16 January 2006, 28 March 2006, 21 September 2006, 27 November 2006, and 24 January 2007). Justice is always administered by leaving the possibility of rectifying a possible mistake or changing a judgment in the light of new circumstances (ruling of 9 December 1998). The Constitutional Court has held that a law must establish not only the right of a party to the proceedings to file an appeal with a court of at least one higher instance against a final act adopted by a court of first instance, but also it must establish the procedure for filing such an appeal; such a procedure must allow correcting the possible mistakes made by a court of first instance; otherwise, the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law would be deviated from and the constitutional right of a person to the due court process would be violated (rulings of 21 September 2006 and 24 October 2007); the said correction of mistakes made by courts of lower instance and the related prevention of injustice is the conditio sine qua non for the trust of the parties to the respective case and society in general not only in the court of general jurisdiction that is considering the respective case, but also in the whole system of courts of general jurisdiction (ruling of 28 March 2006).

... the purpose of the institution of filing an appeal against a final act of a court of first instance is not only the defence and protection of the rights of a person (convict) who has been brought to legal responsibility, but also the defence and protection of the rights and legitimate interests of other persons, inter alia, a victim, as well as the defence and protection of the public interest and the legal order of the state.

The right to the judicial protection of the rights and freedoms of a person that are violated by the activity (or inaction) of the President of the Republic or the Government

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 13 May 2010

The constitutional principle of judicial protection is consolidated in Paragraph 1 of Article 30 of the Constitution. ...

[...]

Paragraph 1 of Article 30 of the Constitution should be interpreted in conjunction with Paragraph 2 of the same article, in which it is prescribed that compensation for material and moral damage inflicted on a person is established by law. ...

[...]

It needs to be noted that the provisions of Article 30 of the Constitution should be interpreted in conjunction with other provisions of the Constitution, inter alia, with Paragraph 1 of Article 109 thereof, whereby, in the Republic of Lithuania, justice is administered only by courts, and with Paragraph 1 of Article 29 thereof, according to which all persons are equal before the law, the court, and other state institutions and officials.

[...]

... "... the fact that the subjects specified in the Constitution may not challenge before the Constitutional Court such failure of a law-making subject to act where the said law-making subject has not passed a legal act (acts) (parts thereof) to establish a new (different) legal regulation harmonised with the said higher-ranking legal act, inter alia, with the Constitution, in order to replace a legal regulation ruled by the Constitutional Court to be in conflict with a higher-ranking legal act, inter alia, with the Constitution, and where the Constitutional Court has no powers to investigate failure to adopt such law-making decisions, does not mean that the aforementioned persons cannot altogether defend their rights and freedoms (also before a court) that have been violated because the said law-making decisions have not been adopted. The general legal principle of ubi ius, ibi remedium, the provision of Paragraph 1 of Article 6 of the Constitution, whereby the Constitution is a directly applicable act, the constitutional principle of responsible governance, the provision of Paragraph 3 of Article 5 of the Constitution, according to which state institutions serve the people, the provision of Article 18 of the Constitution, whereby human rights and freedoms are innate, as well as the constitutional right of a person who believes that his/her constitutional rights or freedoms are violated to apply to a court, imply not only that, in such cases, the rights, freedoms, legitimate interests, and legitimate expectations must and may be defended by means of interpreting the Constitution and by directly applying its provisions, but also that such protection must be guaranteed by courts” (decision of 8 August 2006).

The aforesaid provisions of the constitutional doctrine formulated in the Constitutional Court’s decision of 8 August 2006 are also mutatis mutandis applicable to those legal situations where the rights and freedoms of a person are violated because of the fact that an act of the President of the Republic or an act of the Government has not been adopted, although the adoption of such an act is required by a certain higher-ranking legal act, inter alia, by the Constitution.

[...]

... the activities of the President of the Republic or the Government can also cause a violation of the rights or freedoms of a person, inter alia, such activities can inflict damage.

[...]

... administrative courts may consider cases concerning, inter alia, the result or consequence of the activities (failure to act) of the President of the Republic or the Government where such activities (failure to act) violated (could violate) the rights or freedoms of a person, inter alia, they may consider cases concerning compensation for damage.

The right to an advocate as a condition of the effective implementation of the right to judicial protection (Paragraph 1 of Article 30 and Paragraph 6 of Article 31 of the Constitution) (for more on the right to an advocate, see 2.1.5.2.3. The right to defence and the right to an advocate)

The Constitutional Court’s ruling of 9 June 2011

... the right of a person to apply to a court and the requirement, arising from the Constitution, inter alia, from the provisions of Paragraph 1 of Article 30 and Paragraph 6 of Article 31 thereof, to defend the rights of a person not formally, but in reality, and in an effective manner means, inter alia, that the legislature must establish such a legal regulation that would create the preconditions for the effectiveness of legal assistance rendered by an advocate, where a person has the right to make use of such legal assistance while protecting his/her violated rights and legitimate interests, inter alia, while applying to a court.

[...]

... an advocate, while being engaged in an independent professional activity and rendering legal assistance to a person whose rights and legitimate interests have been violated, helps to implement the constitutional right of such a person to judicial protection. Thus, the right of a person to have an advocate is one of the conditions for the effective implementation of the right of a person to judicial protection.

[...]

... the constitutional right to judicial protection and the right to have an advocate, which are consolidated in the Constitution, inter alia, in the provisions of Paragraph 1 of Article 30 and Paragraph 6 of Article 31 thereof, give rise to the duty of the legislature to establish such a legal regulation that would create the preconditions for a person who defends his/her violated rights and legitimate interests to make use of legal assistance rendered by an advocate. Inter alia, the legislature should provide for such rights of advocates that would enable them to pursue their professional activity and to render effective legal assistance. It should be noted that the establishment of the rights of advocates is not an objective in itself – it is necessary to provide for such rights in order that advocates could effectively perform their professional activity and, having used all legitimate measures of defence, would help to secure the implementation of the right of a person to judicial protection, inter alia, that of the right to apply to a court.

The right to judicial protection (Paragraph 1 of Article 30 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 5 July 2013

The constitutional principle of judicial protection is consolidated in Paragraph 1 of Article 30 of the Constitution. ...

The Constitutional Court has held on more than one occasion that, under the Constitution, the legislature has the duty to lay down such a legal regulation on the basis of which all disputes concerning the violation of the constitutional rights and freedoms and acquired rights of a person could be resolved in a court (inter alia, the rulings of 2 July 2002, 4 March 2003, 29 December 2004, 7 February 2005, and 16 January 2006). The constitutional right of a person to apply to a court may not be interpreted as meaning that the legislature, purportedly, may not establish any such a legal regulation under which a person seeking to defend, in his/her opinion, his/her violated rights or freedoms would be allowed to apply to a court only in the manner provided for by means of a law. When fulfilling its constitutional duty to lay down such a legal regulation on the basis of which all disputes concerning the violation of the rights and freedoms of a person could be resolved in a court and by paying regard, inter alia, to the imperatives consolidated in Paragraph 2 of Article 29 and Paragraph 1 of Article 30 of the Constitution, the legislature may establish a procedure governing the constitutional right to apply to a court, inter alia, the conditions, time limits, and means of implementing this right, which are determined, inter alia, by the public interest; however, the legislature may not establish any such a legal regulation that would deny the right of a person to defend his/her rights or freedoms in a court where he/she believes that his/her rights or freedoms have been violated.

[...]

Paragraph 1 of Article 30 of the Constitution should be interpreted in conjunction with Paragraph 2 of the same article, in which it is prescribed that compensation for material and moral damage inflicted on a person is established by law. ...

When Paragraph 1 of Article 30 of the Constitution is interpreted in conjunction with Paragraph 2 of the same article ... it should be noted that the judicial awarding of damages is one of the means of the defence of violated rights or freedoms in a court.

The right to an advocate as a condition of the effective implementation of the right to judicial protection

See 2.1.5.2.3. The right to defence and the right to an advocate, the ruling of 9 July 2015 (“The right to an advocate; the duty of the state to ensure effective legal aid; financing state-guaranteed legal aid”).

The right of access to a court (on the right to apply to a court for the defence of the right of petition, also see 2.3. Political rights and freedoms, 2.3.6. The right of petition, the decision of 28 June 2016 (“The right to challenge before a court a decision, adopted by an institution of public power, not to deem an application to be a petition or to refuse to accept a petition for consideration”))

The Constitutional Court's decision of 28 June 2016

The Constitutional Court has formulated in its jurisprudence the extensive official constitutional doctrine of the right of access to a court and has revealed the constitutional imperatives that should be complied with in regulating particular relationships by means of legal acts.

The Constitutional Court has held that each person who believes that his/her rights or freedoms have been violated has the right to the judicial protection of his/her violated constitutional rights or freedoms; the defence of violated rights in a court is guaranteed to persons regardless of their legal status (inter alia, the rulings of 17 August 2004, 13 May 2010, and 5 July 2013); the implementation of the right to apply to a court is determined by the fact that the person himself/herself understands that his/her rights or freedoms have been violated (rulings of 1 October 1997, 16 January 2006, and 28 March 2006). The guarantee of the judicial protection of the rights and freedoms of persons is an essential element of the constitutional institution of the rights and freedoms of persons (inter alia, the rulings of 30 June 2000 and 29 December 2004 and the decision of 3 July 2013). The rights of a person must be defended not formally, but in reality, and effectively against the unlawful actions of both private persons and state institutions (inter alia, the rulings of 8 May 2000 and 28 March 2006 and the decision of 3 July 2013).

In its rulings, the Constitutional Court has held that, if the constitutional right of persons to apply to a court were not ensured, the universally recognised legal principle of ubi ius, ibi remedium – if there is a certain right (freedom), there must be a measure for its protection – would also be disregarded; under the Constitution, a legal situation where it is impossible to defend a certain right or freedom of persons (also before a court), even though those persons believe that such a right or freedom has been violated, is impermissible; the Constitution does not tolerate such a legal situation (inter alia, the ruling of 21 January 2008, the decision of 16 April 2014, and the ruling of 19 November 2015).

The Constitutional Court has also held on more than one occasion that, in a democratic state, a court is the main institutional guarantee of human rights and freedoms (rulings of 18 April 1996, 2 July 2002, and 10 December 2012). Under the Constitution, the legislature has the duty to lay down such a legal regulation on the basis of which all disputes concerning the violation of the constitutional rights and freedoms of a person could be resolved in a court (inter alia, the rulings of 2 July 2002, 29 December 2004, and 5 July 2013). A prelitigation procedure for settling disputes may also be established (inter alia, the rulings of 2 July 2002, 29 December 2004, and 22 January 2008); however, the legislature is not permitted to establish any such a legal regulation that would deny the right of a person who believes that his/her rights or freedoms have been violated to defend his/her rights or freedoms in a court (inter alia, the decision of 31 January 2007 and the ruling of 5 July 2013).

The legal regulation that consolidates the procedure for implementing the right to the judicial protection of the rights and freedoms of a person must be in line with the constitutional requirement of legal clarity; the legislature must clearly establish, in laws, in what manner and at what court persons can file their applications in order that they could implement in reality their right to apply to a court regarding the violation of their rights and freedoms (inter alia, the rulings of 29 December 2004, 27 November 2006, and 13 May 2010). When complying with the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law, the legislature has the discretion to establish at what court and under what procedure persons may file their applications regarding the defence of their violated rights and freedoms (ruling of 27 November 2006).

Paragraph 4 of Article 111 of the Constitution provides that the formation and competence of courts is established by the Law on Courts. When interpreting this constitutional provision, the Constitutional Court held that the Constitution not only obliges the legislature to lay down, by means of a law, the establishment and competence of all the courts of the Republic of Lithuania specified in Paragraph 1 of Article 111 of the Constitution, but it also expressis verbis consolidates the title of this law – the Law on Courts (rulings of 28 March 2006, 22 October 2007, and 15 November 2013); this imperative (which arises from the Constitution) of the legal regulation governing the activity of courts of general jurisdiction should also be mutatis mutandis applied to the legal regulation governing specialised courts, which are established under Paragraph 2 of Article 111 of the Constitution (ruling of 28 March 2006, the decision of 8 August 2006, and the ruling of 22 October 2007). At the same time, it was noted that, in itself, such a constitutional legal regulation does not mean that certain relationships connected with the said relationships may not altogether be regulated also by means of other laws; when regulating the aforesaid relationships by means of a law, the legislature must pay regard to the Constitution (rulings of 28 March 2006 and 15 November 2013).

[...]

... the fact that the constitutional right of persons has been violated by a legal act (i.e. by a certain act of the Seimas, the President of the Republic, or the Government) the investigation into the legality of which falls, under the Constitution, within the exclusive competence of the Constitutional Court where those persons, under the Constitution, have no powers to directly initiate a constitutional justice case in the Constitutional Court for determining the legality of such an act, does not mean that such persons are not allowed altogether to defend (also before a court) their violated rights and freedoms. The Constitution consolidates the right of persons whose constitutional rights or freedoms have been violated to apply to a court. This right implies not only that, in such situations, the rights and freedoms of persons, their legitimate interests, and legitimate expectations must and may be defended, but also that courts (judges), while considering cases, have the duty to apply to the Constitutional Court where they face doubts regarding the compliance of an act (part thereof) adopted by the Seimas, the President of the Republic, or the Government with higher-ranking legal acts, inter alia (and, first of all), with the Constitution.

The duty of the state to ensure the provision of effective legal aid to persons to whom access to legal aid is particularly difficult due to financial reasons in those cases where the provision of effective legal aid is necessary in the interests of justice

See 2.1.5.2.2. The right to a fair trial, the ruling of 11 October 2018.

The right to judicial protection (Paragraph 1 of Article 30 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 14 December 2018

... the right of a person, as consolidated in Paragraph 1 of Article 30 of the Constitution, to apply to a court for the defence of violated rights or freedoms implies the legitimate expectation that the court, after an impartial and fair examination of the case, will adopt a reasoned and well-founded decision, inter alia, regarding the distribution of litigation costs. It should be noted that such a legal regulation that creates the preconditions for a court to adopt a fair, reasoned, and well-founded decision in the case also ensures the effective implementation of the constitutional right of the person to the judicial protection of his/her violated constitutional rights and freedoms.

... in order to ensure the effective implementation of the right of a person to the judicial protection of his/her violated constitutional rights and freedoms, it is imperative that a court, with a view to adopting a fair, reasoned, and well-founded decision in the case, in the event that it has doubts regarding the compliance of a legal act applicable in the case with higher-ranking legislation or has doubts regarding the interpretation or validity of the applicable European Union law, properly fulfils its constitutional duty to apply to the Constitutional Court or another court with jurisdiction for assessing whether a legal act applicable in the case is in compliance with higher-ranking legislation, or properly fulfils its constitutional duty to refer to the Court of Justice of the European Union for a preliminary ruling. No legal regulation governing the distribution of the costs incurred by the parties as a result of the above-mentioned application by the court may create the preconditions for the unjustified restriction of the right of a person, which is consolidated in Paragraph 1 of Article 30 of the Constitution, to apply to a court for the defence of his/her violated constitutional rights and freedoms.

The right to file an appeal against a final act of a court of first instance

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 1 March 2019

... under the Constitution, inter alia, Paragraph 1 of Article 30 thereof, and the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law, the right to file an appeal with a court of at least one higher instance against a final act of a court of first instance in order to ensure the possibility of correcting potential mistakes is an inseparable part of the constitutional right to apply to a court and the right to due process. It is not allowed to artificially restrict or altogether deny the right to apply to a court of at least one higher instance for the assessment of the lawfulness and reasonableness of a decision adopted by a court of first instance, and no such legal regulation may be established that would disproportionately limit the right to apply to a court of higher instance for a person who believes that his/her rights or freedoms were not defended properly by a court of first instance.

... implementing the duty, which stems from the Constitution, inter alia, Paragraph 1 of Article 30 thereof, and the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law, to ensure the possibility for the participants of the proceedings to verify the lawfulness and reasonableness of a decision of a court of first instance in a court of at least one higher instance, the legislature must establish such a legal regulation that would create the preconditions for a person to effectively exercise his/her right to file an appeal with the court of appeal instance against a decision that has been adopted by a court of first instance and has not come into force yet. This means that, when the procedure for filing an appeal with the court of appeal instance against a decision adopted by a court of first instance is established by means of a law, no such grounds, time limits, and conditions for filing an appeal may be provided for due to which it would become especially difficult to apply to the court of appeal instance or it would altogether be impossible to file an appeal with the court of appeal instance against a final act adopted in the respective case by a court of first instance. Otherwise, the constitutional right to file an appeal with the court of appeal instance against a decision of a court of first instance would be declaratory; correcting the potential mistakes made by the court of first instance, as well as applying law in a fair manner and administering justice, would be precluded; the constitutional right of a person to the due process of law would be violated; and the principle of a state under the rule of law would be deviated from.

The duty of the state to ensure effective legal aid in criminal and civil proceedings (Paragraph 1 of Article 30 and Paragraphs 2 and 6 of Article 31 of the Constitution)

See 2.1.5.2.3. The right to defence and the right to an advocate, the ruling of 1 March 2019 (“The right to an advocate; the duty of the state to ensure effective legal aid in criminal and civil proceedings (Paragraph 1 of Article 30 and Paragraphs 2 and 6 of Article 31 of the Constitution)”).

The right of a state servant (official) to apply to a court for the defence of his/her rights violated due to the application of official liability

See 4.3. State service, the ruling of 18 April 2019.

2.1.5.2.2. The right to a fair trial

The rights exercised in court proceedings by the persons participating in a case; the equality of arms between the parties

The Constitutional Court’s ruling of 18 April 1996

Courts administer justice, i.e. they resolve legal conflicts by adopting legal decisions. Justice is administered by applying special procedural forms the purpose of which is to ensure the rights of persons in court proceedings, to facilitate the establishment of the actual circumstances of a case, and to adopt a fair decision. ... In civil procedure, the principle of the equality of persons before the court manifests itself as the principle of the equality of arms between the parties. ... The dispute of equal parties in proceedings, where each party to the case has equal possibilities during the consideration of their case in a court, expresses the essence of civil procedure.

Assessing evidence in court proceedings

The Constitutional Court’s ruling of 18 April 1996

A court is not bound in advance by any evidence presented to it.

The equality of arms between the parties; courts as subjects of procedural legal relationships

The Constitutional Court’s ruling of 19 December 1996

... The procedural rights of parties are equal. The rights of one party correspond to those of the other party; for instance, the plaintiff is entitled to bring an action, while the defendant is entitled to defend against the action brought by rebutting the claims of the plaintiff or by making counter-claims, etc. This principle is of great importance as only equal parties of a dispute may compete on equal terms. It is important that the principle of the equality of arms between the parties is observed in all stages of proceedings, since the implementation of other principles of proceedings also depends on the implementation of the principle of the equality of arms between the parties.

[...]

... the essence of the equality of the rights of the persons participating in a case is the equality of persons before the court, but not the equality between the court (judge) considering a dispute and the persons participating in the case. Otherwise, the nature of a court as an institution administering justice would be denied.

The judicial protection of rights and freedoms

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 1 October 1997

The judicial protection of rights and freedoms, unlike other ways of their protection, is characterised by such universally recognised democratic principles (equality before the court, publicity, the principle of adversarial argument, the right to be heard in a court, etc.) that are specific to this protection alone. A court obeys only the law and, in particular cases, adopts decisions in the name of the State of Lithuania (Paragraph 4 of Article 109 of the Constitution). The state guarantees the execution of a court decision adopted with respect to a concrete person.

When resolving a conflict, a court, as an institution of state power, adopts an act of justice. When adopting it, a court invokes special procedural rules. One of such rules prescribes that, in determining the rights and duties of a person, a court must present clear and convincing reasoning substantiating the adopted decision. If persons disagree with a court decision adopted with respect to them, the laws guarantee the possibility for them to appeal against the said decision in accordance with the hierarchical line, i.e. they are guaranteed the verification of the lawfulness and validity of the adopted decision at a court of higher instance.

The right to the due court process (Paragraph 2 of Article 31 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 5 February 1999

Paragraph 2 of Article 31 of the Constitution provides that a person charged with committing a crime has the right to a public and fair hearing of his/her case by an independent and impartial court. This constitutional provision consolidates the principle of the right of individuals to the due court process. The adherence to the said principle is a necessary condition for resolving a case in a fair manner. When the rights of persons in court proceedings are guaranteed, it is necessary to ensure, by means of legal norms, that proceedings are carried out fairly and professionally, that the rights of the parties to proceedings are respected, and that cases are considered by impartial judges.

[...]

The requirement by the Constitution that cases must be investigated in a fair manner implies that courts must correctly establish the actual circumstances of cases and that they must correctly apply criminal laws. Ensuring the impartiality of courts is one of the conditions for the fair consideration of a case. The same another condition would be the separation of the functions of subjects in procedural activities. Therefore, a case is justly investigated only if the constitutional principles of procedural activities are not violated and the rights of all participants in proceedings are ensured.

The right to a fair, independent, and impartial trial (Paragraph 2 of Article 31 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 12 February 2001

The constitutional right of persons to the hearing of their case by an impartial court also means that judges whose impartiality can raise doubts may not consider their case. Considering a case, a judge must be neutral. The impartiality and independence of a court are an essential guarantee of ensuring human rights and freedoms, and are a necessary condition for the fair consideration of a case; consequently, this is also a necessary condition for trust in courts.

The principle of the independence of judges and courts, consolidated in the Constitution, and the right of persons to a fair and public hearing of their case by an independent and impartial court imply the duty of the state to lay down the guarantees for the independence of judges and courts.

The right to a fair trial (Paragraph 2 of Article 31 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 10 June 2003

... under Paragraph 2 of Article 31 of the Constitution, a person charged with committing a crime has the right to a public and fair hearing of his/her case by an independent and impartial court.

Paragraph 2 of Article 31 of the Constitution consolidates the right of a person to a fair, impartial, and independent trial. Interpreting Paragraph 2 of Article 31 in conjunction with Paragraph 4 of this article, according to which punishment may be imposed or applied only on the grounds established by means of a law, in the context of the case at issue, it should be noted that, under the Constitution, when considering a case and investigating all circumstances of the case, an independent and impartial court may not impose a punishment by failing to observe the law.

It should be noted that the constitutional right to a fair trial means, inter alia, not only that the principles and norms of criminal procedure law must be observed in court proceedings, but also that the punishment established in the penal law and imposed by a court must be just; the penal law must establish all possibilities for a court, after considering all circumstances of a case, to impose a just punishment on the person who committed a criminal act. The imposition of an unjust punishment would imply that the right of a person to a fair trial is violated; consequently, this would imply that Paragraph 2 of Article 31 of the Constitution and the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law are also violated.

The right to the due court process (Paragraph 2 of Article 31 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 16 January 2006

The due court process is a necessary condition for resolving a case in a fair manner (ruling of 5 February 1999).

... the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law implies the right of a person to the due process of law. The due process of law includes court proceedings. Thus, the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law gives rise to the right of a person to the due court process.

Certain requirements for court proceedings stem from Paragraph 2 of Article 31 of the Constitution, which prescribes that a person charged with committing a crime has the right to a public and fair hearing of his/her case by an independent and impartial court.

The Constitutional Court has held that the principle of the right of a person to the due court process, as laid down in Paragraph 2 of Article 31 of the Constitution, means, inter alia, that a court must unconditionally adhere to the constitutional principles and the requirements of laws that consolidate the said principles as regards the equality of parties in criminal proceedings before the law and the court; a court must also be impartial and independent. These are the most important preconditions ensuring that the circumstances of a case are investigated thoroughly, completely, and objectively and that the truth is established, as well as that penal laws are applied correctly (ruling of 19 September 2000).

... Paragraph 2 of Article 31 of the Constitution and the principle of a state under the rule of law give rise to the right of a person to the due court process, which is an important condition for resolving a case in a fair manner; the said right means that, in criminal proceedings in a court, it is necessary to pay regard to the clarity of the proceedings, the equality of the rights of the participants of proceedings, their participation in the procedure of providing evidence, their right to an interpreter, the principle of adversarial argument, and other principles in order that the circumstances of committing a criminal act would be investigated comprehensively, objectively, and impartially and that a fair decision would be adopted in a criminal case. The Constitution obliges the legislature to establish, while regulating the relationships of criminal proceedings, such a legal regulation that would also ensure the rights of participants in criminal proceedings: proceedings must be such that the effective protection of the rights of a person who has suffered from a criminal act would be ensured and that such a person would be able to make use of all rights arising from the Constitution. Criminal proceedings must also be such that the constitutional rights of a person suspected of committing a criminal act are not violated: the right to defence, the right to an advocate, the right to be informed about the accusation, etc. must be secured. The Constitutional Court has held that, when guaranteeing the rights of persons in court proceedings, it is necessary to ensure that proceedings are carried out fairly and professionally, that the rights of the parties to proceedings are respected, and that cases are considered by impartial judges (ruling of 5 February 1999).

The right to file an appeal against a final act of a court of first instance

See 2.1.5.2.1. The right of access to a court, the ruling of 24 January 2008.

The independence of judges and courts as a necessary condition for the protection of human rights and freedoms (Paragraph 2 of Article 31 and Paragraph 2 of Article 109 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 28 May 2008

Paragraph 2 of Article 31 and Paragraph 2 of Article 109 of the Constitution are interrelated, as they, inter alia, consolidate one of the most important principles of the administration of justice – the independence of courts and judges; under the Constitution, the independence of courts and judges is, first of all, a necessary condition for the protection of human rights and freedoms (ruling of 5 February 1999).

In the jurisprudence of the Constitutional Court (rulings of 6 December 1995, 21 December 1999, 12 February 2001, 12 July 2001, 13 May 2004, 16 January 2006, and other rulings), various aspects of the independence of judges and courts are revealed; the independence of judges and courts stems from the Constitution.

... the function of the administration of justice determines the independence of judges and courts (rulings of 12 July 2001 and 13 May 2004); the independence of judges and courts is one of the essential principles of a democratic state under the rule of law (rulings of 21 December 1999, 12 February 2001, and 13 May 2004); a judge can administer justice only while being independent of the parties to a case, state institutions, officials, political and public associations, natural and legal persons (rulings of 12 July 2001 and 13 May 2004); the independence of judges and courts is not a privilege, but one of the most important duties of judges and courts; the said duty stems from the constitutionally guaranteed right of a person to an independent and impartial arbiter of a dispute; the independence of judges and courts is a necessary condition for an impartial and fair consideration of a case; therefore, the independence of judges and courts is also a condition for trust in courts (rulings of 6 December 1995, 21 December 1999, 12 February 2001, 9 May 2006, and 22 October 2007).

The right to the due court process (Paragraph 2 of Article 31 and Paragraph 1 of Article 109 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 28 May 2008

The due court process is a necessary condition for resolving a case in a fair manner (ruling of 5 February 1999).

The Constitutional Court has held that the principle of the right of a person to the due court process, as laid down in Paragraph 2 of Article 31 of the Constitution, means, inter alia, that a court must unconditionally adhere to the constitutional principles and the requirements of laws that consolidate the said principles as regards the equality of parties in criminal proceedings before the law and the court; a court must also be impartial and independent. These are the most important preconditions ensuring that the circumstances of the case are investigated thoroughly, completely, and objectively and that the truth is established, as well as that penal laws are applied correctly (rulings of 19 September 2000 and 16 January 2006). In criminal proceedings in a court, regard must be paid to the clarity of the process, the equal rights of the participants of proceedings, their participation in the procedure of providing evidence, their right to an interpreter, the principle of adversarial argument, and other principles in order that the circumstances of committing a criminal act would be investigated comprehensively, objectively, and impartially and a fair decision would be adopted in a criminal case (ruling of 16 January 2006).

The Constitutional Court has also held the following.

In criminal procedure law, the provision of Paragraph 1 of Article 109 of the Constitution, whereby only courts administer justice, means, inter alia, that a court in criminal proceedings must be an impartial arbiter, who objectively assesses the data (evidence) in a criminal case regarding the circumstances of committing a criminal act and who adopts a fair decision concerning the guilt of a person accused of having committed a criminal act; at the same time, in order to establish the objective truth, a court must take an active part in criminal proceedings – a court must define the limits of the consideration of a criminal case, perform certain procedural actions, and ensure that persons participating in court proceedings do not abuse their rights or powers, and it must resolve other issues related to the consideration of a criminal case in a court. While considering a criminal case, a court must act in such a way that the objective truth is established in a criminal case and the question of the guilt of a person accused of having committed a criminal act is fairly resolved. A court must also be equally just to all persons who participate in criminal proceedings (ruling of 16 January 2006).

When investigating a criminal case, without overstepping the limits defined in the Constitution and laws, a court is independent throughout the entire criminal proceedings. From the point of view of the independence of a court, the fact, as such, that a court abides by the respective norms of [criminal procedure law] does not mean that the independence of such a court is denied. As noted by the Constitutional Court, the constitutional right to a fair trial means, inter alia, that the principles and norms of criminal procedure law must be observed in court proceedings (ruling of 10 June 2003).

The norms and principles consolidated in the Constitution, inter alia, the right of persons to a public and fair hearing of their case by an independent court, as consolidated in Paragraph 2 of Article 31 of the Constitution, as well as the principles of a state under the rule of law and justice, imply the model of a court as an institution administering justice where a court may not be understood as a “passive” observer of court proceedings and where the administration of justice may not depend solely on the material submitted to a court. Seeking to investigate all circumstances of a case objectively and comprehensively and to establish the truth in a case, a court has the powers either to perform procedural actions by itself or to assign certain institutions (officials), inter alia, prosecutors, to perform the respective actions (ruling of 16 January 2006); when performing procedural actions, a court must be impartial and act in such a way that would not create any preconditions for doubting its impartiality or independence.

Judicial control over the enforcement procedure

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 30 June 2008

... In order to ensure the lawfulness of the enforcement procedure, it is necessary to consolidate effective judicial control over the enforcement procedure (there may be various forms of such control), by exercising which, a court could resolve all questions (disputes) arising during such an enforcement procedure. The main purpose of such control is to ensure the lawfulness and effectiveness of the enforcement procedure, as well as the defence of violated rights of a person.

[...]

While regulating the relationships linked to the enforcement procedure, law-making subjects must comply with the constitutional requirement for the due process of law, inter alia, it is necessary to ensure judicial control over the enforcement procedure, as well as the imperative of the constitutional right of a person to judicial protection.

The right to the due court process (for more on the principle of the public consideration of cases in a court, see 9.1. Courts, 9.1.6. Court proceedings and court decisions, the ruling of 6 December 2012 (“The principle of the public consideration of cases in a court (Paragraph 1 of Article 117 of the Constitution)”)

The Constitutional Court’s ruling of 6 December 2012

The due court process is a necessary condition for resolving a case in a fair manner (rulings of 5 February 1999, 16 January 2006, 28 May 2008, and 8 June 2009).

The constitutional right of a person to the due court process implies the duty of the legislature to establish, by means of a law, such proceedings for consideration of cases in a court that would be in line with the norms and principles of the Constitution. The legislature, when regulating, by means of a law, the relationships of the consideration of cases in a court, must pay regard to the Constitution, inter alia, to the principles laid down in Article 117 thereof, as well as to the constitutional principles of a state under the rule of law, the equality of rights and justice, and the impartiality and independence of judges.

When the relationships of the consideration of cases in a court are regulated, regard must be paid, inter alia, to the principle of the public consideration of cases in a court, as consolidated in Paragraph 1 of Article 117 of the Constitution.

The right to a fair trial (Paragraph 2 of Article 31 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court’s ruling of 15 November 2013

Paragraph 2 of Article 31 of the Constitution prescribes: “A person charged with committing a crime shall have the right to a public and fair hearing of his case by an independent and impartial court.”

This constitutional provision consolidates the principle of the right of a person to the due court process. The adherence to this principle is a necessary condition for resolving a case in a fair manner. When interpreting this principle, the Constitutional Court noted, inter alia, the following (inter alia, the rulings of 5 February 1999, 19 September 2000, 12 February 2001, 10 June 2003, 16 January 2006, 28 May 2008, and 8 June 2009):

- the requirement of the Constitution that cases must be considered in a fair manner implies that courts must correctly establish the actual circumstances of cases and that they must correctly apply criminal laws; ensuring the impartiality of courts is one of the conditions for considering a case in a fair manner;

- a person may not be recognised guilty of committing a crime, nor any criminal punishment may be imposed on anyone, without proper court proceedings, enabling the accused to be aware of everything with which he/she is charged and on what grounds the accusations against him/her are based, as well as allowing him/her to prepare and present evidence for his/her defence; this must be ensured by means of criminal procedure norms, which must be in conformity with the constitutional principles of lawfulness, the equality before the law and the court, the impartiality of courts and judges, and the public and fair consideration of cases; the participants of trials – the accuser, the accused, counsel for the defence, the victim and his/her representative, the civil plaintiff and the civil defendant and their representatives – must be guaranteed, by means of laws, the equal rights to present evidence, to take part in the investigation into evidence, and to submit requests; cases must be considered on the basis of the principle of adversarial argument;

- criminal procedure must ensure that the constitutional rights of persons suspected or accused of having committed a criminal act are not violated: their right to defence, the right to an advocate, the right to be aware of what he/she is charged with, etc. must be ensured;

- the constitutional right to a fair trial, inter alia, means not only that the principles and norms of criminal procedure law must be observed in court proceedings, but also that the punishment established in the penal law and imposed by a court must be just; the penal law must establish all possibilities for a court, after considering all circumstances of a case, to impose a just punishment on the person who committed a criminal act; the imposition of an unjust punishment would imply that the right of a person to a fair trial is violated; consequently, in such a case, Paragraph 2 of Article 31 of the Constitution and the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law would also be violated;

- the norms and principles consolidated in the Constitution, inter alia, the right of persons to a public and fair hearing of their case by an independent court, as consolidated in Paragraph 2 of Article 31 of the Constitution, as well as the principles of a state under the rule of law and justice, imply the model of a court as an institution administering justice where a court may not be understood as a passive observer of court proceedings and where the administration of justice may not depend solely on the material submitted to a court; seeking to investigate all circumstances of the case objectively and comprehensively and to establish the truth in a case, a court has the powers either to perform procedural actions by itself or to assign certain institutions (officials), inter alia, prosecutors, to perform the respective actions; when performing procedural actions, a court must be impartial and act in such a way that would not create any preconditions for doubting its impartiality or independence.

[...]

Under Paragraph 1 of Article 109 of the Constitution and the constitutional principles of a state under the rule of law and justice, courts have the duty not only to investigate all circumstances of criminal cases in an exhaustive and impartial manner, but also to correctly apply criminal laws, inter alia, to properly qualify a criminal act committed by the accused. A court must investigate whether a criminal act specified in the indictment was committed precisely under the essential circumstances specified in the indictment, with the exception of situations where the prosecutor, the private accuser, or the victim submit the request that the factual circumstances of the committed act specified in the indictment be changed to circumstances that are different in substance. ...

... under the Constitution, inter alia, Paragraph 2 of Article 31 and Paragraph 1 of Article 109 thereof, and under the constitutional principles of a state under the rule of law and justice, the possibilities must be created for a court considering a criminal case to change, on its own initiative, the factual circumstances of the committed act specified in the indictment to circumstances that are different in substance. While implementing this right, a court must inform the accused and other participants of the court trial about such a possibility and must ensure the right to be aware of what the accusation is, the right to defence, and the implementation of other constitutional principles of the due process of law.

The duty of the state to ensure the provision of effective legal aid to persons to whom access to legal aid is particularly difficult due to financial reasons in those cases where the provision of effective legal aid is necessary in the interests of justice

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 11 October 2018

... the duty of the state to ensure the provision of effective legal aid in those cases where this is necessary in the interests of justice, as implied by the Constitution, inter alia, the right of a person to apply to a court, provided for in Paragraph 1 of Article 30 of the Constitution, the imperative of a fair hearing of a case by an independent and impartial court, guaranteed in Paragraph 2 of Article 31 of the Constitution, and the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law, inter alia, means that the legislature must establish such a model of organising, providing, and funding legal aid under which persons to whom access to such aid is particularly difficult due to financial reasons are provided with legal aid on the basis of the criteria such as the complexity of the case or applicable law, the severity of the possible punishment, the gravity of the criminal act, certain particularities of the social and personal situation of the person, and other significant circumstances. It should also be noted that the obligation – as implied by the constitutional duty of the state to ensure the effective provision of legal aid – to responsibly plan, accumulate, and use the funds necessary for this gives rise, inter alia, to the right of the legislature to establish such a model of organising, providing, and funding legal aid under which it is required that, upon the closure of the legal proceedings, the person pays, in full or in part, the costs of the legal aid provided to him/her and financed by means of public funds if his/her financial situation improves and he/she is able to pay them. Thus, the legislature may also establish such a legal regulation under which legal aid in certain cases is not provided to persons who have not fulfilled the duty established in the law to pay, in full or in part, the costs of the legal aid provided to them in other proceedings; however, such a legal regulation may not, in any case, deny the right of a person to apply to a court and the right to the due process of law, which are consolidated in Paragraph 1 of Article 30 and Paragraph 2 of Article 31 of the Constitution, i.e. no preconditions may be created for disregarding the interests of justice, among other things, where access to legal aid would be particularly difficult for a certain person due to financial reasons.

The right to file an appeal against a final act of a court of first instance

See 2.1.5.2.1. The right of access to a court, the ruling of 1 March 2019.

The duty of the state to ensure effective legal aid in criminal and civil proceedings (Paragraph 1 of Article 30 and Paragraphs 2 and 6 of Article 31 of the Constitution)

See 2.1.5.2.3. The right to defence and the right to an advocate, the ruling of 1 March 2019 (“The right to an advocate; the duty of the state to ensure effective legal aid in criminal and civil proceedings (Paragraph 1 of Article 30 and Paragraphs 2 and 6 of Article 31 of the Constitution)”).

2.1.5.2.3. The right to defence and the right to an advocate

The right to defence and the right to an advocate; the requirement for advocates to have higher university education in law

The Constitutional Court’s ruling of 10 July 1996

The right to defence and the right to have an advocate are found among the fundamental human rights. The right to defence and the right to have an advocate help to ensure the freedom and inviolability of a person, as well as the protection of other constitutional rights and freedoms. The implementation of the constitutional right to defence is particularly dependent on the level of the professional training of an advocate, i.e. on the qualifications acquired by such a lawyer and the skills developed during his/her legal practice. ...

... The Constitutional Court has recognised that, in general, [the fact that lawyers who work as advocates are required to receive broadly-based legal training, which can be ensured only by higher university education in law], may be treated as increased requirements for educational qualifications for the lawyers of this profession. However, establishing such requirements is aimed at ensuring that residents are rendered more qualified legal aid, i.e. it is aimed at strengthening the protection and defence guarantees of human rights and freedoms.

The right to defence (Paragraph 6 of Article 31 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court’s ruling of 19 September 2000

Paragraph 6 of Article 31 of the Constitution prescribes: “A person suspected of committing a crime, as well as the accused, shall be guaranteed, from the moment of his apprehension or first interrogation, the right to defence, as well as the right to an advocate.” The right of persons to defence guaranteed in this constitutional norm implies that a law must ensure that they have sufficient procedural means to defend themselves from charges against them and that they have the possibility of making use of these means. The right to defence is one of the conditions for considering a case in a fair manner. By guaranteeing the right of persons to defence, the preconditions are created to justly punish everyone who has committed a crime and to ensure that no innocent person is held criminally liable and convicted.

The right to defence and the right to an advocate (Paragraph 6 of Article 31 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court’s ruling of 12 February 2001

Paragraph 6 of Article 31 of the Constitution prescribes: “A person suspected of committing a crime, as well as the accused, shall be guaranteed, from the moment of his apprehension or first interrogation, the right to defence, as well as the right to an advocate.”

The right to an advocate, consolidated in Paragraph 6 of Article 31 of the Constitution, means that a person has the right to choose an advocate, as well as the right to have an advocate appointed by the state.

The right of a person to have an advocate also implies the right of a person to be clearly informed that he/she is entitled to have an advocate from the moment of his/her apprehension or first interrogation.

It should be noted that the right of persons to defence and their right to an advocate, which are laid down in Paragraph 6 of Article 31 of the Constitution, are absolute: these rights may not be denied or restricted on any grounds or any conditions.

The right of a person suspected of committing a crime, as well as that of the accused, to defence is one of the guarantees of human rights protection. This right is a necessary condition in order that every person who committed a crime would be justly punished and that an innocent person would not be held criminally liable and convicted.

[...]

The right to defence and the right to have an advocate, which are consolidated in Paragraph 6 of Article 31 of the Constitution, give rise to the duty of the legislature to particularise, in laws, the implementation of the constitutional right of persons to judicial protection. When it establishes such a legal regulation, the legislature is bound by the Constitution. The constitutional right to defence and the right to have an advocate also give rise to the duty of state institutions to ensure the real possibility for the implementation of these rights.

It needs to be noted that the right to choose an advocate, unlike the right to have an advocate, is not absolute. For instance, an advocate may not act simultaneously as counsel for the defence of two or more persons suspected of committing a crime or of two or more of the accused in cases where the interests of the defence of one of such persons are in conflict with those of the other. Laws may provide that, in cases where the exercise of defence by a person faces real difficulties, a court may propose that a person choose a different advocate.

The right to defence and the right to an advocate; the right of an advocate to receive information that is necessary for the effective implementation of the right of persons to judicial protection (Paragraph 1 of Article 30 and Paragraph 6 of Article 31 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 9 June 2011

The right to have an advocate as a condition for the effective implementation of the right to judicial protection stems not only from Paragraph 6 of Article 31 of the Constitution, but also from Paragraph 1 of Article 30 thereof, which prescribes that "A person whose constitutional rights or freedoms are violated shall have the right to apply to a court".

[...]

... the right of a person to apply to a court and the requirement, arising from the Constitution, inter alia, from the provisions of Paragraph 1 of Article 30 and Paragraph 6 of Article 31 thereof, to defend the rights of a person not formally, but in reality, and in an effective manner means, inter alia, that the legislature must establish such a legal regulation that would create the preconditions for the effectiveness of legal assistance rendered by an advocate where a person has the right to make use of such legal assistance in protecting his/her violated rights and legitimate interests, inter alia, while applying to a court.

The Constitutional Court has held that the activities of an advocate constitute certain independent professional activities of a person that are related to rendering the respective legal services (ruling of 14 February 2011).

... an advocate, while being engaged in an independent professional activity and rendering legal assistance to a person whose rights and legitimate interests are violated, helps to implement the constitutional right of such a person to judicial protection. Thus, the right of a person to have an advocate is one of the conditions for the effective implementation of the right of a person to judicial protection.

The Constitutional Court has held that the constitutional right to defence and the right to have an advocate give rise to the duty of the legislature to particularise, in laws, the implementation of the constitutional right of persons to judicial protection. When it establishes such a legal regulation, the legislature is bound by the Constitution. The constitutional right to defence and the right to have an advocate also give rise to the duty of state institutions to ensure the real possibility for the implementation of these rights (ruling of 12 February 2001).

It should be noted that the constitutional right to judicial protection and the right to have an advocate, which are consolidated in the Constitution, inter alia, in the provisions of Paragraph 1 of Article 30 and Paragraph 6 of Article 31 thereof, give rise to the duty of the legislature to establish such a legal regulation that would create the preconditions for a person who defends his/her violated rights and legitimate interests to make use of legal assistance rendered by an advocate; inter alia, the legislature must provide for such rights of advocates that would enable them to pursue their professional activity and to render effective legal assistance. It should be noted that the establishment of the rights of advocates is not an objective in itself – it is necessary to provide for such rights in order that advocates could effectively perform their professional activity and, having used all legitimate measures of defence, would help to ensure the implementation of the right of a person to judicial protection, inter alia, the implementation of the right to apply to a court.

... in order to ensure the right of a person to have an advocate as one of the conditions for the effective implementation of the right to judicial protection, the legislature must establish, inter alia, such a legal regulation whereby an advocate could receive all information that is held by state and municipal institutions and is necessary for the implementation of the said right of a person.

On the other hand, under the Constitution, inter alia, Article 22 and Paragraph 3 of Article 25 thereof, it is not allowed to establish any such a legal regulation governing the provision of information held by state and municipal institutions to advocates that would create the preconditions for violating the values protected under the Constitution, inter alia, the inviolability of the private life of individuals.

It also needs to be noted that the right to have an advocate, which is consolidated in the Constitution, inter alia, in the provisions of Paragraph 1 of Article 30 and Paragraph 6 of Article 31 thereof, gives rise to the duty of the legislature to establish not only certain rights of advocates, which are necessary in order to render effective legal assistance, but also their respective duties, inter alia, the duty of confidentiality, which means that an advocate must safeguard the information that is entrusted to him/her and is necessary for rendering legal assistance and that he/she must not disclose it, as well as the duty not to use the received information for purposes contrary to law; at the same time, it needs to be noted that the responsibility of advocates must also be established, inter alia, for the unlawful use of the received information.

The right to an advocate; the duty of the state to ensure effective legal aid; the financing of state-guaranteed legal aid

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 9 July 2015

The Constitutional Court has ... noted that an advocate, while performing an independent professional activity and rendering legal assistance to a person whose rights and legitimate interests have been violated, helps to implement the constitutional right of a person to judicial protection. The right of a person to have an advocate is one of the conditions for the effective implementation of the right of a person to judicial protection (ruling of 9 June 2011).

In the acts of the Constitutional Court, it has also been held that the constitutional right to defence and the right to have an advocate give rise to the duty of the legislature to particularise, in laws, the implementation of the constitutional right of persons to judicial protection. When it establishes such a legal regulation, the legislature is bound by the Constitution. The constitutional right to defence and the right to have an advocate also give rise to the duty of state institutions to ensure the real possibility for the implementation of these rights (rulings of 12 February 2001 and 9 June 2011).

In the context of the constitutional justice case at issue, it should be noted that the Constitution, inter alia, the right of a person to apply to a court, as consolidated in Paragraph 1 of Article 30 thereof, the imperative of a public and fair hearing of a case by an independent and impartial court, as guaranteed in Paragraph 2 of Article 31 thereof, and the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law imply the duty of the state to ensure, under the procedure and conditions established in a law and taking account of the financial capacities of the state, the provision of effective legal aid, inter alia, legal advice and legal representation services, to those socially sensitive (vulnerable) persons for whom, in the ordinary market of legal services, such legal aid would otherwise be fictitious or its access would be extremely difficult due to financial reasons, as well as in those cases where this is necessary for the interests of justice. While regulating the legal aid (public legal service) that is financed from state budget funds or other public funds and is ensured by special institutional and organisational means, the legislature has broad discretion to choose a model of organising, providing, and funding such legal aid, inter alia, to establish the subjects administrating this legal aid (service) and those directly rendering it, the forms of their activity, and the grounds for remunerating them.

It also needs to be noted that, having established in laws that the legal aid (public service) ensured by the state is provided, inter alia, by persons engaged in individual professional activity, inter alia, by advocates, the legislature has broad discretion to establish a system of payment for legal services rendered by these subjects; meanwhile, an institution authorised by the legislature, paying regard to the objectives of the functioning of this system as determined in laws, may responsibly concretise certain (explicitly or implicitly comprised) elements of this system, including, inter alia, additional funding where the rendering of the service in question becomes prolonged due to objective reasons.

In this context, it should also be noted that the Constitutional Court has held that the state may choose various systems of remuneration for work; it is allowed to establish a system with a fixed-size salary, or a system with both minimum and maximum salaries for particular positions, or a system where remuneration for work is regulated by applying a coefficient with a certain established value based on a certain established unit (such remuneration may also consist of several elements) (rulings of 20 May 2007 and 30 April 2013). This provision of the official constitutional doctrine is mutatis mutandis applicable to cases where the activity of advocates rendering public legal services is financed by the state budget funds or other public funds.

[...]

... under the Constitution, a person who has completed assigned work has the right to demand that he/she be paid the whole work remuneration (remuneration) that is due according to legal acts. This provision of the official constitutional doctrine is mutatis mutandis applicable to the legal regulation governing funding, from state budget funds or other public funds, the activity of advocates rendering public legal services according to the agreement and under the procedure established by means of a law.

Thus, the legislature, when regulating the funding of the activity of advocates rendering state-guaranteed legal aid, or an institution authorised by it, paying regard to the objectives of the functioning of this system determined in laws, may stipulate, inter alia, that the base of the remuneration for the advocates who are assigned by the state where necessary (on an irregular basis) and on voluntary grounds to provide public legal services for consideration is calculated according to the category of a concrete case or the stage of its consideration in courts; meanwhile, where the rendering of the service becomes prolonged due to objective reasons, additional remuneration may be paid and its maximum amount is responsibly and proportionately limited by a certain number of the calculated hours of the service.

Consequently, an advocate rendering public legal services under the procedure established by means of a law, once he/she has carried out the activity assigned (entrusted under the agreement) to him/her by the state where necessary, has the right to demand that he/she be paid all remuneration for the preparation for a certain case or procedural representation due according to legal acts, including all additional remuneration provided for by legal acts where the rendering of the service becomes prolonged due to objective reasons.

[...]

It should be emphasised that the constitutional duty of the state to ensure the provision of legal aid (public legal service) under the procedure and conditions established by means of a law also implies the obligation to responsibly plan, accumulate, and use the funds needed for such legal aid, as well as the obligation to regulate remuneration for the provision of this service, inter alia, on the grounds of the professional activity of advocates, so that financial resources would be used rationally and distributed in an even manner, so that such legal aid would be accessible to everyone to whom it is necessary, as well as so that speedy legal proceedings and choosing the most effective means and measures of the defence of rights would be encouraged.

It should also be emphasised that advocates, in assuming the obligation to render legal aid funded from public funds, in the light of the essence of the activity of providing independent professional legal aid and the purpose of the law regulating state-guaranteed legal aid, should be treated as respectively bound by the obligation, stemming from the specific nature of their profession, not to dismiss the risk of additional costs and expenses and to evaluate such a risk where the rendering of the service becomes prolonged due to objective reasons, as well as to maintain high standards of their professional activity, inter alia, to choose such legitimate ways and measures of defence that would comply, as much as possible, with the requirements of proper, inter alia, speedy, economical, and fair legal proceedings. Thus, the providers of legal aid guaranteed by the state, who have agreed to render it under agreement concluded of their own free will, may not be considered to have gained the legitimate expectation that, where the rendering of the service becomes prolonged due to objective reasons, all work costs incurred in connection with the rendering of the public service will additionally be reimbursed from state budget funds.

[...]

... a law may establish a differentiated legal regulation with respect to certain categories of persons who are in different situations. Such a provision of the official constitutional doctrine is mutatis mutandis applicable to the legal regulation governing the funding from state budget funds the activity of advocates who may provide public legal services independently under the procedure established by means of a law and on the grounds of an agreement, as well as the activity of prosecutors and judges who perform their professional legal activity (hold office) in state institutions.

Thus, there are no grounds for stating that the requirement stems from Article 29 of the Constitution to establish a uniform system of remuneration from state budget funds or other public funds for the work of state officials or state servants and persons engaged in independent professional activities – for legal services rendered by advocates.

Consequently, there are also no grounds for stating that the requirement stems from Article 48 of the Constitution to establish the system of remuneration from state budget funds or other public funds for the work of advocates rendering state-guaranteed legal service where such a system, according to its elements ... would not be different from the system of remuneration (elements thereof) for the work of judges, prosecutors, or other state officials or servants working in the same legal system.

The duty of the state to ensure the provision of effective legal aid to persons to whom access to legal aid is particularly difficult due to financial reasons in those cases where the provision of effective legal aid is necessary in the interests of justice

See 2.1.5.2.2. The right to a fair trial, the ruling of 11 October 2018.

The right to an advocate; the duty of the state to ensure effective legal aid in criminal and civil proceedings (Paragraph 1 of Article 30 and Paragraphs 2 and 6 of Article 31 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 1 March 2019

The Constitutional Court noted that the right of a person to have an advocate is one of the conditions for the effective implementation of the right of a person to judicial protection (rulings of 9 June 2011 and 9 July 2015). The constitutional right to defence, as well as the right to have an advocate, give rise to the obligation of the legislature to particularise, by means of laws, the implementation of this constitutional right of persons and the duty of state institutions to ensure the real possibilities for the implementation of these rights (inter alia, the rulings of 12 February 2001, 9 July 2015, and 11 October 2018).

... under the Constitution, when the implementation of the constitutional right to apply to a court, inter alia, to file an appeal with the court of appeal instance against the final act of a court of first instance, is regulated, the right to an advocate, as one of the conditions for the effective implementation of the right of a person to judicial protection, may not be transformed into the duty restricting this constitutional right, inter alia, to the extent that the possibility of exercising the right itself would be denied.

[...]

... seeking to ensure the right of a person to judicial protection, which is consolidated in Paragraph 1 of Article 30 of the Constitution, and compliance with the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law, as well as the right to the due process of law as implied by the said right and principle, the duty stems for the legislature, taking into account the financial capabilities of the state and having regard to the obligations stemming from the Constitution, inter alia, Paragraphs 2 and 6 of Article 31 thereof, to primarily ensure the provision of effective legal aid in criminal cases to those socially sensitive (vulnerable) persons for whom, in the ordinary market of legal services, it would otherwise be fictitious or its access would be extremely difficult due to financial reasons, as well as in other cases where it is necessary in the interests of justice. It should also be noted that, under the Constitution, inter alia, Paragraph 1 of Article 30 thereof, and the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law, the legislature must also establish such a legal regulation under which, in the cases established in the law, the legal aid guaranteed by the state would be provided, inter alia, in civil proceedings, to those persons for whom it would be altogether impossible to implement their right to apply to a court if such aid were not provided.

Thus, under the Constitution, in view of the particularities of civil and criminal proceedings, the provision of legal aid, which is financed from state budget funds or other public funds and is ensured by special institutional and organisational means, inter alia, the possibility of receiving the assistance of a lawyer, may be regulated in a different manner in civil and criminal proceedings.

2.1.5.3. The constitutional principle of compensation for damage

Compensation for damage inflicted on persons as a result of unlawful actions performed by state institutions or officials (Paragraph 2 of Article 30 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 30 June 2000

One of the main ways of protecting violated rights and freedoms is compensation for damage inflicted as a result of unlawful actions.

Article 30 of the Constitution prescribes:

“A person whose constitutional rights or freedoms are violated shall have the right to apply to a court. Compensation for material and moral damage inflicted upon a person shall be established by law.”

The norm of Paragraph 2 of Article 30 of the Constitution provides for the duty of the legislature to pass a law or laws providing for compensation for damage for a person who has suffered material or moral damage. Laws must provide for the real protection of violated human rights and freedoms; this protection must be coordinated with the protection of other values consolidated in the Constitution.

Thus, the Constitution guarantees the right of an individual to compensation for material or moral damage, including the recovery of damage through judicial procedure.

While deciding the question of the legal responsibility of the state for damage inflicted as a result of actions performed by its institutions or officials, emphasis should be placed on the provisions of Article 5 of the Constitution, according to which the scope of power is limited by the Constitution and state institutions serve the people. On the grounds of these constitutional provisions, the constitutional principle of the protection of human rights and freedoms, as well as other principles found in a state under the rule of law, the conclusion should be drawn that, in the course of implementing Paragraph 2 of Article 30 of the Constitution, a law must provide for the duty of the state to compensate for material and moral damage inflicted as a result of unlawful actions performed by its institutions and officials. Only such interpretation of Paragraph 2 of Article 30 of the Constitution makes it possible to ensure the effective protection of violated constitutional rights and freedoms of individuals.

The nature of functions fulfilled by the state and the diversity of activities carried out by its institutions determine the particularities of the legal responsibility of the state; therefore, compensation for damage in various areas where the state fulfils its functions may be regulated in a different manner.

As mentioned before, the norm of Paragraph 2 of Article 30 of the Constitution obligates the legislature to pass laws that provide for compensation for damage. The Constitutional Court emphasises that the Constitution is a directly applicable act; therefore, even in the absence of the respective regulation established by means of a law, an individual, by making direct reference to Paragraph 2 of Article 30 of the Constitution and other articles thereof, in which guarantees are established for the protection of the respective human rights and freedoms, may claim compensation for damage inflicted on him/her as a result of unlawful actions performed by state institutions or its officials.

Compensation for damage inflicted on persons (Paragraph 2 of Article 30 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 19 August 2006

In protecting and defending human rights and freedoms (and, in general, individual rights and freedoms – not only those of natural persons, but also those of legal persons), inter alia, human dignity, a particular importance falls on the institution of compensation for damage. Paragraph 2 of Article 30 of the Constitution provides that compensation for material and moral damage inflicted on a person is established by law. Thus, the necessity to compensate for material and moral damage inflicted on a person is a constitutional principle (rulings of 20 January 1997 and 13 December 2004). This constitutional principle is inseparable from the principle of justice, which is consolidated in the Constitution: laws must create all necessary preconditions for fair compensation for inflicted damage. Thus, the Constitution imperatively requires that a law establish such a legal regulation according to which a person who has suffered damage as a result of unlawful actions could in all cases demand and receive fair compensation for that damage. ... it does not follow from the Constitution that it is possible to establish, by means of laws, some exceptions under which moral and/or material damage inflicted on a person is not compensated, for example, because of the reason that it was inflicted as a result of unlawful actions performed by the institutions or officials of the state itself. If a law, and the more so another legal act, established such a legal regulation by which the state would fully or partially avoid the duty to justly compensate for material and/or moral damage inflicted as a result of unlawful actions performed by state institution or officials, it would mean not only that the constitutional concept of compensation for damage is disregarded and that such a legal regulation is not in line with the Constitution (inter alia, Paragraph 2 of Article 30 thereof), but also that the raison d'être of the state itself as the common good of all society would be undermined.

It should be noted that the legislature, while regulating, by means of a law, the relationships linked with compensation for material and/or moral damage inflicted on a person, has a certain degree of discretion inasmuch as this is not restricted by the Constitution. Thus, a legal regulation established in laws may be differentiated according to whether damage inflicted as a result of unlawful actions is compensated under extrajudicial or judicial procedure; however, in any case, it is not allowed to establish any such a legal regulation that would deny the right of a person to apply to a court and to claim just compensation for damage inflicted as a result of unlawful actions. In the regulation of the said relationships by means of a law, it is also necessary to pay regard to the constitutional principles of the equality of the rights of persons, the inviolability and protection of property, the independence of courts, the due process of law, and other constitutional principles.

... the Constitution does not tolerate any such a legal regulation where a person who has sustained material and/or moral damage as a result of unlawful actions performed by state institutions and officials cannot in a court claim just compensation for such damage, or where a court, which must administer justice under the Constitution (inter alia, Article 109 thereof), cannot, while taking account of all significant circumstances of a case, establish the amount of material and/or moral damage inflicted on a person as a result of the said unlawful actions and cannot, while following law, inter alia, not violating the imperatives of justice, reasonableness, and proportionality, award just compensation for that material and/or moral damage sustained by the said person.

It should also be emphasised that the institution of compensation for damage inflicted as a result of unlawful actions performed by state institutions and officials implies, inter alia, that the right of a person to compensation for damage inflicted as a result of unlawful actions performed by state institutions and officials arises only once it is held, in accordance with the procedure established by means of laws (in compliance with the requirements of the due process of law), that particular state institutions and officials performed unlawful actions and that the said person sustained damage specifically due to the said unlawful actions performed by those state institutions and officials.

The legislature may exercise discretion while regulating the relationships linked with compensation for material and/or moral damage inflicted on a person as a result of unlawful actions performed by state institutions and officials; however, such discretion may not be interpreted as including the free discretion to establish a certain exhaustive (finite) list of cases in which such damage must be compensated for or to stipulate that in certain cases damage inflicted as a result of the said unlawful actions may be not subject to compensation.

Under the Constitution, the legislature also does not have the freedom to establish any minimum limits and prescribe that, where damage inflicted on a person by state institutions or officials is below the said limits, such damage would not be subject to compensation. Neither does the legislature have the constitutional powers to establish any maximum compensation limits of damage inflicted on a person by state institutions or officials where such limits would restrict a court and would prevent it from awarding just compensation for that material and/or moral damage sustained by a person.

It also needs to be mentioned that, in the regulation of the relationships of compensation for damage inflicted as a result of unlawful actions performed by state institutions and officials, it is not allowed to establish any such a legal regulation that would make compensation for damage dependent on whether a court decision by which a person is unlawfully sentenced (and which is quashed later) is appealed under appeal procedure or cassation procedure (ruling of 30 June 2000).

If all the said imperatives were disregarded, the preconditions would be created for the occurrence of such legal situations where damage inflicted on a person as a result of unlawful actions performed by state institutions and officials would be compensated partially or not compensated at all and the constitutional powers of courts to administer justice would be limited. This would also mean that the constitutional concept of compensation for damage is disregarded and that the constitutional principles of justice and a state under the rule of law are deviated from.

In this context, it should be noted that, under the Constitution, a person has the right to claim compensation for damage inflicted as a result of unlawful actions performed by state institutions and officials also where the particular case of compensation for damage is not specified in any law; meanwhile, courts, deciding such cases within their competence, have the constitutional powers to award the respective compensation for damage by directly applying the Constitution (principles of justice, legal certainty and legal security, proportionality, the due process of law, the equality of the rights of persons and the protection of legitimate expectations, as well as other provisions of the Constitution) and the general principles of law, by following, inter alia, the principle of reasonableness, etc.

[...]

... the Constitution does not prohibit the legislature from establishing in a law, by paying regard to the norms and principles of the Constitution, reasonable and well-founded criteria when regulating the relationships linked with compensation for damage inflicted as a result of unlawful actions performed by state institutions and officials where the said criteria would make it possible to establish (assess) the amount of the damage that should be compensated. Such criteria may be very different; they may be differentiated according to the nature, particularities, and other circumstances of the inflicted damage. The Constitutional Court held in its ruling of 30 June 2000 that compensation for damage in various areas where the state fulfils its functions may be regulated in a different manner. Thus, it is also allowed to establish such a separate special legal regulation that would include legal situations where damage is inflicted on a person not by any type of subjects, but only as a result of unlawful actions performed by state institutions and officials, or even a more special legal regulation that would include legal situations where damage is inflicted on a person not as a result of any type, but as a result of specific, unlawful actions performed by state institutions and officials; such differentiation of a legal regulation may also include the aforesaid criteria under which it would be possible to establish (assess) the amount of damage subject to compensation. However, as it was held in this ruling of the Constitutional Court, the overall legal regulation of the relationships linked with compensation for material and/or moral damage inflicted on a person as a result of unlawful actions performed by state institutions and officials may not be such where its differentiation would create the preconditions for interpreting the said legal regulation as implying the possibility of establishing an exhaustive (finite) list of cases where damage inflicted on a person must be subject to compensation.

It should also be emphasised that no criteria, expressis verbis specified in laws, on the basis of which it is possible to establish (assess) the amount of damage subject to compensation may impede a court from administering justice, i.e. by taking account of all significant circumstances of a case, from establishing the amount of material and/or moral damage inflicted on a person as a result of unlawful actions performed by state institutions and officials and, by following law, inter alia, by respecting the imperatives of justice, reasonableness, and proportionality, from awarding just compensation for material and/or moral damage sustained by a person.

Compensation for damage inflicted on persons: types of damage (material and moral damage); the possibility of claiming compensation for damage sustained by another person (Paragraph 2 of Article 30 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 19 August 2006

Paragraph 2 of Article 30 of the Constitution mentions expressis verbis two types of damage: material and moral damage, i.e. (correspondingly) property losses and moral (non-property) injuries (they may also be caused by physical pain), which may be assessed and compensated materially only on certain conditions. The legislature must pay regard to this constitutional distinction.

... the types of damage mentioned in Paragraph 2 of Article 30 of the Constitution may also be named in laws by different terms only if those terms do not deny (distort) the constitutional concept of the said types of damage.

The classification of damage (subject to compensation) inflicted on a person into material damage and moral damage, as consolidated in Paragraph 2 of Article 30 of the Constitution, determines the particularities of a legal regulation governing the relationships linked with compensation for damage of a particular type. One of such particularities is related to the establishment (assessment) of the amount of inflicted damage and to the form of compensation for that damage. While compensating for material damage, in all cases it is possible to follow the principle of full (adequate) compensation for damage (restitutio in integrum) when the amount of inflicted damage may be expressed in a monetary equivalent and damage may be compensated with money (also, this does not deny the possibility of compensating for material damage by means of other property or otherwise); thus, material losses are compensated with material assets. Meanwhile, as mentioned before, moral damage is a moral injury that can only be assessed and compensated materially on certain conditions; it is quite often completely impossible (inter alia, even by means of material compensation) to replace a moral injury suffered by a person, because it is impossible to return back the psychological, emotional, or another condition of a person that had been before this person suffered the aforesaid moral injury – such a condition sometimes (at best) can be newly created while using, inter alia, material (first of all, monetary) compensation for that moral damage (however, this does not mean that, sometimes, moral satisfaction alone for sustained moral damage is not indeed impossible). Material (monetary) compensation for moral damage, as the material equivalent of the said moral damage, must also be paid by following the principle of full (adequate) compensation for damage. In such cases, the application of such compensation has typical important characteristics, since the content of this material compensation virtually differs from the content of moral damage itself (which was inflicted and which is compensated); thus, according to its nature, such material compensation (regardless of its amount) cannot (or not always can) replace a moral injury suffered by a person. The purpose of such material (first of all, monetary) compensation for moral damage is to create the material preconditions for newly creating what is impossible to return, and to compensate a person as justly as possible for what often may not be replaced by anything at all – neither by money nor by any material property.

As such, the classification of damage (subject to compensation) inflicted on a person into material damage and moral damage is not identical to the classification of damage into damage for which material compensation may be claimed not only by persons who have sustained particular damage, but also by certain other persons, and into damage for which material compensation may be claimed only by a person who has sustained particular damage, as the possibility of material compensation for the said damage is related only to that person and may not be related to any other person. For instance, while paying regard to the constitutional imperative of the protection and defence of ownership (and related property rights) and other constitutional requirements, it needs to be held that the right to claim compensation for certain material damage must usually be inherited or transferred in any other way; however, such legal situations are also possible where the right to claim compensation for certain material damage is inseparably related only to the person who has sustained that damage and it may not be related to any other person. Also, the right to claim for material compensation for the moral damage inflicted on a person in some cases may be related only to the person who has sustained that damage; however, under the Constitution, legal situations are also possible where this right may be transferred to certain other persons.

It should be noted that it does not follow from the Constitution that compensation for material and/or moral damage inflicted on a person must in all cases be paid (or compensated otherwise) specifically to the person who has sustained such damage and that the respective compensation may not altogether be paid to another person (persons). In particular, legal situations should be mentioned where a person who sustained damage dies, the more so such legal situations where the fact that he/she was deprived of his/her life constitutes the content of the inflicted damage. ... the Constitution requires that a law establish such a legal regulation that would ensure that the state could not avoid the duty to pay compensation, provided that such compensation is reasonably claimed, for damage inflicted as a result of unlawful actions performed by its institutions and officials also in cases where it is not possible to pay compensation for that damage to the same person in whose respect those unlawful actions were performed precisely because of the fact that the person is dead, all the more so that the content of damage inflicted on the said person includes the fact that he/she was deprived of his/her life as a result of the aforementioned unlawful actions. Thus, the state may not avoid compensating for such damage in all cases where it is reasonably claimed by other persons and a person in whose respect the unlawful actions of state institutions and officials were performed and who sustained particular material and/or moral damage as a result of the said actions cannot claim himself/herself compensation for it because of the fact that the unlawfulness of the actions performed by state institutions and officials is established already after the death of the said person (sometimes the cause of which may be the said unlawful actions) or because of the fact that, even though the unlawfulness of the actions performed by state institutions and officials was established when the person was alive, he/she died earlier than he/she could (during a reasonable term established in a law) exercise his/her right to claim compensation for damage or he/she had exercised this right, but died before the decision of the respective state institution (inter alia, a court) was adopted and/or executed regarding the claim.

If such a legal regulation were established according to which it would be possible to pay the said compensation for damage inflicted as a result of unlawful actions performed by state institutions and officials only to a person who sustained that damage, and it would be impossible in any circumstances to pay compensation for that damage to other persons, even though the claims of other persons to compensate for the said damage inflicted not directly on them would be most reasoned on the basis of the imperatives of justice, reasonableness, and proportionality, arising from the Constitution, and on the basis of other provisions of the Constitution, it would mean that, in certain cases, the state, using a formal clause that it has itself created, tries to avoid its obligation and neglect its constitutional duty to compensate for damage inflicted as a result of unlawful actions performed by its institutions and officials; it would have to be stated that the state tries not to fulfil the said constitutional obligation even where a person dies specifically as a result of unlawful actions performed by state institutions and officials and that such unlawful actions caused the death of the person who, should he/she had survived, would have received compensation for the said damage. Such a position of the state, if it were consolidated in legal acts, would be incompatible not only with various provisions of the Constitution (inter alia, with those that consolidate family as the basis of society and the state and with those that protect and defend family, motherhood, fatherhood, childhood, and other constitutionally valuable social relationships), but also with the essence of the State of Lithuania itself, as a democratic state based on law and justice, as well as with its constitutional mission and nature.

The mere fact that a person in whose respect certain state institutions and officials directly performed certain unlawful actions, thereby inflicting damage on him/her, has exercised the right to claim (and receive) compensation for such damage does not mean that other persons are in general (in all cases) prevented from claiming (by applying to a court) compensation for (material or moral) damage sustained by them as a result of the same unlawful actions, even though those actions were not performed directly in their respect (e.g. the dependants of a person in whose respect unlawful actions were directly performed may have the independent right to claim (by applying to a court) compensation for damage inflicted on them, regardless of whether the said person has exercised his/her right of claim or not). Otherwise, the principles of justice and a state under the rule of law, which are established in the Constitution, would be diverged from, inter alia, the powers of a court to administer justice, which are consolidated in Article 109 of the Constitution, would be limited and the constitutional concept of compensation for damage, which is laid down, inter alia, in Paragraph 2 of Article 30 of the Constitution, would be disregarded.

[...]

... the absolute prohibition on inheriting the right of natural persons to compensation for damage that was inflicted as a result of certain unlawful actions performed by an interrogator, an investigator, a prosecutor, or a court limits, inter alia, the powers of a court to administer justice, which are consolidated in Article 109 of the Constitution, deviates from the constitutional concept of compensation for damage, which is laid down, inter alia, in Paragraph 2 of Article 30 of the Constitution, and violates the constitutional principles of justice and a state under the rule of law.

Compensation for damage inflicted on persons where such compensation is paid, inter alia, on the basis of a compulsory contractual insurance against liability (Paragraph 2 of Article 30 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 3 February 2010

The provision of Paragraph 2 of Article 30 of the Constitution, which consolidates the right of a person to receive compensation for material and moral damage inflicted on him/her, obligates the legislature to establish sufficient measures of the implementation of this right.

When performing the duty to adopt a law or laws that establish compensation for damage inflicted on a person, the legislature, by using its discretion, may choose and consolidate, in a law or laws, various forms of compensation for inflicted damage. ... the constitutional principle of justice also implies that damage must normally be compensated by the person who caused damage or by another person responsible for the actions of the person who caused that damage.

... the legislature, having taken into account, inter alia, the fact that the risk of inflicting damage (emergence of damage) is higher in certain spheres of activity and striving to ensure that damage inflicted on persons would be compensated efficiently and timely, may also establish such a legal regulation whereby, on the basis of a contract, the obligation of compensating for damage inflicted on other persons is undertaken by a person other than the one who inflicted damage or by a person who is responsible for the actions of the person who inflicted damage, i.e. to establish the so-called insurance-based method of compensation for damage. In establishing such a method of compensation for damage inflicted on a person, the legislature must consolidate the grounds for insurance-based compensation for damage.

... it should also be noted that the legislature, having taken into account the fact that the use of certain objects poses a higher risk to the rights and legitimate interests of other persons, as well as having taken into account the particularities of certain vocational or economic activities of other persons, may establish such a legal regulation according to which persons who use certain objects or who are engaged in certain vocational or economic activities must obtain insurance to cover their civil liability against causing damage. When establishing the grounds and conditions for compulsory insurance, the legislature may set, inter alia, the maximum amounts covered by insurance. In establishing such conditions, the legislature must ensure that the fulfilment of the duty to pay insurance contributions would not become an excessively heavy burden for a person who must, pursuant to the law, obtain insurance to cover his/her civil liability against causing damage.

... the activity of economic operators that undertake, in accordance with the procedure laid down in a law and on the basis of a contract, the obligation of compensating, to a certain extent, for damage caused by another person should be regarded as a type of certain economic-commercial activity. Thus, the legislature, when regulating the relationships of insurance-based compensation for damage, inter alia, when setting the grounds for the legal situation of operators that undertake, under a contract, the obligation of compensating, to the certain extent, damage caused by another person, must pay regard to the imperatives that stem, inter alia, from Article 46 of the Constitution.

[...]

It needs to be noted that a legal regulation governing the relationships of damage compensation may be differentiated, by means of laws, in view of whether a person is compensated for damage under judicial or extrajudicial procedure; however, under no circumstances is it allowed to establish such a legal regulation that would deny the right of a person to apply to a court and to demand just compensation for the inflicted damage from the operator that undertook, under a contract, the obligation of compensating for damage to a certain extent, or from the person who inflicted damage, or from another person who is responsible for the actions of the person who inflicted damage. When regulating the said relationships by means of a law, the constitutional principles of the equality of the rights of persons, justice, and other constitutional principles must be followed.

Under the Constitution, compensation for damage inflicted on a person must be real and fair.

The legislature may not establish any such a legal regulation that would create the preconditions for a situation where a person who has suffered damage, inter alia, moral damage, would not be able to receive fair compensation for damage.

The constitutional principle of compensation for damage is inseparable from the principle of justice, which is consolidated in the Constitution: laws must create all necessary preconditions for fair compensation for inflicted damage (ruling of 19 August 2006). Thus, the Constitution imperatively requires that a law must establish such a legal regulation according to which a person who has suffered damage could in all cases demand and receive fair compensation for that damage.

The constitutional imperative that damage must be compensated in a fair manner is also related to the constitutional principles of the proportionality and adequacy of compensation for damage, which require that the measures that are established in laws and are applicable be proportionate to the objective sought and not limit the rights of persons more than necessary in order to achieve the legitimate, universally significant, and constitutionally justifiable objective, and not create the preconditions for abusing law (ruling of 27 March 2009).

... the legislature, when laying down, inter alia, a legal regulation governing compensation for damage inflicted on a person in cases where certain subjects, on the basis of a compulsory insurance contract, undertake the obligation of compensating for damage inflicted by another person, is not obligated to establish such insurance-covered amounts that, upon the occurrence of the insured event, would in all cases ensure full compensation for damage. However, the legislature must not deny the constitutional right of a person to claim, on general grounds, full compensation for the damage inflicted on him/her, inter alia, when the insurance amount does not cover full compensation for damage, i.e. to claim compensation for damage from the person who inflicted damage or from another person who is responsible for the actions of the person who inflicted damage.

[...]

According to Paragraph 2 of the Constitutional Act on Membership of the Republic of Lithuania in the European Union, the norms of European Union law are a constituent part of the legal system of the Republic of Lithuania and, where it concerns the founding Treaties of the European Union, the norms of European Union law are applied directly, while in the event of the collision of legal norms, they have supremacy over the laws and other legal acts of the Republic of Lithuania.

... the relationships of compulsory insurance against civil liability of holders of vehicles are also regulated by the respective legal acts of the European Union. ... in the course of the regulation of the relationships of compulsory insurance against civil liability of holders of vehicles, the legislature must also pay regard to the requirements that originate from the legal acts of the European Union. The laws of the Republic of Lithuania that regulate the aforementioned relationships may not compete with the legal acts of the European Union.

The right of persons who sustained damage due to genocide to demand compensation for such damage from natural persons who committed this crime

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 29 November 2010

The constitutional right of a person to demand real and fair compensation for material and moral damage does not mean that a law may not define various conditions and grounds for the emergence of damage; taking account of this, the proper time limits for demanding such compensation are established.

In this context, it needs to be noted that damage may emerge on various grounds and under various circumstances, inter alia, also due to committing a crime, as well as due to such crimes as genocide, responsibility for which is not subject to statutory limitations under international documents.

[...]

Under Paragraph 2 of Article 30 of the Constitution and under the constitutional principle of justice, there may not be any such a legal regulation that would create the preconditions for such situations where damage sustained by persons, inter alia, damage due to genocide, could not be compensated in a fair manner.

... such a legal regulation whereby persons who sustained damaged due to genocide would not be allowed to receive fair compensation for damage due to the fact that they do not have the right to demand compensation for such damage from the natural persons who committed the crime of genocide and with regard to whom an effective court judgment has been adopted would be in conflict with the Constitution, inter alia, with Paragraph 2 of Article 30 thereof, and with the constitutional principle of justice.

Thus, the Constitution, inter alia, Paragraph 2 of Article 30 thereof, and the constitutional principle of justice give rise to the duty of the legislature to regulate the relationships of compensation for damage that occurred due to the perpetration of genocide (where such damage has not been compensated yet) so that persons who sustained damage due to genocide would have the right to demand, without being restricted by any time limits, fair compensation for damage from the natural persons who committed the crimes of genocide.

The duty to compensate for damage caused by a criminal act (Paragraph 2 of Article 30 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 19 May 2017

Paragraph 2 of Article 30 of the Constitution provides that compensation for material and moral damage inflicted on a person is established by law.

As held by the Constitutional Court, in protecting and defending human rights and freedoms, inter alia, human dignity, a particular importance falls on the institution of compensation for damage (ruling of 19 August 2006); compensation for damage inflicted as a result of unlawful actions is one of the main ways of protecting violated rights and freedoms (ruling of 30 June 2000).

In its acts (inter alia, the rulings of 19 August 2006, 3 February 2010, and 16 April 2015), the Constitutional Court formulated the broad constitutional doctrine of compensation for damage, which is based on the essential provision that the necessity to compensate for material and moral damage inflicted on a person is a constitutional principle, whose consolidation is aimed to ensure that persons who have suffered material or moral damage will be compensated.

[...]

... in order to attain a balance between the interests of an insolvent natural person and his/her creditors by means of the institution of the bankruptcy of a natural person, which is established in the law, the legislature may not deny the requirement, which arises from the Constitution (inter alia, from the principle of compensation for damage, laid down in Paragraph 2 of Article 30 thereof, as well as from the constitutional principles of justice and a state under the rule of law), that a person who has sustained material and moral damage must be compensated for in a fair manner. Consequently, when determining the conditions for releasing bankrupt natural persons from debt obligations, the legislature may not establish any such a legal regulation according to which persons would be able to avoid the obligation to compensate for the material and/or moral damage caused by them by committing a criminal act and a person who has sustained the said damage would not be able to receive fair compensation for it.

... in view of the fact that ... the personal bankruptcy process is aimed to attain a fair balance between the interests of the debtor and his/her creditors, it would be unfair to establish such a legal regulation under which the interests, inter alia, the desire to return to an active economic activity, of a person who has caused damage by committing a criminal act would have greater protection than the rights of a person who has sustained the said damage, i.e. his/her right to receive fair compensation for the sustained damage, which, at least in part, would restore the situation that had existed before the criminal act was committed. Thus, not only the insolvency of a person who has committed an intentional criminal act, but also the insolvency of a person who has committed a negligent criminal act, is not a constitutionally justifiable ground for releasing such a person from the obligation to compensate for the damage that he/she has caused.

Compensation for damage inflicted on persons as a result of the unlawful actions performed by state institutions or officials (inter alia, ministers) (Paragraph 2 of Article 30 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 8 March 2018

Paragraph 2 of Article 30 of the Constitution prescribes: "Compensation for material and moral damage inflicted upon a person shall be established by law."

As held by the Constitutional Court, the right of a person to claim compensation for damage inflicted by unlawful actions arises from Paragraph 2 of Article 30 of the Constitution (ruling of 19 May 2017); compensation for damage inflicted as a result of unlawful actions is one of the main ways of protecting violated rights and freedoms (ruling of 30 June 2000).

... mention should be made of some provisions of the official constitutional doctrine of compensation for damage, which have been formulated in the acts passed by the Constitutional Court, regarding the legal responsibility of the state for damage caused as a result of the actions carried out by its institutions or officials:

– on the basis of the constitutional provisions of Article 5 of the Constitution that the scope of power is limited by the Constitution and that state institutions serve the people, also on the basis of the constitutional principle of the protection of human rights and freedoms, as well as other principles of a state under the rule of law, the conclusion should be drawn that, in order to implement Paragraph 2 of Article 30 of the Constitution, a law must provide for the duty of the state to compensate for material and moral damage inflicted as a result of unlawful actions committed by its institutions and officials; only such interpretation of Paragraph 2 of Article 30 of the Constitution makes it possible to ensure the effective protection of the violated constitutional rights and freedoms of individuals (ruling of 30 June 2000); if a law, let alone another legal act, established such a legal regulation by which the state could fully or partially avoid the duty to justly compensate for material and/or moral damage inflicted as a result of unlawful actions committed by state institutions or officials, it would mean not only that the constitutional concept of compensation for damage is disregarded and that such a legal regulation is not in line with the Constitution (inter alia, with Paragraph 2 of Article 30 thereof), but also that the raison d'être of the state itself as the common good of all society would be undermined (ruling of 19 August 2006);

– the Constitution does not prohibit the legislature from establishing in a law, while paying regard to the norms and principles of the Constitution, the reasonable and well-founded criteria when regulating the relationships linked to compensation for damage inflicted as a result of unlawful actions committed by state institutions and officials where the said criteria would make it possible to establish (assess) the amount of damage that should be compensated; such criteria may be very different; they may be differentiated according to the nature, particularities, and other circumstances of the inflicted damage; on the other hand, no criteria, expressis verbis specified in the laws, by means of which it would be possible to establish (assess) the amount of damage that needs to be compensated, should impede a court from administering justice, i.e. by taking account of all the significant circumstances of the case, from establishing the amount of material and/or moral damage inflicted on a person as a result of unlawful actions committed by state institutions or officials and, by following the law, inter alia, without prejudice to the imperatives of justice, reasonableness, and proportionality, from awarding fair compensation for the material and/or moral damage sustained by the person (rulings of 19 August 2006 and 16 April 2015).

Thus, under the Constitution (inter alia, Paragraph 3 of Article 5 and Paragraph 2 of Article 30 thereof) and the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law, the material and/or moral damage sustained by a person as a result of unlawful actions committed by state institutions or officials must be compensated for while taking into account the reasonable and well-founded criteria, as established by means of a law, in order to determine the amount of damage. ... this duty of the state should be interpreted as including its obligation to compensate a person for the material and/or moral damage suffered by him/her as a result of the unlawful actions committed by a minister in the exercise of his/her powers of internal administration with respect to the ministry and the establishments assigned to the area entrusted to the ministry.

... as held by the Constitutional Court, the constitutional principle of justice implies, inter alia, that damage must normally be compensated by the person who has caused it or by another person responsible for the actions of the said person (rulings of 3 February 2010 and 6 December 2013).

... the principle of responsible governance, as consolidated in the Constitution, implies that all state institutions and officials are obliged to follow the Constitution and law while performing their functions and must properly implement the powers granted to them under the Constitution and laws by acting in the interests of the Nation and the State of Lithuania; the principle of transparency, as one of the principles governing the activity of public authority institutions and officials, which arises from the Constitution, implies, among other things, the responsibility of decision-making officials for their decisions; transparency is a necessary precondition, inter alia, for preventing the abuse of power; therefore, it is a necessary precondition for people to have trust in public authority institutions and the state in general.

It also needs to be mentioned that the state performs its functions through the system of respective institutions; this system includes, first of all, state institutions (ruling of 13 December 2004); if state institutions or officials act ultra vires, such acts may not, unreservedly, be equated with the acts of the state itself (ruling of 30 October 2008).

... the personal responsibility of a minister as implied by the provision “Ministers shall head their respective ministry” of Paragraph 1 of Article 98 of the Constitution means his/her personal responsibility for all his/her activities, inter alia, for the proper exercise of the powers of internal administration with respect to the ministry and the establishments assigned to the area entrusted to the ministry; in view of the overall legal regulation consolidated in the Constitution, there are no grounds for stating that, under the Constitution, ministers are subject to other rules of legal responsibility compared with other persons (except for immunity provided for in Article 100 of the Constitution in cases where criminal responsibility or the restriction of liberty is applied to ministers).

Thus, under the Constitution, inter alia, the constitutional principles of responsible governance and a state under the rule of law, if state officials, inter alia, ministers, when improperly exercising the powers conferred on them under the Constitution and laws, inflict material and/or moral damage on persons by their unlawful actions (or inaction), such their actions cannot be equated with the actions (or inaction) of the state itself (or institutions thereof); state officials, inter alia, ministers who have inflicted damage must be held responsible in the prescribed manner for their actions that have caused damage.

In this context, it should also be noted that, under Paragraph 2 of Article 128 of the Constitution, the procedure for the possession, use, and disposal of state property is established by law.

Under the Constitution, property that belongs to the state by right of ownership should be managed in such a way that it would serve the general welfare of the nation and the interest of all society; the Constitution gives rise to the requirement that state-owned property must be used sparingly, not wasted, and managed rationally (rulings of 30 September 2003 and 24 October 2012); while acting in the interests of society, state institutions must serve the common good of the nation (ruling of 30 September 2003).

Thus, under the Constitution, inter alia, Paragraph 3 of Article 5, Paragraph 2 of Article 30, and Paragraph 2 of Article 128 thereof, as well as under the constitutional principles of responsible governance and a state under the rule of law, in order to ensure proper respect for the interests of all society, it is necessary to create the preconditions for the state, after it has fulfilled (through its institutions) its constitutional duty to compensate a person for material and/or moral damage inflicted by the unlawful actions (or inaction) of state institutions and officials, inter alia, ministers, for obtaining (in whole or in part) reimbursement for the losses suffered due to this by the state from the state officials, inter alia, ministers, who have improperly exercised the powers conferred on them under the Constitution and laws. This is the only way to ensure that property owned by the state will serve the general welfare of the nation. Meanwhile, without creating such preconditions, it would not be ensured, inter alia, that state officials, inter alia, ministers, who have caused damage would be held responsible for their actions according to the established procedure and, therefore, that people would have trust in public authority institutions and the state in general; this would be incompatible with the Constitution, inter alia, the constitutional principles of responsible governance and a state under the rule of law.

As mentioned before, under the Constitution, the material and/or moral damage suffered by a person as a result of unlawful actions committed by state institutions or officials must be compensated by taking into account the reasonable and well-founded criteria, as established by means of a law, in order to determine the amount of that damage. ... the above-mentioned provisions of the official constitutional doctrine are also mutatis mutandis applicable to regulating, by means of a law, the duty of the state to compensate for damage caused as a result of unlawful actions committed by a minister in the exercise of the powers of internal administration with respect to the ministry and the establishments assigned to the area entrusted to the ministry, as well as to regulating, by means of a law, the procedure for implementing the right of the state, after it has fulfilled the said duty, to recourse against the person – a minister – who has caused the damage.

2.2. CIVIL (INDIVIDUAL) RIGHTS AND FREEDOMS

2.2.1. The right to life

Human life and dignity are exceptional values

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 9 December 1998

Human life and dignity constitute the integrity of a personality and they denote the essence of an individual. Life and dignity are the inalienable properties of an individual; therefore, they may not be treated separately. Innate human rights are the innate possibilities of an individual that ensure his/her human dignity in the spheres of social life. ...

Thus, human life and dignity, as expressing the integrity and singular essence of a human being, are above a law. In view of this, human life and dignity should be deemed to be exceptional values. In such a case, the purpose of the Constitution is to ensure the defence of and respect for these values. First of all, the state itself is subject to these requirements.

The particularities of formulating the human rights and freedoms that are consolidated in Chapter II of the Constitution (Article 19 of the Constitution does not contain any exceptions that would allow depriving individuals of their life on behalf of the state)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 9 December 1998

The Constitutional Court, treating the human rights and freedoms that are consolidated in Chapter II of the Constitution as an integral catalogue, draws attention to the particularities of the wording of these rights and freedoms. As a rule, the fundamental rights listed in this chapter of the Constitution are presented as a general norm. However, where there are exceptions to this norm, they are pointed to. For instance, Article 20 of the Constitution prescribes: “Human liberty shall be inviolable.” Paragraph 2 of the same article establishes the prohibition on the arbitrary apprehension or detention of an individual; an individual may not be deprived of his/her liberty otherwise than on the grounds and according to the procedures established by means of a law. Article 23 of the Constitution prescribes: “Property shall be inviolable”, while Paragraph 3 thereof stipulates that property may be taken only for the needs of society according to the procedure established by law and must be justly compensated for. Article 21 of the Constitution, having stated that “Human dignity shall be protected by law”, specifies in Paragraph 2 that it is prohibited to degrade the dignity of a human being, to subject him/her to cruel treatment, or to establish such punishments. The constitutional articles on the inviolability of private life (Article 22), the inviolability of the home of a human being (Article 24), etc. are formulated in a similar manner. Meanwhile, Article 19 of the Constitution contains only one general norm: “The right to life of a human being shall be protected by law.” Thus, it should be presumed that the norm of Article 19 provides for no exception that would allow depriving individuals of their life on behalf of the state.

Therefore, it is possible to assert that the exceptional protection of innate rights as provided for in Article 18 of the Constitution prevents the establishment of the death penalty ...

The protection of the right to life and the death penalty (Article 19 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court’s ruling of 9 December 1998

Article 19 of the Constitution prescribes: “The right to life of a human being shall be protected by law.” ... human life is deemed to be the highest value in the law of democratic countries. ... Attention should be paid to the fact that the Constitution demands that the right to life, but not life itself, be protected by law.

The right to life of a human being is ensured by a rather broad system of legal means, which is established in the Constitution itself and in numerous other laws. The legal regulation together with moral, religious, and other social norms is, first of all, aimed at the protection of the right to life of a human being.

The norms of the criminal law that establish responsibility for committing an unlawful act by which an attempt on the life of a human being is made constitute a separate group. ...

The Constitutional Court has noted that the protection of common interests in a democratic state under the rule of law may not deny a concrete human right in general. The doctrine of human rights and freedoms, as well as international and domestic law, which are based on the said doctrine, relate such a solution of the aforementioned problem to a rational proportion ensuring that limitations will not violate the essence of a particular human right. ... the right to life is an innate right of every individual. It is indivisible. Either there is life or there is no life. A court sentence may or may not deprive an accused person of his/her life. In the latter case, another punishment is imposed. After the imposition and execution of the death penalty, the life of a human being ceases. At the same time, the innate right to life of that human being, which is protected under the norm of the Constitution, is denied.

... a sanction providing for an alternative between the death penalty and the deprivation of liberty ... also raises an additional constitutional problem, deriving from the ... indivisible nature of the death penalty. ... a court, conforming to the grounds for imposing punishments that are established in criminal laws, chooses an optimal punishment according to the sanction and imposes it on the prisoner at the bar. An essential difference arises when the death penalty is imposed. In such a case, a court has only the option that it may either impose it or not to impose it. However, the law does not and cannot indicate unequivocally as to when the death penalty must be imposed. Therefore, it is possible to assert that, in such a case, the final decision concerning the imposition of the death penalty depends not only on the law, but also on a court. Consequently, the decision of whether or not to impose the death penalty may depend on the psychological state of judges (compassion or, on the contrary, strictness, the fear to adopt a wrong decision, etc.), on the professionalism and activity of the defence or the prosecution, as well as on numerous other subjective circumstances.

Finally, attention should be drawn to the circumstance that a court may face the difficulty to judge on the basis of objective criteria as to which individual deserves to be punished by death and which to be imprisoned for life. Besides, no matter what guarantees are ensured in criminal proceedings in a state under the rule of law, the possibility of a mistake always exists. As it is evident from judicial practice in various states, it is impossible to protect courts from such mistakes and, after the death penalty is carried out, no possibilities exist for rectifying such a mistake. The possibility itself that a person who does not deserve it or who is innocent may be sentenced to death is not in line with the right to life, guaranteed by the Constitution.

[...]

Taking account of ... the entirety of the norms of the Constitution (adopted by the nation in a referendum) that protect the right of a human being to life and dignity, the Constitutional Court holds that the Constitution does not contain any prerequisites for establishing the death penalty in a norm of a law.

Human life and dignity are exceptional values; the connection of these values with the right of individuals to the best possible health

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 16 May 2013

Human life and dignity are exceptional values expressing the integrity and singular essence of a human being (ruling of 9 December 1998). The state is under the constitutional obligation to protect and defend these values. ... It is clear that human dignity, the right to life, and the right to the best possible health are so tightly interrelated that, on the one hand, in cases where proper health protection is not ensured, the protection of the human right to life and human dignity will no longer be fully fledged; on the other hand, the right to sustaining and saving life where the life of a person is in danger is an inseparable and fundamental part of the human right to the best possible health.

2.2.2. Human dignity and the inviolability of the human person

The prohibition on torturing or injuring human beings, degrading their dignity, subjecting them to cruel treatment, or establishing such punishments (Paragraph 3 of Article 21 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 9 December 1998

Paragraph 3 of Article 21 of the Constitution prescribes: "It shall be prohibited to torture or injure a human being, degrade his dignity, subject him to cruel treatment, or to establish such punishments." ...

[...]

First of all, it should be noted that Paragraph 3 of Article 21 of the Constitution ... links the prohibition on torturing or injuring a human being, degrading his/her dignity, or subjecting him/her to cruel treatment or cruel punishments with the activities of the state and its institutions. This means that such prohibitions are established in an attempt to protect an individual from the unlawful actions of a state official or any other person authorised by the state.

Analysing the conduct that is prohibited by the Constitution, it needs to be noted that not every action that is performed by officials and has adverse effects on an individual may be judged to be unlawful. For instance, negative consequences and, in certain respects, suffering appear after the imposition of sanctions provided for in the criminal law and recognised by the international community in cases where such sanctions establish the respective restrictions on a person (e.g. the deprivation of liberty, a fine, limitations on rights, etc.). Such restrictions constitute a compulsory element of punishment and problems never arise as to their lawfulness. This means that such cases where, for instance, a suspect is apprehended or a person is punished by the deprivation of liberty following a court decision and, due to this, such a person suffers or experiences certain inconveniences may not be treated as punishments prohibited by the Constitution.

The death penalty should be assessed differently. It is generally recognised that it is cruel. However, it cannot be failed to mention the following aspect: the death penalty is provided for a murder committed under aggravating circumstances. Thus, it should be held that, in such a case, two aspects of cruelty come into collision: the cruelty of a crime and that of the punishment. Still, it should be recognised that the cruelty of a crime as such does not counterbalance the cruelty of the death penalty. Meanwhile, continually repeated acts of cruelty cannot avoid exerting influence on the socio-psychological state of society and on the cultivation of tolerance for continuous cruelty.

Assessing the death penalty through the prism of the conduct prohibited by the Constitution, a specific aspect of the said penalty becomes apparent. The degradation of the dignity of a convict derives essentially from the cruelty of the death penalty itself. The cruelty manifests itself by the fact that, after the death sentence is carried out, the human essence of such a criminal is also denied, he/she is deprived of any human dignity, as the state in that case treats the person as a mere object to be eliminated from the human community.

The right to the inviolability of the human person (Paragraph 1 of Article 21 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 8 May 2000

The human right to the inviolability of the human person is enshrined in Paragraph 1 of Article 21 of the Constitution. The content of the inviolability of the human person as a value protected by law is composed of physical and psychological inviolability. This means that laws must guarantee that an individual will be protected against any unreasonable outward impact on his/her life, health, and freedom of physical activity and against any infringement on his/her psychological or mental state or intellectual or creative expression that might be carried out by state or municipal institutions, their officials or employees, as well as by any other persons.

The human right to physical liberty, which is established in Paragraph 1 of Article 20 of the Constitution, is closely connected with the human right to the inviolability of the human person. The inviolability of the liberty of an individual is a prerequisite for freedom of decision making; it creates the preconditions for performing any lawful actions and implementing legal possibilities in various spheres of life. It is possible to maintain that the inviolability of the human person establishes the limits of the liberty of other persons, i.e. the conduct of the latter is permissible as long as it is not harmful to the inviolability of the human person of another individual. ...

It needs to be emphasised that the human right to liberty and the inviolability of the human person may be subject to limitation where necessary. This may be done only on the grounds and in accordance with the procedure established in laws. Paragraph 2 of Article 20 of the Constitution states: "No one may be deprived of his liberty otherwise than on the grounds and according to the procedures established by law."

The protection and defence of human dignity (Paragraphs 2 and 3 of Article 21 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 29 December 2004

Paragraph 2 of Article 21 of the Constitution prescribes: "Human dignity shall be protected by law."

Dignity is an inalienable characteristic of a human being as the greatest social value. Every member of society has innate dignity. In its ruling of 9 December 1998, the Constitutional Court held that innate human rights are the innate possibilities of an individual that ensure his/her human dignity in the spheres of social life. It should be noted that dignity is characteristic of every human being, irrespective of how he/she assesses himself/herself or other people assess him/her.

Paragraph 2 of Article 21 of the Constitution should also be interpreted within the context of Paragraph 3 of this article. It is established in Paragraph 3 of Article 21 of the Constitution, inter alia, that it is prohibited to degrade the dignity of a human being. Thus, the Constitution establishes the duty of the state to ensure the protection and defence of human dignity. The fact that the legislature, while regulating relationships linked with the implementation of human rights and freedoms, must guarantee their proper protection constitutes one of the conditions for the ensuring of human dignity as a constitutional value.

The duty of the state to ensure the protection and defence of human dignity also means that state institutions and officials may not unreasonably limit human rights and freedoms, treat an individual solely as a subject belonging to a particular social, economic, professional, or another category. In every case, an individual must be regarded as a free personality, whose human dignity should be respected. State institutions and officials have the duty to respect human dignity as a special value. Violations of human rights and freedoms may also undermine human dignity.

The protection and defence of human dignity

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 19 August 2006

In protecting and defending human rights and freedoms (and, in general, individual rights and freedoms – not only those of natural persons, but also those of legal persons), inter alia, human dignity, a particular importance falls on the institution of compensation for damage.

The right to the inviolability of the human person (Article 21 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 4 June 2012

... Article 21 of the Constitution gives rise to the duty of the legislature to establish such a legal regulation that would ensure the human right to the inviolability of the human person and would take all necessary measures to protect this right. The protection of the physical and psychological inviolability of a human being, inter alia, from criminal acts, is a constitutionally important objective and a public interest.

Human life and dignity are exceptional values; the connection of these values with the right of individuals to the best possible health

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 16 May 2013

Human life and dignity are exceptional values expressing the integrity and singular essence of a human being (ruling of 9 December 1998). The state is under the constitutional obligation to protect and defend these values. The Constitutional Court has held that innate human rights are the innate possibilities of an individual that ensure his/her human dignity in the spheres of social life; the fact that the legislature, while regulating the relationships connected with the implementation of human rights and freedoms, must guarantee their proper protection constitutes one of the conditions for ensuring human dignity as a constitutional value (rulings of 29 December 2004 and 2 September 2009 and the decision of 20 April 2010). It is clear that human dignity, the right to life, and the right to the best possible health are so tightly interrelated that ... in cases where proper health protection is not ensured, the protection of the human right to life and human dignity will no longer be fully fledged ...

The connections of human dignity with other constitutional values

The Constitutional Court's conclusion of 19 December 2017

... the dignity of an individual as a free personality is inseparable from the inviolability of the human person and ... the content of the inviolability of the human person is composed of physical and mental inviolability. The inviolability of the human person is a necessary precondition for the expression of the freedom of physical activity, intellectual and creative freedoms of the person, thus, also for the expression of the free personality of the person; an infringement on the inviolability of the human person disturbs the physical, mental, or spiritual state of the person; thus, human dignity as a special constitutional value is also violated. Therefore, the guarantee of the inviolability of the human person, as consolidated in Paragraph 1 of Article 21 of the Constitution, should be regarded as one of the elements of the constitutional protection of human dignity.

The constitutional protection of human dignity is also enshrined in other provisions of the Constitution as, for instance, in Paragraph 4 of Article 22 thereof, whereby no one may be subject to arbitrary or unlawful interference with his/her private and family life, as well to encroachment upon his/her honour and dignity. Thus, under the Constitution, the protection of human dignity is inseparable from the protection of the private life of a person, which is guaranteed in Paragraph 1 of Article 22 of the Constitution, according to which private life is inviolable.

... an arbitrary and unlawful interference with the private life of an individual is, at the same time, an infringement on his/her honour and dignity (inter alia, the rulings of 29 December 2004 and 21 December 2006).

... the physical and mental inviolability of a person comprises the content of the inviolability of the human person and is covered by the right of a person to privacy. Accordingly, an infringement on the inviolability of the human person – his/her physical or mental inviolability – is simultaneously an arbitrary and unlawful interference with his/her private life and, thus, also an infringement on his/her honour and dignity. In view of this, the guarantee of the inviolability of the private life of a person, which is consolidated in Paragraph 1 of Article 22 of the Constitution, as well as the guarantee of the inviolability of the human person, enshrined in Paragraph 1 of Article 21 of the Constitution, should be considered an element of the constitutional protection of human dignity.

The prohibition of discrimination against persons on the grounds of gender, race, nationality, language, origin, social status, belief, convictions, or views, which arises from Article 29 of the Constitution, consolidating the principle of the equality of the rights of persons, should also be considered an element of the constitutional protection of human dignity.

[...]

... dignity is an inalienable characteristic of a human being as the greatest social value. All people by nature should be deemed equal in terms of their dignity and rights. Thus, discrimination prohibited under Article 29 of the Constitution in cases where human rights are restricted on the grounds of gender, race, nationality, language, origin, social status, belief, convictions, or views also degrades the dignity of the discriminated person.

Harassment as conduct degrading human dignity

See 2. The constitutional status of persons, 2.1. General provisions, 2.1.2. The principle of the equality (of the rights) of persons, the conclusion of 19 December 2017 (“Harassment as one of the forms of discrimination”).

2.2.3. The inviolability of human liberty

The constitutional grounds for restricting human liberty; limiting individual rights and freedoms, inter alia, the right to the inviolability of correspondence, of persons sentenced to the deprivation of liberty

The Constitutional Court’s ruling of 24 March 2003

Paragraph 1 of Article 20 of the Constitution provides that human liberty shall be inviolable. Under Paragraph 2 of the same article, no one may be deprived of his/her liberty otherwise than on the grounds and according to the procedures established by law.

A person who has committed a criminal act may be given a sentence of the deprivation of liberty. Such a sentence must be established in a law. Under Paragraph 4 of Article 31 of the Constitution, punishment may be imposed or applied only on the grounds established by law. In the Republic of Lithuania, justice is administered only by courts (Paragraph 1 of Article 109 of the Constitution). Punishment may be imposed only on the basis of a court sentence.

Thus, the Constitution provides that the liberty of a person who commits a crime may be restricted on the grounds and according to the procedure established by law. On restricting the liberty of such a person, his/her rights and freedoms, including the inviolability of correspondence, may be subject to limitation.

The persons sentenced to the deprivation of liberty are isolated from society in places of detention, in which their conduct is under control; convicts may be searched, their correspondence may be censored, etc. Limitations imposed on convicts are objective elements constituting the content of the punishment of the deprivation of liberty; without these limitations, the deprivation of liberty would lose its sense. Thus, the censorship of the correspondence of convicts is permitted in places of detention, because it constitutes a means of control over the conduct of convicts. According to the Constitution, the grounds and procedure for the censorship of the correspondence of convicts, as one of the elements of the content of the punishment of the deprivation of liberty, must be established by means of a law.

Under the Constitution, a person is declared guilty of committing a crime and is sentenced only by an effective court judgment. Such a court judgment empowers the institutions that execute sentences and supervise the lawfulness of the execution of sentences to impose on a convict those limitations on rights and freedoms that are associated with the type of punishment imposed on him/her, including the censorship, on the grounds established in the law and in accordance with the procedure provided for in the law, of the correspondence of a person sentenced to the deprivation of liberty.

When establishing a legal regulation limiting the human rights and freedoms, as well as the right to the inviolability of correspondence, of persons sentenced to the deprivation of liberty, the legislature is bound by the Constitution. According to the Constitution, the right of convicts to the inviolability of correspondence may be limited only by means of a law specifying the grounds and procedure for this limitation. The limitation in question must be such that would result in a reasonable relationship between the chosen measures and the pursued legitimate and universally important objective. To achieve this objective, such measures may be established that would be sufficient and would limit the rights of the person not more than it is necessary (rulings of 6 December 2000 and 2 October 2001). The Constitutional Court has noted that the protection of common interests in a democratic state under the rule of law may not deny any concrete human right or freedom in general and that the established and applied restrictions may not violate the essence of any particular human right (rulings of 9 December 1998 and 24 March 2003).

Limiting the right of persons sentenced to the deprivation of liberty to the inviolability of correspondence (Paragraphs 1 and 2 of Article 22 of the Constitution)

See 2.2.4. The inviolability of private life, the ruling of 26 February 2015.

2.2.4. The inviolability of private life

The right to privacy (Article 22 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 21 October 1999

Article 22 of the Constitution prescribes:

“Private life shall be inviolable.

Personal correspondence, telephone conversations, telegraph messages, and other communications shall be inviolable.

Information concerning the private life of a person may be collected only upon a justified court decision and only according to the law.

The law and courts shall protect everyone from arbitrary or unlawful interference with his private and family life, as well as from encroachment upon his honour and dignity.”

The norms established in this article of the Constitution protect the right of an individual to privacy. This right includes private, family, and home life, the physical and psychological inviolability of an individual, his/her honour and reputation, the secrecy of personal facts, the prohibition on making public the received or acquired confidential information, etc. If the private life of an individual is interfered with in an arbitrary and unlawful manner, then, at the same time, his/her honour and dignity are encroached upon.

Persons may not expect privacy if they perform acts of a public nature or violate legal norms, commit crimes or other violations of law

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 8 May 2000

The legal concept of private life is linked with the state of an individual when he/she may expect privacy or with legitimate expectations for private life. If a person performs acts of a public nature, whether at home or on other private premises, and if he/she understands, must understand, or is capable of understanding such a fact, then such actions of a public nature will not be protected under Article 22 of the Constitution ... and such a person may not expect privacy.

The activities of state and municipal officials linked with the performance of the functions of state and municipal power and administration are always of a public nature. In a democratic state under the rule of law, the public performance of duties by state officials and state servants is one of the essential principles of protection against their arbitrariness or abuse.

In cases where a person violates the norms of private law that regulate commercial or any other secrets of private nature, he/she may not expect complete privacy, either. For example, a contracting party to an agreement containing a commercial secret applies to a court or another institution that settles disputes; the said contracting party reveals the content of the agreement and requests that the party that breached it fulfil the conditions of the agreement and pay damages. In such a case, after breaching the conditions of the agreement, the party that breached them may not expect that the other party to the agreement would not defend its rights before a court or another institution that settles disputes.

The Constitutional Court notes that a person who commits criminal acts or acts contrary to law must not and may not expect privacy. The limits of the protection of the private life of an individual cease to exist in cases where, by his/her actions or in a criminal or any other unlawful manner, he/she violates the interests protected by law, or inflicts damage on particular persons, society, or the state.

The guarantees of the inviolability of private life (Paragraphs 3 and 4 of Article 22 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 19 September 2002

The provision "Information concerning the private life of a person may be collected only upon a justified court decision and only according to the law" of Paragraph 3 of Article 22 of the Constitution and the provision "The law and courts shall protect everyone from arbitrary or unlawful interference with his private and family life, as well as from encroachment upon his honour and dignity" of Paragraph 4 of the same article are among the most important guarantees of the inviolability of the private life of a person. The said provisions protect the private life of a person against unlawful interference by state or other institutions, their officials, or other persons.

A balance between the inviolability of private life and freedom of information (Articles 22 and 25 of the Constitution); compensation for damage inflicted as a result of imparting information about private life (Paragraph 2 of Article 30 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 23 October 2002

The provisions of Article 22 of the Constitution, which consolidate the inviolability of private life, are related to other provisions of the Constitution and must be interpreted while taking account of them ... There is a balance among the values consolidated in Articles 22 and 25 of the Constitution. In the course of the regulation of the relationships connected with informing the public, the duty arises for the legislature to pay regard to the balance of the said constitutional values.

[...]

... There are such areas of private life (e.g. intimate life) the information about which may neither be collected nor published without the consent of the person, unless (and only inasmuch as) this helps to detect a crime committed by that person.

Article 28 of the Constitution provides that, while implementing his/her rights and exercising his/her freedoms, everyone must observe the Constitution and laws of the Republic of Lithuania and may not restrict the rights and freedoms of other people. Under Paragraph 2 of Article 30 of the Constitution, compensation for material and moral damage inflicted on a person is established by law. The legislature has the duty to stipulate by means of a law that, in cases where information about the private life of an individual is imparted without the consent of that individual and, due to this, damage is inflicted on the said individual (with the exception of cases where the dissemination of such information helps to detect crimes or violations of law, or where the said dissemination discloses such circumstances of the private life of the said person that are of public importance), then the inflicted damage must be compensated. Such compensation for damage includes both material and moral damage. Compensation must be adequate for the material and/or moral damage inflicted.

Imparting information about the private life of public persons

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 23 October 2002

... the personal characteristics, conduct, and certain circumstances of the private life of persons participating in social and political activities may be important for public affairs. The interest of the public to know more about these persons than about others is constitutionally justifiable. The said interest would not be ensured if, in every particular case, when publishing the information of public importance about the private life of a person participating in social and political activities, the consent of the said person were necessary. Consequently, the media may inform the public about the private life of such a person without the consent of that person inasmuch as the personal characteristics, conduct, and certain circumstances of the private life of the said person may be important for public affairs; due to this, the published information is of public importance. A person participating in social and political activities can expect increased public and media attention towards him/her. Such persons, as a rule, are called public persons.

Persons who, due to the office that they hold or due to the nature of the work that they perform, participate in public life should be categorised as public persons in the first place. They are politicians, state or municipal officials, or the heads of public organisations. Other persons may also be considered public persons if their activity is important for public affairs.

The Constitution does not use the notion of a public person. When establishing the institution of a public person, the legislature must define the criteria under which certain persons may be categorised as public persons. It needs to be noted that the post of a person or his/her participation in social activity in itself may not be considered necessary or sufficient criteria under which such a person could be categorised as a public person. The legislature, when establishing, by means of a law, the criteria under which a person may be categorised as a public person, must pay regard to the balance between the right of an individual to privacy, enshrined in Article 22 of the Constitution, and the interest of the public, which is guaranteed and safeguarded by the Constitution, to be informed about all factors capable of exerting influence on public affairs.

It needs to be noted that certain facts of the private life of public persons and their personal characteristics, as a rule, naturally reveal themselves in their public activity. In its ruling of 8 May 2000, the Constitutional Court held that, when a person performs acts of a public nature, whether at home or on other private premises, and if he/she understands, must understand, or is capable of understanding such a fact, such actions of a public nature will not be protected under Article 22 of the Constitution and such a person may not expect privacy.

The inviolability of private life (Article 22 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 24 March 2003

The Constitution provides that private life is the personal life of an individual: the way of life, marital status, living surroundings, relationships with other people, the views, convictions, or habits of an individual, his/her physical or psychological state, health, honour, dignity, etc. The inviolability of private life, established in Article 22 of the Constitution, implies the right of a person to privacy. The right of an individual to privacy includes the inviolability of private, family, and home life, the inviolability of honour and reputation, the physical and psychological inviolability of a person, the secrecy of personal facts, the prohibition on making public the received or acquired confidential information, etc. (rulings of 21 October 1999, 8 May 2000, 19 September 2002, and 23 October 2002).

The human right to privacy is not absolute. Under the Constitution, it is allowed to impose limitations on constitutional human rights and freedoms, including the right to privacy, if the following conditions are observed: the limitations are established by means of a law; the limitations are necessary in a democratic society in order to protect the rights and freedoms of other persons, the values consolidated in the Constitution, and the constitutionally important objectives; the limitations do not deny the nature and essence of rights and freedoms; and the constitutional principle of proportionality is followed (rulings of 19 September 2002 and 23 October 2002).

The legal concept of private life is linked with legitimate expectations for private life held by a person. If a person commits criminal acts or acts contrary to law, violates the interests protected by law, or inflicts damage on particular persons, society, or the state, he/she is aware, or must and can be aware, of the fact that this will lead to the particular reaction of state institutions and that, for a breach of law being committed (or one already committed), the state may apply coercive measures through which a certain influence will be exerted on his/her conduct. It needs to be noted that a person who has committed a criminal act must not and may not expect that his/her private life will be protected in a manner equal to that of persons who do not violate laws.

Limiting the right of persons sentenced to the deprivation of liberty to the inviolability of correspondence

See 2.2.3. The inviolability of human liberty, the ruling of 24 March 2003 (“The constitutional grounds for restricting human liberty; limiting individual rights and freedoms, inter alia, the right to the inviolability of correspondence, of persons sentenced to the deprivation of liberty”).

Limiting the right to privacy by means of preventive measures aimed at reducing organised crime

The Constitutional Court’s ruling of 29 December 2004

... in cases where data, received in accordance with the procedure established in laws, about the relations of persons with organised criminal groups, criminal syndicates, or their members, constitute a sufficient basis for considering that those persons may commit grave crimes, i.e. where particular activity of persons or their relations prove to be a threat to constitutional values, inter alia, human rights and freedoms, the constitutional order, the safety of society and the state, as well as public order, it is allowed to establish, by means of a law, preventive measures that provide for certain control over the conduct of the said persons. As such, the preventive measures that are aimed at limiting and reducing organised crime should not be considered a constitutionally unreasonable limitation on the human right to privacy, but only provided that they are established by means of a law, they are necessary in a democratic society in order to ensure the rights and freedoms of other persons and values consolidated in the Constitution, they do not deny the nature and essence of the right of an individual to privacy, they are proportionate to the objective sought and this objective may not be attained by any other means. When applying the aforementioned preventive measures, jurisdictional and other law-applying institutions must assess in every case a particular situation, investigate all important circumstances, and find out whether the same objectives may be attained without interfering with the private life of an individual and the privacy of family life and without limiting the human right to privacy more than necessary in order to achieve the said important social and constitutionally justifiable objective.

In order to protect a person from arbitrary and unlawful restriction of his/her privacy, preventive measures interfering with the exercise of the human right to private life may be imposed only on the basis established in a law, only by following the procedure established in a law, and only by providing for the right of a person to file a complaint with a court against an imposed preventive measure.

Limiting the right of persons sentenced to the deprivation of liberty to the inviolability of correspondence (Paragraphs 1 and 2 of Article 22 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 26 February 2015

Article 22 of the Constitution, inter alia, prescribes: "Private life shall be inviolable" (Paragraph 1); "Personal correspondence, telephone conversations, telegraph messages, and other communications shall be inviolable" (Paragraph 2).

In this context, it should be noted that personal correspondence, the inviolability of which is protected under the Constitution, is an important form of maintaining social relations. Under Paragraph 2 of Article 22 of the Constitution, the right to the inviolability of correspondence is equally protected with regard to persons whose liberty has been restricted on the grounds and under the procedure provided for by law. However, the right of a person to the inviolability of correspondence, which is consolidated in Paragraph 2 of Article 22 of the Constitution, is not absolute.

The Constitutional Court, inter alia, while interpreting Paragraph 2 of Article 22 of the Constitution, has noted that the legal concept of private life is linked with the legitimate expectations of the private life of a person; if a person commits criminal acts or acts contrary to law, violates the interests protected by law, or inflicts damage on particular persons, society, or the state, he/she is aware, or must and can be aware, of the fact that this will lead to the particular reaction of state institutions and that, for a breach of law being committed (or one already committed), the state may apply coercive measures through which a certain influence will be exerted on his/her conduct; a person who has committed a criminal act must not and may not expect that his/her private life will be protected in a manner equal to that of persons who do not violate laws (ruling of 24 March 2003).

Under the Constitution, the liberty of persons who have committed crimes may be restricted on the grounds and under the procedure established in laws; upon the restriction of the liberty of such persons, their rights and freedoms may be limited, including the inviolability of correspondence (ruling of 24 March 2003).

When establishing a legal regulation limiting the human rights and freedoms, as well as the right to the inviolability of correspondence, of persons sentenced to the deprivation of liberty, the legislature is bound by the Constitution; according to the Constitution, the right of convicts to the inviolability of correspondence may be limited only by means of a law specifying the grounds and procedure for this limitation (ruling of 24 March 2003). The said limitation must be such that would result in a reasonable relationship between the chosen measures and the pursued legitimate and universally important objective; to achieve this objective, such measures may be established that would be sufficient and would limit the rights of a person not more than it is necessary (rulings of 6 December 2000, 2 October 2001, and 24 March 2003). The Constitutional Court has emphasised that the protection of common interests in a democratic state under the rule of law may not deny any concrete human right or freedom in general and that the established and applied restrictions may not violate the essence of any particular human right (rulings of 9 December 1998 and 24 March 2003).

[...]

... under the Constitution, inter alia, the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law, where necessary for the purposes of achieving a legitimate and universally important objective, a law may provide for certain limitations on the right of a person to the inviolability of correspondence, which is consolidated in Paragraph 2 of Article 22 of the Constitution, inter alia, limitations on the right of convicts to correspondence; the requirement arises for the legislature to establish such a legal regulation that would create the preconditions for the sufficient individualisation of limitations on this right of convicts, once the individual situation of convicts and other important circumstances are assessed.

The connection of the inviolability of private life with the protection of human dignity (Paragraphs 1 and 4 of Article 22 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's conclusion of 19 December 2017

The constitutional protection of human dignity is also enshrined in ... Paragraph 4 of Article 22 [of the Constitution], whereby no one may be subject to arbitrary or unlawful interference with his/her private and family life, as well to an infringement on his/her honour and dignity. Thus, under the Constitution, the protection of human dignity is inseparable from the protection of the private life of a person, which is guaranteed in Paragraph 1 of Article 22 of the Constitution, according to which private life is inviolable.

[...]

... the physical and mental inviolability of a person comprises the content of the inviolability of the human person and is covered by the right of a person to privacy. Accordingly, an infringement on the inviolability of the human person – his/her physical or mental inviolability is simultaneously an arbitrary and unlawful interference with his/her private life and, thus, also an infringement on his/her honour and dignity. In view of this, the guarantee of the inviolability of the private life of a person, which is consolidated in Paragraph 1 of Article 22 of the Constitution, as well as the guarantee of the inviolability of the human person, enshrined in Paragraph 1 of Article 21 of the Constitution, should be considered an element of the constitutional protection of human dignity.

Harassment violates human rights to the inviolability of the human person and private life

See 2. The constitutional status of persons, 2.1. General provisions, 2.1.2. The principle of the equality (of the rights) of persons, the conclusion of 19 December 2017 (“Harassment as one of the forms of discrimination”).

The limitation of the human right to privacy, inter alia, the right to the protection of family life (Paragraphs 1 and 4 of Article 22 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 11 January 2019

... under the Constitution, the right of a person to privacy is not absolute (ruling of 29 December 2004). ... the right to the protection of family life, which is guaranteed under Paragraph 4 of Article 22 of the Constitution, is not absolute, either.

As the Constitutional Court has more than once emphasised in its rulings, under the Constitution, it is allowed to limit the rights and freedoms of a person if the following conditions are observed: the limitations are established by means of a law; the limitations are necessary in a democratic society in order to protect the rights and freedoms of other persons, the values consolidated in the Constitution, and the constitutionally important objectives; regard is paid to the constitutional principle of proportionality (inter alia, the rulings of 26 January 2004, 21 June 2011, and 9 May 2014), according to which the rights and freedoms of a person may not be limited by means of a law more than necessary in order to reach the legitimate objectives important to society (rulings of 7 July 2011, 14 April 2014, and 17 February 2016); the protection of common interests in a democratic state under the rule of law may not deny a particular human right or freedom as such (rulings of 9 December 1998, 24 March 2003, and 26 February 2015).

... the above-mentioned conditions for limiting the rights and freedoms of persons are also applicable in limiting the right of a person, as established in Article 22 of the Constitution, to privacy, inter alia, to the protection of private and family life. It needs to be emphasised that, when certain limitations, which are necessary in a democratic society in order to reach the constitutionally important objectives, are established by means of a law with respect to the exercise of the right to private and family life, it is also necessary to follow the constitutional principles of the equality of the rights of persons and proportionality; otherwise, human dignity, protected under Paragraphs 2 and 3 of Article 21 of the Constitution, would be violated, i.e. the preconditions would be created for degrading human dignity while denying the free personality of the person and his/her inherent equality with other people in terms of human dignity. In this context, it should be mentioned that only a state that has respect for the dignity of every person can be considered to be truly democratic (conclusion of 19 December 2017).

The inviolability of private life (Article 22 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 18 April 2019

... Paragraphs 1–4 of Article 22 of the Constitution, which guarantee the right of a person to privacy, inter alia, the right to respect for private life and to its inviolability, as well as the right to the inviolability of personal correspondence, telephone conversations, and other communications, and consolidate the prohibition of an arbitrary or unlawful interference with private and family life, as well as the prohibition of an infringement on the honour and dignity of a person ... are interrelated and should be interpreted in conjunction with one another; it would not be possible to properly ensure the right of a person to respect for his/her private life, honour, and dignity, as well as the right to the inviolability of his/her correspondence or other communications, if information on the private life of the person were collected in a manner different from that provided for in Paragraph 3 of Article 22 of the Constitution, i.e. not exclusively upon a reasoned court decision and not exclusively according to the law, or if laws did not establish the respective guarantees for the protection of the rights of a person, which are meant to protect the person from an arbitrary or unlawful interference with his/her personal and family life.

At the same time, it is worth mentioning that the private life of a person is a broad category, which is difficult to define for all cases. The right of a person to respect for his/her private life, which is consolidated in Article 22 of the Constitution, and the protection of this right should be interpreted extensively on the basis of the principle of the dynamic interpretation of human rights, taking into account, inter alia, societal development, as well as scientific and technological progress, which increasingly gives more possibilities of interfering with the private life of a person as, for instance, for the purposes of preventing crime or achieving other objectives of public order, by collecting, storing, using, and retaining not only samples of a person's fingerprints and his/her voice, but also a person's cellular or DNA samples, or by carrying out, by technological means, the mass monitoring and surveillance of cyber spaces used by individuals, inter alia, the tracking of the location of individuals via the Global Positioning System (GPS).

... under the Constitution, inter alia, Article 22 thereof, the principle of respect for the private life of a person implies the positive duties of the state to take the respective measures while seeking to ensure the right of a person to the protection of his/her private and family life, including the protection of his/her honour and dignity, in the course of, inter alia, secretly collecting information about that person for criminal justice or other lawful purposes, as well as using such information in the cases and according to the procedures provided for in laws.

[...]

... if any person, inter alia, a state servant (official), commits criminal or other acts that are contrary to law as, for instance, misconduct in office, he/she must be aware that, under the Constitution, inter alia, Article 22 thereof, and the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law, such his/her actions will trigger an appropriate reaction from the authorised state institutions and that a violation of law that is being committed (or has already been committed) may lead to coercive measures lawfully and reasonably enforced by the state, and these coercive measures will not only have a certain effect on the conduct of that person, but will also interfere with his/her private life. A person, inter alia, a state servant (official), who has committed a criminal or another act that is contrary to law, inter alia, misconduct in office, or has otherwise violated the interests protected by law, or has inflicted damage on individual persons, society, or the state should not and cannot expect that his/her private life will be protected in the same way as the private life of persons who do not violate laws or who act in the public interest.

It needs to be noted that Paragraphs 3 and 4 of Article 22 of the Constitution consolidate the duty of the legislature to establish, by means of a law, the procedure for collecting information on the private life of a person (ruling of 19 September 2002).

... under the Constitution, inter alia, Article 22 thereof, and the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law, the legislature, having established the powers of state institutions to secretly collect, in the cases and according to the procedure established by means of a law, information about persons for the purposes of criminal justice or other legitimate purposes, is also obliged to establish, by means of a law, the cases and conditions of the use of such collected information, inter alia, to consolidate the possibility of transferring this information to other state institutions for use for other legitimate purposes established in laws, including for the investigation of misconduct in office.

2.2.5. The right of ownership

2.2.5.1. The protection of the right of ownership

The inviolability of property; limiting the rights of ownership (Article 23 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 13 December 1993

The inviolability of property means, on the one hand, the right of the owner as the possessor of subjective rights to property, to require that other persons not violate his/her rights, as well as, on the other hand, the duty of the state to defend and protect ownership against unlawful encroachment on it.

... On the other hand, the subjective rights, i.e. the rights of an owner, to possess, use, and dispose of property can be limited by means of laws due to the nature of the property possessed (e.g. weapons, narcotic substances, etc.), or if this is necessary for the public interest (ecological issues, etc.), or due to acts performed by the owner. ...

Limitations on property rights may also stem from international treaties, because international treaties that are ratified in compliance with Paragraph 3 of Article 138 of the Constitution are a constituent part of the legal system of the Republic of Lithuania.

Ownership relationships are regulated only by means of laws (Paragraph 2 of Article 23 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 15 July 1994

Paragraph 2 of Article 23 of the Constitution provides that the rights of ownership are protected by law. Thus, ownership relationships may be regulated only by means of laws and they may not be regulated by means of statutory acts.

Limiting the rights of ownership (Paragraph 3 of Article 23 and Article 28 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 8 April 1997

... the right to possess property is one of innate human rights. Any limitation on ownership rights, along with the establishment of sanctions prescribed by means of legal norms, must be precise and, if necessary, detailed enough. Laws must ensure that unreasonable restriction on ownership rights is avoided and that it would always be possible to protect these rights in a court, since Article 30 of the Constitution prescribes that a person whose constitutional rights or freedoms are violated has the right to apply to a court.

The conclusion should be drawn from the analysis of the content of Articles 23 and 28 of the Constitution that it is possible to establish, by means of laws, limitations on ownership rights, as well as property sanctions for violations of law. However, this must not deny the essence of the right of ownership.

The inviolability of property and the defence of ownership rights (Paragraphs 1 and 2 of Article 23 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 1 June 1998

The principle of the inviolability of property is consolidated in Paragraph 1 of Article 23 of the Constitution: "Property shall be inviolable." Thus, only an owner, as a possessor of subjective rights to property, has the exclusive right to possess, use, and dispose of it. At the same time, an owner has the right to demand that other natural and legal persons, as well as the state, not violate his/her ownership rights.

Paragraph 2 of Article 23 of the Constitution prescribes: “The rights of ownership shall be protected by law.” Consequently, the state has the obligation to pass the respective laws and, on the basis thereof, to protect ownership. For that purpose, the system of the respective legal norms is created, the aim of which is to ensure the possibility for an owner to use, possess, and dispose of his/her property at his/her discretion, as well as to defend and protect the right of ownership from violations. It is not possible to assert, however, that, in implementing his/her subjective ownership rights, an owner is absolutely free. Neither the Constitution nor universally recognised international legal norms deny the possibility of establishing, by means of laws, certain limits on the possession, use, or disposal of property. At the same time, such limitations may not deny the essence of the right of ownership.

When the content of Paragraphs 1 and 2 of Article 23 of the Constitution is interpreted, account should be taken of Article 28 of the Constitution, wherein it is prescribed: “While implementing his rights and exercising his freedoms, everyone must observe the Constitution and laws of the Republic of Lithuania and must not restrict the rights and freedoms of other people.” ... an owner, when implementing his/her subjective ownership rights, must take into consideration the public interest.

The inviolability of property; taking property for the needs of society (Article 23 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court’s ruling of 18 June 1998

Article 23 of the Constitution prescribes:

“Property shall be inviolable.

The rights of ownership shall be protected by law.

Property may be taken only for the needs of society according to the procedure established by law and shall be justly compensated for.”

The function of these constitutional norms is many-sided. The chief purpose of the norms consolidated in Article 23 of the Constitution is to ensure the protection of the subjective rights of a person to the ownership of the property possessed by him/her. As regards the constitutional guarantee of the inviolability of property, it should be noted that, in the legal language, the word “inviolability” is, as a rule, understood as an inviolable, inalienable human right. In this respect, the fact of great importance is that the Constitution itself establishes the requirements of protective nature that must be observed when the necessity arises to take private property for the needs of society. Taking property for the needs of society, as indicated in Paragraph 3 of Article 23 of the Constitution, is understood as an individual decision concerning taking property held in private ownership, which is made in every concrete case according to the procedure established by means of laws.

... It is evident that the constitutional guarantee of the inviolability of property and the constitutional regulation of taking private property for the needs of society deny the possibility of general nationalisation without compensation.

The protection of intellectual property (Article 23 and Paragraph 3 of Article 43 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court’s ruling of 5 July 2000

The norms of Article 23 of the Constitution ensure the protection of the rights of ownership. The inviolability of property, as consolidated in this article, obligates other persons not to infringe the rights of an owner and obligates the state to protect and defend the rights of ownership. Intellectual property is also under protection under Article 23 of the Constitution.

Intellectual property covers the copyright to works of literature, science, and art (books, brochures, articles, diaries, other pieces of literature, computer software, speeches, lectures, sermons and other verbal works, pieces of music with or without a text, audio-visual works (cinema films, television films, video films, slide films, other works made by means of cinematography)), etc. Intellectual property also includes the rights of performers, producers of phonograms, broadcasting organisations and producers of the first fixation of an audio-visual work (film) (related rights).

The Constitution is an integral and directly applicable act; therefore, while investigating the compliance of impugned norms with Article 23 of the Constitution, account should also be taken of the fact that the protection and defence of the rights and interests of authors is also provided for in Paragraph 3 of Article 42 of the Constitution, which stipulates that the law protects and defends the spiritual and material interests of an author that are related to scientific, technical, cultural, and artistic work.

The protection of property is guaranteed under the Constitution. Property acquired unlawfully does not become the property of the person who has acquired it. Thus, such a person does not acquire the rights of ownership, which are protected under the Constitution.

The illegal reproduction, circulation, public performance, other use by any means for commercial purposes of works of literature, science, or art (including computer software and databases), and/or video recordings (i.e. without the permission of the author or producer of an audio and/or video recording, or without the permission of a successor of their rights), as well as their storage for the said purposes, infringe copyright and related rights.

The defence of the rights and interests of an author against violations is a public interest; therefore, the legislature may provide for civil, administrative, or criminal responsibility for violations of the rights and interests of an author, depending on the nature of such violations.

The inviolability of property; taking property for the needs of society (Article 23 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 2 April 2001

... [Article 23] of the Constitution establishes the principle of the inviolability of property, which means that the right is guaranteed for a subject of ownership to demand that other persons not violate his/her rights of ownership. The legislature has the duty to pass laws protecting the ownership rights of owners from any unlawful encroachment. The Constitution guarantees that no one may take property in an arbitrary manner and not on the basis of law.

Under the Constitution, taking property for the needs of society is understood as an individual decision concerning taking property held in private ownership, which is made in every concrete case according to the procedure established by means of laws (ruling of 18 June 1998).

Paragraph 3 of Article 23 of the Constitution indicates the needs of society for which property may be taken according to the procedure established by means of a law and must be adequately compensated for. These are interests of all society or part thereof. The state, while carrying out its functions, is constitutionally obligated to ensure and satisfy such interests. When property is taken for the needs of society, it is important to seek a balance among various legitimate interests of society and its members.

The needs of society for which property is taken under Paragraph 3 of Article 23 of the Constitution are always specific and clearly expressed needs of society for a concrete object of property. Under the Constitution, it is permitted to take property (by fairly compensating for it) only for such public needs that could not be objectively satisfied if a certain concrete object of property were not taken.

Fair compensation must be established for property taken for the needs of society. This provision of Paragraph 3 of Article 23 of the Constitution also means that a person whose property is taken for the needs of society has the right to demand that the established compensation be equivalent in value to the taken property.

The right of succession (Article 23 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 4 March 2002

Article 23 of the Constitution consolidates the inviolability of property and the protection of the rights of ownership. These provisions of the Constitution also mean that an owner has the right to state in his/her will to whom his/her property will be left after his/her death; in cases where such a will has not been stated, he/she has the right that after his/her death his/her property will be inherited by the heirs established by law.

If the provisions of Article 23 of the Constitution are interpreted systemically, in the context of the overall constitutional regulation and, especially, in the context of the constitutional provisions establishing that the family is the basis of society and the state and providing for the duty of the state to protect and take care of family, motherhood, fatherhood, and childhood, as well as the right and duty of parents to support their children until they reach the age of majority and the duty of children to respect their parents, to take care of them in their old age, and to preserve their heritage (Paragraphs 1, 2, 6 and 7 of Article 38 of the Constitution), the duty of the state to protect under-age children by law (Paragraph 3 of Article 39 of the Constitution), as well as the provisions establishing constitutional human rights and their innate nature (Article 18 of the Constitution), etc., it should be held that the institution of succession stems from the Constitution. The Constitution guarantees the right to succession.

Under the Constitution, the relationships of succession must be regulated exclusively by means of a law. The legislature, when regulating these relationships, must observe the principles and norms of the Constitution. This means, inter alia, that it is not allowed to establish such a legal regulation that, on the one hand, would deny the will of a testator to leave his/her property as inheritance to other persons and that, on the other hand, in the absence of the testament of a deceased, would give priority not to the persons related to a deceased by family relations or relations of parents and children, i.e. the relationships that are consolidated in the Constitution, but to other persons. It needs to be noted that the legislature, when regulating the relationships of succession, must ensure a balance between the right of an individual to leave his/her property to other persons and other values protected by the Constitution.

[...]

... the legislature, when regulating the relationships of succession, may differentiate this regulation according to by what family or kinship relations certain persons were related to a testator.

The protection of the rights of ownership; limiting the rights of ownership; the social function of ownership (Article 23 of the Constitution); pharmacies as objects of the right of ownership

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 14 March 2002

Paragraph 1 of Article 23 of the Constitution provides that property is inviolable; Paragraph 2 of the same article of the Constitution provides that the rights of ownership are protected by law. These constitutional provisions imply that the Constitution, when guaranteeing the protection of ownership, also establishes the constitutional right to the acquisition of property and guarantees the protection of this right.

It should be noted that the constitutional right of a person to ownership is an essential (necessary) condition for the implementation of his/her freedom of economic activity. When limitations are imposed on the right of persons to ownership, freedom of individual economic activity is also limited.

The right of persons to ownership, freedom of economic activity, as well as most other rights and freedoms consolidated in the Constitution, are not absolute. While implementing his/her rights and exercising his/her freedoms, everyone must observe the Constitution and laws of the Republic of Lithuania and must not restrict the rights and freedoms of other people (Article 28 of the Constitution). ...

[...]

Under the Constitution, the right to ownership may be limited due to the nature of property and/or other reasons where the non-limitation of this right would make it impossible to protect the values consolidated in the Constitution and damage would be inflicted on the public interest.

[...]

... the right to ownership is a constitutional right of persons and ... the legislature, when imposing limitations on this right, is bound by the norms and principles of the Constitution: this right may not be limited more than it is necessary in a democratic society where the values consolidated in the Constitution, as well as the public interest, must be protected.

... under the Constitution, the existence of a public interest (constitutionally important objective) may serve as a ground for limiting the right of a person to ownership only in cases where the non-limitation of this right, due to the nature of property and/or other important reasons, would render the protection of the values consolidated in the Constitution impossible and would harm the public interest.

[...]

The social function of ownership must be emphasised. Ownership includes obligations (ruling of 21 December 2000). An owner, when enjoying the right to possess, use, and dispose of his/her property, may not violate laws and the rights of other persons. A pharmacy is an enterprise licensed for pharmaceutical activities, i.e. activities that are part of public health activities and are related to goods of a specific nature – medicines and medicinal substances; therefore, laws may and must impose such limitations on the subjective rights of the owners of pharmacies that, in the pharmacies owned by them, only individuals who have pharmaceutical education and hold the necessary qualification would be able to control the professional activities of pharmacists working in such pharmacies, would be able to head such pharmacies, and would be able to conduct managerial control in such pharmacies. Under the Constitution, laws must establish such a regulation of pharmaceutical activities that the economic interests of the owners of pharmacies would not cast into the shade the activities of pharmacies conducted in the interest of the health of people and public health promotion.

... Under the Constitution, it is prohibited to limit the right of ownership of a person on the basis of his/her education. The requirements relating to pharmaceutical education and the necessary qualification must be imposed on persons conducting pharmaceutical activities in pharmacies. It is not permitted to impose requirements relating to education on persons who wish to hold pharmacies by right of ownership.

The duty of non-state property entities to contribute, using their property, to the satisfaction of the special needs of society (i.e. the duty of telecommunication operators to ensure the technical possibility for the subjects of operational activities to exercise control over the content transmitted through telecommunication networks) (Article 23 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 19 September 2002

... the inviolability and protection of property, consolidated in Article 23 of the Constitution, also means that it is not permitted to introduce any such a legal regulation that would establish the continuing duty of non-state property entities to use their property to fulfil state functions, which must be financed from state funds; the duty may be established for non-state property entities to contribute, by using their property, to the satisfaction of the special needs of society inasmuch as such a duty to contribute to the satisfaction of these needs under extraordinary circumstances stems from the Constitution.

Thus, under the Constitution, the duty may be established for telecommunication operators – non-state property entities – to ensure and constantly maintain the technical possibilities necessary for the subjects of operational activities to control, under the procedure established in laws, the content of information transmitted through telecommunication networks; however, it is not permitted to establish the duty of telecommunication operators to maintain, at their expense, the technical possibilities of such facilities that are not necessary in the economic activity of the said telecommunication operators.

[...]

It needs to be noted that information transmitted through telecommunication networks is not the property of telecommunication operators.

Under the Constitution, the state must ensure the security of society and public order. ... the prevention, investigation, and detection of crimes is a public interest; therefore, in order to ensure the normal activities of law enforcement authorities that are performing the said functions, the necessary information must be provided for no consideration. This is also implied by the constitutional striving for an open, just, and harmonious civil society and a state under the rule of law.

The right to a pension from the aspect of the protection of property (Articles 23 and 52 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 25 November 2002

... in cases where the collection of funds necessary to pay pensions and the payment of pensions are based on social insurance (social insurance contributions), individuals themselves, to a certain extent, take part in the creation of the material preconditions for the payment of these pensions. When the amounts of old-age pensions are established by means of a law, consideration should be given to the amount of the paid contributions in the course of creating the material preconditions for the payment of these pensions.

A person who meets the conditions established in a law in order to receive an old-age pension and has been granted and paid this pension has the right to the monetary benefit of the respective amount, i.e. the right to property. Under Article 23 of the Constitution, this right must be protected and defended.

The right to a pension from the aspect of the protection of property (Articles 23 and 52 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 3 December 2003

Interpreting the provisions of Article 23 of the Constitution, the Constitutional Court has held on more than one occasion that the inviolability of property and the protection of the rights of ownership mean, inter alia, that an owner, as the holder of subjective rights to property, has the right to demand that other persons not violate his/her rights and that the state has the duty to ensure the defence and protection of the rights of ownership.

... the Constitution is an integral act ... its provisions are interrelated and constitute a harmonious system. When revealing the content of the constitutional institution of the protection of the rights of ownership, account must be taken not only of Article 23 of the Constitution, but also of other provisions of the Constitution that reveal different aspects of the constitutional concept of the said right, as well as of Article 52 of the Constitution. In its ruling of 4 July 2003, the Constitutional Court held that the claims of a person for the payment of the pension granted to him/her are defended not only under Article 52 of the Constitution, but also under Article 23 of the Constitution. It needs to be noted that, in such a case, the right to demand that the pension provision benefits that are established in the Constitution and laws that are not in conflict with the Constitution be paid arises out of Article 52 of the Constitution, while the property aspects of the said right are defended under Article 23 thereof.

... the state has the duty to fulfil those obligations of property nature that it has undertaken by establishing, by means of a law, such a legal regulation according to which a person who meets the conditions provided for in a law acquires the right to a certain pension. Thus, a person who meets the conditions established in a law in order to receive an old-age pension and has been granted and paid this pension has the right to the monetary benefit of the respective amount, i.e. the right to property. Under Article 23 of the Constitution, this right must be protected and defended.

Thus, under Article 23 of the Constitution, persons who have been granted and paid a pension established by the Constitution or a law have the right to demand that pension benefits in the amounts granted and paid previously be continued to be paid to them. Naturally, the law that establishes the grounds for such pension provision, the persons who are granted and paid pensions, the conditions for granting and paying pensions, as well as the amounts of pensions, must be in conformity with the norms and principles of the Constitution.

... pensions that have been granted and paid under the Constitution may be reduced only in the event of an extreme situation in the state (economic crisis, a natural disaster, etc.), when there is an objective lack of funds for performing state functions and for satisfying public interests, including the payment of pensions. In such a case, the granted and paid pensions may be reduced to the extent that is necessary to ensure the vitally important interests of society and to protect other constitutional values. At the same time, it should be noted that the reduced pensions may be paid only on a temporary basis. In addition, in the event of implementing a reform of the pensionary system, some pensions may be eliminated and the amounts of other pensions may be reduced. In such a case, the legislature must establish a fair mechanism for compensating persons for the losses incurred due to such an amendment of the said regulation. Otherwise, the legal regulation according to which the payment of a granted and paid pension is terminated or reduced should be judged to be in violation of Paragraph 2 of Article 23 of the Constitution, which provides that the rights of ownership are protected by law.

The inviolability and protection of ownership; limiting the right of ownership; the social function of ownership (Article 23 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 13 May 2005

... Article 23 of the Constitution consolidates the imperatives of the inviolability of property and the protection of ownership. Private ownership as one of the bases of the national economy is consolidated in Paragraph 1 of Article 46 of the Constitution.

[...]

Interpreting Article 23 of the Constitution, the Constitutional Court has held on more than one occasion in its rulings that the inviolability of property and the protection of ownership, which are consolidated in this article, mean, inter alia, that an owner has the right to possess the property that belongs to him, also to use and dispose of it, as well as the right to demand that other persons not violate such his/her rights, and that the state has the duty to protect and defend ownership against unlawful encroachment on it.

The provision of Paragraph 2 of Article 23 of the Constitution, whereby the rights of ownership are protected by law, means that the legislative protection of the subjective rights of ownership is guaranteed. As a rule, the subjective right of ownership is defined as the possibility, which is protected by laws, for an owner to possess, at his/her discretion and in his/her interests, the property that belongs to him/her and to use and dispose of it; however, an owner may not overstep the limits established in laws, nor may he/she restrict the rights and freedoms of other persons (ruling of 16 March 1999). The said provision of Paragraph 2 of Article 23 of the Constitution also means that laws must protect the ownership rights of all owners, thus, including the right of ownership of the state as the organisation of all society (ruling of 30 September 2003).

The constitutional guarantee of the protection of the right of ownership is a status quo guarantee, since it protects, first of all, the ownership rights held by a person (rulings of 27 October 1998, 16 March 1999, and 4 March 2003).

The Constitutional Court has also held on more than one occasion that, under the Constitution, the right of ownership is not absolute and that this right can be limited by means of a law due to the nature of an object of ownership, due to the committed acts that are contrary to law, and/or due to a constitutionally justifiable need that is essential to society. Limitations on the right of ownership are permissible; however, in all cases, the following conditions must be observed: the right of ownership may be limited only on the grounds of a law; the limitations must be necessary in a democratic society in order to protect the rights and freedoms of other persons, the values consolidated in the Constitution, and/or constitutionally important objectives; it is necessary to follow the principle of proportionality, under which the measures provided for in laws must be in line with the sought objectives that are essential to society and are constitutionally justifiable. It needs to be emphasised that, under the Constitution, it is not allowed to deny the essence of the right of ownership by means of any limitation on the right of ownership; if the right of ownership were limited to the extent that its implementation becomes impossible, if the said right were restricted to the extent that reasonable limits would be exceeded, or its legal protection would not be ensured, in such a case, there would be grounds for asserting that the essence of the right of ownership is violated, which would be tantamount to denying the said right.

The constitutional imperative of social harmony, the constitutional principles of justice, reasonableness, and proportionality, as well as other provisions of the Constitution, imply that the inviolability of property and the protection of the subjective rights of ownership, which are consolidated in the Constitution, may not be interpreted as grounds to set in opposition the rights and interests of an owner and the public interest, or as grounds to set in opposition the rights and interests of an owner and the rights, freedoms, and legitimate interests of other persons. Ownership also performs a social function. Interpreting the provisions of Article 23 of the Constitution, the Constitutional Court has held that ownership includes obligations and that, by this provision, the social function of ownership is expressed (rulings of 21 December 2000, 14 March 2002, 19 September 2002, and 30 September 2003).

Taking property for the needs of society

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 23 November 2007

... interpreting the notion “needs of society” in the context of the institution of expropriation, the Constitutional Court has held that taking property for the needs of society is linked in the Constitution not with the fact who will receive the taken property, but with the objectives of the taking of property: to use a particular item in the interests of society, for the socially important objectives that can only be achieved by making use of the individual properties of a particular taken item; the needs of society cannot be interpreted as in all cases prohibiting the taking of property and transferring it into private ownership; the question of whether property is taken for the needs of society is not determined by the fact which subject (i.e. the state, a municipality, a legal or natural person) will subsequently become the owner of that property, but by the fact whether the property taken from the owner is really taken because it is necessary to satisfy the needs of society, i.e. socially important objectives that can only be achieved by making use of the particular taken property (ruling of 4 March 2003).

Taking property for the needs of society (Paragraph 3 of Article 23 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 20 May 2008

Under Article 23 of the Constitution, property may be taken from an owner only for the needs of society where it is justly compensated for; property may be taken for the needs of society only according to the procedure established by means of a law and must be justly compensated for. The Constitutional Court has held that Paragraph 3 of Article 23 of the Constitution indicates the needs of society for which property may be taken according to the procedure established by means of a law and must be justly compensated for. These are the interests of all society or part thereof. The state, while carrying out its functions, is constitutionally obligated to ensure and satisfy such interests; where property is taken for the needs of society, it is important to seek a balance among various legitimate interests of society and its members; the needs of society for which property is taken are always specific and clearly expressed needs of society for a concrete object of property; it is permitted to take property (by fairly compensating for it) only for such public needs that could not be objectively satisfied if a certain concrete object of property were not taken; a person whose property is taken for the needs of society has the right to demand that the established compensation be equivalent in value to the taken property (rulings of 2 April 2001 and 4 March 2003). Where a decision on taking property for the needs of society is adopted, it is essential at the same time to establish the amount of compensation for the taken property; in addition, it is necessary to establish a procedure according to which an owner will be compensated for the taken property. The legislature, irrespective of the fact which subject (i.e. the state, a municipality, a legal or natural person) becomes the owner of such property, has the duty to establish a legal regulation ensuring that the said property would be used for the needs of society in reality (ruling of 4 March 2003). In this context, it needs to be emphasised that the needs of society are the necessities of the state at the same time (rulings of 4 March 2003 and 23 November 2007); it is not permitted to create opposition between the notion “needs (necessities) of the state” and the notion “needs (necessities) of society”, because they do not deny, but supplement, each other; the notions “needs (necessities) of the state” and “needs (necessities) of society” denote the public interest and should be related to the constitutional concept of the welfare of the nation (ruling of 23 November 2007).

Interpreting Paragraph 3 of Article 23 of the Constitution, the Constitutional Court has also held in its acts on more than one occasion that, as long as an agreement is not reached on compensation for the property being taken or as long as the respective dispute is not settled in a court, property may not be taken from an owner (ruling of 4 March 2003). In interpreting the said provision of the constitutional doctrine together with other doctrinal provisions of the Constitutional Court that were formulated when interpreting Article 23 of the Constitution (inter alia, with the following: ownership includes obligations and this provision expresses the social function of ownership; where property is taken for the needs of society, it is necessary to seek a balance between various legitimate interests of society and its members; it is permitted to take property (by adequately compensating for) only for such public needs that could not be objectively satisfied if a certain concrete object of property were not taken; a person whose property is taken for the needs of society has the right to demand that the established compensation be equivalent in value to the taken property; the rights and interests of an owner and the public interest may not be opposed), it needs to be noted that, under the Constitution, where the legislature regulates the relationships connected with the consideration of disputes in a court regarding taking property for the needs of society, the duty arises to establish such a legal regulation that would allow solving the said disputes promptly, thus guaranteeing the public interest and ensuring that an owner would not abuse his/her right to receive fair compensation for the taken property and would not thereby delay the procedure for taking property for the needs of society.

The Constitution does not tolerate such legal situations where, after a certain institution that is established by means of a law and has the right to adopt a decision on taking property for the needs of society adopts a decision on taking property for the needs of society and on the amount of compensation for the property taken from the owner and after such compensation is paid, it is impossible to satisfy the need of society for an unreasonably long time due to prolonged disputes, inter alia, disputes in courts regarding the amount of compensation for the property taken from its owner, and due to this, the interests of vital importance and other particularly important interests of society cannot be ensured. The Constitution gives rise to the duty of the legislature to establish, inter alia, the grounds and manner of fair compensation for property taken for the needs of society and the duty to provide that, after the competent institution decides on taking property for the needs of society and on the amount of compensation for the property taken from the owner and after this compensation is paid, a court, once it establishes that, without the immediate satisfaction of this need of society, the interests of vital importance and other particularly important interests of society will be impaired, may allow the use of the property in order to satisfy the needs of society before the respective dispute is decided on its merits regarding the amount of compensation for the taken property.

The Constitutional Court has also noted that, in deciding whether property is taken for the needs of society, account should be taken of the fact that the needs of society are not a static phenomenon. The needs that are regarded as the needs of society at a certain stage of the development of society and the state may be considered to be not in line with the constitutional concept of the needs of society at a different stage of the development of society and the state and vice versa. While taking account of the fact as to what socially important objectives are sought at the moment of taking particular property, it is necessary each time to decide on an individual basis whether the needs for which property is taken are the needs of society (ruling of 4 March 2003).

The inviolability, protection, and defence of property (inter alia, in cases where an owner loses his/her property as a result of a crime committed by other persons) (Article 23 of the Constitution); the protection of the rights of an honest acquirer

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 30 October 2008

The provisions of Article 23 of the Constitution, which constitute a whole, reveal the essence of the protection of the rights of ownership (ruling of 27 May 2002). The Constitutional Court has held in its acts on more than one occasion that Article 23 of the Constitution consolidates the principle of the inviolability of property. Under the Constitution, owners have the right to perform any actions, with the exception of those prohibited by law, with regard to their property, as well as to use their property and determine its future in any way that does not violate the rights and freedoms of other persons (rulings of 14 March 2006 and 20 May 2008). On the other hand, the Constitutional Court, interpreting the provisions of Article 23 of the Constitution, has held on more than one occasion that ownership includes obligations. When using his/her property, an owner must behave responsibly and carefully.

Under the Constitution, other persons must not violate the ownership rights of an owner and the state is under the obligation to defend and protect property against both unlawful encroachment on it and other violations. No one may take property in an arbitrary manner and not on the basis of law. The right of the subject of property – an owner – to demand that other persons not violate his/her right of ownership and that the state ensure the protection of his/her ownership rights is guaranteed by the Constitution (ruling of 8 July 2005).

... the constitutional principle of the inviolability of property would also be denied if, after an owner loses his/her property as a result of a crime committed by another person (other persons), the rights of ownership of the owner would not be defended. In this context, it should be noted that, when an owner loses his/her property as a result of a crime committed by another person (other persons), this does not mean that he/she loses the rights of ownership, nor that a person who acquires such property becomes the owner of the said property. The Constitutional Court has held that Article 23 of the Constitution, inter alia, Paragraph 2 thereof, gives rise to the duty of the legislature to regulate ownership relationships in such a manner that would defend and protect the rights of ownership and would ensure the inviolability of property (ruling of 23 August 2005); the state is under the obligation to pass the respective laws protecting the rights of ownership and to protect ownership on the basis of such laws (ruling of 14 March 2006). Under the Constitution, an owner has the right to recover his/her property if he/she loses such property as a result of a crime committed by another person (other persons); such his/her right is an important constitutional guarantee of the protection of the rights of ownership. This implies the duty of the legislature to establish such a legal regulation that would ensure the defence of the rights of ownership of the owner who loses his/her property as a result of a crime committed by another person (other persons). When establishing the said legal regulation, the legislature must establish how the defence of the rights of ownership of an owner must be ensured, inter alia, in cases where such property cannot be recovered due to objective reasons and there are no possibilities of restituting it in kind.

The Constitution, while guaranteeing the protection of ownership, also establishes the constitutional right to the acquisition of property and guarantees the protection of this right (ruling of 14 March 2002). Under the Constitution, the ways of the acquisition of the right of ownership may be varied; however, they may not be in conflict with the requirements stemming from the Constitution, inter alia, from the principles of justice and good faith.

The legislature, paying regard to the norms and principles of the Constitution, must establish the ways and grounds for the acquisition of the right of ownership. This implies the requirement for the lawfulness of the acquisition of property. Under the Constitution, one of the essential conditions for the lawfulness of transferring an object of ownership (property) into the ownership of another person (other persons) is the expression of the will (consent) of an owner regarding such transfer of the object of ownership (property) into the ownership of another person (other persons). Where property is transferred to another person without the expression of the will (consent) of the owner, such transfer of property is considered to be unlawful and the transferred property is regarded as property acquired unlawfully by another person, unless the transfer of property into the ownership of another person (other persons) without the expression of the will (consent) of the owner of that property would be constitutionally justifiable.

Property acquired unlawfully does not become the property of the person who has acquired it. Thus, such a person does not acquire the rights of ownership, which are protected by the Constitution (ruling of 5 July 2000).

In this context, it needs to be noted that such a situation is possible where a person acquires property while knowing or having to know that the person from whom such property is acquired does not have the right to transfer that property into ownership. Such acquisition of property does not create the rights of ownership for its acquirer. In view of this, it should be noted that the Constitution also does not defend the rights of such a person who acquires property that has been lost by the owner as a result of a crime committed by another person (other persons) and he/she knows or has to know about it, i.e. he/she acquires the said property while behaving in bad faith and unlawfully.

In addition, such a situation is possible where a person who seeks to acquire property lawfully acquires property that has been lost by its owner as a result of a crime committed by another person (other persons), where such a person, when acquiring it, does not know and is unable to know that. ... even in cases where a person acquires property without knowing or without being able to know that its owner lost it as a result of a crime committed by another person (other persons), the acquisition of such property in itself may not be treated as creating the rights of ownership for the acquirer of the property. As it has been held by the Constitutional Court on more than one occasion, no right may arise on the grounds of unlawfulness.

While regulating the protection of the rights of ownership, the legislature must ensure a balance among the values defended and protected under the Constitution. The fact that the rights of ownership of an owner who loses his/her property as a result of a crime committed by another person (other persons) must be defended does not mean that it is allowed not to protect the rights of such a person who sought to acquire property lawfully and in good faith, but who has acquired it without knowing that the owner of such property has lost it as a result of a crime committed by another person (other persons). The requirement to defend the rights of such a person stems from the Constitution, inter alia, the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law and the constitutional principle of compensation for damage, which is consolidated in Article 30 of the Constitution. This constitutional principle is inseparable from the principle of justice, which is consolidated in the Constitution: laws must create all necessary preconditions for fair compensation for inflicted damage (ruling of 19 August 2006).

The requirement to defend the rights of a person who has in good faith acquired property that has been lost by its owner as a result of a crime committed by another person (other persons) stems from Article 46 of the Constitution, inter alia, from Paragraph 1 thereof, which also consolidates freedom of individual economic activity and initiative; freedom of individual economic activity and initiative implies the freedom to conclude contracts.

Under Paragraph 3 of Article 23 of the Constitution, property may be taken from an owner only for the needs of society where it is justly compensated for; property may be taken for the needs of society only according to the procedure established by means of a law and must be justly compensated for. The Constitutional Court has held that Paragraph 3 of Article 23 of the Constitution indicates the needs of society for which property may be taken according to the procedure established by means of a law and must be justly compensated for. These are the interests of all society or part thereof. The state, while carrying out its functions, is constitutionally obligated to ensure and satisfy such interests; where property is taken for the needs of society, it is important to seek a balance among various legitimate interests of society and its members; the needs of society for which property is taken are always specific and clearly expressed needs of society for a concrete object of property; it is permitted to take property (by fairly compensating for it) only for such public needs that could not be objectively satisfied if a certain concrete object of property were not taken; a person whose property is taken for the needs of society has the right to demand that the established compensation be equivalent in value to the taken property (rulings of 2 April 2001, 4 March 2003, and 20 May 2008).

... the imperatives that stem from Paragraph 3 of Article 23 of the Constitution are not applicable to the taking of property from its owner in cases where the owner recovers his/her property lost as a result of a crime committed by another person (other persons).

The provisions of Article 23 of the Constitution guarantee the protection of property for all its owners, i.e. natural persons, legal persons, municipalities, and the state (ruling of 27 May 2002). Therefore, under the Constitution, laws have to protect the rights of ownership of all owners, inter alia, the ownership rights of the state (as the organisation of all society).

The protection of the rights of an owner of a trademark (Article 23 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 27 March 2009

The requirements, which arise from Article 23 of the Constitution, to guarantee the inviolability of property and the protection thereof must be applied to the full extent also to defending intellectual property rights and ensuring the inviolability and protection of the property of an owner of a trademark.

The specificity of the protection of ownership rights is also determined by an object of property. While taking account of the specificity of the objects of property, the legislature may consolidate various ways of the defence of the infringed rights of the owners of these objects, inter alia, where such ways are connected with reimbursement (compensation) for inflicted damage or other losses.

... an owner of a trademark may sustain various losses – both of material and moral nature (for instance, decrease in the value of the trademark, decrease in the reputation of the enterprise of the owner of the trademark, etc.), which occur as a result of unlawful actions performed by other persons. The Constitution, inter alia, Paragraphs 1 and 2 of Article 23 thereof, and the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law give rise to the duty of the legislature to establish such a legal regulation that would permit reimbursing (compensating) for the losses of both material and moral nature sustained by an owner. Such a legal regulation must create the preconditions, by taking account of the specificity of intellectual property, for calculating the losses sustained by an owner of a trademark as a result of unlawful actions performed by other persons; in cases where sometimes it is even impossible to calculate the amount of material damage inflicted on an owner of a trademark, it is also necessary to establish such a manner of compensation for losses sustained by the said owner where the said manner of compensation would not be related only to the material damage inflicted on him/her.

It should be noted that, under the Constitution, laws must provide for responsibility for an infringement of the rights of an owner of a trademark, inter alia, the duty to reimburse an owner of a trademark for inflicted material and moral damage (losses).

The protection of the rights of the owners of copyright and related rights (Article 23 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 6 January 2011

The requirements, which arise from Article 23 of the Constitution, to guarantee the inviolability of property and the protection thereof must be applied to the full extent also to defending intellectual property rights and ensuring the inviolability and protection of the property of the owners of copyright and related rights.

The specificity of the protection of ownership rights is also determined by an object of property. While taking account of the specificity of the objects of property, the legislature may consolidate various ways of the defence of the infringed rights of the owners of these objects, inter alia, where such ways are connected with reimbursement (compensation) for inflicted damage or other losses.

The necessity to compensate a person for material and moral damage inflicted on him/her is a constitutional principle stemming from the Constitution, inter alia, from Paragraph 2 of Article 30 thereof, which provides that compensation for material and moral damage inflicted on a person is established by law.

It should be noted that, under the Constitution, laws must provide for responsibility for an infringement of the rights of the owners of copyright and related rights, inter alia, the duty to compensate an owner of copyright and related rights for inflicted material and moral damage (losses).

[...]

... the owners of copyright and related rights may sustain various losses – both of material and moral nature (as, for instance, a decrease in the value of a work or an object of related rights, a decrease in the reputation of the owners of copyright and related rights, etc.), which occur as a result of unlawful actions performed by other persons. The Constitution, inter alia, Paragraphs 1 and 2 of Article 23 thereof, and the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law give rise to the duty of the legislature to establish such a legal regulation that would permit reimbursing (compensating) for the losses of both material and moral nature sustained by an owner, including an owner of copyright and related rights. Such a legal regulation must create the preconditions, by taking account of the specificity of intellectual property, for calculating the losses sustained by an owner of copyright and related rights as a result of unlawful actions performed by other persons; in cases where sometimes it is even impossible to calculate the amount of material damage inflicted on an owner of copyright and related rights, it is also necessary to establish such a manner of compensation for losses sustained by the said owner where the said manner of compensation would not be related only to the material damage inflicted on him/her.

The inviolability and protection of ownership; ownership includes obligations; limiting the right of ownership; the protection of the ownership rights of the owners of residential and non-residential premises in blocks of flats (Article 23 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 7 June 2016

Interpreting the provisions of Article 23 of the Constitution, the Constitutional Court has held that the right of ownership is one of fundamental human rights. The inviolability and protection of ownership, as consolidated in Article 23 of the Constitution, inter alia, means that owners have the right to perform any actions, with the exception of those prohibited by law, with regard to their property, as well as to use their property and determine its future in any way that does not violate the rights and freedoms of other persons (inter alia, the rulings of 14 March 2006 and 20 December 2013). Laws must protect the rights of ownership of all owners (inter alia, the rulings of 30 September 2003 and 9 October 2013). An owner has the right to demand that other persons not violate his/her rights of ownership and the state has the duty to defend and protect ownership against unlawful encroachment on it (inter alia, the rulings of 19 September 2002 and 6 January 2011). Article 23 of the Constitution gives rise to the duty of the legislature to regulate ownership relationships in such a manner that would defend and protect the rights of ownership and would ensure the inviolability of property (rulings of 30 October 2008 and 30 October 2008).

The Constitutional Court has emphasised on more than one occasion that ownership includes obligations (inter alia, the rulings of 21 December 2000 and 3 April 2015). As a rule, the subjects of the ownership relationships that are regulated by means of legal norms not only have certain rights, but also the respective duties (rulings of 8 April 1997 and 31 January 2011). When using his/her property, an owner must behave responsibly and carefully (ruling of 30 October 2008). An owner, while enjoying the right to possess, use, and dispose of his/her property, may not violate laws and the rights of other persons (inter alia, the rulings of 14 March 2002 and 12 April 2013). The duties of an owner are determined, inter alia, by the specificity of the objects of ownership; thus, taking account of the particularities of the objects of ownership, the legislature may establish certain duties of the owners of these objects, as well as their responsibility for non-compliance with these duties (ruling of 12 April 2013).

Under the Constitution, the right of ownership is not absolute; it can be limited by means of a law, inter alia, due to the nature of an object of ownership and due to a constitutionally justifiable need that is essential to society. In all cases where [the right of ownership is] limited, the following conditions must always be observed: ownership may be limited only on the grounds of a law; the limitations must be necessary in a democratic society in order to protect the rights and freedoms of other persons, the values consolidated in the Constitution, and the constitutionally important objectives that are essential to society; regard must be paid to the principle of proportionality, under which the measures provided for in laws must be in line with the sought objectives that are essential to society and are constitutionally justifiable (inter alia, the rulings of 19 September 2002 and 20 December 2013). It needs to be emphasised that, under the Constitution, it is not allowed to deny the essence of the right of ownership by means of any limitation on the right of ownership; if the right of ownership were limited to the extent that its implementation becomes impossible, if the said right were restricted to the extent that reasonable limits would be exceeded, or its legal protection would not be ensured, in such a case, there would be grounds for asserting that the essence of the right of ownership is violated, which would be tantamount to denying the said right (ruling of 13 May 2005).

The Constitutional Court has also held that the ownership right of the owners of residential and non-residential premises are protected under the Constitution and laws; the Constitution and laws protect and defend the rights of owners irrespective of whether there is [a certain society] in a block of flats or whether there is no such society (ruling of 23 June 1999). The proper maintenance of blocks of flats and their preservation is not only the private interest of their owners, but also a public interest (ruling of 21 December 2000). It has been noted in the [jurisprudence] of the Constitutional Court that, under the Constitution, the existence of a public interest (constitutionally important objective) may serve as a ground for limiting the right of a person to ownership only in cases where the non-limitation of this right, due to the nature of property and/or other important reasons, would render the protection of the values consolidated in the Constitution impossible and would harm the public interest (inter alia, the rulings of 14 March 2002 and 5 July 2013).

The discretion of the legislature to regulate the relationships in connection with the bankruptcy of a natural person

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 19 May 2017

... under the Constitution, the legislature generally has no duty to establish the institution of the bankruptcy of a natural person as one of the possible ways of solving the insolvency of natural persons. Having chosen to establish the institution of the bankruptcy of a natural person in the Lithuanian legal system, the legislature, in order to ensure, among other things, a balance of interests between an insolvent natural person and his/her creditors, has broad discretion to regulate the relationships in connection with the bankruptcy of natural persons, inter alia, to choose a model of the institution of the bankruptcy of a natural person, to define the circle of persons that could go bankrupt, to establish the grounds for opening bankruptcy proceedings against a natural person, also the cases where such proceedings may not be opened, to regulate the procedures for the bankruptcy of natural persons, to determine the conditions for release from fulfilling debt obligations, as well as other essential elements of the institution of the bankruptcy of a natural person. However, in doing so, the legislature must respect the norms and principles of the Constitution.

... the models of the institution of the bankruptcy of a natural person are diverse; the choice by the legislature to consolidate one or another model of the institution of the bankruptcy of a natural person by means of laws may depend on the specific objectives pursued by the legislature. In addition, laws may establish the judicial or extrajudicial bankruptcy process of natural persons. The legislature, making use of its broad discretion to choose one or another model of the institution of the bankruptcy of a natural person, may also establish such a model whereby, in the bankruptcy process of a natural person, a court would be granted wider powers to decide, inter alia, on opening bankruptcy proceedings against a natural person and/or exempting him/her from the fulfilment of remaining unsatisfied debt obligations after the closure of the bankruptcy process, once the court has taken into account the circumstances of a particular case and has assessed the situation of a natural person seeking bankruptcy.

... according to Article 29 of the Constitution and the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law, when regulating the relationships in connection with the bankruptcy of a natural person, the legislature must equally treat all persons who are in the same (similar) situation and establish such grounds and procedure for opening personal bankruptcy proceedings that are equally applicable to all natural persons.

[...]

... in order to ensure a balance between the interests of an insolvent natural person and his/her creditors by means of the bankruptcy institution of a natural person established in the law, the legislature may not deny the requirement, which arises from the Constitution (inter alia, from the principle of compensation for damage, as laid down in Paragraph 2 of Article 30 thereof, as well as from the constitutional principles of justice and a state under the rule of law), that material and moral damage sustained by a person must be compensated for in a fair manner. Consequently, when determining the conditions for releasing bankrupt natural persons from fulfilling debt obligations, the legislature may not establish any such a legal regulation according to which persons would be able to avoid the obligation to compensate for the material and/or moral damage caused by them by committing a criminal act and a person who has sustained the said damage would not be able to receive fair compensation for it.

... in view of the fact that, as mentioned before, the personal bankruptcy process is aimed to attain a fair balance between the interests of the debtor and his/her creditors, it would be unfair to establish such a legal regulation under which the interests, inter alia, the desire to return to an active economic activity, of a person who has caused damage by committing a criminal act would have greater protection than the rights of a person who has sustained the said damage, i.e. his/her right to receive fair compensation for the sustained damage, which, at least in part, would restore the situation that had existed before the criminal act was committed. Thus, not only the insolvency of a person who has committed an intentional criminal act, but also the insolvency of a person who has committed a negligent criminal act, is not a constitutionally justifiable ground for releasing such a person from the obligation to compensate for the damage that he/she has caused.

Limitations on the rights of ownership in cases where such limitations are necessary for the installation and operation of the energy infrastructure; the amount of compensation for losses resulting from limitations on the right of ownership

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 8 July 2020

... in accordance with Paragraph 3 of Article 46 of the Constitution, regulating economic activity in the field of energy so that it serves the general welfare of the people and seeking to achieve the constitutionally important objective of ensuring the security and reliability of the energy system, the state may, by means of a law, impose limitations on the right of ownership, which is consolidated under Article 23 of the Constitution, in cases where such limitations are necessary for the installation and operation of the energy infrastructure in order to provide a service in the public interest: the secure and reliable supply of electricity to all consumers. ... under the Constitution, inter alia, the constitutional imperative of social harmony and the constitutional principles of justice, reasonableness, and proportionality, when establishing such a legal regulation, the legislature must ensure a balance between the constitutionally defended and protected rights and interests of the owners of land and other immovable objects, on the one hand, and the rights and interests of electricity consumers, on the other. Therefore, having regard to the imperative of ensuring the effective protection of consumer rights, which stems from the Constitution, inter alia, Paragraph 5 of Article 46 thereof, and implies imposing limits on electricity prices as one of the means of protecting the interests of electricity consumers, the legislature may provide for the maximum amount of compensation for losses resulting from limitations on the right of ownership in cases where such limitations are necessary for the installation and operation of the energy infrastructure.

The right to ownership is a constitutional right of persons; the legislature, when imposing limitations on this right, is bound by the norms and principles of the Constitution (ruling of 14 March 2002), inter alia, the constitutional principle of the equality of persons, enshrined in Article 29 of the Constitution.

2.2.5.2. Restitution

The property expropriated by the occupation government did not become state-owned property

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 23 August 2005

After the occupation government nationalised and in other unlawful ways expropriated residential houses, parts thereof, flats, land, forests, water bodies, and other private property in 1940 and later, the innate human right to possess private property was denied.

On the basis of such arbitrary acts of the occupation government, any lawful state-owned public property could not arise, nor did it arise, since law cannot come into existence on the basis of lawlessness. In its rulings, the Constitutional Court has held on more than one occasion that the property seized from the people in such a manner should be regarded only as property factually possessed by the state.

Balancing the interests of persons whose rights of ownership are to be restored and the interests of all society in the course of restitution

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 23 August 2005

The fact that the state has decided that the denied rights of ownership must be restored, as well as the fact that the law regulating restitution relationships has been adopted and that the restoration of the rights of ownership has started to be implemented, means that the state has undertaken the obligation to restore the rights of ownership in the manner, under the conditions and procedure, and within the time limits as provided for in the law. At the same time, the duty has arisen for the state (its institutions) to allocate the necessary funds and other financial and material resources for the restoration of the rights of ownership (inter alia, for the payment of monetary compensation for real property to be purchased by the state). It needs to be noted that the legislature, when it establishes, by means of a law, the manner, conditions, and procedure of the restoration of the rights of ownership to the existing real property, as well as when it consolidates such a manner of the restoration of the rights of ownership to the existing real property as monetary compensation payment, is bound by the norms and principles of the Constitution: inter alia, by Paragraph 2 of Article 128 of the Constitution, according to which the procedure for the possession, use, and disposal of state-owned property is established by law; by Article 23 of the Constitution, which consolidates the protection of the rights of ownership; by Article 29 of the Constitution, which guarantees the equality of the rights of persons; and by the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law, which encompasses legal clarity, legal certainty, legal security, the protection of legitimate expectations, and other requirements; the legislature is also bound by other norms and principles of the Constitution. While regulating the restoration of the rights of ownership to the existing real property, the legislature must take account of the constitutional principles of the protection of property, as well as of the fact that, in the course of restoring the rights of ownership to the existing real property, it is equally necessary to protect other values consolidated in the Constitution, inter alia, the striving for an open, just, and harmonious civil society, and to ensure that, in the course of restoring the rights of ownership of certain persons, i.e. owners, the rights and legitimate interests of other persons would not be violated. During the process of the restoration of the rights of ownership to the existing real property, a balance should be sought between the interests of persons whose rights of ownership are to be restored and the interests of all society.

The legislature has the discretion to establish, by means of a law, the manner, conditions, and procedure of the restoration of the rights of ownership to the existing real property. In order to fulfil the obligations undertaken by the state to restore the rights of ownership to the existing real property under the manner, conditions, and procedure established in a law, inter alia, in order to pay monetary compensation for the real property purchased by the state, the funds of the state budget and other state resources are used. The burden of the obligations undertaken by the state falls on all society, whose members are also those persons to whom the rights of ownership are restored. Consequently, by establishing the manner, conditions, and procedure of the restoration of the rights of ownership to the existing real property, the state may not undertake the financial and other obligations in the amount that would be unbearable for society and the state, would impose a disproportionately heavy financial or another burden on society, could cause social tension and conflict, would preclude or hinder the state from ensuring other constitutional values, or would preclude or hinder the state from fulfilling the functions that fall on it under the Constitution. The obligations undertaken by the state to restore the rights of ownership to the existing real property must be linked with the financial and material capacities of the state; the time limits of the restoration of the rights of ownership to the existing real property must be realistic – they must be such that the state could properly fulfil the undertaken obligations by the established time.

The duty of the state to pay regard to the principle of the protection of legitimate expectations in the course of regulating restitution relationships

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 23 August 2005

Under the Constitution, the state must comply with obligations undertaken by it and fulfil them properly and in time. The laws on the restoration of the rights of ownership to the existing real property must be supported by financial, material, and other resources of the state. Otherwise, it would be impossible to make use of the laws providing for the restoration of the rights of ownership, they would become inefficient, and the trust of a person in the state and law would be undermined.

[...]

... the fact that the state has decided that the denied rights of ownership must be restored, as well as the fact that the law regulating restitution relationships has been adopted and the restoration of the rights of ownership has started to be implemented, means that the state has created the legitimate expectation for the persons entitled to have their rights of ownership restored that they will be able to implement this right in the manner, under the conditions and procedure, and within the time limits provided for in the law. The said legitimate expectation is protected and defended by the Constitution. At the same time, the state acquires the duty to regulate, by means of laws, the restoration of the rights of ownership to the existing real property in such a manner that the aforementioned legitimate expectation would be implemented in reality.

The powers of the legislature to extend the time limits by when the payment of monetary compensation must be completed and to change the periodicity of compensation payment into the one less favourable to the persons entitled to receive such compensation

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 23 August 2005

... during the process of the restoration of the rights of ownership to the existing real property, a balance should be sought between the interests of persons whose rights of ownership are to be restored and the interests of all society. ... in general, the Constitution does not preclude the legislature, where necessary, from extending the time limits until the expiry of which the payment of particular monetary compensation must be completed, as well as from changing the previously established periodicity of the payment of such monetary compensation, inter alia, from establishing a certain legal regulation that would be less favourable to the persons entitled to receive such monetary compensation. However, the legislature is permitted to establish the aforesaid legal regulation, which would be less favourable to the persons entitled to receive particular monetary compensation, only in exceptional cases, where doing so is constitutionally justifiable. ... inter alia, such a case that would be constitutionally justifiable could occur where, due to special circumstances, a particularly difficult economic and financial situation in the state would emerge, in which, if the legislature did not extend the previous time limits, established in the law, until the expiry of which the payment of particular monetary compensation must be completed and/or if the legislature did not change the previously established periodicity of the payment of monetary compensation into the one less favourable to the persons entitled to receive that monetary compensation, the values protected under the Constitution would be damaged to an extent that is greater than the one that could occur if the said time limits, until the expiry of which the payment of monetary compensation must be completed, [were extended] and/or the previously established periodicity of the payment of monetary compensation [were changed] into the one less favourable to the persons entitled to receive that monetary compensation.

It should especially be emphasised that, when, due to certain objective reasons, extending the previously established time limits until the expiry of which the payment of monetary compensation must be completed and/or changing the previously established periodicity of the payment of monetary compensation, the legislature must pay regard to the constitutional requirements of legal clarity, legal certainty, legal security, and the protection of legitimate expectations, which imply the duty of the legislature also to establish, by means of a law, such a legal regulation that would cover the aforesaid situations and would make it clear by when the payment of monetary compensation is to be completed, as well as in what portions and when such compensation is to be paid to persons entitled to receive it.

The constitutional requirements of legal clarity, legal certainty, and the protection of legitimate expectations also imply that the time limits until the expiry of which the payment of monetary compensation must be completed may not be unreasonably long, nor may they be extended for an unreasonably long time period, since the unreasonably long time limits of the restoration of the rights of ownership to the existing real property, especially in the event of their unreasonable extension (inter alia, repeated extension), can distort the institution of the restoration of the rights of ownership to the existing real property, violate the constitutional rights of ownership, as well as other rights of a person, and undermine the trust of people in the state and law.

As long as property is not restituted or compensation is not paid, the rights of former owners to concrete property are not restored

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 23 August 2005

In its rulings adopted in the constitutional justice cases in which the constitutionality of the legal acts (parts thereof) regulating the restoration of the ownership rights of citizens to the existing real property was assessed, the Constitutional Court noted on more than one occasion that, as long as property has not been restituted or, in cases where property is not restituted in kind – as long as the respective compensation has not been paid, the subjective rights of a former owner to concrete property are not restored. A decision of the institution authorised by the state to restitute property in kind or to compensate for it has the juridical meaning to the effect that, only from the moment of the adoption of such a decision, a former owner acquires the rights of the owner to the property concerned. Where the rights of ownership are restored on the grounds of a law, the norms of Article 23 of the Constitution apply to the defence of these rights to the full extent; after the decision to restore the rights of ownership to a person is adopted by the institution authorised by the state, the person acquires the rights of ownership, which are protected and defended by Article 23 of the Constitution.

The recognition of the continuity of the rights of ownership constitutes the grounds for limited restitution

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 5 July 2007

... when, on 15 November 1990, the Supreme Council adopted the principled decision that it is necessary to restore the rights of ownership, it was held that the continuity of the rights of ownership of the citizens of Lithuania is unquestionably recognised, that the citizens of Lithuania have the right to recover in kind, within the limits and under procedure defined by means of a law, the property that belonged to them, while, in cases where there are no possibilities of recovering it, to receive compensation for it. The provision that, in cases where there are no possibilities for restituting property in kind, compensation must be granted is not in conflict with the principles of the inviolability of property and the protection of the rights of ownership, since fair compensation also ensures the restoration of the rights of ownership; however, it is important that the conditions that prevent the restitution of property in kind and are established by means of the law regulating restitution relationships be in line with the constitutional provisions governing the protection of ownership.

It was impossible to restore the denied rights of ownership by invoking the laws that were valid at the time when the said principled decision to restore the rights of ownership was adopted. In regulating, by means of laws, the restoration of the denied rights of ownership, it was necessary to take account of the fact that, during the years of the occupation, other property relationships, as well as other social and economic relationships, emerged among people and other objective circumstances appeared, due to which it was impossible to completely restore the rights of ownership (to return to the status quo ante). Therefore ... not restitutio in integrum, but limited restitution, was chosen; such a choice was determined, among other factors, by the scale of the restoration of the rights of ownership and the limited material and financial capacities of the state.

The constitutional grounds for regulating restitution relationships; limited restitution

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 5 July 2007

When regulating the relationships of the restoration of the rights of ownership, the legislature has the discretion to establish the conditions and procedure for the restoration of the rights of ownership. In doing so, the legislature is bound by the Constitution; thus, the legislature must pay regard to the constitutional principles of the protection of the rights of ownership, the constitutional striving for an open, just, and harmonious civil society, as well as other constitutional values. In its ruling of 4 March 2003, the Constitutional Court held that, when the conditions and procedure for the restoration of the rights of ownership are established by means of laws, it is necessary to take account of the changed social, economic, and other conditions. In its ruling of 27 October 1998, the Constitutional Court held that, in the process of the restoration of the rights of ownership, it is necessary to balance the interests of persons who seek to restore the rights of ownership and the needs of society; in the same ruling, it was also stated that, in the course of the restoration of the rights of some persons, it is not permitted to violate the rights of other persons and that it is impossible to attain justice by recognising the interests of only one group or one person and by denying the interests of others at the same time.

The Law on the Restoration of the Rights of Ownership of Citizens to the Existing Real Property may provide that objects of property are not restituted in kind to the persons entitled to have their rights of ownership to those objects restored and that those objects are purchased by the state; the provision [of the law] that compensation must be provided for in cases where property may not be restituted in kind is not in conflict with the principles of the inviolability of property and the protection of the rights of ownership, since fair compensation ensures the restoration of the rights of ownership in an equal manner (rulings of 27 May 1994 and 23 August 2005).

... the legislature, while having the powers to establish the conditions and procedure for the restoration of the rights of ownership, also has the powers to stipulate (of course, without overstepping the limitations established explicitly and implicitly in the Constitution) that, in cases where it is impossible to restate in kind specifically the property that belonged to a certain person by right of ownership prior to the unlawful nationalisation or other unlawful expropriation, the rights of ownership are restored by other ways, inter alia, by granting a plot of land, forest, or water body of equal value in another location, i.e. by granting property that never belonged to that person by right of ownership.

Interpreting Article 23 of the Constitution in the context of the restoration of the rights of ownership, the Constitutional Court has held that it is impossible to equate the purchase by the state of the existing real property from citizens whose rights of ownership are to be restored with the taking of property from an owner for the needs of society and that, in deciding whether compensation for the existing real property not to be restituted in kind is fair, regard should be paid to the fact that it was not the State of Lithuania that unlawfully nationalised or otherwise unlawfully expropriated the property of owners. The State of Lithuania, seeking, at least in part, to restore justice – to restore the violated rights of ownership, has opted for limited restitution rather than restitutio in integrum; the restoration of justice where owners are compensated for the existing real property not to be restituted in kind has two sides: it is the restoration of justice with respect to both owners and all society; the unlawful actions of the occupation government inflicted enormous damage not only on the owners whose rights of ownership were denied, but also on all society and the entire state; in restoring justice with respect to owners, the state may not ignore justice with respect to all society, whose members also include the said owners; in the process of the restoration of the rights of ownership, the state must strive for a balance between the persons whose rights of ownership are to be restored and the interests of all society (ruling of 4 March 2003).

The Constitution does not prohibit such a situation where the relationships of the restoration of the rights of ownership to the existing real property are regulated by means of a law in a differentiated manner, inter alia, in terms that the conditions and procedure for the restoration of the rights of ownership may vary depending on the kind of the property (land, forest, a water body) to which the rights of ownership are to be restored, or depending on the territory on which the property to which the rights of ownership are to be restored is located. However, regard must be paid to the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law, which includes, inter alia, the protection of legitimate expectations, legal certainty, and legal security.

At the same time, it needs to be emphasised that, although the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law implies the requirements of legal certainty, legal security, the protection of legitimate expectations, and other requirements, inter alia, those raised for the legal regulation of restitution relationships, it is not permitted to interpret the said principle in such a way that it does not, in general, permit the legislature, after it has started the restoration of the rights of ownership under certain conditions, to change those conditions later, inter alia, to establish new, additional conditions, in cases where such changes are aimed at protecting certain constitutional values that would be harmed or the preconditions for such harm would be created if the conditions for the restoration of the rights of ownership to the existing real property established earlier were not changed. Quite to the contrary, should it become clear that the restoration of the rights of ownership to the existing real property under the earlier established conditions and procedure inflicts harm on other values protected and defended by the Constitution or gives rise to the preconditions for such harm to appear, the legislature not only may, but also must, respectively amend the previously established conditions and procedure for the restoration of the rights of ownership to the existing real property. However, in such cases, the legislature must also pay regard to the constitutional principle of proportionality, under which the measures established by legal acts and put into application must be proportionate to the objective sought, while the rights of a person may not be limited more than necessary in order to reach a legitimate, universally significant, and constitutionally justifiable objective.

Restitution in areas of particular value

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 5 July 2007

... the circumstance that the property to which the rights of ownership are restored is in an area that is categorised as an area of particular value is a sufficient basis for the legislature to regulate the restoration of the rights of ownership to such property, by taking account of, inter alia, the legal status of such an area. It needs to be emphasised that the legislature, when establishing the conditions and procedure for the restoration of the rights of ownership to land, forests, and water bodies that are located in areas of particular value may not disregard the imperative, arising from the Constitution, to regulate those relationships in the manner ensuring that the protection of areas of particular value is not undermined, since ... areas of particular value are a national value of universal significance and it is necessary to preserve them for posterity; the protection of such areas is a public interest, to guarantee which is a constitutional obligation of the state.

[...]

If the objects of nature that are located in areas of particular value belong by right of ownership to the state, then, regardless of whether or not they are recognised as objects of state importance, they may be transferred into the ownership of other persons only in the cases (and only in the manner) where this is constitutionally justifiable; inter alia, a legal regulation whereby land, forests, parks, and water bodies that are located in areas of particular value and belong by right of ownership to the state would be transferred, as equivalent kind, into the ownership of other persons when the rights of ownership are restored to them, i.e. a legal regulation whereby an object – land, a forest, a park, or a water body – that is located in an area of particular value would be transferred to a person in kind into his/her ownership where such a person never had the ownership rights to the said object, would lack constitutional justification (ruling of 14 March 2006).

... the legislature has the powers to establish also such a manner of the restoration of the rights of ownership of citizens that, in cases where it is impossible to restitute in kind the plot of land, forest, or water body that belonged to a person by right of ownership prior to the unlawful nationalisation or other unlawful expropriation, the rights of ownership are restored by giving the person a plot of land, forest, or water body that is in another locality, but which is of equal value to the former one; however, under the Constitution, the legislature may not establish any such a manner of the restoration of the rights of ownership to the existing real property where, instead of the previously possessed plot of land, forest, or water body in another location, a person is assigned land, forest, or a water body as property of equal value that is located in the areas categorised as areas of particular value. Such a legal regulation would create the legal preconditions for the occurrence of qualitative changes in areas of particular value, the control over which would be difficult, and it would not be in line with Article 54 and Paragraph 2 of Article 128 of the Constitution and the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law.

[...]

... the legislature can also establish a legal regulation whereby, in the territory of areas of particular value (in state parks and state reserves), a person is restituted in kind precisely the land, forest, or water body that belonged to him/her by right of ownership prior to the unlawful nationalisation or other unlawful expropriation, in cases where the said land, forest, or water body are not purchased by the state.

The legitimate expectation of citizens that their rights of ownership to the existing real property will be restored

The Constitutional Court's decision of 4 July 2008

The Constitutional Court has held in its acts on more than one occasion that the fact that the state has decided that the denied rights of ownership must be restored, as well as the fact that the law regulating restitution relationships has been adopted and the restoration of the rights of ownership has started to be implemented, means that the state has created the legitimate expectation for the persons entitled to have their rights of ownership restored that they will be able to implement this right in the manner, under the conditions and procedure, and within the time limits provided for in the law; the said legitimate expectation is protected and defended by the Constitution; at the same time, the state acquires the duty to regulate, by means of laws, the restoration of the rights of ownership to the existing real property in such a manner that the aforementioned legitimate expectation would be implemented in reality.

[...]

In the acts of the Constitutional Court, it has also been held on more than one occasion that the legislature, having established the procedure and conditions for the restoration of the rights of ownership, emphasised that priority is given to the restitution of land in kind to the former owners; however, if, due to the existing factual relationships of land use and the needs of society, there are no possibilities of restoring the land in kind, they are guaranteed the right to choose the manner of the restoration of the rights of ownership under the procedure and conditions established in the law, inter alia, the restoration of the rights of ownership in equivalent kind.

However, after the legislature has chosen not restitutio in integrum, but limited restitution, citizens who meet the requirements established in [the law] for the restoration of the rights of ownership are granted the right to restitution, though not necessarily in the requested manner (provided there is no possibility of restoring the rights of ownership in that particular manner), but in the manner provided for in the law, where the choice of the manner is determined not by the wishes of claimants to property restitution, but by objective circumstances (obstacles to reconstitute the property in kind or to compensate with property of equal value, where such obstacles emerged due to the factual relationships of land use and the needs of society).

Therefore, the statement of the will of a citizen who meets the requirements established in [the law] for the restoration of the rights of ownership does not mean that the rights of ownership will be restored to him/her in the manner that he/she requests. At the same time, it needs to be noted that, after a claimant to property restitution has properly stated his/her will, he/she may reasonably expect that the rights of ownership will be restored to him/her in the manner provided for in the law, by following the procedure established in [the law], and that, in the course of the restoration of the rights of ownership, the procedure provided for in [the law] will not be violated (authorised institutions will not delay the performance of the actions that are within their competence).

The needs of society due to which the existing real property is not restituted in kind to former owners

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 2 September 2011

... as held by the Constitutional Court, the legitimate expectation of an owner to have his/her rights of ownership restored to the existing real property does not mean that the rights of ownership to the existing real property must, in all cases, be restored by restituting that property in kind; there may also be such legal situations where former owners are not restituted in kind such existing real property that is necessary for the needs of society (ruling of 20 May 2008).

The Constitutional Court has held on more than one occasion that the needs of society due to which the existing real property is not to be restituted in kind to former owners may be very much varied. The Constitutional Court has held that the concept of the needs of society due to which certain property is not to be restituted in kind in the course of restitution, but is to be purchased by the state, is much broader than the content of the notion “the needs of society”, as used in Paragraph 3 of Article 23 of the Constitution (ruling of 5 July 2007).

In this context, it should be noted that, as held by the Constitutional Court, the needs of society for which property may be taken according to the procedure established by means of a law and must be justly compensated for are the interests of all society or part thereof. The state, while carrying out its functions, is constitutionally obligated to ensure and satisfy such interests; where property is taken for the needs of society, it is important to seek a balance among various legitimate interests of all society and its members; the needs of society for which property is taken are always specific and clearly expressed needs of society for a concrete object of property (rulings of 2 April 2001 and 4 March 2003).

... it also needs to be noted that, according to the law, it is allowed not to reconstitute to former owners in kind only such existing real property that is used for the needs of all society or part thereof (but not for the needs of individual persons), inter alia, the property used for educational, healthcare, cultural, and scientific needs.

The constitutional grounds for regulating restitution relationships

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 19 June 2012

... in the acts of the Constitutional Court (inter alia, the rulings of 4 March 2003, 23 August 2005, 5 July 2007, 20 May 2008, 9 March 2010, and 22 December 2010), the broad official constitutional doctrine of the restoration of the rights of citizens to the existing real property was formed, which is based, inter alia, on the following provisions:

- the State of Lithuania, seeking, at least in part, to restore justice – to restore the violated rights of ownership, has opted for limited restitution rather than restitutio in integrum; such a choice was determined by the scale of the restoration of the rights of ownership and the limited material and financial capacities of the state; in regulating, by means of laws, the restoration of the denied rights of ownership, it was necessary to take account of the fact that, during the years of the occupation, other property relationships, as well as other social and economic relationships, emerged among people and other objective circumstances appeared, due to which it was impossible to completely restore the rights of ownership (to return to the status quo ante);

- in regulating the restoration of the denied rights of ownership, the legislature has the discretion to establish the conditions and procedure for the restoration of the rights of ownership;

- the legislature, in regulating the restoration of the rights of ownership, has the discretion to establish, inter alia, the time limits for filing applications for the restoration of the rights of ownership; in doing so, the legislature must take account of the fact that the unreasonably long time limits of the restoration of the rights of ownership to the existing real property, especially in the event of their unreasonable extension (inter alia, repeated extension), may distort the institution of the restoration of the rights of ownership to the existing real property (ruling of 22 December 2010);

- the fact that the state has decided that the denied rights of ownership must be restored, also the fact that the law regulating restitution relationships has been adopted and that the implementation of the restoration of ownership rights has started, has created the legitimate expectation for persons that have the right to restore the rights of ownership to implement such their right in the manner, under the conditions and procedure, and within the time limits as established in the law; the said legitimate expectation is protected and defended by the Constitution; at the same time, the state acquires the duty to regulate, by means of laws, the restoration of the rights of ownership to the existing real property in such a manner that the aforementioned legitimate expectation would be implemented in reality;

- the constitutional imperatives of a harmonious, just, and open civil society, as well as the constitutional requirements of legal certainty, legal security, and the protection of legitimate expectations, imply that the launched process of restitution may not be extended for an unreasonably long time; thus, amendments to the legal regulation governing the respective relationships may not be such that would create the preconditions for delaying this process for an unreasonably long period; due to an unreasonably long time during which the rights of ownership to the existing real property are restored, the essence of the institution of restitution itself can be distorted or even denied, as well as the constitutional rights of ownership and other rights of a person can be violated, and the trust of people in the state and law can be undermined (rulings of 5 July 2007 and 22 December 2010).

Fair compensation for real property purchased by the state (Article 23 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 11 September 2013

Article 23 of the Constitution prescribes:

“Property shall be inviolable.

The rights of ownership shall be protected by law.

Property may be taken only for the needs of society according to the procedure established by law and shall be justly compensated for.”

The right of ownership as an innate right of a human being, in the sense of Article 23 of the Constitution, may not be equated to the right of a citizen of the Republic of Lithuania to restore the rights of ownership to the existing real property according to the procedure established by means of a law (ruling of 22 December 2010).

Interpreting the content of Article 23 of the Constitution in the context of the restoration of the rights of ownership, the Constitutional Court has held that the constitutional guarantee of the inviolability of property, as well as the constitutional regulation of the taking of private property for the needs of society, denies any possibility of general nationalisation without compensation; such a concept of the function of Article 23 of the Constitution implies that, in restoring the rights of ownership to citizens whose rights of ownership were generally and unlawfully denied by the occupation government, the state must also follow the principle of fair compensation for property to be purchased by the state (ruling of 18 June 1998).

The Constitutional Court, interpreting Article 23 of the Constitution, has also held on more than one occasion that the legislature, in regulating the restoration of the denied rights of ownership, has discretion to establish the conditions and procedure for the restoration of the rights of ownership and that this discretion is objectively determined by the fact that, during the period following the unlawful expropriation of property, the system of the relationships of ownership changed in substance (rulings of 2 April 2001 and 4 March 2003). Nonetheless, when establishing, by means of laws, the conditions and procedure for the restoration of the rights of ownership to the existing real property, the legislature is bound by the Constitution; thus, the legislature is also obliged to take account of the constitutional principles of the protection of the rights of ownership, the constitutional striving for an open, just, and harmonious civil society, as well as of other constitutional values (ruling of 4 March 2003).

The Constitutional Court has held on more than one occasion that the provision according to which compensation must be granted where the restitution of property in kind is impossible is not in conflict with the principles of the inviolability of property and the protection of the rights of ownership, since fair compensation ensures the restoration of the rights of ownership (inter alia, the rulings of 23 August 2005, 5 July 2007, 6 September 2007, 9 March 2010, and 30 May 2013).

Interpreting Article 23 of the Constitution in the context of the restoration of the rights of ownership to the existing real property, the Constitutional Court has also held on more than one occasion that, in deciding whether compensation for the existing real property not to be restituted in kind is fair, regard should be paid to the fact that it was not the State of Lithuania that unlawfully nationalised or otherwise unlawfully expropriated the property of owners; the State of Lithuania, seeking, at least in part, to restore justice – to restore the violated rights of ownership, has opted for limited restitution rather than restitutio in integrum; the restoration of justice where owners are compensated for the existing real property not to be restituted in kind has two sides: it is the restoration of justice with respect to both owners and all society. The unlawful actions of the occupation government inflicted enormous damage not only on the owners whose rights of ownership were denied, but also on all society and the entire state; in restoring justice with respect to owners, the state may not ignore justice with respect to all society, whose members also include the said owners; in the process of the restoration of the rights of ownership, the state must strive for a balance between the persons whose rights are to be restored and the interests of all society (rulings of 4 March 2003, 5 July 2007, and 20 May 2008).

Land that is not to be restituted in kind to owners due to its indispensability for the needs of society is to be purchased by the state and the owners concerned must be compensated for it in the forms and manner as established by means of a law; when establishing, by means of a law, the forms and procedure of compensating owners for land to be purchased by the state, the legislature must pay regard to a balance between the legitimate interests of a person and those of society (ruling of 10 May 2002).

In its ruling of 4 March 2003, the Constitutional Court held that, in deciding whether compensation for the existing real property not to be restituted in kind is fair, account should be taken not only of the actual market value of the property not to be restituted in kind, but also of the value of that property at the time when it was unlawfully nationalised or otherwise unlawfully expropriated, as well as of the changes in the quality and value of that property. The state may not establish any such forms and amounts of compensation that would be financially unbearable for society and the state, would place a disproportionately heavy financial burden on society, and would cause social tension and conflict. Otherwise, the constitutional imperative of a harmonious and just society would be violated.

In its ruling of 18 June 1998, the Constitutional Court held that the deduction of the cost of land betterment is not in itself incompatible with the provision of fair compensation. At the same time, the Constitutional Court noted that the legal regulation of compensation for property to be purchased by the state had been determined, among other factors, by the limited material and financial capacities of the state. When the state undertakes certain obligations under a law, these obligations must be supported by the available material and financial resources, otherwise the law becomes ineffective. Therefore, taking into consideration the capacities of the state, the legislature may establish the respective amounts of compensation for property to be purchased by the state.

In its ruling of 2 April 2001 ... the Constitutional Court held that the location of the particular land, as well as the fact when the land was categorised as urban territory, i.e. prior to or after its unlawful nationalisation, implies the discretion of the legislature to lay down different methods for establishing the price of land. When providing for a method for establishing the price of land, the legislature may not violate the principle of fair compensation and the constitutional principle of the equality of persons.

In the aforesaid ruling, the Constitutional Court noted that ... the fact of crucial importance is not what forms of compensation are established, but whether those forms can secure real and fair compensation for land to be purchased by the state.

At the same time, it should be noted that, in its ruling of 4 March 2003, the Constitutional Court pointed out that fair compensation for property unlawfully nationalised or otherwise unlawfully expropriated may not be equated to fair compensation for property taken for the needs of society, i.e. where property for the needs of society is taken under Article 23 of the Constitution, compensation for such property is fair if it is equal in value to the taken property.

The restoration of the rights of ownership to the existing real property, including the restoration whereby monetary compensation is paid for property to be purchased by the state, may not be equated to the taking of property for the needs of society by fairly compensating for such property as provided for in Paragraph 3 of Article 23 of the Constitution – the nature and purpose of these legal institutions are different (ruling of 23 August 2005).

The right of the heirs of former owners to restore the rights of ownership

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 8 October 2014

The Constitutional Court has noted that the right of ownership, in the sense of Article 23 of the Constitution, is not identical to the right of a citizen of the Republic of Lithuania to restore the rights of ownership to the existing real property according to the procedure established by means of a law (rulings of 22 December 2010, 11 September 2013, and 9 October 2013); in reality, persons to whom the rights of ownership are to be restored do not have the subjective rights to the formerly held property until the moment when the respective state institutions adopt a decision on the restoration of the rights of ownership (rulings of 18 June 1998, 4 March 2003, 20 May 2008, 22 December 2010, and 19 June 2012); only after the authorised state institution adopts a decision to restore the rights of ownership to a person, that person acquires the rights of ownership, which are protected and defended under Article 23 of the Constitution (rulings of 4 March 2003, 23 August 2005, 22 December 2010, 19 June 2012, and 10 October 2013).

[...]

Consequently, under the Constitution, the right to inherit property is also not identical to the right of a citizen of the Republic of Lithuania to restore the rights of ownership to the existing real property according to the procedure established by means of a law; persons who have the right to inherit the property of a deceased former owner must not be identified with persons entitled to restore the rights of ownership to the existing real property according to the procedure established by means of a law.

It should be noted that, in view of the specificity of the relationships of the restoration of the rights of ownership, the discretion of the legislature to establish the conditions and procedure for the restoration of the rights of ownership includes its discretion to define, inter alia, the circle of the subjects to whom the rights of ownership are restored, i.e. to define persons who have the right to restore the rights of ownership. In implementing this discretion, the legislature may establish that the rights of ownership to the existing real property are restored not according to the legal norms governing inheritance relationships, but only under a special procedure established by means of a law, and not to all former owners and not all heirs of former owners, but only to those who meet the conditions established in the law.

The discretion of the legislature to establish different conditions for the restoration of the rights of ownership to land located in different territories

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 30 October 2014

... the necessity to guarantee the constitutional protection of the rights of ownership and the constitutional imperative of an open, just, and harmonious civil society imply the duty of the state, when establishing, by means of laws, the conditions and procedure for the restoration of the rights of ownership, to take account of the changed social, economic, and legal situation, as well as of other realities, and to ensure that, in the course of restoring the rights of ownership of some persons – owners, the rights and legitimate interests of other persons, i.e. those who are using the land of the former owners because it is necessary for the exploitation of the structures owned by these persons by right of ownership, are not violated. The fact that the Constitution does not prohibit the situation where the relationships of the restoration of the rights of ownership to the existing real property are regulated by means of a law in a differentiated manner, to the extent that the conditions and procedure for the restoration of the rights of ownership may vary, inter alia, depending on the territory where the property to which the rights of ownership are to be restored is located, means that the legislature has the discretion to establish differentiated conditions and procedure for the restoration of the rights of ownership to land located in urban areas and rural areas, as well as to land located in different urban areas, inter alia, land necessary for the exploitation of certain structures (buildings); however, in doing so, the legislature must pay regard to the Constitution, inter alia, the requirements stemming from the Constitution that, in the course of restoring the rights of ownership of former owners, the non-violation of the rights and legitimate expectations of other persons must be ensured; in addition, land may be not restituted in kind to persons entitled to have their rights of ownership restored and it may be purchased by the state only where there is the need of society for doing so.

The constitutional grounds for regulating restitution relationships (powers of the legislature to establish the manner, conditions, and procedure for restoring the rights of ownership; the right to restore the rights of ownership to the existing real property is not identical to the right of ownership; the legitimate expectation of citizens that their rights of ownership to the existing real property will be restored)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 16 June 2015

In the acts of the Constitutional Court, the broad official constitutional doctrine of restitution – the restoration of the ownership rights of citizens to the existing real property – has been formulated.

The Constitutional Court has held on more than one occasion that, when regulating the restoration of the denied rights of ownership, the legislature has the discretion to establish the conditions and procedure for the restoration of the rights of ownership (inter alia, the rulings of 4 March 2003, 11 September 2013, 9 October 2013, and 10 October 2013). This discretion is objectively determined by the fact that, during the period following the unlawful expropriation of property, the system of the relationships of ownership changed in substance (rulings of 2 April 2001, 4 March 2003, and 11 September 2013); in the course of establishing, by means of laws, the conditions and procedure for the restoration of the rights of ownership, it is necessary to take account of the changed social, economic, and other conditions (ruling of 6 September 2007).

When establishing, by means of a law, the manner, conditions, and procedure for the restoration of the rights of ownership to the existing real property, the legislature is bound by the norms and principles of the Constitution, inter alia, by Article 23 of the Constitution, which consolidates the protection of the rights of ownership, by Article 29 thereof, which guarantees the equality of the rights of persons, as well as by the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law, which encompasses legal clarity, legal certainty, legal security, the protection of legitimate expectations, and other requirements (rulings of 23 August 2005, 22 December 2010, 30 May 2013, and 30 October 2014).

The Constitutional Court has held that the right of ownership, in the sense of Article 23 of the Constitution, is not identical to the right of citizens of the Republic of Lithuania to have the rights of ownership to the existing real property restored according to the procedure established by means of a law (rulings of 22 December 2010, 11 September 2013, and 9 October 2013). In reality, persons to whom the rights of ownership are to be restored do not have the subjective rights to the formerly held property until the moment when the respective state institutions adopt a decision on the restoration of the rights of ownership (inter alia, the rulings of 18 June 1998, 4 March 2003, 20 May 2008, 22 December 2010, and 19 June 2012). Only after the authorised state institution adopts a decision to restore the rights of ownership to a person, that person acquires the rights of ownership, which are protected and defended under Article 23 of the Constitution (inter alia, the rulings of 4 March 2003, 23 August 2005, 10 October 2013, 8 October 2014, and 30 October 2014).

The Constitutional Court has also held that the legal regulation providing for certain alternatives to the restoration of the rights of ownership in kind is not in conflict with the objectives of restitution and the constitutional principle of the protection of the rights of ownership (rulings of 20 May 2008, 9 March 2010, 11 October 2012, and 30 October 2014). In this case, the fact of crucial importance is not what manner of compensation is established, but whether this manner ensures real and fair compensation (rulings of 2 April 2001, 11 September 2013, and 30 October 2014). In the laws governing restitution, the provision according to which compensation must be granted where the restitution of property in kind is impossible, is not in conflict with the principles of the inviolability of property and the protection of the rights of ownership, since fair compensation ensures the restoration of the rights of ownership (inter alia, the rulings of 5 July 2007 and 6 September 2007 and the decision of 4 July 2008).

The constitutional principle of the equality of the rights of persons, which is consolidated in Article 29 of the Constitution, means, inter alia, that the legislature, when it regulates the legal relationships of the restoration of the rights of ownership by means of a law, is not allowed to establish any such a legal regulation that would, in a different manner, treat persons entitled to have their rights of ownership restored if there are not any such differences between those persons that would objectively justify their unequal treatment (ruling of 20 November 1996).

[...]

The Constitutional Court has also noted that, as such, amendments to the legal regulation made by the legislature by paying regard to the Constitution where such amendments modify the conditions and procedure for the restoration of the rights of ownership may not be regarded as the unequal treatment of the subjects of the restoration of the rights of ownership (ruling of 30 May 2013).

[...]

The fact that the state has decided that the denied rights of ownership must be restored, as well as the fact that the law regulating restitution relationships has been adopted and the restoration of the rights of ownership has started to be implemented, means that the state has created the legitimate expectation for persons entitled to have their rights of ownership restored that they will be able to implement this right in the manner, under the conditions and procedure, and within the time limits provided for in the law; the said legitimate expectation is protected and defended by the Constitution; at the same time, the state acquires the duty to regulate, by means of laws, the restoration of the rights of ownership to the existing real property in such a manner that the aforementioned legitimate expectation would be implemented in reality (rulings of 23 August 2005 and 20 May 2008, the decision of 4 July 2008, and the ruling of 19 June 2012).

However, the legitimate expectation of persons to have their rights of ownership to the existing real property restored does not mean that such rights must be restored by restituting the property in kind in all situations (rulings of 20 May 2008, 2 September 2011, 11 October 2012, and 30 October 2014).

Although the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law implies the requirements of legal certainty, legal security, the protection of legitimate expectations, and other requirements, inter alia, those raised for the legal regulation of restitution relationships, it is not allowed to interpret the said principle as meaning that it does not, in general, permit the legislature, after it has started the restoration of the rights of ownership under certain conditions, to change those conditions later, inter alia, to establish new, additional conditions, in cases where such changes are aimed at protecting certain constitutional values that would be harmed or the preconditions for such harm would be created if the conditions for the restoration of the rights of ownership to the existing real property established earlier were not changed (rulings of 5 July 2007, 6 September 2007, and 30 May 2013); quite to the contrary, should it become clear that the restoration of the rights of ownership to the existing real property under the earlier established conditions and procedure inflicts harm on other values protected and defended by the Constitution or gives rise to the preconditions for such harm to appear, the legislature not only may, but also must, respectively amend the previously established conditions and procedure for the restoration of the rights of ownership to the existing real property. However, in such cases, regard must also be paid to the constitutional principle of proportionality, under which the applicable measures established by means of legal acts must be proportionate to the objective sought, while the rights of persons may not be limited more than necessary in order to reach a legitimate, universally significant, and constitutionally justifiable objective (ruling of 5 July 2007).

The constitutional imperatives of a harmonious, just, and open civil society, as well as the constitutional requirements of legal certainty, legal security, and the protection of legitimate expectations, imply that the launched process of restitution may not be extended for an unreasonably long time; due to an unreasonably long time during which the rights of ownership to the existing real property are restored, the essence of the institution of restitution itself can be distorted or even denied, the constitutional rights of ownership and other rights of a person can be violated, and the trust of people in the state and law can be undermined (rulings of 5 July 2007, 22 December 2010, and 19 June 2012).

2.2.5.3. Special objects of the right of ownership

Land, forests, and water bodies are special objects of the right of ownership

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 13 May 2005

... land, forests, and water bodies are among objects of ownership (also of private ownership). Their proper and rational use is a public interest protected by the Constitution.

It should especially be emphasised that, from the point of view of the right of ownership, land, forests, and water bodies are special objects, since the proper use and protection of land, forests, and water bodies are the medium of the existence of human beings as biological and social beings, as well as the medium for maintaining and spreading social ties, a condition for the survival and development of human beings and society, and the basis of the welfare of the nation. Ownership includes obligations. This constitutional imperative, linked with the aforesaid especially important function of land, forests, and water bodies, as objects of the natural environment, and with the nature of the said special objects of the right of ownership, means that, under the Constitution, it is necessary to establish a legal regulation that would consolidate the obligation of owners to contribute to ensuring the constitutionally enshrined public interest – the protection of the natural environment, wildlife and plants, individual objects of nature, and areas of particular value and the rational use of natural resources, as well as their restoration and increase – in such a manner that the land, forests, and water bodies that belong to them by right of ownership would be used only properly and rationally and that no harm would be inflicted on the said land, forests, and water bodies as the medium of the existence of human beings and society and one of the necessary conditions for the survival and development of human beings and society. This implies, inter alia, that laws may establish specific requirements defining the management, use, and disposal of plots of land, forests, and water bodies, as well as particular limitations on and conditions for the owners of these objects. In this context, it should be noted that, in its ruling of 27 May 1994, the Constitutional Court held that the specific purpose and situation of land, as compared with other objects of real property, also determines a special legal regulation of the relationships connected with land; it was held by the Constitutional Court in the rulings of 8 March 1995 and 25 September 1996 that the Constitution treats land as a universal value, which has a social function and must serve the welfare of the nation; it was held in the ruling of 1 June 1998 that the special ecological, social, and economic importance of forests to the environment and public interests determines certain limitations and restrictions on the rights of ownership of the owners of forests.

On the other hand, it is not permitted to deny the essence of the right of ownership by the said limitations, restrictions, or other requirements.

Limiting the rights of ownership of the owners of private plots of land, forests, and water bodies in order to ensure the protection of wildlife and its rational use (Articles 23 and 54 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 13 May 2005

... wildlife is also a specific constituent part of the natural environment in the sense that the living environment of wild animals comprises, inter alia, plots of land, forests, and water bodies, including those that also belong to legal and natural persons by right of ownership.

Thus, such legal situations are possible where the state, while seeking to ensure the public interest, i.e. the protection and rational use of wildlife (its resources), as well as its restoration and increase, may and, in certain cases, must establish a legal regulation whereby the ownership rights of the owners of private plots of land, forests, or water bodies are, to a certain extent, interfered with, but the essence of the ownership right of these owners is not denied.

Interpreting Article 23 of the Constitution within the context of the imperatives of protecting wildlife and ensuring the rational use of its resources, which are consolidated in Article 54 of the Constitution, it must be emphasised that ... the state is under the constitutional obligation to take care of wildlife, to ensure the protection, restoration, and increase of wildlife as a national value of universal importance, including, inter alia, the management (i.e. regulation and control) of populations of wild animals (their species). Thus, when protecting and defending the ownership rights of a person, it is not allowed to violate the public interest that wildlife resources should be used, restored, and increased in a rational manner and that wildlife should be protected. In the event of a clash of these two constitutional values – the ownership rights of a person and the public interest that wildlife resources would be used, restored, and increased in a rational manner and that wildlife would be protected – it is necessary to find solutions that could ensure a fair balance between these values, i.e. that none of these values would be denied. This requirement also applies to the adoption of the legal acts regulating the respective social relationships and to the legal regulation established therein.

... in the course of regulating, by means of legal acts, the management (i.e. regulation and control) of populations of wild animals (their species), the rights of ownership of the owners of private plots of land, forests, and water bodies may be limited to the extent that it is necessary to achieve the said socially important objective, i.e. only to the extent that is necessary to ensure the protection of wildlife and the rational use of its resources, as well as its restoration and increase. If, while seeking to achieve the said socially important objective, it is inevitably necessary to limit ownership rights (without denying their essence) to a certain extent, there must be a fair balance between the said objective and the chosen means of limitation: it is allowed to establish only such means of limitation that would limit the rights of ownership of owners to the extent not greater than necessary.

Interpreting the provision, which stems from the Constitution, that ownership includes obligations in conjunction with Article 54 of the Constitution, it needs to be emphasised ... that the owners of private plots of land, forests, or water bodies, when enjoying the right to possess, use, and dispose of their property, may not violate the imperatives of the protection of wildlife and its rational use, as well as its restoration and increase, which are consolidated in Article 54 of the Constitution.

Implementing its constitutional obligation to take care of wildlife and ensure the protection, rational use, restoration, and increase of wildlife as a national value of universal importance, the state may establish the respective procedure for the use of plots of land, forests, and water bodies, where the said procedure will have to be followed by all persons, including the owners of private plots of land, forests, or water bodies. However, the said procedure may not limit the rights and legitimate interests of other persons, including those of the private owners of plots of land, forests, or water bodies, more than it is necessary in order to achieve the said socially important objective.

The right of owners to prohibit hunting in the plots of land that belong to them

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 13 May 2005

Under the Constitution, the legislature, when regulating hunting and related relationships, may not establish a legal regulation whereby hunting may be permitted in private land plots located in hunting grounds without the permission of the owners of those particular land plots. In this respect, an owner may not be subject to any restrictions on the grounds established in legal acts; the absence of such grounds does not mean that it is allowed to ignore the will of the owner that no hunting should take place in the land, forest, or water body belonging to him/her by the right of ownership. If it is intended to use a plot of land owned by a person by right of ownership for hunting, the owner of this land plot must be informed in a due manner – directly, and a reasonable and, thus, sufficient time period must be provided for during which the owner could have a real possibility of expressing his/her will freely concerning whether hunting can or cannot take place in that land plot, as well as under what conditions the owner agrees that hunting may take place in that land plot.

In this context, it should be noted that the ownership rights of an owner would not be automatically violated by such a legal regulation under which the fact that an owner of a private land plot that is located in hunting grounds and is intended to be used for hunting, after the owner has been duly informed about this, has failed within a reasonable time period to express his/her will whether hunting can or cannot take place in that particular land plot is considered to be his/her consent that hunting can take place in that land plot. Moreover, it is worth noting that it is possible to establish, by means of a law, various forms and procedure of expressing the consent of an owner of a private land plot located in hunting grounds that hunting can take place in that land plot, inter alia, that agreements may be concluded concerning the granting of the right to hunt in the land plot of the owner.

[...]

The Constitution consolidates the imperative that ownership includes obligations. ... under the Constitution, it is necessary to establish such a legal regulation that would lay down the obligation of owners themselves to efficiently contribute to the constitutionally consolidated public interest, i.e. ensuring the protection of the natural environment, wildlife and plants, individual objects of nature, and areas of particular value, as well as the rational use of natural resources and their restoration and increase, inter alia, the proper management of populations of wild animals (their species).

If an owner of a private plot of land, forest, or water body prohibits hunting in the land owned by him/her, the management (i.e. regulation and control) of populations of animals (their species) in the respective territory also becomes more difficult from the aspect that, in this way, damage may be inflicted on the legal rights and interests of the owner himself/herself, including the fact that huntable animals may cause certain damage to such owners. An owner who has prohibited the hunting of huntable animals in the land owned by him/her accepts a certain risk; there is no reason to require that someone else compensate for the aforementioned damage.

Cultural objects of state importance; the nationalisation of cultural objects of national importance (Paragraph 1 of Article 47 (wording of 23 January 2003) of the Constitution)

See 11. The state budget and finances, 11.2. The possession, use, and disposal of state-owned property. Property that belongs by right of exclusive ownership to the Republic of Lithuania, the ruling of 8 July 2005.

Land, forests, parks, and water bodies are special objects of the right of ownership; the duty of their owners, managers, and users to protect the natural environment; limiting the rights of ownership of the owners of private land plots located in areas of particular value in order to ensure the protection of the natural environment (Articles 23, 46, 53, and 54 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 14 March 2006

... land, forests, parks, and water bodies are special objects of the right of ownership, since the proper use and protection of land, forests, parks, and water bodies is a condition for the survival and development of human beings and society and the basis of the welfare of the nation. Under the Constitution, the natural environment, wildlife and plants, individual objects of nature, and areas of particular value are national values of universal importance; protecting such values and ensuring their rational use and increase is a public interest; the state is under the constitutional obligation to guarantee such an interest (ruling of 13 May 2005).

Article 54 of the Constitution provides that the state takes care of the protection of the natural environment, wildlife and plants, individual objects of nature, and areas of particular value, and supervises the sustainable use of natural resources, as well as their restoration and increase (Paragraph 1) and that the destruction of land and subsurface, the pollution of water and air, radioactive impact on the environment, as well as the depletion of wildlife and plants, are prohibited by law (Paragraph 2). It also needs to be mentioned that, under Paragraph 3 of Article 53 of the Constitution, the state and each person must protect the environment from harmful influences.

When interpreting, in conjunction with Article 54 of the Constitution, the provisions, which originate from the Constitution, whereby ownership includes obligations and the right of ownership is not absolute, it should be held that all owners, managers, and users of plots of land, forests, or water bodies must pay regard to the constitutional imperative of the protection of the natural environment, must protect the natural environment, may not make its state worse, and may not inflict harm on it.

[...]

Paragraph 3 of Article 46 of the Constitution prescribes that the state regulates economic activity so that it serves the general welfare of the nation. It is also necessary to pay regard to this constitutional imperative when regulating, by means of legal acts, the relationships linked with the ownership and use of land, forests, or water bodies, including those that are in areas of particular value, as well as with other activities in such locations.

[...]

... the state, while being under the constitutional obligation to act in such a way as to ensure the protection of the natural environment and individual objects of nature, the protection of areas of particular value, and the rational use, restoration, and increase of natural resources, may also establish, by means of laws, a legal regulation that would impose also such limitations and prohibitions on the owners of the respective objects located in areas of particular value whereby the rights of ownership of the owners of private plots of land would be interfered with to a certain extent. Such limitations and prohibitions must be proportionate to the sought constitutionally justifiable objective.

[...]

In this ruling of the Constitutional Court, it has been held that: the variety of areas of particular value can determine the particularities of their legal regime, the manner of the protection of objects that are located in such areas, as well as the conditions of and limitations and prohibitions on activity in such areas; such limitations and prohibitions may be applied, inter alia, to economic activity and construction in the said areas, as well as to any other activity due to which landscape in particular areas or individual objects located in those areas can be changed, etc.; the said limitations and prohibitions aimed to ensure the protection of areas of particular value, which is a public interest, may and must be imposed on all owners and users of such objects; it is also allowed to impose such limitations and prohibitions whereby the rights of ownership of all owners, including those of private land plots, forests, parks, or water bodies, are interfered with to a certain extent. It has also been held that all said limitations and prohibitions must be constitutionally justifiable; they must not restrict the rights of owners and other persons more than it is necessary in order to achieve the universally important objectives.

A differentiated regulation of the relationships linked with the ownership and use of land, forests, parks, and water bodies (Articles 47 and 54 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 14 March 2006

When regulating, by means of legal acts, the relationships linked with the ownership and use of land, forests, and water bodies, including those located in areas of particular value, attention must be paid to the fact that the said objects are very varied. This implies a differentiated legal regulation of the said relationships; the grounds for such a legal regulation stem from the Constitution itself.

[...]

When regulating, in a differentiated manner, the relationships that are linked with the ownership and use of land, forests, parks, and water bodies, including those that are in areas of particular value, the legislature may classify land and other objects of the natural environment under certain types (categories) and may establish a legal regime related to such objects, inter alia, the conditions, limitations, and prohibitions linked with ownership, use, as well as economic and other activity. The said limitations and prohibitions must be constitutionally justifiable.

Under the Constitution, land, forests, parks, and water bodies, including those that are located in areas of particular value, may belong by right of ownership to various subjects – the state, municipalities, as well as legal and natural persons.

Under Paragraph 4 (wording 20 June 1996) of Article 47 of the Constitution and Paragraph 1 (wording 23 January 2003) of Article 47 of the Constitution, inter alia, internal waters, forests, and parks of state importance belong by right of exclusive ownership to the Republic of Lithuania.

This constitutional provision means that the specified objects can belong by right of ownership only to the state, save the exceptions that stem from the Constitution itself; the state (its institutions, officials) may not adopt any decisions that could become the basis for transferring these objects from the ownership of the state into the ownership of other subjects (save the exceptions permitted by the Constitution) (ruling of 8 June 2005).

On the other hand, the fact that, under the Constitution, certain objects of state importance belong by right of exclusive ownership to the Republic of Lithuania does not mean that the respective objects that belonged by right of ownership to certain persons and were later declared to be of state importance must necessarily be taken and made state ownership. In this context, it should be mentioned that, under Paragraph 3 of Article 23 of the Constitution, property may be taken only for the needs of society according to the procedure established by means of a law and must be justly compensated for.

It needs to be emphasised that not every object (inter alia, an object of nature) that belongs by right of ownership to the state should be declared to be of state importance. In addition, it needs to be noted that it is allowed to declare not any internal waters, forests, and parks as internal waters, forests, and parks of state importance and, thus, also as belonging by right of exclusive ownership to the state, but only those whose continuous value is so high and the necessity to preserve them to the posterity is so pressing that, if they were not declared to be of state importance, a threat to their preservation would arise.

Taking account of the special continuous value of internal waters, forests, and parks of state importance and the necessity to preserve them to the posterity, the state is under the constitutional obligation to take care of these objects and preserve them.

The recognition that land, forests, parks, or water bodies, including those that are located in areas of particular value, are of state importance implies a special legal regulation of the relationships linked with the supervision, protection, and use of such objects. In view of the special continuous value of the said objects and of their importance and necessity to preserve them to the posterity, a special individual legal regime may be established by means of a law in connection with such objects if compared with other objects.

It needs to be noted that, under the Constitution, the state also has the duty to take care of those natural objects of state importance that belong by right of ownership to other persons, but not to the state, and to ensure their protection. This duty of the state may not be interpreted as releasing the owners of the respective natural objects from the duty to contribute themselves to the preservation of the said natural objects and to observe the legal regime established with regard to those natural objects.

[...]

It should also be noted that, in cases where certain areas are, under the procedure established by means of a law, declared to be of particular value and/or the individual objects of nature therein are declared to be under protection, the duty may arise for the state to compensate the owners concerned for the losses sustained due to the changed legal regime of the respective areas and/or objects of nature.

Forests as special objects of the right of ownership

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 14 March 2006

... forests are special objects of the right of ownership ... it is possible to establish, by means of a law, a special, exceptional legal regime in connection with forests if compared with other objects. In its ruling of 1 June 1998, the Constitutional Court held that a special ecological, social, and economic importance of forests for the environment and public interests determines certain limitations and restrictions on the rights of ownership of the owners of forests. Such limitations and restrictions must be proportionate to the constitutionally justifiable objective sought.

[...]

... the legislature, in order to ensure the protection of forests and not to diminish their value, may establish the minimum sizes of forest holdings.

The legal regulation governing the relationships linked with the ownership and use of land as a special object of the right of ownership

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 30 March 2006

Land is a special object of the right of ownership (rulings of 13 May 2005 and 14 March 2006). The possession of plots of land by right of ownership may be one of the essential conditions for starting and developing a business and one of the necessary preconditions for engaging in economic activities. When legally regulating the relationships linked with the use of land for business and economic activities, regard must be paid to the specificity of the nature of land as a natural resource and as real property.

The Constitution gives rise to the possibility and necessity of legally regulating the relationships linked with the acquisition, possession, and transfer of land as a special object of the right of ownership (and as one of the conditions of a business – one of the preconditions for engaging in business activity) so that no preconditions are created for inflicting harm on land as a special value, defended and protected by the Constitution, or for violating other constitutional values.

The aforesaid possibility and necessity that arise from the Constitution imply, inter alia, that the legal regulation of these relationships must have certain particularities if compared with the legal regulation of other property relationships. The Constitutional Court has held that the grounds for a differentiated legal regulation connected, inter alia, with the ownership of land (as well as with the ownership of other objects of the natural environment) arise from the Constitution itself (ruling of 14 March 2006).

One of the grounds for the legal regulation of these relationships is the relation of a particular person (either a person who wishes to acquire land by right of ownership or a land owner) with the State of Lithuania, i.e. the fact that he/she is a national subject or a foreign subject: Paragraph 3 of Article 47 of the Constitution provides that, in the Republic of Lithuania, foreign entities may acquire the ownership of land, internal waters, and forests according to a constitutional law.

... land is not the same as regards its nature and useful features. The Constitutional Court has held that the Constitution does not prohibit categorising land and other objects of the natural environment according to various criteria, inter alia, according to the purpose of their use; this must be done by taking account of the characteristics of particular natural objects and other factors of the natural environment (ruling of 14 March 2006).

[...]

... agricultural land is a limited natural resource of exceptional value; its quality and areas with rich soil are constantly decreasing due to industrial impact, urban expansion, and other factors. In order to preserve the useful characteristics of agricultural land, the legislature has the duty to establish clear criteria of changing agricultural land into land for other uses and, in the course of changing land use, regard must be paid to the public interest.

When regulating, in a differentiated manner, the relationships linked with the ownership and use of land, the legislature, taking account of the type (category) of land, may establish a land legal regime, inter alia, the conditions, limitations, and prohibitions regarding ownership, use, as well as economic and other activity. The said limitations and prohibitions must be constitutionally justifiable.

Such limitations and prohibitions may be imposed on all natural and legal persons, regardless of the right by which agricultural land is possessed, i.e. the right of ownership, rent, use, or another right.

It needs to be especially emphasised that a law must establish such a legal regulation whereby plots of land, if they are categorised as agricultural land, would be used only for agricultural purpose by owners and/or users in order that the nature of agricultural land would be preserved until the purpose of agricultural land is changed according to the criteria established by means of a law.

Under the Constitution, the legislature has the right to establish the measures of control and sanctions for failure to comply with the established requirements. The legislature may also establish such means of social engineering that would induce the owners and/or users of plots of agricultural land to use the said plots only according to the established purpose of such land.

Taking account of the nature of land as a limited resource, as well as of the necessity to preserve the useful characteristics of agricultural land, it should be held that the legislature may also establish, by means of a law, the maximum sizes of land plots the acquisition of the ownership of which is allowed.

... the possibility of a differentiated legal regulation of the relationships linked with the ownership and use of land, inter alia, according to the purpose of land, also implies the possibility of establishing, by means of a law, different maximum sizes of agricultural plots of land and those of plots of land of different use the acquisition of the ownership of which is allowed.

However, it needs to be emphasised that, when establishing, by means of a law different maximum sizes of agricultural plots of land and of plots of land of different use the acquisition of the ownership of which is allowed, it is not permitted to violate the norms and principles of the Constitution, inter alia, the imperative of social harmony, justice, proportionality, the equality of the rights of persons, and other principles. Under the Constitution, it is not permitted to establish any such a legal regulation whereby unequal economic conditions would be established to the existing or potential business subjects, the development of businesses would be hindered, or restrictions would be imposed on freedom of economic activity, the economic efforts useful to society, and initiative.

It needs to be underlined that the maximum sizes of agricultural plots of land the acquisition of the ownership of which is allowed must be determined by the nature of agricultural land and the public interest sought, but not by such criteria that cannot be justified constitutionally (as, for instance, the requirement that the acquirers of agricultural plots of land should farm that land by themselves or live in a particular locality, that they would be forced to choose a certain form of farming allowed under laws, etc.).

It needs to be held that, as such, the establishment (by means of a law) of the maximum sizes of agricultural plots of land the acquisition of the ownership of which is allowed does not mean that the right of ownership of a person, freedom of economic activity, or other constitutional rights and freedoms are constitutionally groundlessly restricted. On the contrary, the establishment of such maximum sizes may be one of the means creating the preconditions for the rational management of agricultural land, the preservation of tilled agricultural land, the proper development of agricultural business, the promotion of fair competition in agriculture, the non-permission to monopolise the production and the market, etc.

Such aspirations substantiating the maximum sizes of agricultural plots of land the acquisition of the ownership of which is allowed should be treated as expressing the public interest protected by the Constitution.

In this context, it should be mentioned that the Constitution does not contain any prohibition against establishing, by means of a law, the minimum sizes of agricultural plots of land the acquisition of the ownership of which is allowed as, for instance, the size that is necessary in order that a natural person could register a farm of a farmer, or in order to help prevent possible abuses as, for instance, the acquisition of agricultural plots of land and registering a farm of a farmer (allegedly meant for agricultural activities) only for the purpose of making use of the respective exceptions and concessions provided for by the legal regulation and using support provided by the state or other support and, subsequently, using the said agricultural land not for agricultural, but for other activities.

... under the Constitution, it is permitted in general to establish, by means of a law, different maximum sizes of plots of land of the same use (including agricultural land) the acquisition of the ownership of which is allowed.

However, under the Constitution, it is not permitted to establish any such a legal regulation where the maximum sizes of agricultural plots of land the acquisition of the ownership of which is allowed would be established in regard of different subjects by failing to follow the constitutionally justifiable criteria, since, otherwise, the preconditions would be created for violating the constitutional rights of some of those subjects, inter alia, the right to freely choose a business, the constitutional principle of the equality of the rights of persons, and other provisions of the Constitution; in addition, the preconditions would be created for distorting fair competition in the agricultural market.

Changing the use of land, converting forest land into other landed property (Articles 23 and 54 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 22 June 2009

The Constitutional Court has ... held that it is permitted to make changes in the designation of plots of land as agricultural land or as land for other uses (inter alia, after qualitative changes in the respective resources of land take place); in order to preserve the useful characteristics of agricultural land, the legislature has the duty to establish clear criteria of converting agricultural land into land for other uses and, in the course of changing the use of land, regard must be paid to the public interest (ruling of 30 March 2006); this also mutatis mutandis applies to regulating the relationships linked with converting the designation of plots of land as forest land.

Thus, according to the Constitution, the legislature may establish such a legal regulation according to which the designation of plots of land as land for forestry use may be altered and forest land may be converted into other landed property (inter alia, after qualitative changes in the respective resources of land take place). Under the Constitution, inter alia, Articles 23 and 54 thereof, the legislature, when regulating the relationships linked with converting the designation of plots of land as land for forestry uses into land for other uses, including the relationships linked with converting forest land into other landed property, is obligated to establish clear criteria of converting the designation of plots of land as land for forestry uses into land for other uses, as well as those of converting forest land into other landed property. When doing so, regard must be paid to the particularities of forest as a natural object, the general principles of environmental protection (inter alia, diminishing negative impact on the environment, efficient and combined utilisation), and the public interest. In this context, it should be noted that the legal regulation where a law establishes the conversion of plots of land for forestry uses into land for other uses, as well as the conversion of forest land into other landed property, may be differentiated, inter alia, by taking account of the forest value, the functional purpose, and the impact on the ecosystem.

[...]

... the fact that forest land may be converted into other landed property only in exceptional cases is in line with the special legal status of forest as a national value of exceptional importance.

The subsurface as a special object of the natural environment that belongs by right of exclusive ownership to the state (Paragraph 1 of Article 47 (wording of 23 January 2003) of the Constitution) (on the issue of regulating economic and other activity related to the use of the subsurface, see 2.4.2. Social rights, 2.4.2.3. The right to a healthy environment, the ruling of 16 December 2015 (“The duty of the state, when regulating economic and other activity related to the use of the subsurface, to ensure the protection of the subsurface and other objects of the natural environment (land, water, air, plants, wildlife) and human health, as well as the rational use of natural resources”))

The Constitutional Court’s ruling of 16 December 2015

... under Paragraph 1 of Article 47 (wording of 23 January 2003) of the Constitution, the subsurface belongs by right of exclusive ownership to the Republic of Lithuania. The subsurface is a special object of the natural environment; it belongs by right of exclusive ownership to the state and may never become the property of anyone else. The fact that the subsurface is under the exclusive ownership of the state provides the constitutional ground for establishing a special and specific legal regime of the protection and exploitation of the subsurface compared with other objects of nature.

2.2.6. The inviolability of the home of a human being

The inviolability of the home of a human being (Article 24 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court’s ruling of 29 December 2004

Article 24 of the Constitution prescribes:

“The home of a human being shall be inviolable.

Without the consent of the resident, it shall not be permitted to enter his home otherwise than by a court decision or according to the procedure established by law when this is necessary to guarantee public order, apprehend a criminal, or save the life, health, or property of a human being.”

The principle of the inviolability of the home of a human being is consolidated in Article 24 of the Constitution. Other constitutional human rights and freedoms, i.e. the right to privacy, the right to ownership, etc., as well as acquired rights, are also ensured by the constitutional guarantee of the inviolability of the home of a human being – the guarantee that the home of a human being will be secure from encroachment by outsiders.

At the same time, it needs to be noted that, under the Constitution, the inviolability of the home of a human being is not absolute to the extent that, without the consent of the resident, it is permitted to enter his/her home when this is necessary to guarantee the values protected and defended by the Constitution (Paragraph 2 of Article 24 of the Constitution). For instance, it is permitted to enter a home without the consent of the resident by a court decision adopted in order to ensure the values protected and defended by the Constitution or under the procedure established by means of a law where this is necessary to guarantee public order, apprehend a criminal, or save the life, health, or property of a human being. The aforementioned constitutional provisions imply the duty of the legislature to establish, by means of a law, the procedure for entering a home without the consent of the resident. When setting this procedure, the legislature must also regulate the manner how the respective court decision should be executed, as well as how a home is entered without the consent of the resident in cases where this is necessary to guarantee public order, apprehend a criminal, save the life, health, or property of a human being. When establishing such a legal regulation, the legislature must pay regard to the norms and principles of the Constitution.

2.2.7. The freedom to express convictions and freedom of information

2.2.7.1. The protection of the freedom to express convictions and freedom of information

The right to have convictions and to freely express them

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 13 June 2000

Democratic states under the rule of law recognise that, as regards its content, freedom of thought, conscience, and religion is a more specific expression of the broader human freedom to have convictions and freely express them. "Convictions" is a broad and diverse constitutional notion, embracing political and economic convictions, religious feelings, cultural disposition, ethical and aesthetical views, etc.

The freedom to have convictions means that an individual is free to form his/her own convictions and to choose world-view values, that he/she is protected from any coercion, and that it is not permitted to exert control over his/her convictions. The duty of state institutions is to ensure and protect this freedom of individuals. The content of convictions is the private matter of an individual.

The right to the free expression of convictions is inseparable from the freedom to have them. Freedom of the expression of convictions entails the possibility of expressing one's thoughts, views, and convictions orally, in writing, in symbols, or in other ways and by other means of the dissemination of information in an unhampered manner. At the same time, freedom of the expression of convictions includes the freedom not to disclose one's convictions and not to be compelled to disclose them.

Freedom of convictions and their expression consolidates ideological, cultural, and political pluralism. No views or ideology may be declared mandatory and thrust on an individual, i.e. a person who freely forms and expresses his/her own views and who is a member of an open, democratic, and civil society. This is an innate human freedom. The state must be neutral in matters of convictions; it does not have any right to establish a mandatory system of views.

The freedom to have convictions may not be limited at all; the freedom to express convictions may be limited under the procedure provided for by means of a law and only in cases where this is necessary to protect the values specified in Paragraph 3 of Article 25 of the Constitution, i.e. human health, honour or dignity, private life, or morals, or to defend the constitutional order. Freedom of the expression of convictions may also be temporarily limited upon the imposition of martial law or the declaration of a state of emergency (Article 145 of the Constitution). The validity of limitations on a right or freedom of a person in a democratic society should be assessed on the basis of the criteria of common sense and those of evident necessity; it must be in compliance with the concept and requirements of justice, as well as with the constitutionally consolidated possibilities and conditions for the limitation of the respective right or freedom (ruling of 13 February 1997). Any limitation on fundamental rights and freedoms should be connected with the rational relationship between competing values where such a relationship guarantees that the essence of the respective human right would not be violated by means of limitations.

The freedom to seek, receive, and impart information (Article 25 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 23 October 2002

Article 25 of the Constitution prescribes:

“Everyone shall have the right to have his own convictions and freely express them.

No one must be hindered from seeking, receiving, or imparting information and ideas.

The freedom to express convictions, as well as to receive and impart information, may not be limited otherwise than by law when this is necessary to protect human health, honour or dignity, private life, or morals, or to defend the constitutional order.

The freedom to express convictions and to impart information shall be incompatible with criminal actions – incitement to national, racial, religious, or social hatred, incitement to violence or to discrimination, as well as defamation and disinformation.

Citizens shall have the right to receive, according to the procedure established by law, any information held about them by state institutions.”

The constitutional freedom to seek, receive, and impart information and ideas unhindered is one of the foundations of an open, just, and harmonious civil society and a state under the rule of law. This freedom is an important precondition for implementing various rights and freedoms of a person, which are consolidated in the Constitution, since a person can implement most of his/her constitutional rights and freedoms in a fully fledged manner only if he/she has the right to seek, receive, or impart information unhindered. The Constitution guarantees and protects the interest of the public to be informed.

The provisions of Article 25 of the Constitution are inseparable from other provisions of the Constitution that consolidate the guarantees of the freedom of a person to seek, receive, and impart information unhindered: the provision of Paragraph 1 of Article 44, whereby censorship of mass information is prohibited; the provision of Paragraph 2 of the same article, under which the state, political parties, political or public organisations, or other institutions or persons may not monopolise the mass media; the provisions of Paragraph 2 of Article 33, which state that citizens are guaranteed the right to criticise the work of state institutions or their officials and to appeal against their decisions, and that persecution for criticism is prohibited, etc.

The freedom to seek, receive, and impart information is not absolute. The Constitution not only consolidates the freedom of an individual to seek, receive, and impart information, but also defines the limits of this freedom. For instance, under Paragraph 4 of Article 25 of the Constitution, the freedom to express convictions and to impart information is incompatible with criminal actions – incitement to national, racial, religious, or social hatred, incitement to violence or to discrimination, as well as defamation and disinformation; under Paragraph 3 of the same article, the freedom to express convictions, as well as to receive and impart information, may not be limited otherwise than by law when this is necessary to protect human health, honour or dignity, private life, or morals, or to defend the constitutional order; Article 28 of the Constitution provides that, while implementing his/her rights and exercising his/her freedoms, everyone must observe the Constitution and laws of the Republic of Lithuania and must not restrict the rights and freedoms of other people.

The values consolidated in the Constitution constitute a harmonious system; there is a balance among them. Under the Constitution, it is not permitted to establish any such a legal regulation that, by consolidating the guarantees of implementing freedom of information, would create the preconditions for violating other constitutional values and the balance among constitutional values. ...

A balance between the inviolability of private life and freedom of information (Articles 22 and 25 of the Constitution); compensation for damage inflicted as a result of imparting information about private life (Paragraph 2 of Article 30 of the Constitution)

See 2.2.4. The inviolability of private life, the ruling of 23 October 2002.

Imparting information about the private life of public persons

See 2.2.4. The inviolability of private life, the ruling of 23 October 2002.

The freedom to express convictions and freedom of information and the conditions for limiting these freedoms (Article 25 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 19 September 2005

The provisions of Article 25 of the Constitution constitute the constitutional foundation for freedom of information. They are all interrelated and supplement each other. Constitutional freedom of information is inseparable from constitutional freedom of convictions and their expression and is a condition of the latter.

Interpreting the content of freedom of information, which is consolidated in the Constitution, as innate freedom of an individual, the Constitutional Court has held that this freedom is an important precondition for implementing various rights and freedoms of a person, which are provided for in the Constitution, since a person can implement most of his/her constitutional rights and freedoms in a fully fledged manner only if he/she has the right to seek, receive, and impart information unhindered. The Constitution guarantees and protects the interest of the public to be informed (rulings of 23 October 2002, 26 January 2004, and 8 July 2005).

Under the Constitution, it is not permitted to establish any such a legal regulation that, by consolidating the guarantees of implementing freedom of information, would create the preconditions for violating other constitutional values and their balance. The freedom to seek, receive, and impart information is not absolute (rulings of 20 April 1995, 19 December 1996, 23 October 2002, and 26 January 2004).

The provision of Paragraph 4 of Article 25 of the Constitution, whereby the freedom to express convictions and to impart information is incompatible with criminal actions – incitement to national, racial, religious, or social hatred, incitement to violence or to discrimination, as well as defamation and disinformation, means that the prohibition on imparting information of the said content is absolute. Thus, the constitutional concept of freedom of information does not encompass the alleged freedom (which denies the constitutional values in substance) to perpetrate the criminal actions specified in Paragraph 4 of Article 25 of the Constitution, i.e. to impart such thoughts, views, etc. by which national, racial, religious, or social hatred, as well as violence or discrimination, is incited, persons are defamed, or society and its individual members are disinformed otherwise (ruling of 8 July 2005). Moreover, the concept of constitutional freedom of information does not encompass war propaganda, which is prohibited by Paragraph 2 of Article 135 of the Constitution.

The provision of Paragraph 4 of Article 25 of the Constitution, according to which the freedom to express convictions and to impart information is incompatible with criminal actions – incitement to national, racial, religious, or social hatred, incitement to violence or to discrimination, as well as defamation and disinformation, also means that the legislature must, by means of a law, establish such a legal regulation whereby incitement to national, racial, religious, or social hatred, incitement to violence or to discrimination, as well as defamation and disinformation, if such incitement, defamation, or disinformation attempt to deny the respective constitutional values in substance, would be prosecuted as criminal actions and legal responsibility would be established for such incitement, defamation, or disinformation as criminal actions.

At the same time, it needs to be noted that the said provisions of Paragraph 4 of Article 25 of the Constitution, inter alia, the expression “criminal actions”, may not be interpreted only linguistically, i.e. as meaning that the constitutional freedom to express convictions and impart information is incompatible with only such actions for which laws establish criminal responsibility. The said constitutional freedom is also incompatible with imparting such thoughts, views, etc. that incite national, racial, religious, or social hatred, violence or discrimination, or by which persons are defamed and society or its individual members are disinformed otherwise for which laws establish not only criminal, but also other responsibility. Thus, under the Constitution, the constitutional freedom to express convictions and impart information is incompatible with any actions that are contrary to law and by which national, racial, religious, or social hatred, as well as violence or discrimination, are incited and by which persons are defamed and society or its individual members are disinformed otherwise. If the said provision of Paragraph 4 of Article 25 of the Constitution, inter alia, its expression “criminal actions”, were interpreted differently (i.e. in a narrowing manner), the constitutional imperative of an open, just, harmonious civil society, the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law, and other provisions of the Constitution would be disregarded.

Under Paragraph 3 of Article 25 of the Constitution, the freedom to express convictions, as well as to receive and impart information, may not be limited otherwise than by law when this is necessary to protect the constitutional values specified in this paragraph – human health, honour or dignity, private life, morals, or the constitutional order. It should be emphasised that the list of the constitutional values enumerated in Paragraph 3 of Article 25 of the Constitution may not be interpreted as an exhaustive and final one, i.e. as giving no permission to limit the freedom to receive and impart information when this is necessary to protect other constitutional values, which are not mentioned expressis verbis in Paragraph 3 of Article 25 of the Constitution.

It also needs to be noted that freedom of information, which is consolidated in Article 25 of the Constitution, may be temporarily limited after martial law is imposed or a state of emergency is declared (Article 145 of the Constitution).

... under the Constitution, it is permitted to limit human rights and freedoms, including the right to express convictions and to receive and impart information and ideas, if the following conditions are observed: the limitations are established by means of a law; the limitations are necessary in a democratic society in order to protect the rights and freedoms of other persons, the values consolidated in the Constitution, and the constitutionally important objectives; the limitations do not deny the nature and essence of rights and freedoms; and the constitutional principle of proportionality is followed.

... under the Constitution, the legislature, has the duty to establish such a legal regulation that would ensure that public power (its institutions, officials) will be able to promptly take the measures preventing such acts by which, under the disguise of freedom of information, the values consolidated, protected, and defended by the Constitution are infringed upon.

The provisions of Paragraphs 3 and 4 of Article 25 of the Constitution must also be interpreted in the context of the provision of Paragraph 1 of Article 30 of the Constitution, whereby a person whose constitutional rights or freedoms are violated has the right to apply to a court. The right of a person to apply to a court due to a fact that, in his/her opinion, his/her freedom of information is limited, means that a person has the right to challenge any decision of public power (its institution or official) in a court in cases where, in his/her opinion, the said decision limits his/her right to seek, receive, or impart information. Under the Constitution, the legislature has the duty to establish, by means of a law, a legal regulation that would ensure the effective judicial protection of this right.

It also needs to be noted that the constitutional right of a person to apply to a court due to the fact that, in his/her opinion, his/her freedom of information is limited also implies his/her right to raise the issue of the constitutionality of those limitations and/or prohibitions on freedom of information that are laid down in the legal acts applicable in the respective case.

As mentioned before, constitutional freedom of information is an innate freedom of an individual. In its rulings, the Constitutional Court has held on more than one occasion that everything that is linked with human rights and freedoms must be regulated by means of laws; such laws must be in compliance with the Constitution. Therefore, a legal regulation defining the limits on the implementation of freedom of information must be established by means of a law.

Under Paragraph 3 of Article 25 of the Constitution, the legislature must define, by means of a law, the content of information the imparting of which is prohibited or limited, the manner by means of which the imparting of certain information is prohibited, as well as other conditions of imparting particular information, if this in any manner limits freedom of information. The legislature also must, by means of a law, establish: responsibility for non-compliance with the said prohibitions and limitations, including that for imparting such information the imparting of which is prohibited; the subjects that have the powers to supervise compliance with the prohibitions and/or limitations, established by means of laws, on imparting certain information; the subjects that apply responsibility for non-compliance with the prohibitions and/or limitations, established by means of laws, on imparting certain information; effective measures for the judicial protection of freedom of information.

It is worth noting that the Constitution also does not preclude the regulation of certain relationships by means of substatory legal acts, inter alia, government resolutions, where such relationships are linked with receiving and imparting information, including the relationships linked with the supervision of and control over compliance with the prohibitions, established by means of laws, on imparting information and/or limitations on imparting information. ... the Government, while regulating the aforesaid relationships by means of its resolutions, may not establish any such a legal regulation that would not be based on the Constitution and laws, or any such a legal regulation that would compete with a legal regulation established by means of laws.

[...]

... under the Constitution, all persons have the duty not to impart any such information the imparting of which is prohibited by means of laws, as well as the duty not to violate the procedure for imparting restricted information. Persons who become aware of the fact that they, in any manner, participate in imparting information the imparting of which is prohibited under laws or that they otherwise contribute to imparting such information, or that they, in any manner, violate the procedure for imparting information the imparting of which is limited by means of a law must immediately discontinue such activity.

[...]

Thus, the imparting of information not to be disclosed to the public and a violation of the procedure for imparting restricted information are violations of law, which are not tolerated by the Constitution.

[...]

Under the Constitution, the legislature has the duty to regulate, by means of a law, the relationships linked with seeking, receiving, and imparting information in such a way that, on the one hand, would ensure one of innate human rights – freedom of information (implying, inter alia, freedom of the electronic media) and, on the other hand, would not violate, but protect and defend, constitutional values in the course of implementing freedom of information.

Electronic communications and telecommunications are undergoing fast development. The possibilities of seeking, receiving, and imparting information by making use of electronic information technologies, inter alia, the internet, are constantly expanding. It needs to be noted that, at the same time, the social relationships linked with imparting information on the internet are becoming more complex. Therefore, it is necessary that legislation do not fall behind the progress of information technologies and changes, determined by this progress, in particular social relationships, inter alia, that legislation reflect the particularities of the subjects of the said relationships where the said particularities objectively determine the necessity to differentiate the legal status of those subjects.

Limiting freedom of information (inter alia, advertising) in order to protect human health (Paragraph 3 of Article 25 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 29 September 2005

... under Paragraph 3 of Article 25 of the Constitution, freedom of information may be limited by law if this is necessary to protect human health. Thus, freedom of advertising may also be limited on the said grounds.

[...]

In order to protect human health – a constitutional value, freedom of information (which ... inter alia, encompasses freedom of advertising) may also be limited to a certain extent by means of a law. However, such limitation of this constitutional freedom must be necessary in a democratic society and the chosen measures must be proportionate to the objective sought.

It needs to be emphasised that the legislature, when limiting, by means of a law, freedom of advertising (at the same time, freedom of information) in order to protect human health, must establish such a legal regulation that would maintain a reasonable balance between the obligation to the state, established in the Constitution, to take care of human health and the constitutional right of an individual to seek, receive, and impart information. Information, also that of advertising content, may not be limited due to the sole fact that, in the opinion of the legislature, it is not useful to the people, although it is not harmful to them at the same time. It should also be noted that selective limitations on advertising, i.e. limitations on imparting and/or receiving advertising by means of certain sources and the non-limitation of imparting and/or receiving advertising by means of other sources is allowed only when such differentiation is objectively justifiable. It should especially be noted that limitations on freedom of advertising established by means of laws may not, under the Constitution, be greater than it is necessary, inter alia, in order to protect human health.

Control over imparting information on medicines (inter alia, the advertising of medicines) where such information may create the preconditions for harming human health

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 29 September 2005

... by advertising medicines (irrespective of whether or not this activity is charged), an attempt is made to induce the usage of certain medicines, while this can create the preconditions for harming human health – a value that is consolidated, protected, and defended by the Constitution. Such effects can also be caused by misleading information (of both advertising and non-advertising content) about medicines, which, in some cases, can amount to disinformation, whose dissemination ... is not covered by the constitutional concept of freedom of advertising.

Under the Constitution, the legislature has the duty to establish, by means of a law, such a legal regulation that would prevent imparting information (of both advertising and non-advertising content) about medicines in cases where such information can create the preconditions for harming human health. Under the Constitution, the legislature also has the duty to establish, by means of a law, such a legal regulation that would prevent imparting misleading information (of both advertising and non-advertising content) about medicines and other information about medicines where such information can create the preconditions for harming human health. By establishing, by means of a law, the said constitutionally necessary legal regulation, the legislature must also establish an effective manner of control over advertising medicines and over other information about medicines where such information can create the preconditions for harming human health. In this context, attention should be paid to the fact that, in foreign democratic states, various ways of effective control over information about medicines (inter alia, the advertising of medicines) where imparting such information can create the preconditions for harming human health are established as, for example: the preliminary verification of information imparted by the mass media, limitations on imparting such information, the powers of state institutions to take action to discontinue imparting such information (inter alia, misleading advertising), etc.

... the Constitution also does not prevent the regulation of certain relationships by means of statutory legal acts where the said relationships are linked with receiving and imparting information, including the relationships linked with supervision and control over compliance with prohibitions, established by means of laws, on imparting information and/or limitations on imparting information; however, statutory legal acts may not establish any such a legal regulation that would not be based on the Constitution and laws, or any such a legal regulation that would compete with a legal regulation established by means of a law.

... a law must establish the main elements of limitations on advertising medicines and on other information about medicines where imparting such information can create the preconditions for harming human health as, for instance: what information about medicines (inter alia, advertising medicines) is subject to limitation or subject to prohibition altogether; the manner of the limitation of the said information (advertising) and/or the conditions of imparting it; the scope (extent) of prohibitions; the criteria according to which medicines are categorised as such whose advertising can create the preconditions for harming human health and, due to this, is subject to limitation or subject to prohibition altogether; the subjects who have the powers to supervise how the prohibitions and/or limitations to impart particular information, which are established in laws, are observed; responsibility for non-compliance with the aforesaid requirements, which are established by means of laws; the subjects that have the powers to hold someone liable for the respective violations of laws; the effective measures of the judicial protection of freedom of advertising, etc.

[...]

Under the Constitution, the state must regulate economic activity in order to ensure the implementation of the state function to take care of the health of people. Therefore, the state, while regulating economic activity by means of laws and paying regard to the Constitution, may establish specific limitations on the economic activity that is, inter alia, related to the protection of human health, including advertising medicines and other information about medicines the imparting of which can create the preconditions for inflicting harm on human health.

In this context, it should also be mentioned that, as held by the Constitutional Court in its ruling of 13 February 1997, the limitation of advertising is one of the ways to reduce the unrestricted promotion and consumption of substances that are harmful to human health.

... the legislature must legislatively establish such a legal regulation that would preclude any preconditions for inducing the uncontrolled use of medicines, which might harm human health.

... the legislature has broad discretion to choose how, while taking account of the fact that certain medicines can harm human health and imparting information about them can create the preconditions for harming human health, to differentiate the legal regulation governing the acquisition, circulation, and use of medicines and the imparting of information about medicines (including the advertising of medicines). One of the grounds (which is widespread all over the world) for such differentiation laid down by the legal regulation is grouping medicines into prescriptive and non-prescriptive, whereby certain medicines, i.e. prescriptive ones, due to the fact that their unrestricted acquisition, circulation, and use can create the preconditions for inflicting harm on human health, may be acquired, be in circulation, and be used only upon medical prescription, while the acquisition, circulation, and use of other, non-prescriptive, medicines are not restricted. The categorisation of certain medicines (their groups) as prescriptive or non-prescriptive ones and the prescription of medicines to patients is a matter within the professional competence of specialists in the respective area.

... the said grouping of medicines into prescriptive and non-prescriptive ones may be (and actually is) one of the grounds for differentiating, by means of a law, the legal regulation of the relationships linked with the imparting of information about medicines (inter alia, the advertising of medicines).

The interest of the public to be informed (for more, see 2.2.7.2. Freedom of the media)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 21 December 2006

The interest of the public to be informed, which is guaranteed and protected by the Constitution, implies the respective constitutional obligations for the state. On the one hand, the state (its institutions and officials) has not only the duty of negative content not to hinder the free flow of information and ideas, but also the duty of positive content to take all necessary measures so that other persons would not hinder the said flow. In this context, it should be emphasised that Article 44 of the Constitution provides that censorship of mass information is prohibited (Paragraph 1) and that the state, political parties, political or public organisations, or other institutions or persons may not monopolise the mass media (Paragraph 2).

The mission of the state as the political organisation of all society is to ensure human rights and freedoms and to guarantee the public interest (rulings of 30 December 2003, 13 December 2004, 29 December 2004, 16 January 2006, and 21 September 2006). The implementation of a public interest, as an interest of society that is recognised by the state and is protected by law, is one of the most important conditions for the existence and evolution of society itself (rulings of 6 May 1997, 13 May 2005, and 21 September 2006). The same applies to the interest of the public to be informed. The free and universal exchange of information and imparting it in an unrestricted manner are a particularly important factor in democratic processes. This factor ensures not only the formation of individual opinions and subjective convictions, but also the formation of group views, including political will, as well as the formation of the will of the whole Nation (ruling of 13 February 1997). It needs to be emphasised that the state, as the common good of all society (rulings of 25 May 2004, 19 August 2006, and 21 September 2006), is under the constitutional obligation not only not to hinder the free flow of information and ideas and to take all necessary measures so that other persons would not hinder the said flow, but also to take measures (positive activity) itself (through its institutions) in order to inform the public about the most important processes taking place in society and the state so that citizens (and other residents) would receive as accurate information as possible about things they should know, citizens could participate in the adoption of decisions of state importance, and people could participate in the adoption of other decisions related to handling public affairs, as well as decisions related to the implementation of their rights and freedoms. Otherwise, the preconditions would be created not only for violating the rights of a person (including the right of citizens, consolidated in Paragraph 1 of Article 33 of the Constitution, to participate in the governance of their state both directly and through their democratically elected representatives and the right of citizens, consolidated in Paragraph 2 of the same article, to criticise the work of state institutions or their officials and to appeal against their decisions), but also for violating other values, which are consolidated, defended, and protected by the Constitution.

The interest of the public to be informed, which is guaranteed and protected by the Constitution, as well as constitutional freedom of information, can be ensured only when various mass media function freely (this does not mean that there are no restrictions at all) in the state. A mature and developed system of the mass media is a necessary condition for ensuring the public interest, i.e. the interest of the public, to be informed. The Constitution gives rise to freedom of the mass media and the duty of the legislature to establish the guarantees of freedom of the mass media by means of a law (rulings of 23 October 2002, 4 March 2003, and 8 July 2005).

Limiting freedom of information

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 15 May 2007

In its acts, the Constitutional Court has held more than once that freedom of information is not absolute and that the Constitution does not permit the establishment of any such a legal regulation that, by consolidating the guarantees of implementing freedom of information, would create the preconditions for violating other constitutional values and their balance. It needs to be noted that, under the Constitution, the state has the duty not only to guarantee the secrecy of information that constitutes a state secret, but also the protection of certain other information, i.e. in order that there would not be any arbitrary attempts to find out or impart information the disclosure of which could inflict damage on the rights, freedoms, and legitimate interests of a person, as well as on other values consolidated, defended, and protected by the Constitution; for instance, in addition to a “state secret”, Paragraph 1 of Article 117 of the Constitution indicates a “professional secret”, a “commercial secret”, as well as “the secrecy of private or family life”; Article 22 of the Constitution consolidates, inter alia, the inviolability of personal correspondence, telephone conversations, telegraph messages, and other communications, as well as the prohibition on collecting information concerning the private life of a person otherwise than upon a reasonable court decision and only according to the law; various articles (parts thereof) of the Constitution consolidate the principle of the secrecy of voting during elections; it needs to be noted that not all information that must be protected in such a manner is explicitly mentioned in the text of the Constitution. The Constitutional Court has held that the legislature must define, by means of a law, the content of information the imparting of which is prohibited or limited, a manner by means of which the imparting of certain information is prohibited, as well as other conditions for imparting particular information if this limits freedom of information in any manner; the legislature also must, by means of a law, establish the following: responsibility for disregard of the said prohibitions and limitations, including responsibility for imparting such information the imparting of which is prohibited; the subjects that have the powers to supervise compliance with the prohibitions and/or limitations, established by means of laws, on imparting certain information; the subjects that apply responsibility for disregard of the prohibitions and/or limitations, established by means of laws, on imparting certain information; effective measures for the judicial protection of freedom of information ... (ruling of 19 September 2005).

The protection of state secrets (other classified information)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 15 May 2007

The state secret is a constitutional institution. The notion "state secret" is expressis verbis employed in the Constitution (Paragraph 1 of Article 117). A state secret is such information not to be made public or imparted the disclosure of which could inflict damage on the state as the common good of all society and as the political organisation of all society, whose purpose is ensuring human rights and freedoms and guaranteeing the public interest.

[...]

Certain requirements are established with regard to persons who are granted the right of access to information that constitutes a state secret; these requirements are related to the reliability and loyalty of such persons to the State of Lithuania; the said requirements should be linked with the trust of the state in that person; the distrust by the state of a certain person can be determined by the activity of that person, inter alia, by the committed violations of law, as well as by the personal qualities of that person, his/her personal contacts, as well as other important circumstances; permission to have access to state secrets may be granted only to such persons whose activity, personal qualities, contacts, etc. cannot give rise to concerns that, if they learn a state secret, a threat will be posed to, or all the more that damage will be inflicted on, the sovereignty of the state, its territorial integrity, constitutional order, and defence power, other especially important state interests, and the foundations of the life of society and the state, and that there will be violations of the most important relationships regulated, defended, and protected by the Constitution, which need to be protected and defended specifically because of the fact that certain information, according to laws, is classified; persons who have lost the trust of the state in them must be deprived of the right to access or handle information that constitutes a state secret.

The disclosure of a state secret may pose a threat to or even inflict damage on the sovereignty of the state, its territorial integrity, constitutional order and defence power, other especially important state interests, and the foundations of the life of society and the state; if the disclosure (finding out, imparting) of information that constitutes a state secret were not prevented and if such disclosure were not legally prosecuted, the preconditions would be created for violating even the most important relationships regulated, defended, and protected by the Constitution and, thus, also for giving priority to the interest of a certain person or persons to know and impart certain information at the expense of the public interest.

[...]

Where laws regulate the relationships linked with state secrets (or other classified information) and their protection, it is necessary to establish not only what information is regarded as a state secret (or what information constitutes classified information) and responsibility for its disclosure, but also what persons and under what procedure and conditions can dispose of (or can be deprived of the right to dispose of) state secrets (or other classified information), as well as in what cases and under what procedure and conditions information that constitutes a state secret (or other classified information) may be declassified and who is empowered to do so. Such persons, procedure, and conditions may be differentiated, inter alia, according to the types (categories) of state secrets (or other classified information), which are established by the legislature.

When revealing the content of the constitutional institution of the state secret, it should also be noted that the constitutional obligation to protect state secrets (or other classified information) also arises from the international treaties that are ratified by the Seimas The international treaties ratified by the Seimas, as well as membership of the Republic of Lithuania in international organisations, imply that the Republic of Lithuania (its institutions and officials) may also dispose of secrets that belong to other states or international organisations. There is no doubt that the constitutional obligation to protect state secrets (or other classified information) also includes the obligation to protect secrets that belong to other states or international organisations in cases where such secrets are disposed of by the Republic of Lithuania (its institutions and officials). ...

All this is mutatis mutandis applicable to secrets that belong to other states or international organisations in cases where such secrets can be disposed of by the Republic of Lithuania (its institutions, officials) under such international treaties of the Republic of Lithuania the ratification of which by the Seimas is not required under the Constitution and laws, or in cases where such secrets can be disposed of by the Republic of Lithuania (its institutions, officials) under international agreements concluded by state institutions.

[...]

... when state institutions decide whether a person has the right to handle or access information that constitutes a state secret (or other classified information), it is necessary to pay regard to the imperative that, in order that a person would have such a right, the state must have unconditional trust in him/her and that a person who has lost the trust of the state in him/her, must be deprived of the said right.

[...]

When choosing an institutional mechanism of ensuring the protection state secrets (or the protection of other classified information), the legislature has broad discretion. For instance, it is allowed, in the system of state security, to establish an institution that will have the powers to control how state secrets (or other classified information) are protected and to adopt the respective decisions that are binding on the subjects of secrets.

The protection of state secrets (other classified information) in court proceedings; the right of a judge to have access to a state secret or other classified information (Articles 109 and 117 of the Constitution)

See 9.1. Courts, 9.1.6. Court proceedings and court decisions, the ruling of 15 May 2007.

The publication of legal acts that contain information constituting a state secret or other classified information

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 27 June 2007

Such legal acts may be adopted that contain information constituting a state secret or other classified information. The Constitutional Court has held that, under the Constitution, the state has the duty to guarantee the secrecy of information that constitutes a state secret; the disclosure of a state secret may pose a threat to or even inflict damage on the sovereignty of the state, its territorial integrity, or on other especially important state interests or the foundations of the life of society and the state; when the relationships linked with state secrets (or other classified information) and their protection are regulated by means of laws, it must be established what persons and under what procedure and conditions can dispose of state secrets (or other classified information) (ruling of 15 May 2007). The legislature has the duty to establish such ways and procedure of the official publication of legal acts that contain information constituting a state secret or other classified information where the said ways and procedure would guarantee the protection of the secrecy of such information, without denying, at the same time, the imperatives of the publication of legal acts, which arise from the Constitution, inter alia, by ensuring the accessibility of legal acts to the respective legal subjects, whose rights and duties are enshrined in those legal acts. On the other hand, the Constitutional Court has held that the legal normative acts regulating the relationships linked with constitutional human rights and freedoms and with their implementation may not bear any classification markings at all (ruling of 5 April 2000).

The protection of state secrets (other classified information) (for more on assessing the reliability and loyalty to the State of Lithuania of persons who seek to hold or hold a position in state service where such a position is connected with the use or protection of classified information, see 4. The state and its institutions, 4.3. State service, the ruling of 7 July 2011)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 7 July 2011

... under the Constitution, persons seeking to hold or holding a position in state service where such a position is connected with the use or protection of classified information are subject to the special condition – the exceptional and completely unquestionable reliability of these persons and their loyalty to the State of Lithuania. The reliability of a person who seeks to hold or holds a position in state service that is connected with the use or protection of classified information, as well as the loyalty of that person to the State of Lithuania, must be assessed by taking account of all significant circumstances characterising that person, inter alia, his/her activity, committed violations of law, his/her professional and personal qualities, reputation, and ties with other persons. Therefore, the legislature has broad discretion when regulating the relationships connected with the protection of state secrets and official secrets, inter alia, when establishing the criteria for the reliability and loyalty to the State of Lithuania of persons who seek to hold or hold a position in state service where such a position is connected with the use or protection of classified information, as well as the procedures for screening such persons. In the course of implementing the said discretion, the legislature must pay regard to the norms and principles of the Constitution, inter alia, the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law.

[...]

... it is not permitted to establish any such a legal regulation that would allow the state institution authorised under the law to declare, on the basis of minor circumstances alone, the unreliability (or the disloyalty to the State of Lithuania) of a person seeking to hold or holding a position in state service where such a position is connected with the use or protection of classified information. However, this does not mean that the legislature may not provide for such measures of the protection of classified information that would make it possible in advance to prevent threats to the security of classified information and, at the same time, threats to state interests.

[...]

... the geopolitical orientation of the State of Lithuania means membership of the Republic of Lithuania in the EU and NATO and the necessity to fulfil the respective international obligations related to the said membership, inter alia, in the field of the protection of classified information. Therefore, when regulating the protection of state secrets, the Republic of Lithuania may not establish lower standards of the protection in question than those pertaining to the protection of classified information in the EU and NATO. By following the norms and principles of the Constitution, it is also possible to establish higher standards of the protection of state secrets of the Republic of Lithuania.

The interest of the public to be informed (Article 25 of the Constitution) (for more on the right of the electorate to receive significant information about candidates for the position of members of municipal councils, see 10. Local self-government and governance, 10.2. Local self-government, the ruling of 17 November 2011)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 17 November 2011

... one of the foundations of an open, just, and harmonious civil society and a state under the rule of law is the constitutional right to receive information, which is consolidated in Article 25 of the Constitution.

The Constitution guarantees and protects the interest of the public to be informed (inter alia, the rulings of 8 July 2005, 19 September 2005, 29 September 2005, and 21 December 2006). The constitutional right to receive information is an important precondition for implementing various rights and freedoms of a person, which are consolidated in the Constitution (ruling of 21 December 2006).

... the interest of the public to be informed assumes especial importance in the process of elections to political representative institutions, inter alia, elections to municipal councils. During the electoral process, real possibilities must be created for persons implementing the active electoral right, who decide on the eligibility of a candidate to be a member of the municipal council, to receive information about the major facts of the life of such a person, which may be of significance when representing the interests of voters and handling public affairs.

2.2.7.2. Freedom of the media

Freedom of the media (Article 25 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 23 October 2002

Article 25 of the Constitution and other provisions of the Constitution consolidating and guaranteeing the freedom of an individual to seek, receive and, impart information give rise to freedom of the media. Under the Constitution, the legislature has the duty to establish the guarantees of freedom of the media by means of a law.

The right of a journalist to preserve the secret of the source of information

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 23 October 2002

... by consolidating the right of a journalist to preserve the secret of the source of information and not to disclose the source of information as one of the guarantees of freedom of the media, the legislature must pay regard to the imperative of an open, just, and harmonious civil society and the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law, which are consolidated in the Constitution, and must not violate the rights and freedoms of a person. It is not permitted to establish, by means of laws, any such a legal regulation whereby, while consolidating the right of a journalist to preserve the secret of the source of information and not to disclose the source of information, the preconditions for violating the values consolidated in the Constitution would be created.

Thus, by establishing, [by means of a law], the right of a journalist to preserve the secret of the source of information and not to disclose the source of information, the legislature may not establish such a legal regulation that would create the preconditions for not disclosing the source of information even in cases where this is necessary in a democratic state to disclose the source of information due to vitally important or other especially significant interests of society, or in cases where this is necessary in order to ensure that the constitutional rights and freedoms of a person are protected and justice is administered, since the non-disclosure of the source of information could cause much graver effects than its disclosure. If the aforementioned legal regulation were established, the balance among the values protected by the Constitution, the constitutional imperative of an open and harmonious civil society, as well as the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law, would be violated.

It needs to be noted that, after the right of a journalist to preserve the secret of the source of information and not to disclose the source of information is consolidated, in cases where the question arises whether the source of information should be disclosed, it must be assessed in every particular case whether the non-disclosure of the source of information would violate the values protected under the Constitution. In a democratic state under the rule of law, the solving of such questions is within the competence of courts. The constitutional principle of judicial protection is universal (ruling of 2 July 2002).

Thus, the legislature, when establishing the right of a journalist to preserve the secret of the source of information and not to disclose the source of information, also has the duty to stipulate in a law that, in every particular case, it is only a court that can decide whether a journalist must disclose the source of information. When establishing such powers of a court, the legislature is bound by the concept of freedom of the media, under which it is permitted to demand that the source of information be disclosed only where this is necessary in order to ensure the vitally important or other especially significant interests of society and in order to ensure that the constitutional rights and freedoms of persons are protected and justice is administered, i.e. only where this is necessary in order to disclose the source of information due to a more important interest protected under the Constitution. Thus, it is not necessary to disclose the source of information if a court decides that the interest to disclose the source of information is not more important than the interest not to disclose the source of information. In cases where the source of information is disclosed, a court, while taking account of the circumstances of the case, may adopt a decision on limiting disclosed information that may be made known to the public. Thus, by establishing the powers of a court to decide whether or not the source of information must be disclosed, the legislature may not deny the duty of a court, which follows from the Constitution, in the course of deciding the issue of the disclosure of the source of information, to assess, in every particular case, whether it is required to disclose the source of information specifically for ensuring the vitally important or other especially significant interests of society, as well as with a view to ensuring that the constitutional rights and freedoms of a person are protected and justice is administered.

It also needs to be noted that the legislature, when establishing, by means of a law, the powers of a court to decide the issue of the disclosure of the source of information, has the duty to establish such a legal regulation whereby a court may decide whether a journalist must disclose the source of information only in cases where all other means of the disclosure of the source of information have been exhausted.

The raison d'être of a public broadcaster is to ensure the interest of the public to be informed

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 21 December 2006

The raison d'être of a public broadcaster is to ensure the public interest – the interest of the public to be informed, which is consolidated, protected, and defended by the Constitution. The concept of all radio and television broadcasters, including that of a public broadcaster, is closely related to the public interest, i.e. the interest of the public to be informed, as well as to freedom of information and the constitutional concept of fair competition.

The prohibition on monopolising the media; the constitutional principle of the variety of the sources of public information

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 21 December 2006

Information and ideas can be imparted by means of various mass media, inter alia, the press, the internet, radio, or television. From the standpoint of imparting information and ideas, the fact as to who has founded certain mass media or who their owner is, or who renders the respective public services, i.e. whether this is done by the state or private natural or legal persons, is of no essential importance. However, it needs to be noted that the Constitution does not tolerate any such a situation where the need of the public to be informed would be satisfied by using only one means of the mass media, since this would mean the monopolisation of the mass media, which is explicitly prohibited by the Constitution. ... under Paragraph 2 of Article 44 of the Constitution, the state, political parties, political or public organisations, or other institutions or persons may not monopolise the mass media. This constitutional provision (which should be interpreted in the context of the prohibition on monopolising the market, which is consolidated in Paragraph 4 of Article 46 of the Constitution) must be applied not only to the state (its institutions), but also to all other persons. Thus, the legislature is under the constitutional obligation to establish, by means of a law, a legal regulation that would prevent the monopolisation of the mass media so that no monopolisation tendencies would become prevalent in the mass media market and in the space of public information.

On the other hand, when establishing the said legal regulation, the legislature must seek to attain a balance among the values consolidated, defended, and protected by the Constitution and it may not violate, inter alia, the right of private ownership and freedom of individual economic activity and initiative, which are consolidated in Paragraph 1 of Article 46 of the Constitution. In this context, it needs to be held that the provisions of Article 25 of the Constitution, if interpreted together with the provisions of Paragraph 1 of Article 46 of the Constitution and other provisions of the Constitution, also express the constitutional principle of the variety of sources of public information. All this in itself implies that, if regard is paid to the Constitution, a large part of the mass media market will always be held by private persons and a great part of public information will comprise information imparted through the private mass media.

Regulating the relationships connected with the functioning of the audio-visual sector of the mass media and the electronic mass media

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 21 December 2006

... as the Constitutional Court has held, freedom of the mass media also implies freedom of the electronic mass media (ruling of 19 September 2005). When the relationships linked with the functioning of the audio-visual sector and with that of the electronic mass media (and with electronic communications in general) are regulated by means of legal acts, account should be taken, on the one hand, of an especially considerable impact on the public by such mass media, especially by radio and television, and, on the other hand, of the fact that the functioning of such mass media was and, to a certain extent, is linked with the use of limited resources, such as electronic communication channels (radio frequencies), which belong to the state by right of ownership. In this context, it needs to be emphasised that, as the Constitutional Court has held, higher requirements are placed on radio and television compared with other types of the mass media because of the especially great influence of radio and television on a broad audience, as well as because the technical possibilities of radio and television broadcasting are not unlimited (ruling of 20 April 1995).

From the standpoint of an open, just, and harmonious civil society, the striving for which is proclaimed in the Preamble to the Constitution, any tendencies towards the monopolisation of the audio-visual sector of the mass media, inter alia, radio and television, as well as of the electronic mass media, may not be tolerated. As the Constitutional Court held in its ruling of 20 April 1995, the prohibition consolidated in Paragraph 2 of Article 44 of the Constitution, "first and foremost, means the prohibition on the monopolisation of the production of radio and television programmes, as well as of the imparting of information". This prohibition ... should also be applied to the state (its institutions) and all other persons.

Consequently, under the Constitution, the broadcasting of radio and television programmes cannot be left to the state only, nor can it be entrusted to one legal or natural person or few persons, who would be able to monopolise the audio-visual sector or part thereof. The Constitution implies that various broadcasters must operate in the radio and television broadcasting services market.

It also needs to be noted that, if only the broadcaster founded by the state or only a private broadcaster became overly prevalent in the audio-visual sector, this would create the preconditions for violating the values consolidated in Article 25 of the Constitution and for overstepping the limits of constitutional freedom of information, which is laid down in this article (Paragraph 4 thereof). Any overly distinctive dominance of a broadcaster founded by the state or such dominance of a private broadcaster in the audio-visual sector would also violate the principle of the variety of sources of public information, which arises from the Constitution. The legislature has the constitutional duty to establish such a legal regulation and such limitations that the said tendencies (towards monopolisation or towards overly distinctive dominance) would not become prevalent. In doing so, the legislature has broad discretion to choose various means of limitation as, for instance, the prohibition precluding a certain natural or legal person, who is acting alone or together with others, from owning a certain part of the capital, territory, or audience of a media outlet, a limitation on the number of licences granting the right to broadcast radio or television programmes, a limitation on the size of the market of electronic communication channels (radio frequencies) (which is applied to a person individually or together with other persons, as well as to other media outlets), etc.

Making use of freedom of information and its implementation by means of the mass media should be related to special obligations and responsibility. The specific nature of radio and television as a means of the mass media increases this responsibility even more. As mentioned before, higher requirements are placed on radio and television compared with other types of the mass media.

The duty of the state to impart to the public through the mass media the information related to fostering constitutional values and implementing constitutional principles; the possibilities of the state to entrust private broadcasters with the task of imparting such information (providing public broadcasting services)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 21 December 2006

The information that the state (its institutions) is constitutionally obligated to impart to citizens through the mass media, inter alia, through radio and television, is linked with fostering various values consolidated, protected, and defended by the Constitution and with implementing various principles of the Constitution. Imparting such information is aimed to attain socially and constitutionally important objectives, i.e. to ensure the protection of national interests (inter alia, national security), to strengthen democracy, to promote civic consciousness, respect for law, the openness of society, and tolerance, to foster language and culture, etc. For instance, in its ruling of 8 July 2005, the Constitutional Court held that the state is constitutionally obligated to support and foster culture as a national value of universal importance – the material and spiritual creative activity and its results that should be passed on to future generations; according to the Constitution, the state must, by its positive decisions (inter alia, a legal regulation), encourage and support, by using state funds and other resources, the creation, dissemination, propagation, and preservation of material and spiritual cultural values; freedom of access to culturally valuable objects is consolidated in the Constitution; the said freedom is also related to the imperative of an open society, which is also consolidated in the Constitution: if this freedom is not ensured, the striving for an open society would also be harmed.

Imparting such information that is linked with fostering various values consolidated, defended, and protected by the Constitution and with implementing various principles of the Constitution to the public is a necessary condition for the proper fulfilment of various state functions.

It needs to be noted that the state may choose various ways of imparting the said information through radio and television, i.e. rendering the respective public services to the public by using various means. It can do so not only through a broadcaster founded by the state, but also through private radio and television broadcasters; it can entrust various radio and television broadcasters with broadcasting (in compliance with the respective requirements) certain public radio and television programmes. In this context, it should be mentioned that, as it has been held by the Constitutional Court, the state may carry out its functions to a certain extent through establishments other than state institutions, which are assigned (entrusted) according to laws with carrying out particular state functions or participate in fulfilling state functions in the particular forms and manner defined in laws (ruling of 13 December 2004). Thus, the state can also guarantee the interest of the public to be informed by entrusting (tendering) the dissemination of public programmes to those radio and television broadcasters that would ensure the implementation of the said interest of the public in the most effective manner.

Under the Constitution, the state may establish, by means of a law, also certain requirements for the programmes of radio and television broadcasters (including private ones), inter alia, that a certain part of their programmes must be composed of broadcasts corresponding to the content of public programmes; by establishing compensation criteria in advance, it can also encourage private broadcasters to broadcast public radio and television programmes, provided that such programmes meet the specified conditions.

At the same time, the state (its institutions) has (have) the duty to supervise whether the programmes and broadcasts transmitted by radio and television broadcasters (including private ones) violate the constitutional principle of the equality of the rights of persons, human dignity, as well as the rights, freedoms, and legitimate interests of persons. Besides, the state (institutions empowered by it) has (have) the duty to control the use of electronic communication channels (radio frequencies) assigned to radio and television broadcasters, as well as the lawfulness and transparency of financing all radio and television broadcasters (including the sources of financing), and to regulate the conditions of how broadcasters access the market, the concentration of the market within the country and concentration together with foreign investors, etc.

On the other hand, the state regulation of the activity of private radio and television broadcasters may not overstep certain limits established in the Constitution, inter alia, it is not permitted to violate the protection of private ownership, to constitutionally unreasonably restrict freedom of individual economic activity and initiative, or to introduce censorship.

Therefore, it needs to be noted that the possibilities of the state to entrust private broadcasters with imparting information that is linked with fostering various values consolidated, protected, and defended by the Constitution and with implementing various principles of the Constitution, as well as with rendering the respective public services to society, are limited ones, since private (commercial) broadcasters come into being not in order, on their own initiative, to contribute to the fulfilment of the respective state functions (rendering public broadcasting services), but because radio and television broadcasting, where it is carried out by private (commercial) broadcasters, is an economic activity aimed at gaining profit; meanwhile, the public information that the state is constitutionally obligated to impart (although such information is linked with fostering various values consolidated, protected, and defended by the Constitution and with implementing various principles of the Constitution) is often not such information the imparting of which would be profitable for the broadcaster – it is imparted in order to satisfy the public interest, but not in order to gain profit.

The possibilities of the state to entrust private broadcasters with imparting information linked with fostering various values consolidated, protected, and defended by the Constitution and with implementing various principles of the Constitution, as well as with rendering the respective public services to society, are also limited because of the fact that there are very limited possibilities of controlling the structure of programmes, let alone influencing their content, without violating the independence of private broadcasters.

A public radio and television broadcaster (its constitutional mission and functions, as well as constitutional requirements for the activity of a public broadcaster)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 21 December 2006

Experience in other states shows that, as a rule, states need to have at least one public radio and television broadcaster (which is, as a rule, founded by the state itself); a special subject – a public broadcaster that is established and operates on the grounds other than private (commercial) broadcasters – is volens nolens entrusted with broadcasting ... socially and constitutionally important information to the public.

The fact that the Constitution does not employ the notion “public broadcaster” does not mean that no requirements arise for a public broadcaster from the Constitution, which are determined by the particularities of a public broadcaster in comparison with other – private (commercial) – broadcasters. Quite to the contrary, the duty of the state (its institutions) to impart to the public through the mass media (inter alia, through radio and television) information that is related to fostering various values consolidated, protected, and defended by the Constitution and to implementing various principles of the Constitution, as well as the fact that the possibilities of the state to entrust private broadcasters with imparting such information and rendering the respective public services to society are limited, implies the constitutional necessity to found a public radio and television broadcaster and to regulate the relationships related to its activity in order that the said duty of the state would be properly fulfilled.

... the raison d'être of a public broadcaster is to ensure the public interest – the interest of the public to be informed, which is consolidated, protected, and defended by the Constitution. This implies a special mission of a public broadcaster.

The mission and functions of a public broadcaster stem from various norms and principles of the Constitution, as well as from the values consolidated in the Constitution. This implies that a national public broadcaster must be established and that it must provide the respective public services in order that these services would cover all society and help ensure national interests and that such services would be designated for the education of civil society and the fostering of culture. On the other hand, this does not deny the fact that, along with the national public broadcaster, there could be other public broadcasters that operate not at the state level (but, for example, at the regional level) and whose mission may have certain particularities determined by the specificity of the audience of their listeners and/or viewers.

It needs to be especially emphasised that a public broadcaster, while carrying out its constitutional mission, has important functions in contributing to the implementation of the sovereignty of the Nation and the principles of democracy, as well as in ensuring the security of society and the state, public order, the welfare of citizens, and their rights and freedoms. In addition, an important role falls on a public broadcaster where the state fulfils its constitutional obligation to support culture and science, to take care of the protection of Lithuanian historical, artistic, and cultural monuments, as well as other culturally valuable objects.

The activity of a public broadcaster must be organised in such a way that state institutions could have a real possibility of imparting certain information through that public broadcaster. For instance, a law must consolidate the duty of a public broadcaster to promptly announce official reports about emergency situations (natural or other disasters, etc.), as well as information about other important events in this country and those from abroad, inter alia, events that could (either directly or indirectly) cause negative effects to Lithuanian society and/or the state itself. A public broadcaster must also give air-time for urgent messages in other special cases, inter alia, when high state officials and the heads of institutions so request. The principle of democracy enshrined in the Constitution implies, inter alia, that a law must establish such a legal regulation whereby, at the time of election campaigns, a public broadcaster gives air-time to political parties and political organisations, also candidates for the Seimas, for the European Parliament, for the post of the President of the Republic, and for municipal councils, that participate in the respective election; the constitutional principles of justice and the equality of the rights of persons imply that the persons of the same categories should be given equal air-time, unless such allocation of equal air-time and the observance of the criterion of arithmetical proportionality would hinder the implementation of certain socially and constitutionally important objectives.

Besides, the constitutional freedom of associations and the constitutional provisions that the state recognises the churches and religious organisations that are traditional in Lithuania and that churches and religious organisations are free to proclaim their teaching imply that a law may (and, under certain circumstances, must), without violating the constitutional secularism and world-view neutrality of the State of Lithuania, as well as the separation of the state and the church, establish the duty for a public broadcaster to give some air-time to public organisations and the churches recognised by the state, thus ensuring the self-expression possibilities of the members of these organisations and communities and diminishing the threat that they would not be heard at all. At the same time, it needs to be noted that it is not permitted to abuse political, religious, or other expression by any persons in programmes and broadcasts of a public broadcaster; it is not permitted that such expression would violate the constitutional right of other people to have their own convictions and freely express them, since, under the Constitution, “no views or ideology may be declared mandatory and thrust on an individual, i.e. a person who freely forms and expresses his/her own views and is a member of an open, democratic, and civil society” (ruling of 13 June 2000).

In its ruling of 20 April 1995, the Constitutional Court held that “the publisher is responsible for imparted information; therefore, the requirements or instructions of the publisher or the editor concerning the content of information, as well as decisions in regard to the possibility of its imparting, etc., are not considered to be censorship”. This official constitutional doctrinal provision is applicable to all radio and television broadcasts, including those made by a public broadcaster. In addition, the official constitutional doctrinal provision that state institutions and officials have the duty to respect human dignity as a special value (ruling of 29 December 2004) and the constitutional imperatives regarding the inviolability of the right to private life and the protection of private life are also applicable to a public broadcaster. Therefore, a public broadcaster must refuse to broadcast programmes or broadcasts in which opponents or other persons are insulted or otherwise humiliated, in which any people are discriminated on the basis of their gender, race, nationality, language, origin, social status, belief, convictions, or views, or in which human dignity is otherwise violated and a public broadcaster must not permit persons who do so to participate in its programmes or broadcasts. The legislature has the duty to consolidate the right to react, which could be effectively used, while denying untrue information (facts), by individuals about whom disinformation was imparted (which could also violate their dignity) in the programmes or broadcasts of a public broadcaster (or other broadcasters).

It has been mentioned that an important role falls on a public broadcaster where the state fulfils its constitutional obligation to support culture and science and to take care of the protection of Lithuanian historical, artistic, and cultural monuments, as well as other culturally valuable objects. This implies that a public broadcaster must allocate proper air-time for programmes and broadcasts designated for culture, inter alia, science, art, other areas of spiritual life and creation, the material and spiritual heritage of society, as well as for programmes and broadcasts promoting Lithuanian culture beyond the boundaries of Lithuania. The programmes and broadcasts of a public broadcaster must reflect the variety of Lithuanian culture, without excluding the cultural life and cultural heritage of Lithuanians who reside abroad. In this context, it should be mentioned that, as held by the Constitutional Court, “the state support and development of culture as a constitutionally protected and defended value would be impossible if culture were not developed in regions, separate parts of the territory of the state, and separate self-governing territorial communities, which form part of the whole national community – the civil Nation” (ruling of 8 July 2005).

It should also be emphasised that a public broadcaster has an especially important role in fostering the culture of the language in public life, as well as in consolidating respect for the Lithuanian language – a constitutional value and in ensuring its survival, spread, and consistent development.

A public broadcaster may foster culture by choosing various genres of broadcasts: information, education, entertainment, also including broadcasts of light content. In this context, it needs to be noted that the Constitution also gives rise to no prohibition whatsoever precluding a public broadcaster from broadcasting entertainment broadcasts if they have cognitive, educational, or other cultural value, especially if such broadcasts can connect different social groups from the cultural standpoint. It is important that the broadcasts of a public broadcaster designated for culture, no matter to what genre they belong or to what audience they are intended, must always be quality broadcasts. No consumerist interest of any social group, inter alia, that denying the cultural identity of Lithuania, may have any impact on the broadcasts of a public broadcaster.

Summing up, it needs to be held that it is the very nature and mission of a public broadcaster that makes it different from private (commercial) radio and television broadcasters – the broadcasting of programmes and broadcasts by a public broadcaster must be the rendering of public services, i.e. the rendering of services to the public, since public services must satisfy the public interest; thus, such public services must be of a public nature. In this respect, a public broadcaster expresses the public interest. Consequently, a public broadcaster must always remain independent of any particular – private or group – interests (political, economic, or other interests).

In a pluralistic democracy (Lithuania, under the Constitution, is a pluralistic democracy), the activity of a public broadcaster must be based on objectiveness, impartiality, and justice and it may not depend on any party or other political preferences. The activity of a public broadcaster must bring society together, but not divide it. In programmes broadcast by this broadcaster, various views must be represented, universal human values verified by the civilisation and time must be propagated, the entire variety of life of society and the state, as well as the variety of cultures, must be reflected, and various topics and issues, inter alia, such that are designated for people with special needs, whose socialisation and integration into society is more difficult than that of other people (e.g. people with disabilities), must be discussed. An important part of the mission of a public broadcaster, which arises from the Constitution, is to ensure that the imparting of the information broadcast by it would help to increase social capital, to decrease social exclusion and to increase social solidarity, to strengthen constitutionally valuable social ties, civic consciousness, and an open, just, and harmonious civil society, to help society to perceive itself as the national community – the civil Nation, to increase the creative potential of society, to promote civilisation, ecological awareness, to foster the culture of society, the cultural affinity and cultural continuity of the Nation, as well as human self-expression, and to promote the rational solution of social and state issues.

It is due to this that a public broadcaster may and, in view of the fact that the state possibilities of entrusting the rendering of public broadcasting services to private broadcasters are limited, even must be assigned to render all or most of public radio and television services.

The independence of a public broadcaster

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 21 December 2006

The constitutional mission of a public broadcaster also implies that material, organisational, and financial conditions must be created in order that such a public broadcaster would successfully accomplish its mission, that a legal regulation established by means of a law would guarantee the independence of a public broadcaster from the interference of state institutions, officials, and other persons with the activity of the said broadcaster. This is a conditio sine qua non in order that a public broadcaster could carry out its mission.

In this context, it needs to be noted that, in itself, the fact that the state is the founder of a public broadcaster does not mean that the imperative of the independence of a public broadcaster is deviated from.

It needs to be emphasised that a law must establish such a model of the management of a public broadcaster that would ensure that the constitutional mission of the said broadcaster will not be deviated from and the independence of the said broadcaster will not be denied.

In itself, the fact that certain state institutions provided for in a law may participate in the formation of the highest institution of a public broadcaster, where the said highest institution has the powers to decide the most important issues of the activity of the public broadcaster as, for example, to plan the strategy of the activity of the public broadcaster, to establish requirements for programmes and broadcasts, etc. (this highest institution may be named in a varied manner: a council, a board, etc.), as well as in the formation of the institutions supervising the activity of the public broadcaster, cannot be considered a deviation from the above-mentioned imperative of independence. In itself, such participation of the state institutions that are provided for in a law in the formation of the said institutions of the national public broadcaster does not mean that the state interferes with the activity of the national public broadcaster.

However, it needs to be emphasised that a public broadcaster founded by the state may reasonably be regarded as a public broadcaster only when the institution that has the powers to decide the most important issues of the activity of the public broadcaster is composed not of state officials or state servants, but of persons who could reasonably be called representatives of all society, but not of some interest groups (also professional and institutionalised groups, inter alia, those linked with the mass media, with radio and television in particular, as well as groups uniting persons whose creative work or production could be promoted by the public broadcaster). They must express precisely the interests of all society. These persons must represent the widest possible social spectrum. The procedure for the election or appointment of the highest institution that has the powers to decide the most important issues of the activity of a public broadcaster must be public and transparent.

The activity of a public broadcaster may not be focused only on commercial success, because it has the duty to inform and educate society

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 21 December 2006

The transmission of programmes and broadcasts is a certain technical process. In this respect, it is absolutely of no importance whether programmes or broadcasts are broadcast by a public broadcaster or private (commercial) broadcasters – the nature of this technical process and of the activity related to it does not become different because of this. ... both when programmes or broadcasts are broadcast by a public broadcaster and when this is done by private (commercial) broadcasters, the features of broadcasting and of the activity related to it are, from the aspect at issue, virtually the same regardless of who is broadcasting and to whom the broadcast is meant, regardless of what is broadcast (informational, educational, sport, or entertainment broadcasts, films, concerts, trailers, ads, etc.), and regardless of whether particular programmes are broadcast upon someone's commission (inter alia, for commercial purposes) or on the initiative of the broadcaster itself in the absence of any ordering customer. In addition, the activity of some broadcasters always has impact on the activity of other broadcasters (especially, on the activity of the same nature and, indirectly, on the activity that is of a different character), as well as on economic and commercial activity. Thus, as participants in the audio-visual sector, all radio and television broadcasters, whatever they broadcast (i.e. it is not important whether or not the broadcasting services rendered by them are designated for satisfying the public interest and, consequently, it is not important whether or not such services are of a public character), inevitably compete for the audience of listeners and viewers. The same can be said about a public broadcaster, which, as regards this competition field, is not somewhere “apart”, since every consumer of television or radio services always, at any concrete moment, chooses one over another radio or television broadcaster (i.e. a broadcast or programme transmitted by it); thus, having chosen to listen to or to watch, for example, a programme or broadcast which is being broadcast by a public broadcaster, he/she also chooses not to watch or not to listen to the programmes or broadcasts that are being broadcast by private (commercial) broadcasters and vice versa. In this way, every consumer of television or radio services (listener or viewer) himself/herself defines his/her position in regard to radio and television broadcasters, which inevitably compete with other broadcasters for the audience of listeners and viewers.

However, it must be specially emphasised that a public broadcaster, in view of its special constitutional mission, is not established for the purpose of taking the market (or part thereof) and consolidating its market position; in this regard, it substantially differs from private (commercial) broadcasters. The mission of a public broadcaster is different – it is the mission of a non-participant in the market. A public broadcaster, as a provider of public services related to the interest of the public to be informed (this interest arises from the Constitution), is not designated for the market (although, in certain cases, specifically whenever it broadcasts advertising, it operates in the market); therefore, the purpose of a public broadcaster may not be a mere striving for a broader audience of listeners or viewers or the satisfaction of consumerist needs. Quite to the contrary, a public broadcaster, without representing any interest group, must render public radio and television services to all society and not only to its founder, i.e. the state. The programmes and broadcasts of a public broadcaster must be prepared and imparted not because of their economic profit, but because certain information is necessary for citizens (and other residents) so that citizens could participate in the adoption of decisions of state importance and people could participate in the adoption of other decisions related to the management of public affairs, as well as decisions related to the implementation of their rights and freedoms.

Thus, the activity of a public broadcaster may not be commercialised, its programmes and broadcasts should not be oriented to attracting the largest possible audience or to commercial success. A public broadcaster must not adapt to the situation in the audience or the market, it must not flatter consumerist tastes, but must inform and educate society, implant such civil and cultural attitudes in the public that are dictated to a public broadcaster by its constitutional mission. If this requirement were deviated from, not only the constitutional mission of a public broadcaster would be harmed, but also the raison d'être of a public broadcaster would be denied.

[...]

... a public broadcaster is not designated for the market (although, whenever it broadcasts advertising, it operates in the market) and ... the programmes and broadcasts of a public broadcaster must be prepared and imparted not because of their economic profit. However, this does not mean that it is permissible to arrange the activity of a public broadcaster in such a manner that its administration would not be interested in the “feedback”, i.e. what the rating of the programmes and broadcasts of the public broadcaster is and what response is evoked by the programmes and broadcasts of the public broadcaster within the audience of radio listeners and television viewers. Nor does this mean that the activity of a public broadcaster may not bring profit (where the radio and television market grants such possibilities provided that account is taken of the content and quality of concrete programmes and broadcasts) or that this activity may be unprofitable, let alone that, as a rule, the funds of all taxpayers are allocated in order to finance such activity.

A public broadcaster is subject to the highest requirements of mass media ethics

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 21 December 2006

... higher requirements are placed on radio and television compared with other types of the mass media ... the specific nature of radio and television as a means of mass media increases the responsibility of a broadcaster even more. This is especially apparent in the case of a public broadcaster. A public broadcaster (its programmes and broadcasts) must be subject to the highest requirements of mass media ethics. For example, imparting any disinformation (which, as mentioned before, is not covered by the constitutional concept of freedom of information) is absolutely prohibited in programmes and broadcasts of a public broadcaster (as well as in those of other broadcasters). In a state under the rule of law (i.e. in a state where human rights and freedoms are respected, protected, and defended), there may not be any such a legal regulation whereby a public broadcaster (as well as other broadcasters) would not be responsible if, due to its unlawful action or its failure to act, human dignity and the right to the inviolability of private life are infringed in its programmes or broadcasts or if, in its programmes or broadcasts, such thoughts, views, and other information are disseminated by which national, racial, or social hatred, as well as violence or discrimination, are incited, persons are defamed, or society and its individual members are disinformed otherwise, or if criminal actions are incited. Under the Constitution, a public broadcaster must ensure that freedom of information is not abused.

The duty of the state to create financial conditions for the activity of a public broadcaster; the possibilities of financing a public broadcaster from funds received for broadcast advertising; the possibilities and conditions of limiting or prohibiting advertising broadcast on the radio and television

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 21 December 2006

... material, organisational, and financial conditions must be created in order that a public broadcaster could successfully accomplish its mission. Thus, the nature and constitutional mission of a public broadcaster also imply not only the state obligation to found a public broadcaster, but also the duty to ensure the activity of the public broadcaster, inter alia, the duty to allocate proper financing to the public broadcaster so that it could carry out the said mission and render particular public broadcasting services. In this context, it needs to be mentioned that, as it was held by the Constitutional Court, the imperative of just society and social harmony, which is consolidated in the Constitution, implies that, when supporting culture (inter alia, creative activity), regard must be paid to the resources and the material and financial possibilities of the state and society, as well as other important factors, inter alia, expediency (ruling of 8 July 2005).

[...]

Under the Constitution, the legislature has broad discretion to choose the financing model of the national public broadcaster – the Lithuanian National Radio and Television [Lietuvos nacionalinis radijas ir televizija, hereinafter referred to as the LRT]. When doing so, the legislature must pay regard to the Constitution.

[...]

... state financial support for the national public broadcaster, which is allowed to broadcast advertising under the law, should not overstep the limits of reasonableness and fairness. In this area, regard must be paid to the relevant provisions of European (inter alia, EU) law.

It needs to be emphasised that the choice for a model of financing the national public broadcaster is a matter of social, political, and economic expediency, which is within the competence of the legislature. Under the Constitution, the legislature has the discretion to choose the model of financing the national public broadcaster by taking account of the resources and the material and financial possibilities of the state and society and by paying regard to other important factors, inter alia, expediency. When doing so, the legislature may not violate any norms and principles of the Constitution.

[...]

... upon founding the national public broadcaster, the Seimas, under the Constitution, has to establish such a legal regulation that would ensure that this broadcaster would have sufficient funds for carrying out its special constitutional mission. However, this does not mean that all such funds must necessarily be provided for in the state budget and allocated from it; other sources of financing the national public broadcaster may also be provided for.

[...]

Although ... a public broadcaster, as a provider of public services related to the interest of the public to be informed (this interest derives from the Constitution), is not designated for the market and ... the programmes and broadcasts of a public broadcaster must be prepared and imparted not because of their economic profit, however, the activity of a public broadcaster (especially that of the national public broadcaster) and competition with private (commercial) broadcasters for the audience of listeners and viewers have influence on the economic and commercial activity of these other broadcasters; whereas, when broadcasting advertising, a public broadcaster is a participant in particular (advertising) competitive relationships.

... the legislature, when implementing its discretion stemming from the Constitution to establish such a differentiated legal regulation governing the relationships linked with advertising that meets best the expediency reasons at a given time, must simultaneously ensure the public interest so that the activity of a public broadcaster would be efficient and its special constitutional mission would be carried out and may regulate the respective relationships by means of a law also in a manner that advertising is permitted in the programmes and broadcasts of the national public broadcaster or may establish limitations on advertising.

In its ruling of 8 July 2005, the Constitutional Court held that “the constitutional duty of the legislature to establish such a legal regulation under which funding for municipal functions would be guaranteed where account is taken of the resources and material and financial capacity of the state and society, as well as other important factors, does not deny the duty of municipalities (their institutions or officials) to adopt the respective decisions within the competence defined by the Constitution or laws so that the funds needed for performing their functions would be collected and these funds would be used in a proper manner” and that “the aforesaid constitutional duty of the legislature does not deny the responsibility of municipalities (their institutions or officials) for the proper performance of the functions transferred to them”.

The cited constitutional doctrinal provisions are mutatis mutandis applicable not only to self-government (municipal) institutions, but also to all institutions established by the state – establishments, enterprises, and organisations (their officials), unless the independent collection of funds, the receipt of support, etc. would be in conflict with the purpose of a particular institution and the nature of its activities, would hinder the proper performance of its functions, and would raise doubts as to decisions adopted by this institution (its officials) (with regard to independence, impartiality, transparency, the absence of a conflict of interests or in other respects).

... the LRT as the national public broadcaster is not such an institution founded by the state to which this reservation could be applied a priori.

It needs to be specially emphasised that the Constitution does not tolerate any such insufficient financing of the national public broadcaster (as well as any other public broadcaster) (i.e. which is not sufficient in order to carry out its constitutional mission) from the state budget (or decreasing such financing) when, by this, an attempt is made (or could be made) to violate its independence and, thus, to exert influence on the programmes and broadcasts that are broadcast by the national public broadcaster.

... one of the sources of financing the national public broadcaster (which is often employed in various states) is the means received by this broadcaster from broadcast advertising (inter alia, commercial advertising).

If such a model of financing the national public broadcaster is chosen whereby it also receives funds from broadcast advertising, regard must be paid to, inter alia, the provisions of Articles 29 and 46 of the Constitution ...

However, it needs to be emphasised that there are not any constitutional arguments that would allow asserting a priori that the LRT, as the national public broadcaster, may not, in general, broadcast advertising (either commercial or any other) or that it may not receive funds from broadcast advertising (either commercial or any other), as well as funds from prepared and/or broadcast non-advertising content broadcasts, from other ordering customers, or that such a legal regulation that consolidates the possibility for the LRT to broadcast advertising and to receive funds from it in itself violates the constitutional clause of fair competition, the constitutional principle of the equality of the rights of persons, and other provisions of the Constitution.

It needs to be noted that limitations on advertising (including commercial advertising) in programmes and broadcasts of a public broadcaster is a matter of legislation, but not that of constitutional review, unless these limitations would obviously deny certain constitutional values and would be harmful for all society; in such cases, their compliance with the Constitution could be assessed.

[...]

... the legislature may also establish such a legal regulation that would limit the broadcasting of advertising in the programmes and broadcasts of the LRT as the national public broadcaster (and other radio and television broadcasters). For example, it is permitted to establish limitations and/or prohibitions on the length and occurrence of advertising, prohibitions on broadcasting advertising on certain days or at a certain time of the day, prohibitions on advertising certain goods or services, prohibitions on broadcasting advertising in certain programmes or broadcasts (in relation to their content or according to the audience), prohibitions on broadcasting political advertising, etc.

The legislature may even, by means of a law, prohibit broadcasting advertising on the national radio and television at all (although this is a rare case in the world), but only if the resources and financial possibilities of society can afford it and if this does not impair the constitutional mission of the national public broadcaster. In addition, in such a special situation, the legislature must ensure the proper financing of the LRT as the national public broadcaster in other ways, for example, by means of the so-called subscription fee (levy), especially if a complete ban on advertising broadcasting can prevent this broadcaster from carrying out its constitutional mission. Otherwise, this would create the preconditions for violating the interest of the public to be informed, which is consolidated, defended, and protected by the Constitution; in addition, certain constitutional values might be denied for the implementation, fostering, and protection of which the institution of a public broadcaster is meant.

On the other hand, if such a model of financing the LRT as the national public broadcaster is chosen whereby the LRT also receives funds from broadcast advertising, when account is taken of the special constitutional mission of the national public broadcaster and its situation in the audio-visual sector, any legal regulation of the relationships linked with the financing and activities of this broadcaster whereby the LRT would be allocated only funds received from advertising or most of the funds received from advertising would be constitutionally groundless. Thus, this might create the preconditions for the LRT to become dependent and vulnerable, since the carrying out of the constitutional mission of the public broadcaster (for which finance is necessary) would depend on the situation in the audience or the market or on improper interest group or political influence, or it might become commercialised, or its programmes and broadcasts might be oriented only to the attraction of the largest possible audience, to commercial success, and to flattering consumerist tastes, but not to the public interest. Such broadcasts and programmes would not inform or educate society or implant such civil and cultural attitudes in the public that are dictated to the public broadcaster by its constitutional mission, and a threat might even appear that the special constitutional mission of the national public broadcaster would be denied at all.

[...]

... the autonomy of the LRT when it broadcasts advertising (inter alia, commercial advertising) is one of the aspects of the independence of the LRT as the national public broadcaster from interference by state institutions, officials, and other persons with the LRT activity; such independence must be ensured in order that this broadcaster would carry out its special constitutional mission.

Control over the activity of a public broadcaster

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 21 December 2006

... a law must establish not only such a model of the management of the national public broadcaster that would ensure that the constitutional mission of this broadcaster will not be deviated from and that the independence of the national public broadcaster will not be denied, but also the respective model of control over this broadcaster.

Such control over the activity of the national public broadcaster must be comprehensive; it may not be just formal. Such control may not be exercised by persons who themselves are related to the national public broadcaster by official, property, or financial links or are dependent on it in one way or another, or who themselves have interests related to the activity of the national public broadcaster, or who belong to the interest groups (also institutionalised ones) that have precisely such interests.

The aforementioned control over the national public broadcaster includes, among other things, a financial and property audit, which is a very important part of this control. Inter alia, control must be exercised over whether the national public broadcaster abuses its special legal status and the possibilities granted by this status (also those that are granted in the radio and television services market), whether the constitutional imperatives of fair competition are deviated from in its activity, and whether the funds that are allocated (not exclusively from the state budget) to the national public broadcaster so that it could carry out its special constitutional mission are used precisely for this purpose.

However, control over the activity of the national public broadcaster may not be understood solely as a financial or property audit. Such control must also include (both a priori (preliminary) and a posteriori (successive)) control over the direction in the content and structure of the programmes and broadcasts of the national public broadcaster, i.e. such monitoring and checking where the programmes and broadcasts of the national public broadcaster are also assessed from the aspect of the mission of this broadcaster, which arises from the Constitution and is defined in laws.

It needs to be emphasised that such control may not become censorship of the programmes and broadcasts of the national public broadcaster, which, as censorship of any other mass media, is expressis verbis prohibited by the Constitution.

The duty of the state to take effective measures against the dissemination of information that incites national, racial, religious, or social hatred, violence, or discrimination or spreads defamation, also against disinformation and against war propaganda

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 16 May 2019

... the Constitution, inter alia, Paragraph 4 of Article 25 and Paragraph 2 of Article 135 thereof, gives rise to the duty of the state to take effective measures against the dissemination of information that incites national, racial, religious, or social hatred, violence, or discrimination or spreads defamation, as well as against disinformation (in particular, against the dissemination of organised false or misleading information in order to manipulate the public, thus inflicting damage on the values protected and defended under the Constitution) and against war propaganda (especially, against incitement to aggression in the area of international relationships).

The constitutional mission of the national public broadcaster

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 16 May 2019

... the Constitution, inter alia, Article 25 thereof, gives rise to the mission of the national public broadcaster to ensure the public interest – the interest of society to be properly informed (which is consolidated, protected, and defended by the Constitution), i.e. to impart information to society at the national level by fostering the constitutional and common human values, inter alia, by protecting the national interests, strengthening democracy, cultivating civic consciousness, building respect for law, developing the openness and tolerance of society, fostering the language and culture, and preventing disinformation; the activity of the national public broadcaster in implementing this mission must be based on the principles of, inter alia, a pluralistic democracy, objectivity, impartiality, respect for human dignity and rights, inter alia, freedom of convictions and their expression, as well as moral and ethical principles.

The independence of a public broadcaster

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 16 May 2019

... the mission of a public broadcaster, inter alia, the national public broadcaster, which arises from the Constitution, inter alia, Article 25 thereof, implies the independence of the said broadcaster, which is necessary in order to carry out this mission. In its ruling of 21 December 2006, when revealing the particularities of the status of a public broadcaster, which are determined by its special constitutional mission, the Constitutional Court held that the constitutional mission of a public broadcaster also implies that the material, organisational, and financial conditions must be created in order that a public broadcaster could successfully carry out its mission, as well as that a legal regulation established by means of a law must ensure the independence of a public broadcaster from interference by public authorities, officials, and other persons with its activity; this is a conditio sine qua non in order that a public broadcaster could carry out its mission.

... under the Constitution, a public broadcaster must always remain independent of any particular – private or group – interests (political, economic, or other interests); the activity of a public broadcaster must not depend on any party or other political preferences. In its ruling of 21 December 2006, the Constitutional Court also emphasised that the mere fact that the state is the founder of a public broadcaster does not mean in itself that the imperative of the independence of a public broadcaster is deviated from.

In this context, it should be noted that the independence of a public broadcaster, inter alia, the national public broadcaster, which is implied by the mission of the said broadcaster, arising from the Constitution, inter alia, Article 25 thereof, from interference with its activity by public authorities, officials, or other persons means, inter alia, that a public broadcaster must be guaranteed the right, without external interference and having regard to its constitutional mission, to freely determine the structure of its programmes, as well as the content, timing, etc. of its broadcasts (independence with respect to freedom of information, i.e. editorial independence), as well as the right to organise and conduct, in an autonomous manner and in accordance with the procedure established in laws, its own activity through its own managing bodies, which are independent of public authorities, officials, political parties and organisations, and other persons, inter alia, from private (commercial) broadcasters (institutional independence).

In this context, it should be mentioned that, as held by the Constitutional Court in its ruling of 21 December 2006, a law must establish such a model of the management of a public broadcaster that would ensure that the constitutional mission of the said broadcaster will not be deviated from and that the independence of the said broadcaster will not be denied; in itself, it is impossible to regard as a deviation from the imperative of independence the fact that certain state institutions, which are provided for in a law, may participate in the formation of the highest body of a public broadcaster, where the said highest body has the powers to decide the most important issues of the activity of the public broadcaster, as, for instance, to plan the strategy for the activity of the public broadcaster, to establish the requirements for programmes and broadcasts, etc. (this highest body may be named in a varied manner: the council, board, etc.), as well as in the formation of the institutions supervising and controlling the activity of the public broadcaster; however, a public broadcaster founded by the state may reasonably be regarded as a public broadcaster only when the institution that has the powers to decide the most important issues of the activity of the public broadcaster is composed not of state officials or state servants, but of persons who can reasonably be called representatives of all society, but not of some interest groups (including professional and institutionalised groups, inter alia, those linked with the mass media, with radio and television in particular, as well as groups uniting persons whose creative work or production can be promoted in a varied manner by the public broadcaster).

... it should be noted that the above-mentioned aspects of the independence of a public broadcaster, inter alia, the national public broadcaster, which is implied by the mission of a public broadcaster, inter alia, the national public broadcaster, i.e. its independence in terms of freedom of information (editorial independence) and its institutional independence, are inseparably linked. Failure to ensure the institutional independence of a public broadcaster, inter alia, the national public broadcaster, inter alia, interference by public authorities or officials with the exercise of the powers, established in the law, of the bodies of a public broadcaster in organising its activities, can create the preconditions for state authorities or officials to have influence, inter alia, on the establishment of the structure of programmes and the content of broadcasts, i.e. to violate the editorial independence of a public broadcaster.

The accountability of a public broadcaster to the public and control over its activity

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 16 May 2019

... the special mission of a public broadcaster, inter alia, the national public broadcaster, which derives from the Constitution, inter alia, Article 25 thereof, and which, as mentioned before, is to ensure the public interest, i.e. the public interest, consolidated, defended, and protected by the Constitution, to be properly informed, also implies that a public broadcaster, inter alia, the national public broadcaster, is accountable to the public.

In this context, it should be noted that the state is a political organisation of society as a whole, whose power extends over the entire territory of the state and is designed to ensure human rights and freedoms and to guarantee the public interest (ruling of 30 December 2003). The Constitutional Court also held in its ruling of 21 December 2006 that the nature and constitutional mission of a public broadcaster also imply not only the obligation of the state to found a public broadcaster, but also the duty to ensure the activity of a public broadcaster, inter alia, the duty to allocate proper financing to a public broadcaster, so that it could carry out the said mission and provide the respective public broadcasting services.

Thus, the independence of a public broadcaster, inter alia, the national public broadcaster, which is implied by its mission, arising from the Constitution, inter alia, Article 25 thereof, does not deny the duty of a public broadcaster, inter alia, the national public broadcaster, to account to the public for the fulfilment of its constitutional mission, as well as the duty of the state, which is the founder of a public broadcaster, inter alia, the national public broadcaster, to control the implementation of the constitutional mission by the said broadcaster and the use of the resources allocated to the said broadcaster for the purpose of implementing this mission, inter alia, the use of the funding allocated to it by the state.

In this context, it should be noted that ... under the Constitution, only the Seimas is the representation of the People; under the Constitution, each member of the Seimas represents the whole of the People.

Thus, the accountability of a public broadcaster, inter alia, the national public broadcaster, to the public, which is implied by the mission of the said broadcaster, arising from the Constitution, inter alia, Article 25 thereof, means not only that a public broadcaster, inter alia, the national public broadcaster, is obliged to make public its activity reports, containing, inter alia, information on the fulfilment of its constitutional mission and the use of the state budget appropriations allocated for the implementation of this mission, but also that, in accordance with the procedure laid down in laws, a public broadcaster, inter alia, the national public broadcaster, is obliged to report to the Seimas as the representation of the People and its founder on its activities, inter alia, on how it implements its constitutional mission and how the state budget appropriations allocated for the implementation of this mission are used.

In this context, it should be noted that the Constitutional Court held in its ruling of 21 December 2006 that a law must also establish the respective model of control over the activity of the national public broadcaster; such control over the activity of the national public broadcaster must be comprehensive, it may not be formal; such control may not be exercised by the persons who themselves are related to the national public broadcaster by official, property, or financial links or are dependent on it in other ways, or who themselves have interests related to the activity of the national public broadcaster, or who belong to the interest groups (also institutionalised ones) that have precisely such interests; this control over the national public broadcaster includes, among other things, a financial and property audit, which is a very important part of this control; inter alia, control must be exercised over whether the national public broadcaster abuses its special legal status and the possibilities granted by this status (including in the radio and television services market), whether the constitutional imperatives of fair competition are deviated from in its activity, and whether the funds allocated (not exclusively from the state budget) to the national public broadcaster so that it could carry out its special constitutional mission are used precisely for this purpose; however, control over the activity of the national public broadcaster cannot be understood solely as a financial or property audit: such control must also include (both a priori (preliminary) and a posteriori (successive)) control over direction in the content and structure of the programmes and broadcasts of the national public broadcaster, i.e. such monitoring and checking of its activity where the programmes and broadcasts of the national public broadcaster are also assessed from the aspect of the mission of this broadcaster, which arises, inter alia, from the Constitution and is defined in laws; such control must not become censorship of the programmes and broadcasts of the national public broadcaster, which, in the same way as censorship of any other mass media, is expressis verbis prohibited by the Constitution.

... under the Constitution, the regulation of the activity of the national public broadcaster should be based on such a model of control over its activity that, on the one hand, would create the preconditions for the state to effectively fulfil its duty of control over the implementation by the national public broadcaster of its constitutional mission and over the use of the resources allocated for the implementation of this mission and that, on the other hand, would be compatible with the independence of the national public broadcaster, which is implied by its mission, arising from the Constitution, inter alia, Article 25 thereof, from interference with its activity by public authorities, officials, or other persons. Such a model, which is implied by the Constitution, of effective control over the activity of the national public broadcaster includes internal and external control over its activity.

It should be noted that internal control over the activity of the national public broadcaster is control over its activity as exercised or organised by its highest body, which has the powers to deal with the most important issues of the activity of this broadcaster, inter alia, control over direction in the structure and content of programmes and broadcasts (i.e. such monitoring and checking of the activity of the national public broadcaster where its programmes and broadcasts are assessed, inter alia, in terms of the mission of this broadcaster, which arises from the Constitution and is defined in laws), as well as control over the use of the resources allocated to the national public broadcaster by the state and the supervision of the organisation and performance of the activity of the national public broadcaster. As mentioned before, the said highest body of the national public broadcaster must be composed not of state officials or state servants, but of persons who can reasonably be called representatives of the public, but not of some interest groups. It should be noted that, when internal control over the activity of the national public broadcaster is carried out, compliance with the said requirement creates the preconditions not to violate the independence of the national public broadcaster (implied by its mission, arising from the Constitution, inter alia, Article 25 thereof) from interference by public authorities, officials, or other persons.

It needs to be noted that external control over the activity of the national public broadcaster means that control over its activity (over how such a broadcaster implements its constitutional mission and uses the resources allocated for the implementation of this mission) must be exercised by state authorities and/or officials with the respective powers established in the Constitution and/or laws. It should be emphasised that, having regard to the imperative of the independence of the national public broadcaster, which is implied by its mission, arising from the Constitution, inter alia, Article 25 thereof, the activity of the national public broadcaster must be controlled by such state authorities and/or officials that, in accordance with the Constitution and/or laws, exercise their powers independently, primarily, of the political authorities (such as prosecutors, who, under Paragraph 3 of Article 118 of the Constitution, are independent and obey only the law when performing their functions, or independent bodies that are established by means of laws and regulate and supervise the activities of the media).

[...]

... under the Constitution, inter alia, Paragraph 1 of Article 134 thereof, the National Audit Office has the powers to exercise external control over the activity of the national public broadcaster – to conduct a state audit, inter alia, to inspect the activity of the national public broadcaster, among other things, in terms of economy, efficiency, and effectiveness, inter alia, by assessing the lawfulness of the management and use of the state assets entrusted to the broadcaster. It should be emphasised that the assignment given to the National Audit Office, which must exercise its constitutional powers independently of other state authorities, inter alia, from the Seimas, the President of the Republic, or the Government, to conduct a state audit of the national public broadcaster does not in itself violate the independence of the national public broadcaster (implied by its mission, arising from the Constitution, inter alia, Article 25 thereof) from interference with its activity by public authorities, officials, or other persons.

... implementing its constitutional powers, the Seimas performs the classical functions of the parliament of a democratic state under the rule of law, inter alia, it exercises parliamentary control; in exercising its power under Item 14 of Article 67 of the Constitution to supervise the execution of the state budget, the Seimas, while having regard to the Constitution, inter alia, to the principles of responsible governance and a state under the rule of law, which are consolidated in the Constitution, may also exercise parliamentary control over the institutions that have been founded by means of laws, are accountable to the Seimas, and are independent managers of state budget appropriations. It has ... been mentioned that the accountability of the national public broadcaster to the public, which is implied by its mission, arising from the Constitution, inter alia, Article 25 thereof, inter alia, means that, in accordance with the procedure established in laws, the national public broadcaster is obliged to account for its activity to the Seimas as the representation of the People and as its founder, inter alia, for the implementation of its constitutional mission and the use of the state budgeted appropriations allocated for the implementation of this mission.

Therefore, the Constitution cannot be interpreted as meaning that, purportedly, it does not allow the exercise of parliamentary control over the activity of the national public broadcaster. As mentioned before, under the Constitution, only the Seimas is the representation of the People; a member of the Seimas is not a representative of political parties or political organisations, public or other organisations, interest groups, territorial communities or the voters of the constituency in which he/she has been elected, but a member of the Seimas represents the whole of the People. In view of this, parliamentary control over the national public broadcaster exercised by the Seimas, inter alia, its structural units, cannot in itself be understood as control, prohibited by the Constitution, exercised over the activity of the national public broadcaster by persons pursuing their own interests in connection with the activity of the national public broadcaster.

However ... in its nature and essence, the Seimas is a political institution, whose decisions reflect the political will of the majority of the members of the Seimas and are based on political arrangements and compromises. With this in mind, it should be emphasised that parliamentary control over the national public broadcaster carried out under the Constitution must not violate the imperative of the independence of the national public broadcaster, which is implied by its mission, arising from the Constitution, inter alia, Article 25 thereof. This means that, under the Constitution, parliamentary control exercised over the national public broadcaster by the Seimas must not undermine the independence of the national public broadcaster in terms of freedom of information (editorial independence), inter alia, it is not allowed to carry out such control over the programmes and broadcasts of the national public broadcaster that would be equivalent to censorship; in addition, it is not allowed to violate the institutional independence of the national public broadcaster, inter alia, by interfering with the exercise of the powers, established by means of a law, of the bodies of this broadcaster in organising its activity, thereby creating the preconditions for exerting political influence on the content of programmes and broadcasts.

... although, under the Constitution, inter alia, Article 76 thereof, the Seimas has broad discretion to set up ad hoc structural units – ad hoc investigation commissions, inter alia, designated for fulfilling the functions of parliamentary control, it may not set up such ad hoc investigation commissions whose mandate would include an investigation inflicting damage on freedom of the media, enshrined in Article 25 of the Constitution, inter alia, on the mission of the national public broadcaster, arising from this article, and on the independence of the national public broadcaster, which is implied by the said mission. This means, among other things, that, under the Constitution, inter alia, the constitutional principles of responsible governance and a state under the rule of law, and having regard to the independence of the national public broadcaster, which is implied by its mission, arising from the Constitution, inter alia, Article 25 thereof, it is not allowed to set up such ad hoc investigation commissions of the Seimas that would be given the task of carrying out an investigation that could create the preconditions for taking over the powers, consolidated in the Constitution and/or laws, of other state authorities, inter alia, the powers of the National Audit Office, to exercise external control over the activity of the national public broadcaster, inter alia ... drafting such decisions that, under the Constitution and/or laws, may only be adopted by the state authorities (their officials) with the respective competence.

On the other hand, having regard to the imperative of the independence of the national public broadcaster, which is implied by its mission, arising from the Constitution, inter alia, Article 25 thereof, the Seimas, under the Constitution, inter alia, Article 76 thereof, whenever the implementation of its constitutional powers requires it to collect necessary, comprehensive, and objective information, may set up an ad hoc investigation commission where a special issue, i.e. one of state importance, arises in relation, for instance, to a threat to the independence of the national public broadcaster, or in relation to the facts (inter alia, violations of law) established by the state authorities and/or officials authorised by the Constitution and/or laws to exercise external control over the national public broadcaster if those facts show that the activity of the national public broadcaster may be not in line with its constitutional mission and/or that the state budget appropriations allocated for the implementation of this mission are used inappropriately. It should also be noted ... that, before the Seimas sets up such an ad hoc investigation commission, it must (inter alia, in terms of expediency) assess whether the respective work can be performed by any already established and functioning structural unit of the Seimas that has the powers, under the Statute of the Seimas and/or laws, to exercise parliamentary control over the national public broadcaster.

2.2.7.3. Freedom of advertising

Freedom of advertising

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 29 September 2005

The constitutional concept of freedom of information is especially broad; it encompasses the freedom to seek, receive, and impart most varied information. Information can also encompass such knowledge by imparting which attempts are made to exert influence on the behaviour and choice of people, inter alia, to induce them to choose, acquire, and/or use certain goods, to use certain services, or not to choose them. Imparting such information is commonly referred to as advertising.

... freedom of information, which is consolidated in the Constitution, also includes freedom of advertising, inter alia, the freedom to advertise goods and services.

All advertising is information; advertising is a particular type of information. Advertising is an important means of competition (rulings of 13 February 1997 and 26 January 2004).

It needs to be emphasised that, by means of advertising goods and services, irrespective of whether or not this activity is charged, attempts are always made to induce the use of certain goods or services. In this context, it needs to be mentioned that the indirect inducement to use certain goods or certain services (where this is done in such a manner that the recipients of advertising would not understand that they receive advertising information as such) should be treated as hidden advertising.

... people can be induced to use certain goods or services also by such information in the course of imparting which no attempts are made to induce people to do so (e.g. statistical data, technical and other information, which announces something, draws attention to something, etc.). Under certain circumstances, imparting such information can exert the same influence on the recipients of such information as advertising; thus, in this respect, it can amount to advertising.

It must also be emphasised that imparted information not necessarily has only advertising or only non-advertising content: it can contain both the elements of advertising content and such information the imparting of which is not advertising.

[...]

... The constitutional concept of freedom of advertising does not encompass imparting such advertising that disinforms and deliberately deceives consumers.

Limiting freedom of advertising in order to protect human health

See 2.2.7.1. The protection of the freedom to express convictions and freedom of information, the ruling of 29 September 2005 (“Limiting freedom of information (inter alia, advertising) in order to protect human health (Paragraph 3 of Article 25 of the Constitution)”).

Limiting the advertising of medicines

See 2.2.7.1. The protection of the freedom to express convictions and freedom of information, the ruling of 29 September 2005 (“Control over imparting information on medicines (inter alia, the advertising of medicines), where such information may create the preconditions for harming human health”).

Conditions for limiting freedom of advertising

The Constitutional Court’s ruling of 21 December 2006

The jurisprudence of the Constitutional Court is based on the principled position that freedom of advertising may be limited by means of a law if this is done in order to protect constitutional values; however, such limitation of this constitutional freedom must be necessary in a democratic society and the chosen measures must be proportionate to the objective sought; it is necessary to maintain a reasonable balance between a particular constitutional value and the constitutional right of an individual to seek, receive, and impart information. Information, also that of advertising content, may not be limited only due to the fact that, in the opinion of the legislature, it is not useful to the people, although it is not harmful to them. Selective limitations on advertising, i.e. limitations on imparting and/or receiving advertising by means of certain sources and the non-limitation of imparting and/or receiving advertising by means of other sources are allowed only when such differentiation is objectively justifiable. Under the Constitution, limitations on freedom of advertising, which are established by means of a law, may not be greater than it is necessary in order to protect relevant constitutional values (ruling of 29 September 2005).

2.2.8. Freedom of thought, conscience, and religion

2.2.8.1. The protection of freedom of thought, conscience, and religion

Freedom of thought, conscience, and religion (Article 26 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court’s ruling of 13 June 2000

One of the fundamental freedoms of individuals is consolidated in Paragraph 1 of Article 26 of the Constitution: freedom of thought, conscience, and religion is not restricted. This freedom guarantees the possibility for people who hold various views to live in an open, just, and harmonious civil society. This freedom is not only an intrinsic value of democracy, but also an important guarantee that other constitutional human rights and freedoms would be implemented in a fully fledged manner.

Interpreting the provisions of Article 26 of the Constitution in a systemic manner, it should be noted that freedom of thought, conscience, and religion is inseparable from other human rights and freedoms consolidated in the Constitution: the right to have one’s own convictions and to freely express them; the freedom to seek, receive, and impart information (Paragraphs 1 and 2 of Article 25); the right to freely form societies and associations; the right not to be compelled to belong to any society, political party, or association (Paragraphs 1 and 2 of Article 35); the right of parents to bring up their children to be honest people and faithful citizens (Paragraph 6 of Article 38); freedom of culture, science and research, and teaching (Paragraph 1 of Article 42); as well as other human rights and freedoms enshrined in the Constitution.

Freedom of thought, conscience, and religion is also inseparable from the principles consolidated in the Constitution: the equality of persons, the prohibition of granting privileges, and non-discrimination (Paragraphs 1 and 2 of Article 29); the fact that the state recognises the church registration of marriages (Paragraph 4 of Article 38); the secularity of state and municipal establishments of teaching and education (Paragraph 1 of Article 40); the fact that the state recognises the churches and religious organisations that are traditional in Lithuania, as well as other churches and religious organisations provided that they conform to the criteria provided for in the Constitution (Paragraph 1 of Article 43); freedom of religious activity (Paragraph 3 of Article 43); the freedom of churches and religious organisations to conduct their affairs freely (Paragraph 4 of Article 43); and the absence of a state religion in Lithuania (Paragraph 7 of Article 43). The aforesaid freedom is also inseparable from the general constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law, from the striving for an open, just, and harmonious civil society, as well as from other constitutional principles.

The content of Article 26 of the Constitution is linked with freedom of convictions and their expression, which is consolidated in Article 25 of the Constitution, and with the general criteria of limiting the exercise of rights and freedoms by persons, as established in Articles 27 and 28 of the Constitution.

Democratic states under the rule of law recognise that, as regards its content, freedom of thought, conscience, and religion is a more particular expression of the broader human freedom to have convictions and freely express them. “Convictions” is a broad and diverse constitutional notion, including political and economic convictions, religious feelings, cultural disposition, ethical and aesthetical views, etc.

[...]

Freedom of thought, conscience, and religion becomes a matter of legal regulation only insofar as an individual expresses his/her thoughts or belief in his/her actions. As long as he/she professes his/her religion or belief, this is an inviolable sphere of his/her private life. This state of an individual may not be limited in any way (conclusion of 24 January 1995). In this respect, freedom of belief is an absolute freedom of individuals. The right of an individual not to disclose his/her approach to matters of belief or non-believing is uncontested, either.

Precisely this aspect of the wording “freedom shall not be restricted”, employed in Paragraph 1 of Article 26 of the Constitution, is particularised in Paragraphs 2, 3, and 4 of the same article. The state has the duty to ensure that no one encroaches on the spiritual matters of an individual, i.e. that no one restricts his/her innate right to choose a religion acceptable to him/her or not to choose any, or to change his/her chosen religion or reject it. The state may not establish mandatory requirements that a person must indicate his/her faith or his/her approach to matters of religion. On the other hand, the state has the duty to ensure that a believer or a non-believer, alone or with others, would make use of freedom of thought, conscience, and religion guaranteed to him/her in such a way that the rights and freedoms of other persons would not be violated: under Article 28 of the Constitution, while implementing his/her rights and exercising his/her freedoms, everyone must observe the Constitution and laws and must not restrict the rights and freedoms of other people and, under Article 27 of the Constitution, convictions, practised religion, or belief may not serve as a justification for a crime or failure to observe laws.

Paragraph 2 of Article 25 of the Constitution consolidates an important condition for freedom of convictions and their expression: no one must be hindered from seeking, receiving, or imparting information and ideas. On the other hand, the provision of Paragraph 3 of Article 26 of the Constitution, whereby no one may compel another person or be compelled to choose or profess any religion or belief, means that no religious or materialistic ideas may be forced on an individual against his/her will. The right of parents and guardians to take care of the religious education of their children and wards according to their convictions, as guaranteed in Paragraph 5 of Article 25 of the Constitution, does not mean that the convictions of parents or guardians are forced on children or wards. Under Paragraph 2 of Article 26 of the Constitution, everyone is free to choose the religion or faith that is acceptable to him/her; in addition, everyone has the right not to choose any religion or belief.

Freedom of thought, conscience, and religion (Article 26 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court’s ruling of 4 July 2017

... Article 26 of the Constitution, by its content, is linked with Articles 27 and 28 of the Constitution, under which convictions, practised religion, or belief may not serve as a justification for a crime or failure to observe laws (Article 27) and, while implementing his/her rights and exercising his/her freedoms, everyone must observe the Constitution and laws and must not restrict the rights and freedoms of other people (Article 28). Among other things, this means that, on the grounds of his/her convictions, practised religion, or belief, no one may refuse to fulfil the constitutionally established duties, inter alia, the duty of a citizen to perform military or alternative national defence service, or demand exemption from these duties.

2.2.8.2. Relations between the state and churches and other religious organisations. The secularity of state and municipal educational establishments

The recognition of churches and religious organisations by the state; traditional churches and religious organisations (Paragraph 1 of Article 43 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 13 June 2000

Paragraph 1 of Article 43 of the Constitution stipulates that the state recognises the churches and religious organisations that are traditional in Lithuania; other churches and religious organisations are recognised provided that they have support in society, and their teaching and practices are not in conflict with the law and public morals.

The constitutional provision that the state recognises the churches and religious organisations that are traditional in Lithuania implies that the legislature may, in certain cases, name certain religious organisations as traditional in Lithuania. The naming of churches or religious organisations as traditional is a special way of their recognition by the state.

The constitutional consolidation of the institution of the recognition of churches and religious organisations as traditional means that such recognition by the state is irrevocable. Tradition is neither created nor abolished by an act of the will of the legislature. The naming of churches and religious organisations as traditional is not an act of their establishment as traditional organisations, but an act stating their tradition – the situation of their relations with society, which does not depend on the will of the legislature. Such an act reflects the development and situation of religious culture in society. It needs to be noted that the provision of Paragraph 1 of Article 43 of the Constitution, which states that there are such churches and religious organisations that are traditional in Lithuania, is the constitutional ground on the basis of which it is allowed to establish the status of traditional churches and organisations, which is different compared with other churches and religious organisations. This means that, without limiting the rights guaranteed for all churches and religious organisations, it is also allowed to ensure, by means of a law, such rights for traditional churches and religious organisations that are not enjoyed by non-traditional churches and organisations.

The principle of the separateness of the state and church, the neutrality of the state in matters of world view and religion, as well as the secularity of the state (Paragraph 1 of Article 40, Paragraphs 4 and 7 of Article 43 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 13 June 2000

Paragraph 7 of Article 43 of the Constitution consolidates the principle of the absence of a state religion in Lithuania. This constitutional norm and the norm providing that there are such churches and religious organisations that are traditional in Lithuania mean that the fact that a certain religion is traditional does not suggest that the said religion is a state religion: churches and religious organisations do not interfere with the activity of the state, its institutions, and officials; they do not form the state policy; meanwhile, the state does not interfere with the internal affairs of churches and religious organisations; they conduct their affairs freely according to their canons and statutes (Paragraph 4 of Article 43 of the Constitution).

Interpreting in a systemic manner the norm laid down in Paragraph 7 of Article 43 of the Constitution, whereby there is no state religion in Lithuania, the norm of Paragraph 4 of the same article, according to which churches and religious organisations conduct their affairs freely according to their canons and statutes, the norms of Paragraph 1 of Article 40, by which state and municipal establishments of teaching and education are secular, as well as other constitutional provisions, the conclusion should be drawn that the principle of the separateness of the state and the church is consolidated in the Constitution. The principle of the separateness of the state and the church is the basis for the secularity of the State of Lithuania, its institutions, and their activities. This principle, together with freedom of convictions, thought, religion, and conscience, which is consolidated in the Constitution, as well as with the constitutional principle of the equality of persons and other constitutional provisions, determines the neutrality of the state in matters of world view and religion.

The fact that the State of Lithuania and its institutions are neutral as regards matters of world view and religion means the separation of the areas of the state and religion, as well as the separation of the mission, functions, and activities of the state and those of churches and religious organisations. It needs to be noted that the neutrality and secularity of the state may not serve as grounds for discriminating believers or for restricting their rights and freedoms. The secularity of the state also implies non-interference by the state with the internal life of churches and religious organisations.

The secularity of state and municipal establishments of teaching and education; providing religious instruction in such establishments of teaching and education (Paragraph 1 of Article 40 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 13 June 2000

Paragraph 1 of Article 40 of the Constitution provides that state and municipal establishments of teaching and education are secular. This constitutional provision implies the requirement that these establishments must be tolerant, open, and accessible to people of all religions, as well as to those members of society who are non-believers. The expression “secular”, employed in Article 40 of the Constitution, means that the Constitution establishes the presumption that teaching in state and municipal establishments of teaching and education must have secular content.

Paragraph 1 of Article 40 of the Constitution provides that, at the request of parents, state and municipal establishments of teaching and education provide religious instruction. This provision implies that: (1) religious instruction is provided at the request of parents (taking account of the norm of Paragraph 5 of Article 26 of the Constitution, such a request may also be expressed by the legal guardians of a child); (2) state and municipal establishments of teaching and education have the duty to guarantee that, in cases where there is the request of parents, religious instruction would be provided; (3) religious instruction must be organised in such a way that the secularity of state and municipal establishments of teaching and education would not be denied.

The requirement of Paragraph 1 of Article 40 of the Constitution to provide religious instruction at the request of parents expresses the principle of positive declaration. To express the request that their children be provided religious instruction, also by indicating the teaching of what particular religion is requested, is a constitutional right of parents.

[...]

It is possible to draw the conclusion on the basis of the provision of Paragraph 1 of Article 40 of the Constitution, which provides for the presence of state and municipal establishments of teaching and education, that several co-founders of state or municipal establishments of teaching and education are allowed and that the state and municipalities (their institutions) may be one of the co-founders of such establishments of teaching and education. Under [the law], the educational establishments that state or municipal institutions found together with state-recognised traditional religious communities are state (municipal) schools. Under Paragraph 1 of Article 40 of the Constitution, these jointly founded educational establishments are secular.

It needs to be noted that the norm consolidated in Paragraph 1 of Article 40 of the Constitution guarantees that, at the request of parents, state and municipal establishments of teaching and education provide religious instruction. ...

... under Paragraph 1 of Article 40 of the Constitution, state and municipal establishments of teaching and education are secular; therefore, all their constituent parts – classes, groups, etc. – must also be secular. These classes and groups may not be set up or formed in any other manner on the basis of religion, belief, or religious instruction. Otherwise, the secular nature of state and municipal establishments of teaching and education would be denied and the constitutional principle of the separateness of the state and the church would be violated. On the grounds of religion, groups may be formed exceptionally for receiving religious instruction; however, under the Constitution, on such grounds, classes, groups, etc. may not be set up or formed in any other way in order to provide instruction in secular subjects in state or municipal establishments of teaching and education. ...

[...]

Under the Constitution, state and municipal establishments of teaching and education are secular. In these establishments, no requirements may be set for teachers and other employees in relation to their convictions. Such requirements may not be set by state or municipal institutions, parents at whose request religious instruction is provided, teachers of religion, traditional churches or religious organisations, or any other state-recognised churches or religious organisations. The Constitutional Court emphasises that, otherwise, the norm of Paragraph 1 of Article 42 of the Constitution, by which culture, science and research, and teaching are free ... would also be denied.

[...]

Paragraph 1 of Article 40 of the Constitution consolidates the principle of the secularity of state and municipal establishments of teaching and education. Among other things, this principle means that state and municipal secular establishments of teaching and education are tolerant, open, and accessible to people of all religions, as well as to those members of society who are non-believers; the content of world-view education in these establishments is secular; in the course of teaching secular subjects, no religion or belief is implanted in pupils. No requirements connected with convictions may be set for the teachers (except teachers of religion) or other employees of secular educational establishments. Thus, churches and religious organisations may not set any requirements connected with convictions or beliefs for the teachers (except teachers of religion) or other employees of secular educational establishments. It is only state and municipal institutions, but not churches or religious organisations, that are permitted to manage, organise, and supervise activities carried out by state and municipal educational establishments.

[...]

Under the Constitution, at the request of parents, pupils in state and municipal establishments of teaching and education must be taught not any kind of religion, but the one specified by parents. This gives rise to the duty of state and municipal educational establishments to ensure that pupils would be taught specifically the religion requested by their parents. ...

[...]

Under the constitutional principle of positive declaration, parents may express their request that state and municipal establishments of teaching and education should provide religious instruction, but they are not obliged to express their request that classes in ethics should be offered, i.e. the subject provided for by [means of a law] for pupils who do not attend classes in religious instruction. In the state and municipal educational establishments co-founded with state-recognised traditional religious associations, as well as in all state and municipal establishments of teaching and education, pupils may be provided religious instruction if there is a request expressed by their parents (guardians). ...

[...]

Under Paragraph 6 of Article 38 of the Constitution, parents have the right and duty to bring up their children to be honest individuals and faithful citizens, as well as to support them until they reach the age of majority; according to Paragraph 5 of Article 26 of the Constitution, parents and guardians take care of the religious and moral education of their children and wards according to their own convictions without restrictions. These provisions, together with the norm of Paragraph 1 of Article 40 of the Constitution, whereby state and municipal establishments of teaching and education provide religious instruction at the request of parents, imply that parents (guardians) have the constitutional right to request that a secular establishment of teaching and education provide religious instruction.

The rights of churches and religious organisations (Paragraph 3 of Article 43 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 13 June 2000

Paragraph 3 of Article 43 of the Constitution prescribes: “Churches and religious organisations shall be free to proclaim their teaching, perform their ceremonies, and have houses of prayer, charity establishments, and schools for the training of priests.”

... Paragraph 3 of Article 43 of the Constitution is intended to guarantee the independence of churches and religious organisations, to protect them against interference by state and municipal institutions, their officials, and other establishments with the activity of churches and religious organisations.

The Constitutional Court emphasises that the provisions of Paragraph 3 of Article 43 of the Constitution may not be interpreted as comprising a final list of the rights of churches and religious organisations. The rights of churches and religious organisations are also established in other provisions of the Constitution. The legislature has the right, without violating the Constitution, to establish such rights for churches and religious organisations that are not expressly mentioned in the Constitution.

The different status of the churches and religious organisations that are traditional in Lithuania and other churches and religious organisations (inter alia, those that are recognised by the state, but are not traditional in Lithuania) (Paragraph 1 of Article 43 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's decision of 6 November 2007

... the provision “The naming of churches and religious organisations as traditional is ... an act stating both their tradition and the situation of their relations with society, which does not depend on the will of the legislature. Such an act reflects the development and situation of religious culture in society” ... of the Constitutional Court's ruling of 13 June 2000 should be interpreted by taking into account the entire context of that ruling of the Constitutional Court, the fact that the Constitution explicitly consolidates the recognition by the state of the institution of the churches and religious organisations that are traditional in Lithuania (Paragraph 1 of Article 43 of the Constitution), and other provisions of the Constitution.

... the Constitution consolidates the threefold status of churches and religious organisations that operate in Lithuania: some churches and religious organisations are traditional in Lithuania, other churches and religious organisations (non-traditional in Lithuania) are recognised by the state, yet other churches and religious organisations operating in Lithuania do not have the status of traditional churches or religious organisations in Lithuania, nor are they recognised by the state.

When interpreting, in a systemic manner, the provision “The naming of churches and religious organisations as traditional is ... an act stating both their tradition and the situation of their relations with society, which does not depend on the will of the legislature. Such an act reflects the development and situation of religious culture in society” ... of the Constitutional Court's ruling of 13 June 2000, it should be stated that:

- under the Constitution, the Seimas has the powers to name in a law (it not only can, but also must do so) as to which churches and religious organisations are traditional in Lithuania; such naming is the statement of the objective fact that some churches and religious organisations are traditional in Lithuania, but this is not the creation of the tradition of particular churches and religious organisations, since their existence as traditional does not depend on the will of the legislature;

- in a law, only those churches and religious organisations may be named as traditional the tradition of which does not raise any doubts, since they are part of the social, cultural, and spiritual heritage of society and formed in Lithuania historically over the centuries; in order to recognise churches and religious organisations as traditional in Lithuania, it is far from sufficient for them, inter alia, to act in Lithuania for several decades or to meet other formal criteria established by the legislature, since the tradition of churches and religious organisations does not appear even over several generations, but it is a long-term process, which continued uninterrupted for centuries and should be related to the long-lived spiritual and cultural development of Lithuanian society and which has an essential impact on it; therefore, the legislature must name, in laws, those churches and religious organisations as traditional in Lithuania that undoubtedly correspond to the aforementioned concept of tradition; the legislature may not name those churches and religious organisations as traditional in Lithuania that do not correspond to the aforementioned concept; having stated and named in a law which churches and religious organisations are traditional in Lithuania, the legislature may not expand this list, unless a very long time has passed after such a statement and the expansion of such a list would reflect the changed development and situation of religious culture in Lithuanian society; – since the tradition of specific churches and religious organisations in Lithuania is the objective situation of the relations of churches and religious organisations with society irrespective of the will of the legislature, the legislature may not withdraw the statement of the existence of this tradition.

[...]

... it should be noted that the establishment of specific criteria for the guidance of public administration subjects in decision making regarding entry on the respective register of religious communities and associations as belonging to traditional ones in Lithuania is the prerogative of the legislature. However, whatever criteria the legislature may establish for the guidance of public administration subjects in decision making regarding entry on the respective register of religious communities and associations as belonging to churches or religious organisations that are traditional in Lithuania, such criteria may not deviate from the constitutional concept of the tradition of churches and religious organisations; moreover, the said criteria may not deny such a concept.

[...]

... the provision that the state recognises “other churches and religious organisations ... provided that they have support in society, and their teaching and practices are not in conflict with the law and public morals” of Paragraph 1 of Article 43 of the Constitution means that certain churches and religious organisations that are not traditional in Lithuania may be singled out from other churches and religious organisations that are not traditional, and may be granted a special status by stipulating that they are churches and religious organisations recognised by the state. Taking into account the fact that the said special status is nothing else but the establishment of the situation of a particular church and religious organisation in the state and that this special status may be granted only to those churches and religious organisations that have support in society, it should be held that the granting of this status is within the prerogative of the legislature.

The condition “have support in society”, which is consolidated in Paragraph 1 of Article 43 of the Constitution, means that support in society for a particular church or religious organisation should be strong and long-term; therefore, it may not be limited to a small group of people or a small part of society, or to several decades of activities, or to one or a few generations. Support in society for a particular church and religious organisation should be such that it would leave no doubt as to the presence of that support. When deciding whether a certain church or religious organisation may be granted state recognition, it should be ascertained that there is actual support in society for that church or religious organisation. Under Paragraph 1 of Article 43 of the Constitution, it should also be ascertained that the teaching and practices of that church or religious organisation are not in conflict with the law and public morals. If those conditions are not satisfied, state recognition may not be granted to the respective church or religious organisation.

Thus, the provision that the state recognises “other churches and religious organisations ... provided that they have support in society, and their teaching and practices are not in conflict with the law and public morals” of Paragraph 1 of Article 43 of the Constitution implies a legal situation different from that implied by the provision of this paragraph that “The State shall recognise the churches and religious organisations that are traditional in Lithuania”. The churches and religious organisations that are not traditional in Lithuania may obtain state recognition by the will of the Seimas, following a resolution adopted by it. It should be noted that such state recognition, differently from the statement that a certain church or religious organisation is traditional in Lithuania, may be withdrawn if a particular church or religious organisation recognised by the state loses its support in society or its teaching and practices become contradictory to laws or public morals.

This means that the different status of the churches and religious organisations that are traditional in Lithuania and other churches and religious organisations that are recognised by the state stems from the Constitution itself. Consequently, the Constitution itself gives rise to the powers of the legislature to establish, by means of a law, such rights for the churches and religious organisations traditional in Lithuania that are not enjoyed by churches and religious organisations that are not traditional in Lithuania (obviously, the establishment of such rights must be substantiated constitutionally). Precisely this is stated in the provisions “the provision of Paragraph 1 of Article 43 of the Constitution, which states that there are such churches and religious organisations that are traditional in Lithuania, is the constitutional ground on the basis of which it is allowed to establish the status of traditional churches and organisations that is different compared with other churches and religious organisations. This means that, without limiting the rights guaranteed for all churches and religious organisations, it is also allowed to ensure, by means of a law, such rights for traditional churches and religious organisations that are not enjoyed by non-traditional churches and organisations” ... of the Constitutional Court’s ruling of 13 June 2000.

In the light of the foregoing arguments, it should be held that the provisions “the provision of Paragraph 1 of Article 43 of the Constitution, which states that there are such churches and religious organisations that are traditional in Lithuania, is the constitutional ground on the basis of which it is allowed to establish the status of traditional churches and organisations that is different compared with other churches and religious organisations. This means that, without limiting the rights guaranteed for all churches and religious organisations, it is also allowed to ensure, by means of a law, such rights for traditional churches and religious organisations that are not enjoyed by non-traditional churches and organisations” ... of the Constitutional Court’s ruling of 13 June 2000 mean the following:

- certain rights, which are not enjoyed by other churches and religious organisations recognised by the state, are established for the churches and religious organisations traditional in Lithuania specifically on the constitutional ground that these churches and religious organisations are traditional in Lithuania;
- if any other church or religious organisation (non-traditional in Lithuania) is recognised by the state, this in itself does not provide grounds for establishing for it such rights that are enjoyed by the churches and religious organisations traditional in Lithuania precisely because they are traditional in Lithuania.

[...]

... as held in this decision of the Constitutional Court, the different status of the churches and religious organisations that are traditional in Lithuania and other churches and religious organisations that are recognised by the state stems from the Constitution itself. It was also held that the Constitution itself gives rise to the powers of the legislature to establish, by means of a law, such rights for the churches and religious organisations traditional in Lithuania that are not enjoyed by churches and religious organisations that are not traditional in Lithuania.

Thus, the Constitution itself also gives rise to the possibility and, in certain cases, necessity of establishing a differentiated legal regulation of the respective relationships with regard to the churches and religious organisations that are traditional in Lithuania and with regard to the churches and religious organisations that are recognised by the state as collective legal subjects.

The establishment of such a differentiated legal regulation may not be interpreted as meaning that, as such, it denies the constitutional right of everyone to freely choose any religion or belief and, alone or with others, in private or in public, to profess his/her religion, to perform religious ceremonies, as well as to practice and teach his/her belief; as such, the establishment of the said legal regulation does not mean that some believers are discriminated, while others are granted privileges.

The status of churches and other religious organisations in the state is established by agreement (Paragraph 5 of Article 43 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court’s decision of 6 November 2007

... the Constitutional Court's ruling of 13 June 2000 ... points out, inter alia, that the secular nature of the state consolidated in the Constitution implies non-interference by the state with the internal life of churches and religious organisations; meanwhile, the tradition of religion is not identified with its being a state religion. Churches and religious organisations conduct their affairs freely according to their canons and statutes (Paragraph 4 of Article 43 of the Constitution). The status of churches and other religious organisations in the state is established by agreement or by law (Paragraph 5 of Article 43 of the Constitution).

The constitutional provision that "The status of churches and other religious organisations in the State shall be established by agreement or by law" may not be interpreted as meaning the obligation of the state to make agreements with all churches and religious organisations that are traditional in Lithuania, as well as with other churches and religious organisations that are recognised by the state. The state freely decides on whether or not to conclude agreements and, if it decides to conclude such agreements, it also decides with whom they will be concluded. The said constitutional provision may not be interpreted as meaning that, once the state concludes a certain agreement with a specific church or religious organisation, it has to conclude the respective agreements with other churches and religious organisations operating in Lithuania.

2.2.9. Freedom of movement

Freedom of movement (Paragraphs 1 and 2 of Article 32 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 29 December 2004

Freedom of movement guaranteed to a citizen is a significant element of the constitutional status of a member of a civil community. It should be noted that the rights and freedoms consolidated in Paragraph 1 of Article 32 of the Constitution are guaranteed both for citizens of the Republic of Lithuania and for other persons who, according to Lithuanian law and international treaties of the Republic of Lithuania, reside in Lithuania in cases where their legal status does not imply a different implementation of these rights and freedoms.

The provisions of Article 32 of the Constitution mean that it is only a citizen himself/herself who has the right to decide in which place of the territory of the Republic of Lithuania to stay, when to leave this place and move to another place, to freely decide as to which permanent or temporary place of residence to choose, and to decide whether to stay in Lithuania or leave, as well as the right to choose himself/herself the time of departure. The right to choose the time of departure also implies the freedom of a citizen to choose any legal manner of departure. It should be noted that, according to the Constitution, it is not allowed to establish such a procedure for the implementation of the said rights and freedoms whereby a citizen would have to ask a certain state institution for permission to implement freedom of movement, which belongs to him/her, as well as the right to choose his/her place of residence in Lithuania, or the right to freely leave Lithuania, or whereby those rights and freedoms would unreasonably be restricted. It is also worth noting that the rights and freedoms consolidated in Article 32 of the Constitution create the preconditions for implementing certain other human rights and freedoms: the freedom to freely choose an occupation or business, the right to ownership, the right to education, etc.

Freedom of movement, the right to choose the place of residence in Lithuania, as well as the right to leave Lithuania freely, which are consolidated in Article 32 of the Constitution, are not absolute. Under Paragraph 2 of Article 32 of the Constitution, they may be subject to limitation; however, this may be done only by means of a law and only when this is necessary for the protection of the security of the state or the health of people; they may also be subject to limitation when this is necessary for administering justice.

... In cases where data, received in accordance with the procedure established by means of laws, about the relations of persons with organised criminal groups, criminal syndicates, or their members, constitute a sufficient basis for considering that those persons may commit grave crimes, i.e. where particular activities of persons or their relations prove a threat to constitutional values, inter alia, human rights and freedoms, the constitutional order, the safety of society and the state, as well as public order, it is allowed to establish, by means of a law, preventive measures that provide for certain control over the conduct of such persons. As such, preventive measures that are aimed at restricting and reducing organised crime should not be considered a constitutionally unreasonable limitation on freedom of movement of a person, as well as the right to freely choose the place of residence in Lithuania and the right to leave Lithuania freely; however, these provisions are applicable only if they are established by means of a law, if they are necessary in a democratic society in order to protect the values defended and protected by the Constitution, if they do not deny the nature and essence of freedom of movement of a person, as well as the right to freely choose the place of residence in Lithuania and the right to leave Lithuania freely, and if they are proportionate to the sought objective that cannot be achieved in any other manner. The jurisdictional and other law-applying institutions, when applying the aforementioned preventive measures, must thoroughly assess the specific situation in every case, must investigate all significant circumstances, must find out whether it is possible to achieve the same objectives without interfering with freedom of movement of a person, the right to freely choose the place of residence in Lithuania, and the right to leave Lithuania freely, without limiting freedom of movement of a person more than necessary in order to achieve the said socially important and constitutionally justifiable objective.

The right of a citizen to move freely; the right of a citizen to return to Lithuania; the right of everyone who is Lithuanian to settle in Lithuania (Article 32 of Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 11 January 2019

... Article 32 of the Constitution ... prescribes:

“Citizens may move and choose their place of residence in Lithuania freely and may leave Lithuania freely.

These rights may not be restricted otherwise than by law when this is necessary for the protection of the security of the State or the health of people, or for the administration of justice.

Citizens may not be prohibited from returning to Lithuania.

Everyone who is Lithuanian may settle in Lithuania.”

Thus, Paragraph 1 of Article 32 of the Constitution consolidates the right of every citizen of the Republic of Lithuania to move freely, inter alia, to choose his/her place of residence in Lithuania or to leave Lithuania; Paragraph 3 of this article consolidates the right of a citizen to return to Lithuania; and Paragraph 4 enshrines the right of everyone who is Lithuanian to settle in Lithuania.

As noted by the Constitutional Court, freedom of movement guaranteed to a citizen is a significant element of the constitutional status of a member of a civil community; the provisions of Article 32 of the Constitution mean that it is only a citizen himself/herself who has the right to decide in which place of the territory of the Republic of Lithuania to stay, when to leave this place and move to another place, to freely decide as to which permanent or temporary place of residence to choose, and to decide whether to stay in or leave Lithuania, as well as the right to choose himself/herself the time of departure (rulings of 29 December 2004 and 6 February 2015).

The rights and freedoms consolidated in Paragraph 1 of Article 32 of the Constitution are guaranteed both for citizens of the Republic of Lithuania and for other persons who legally reside in Lithuania in cases where their legal status does not imply a different implementation of these rights and freedoms (ruling of 29 December 2004).

Freedom of movement, the right to choose the place of residence in Lithuania, as well as the right to leave Lithuania freely, which are consolidated in Article 32 of the Constitution, are not absolute. Under Paragraph 2 of Article 32 of the Constitution, these rights may be subject to restrictions; however, this may be done only by means of a law and only where this is necessary for the protection of national security or human health; they may also be subject to restrictions where this is necessary for administering justice (ruling of 29 December 2004).

It should be noted that the wording “Citizens may not be prohibited from returning to Lithuania” of Paragraph 3 of Article 32 of the Constitution makes it clear that the right of a citizen of the Republic of Lithuania to return to and reside in Lithuania is absolute. As held by the Constitutional Court in its conclusion of 24 January 1995, under Paragraph 3 of Article 32 of the Constitution, the presence of a citizen in his/her country is always lawful. Meanwhile, the conditions for the lawfulness of entry into, departure from, and presence in the country by foreign nationals or stateless persons are prescribed in the domestic law (conclusion of 24 January 1995).

As mentioned before, Paragraph 4 of Article 32 of the Constitution consolidates the right of everyone who is Lithuanian to settle in Lithuania. In view of the fact that Paragraph 3 of Article 32 of the Constitution consolidates the right of every citizen of the Republic of Lithuania to return to and reside in Lithuania, it should be held that Paragraph 4 of the same article enshrines the right of everyone who is Lithuanian, but is not a citizen of the Republic of Lithuania, to settle in Lithuania.

In its ruling of 13 November 2006, when interpreting Paragraph 4 of Article 32 of the Constitution, the Constitutional Court noted that all Lithuanians who reside abroad, wherever their permanent residence, have the right to return to Lithuania, their ethnical homeland, at any time. In the same ruling, the Constitutional Court also emphasised that, under the Constitution, it is not allowed to establish any such a legal regulation that would cut off Lithuanians living abroad from the Lithuanian nation; Lithuanians who reside abroad may not be deprived of the possibility of participating in the life of the Lithuanian nation if they so request; Lithuanians residing abroad are an inseparable part of the Lithuanian nation.

However, it should be noted that the wording “Everyone who is Lithuanian may settle in Lithuania” of Paragraph 4 of Article 32 of the Constitution differs from the wording “Citizens may not be prohibited from returning to Lithuania” of Paragraph 3 of the same article, which, as mentioned before, implies the absolute right of a citizen of the Republic of Lithuania to return to Lithuania and reside there. In this regard, it should be held that the provision of Paragraph 4 of Article 32 of the Constitution implies the right of every Lithuanian who is not a citizen of the Republic of Lithuania to enter Lithuania and settle there; however, this right is not absolute and may be limited for reasons of national or public security, public order, the protection of human health, or for similar constitutionally important objectives. At the same time, this means that Paragraph 4 of Article 32 of the Constitution is a constitutional basis for establishing, by means of a law, such a legal regulation whereby Lithuanians who are not citizens of the Republic of Lithuania would have the right to come to Lithuania and settle there under different (easier) conditions compared with other foreign nationals or stateless persons.

It should be noted that the provisions of Article 32 of the Constitution, inter alia, Paragraph 1, which establishes the right of each citizen of the Republic of Lithuania to move freely, Paragraph 3, which provides for the absolute right of a citizen of the Republic of Lithuania to return to Lithuania and reside there, and Paragraph 4, which consolidates the right of everyone who is Lithuanian to settle in Lithuania, should be interpreted in conjunction with the provisions of Paragraphs 1 and 4 of Article 22 of the Constitution, which ... consolidate the right of a person to privacy, inter alia, the right to the protection of private and family life, also in conjunction with Article 29 of the Constitution, which ... lays down the principle of the equality of persons and the prohibition of discrimination, as well as with the provisions of Paragraphs 1 and 2 of Article 38 of the Constitution, under which ... the Constitution protects and defends all families that meet the constitutional concept of the family, which is based on the content of permanent or long-lasting relationships between family members.

Having regard to the above, it should be held that, under the Constitution, by means of the legal regulation related to freedom of movement of the citizens of the Republic of Lithuania and entry into the Republic of Lithuania for residence purposes by Lithuanians who are not citizens of the Republic of Lithuania, the legislature must create the favourable conditions for the non-national family members of a citizen of the Republic of Lithuania or of a non-national Lithuanian entering Lithuania for residence purposes to enter Lithuania and reside there together with the respective citizen of the Republic of Lithuania or non-national Lithuanian entering Lithuania for residence purposes.

At the same time, it should be emphasised that, under the Constitution, the right of the non-national family members of a citizen of the Republic of Lithuania and the non-national family members of a non-national Lithuanian entering Lithuania for residence purposes to enter Lithuania and reside there together with the respective citizen of the Republic of Lithuania or non-national Lithuanian entering Lithuania for residence purposes is not absolute. This right may be subject to restrictions where necessary in a democratic society for reasons of national or public security, public order, the protection of human health, or for similar constitutionally important objectives; it should be noted that such a legal regulation that would limit this right in the absence of a constitutionally important objective would create the preconditions for the violation of freedom of movement of a citizen of the Republic of Lithuania, consolidated in Article 32 of the Constitution, inter alia, the right of a citizen of the Republic of Lithuania to return to Lithuania and reside there, which is enshrined in Paragraph 3 of this article, as well as the right of everyone who is Lithuanian to settle in Lithuania, which is consolidated in Paragraph 4 of Article 32 of the Constitution.

The right to reunification for a family in the context of the free movement of persons within the EU and migration (Paragraphs 2 and 3 of Article 21, Paragraphs 1 and 4 of Article 22, Articles 29 and 32, and Paragraphs 1 and 2 of Article 38 of the Constitution and the Constitutional Act on Membership of the Republic of Lithuania in the European Union)

See 2.4. Economic, social, and cultural rights, 2.4.2. Social rights, 2.4.2.4. The duty of the state to ensure the protection of family, motherhood, fatherhood, and childhood, the ruling of 11 January 2019.

2.2.10. Freedom of association

The right to freely form societies, political parties, and associations (Article 35 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 21 December 2000

Article 35 of the Constitution prescribes:

“Citizens shall be guaranteed the right to freely form societies, political parties, and associations provided that the aims and activities thereof are not contrary to the Constitution and laws.

No one may be compelled to belong to any society, political party, or association.

The founding and activities of political parties and other political and public organisations shall be regulated by law.”

The constitutional right to freely form societies, political parties, or associations is manifold; its content is composed of the right to form societies, political parties, or associations, the right to join them and take part in their activities, as well as the right not to be a member of any societies, political parties, or associations and the right to leave such entities. Thus, the Constitution guarantees the right to decide of one's own free will whether to belong or not to belong to a certain society, political party, or association.

The concepts “society”, “political party”, and “association”, which are consolidated in Paragraphs 1 and 2 of Article 35 of the Constitution, as well as the expression “other political and public organisations”, which is consolidated in Paragraph 3 of the same article, express the diversity of entities that are founded on a voluntary basis in order to serve the needs of their members in the political, economic, cultural, or social areas and in other spheres of life. Attempting to implement their rights and interests in the political, economic, cultural, or social areas and in other spheres of life, individuals may form various entities provided that the aims and activities thereof do not conflict with the Constitution and laws.

It needs to be noted that the right to freely form societies, political parties, or associations, which is guaranteed in the Constitution, means that an individual either implements or does not implement this right of his/her own free will. Paragraph 2 of Article 35 of the Constitution expressis verbis stipulates that no one may be compelled to belong to any society, political party, or association. This is the constitutional guarantee protecting persons from belonging to any union against their will.

The free will of a person is a fundamental principle of his/her membership in various societies, political parties, or associations. This constitutional principle must be observed when the establishment and activities of all types of associations, as well as relationships connected with their membership, are regulated in legal acts, regardless of the legitimate objectives sought by these entities.

The right of the owners of premises in blocks of flats to form societies

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 21 December 2000

When establishing societies for the purpose of possessing and using common shared property, the owners of residential and non-residential premises in blocks of flats implement the constitutional right to organise in order to achieve a certain common objective. ... this constitutional right may be implemented only on the basis of the free will of individuals. Therefore, membership in societies of the owners of blocks of flats must be based on the voluntary principle. When the establishment, activities, and membership relationships of such societies are regulated by means of a law, it is necessary, as in the case of any other society, to observe the requirement, consolidated in Paragraph 2 of Article 35 of the Constitution, that no one, i.e. neither a natural person nor a formation of natural persons, may be compelled to belong to any society, political party, or association. Thus, in cases where part of the owners of premises in a block of flats decides to establish a society, the other owners may not automatically be regarded as members of such a society. Such forced membership in a society is impermissible.

While implementing his/her rights and exercising his/her freedoms, everyone must observe the Constitution and laws and must not restrict the rights and freedoms of other people (Article 28 of the Constitution). The unwillingness or refusal of individual owners to be members of an established society of the owners of a bloc of flat may not hinder other owners to establish such a society and implement the possession and use of common shared property through the said society. At the same time, it needs to be noted that the voluntary principle of membership in a society means that an owner has the right not to join such a society, i.e. not to relate himself/herself with the membership relationship in a society; however, in this case, such an owner of residential and non-residential premises in a bloc of flats remains a subject of other legal relationships linked with the implementation of the rights of common shared ownership.

Since ownership includes obligations, the owners of residential and non-residential premises in a block of flats (natural and legal persons alike) must fulfil the obligations arising out of the implementation of common shared ownership (pay the expenses connected with maintenance, repair, improvement, etc. of the objects of communal use of the house) irrespective of whether they are or are not members of a particular society. Disputes between a society and its members arising in connection with this may be decided under judicial procedure (Paragraph 1 of Article 30 of the Constitution).

Freedom of association (Article 35 of the Constitution)The Constitutional Court's ruling of 1 July 2004

Article 35 of the Constitution consolidates one of the fundamental rights of a citizen of a democratic state – the right to associate or freedom of association. The right to associate is one of the guarantees of civil and political action. ...

The associations provided for in the Constitution are based on voluntary membership; they are founded and operate in the interests of their members. The autonomy of the associations provided for in the Constitution with respect to state authority bodies and other state or municipal institutions, in other words, with respect to public power, is an essential element of the constitutional legal status of such entities. The said associations may efficiently operate as an important element of civil society, as well as be a form of self-expression of citizens of a democratic state and a guarantee of public activity, only on the condition that such associations are autonomous with respect to state authority bodies and other state and municipal institutions. The autonomy of the said entities with respect to public power implies, inter alia, their right to independently regulate their internal order in their own acts (articles of association, statutes, etc.) in accordance with laws.

[...]

The constitutional right to freely form associations is linked with the possibility of holding various positions in such entities; the said possibility is a derivative from the constitutional right to freely form associations. The procedure for taking up the said positions in associations is established not by the state, but by the acts regulating the internal order (articles of association, statutes, etc.) of the respective associations (which, as mentioned before, under the Constitution, are autonomous with respect to public power).

The right to freely form political parties (Paragraph 1 of Article 35 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 14 April 2006

The right of citizens, which is guaranteed by Paragraph 1 of Article 35 of the Constitution, to freely form, inter alia, political parties provided that the aims and activities thereof are not contrary to the Constitution and laws is one of the fundamental rights of a citizen of a democratic state. In its ruling of 21 December 2001, the Constitutional Court held that the content of the constitutionally guaranteed right to freely form political parties is composed of the right to form political parties and the right to join them and take part in their activities; the Constitution guarantees the right to decide of one's own free will whether to belong or not to belong to a certain political party; a person implements this constitutional right of one's own free will; this free will of a person is a fundamental principle of his/her membership in political parties.

The constitutional right of citizens to freely form, inter alia, political parties and political organisations (which, as mentioned before, includes the right of citizens to take part in the activities of political parties) is not absolute; it can be limited by means of a law, but to the extent not greater than allowed by the Constitution itself. In this context, it needs to be noted that, where limitations on the said constitutional right are established by means of a law, inter alia, where citizens are prohibited from participating in the activities of political parties, regard must be paid to the norms and principles of the Constitution, inter alia, the principle of the equality of the rights of persons, which is consolidated in Article 29 of the Constitution, as well as the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law.

The limitations and prohibitions on the constitutional right to freely form political parties and political organisations are established in the Constitution itself: Paragraph 2 of Article 113 of the Constitution provides that a judge may not participate in the activities of political parties and other political organisations; Article 141 of the Constitution states that persons performing actual military service or alternative service, as well as the officers of the national defence system, the police, and the interior, non-commissioned officers, re-enlistees, and other paid officials of paramilitary and security services who are not retired to the reserve may not take part in the activities of political parties and political organisations; the provision of Paragraph 3 of Article 118 of the Constitution, according to which, when performing their functions, prosecutors are independent and obey only the law, also implies the prohibition precluding prosecutors from being members of political parties and political organisations and from participating in their activities; under Paragraph 2 of Article 83 of the Constitution, a person elected the President of the Republic must suspend his/her activities in political parties and political organisations until the beginning of a new campaign for the election of the President of the Republic. In this context, it should also be mentioned that the right of citizens to freely form political parties, which is consolidated in Article 35 of the Constitution, may be temporarily limited after martial law is imposed or a state of emergency is declared (Article 145 of the Constitution).

The participation of political parties in elections

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 9 November 2010

Political parties belong to such a type of associations the aim and purpose of the establishment and activity of which are inseparable from striving for political power (ruling of 10 February 2005). Political parties implement this striving, inter alia, by participating in elections to representative political institutions.

Therefore, under the Constitution, no such legal regulation is allowed that could prevent political parties or candidates nominated or supported by political parties from participating in elections to representative political institutions. However, this requirement may not be interpreted as consolidating the exclusive right of political parties (their members or candidates supported by political parties) to participate in forming representative political institutions.

The constitutional concept of political organisations

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 11 May 2011

The Constitution consolidates the institutions of political parties and political organisations (Paragraph 3 of Article 35, Paragraph 2 of Article 44, Paragraph 2 of Article 83, Paragraph 2 of Article 113, Paragraph 1 of Article 114, and Article 141 of the Constitution). Political organisations may not be identified with political parties; the particularities of founding political organisations and their activities must be established in a law.

In its ruling of 9 November 2010, the Constitutional Court revealed some features of the constitutional institution of political organisations ...: when defining the concept of political organisations in a law, the legislature may provide for their variety, inter alia, for such political organisations that are founded in order to meet various socially important needs, to conduct activities that are useful for society and, at the same time, to raise certain political aspirations; in the course of consolidating the right of political organisations, inter alia, those founded in order that they could participate in elections, to present lists of candidates, it is necessary to establish certain special requirements, which must be complied with, as, for instance: such political organisations may be founded only by persons (certain number thereof) who have the active electoral right regarding elections to a concrete institution, etc.

Political parties as special participants in public political life; the powers of the legislature to regulate the financing of political parties (Paragraph 3 of Article 35 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 29 March 2012

... it ... needs to be noted that:

- the aims of founding political parties and of their activity are inseparable from the striving for public power and, thus, also from participation in elections to representative institutions of public power (ruling of 9 February 2007);

- the political striving is an essential feature of a party, which distinguishes a party from other collective subjects having the legal forms that are established in laws ...;

- under the Constitution, no such legal regulation is allowed that could prevent political parties or candidates nominated or supported by political parties from participating in elections of the members of the Seimas (ruling of 1 October 2008).

In this context, it needs to be noted that, under Paragraph 1 of Article 35 of the Constitution, whereby citizens are guaranteed the right to freely form societies, political parties, and associations (provided that the aims and activities thereof are not contrary to the Constitution and laws), political parties constitute one of the forms (expressis verbis indicated in the Constitution) of free unification of citizens.

It also needs to be noted that the direct consolidation of political parties in Articles 35, 44, 83, 113, 114, and 141 of the Constitution points to the specificity of their political striving, as well as the specificity of the implementation of that striving.

Thus, under the Constitution, inter alia, the striving for an open civil society, which is enshrined in the Preamble to the Constitution, and the right of citizens to freely form societies, political parties, or associations (provided that the aims and activities thereof are not contrary to the Constitution and laws), which is guaranteed by Paragraph 1 of Article 35 of the Constitution, political parties, as far as their striving for public power and constitutionally guaranteed participation in elections of the members of the Seimas are concerned, are singled out among all of the legal forms of collective subjects that may be established in laws; under the Constitution, political parties (provided that the aims and activities thereof are not contrary to the Constitution and laws) should be treated as special participants not only in the process of elections to institutions of public power, but also as special participants in public political life taking place in the period between election campaigns; the variety of, as well as competition among, such participants, i.e. the multi-party system, creates the preconditions for ensuring political pluralism.

In this context, it also needs to be noted that the legislature, under Paragraph 3 of Article 35 of the Constitution, must regulate, inter alia, the founding and activities of political parties. When doing this, the legislature, under the Constitution, inter alia, Paragraph 3 of Article 35 thereof, may establish, inter alia, the sources and ways of funding political parties, as well as the procedure for control over this funding.

It needs to be noted that the Constitution does not directly provide for any sources and ways of the funding, or any grounds for control over the funding, of election campaigns and their participants, inter alia, political parties; however, the principles related thereto accordingly arise from the Constitution, inter alia, from the striving for an open civil society, which is enshrined in the Preamble thereto, as well as from the specificity of the political striving of parties, which are consolidated directly (indicated expressis verbis) in Articles 35, 44, 83, 113, 114 and 141 thereof, and from the specificity of the implementation of the said striving.

Thus, under the Constitution, inter alia, Paragraph 3 of Article 35 thereof, when regulating the relationships connected with the founding and activities of political parties, the legislature may, at the same time, lay down such sources and ways of funding political parties (including, inter alia, the allocation of state budget funds to political parties) by means of which it is sought to ensure that the political parties whose candidates have received a significant approval (trust) from voters in the respective elections would have the possibility of strengthening that approval (trust) of voters by democratic and lawful means of implementing their political striving.

It needs to be noted that the legislature, when consolidating a model of the regulation of the relationships connected with the sources and ways of the funding and control over the funding of political parties, is bound by the Constitution, inter alia, by the striving for an open civil society, enshrined in the Preamble to the Constitution, i.e. the legislature is not permitted to create any preconditions for denying or distorting the nature of political parties as public (non-state) organisations, for exerting a negative influence on the free development of the multi-party system, or for disproportionately complicating the possibilities for the political parties not satisfying the conditions for the receipt of state budget funds to implement their political striving, nor may it lay down any legal regulation creating the preconditions for receiving public (state) funding by the parties that have committed such violations of laws that are assessed as substantial by the state institutions empowered to conduct control over the funding of a political campaign.

... it should also be noted that:

- the Constitution consolidates the principle of responsible governance (rulings of, inter alia, 1 July 2004 and 13 December 2004);
- the Constitution, inter alia, Paragraph 2 of Article 128 thereof, gives rise to the requirement that state-owned property must be used sparingly, not wasted, and managed rationally (rulings of 5 July 2007, 20 March 2008, and 22 December 2011).

Consequently, under the Constitution, the legislature may establish such a model of the regulation of the relationships connected with the sources and ways of funding political parties that entails the allocation of state budget funds (allocations) to those political parties whose candidates have received a significant approval (trust) from voters in the respective elections; however, such a legal regulation may create no possibilities of receiving such an amount of state budget funds (allocations) that would give rise to the preconditions for denying or distorting the nature of political parties as public (non-state) organisations, for exerting a negative influence on the free development of the multi-party system, for disproportionately complicating the possibilities for the political parties not satisfying the conditions for the receipt of the aforesaid funds to implement their political striving, or for violating the principle of responsible governance and that of the rational management of state-owned property.

[...]

Consequently, under the Constitution, the legislature, when regulating the relationships connected with the founding and activities of political parties, inter alia, the ways of funding thereof, may, inter alia, stipulate that not all founded and operating political parties, but only those whose candidates have received a certain (sufficient) approval from voters in elections to institutions of public power, may be granted the targeted state budget funds allocated to support political parties.

Legal persons as specific entities of legal relationships

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 4 May 2018

... in order to effectively implement constitutional rights and freedoms, inter alia, those provided for in Paragraph 1 of Article 35 and Paragraph 1 of Article 46 of the Constitution, it is allowed to set up entities of legal relationships (inter alia, associations, political parties, and economic operators) whose legal form is a legal person and whose objectives are related to the implementation of the interests of their founders in the political, economic, cultural, social, and other spheres of life. The specificity of the entities of legal relationships of such a legal form – legal persons – is revealed, inter alia, by the fact that, from the moment of their legal registration, they acquire legal capacity and have autonomous structures, and their rights and duties are implemented by single-person or collegial management bodies.

In order to reveal the content of the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law, it should be noted that the Constitutional Court has also held that the mission of the state is to ensure human rights and freedoms, as well as to guarantee the public interest (inter alia, the rulings of 30 December 2003, 13 December 2004, and 26 June 2017). ... the above-mentioned concept of a legal person and the public interest determine that information concerning the establishment of specific entities of legal relationships – legal persons (which are set up in order to effectively implement constitutional rights and freedoms, inter alia, those provided for in Paragraph 1 of Article 35 and Paragraph 1 of Article 46 of the Constitution, and the interests of their founders in the political, economic, cultural, social, and other spheres of life), inter alia, information concerning their legal registration, must be public. In this context, it should be noted that, as it has been held by the Constitutional Court, the public interest is dynamic and subject to change (rulings of 8 July 2005, 6 January 2011, and 12 April 2018).

In view of the above, it should be held that, under the Constitution, inter alia, the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law, the legislature, when regulating the establishment of legal persons and having regard to the requirements determined by the public interest, must stipulate that the registration of legal persons requires the provision of certain mandatory data; a domicile of a legal person may be among such data so that the management bodies of the legal person, who implement the rights and duties of the legal person, would be accessible for the persons concerned.

... the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law implies the requirement to ensure a balance among constitutional values: as the Constitutional Court has held on more than one occasion, in the event of a clash between the values protected by the Constitution, it is necessary to find solutions ensuring that none of these values will be denied or unreasonably limited; otherwise, the balance among the values protected by the Constitution, the constitutional imperative of an open and harmonious civil society, as well as the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law, would be violated (inter alia, the rulings of 23 October 2002 and 4 March 2003 and the conclusion of 19 December 2017); the public interest, as a common interest of the state, all society, or part of society, must be balanced with the autonomous interests of individuals, because not only the public interest, but also the rights of persons, are constitutional values; a fair balance must be ensured in this sphere (rulings of 21 September 2006 and 3 April 2015).

... under the Constitution, inter alia, the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law, when establishing a legal regulation governing the implementation of constitutional rights and freedoms, inter alia, those provided for in Paragraph 1 of Article 35 and Paragraph 1 of Article 46 of the Constitution, in the course of establishing legal persons, inter alia, when consolidating certain mandatory data that are determined by the public interest and are required to be specified when registering legal persons, the legislature must pay regard to the requirement to ensure a balance among constitutional values: the implementation of these rights and freedoms in the course of establishing legal persons must be reconciled with other constitutional values, inter alia, with the right of ownership, which is defended under Paragraphs 1 and 2 of Article 23 of the Constitution, among others, the right of an owner to perform any actions with regard to its property, with the exception of those prohibited by means of a law, as well as to use this property and determine its future in any way that does not violate the rights and freedoms of other persons.

The legal regulation governing the funding of political parties

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 7 June 2019

... under the Constitution, inter alia, Paragraph 3 of Article 35 and Paragraph 2 of Article 128 thereof, and the constitutional principles of a state under the rule of law, the protection of legitimate expectations, justice, and responsible governance, in regulating the relationships connected with the founding and activities of political parties, inter alia, in establishing the sources and ways of funding political parties, as well as the procedure for control over this funding, the legislature has broad discretion; the legislature, inter alia, may choose state budget funds as a source of funding the political parties whose candidates have received significant approval (trust) from voters in the respective elections.

... once the legislature has chosen state budget funds as a source of funding political parties, the Constitution, inter alia, Paragraph 3 of Article 35 and Paragraph 2 of Article 128 thereof, and the constitutional principles of a state under the rule of law, the protection of legitimate expectations, justice, and responsible governance give rise to the duty of the legislature to establish such a model of regulating the relationships connected with this chosen source of funding political parties that ensures the proper, transparent, and public allocation of state budget funds to political parties according to the procedure established by means of a law, inter alia, according to the clear and objective criteria and/or conditions and other essential elements (including time limits) of the allocation of state budget funds to political parties, so as to ensure, among others, the transparency and objectivity of this process and provide the state institutions authorised to allocate state budget funds with no possibilities for the abuse of the powers conferred on them or for the allocation of state budget funds in an unfair and non-transparent manner, thus in violation of the principles of responsible governance and the rational management of state property. The legislature may not establish such a legal regulation that would create the preconditions for receiving public (state) funds by political parties if they have committed such violations of laws that have been assessed as essential (gross) by the state institutions authorised to exercise control over the funding of a political campaign; the legislature also may not establish a legal regulation consolidating such conditions for allocating state budget funds to political parties that would disproportionately complicate their possibilities of implementing their political striving or would have a negative influence on the free development of the multi-party system.

Freedom of association (Article 35 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 11 July 2019

Paragraph 1 of Article 35 of the Constitution prescribes that citizens are guaranteed the right to freely form societies, political parties, or associations provided that the aims and activities thereof are not contrary to the Constitution and laws. Under Paragraph 3 of the same article, the founding and activities of political parties and other political and public organisations are regulated by law.

In its ruling of 1 July 2004, the Constitutional Court held that Article 35 of the Constitution consolidates one of the fundamental rights of a citizen of a democratic state – the right to associate or freedom of association.

Interpreting Paragraph 1 of Article 35 of the Constitution, the Constitutional Court has held that the constitutional right to freely form societies, political parties, or associations is manifold; its content is composed of the right to establish societies, political parties, or associations, as well as of the right to join them and take part in their activities (inter alia, the rulings of 21 December 2000, 1 July 2004, and 4 May 2018); the Constitution guarantees the right to decide of one's own free will whether or not to belong to a certain society, political party, or association (ruling of 21 December 2000); the concepts "society", "political party", and "association" express the diversity of entities established on a voluntary basis to serve the needs of their members in the political, economic, cultural, social, and other areas of life (rulings of 21 December 2000, 1 July 2004, and 4 May 2018).

In its ruling of 1 July 2004, the Constitutional Court held that the associations provided for under the Constitution are based on voluntary membership; they are founded and operate in the interests of their members; an essential element of the constitutional legal status of the constitutionally envisaged associations is their autonomy with respect to state authorities and other state or municipal institutions – in other words, with respect to public power.

It should be noted at the same time that the constitutional right of citizens to freely form, inter alia, associations is not absolute; it may be limited by means of a law, but to the extent not greater than allowed by the Constitution itself (ruling of 14 April 2006). The Constitutional Court has held in its rulings on more than one occasion that, under the Constitution, it is allowed to limit the exercise of the rights and freedoms of a person if the following conditions are observed: the limitations are established by means of a law; the limitations are necessary in a democratic society in order to protect the rights and freedoms of other persons, the values consolidated in the Constitution, and the constitutionally important objectives; the limitations do not deny the nature and essence of rights and freedoms; and the constitutional principle of proportionality is followed (inter alia, the rulings of 26 January 2004, 9 May 2014, and 18 April 2019), under which the measures established by legal acts and put into application must be proportionate to the objective pursued, and the rights of a person may not be limited more than necessary in order to reach a legitimate, universally significant, and constitutionally justifiable objective (inter alia, the rulings of 5 July 2007, 9 June 2011, and 16 June 2015).

As the Constitutional Court held in its decision of 10 February 2005, freedom of societies, political parties, and associations, as consolidated in the Constitution, implies that all these entities may, while following laws, independently regulate their internal order in their own acts (articles of association, statutes, etc.).

... the elements of the content of freedom of association as consolidated in Article 35 of the Constitution – the rights to establish associations and take part in their activities – are to be interpreted as embracing, among others, the right of persons united under an association to define and carry out the activities of the association in such a way that serves their interests, inter alia, without interference from state authorities and other state and municipal institutions, provided that the aims and activities of the association are not contrary to the Constitution and laws. This means, among other things, that, under the Constitution, inter alia, Paragraph 1 of Article 35 thereof, the founders of associations, while establishing an association that will be operating in their interests, as well as members of the already established associations, while regulating and carrying out the activities of the association operating in their interests, may, inter alia, independently decide on granting membership to new members and establish the procedure for granting membership of the association to these members.

On the other hand ... this right of members of an association is not absolute under the Constitution, i.e. it can be limited by means of a law provided that the conditions stemming from the Constitution in relation to limiting the exercise of the rights and freedoms of persons are observed. Freedom of association, as consolidated in Paragraph 1 of Article 35 of the Constitution, would be violated if the right of members of an association to decide on granting membership of the association were limited, inter alia, in the absence of a legitimate, universally significant, and constitutionally justifiable objective, or if this right were limited more than necessary in order to reach such an objective.

2.2.11. Freedom of assembly

Freedom of assembly (Article 36 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 7 January 2000

Article 36 of the Constitution prescribes:

“Citizens may not be prohibited or hindered from assembling unarmed in peaceful meetings.

This right may not be limited otherwise than by law and only when this is necessary to protect the security of the State or society, public order, the health or morals of people, or the rights or freedoms of other persons.”

The constitutional consolidation of the right of assembly means that this right is treated as one of fundamental human rights and values in a democratic society and that it is an inseparable element of the democratic system. It is an important condition of the implementation of the striving for an open, just, and harmonious civil society and a state under the rule of law.

The right of assembly is the subjective right of citizens to participate in peaceful gatherings and to freely express their opinion and views; this right ensures the expression of the political activity of individuals in society and the state.

The Constitution is an integral act (Paragraph 1 of Article 6 of the Constitution); therefore, freedom of assembly should be treated not only as a democratic value to be taken for granted, but also as an important guarantee so that various constitutional rights and freedoms would be implemented in a fully fledged manner: the right of citizens to participate in the governance of their state (Paragraph 1 of Article 33 of the Constitution); the right of citizens to criticise the work of state institutions or their officials (Paragraph 2 of Article 33 of the Constitution); the right of everyone to have their own convictions and freely express them (Paragraph 1 of Article 25 of the Constitution); the right of everyone to seek, receive, or impart information or ideas (Paragraph 2 of Article 25 of the Constitution); the right of citizens to freely form societies, political parties, or associations (Paragraph 1 of Article 35 of the Constitution), etc. Thus, assembling in meetings is one of the ways of civil and political action.

Article 36 of the Constitution not only consolidates the right of citizens to assemble unarmed in peaceful meetings, but also formulates the grounds for a legal regulation governing the implementation of freedom of assembly; the same article guarantees the possibility of implementing this freedom without violating other values enshrined in the Constitution. This implies certain rights and duties of the subjects of the legal relationships linked with the arrangement and conduct of meetings – the organisers of meetings and the institutions and officials adopting decisions concerning the coordinated place, time, and form of a meeting.

On the one hand, the organisers of meetings may freely choose the place, time, purpose, and manner of meetings. If these rights were absent, freedom of assembly as such would lose its sense. At the same time, the organisers of meetings must take measures so that a meeting, as provided for in Paragraph 2 of Article 36 of the Constitution, would not undermine the security of the state or society, public order, the health or morals of people, or the rights or freedoms of other persons.

In their turn, the institution or official adopting decisions concerning the coordinated place, time, and form of a meeting must ascertain whether the meeting will not undermine the security of the state or society, public order, the health or morals of people, or the rights or freedoms of other persons. Coordinating the place of a meeting, the said institution or official must also assess whether the place in question is proper in order that the security of participants of the meeting would be ensured.

[...]

Regulating the implementation of the right of citizens, consolidated in Article 36 of the Constitution, to assemble only in unarmed and only in peaceful meetings, the legislature has discretion to establish the procedure for implementing this right; however, it may not deny the essence of freedom of assembly itself. The Constitutional Court notes that interference by the state with the exercise of freedom of assembly, as well as with the exercise of other rights and freedoms of individuals and citizens, is deemed to be lawful and necessary only in cases where the principle of proportionality between a particular limitation and the sought legitimate objective is observed. In all cases, a balance must be maintained between the rights of persons and the public interest. ...

Paragraph 2 of Article 36 of the Constitution provides that the right of citizens to assemble unarmed in peaceful meetings may not be limited otherwise than by law and only when this is necessary to protect the security of the state or society, public order, the health or morals of people, or the rights or freedoms of other persons. Thus, when establishing the procedure for implementing freedom of assembly, [the law] may define the limits of implementing this freedom: it may contain particularised requirements for the place, time, and form of meetings and it may stipulate what meetings are prohibited.

The requirements, established in the law, for the place, time, and form of meetings may not deny the provision of Paragraph 2 of Article 36 of the Constitution, by which the right to unarmed peaceful meetings may not be limited otherwise than by law and only when this is necessary to protect the security of the state or society, public order, the health or morals of people, or the rights or freedoms of other persons. Similarly, when stipulating what meetings are prohibited, the legislature may not overstep the limits of implementing freedom of assembly as defined in Paragraph 2 of Article 36 of the Constitution. The list of prohibited meetings contained in [the law] must be exhaustive and may not be interpreted in an expansive manner. It is permitted to allow arranging such meetings that are not directly prohibited in [the law] provided that such meetings comply with the requirements for their place ... and their time ... as established in [the law].

2.3. POLITICAL RIGHTS AND FREEDOMS

2.3.1. The right of citizens to participate in the governance of their state

The right of citizens to directly participate in the governance of their state (Article 33 of the Constitution) (for more on referendums, see 2.3.2. The right to a referendum)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 22 July 1994

The Constitution provides that sovereignty belongs to the Nation (Article 2). Citizens have the right to participate in the governance of their state both directly and through their freely elected representatives (Article 33). The direct participation of citizens in the governance of their state is a very important expression of their supreme sovereign power; therefore, a referendum must be a testimony to the actual will of the Nation.

The right of citizens to participate in the governance of their state (Paragraph 1 of Article 33 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 1 October 2008

Article 2 of the Constitution states that sovereignty belongs to the Nation. The Nation executes its supreme sovereign power either directly or through its democratically elected representatives (Article 4 of the Constitution). Paragraph 1 of Article 33 of the Constitution, inter alia, stipulates that citizens have the right to participate in the governance of their state both directly and through their democratically elected representatives. One of the fundamental characteristics of a democratic state is democratic elections to representative institutions of state power. It is through elections that every citizen implements his/her right to participate, together with other citizens, in the governance of his/her country (conclusion of 23 November 1996) and in the formation of the Seimas – the representation of the Nation.

The right of citizens to participate in the governance of their state through their democratically elected representatives (Paragraph 1 of Article 33 of the Constitution) (for more on the electoral rights, see 2.3.3. The electoral rights)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 17 November 2011

Elections ... are a political process. The electoral rights (both active and passive ones) are closely related to the right of citizens of the Republic of Lithuania, consolidated in Article 33 of the Constitution, to participate in the governance of their state (ruling of 9 February 2007), which is implemented, inter alia, by participating in forming political representative institutions (ruling of 11 May 2011).

[...]

... to ensure the right of citizens to participate in the governance of their state, as consolidated in Paragraph 1 of Article 33 of the Constitution, inter alia, through democratically elected representatives, the legislature must create the preconditions for reflecting the will of voters, inter alia, the preconditions for ensuring the transparency of the electoral process and fair competition among subjects exercising their passive electoral right, as well as the publicity of information important to voters regarding those subjects.

2.3.2. The right to a referendum

Referendum ballot-papers must be printed only in the state language*The Constitutional Court's ruling of 10 May 2006*

Making the decisions of national importance, inter alia, when citizens of the Republic of Lithuania vote in referendums, during which, as established in Paragraph 1 of Article 9 of the Constitution, the most significant issues concerning the life of the State and the Nation are decided, is an exceptional sphere of the use of the state language. The knowledge of the state language is also a precondition for implementing the constitutional right of every citizen of the Republic of Lithuania to vote in referendums. The Constitution does not imply that citizens who do not know the state language must be provided with or can be provided with any special or facilitated conditions for participating in the governance of their country, inter alia, that such citizens must, in some way, be additionally or artificially encouraged to participate in referendums or other votes in which the decisions of national importance are made.

Due to this, referendum ballot-papers must be printed only in the state language. Otherwise, the constitutional concept of the state language, which presupposes precisely the use of the state language when making the decisions of national importance, would be ignored; in addition, the imperative of civic consciousness, which stems from the Constitution, and the concept of the national community – the civil Nation, which is established in the Constitution, would be deviated from.

Moreover, it is generally recognised that, in referendum ballot-papers, no matter on what issue the referendum is conducted, questions must be formulated in the manner ensuring that they would be understandable to every voter. ... it should be noted that, as regards the linguistic expression, these questions are not complicated or confusing and do not require voters to possess any special language knowledge. During referendums, voters are presented a certain question, which, from the linguistic point of view, is neither complicated nor confusingly formulated and must be answered only by “yes” or “no”. If there is more than one question, each question in a referendum ballot-paper must be formulated separately and every question must be answered separately. It is very doubtful whether a citizen who does not understand a question (questions) that is (are) formulated in such a simple way, notably because he/she does not know the state language, has enough information about the public life in the Republic of Lithuania so that he/she could make a rational decision how to answer a referendum question; in fact, most probably it would be impossible to argue that such a citizen (maybe with certain exceptions) is capable of understanding the goals of the Nation and is ready to take responsibility for the present and future of the State of Lithuania. Encouraging such citizens artificially or additionally so that they would participate in referendums or other votes during which the decisions of national importance are made (also creating possibilities for them to express their will not in the state language (which they do not know) during a referendum) would be, to a certain extent, equivalent to entrusting decision making on the respective issues of national significance to people who, as mentioned before, are not sufficiently integrated into the society of Lithuania, who are not fully fledged members of the national community – the civil Nation, who do not try to become such members, and who lack civic consciousness.

The constitutional imperative prescribing that it is not permitted to put to a referendum any such possible decisions that would not comply with the requirements of the Constitution*The Constitutional Court's ruling of 11 July 2014*

... in its ruling of 1 December 1994, the Constitutional Court held that the norms of the Constitution are equally binding on all legal subjects, including initiative groups for referendums and groups of citizens of any size. In its ruling of 22 July 1994, the Constitutional Court noted that the Seimas, as well as other participants of the legislation process, while drafting and adopting legal acts, must bring them in line with the Constitution; this is one of the main measures ensuring the constitutional order and one of the fundamental principles of a state under the rule of law; this rule must equally be observed by any group of citizens expressing an initiative to call a referendum; a draft law or the draft provisions of a law proposed to be put to a referendum must be brought in line with the Constitution.

... the Constitution is also binding on the national community – the civil Nation itself. In the context of the constitutional justice case at issue, it should be noted that all other legal subjects, inter alia, law-making subjects, institutions organising elections (referendums), initiative groups for referendums, as well as other groups of citizens, are equally bound by the Constitution and must observe and not violate the Constitution. In addition, it should be noted that the principle of the supremacy of the Constitution, inter alia, gives rise to the imperative that it is not permitted to put to a referendum any such possible decisions that would not comply with the requirements of the Constitution.

The most significant issues concerning the life of the State and the Nation are decided by referendum (Article 9 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 11 July 2014

According to Paragraph 1 of Article 9 of the Constitution, the most significant issues concerning the life of the State and the Nation are decided by referendum. Thus, under the Constitution, inter alia, issues that are important for the life of only some municipalities or some territorial or other communities of citizens may not be decided by referendum.

The most significant issues concerning the life of the State and the Nation are, first of all, the issues of altering the provisions of the Constitution, which, under the Constitution, may be decided only by referendum:

- under Paragraph 1 of Article 148 of the Constitution, the provision “The State of Lithuania shall be an independent democratic republic” of Article 1 of the Constitution may be altered only by referendum if not less than 3/4 of the citizens of Lithuania with the electoral right vote in favour thereof; it should be noted that only the same procedure may be applied to altering the provision “The State of Lithuania shall be an independent democratic republic” of Article 1 of the Constitutional Law on the State of Lithuania, which is a constituent part of the Constitution (Article 2 of the Constitutional Law on the State of Lithuania);

- the same procedure, as provided for in Article 2 of the Constitutional Law on the State of Lithuania, may be applied to altering the provisions of the Constitutional Act on the Non-Alignment of the Republic of Lithuania to Post-Soviet Eastern Unions, which is a constituent part of the Constitution (ruling of 24 January 2014), i.e. these provisions may be altered only in the case where “not less than three-fourths of the citizens of Lithuania with the active electoral right vote in favour”; as the Constitutional Court noted in its ruling of 24 January 2014, under the Constitution, the provisions of the Constitutional Act on the Non-Alignment of the Republic of Lithuania to Post-Soviet Eastern Unions should have the same protection as the provision “The State of Lithuania shall be an independent democratic republic”, which is consolidated in Article 1 of the Constitution and Article 1 of the Constitutional Law on the State of Lithuania;

- under Paragraph 2 of Article 148 of the Constitution, the provisions of the First Chapter “The State of Lithuania” and those of the Fourteenth Chapter “The Alteration of the Constitution” of the Constitution may be altered only by referendum;

- the provisions of Articles 1 and 2 of the Constitutional Act on Membership of the Republic of Lithuania in the European Union, which is a constituent part of the Constitution, may be altered only by referendum. As the Constitutional Court noted in its ruling of 24 January 2014, the Constitutional Act on Membership of the Republic of Lithuania in the European Union, inter alia, lays down the constitutional grounds for membership of the Republic of Lithuania in the European Union. If these constitutional grounds were not consolidated in the Constitution, the Republic of Lithuania would not be able to be a full member of the European Union: “The Republic of Lithuania as a Member State of the European Union shall share with or confer on the European Union the competences of its state institutions in the areas provided for in the founding Treaties of the European Union and to the extent it would, together with the other Member States of the European Union, jointly meet its membership commitments in those areas, as well as enjoy membership rights” (Article 1); “The norms of European Union law shall be a constituent part of the legal system of the Republic of Lithuania. Where it concerns the founding Treaties of the European Union, the norms of European Union law shall be applied directly, while in the event of the collision of legal norms, they shall have supremacy over the laws and other legal acts of the Republic of Lithuania” (Article 2); these constitutional grounds for membership of the Republic of Lithuania in the European Union were consolidated in the Constitution so as to execute the will of the Nation that the Republic of Lithuania would be a member of the European Union; the aforesaid grounds themselves and the expression of the sovereign will of the Nation, as the source of these grounds, determine the requirement that the provisions of Articles 1 and 2 of the Constitutional Act on Membership of the Republic of Lithuania in the European Union may be altered or annulled only by referendum.

Under Paragraph 2 of Article 9 of the Constitution, the Seimas may call a referendum in the cases provided for in a law. Thus, in addition to those established in the Constitution, a law may provide for other most significant issues concerning the life of the State and the Nation that must be decided by referendum. It should be noted that, when establishing the list of such most significant issues concerning the life of the State and the Nation, the legislature is bound by the imperative, stemming from Paragraph 1 of Article 9 of the Constitution, that, under the Constitution, not all issues, but only the most significant issues concerning the life of the State and the Nation, must be decided by referendum and that issues generally not concerning the life of the State and the Nation may not be decided by referendum.

It should be noted that, in addition to those established in the Constitution or the law, there may be other most significant issues concerning the life of the State and the Nation that must be decided by referendum.

Under Paragraph 3 of Article 9 of the Constitution, a referendum is also called if not less than 300 000 citizens with the electoral right so request. The number of 300 000 citizens with the electoral right, who request that a particular issue be decided by referendum, shows that such an issue should be considered to be one of the most significant issues concerning the life of the State and the Nation. Thus, under the Constitution, the significance of a particular issue may also be determined by the fact that, as provided for by law, not less than 300 000 citizens with the electoral right request that it be decided by referendum: the most significant issues concerning the life of the State and the Nation, which must be decided by referendum, should also include such an issue that would be requested to be decided by referendum by not less than 300 000 citizens with the electoral right, although neither the Constitution nor any other law would indicate that this issue must be decided by referendum.

Under Article 4 of the Constitution, the Nation executes its supreme sovereign power, inter alia, through its democratically elected representatives; Item 3 of Article 67 of the Constitution stipulates that the Seimas adopts resolutions on referendums. It has been mentioned that, under the Constitution, only the Seimas is the representation of the Nation, through which the Nation executes its supreme sovereign power.

When interpreting the aforementioned provisions of the Constitution, it should be noted that, under the Constitution, the significance of a certain issue may also be determined by the fact that it is being put to a referendum by the Seimas, as the representation of the Nation: the most significant issues concerning the life of the State and the Nation, which must be decided by referendum, should also include such an issue that would be put to a referendum by the Seimas, as the representation of the Nation, although neither the Constitution nor any other law would indicate that this issue must be decided by referendum. It should be noted that, when a referendum is called by the Seimas on its own initiative, regard must be paid to the aforementioned imperative, stemming from Paragraph 1 of Article 9 of the Constitution, that, under the Constitution, issues generally not concerning the life of the State and the Nation may not be decided by referendum.

Adopting laws by referendum (Paragraph 4 of Article 69 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 11 July 2014

... under Paragraph 4 of Article 69 of the Constitution, the provisions of laws of the Republic of Lithuania may also be adopted by referendum.

Thus, the Seimas may, on its own initiative or at the request of not less than 300 000 citizens with the electoral right, call a referendum on the adoption of the provisions of a law (laws) that regulate a certain most significant issue concerning the life of the State and the Nation.

In this context, it should be noted that, under the Constitution, certain laws may not be adopted by referendum as, for instance:

- under Item 14 of Article 67 of the Constitution, the Seimas approves the state budget and supervises its execution; Article 130 of the Constitution provides that the Government draws up a draft state budget and presents it to the Seimas not later than 75 days before the end of the budget year; under Paragraph 1 of Article 131 of the Constitution, the draft state budget is considered by the Seimas and is approved by law before the start of the new budget year; as held in the Constitutional Court's ruling of 15 February 2013, the budgetary function of the Seimas is its classical function and it is one of the most important functions of the parliament of a democratic state under the rule of law;

- under Item 15 of Article 67 of the Constitution, the Seimas establishes state taxes and other compulsory payments; the Constitutional Court has held on more than one occasion that the Constitution consolidates the prerogative of the Seimas to establish taxes (rulings of 9 October 1998 and 15 March 2000, the decision of 20 September 2005, and the ruling of 16 December 2013), as well as that state taxes and other compulsory payments may be established only by the Seimas (rulings of 26 April 2001, 3 June 2002, and 17 November 2003);

- under Paragraph 3 of Article 69 of the Constitution, the Seimas establishes the list of constitutional laws by a 3/5 majority vote of the members of the Seimas; as held in the Constitutional Court's ruling of 1 December 1994, under the Constitution, the list of constitutional laws may be established only by the Seimas.

The constitutional imperative that preconditions must be created for determining the actual will of the Nation in a referendum (Articles 2 and 4 and Paragraph 1 of Article 9 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 11 July 2014

In its ruling of 22 July 1994, the Constitutional Court pointed out that the direct participation of citizens in the governance of their state is a very important expression of their supreme sovereign power; therefore, a referendum must be a testimony to the actual will of the Nation. In view of this fact, it should be noted that, where the most significant issues concerning the life of the State and the Nation are put to a referendum, they must be such issues regarding which it would be possible to determine the actual will of the Nation: inter alia, they must be formulated in a clear and not misleading manner. Thus, Paragraph 1 of Article 9 of the Constitution, when it is interpreted in conjunction with the provision of Article 2 of the Constitution that sovereignty belongs to the Nation and with the provision of Article 4 of the Constitution that the Nation executes its supreme sovereign power directly, gives rise to the imperative that preconditions must be created for determining the actual will of the Nation in a referendum.

Consequently, under the Constitution, several issues unrelated by their content and nature, or several unrelated amendments to the Constitution, or several unrelated provisions of laws may not be put to a vote in a referendum as a single issue. Acting otherwise would deny the possibility of determining the actual will of the Nation separately regarding each most significant issue concerning the life of the State and the Nation.

In this context, it should also be noted that, in cases where a referendum on certain most significant issues concerning the life of the State and the Nation is initiated pursuant to Paragraph 3 of Article 9 of the Constitution, under which a referendum is called if not less than 300 000 citizens with the electoral right so request, the approval of citizens for calling a referendum must be expressed separately regarding each issue being put to the referendum, i.e. a single signature may not be given in support of an initiative to call a referendum on several issues unrelated by their content and nature, or several unrelated amendments to the Constitution, or several unrelated provisions of laws. Otherwise, no possibility would be ensured for citizens to separately decide regarding their support for each initiative to call a referendum and it would be impossible to determine whether each of the aforementioned issues, which are unrelated by their content and nature, is indeed requested to be put to a referendum by the subject indicated in Paragraph 3 of Article 9 of the Constitution – not less than 300 000 citizens with the electoral right.

Thus, the Constitution, inter alia, Paragraphs 1 and 3 of Article 9 thereof, gives rise to the duty of the legislature to establish, by means of a law, the requirement that several issues unrelated by their content and nature, or several unrelated amendments to the Constitution, or several unrelated provisions of laws may not be put to a referendum as a single issue.

Requirements for the law governing the calling and conduct of referendums (Paragraph 4 of Article 9 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 11 July 2014

Under Paragraph 4 of Article 9 of the Constitution, the procedure for calling and conducting referendums is established by law. Thus, by paying regard to the Constitution, the legislature must, by means of a law, establish a regulation governing issues related to calling and conducting referendums, inter alia, the rights and duties of the participants of the relationships connected with the organisation of referendums.

It should be noted that, as held by the Constitutional Court in its ruling of 1 December 1994, relationships arising in connection with the organisation of referendums are continuous legal relationships; the statement that the announcement of an initiative to organise a referendum already implies the beginning of the referendum is not justified; the formation of an initiative group, the collection of the signatures of citizens for organising a referendum, the submission of documents, as well as their verification and consideration are only certain obligatory actions during the stage of organising a referendum.

Under Paragraph 3 of Article 9 of the Constitution, one of the subjects who may exercise the initiative to call a referendum is not less than 300 000 citizens with the electoral right; thus, under Paragraph 4 of Article 9 of the Constitution, the formation of this subject and the announcement of the initiative to call a referendum, inter alia, the requirements for the content and form of an issue proposed to be decided by referendum, the requirements for the formation and registration of an initiative group of citizens for a referendum, as well as the requirements for the collection of signatures in support of calling a referendum and their submission to the institution organising referendums, must be regulated by means of a law.

It should be noted that, under the Constitution, another subject who may exercise the initiative to call a referendum is the Seimas: as mentioned before, under Paragraph 2 of Article 9 of the Constitution, in the cases established by means of a law, the Seimas may call a referendum; Item 3 of Article 67 of the Constitution stipulates that the Seimas adopts resolutions on referendums.

A law, inter alia, must establish the powers of the institution organising referendums, including the powers to ensure that the Constitution and laws are observed in the course of organising referendums, as well as the powers to register an initiative group of citizens for a referendum, to review the compliance of an issue proposed to be decided by referendum with the requirements established in relation to its content and form, to verify the number of the signatures of citizens obtained in favour of calling a referendum, to submit the respective conclusions to the institution calling referendums – the Seimas, to organise the conduct of referendums, as well as to determine and announce referendum results.

In this context, it should be noted that, in its decision of 11 July 1994, interpreting the provision of Item 13 of Article 67 of the Constitution, according to which the Seimas “shall form the Central Electoral Commission and alter its composition”, and having held in this context that the Nation executes its supreme sovereign power through two main organisational forms – national elections and referendums, the Constitutional Court noted that, in Lithuania, it is necessary to form one universal institution organising elections – the Central Electoral Commission; it was also held that the constitutional provision on the Central Electoral Commission must be implemented through the consolidation of the mission of this commission based on the respective constitutional provisions, as well as the consolidation of the principles of its formation and its competence, exclusively by means of a law.

In view of the fact that a referendum, as well as an election, is a form of the direct execution of the supreme sovereign power of the Nation, where citizens declare their will through a national vote, also that the right to initiate a referendum and to vote in a referendum is granted only to citizens who have the electoral right, as well as that referendums are conducted according to the principles of electoral law, it should be held that, under the Constitution, referendums must be organised by the institution expressis verbis specified in the Constitution – the Central Electoral Commission. Thus, the constitutional status of the Central Electoral Commission implies its certain powers, inter alia, the powers to oversee and take measures that subjects participating in the organisation and conduct of a referendum observe the Constitution and the requirements stemming from laws.

Under the Constitution, the institution calling referendums is the Seimas: under Item 3 of Article 67 of the Constitution, only the Seimas “shall adopt resolutions on referendums”.

As mentioned before, under Paragraph 4 of Article 9 of the Constitution, the procedure for calling referendums must be established by law. It should be noted that the wording of Item 3 of Article 67 of the Constitution implies not only the powers of the Seimas to adopt a resolution on calling a referendum, but also its powers to adopt a resolution on refusing to call a referendum on the grounds provided for by means of a law. It should be emphasised that the grounds, stemming from the Constitution, for adopting a resolution on refusing to call a referendum must be established by means of a law.

... the Constitution is supreme law; the supreme sovereign power of the Nation may be executed, inter alia, directly (by referendum), only in observance of the Constitution; all legal subjects, inter alia, law-making subjects, the institutions organising elections (referendums), initiative groups for referendums, as well as other groups of citizens, are bound by the Constitution and must observe and not violate the Constitution.

Thus, it is necessary to establish, by means of a law, such a legal regulation governing the relationships connected with the organisation of referendums under which preconditions would be created for ensuring that all participants of these relationships observe and not violate the Constitution and that the actual will of the Nation is expressed once a referendum is conducted. In this context, it should be noted that the principle of responsible governance, as consolidated in the Constitution, implies that all state institutions and officials are obliged to follow the Constitution and law while performing their functions and must properly implement the powers granted to them by the Constitution and laws by acting in the interests of the Nation and the State of Lithuania (conclusions of 26 October 2012 and 10 November 2012 and the ruling of 27 May 2014).

In view of the foregoing ... under the Constitution, the legislature must, by means of a law, establish, inter alia, the following:

- the requirements for the content and form of an issue submitted to a referendum, inter alia: the requirement, stemming from the principle of the supremacy of the Constitution, that a decision proposed to be put to a referendum must comply with the requirements stemming from the Constitution; the requirements, stemming from the constitutional imperative under which preconditions must be created for determining the actual will of the Nation in a referendum, that only such issues must be submitted to a referendum regarding which it would be possible to determine the actual will of the Nation (issues must be formulated in a clear and not misleading manner; they may not include several issues unrelated by their content and nature, or several unrelated amendments to the Constitution, or several unrelated provisions of laws);

- the requirement, stemming from the constitutional principles of a state under the rule of law and the supremacy of the Constitution, that an initiative group of citizens for a referendum must bring a decision proposed to be put to the referendum in line with the Constitution;

- the powers of the institution organising referendums – the Central Electoral Commission, which stem from the constitutional principles of a state under the rule of law, the supremacy of the Constitution, and responsible governance, to ensure that the Constitution and laws are observed in the course of organising referendums, inter alia: to verify whether an issue proposed to be decided by referendum complies with the requirements established in relation to the content and form of such issues and to refuse to register an initiative group of citizens for a referendum if it fails to fulfil the duty to bring the decision proposed to be decided by referendum in line with the Constitution or if it proposes deciding by referendum an issue that does not meet other requirements established in relation to the content and form of such issues (inter alia, where an issue proposed to be decided by referendum is formulated in an unclear and misleading manner or where several issues unrelated by their content and nature are submitted as a single issue);

– the grounds, stemming from the Constitution, for the Seimas – the institution calling referendums – not to call a referendum. In this context, it should be noted that the constitutional principles of a state under the rule of law, the supremacy of the Constitution, and responsible governance give rise to the duty of the Seimas not to call a referendum where a decision proposed to be put to the referendum would not comply with the requirements stemming from the Constitution, inter alia, where an issue submitted to the referendum would be such regarding which it would be impossible to determine the actual will of the Nation (that issue would be unclear and misleading, or would include several issues unrelated by their content and nature, or several unrelated amendments to the Constitution, or several unrelated provisions of laws), or where the provisions of the law proposed to be put to the referendum would be in conflict with the Constitution, or where the proposed amendment to the Constitution would not comply with the requirements stemming from the Constitution.

[...]

... the legislature, when regulating the relationships connected with the organisation of referendums, must formulate legal norms in a clear and precise manner so that they would be understandable to the participants of the legal relationships connected with referendums. In this context, it should be noted that the requirement of legal certainty and clarity would be better complied with if [the law] explicitly [and not implicitly] established that the Central Electoral Commission is given the powers, stemming from the Constitution ... to assess whether a draft law proposed by citizens to be put to a referendum is in compliance with the Constitution, as well as that this commission is given the powers not to register, on the grounds of the said assessment, such an initiative group of citizens that proposes putting to a referendum a draft law not complying with the requirements stemming from the Constitution.

The duty of the Seimas not to call a referendum where a decision proposed to be put to the referendum does not comply with the requirements stemming from the Constitution

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 11 July 2014

... in its ruling of 22 July 1994, the Constitutional Court noted that the Constitution does not provide that the implementation of Article 9 of the Constitution, under which a referendum is called by the Seimas in cases provided for by law, as well as where a referendum is requested by not less than 300 000 citizens with the electoral right, may be bound by any additional conditions or by decisions of any subjects; Paragraph 1 of Article 3 of the Constitution stipulates that no one may restrict or limit the sovereignty of the Nation or arrogate to himself/herself the sovereign powers belonging to the entire Nation; the adoption of any preliminary decisions that are not provided for by the Constitution but determine the calling of a referendum would amount to the limitation of the supreme sovereign power of the Nation. It should be noted that ... in its ruling of 22 July 1994, the Constitutional Court did not consider the question whether the Constitution gives rise to any ground for the Seimas not to call a referendum where it is requested by not less than 300 000 citizens with the electoral right.

[...]

... the aforementioned statements from the Constitutional Court's ruling of 22 July 1994 may not be interpreted without taking account of other (both explicit and implicit) provisions of the Constitution that are related to the constitutional provisions during the interpretation of which the said statements were formulated, as well as of the entire official constitutional doctrinal context and the development of the official constitutional doctrine following the adoption of the ruling of 22 July 1994.

In this context, it should be noted that ... the principle of the supremacy of the Constitution is a fundamental requirement for a state under the rule of law; this principle means that the Constitution takes an exceptional, the highest, place in the hierarchy of legal acts; no legal act may be in conflict with the Constitution; no one is permitted to violate the Constitution; the constitutional order must be defended. ... all provisions of the Constitution should be interpreted in view of the principle of the supremacy of the Constitution; all legal acts and the decisions of all state and municipal institutions and officials must comply with and not contradict the Constitution; the discretion of all law-making entities is limited by supreme law – the Constitution.

... since the Constitution also binds the national community – the civil Nation itself, the requirement that the Constitution must be observed when the Nation, inter alia, directly (by referendum), executes its supreme sovereign power may not, under Article 3 of the Constitution, be assessed as a restriction or limitation on the sovereignty of the Nation or as the taking over of the sovereign powers belonging to the entire Nation; the purpose of the provisions of Article 3 of the Constitution is to protect the constitutional values referred to in this article (sovereignty of the Nation, as well as the independence, territorial integrity, and constitutional order of the State of Lithuania); therefore, these provisions may not be invoked for the purpose of denying the said constitutional values; the provisions of Article 3 of the Constitution may not be interpreted, inter alia, in such a way that, purportedly, they imply the right of the Nation to disregard the Constitution, which has been adopted by the Nation itself, or the right of any citizen or any group of citizens to equate themselves with the Nation and act on behalf of the Nation while seeking to violate the aforementioned constitutional values.

Consequently, the requirement that the Constitution be observed may not be regarded as an additional condition, which is not provided for in the Constitution, for calling a referendum, and which would be binding in the event of implementing Article 9 of the Constitution. It should be emphasised that the said requirement stems from the Constitution itself, inter alia, the principle of the supremacy of the Constitution, as consolidated in Paragraph 1 of Article 7 of the Constitution, and the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law. If the Constitution were interpreted in a different way, i.e. purportedly that the Seimas is obliged to call a referendum even where a decision proposed to be put to the referendum does not comply with the requirements stemming from the Constitution, preconditions would be created for the denial of constitutional principles and the Constitution itself, as supreme law and the legal foundation for the common life of the Nation.

As mentioned before, the Constitution equally binds the national community – the civil Nation itself; when the Constitution is interpreted, it is not allowed to create opposition between the direct (through a referendum) and indirect (through the representation of the Nation – the Seimas) forms of the execution of the supreme sovereign power of the Nation. Thus, it should also be emphasised that the duty of the Seimas, stemming from the Constitution, not to call a referendum where a decision proposed to be put to the referendum would not comply with the requirements stemming from the Constitution may not be regarded as the power of the Seimas to adopt a preliminary decision that is not provided for in the Constitution but determines the calling of a referendum, i.e. which limits the supreme sovereign power of the Nation. The provision “Sovereignty shall belong to the Nation” of Article 2 of the Constitution, the provision “The Nation shall execute its supreme sovereign power ... directly” of Article 4, as well as the provision “The most significant issues concerning the life of the State and the Nation shall be decided by referendum” of Article 9 of the Constitution, may not be interpreted only literally: these provisions do not mean that the Nation may, by referendum, establish, inter alia, in the Constitution, any legal regulation it requests, including a legal regulation not complying with the requirements stemming from the Constitution.

[...]

As mentioned before, Item 3 of Article 67 of the Constitution stipulates that the Seimas adopts resolutions on referendums. It has been mentioned that the wording of Item 3 of Article 67 of the Constitution implies not only the powers of the Seimas to adopt a resolution on calling a referendum, but also its powers to adopt a resolution on refusing to call a referendum on the grounds provided for by means of a law; the grounds provided for by means of a law for adopting a resolution on refusing to call a referendum must stem from the Constitution.

In this context, it should be noted that, under Item 3 of Article 67 of the Constitution, the Seimas is obliged to adopt a resolution both in the case where it decides to call a referendum, as well as in the case where it decides not to call a referendum. Under Paragraph 1 of Article 102 and Paragraph 1 of Article 105 of the Constitution, a resolution of the Seimas to call a referendum or not to call a referendum may be an object of constitutional review. Under Paragraph 1 of Article 106 of the Constitution, the Government, not less than 1/5 of all the members of the Seimas, and courts have the right to apply to the Constitutional Court concerning the aforesaid acts (resolutions to call or not to call a referendum) of the Seimas; systemically interpreting Paragraphs 1 and 4 of Article 106 of the Constitution, it should be noted that the right to apply to the Constitutional Court and request an investigation into the compliance of a resolution of the Seimas with the Constitution is also granted to the Seimas in corpore.

In this context, it should also be noted that, in interpreting Paragraph 1 of Article 102 of the Constitution in the context of the constitutional legal regulation, the Constitutional Court has held on more than one occasion that, under the Constitution, the Constitutional Court has the exclusive competence to investigate and decide, inter alia, whether any act (part thereof) adopted by referendum is in conflict with any higher-ranking act, inter alia (and, first of all), with the Constitution (rulings of 28 March 2006, 6 June 2006, 24 October 2007, and 13 May 2010).

The requirements stemming from the Constitution for the alteration of the Constitution by referendum (on the limitations on the alteration of the Constitution, see 1. The foundations of the constitutional order, 1.8. The foundations of lawmaking and of the application of law, 1.8.4. The hierarchy of legal acts, 1.8.4.2. The Constitution, 1.8.4.2.4. Amendments to the Constitution and the stability of the Constitution, the rulings of 24 January 2014 and 11 July 2014)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 11 July 2014

... the substantive limitations imposed on the alteration of the Constitution are equally applicable in the event of the alteration of the Constitution by referendum. It has been mentioned that the principle of the supremacy of the Constitution, inter alia, gives rise to the imperative according to which it is not permitted to put to a referendum any such possible decisions that would not comply with the requirements stemming from the Constitution. Thus, according to the Constitution, it is also not permitted to put to a referendum any such a draft amendment to the Constitution that disregards the substantive limitations set on the alteration of the Constitution. Otherwise, the preconditions would be created for denying the principle of the supremacy of the Constitution and for disregarding the imperative, stemming from Paragraph 1 of Article 6 of the Constitution, that no amendments to the Constitution may violate the harmony of the provisions of the Constitution and the harmony of the values consolidated in these provisions.

It has been mentioned that, under the Constitution, a law, inter alia, must establish the requirement, stemming from the constitutional principles of a state under the rule of law and the supremacy of the Constitution, that an initiative group of citizens for a referendum must bring a decision proposed to be put to the referendum in line with the Constitution. This requirement, inter alia, gives rise to the duty of an initiative group of citizens for a referendum to submit to the referendum only such draft amendments to the Constitution that would observe the substantive limitations, stemming from the Constitution, on the alteration of the Constitution.

It has been mentioned that, under the Constitution, a law, inter alia, must establish the powers of the institution organising referendums – the Central Electoral Commission, which derive from the constitutional principles of a state under the rule of law, the supremacy of the Constitution, and responsible governance, to review whether an issue proposed to be decided by referendum complies with the requirements set in relation to the content and form of such an issue and to refuse to register an initiative group of citizens for a referendum where such a group fails to fulfil the duty to bring a decision proposed to be put to the referendum in line with the Constitution. These powers, inter alia, imply the duty of the Central Electoral Commission not to register such an initiative group of citizens for a referendum that proposes putting to the referendum such a draft amendment to the Constitution that disregards the substantive limitations, stemming from the Constitution, on the alteration of the Constitution.

It has been mentioned that the constitutional principles of a state under the rule of law, the supremacy of the Constitution, and responsible governance give rise to the duty of the Seimas not to call a referendum where a decision proposed to be put to the referendum does not comply with the requirements stemming from the Constitution. Thus, under the Constitution, a law must lay down a ground for the institution calling referendums – the Seimas – not to call a referendum where a decision proposed to be put to the referendum would not comply with the requirements stemming from the Constitution. This ground, inter alia, also includes cases where a draft amendment submitted to a referendum disregards the substantive limitations, stemming from the Constitution, on the alteration of the Constitution.

The requirement that the same procedure for calling and conducting referendums be applied in deciding all the most significant issues concerning the life of the State and the Nation (Paragraph 1 of Article 9 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 15 February 2019

... under Paragraph 1 of Article 9 of the Constitution, irrespective of whether they are specified in the Constitution or a law as issues that must be decided by referendum, or whether, although they are not specified in the Constitution or a law, they are put to a referendum by 300 000 citizens with the electoral right or by the Seimas as the representation of the Nation, all [such] issues should be regarded as the most significant issues concerning the life of the State and the Nation; such issues are not differentiated in Paragraph 1 of Article 9 of the Constitution. Therefore, the Constitution, inter alia, Paragraph 1 of Article 9 thereof, gives rise to the requirement that the same procedure for calling and conducting referendums be applied in deciding all the most significant issues concerning the life of the State and the Nation, with the exception of the special requirements provided for in the Constitution with regard to adopting decisions on certain of the most significant issues concerning the life of the State and the Nation (e.g. under Paragraph 1 of Article 148 of the Constitution, in order to amend the provision “The State of Lithuania shall be an independent democratic republic” of Article 1 of the Constitution, it is required that not less than 3/4 of the citizens of Lithuania with the electoral right vote in favour thereof; under Article 2 of the Constitutional Law on the State of Lithuania, the provision “The State of Lithuania shall be an independent democratic republic” of Article 1 of this constitutional law may be amended by following the same procedure).

The democratic principles governing elections to political representative institutions (universal, equal, and direct suffrage, secret ballot, free and fair elections, a transparent and public electoral process) must be applied to calling and conducting referendums

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 15 February 2019

... Paragraph 1 of Article 9 of the Constitution does not expressis verbis set out the requirements how the most significant issues concerning the life of the State and the Nation must be decided by referendum.

However ... referendums, as well as elections, constitute a form of the direct execution of the supreme sovereign power of the Nation; national elections and referendums are based on the same constitutional grounds, inter alia, the sovereignty of the Nation, democracy, and the electoral rights, as laid down, inter alia, in Articles 2 and 4, Paragraph 1 of Article 33, and Article 34 of the Constitution. Thus, Paragraph 1 of Article 9 of the Constitution, interpreted in the context of the provisions of Articles 2 and 4, Paragraph 1 of Article 33, and Article 34 of the Constitution, gives rise to the imperative that the constitutionally consolidated democratic principles governing elections to political representative institutions (universal, equal, and direct suffrage, secret ballot, free and fair elections, a transparent and public electoral process) be mutatis mutandis applied to calling and conducting referendums. It should be noted that ... these principles stem, inter alia, from the imperatives implied by the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law and should be interpreted by taking into account these imperatives.

It needs to be emphasised that, arising from the Constitution, the above-mentioned imperative that the constitutionally consolidated democratic principles governing elections to political representative institutions be mutatis mutandis applied to calling and conducting referendums is not an objective in itself. As the Constitutional Court held in its ruling of 11 July 2014, Paragraph 1 of Article 9 of the Constitution, interpreted in conjunction with the provision of Article 2 of the Constitution that sovereignty belongs to the Nation and with the provision of Article 4 of the Constitution that the Nation executes its supreme sovereign power directly, gives rise to the imperative to create the preconditions for determining the actual will of the Nation in a referendum. Thus, compliance with the above-mentioned constitutionally consolidated democratic principles governing elections to political representative institutions is a conditio sine qua non in order to create the preconditions for determining the actual will of the Nation in a referendum.

Consequently, under Paragraph 1 of Article 9 of the Constitution, in exercising its powers, established in Paragraph 4 of this article, to regulate the procedure for calling and conducting referendums, the legislature is bound by the democratic principles governing elections to political representative institutions. Otherwise, if the provision of Paragraph 1 of Article 9 of the Constitution were interpreted only literally by applying solely the linguistic method of the interpretation of law, such an interpretation would deny the above-mentioned constitutional imperative to create the preconditions for determining the actual will of the Nation in a referendum.

In view of this, it should be noted that, under Paragraph 1 of Article 9 of the Constitution, conducting a referendum is subject, inter alia, to the principles of universal, equal, and direct suffrage.

Thus, under the Constitution, a referendum must be conducted on the basis, inter alia, of universal suffrage, i.e. by creating the preconditions for the participation in a referendum of all citizens with an active electoral right under Article 34 of the Constitution (i.e. those who, on the day of the referendum, have reached 18 years of age and have not been declared by a court to be legally incapacitated).

Under the Constitution, a referendum must also be conducted on the basis of equal suffrage. With regard to the principle of equal suffrage, it is universally recognised that this principle, inter alia, means that, in the course of organising and conducting elections, all voters must be treated equally, as well as that the vote of each voter is equal to the vote of any other voter and has equal weight when the results of voting are established (ruling of 1 October 2008). Thus, as in the case of elections, all citizens who can participate in a referendum must be treated in the same way and as having equal votes.

Under the Constitution, a referendum must also be conducted by having regard to the principle of direct suffrage, which requires a vote without mediators in a referendum. Interpreting the content of this principle, the Constitutional Court has held that the legislature, while regulating electoral relationships, may not establish such a legal regulation that would create the preconditions for a different person to cast a vote for the voter (except where the voter is unable to implement such his/her constitutional right by himself/herself for health reasons) (conclusion of 5 November 2004). This requirement applies to the legal regulation governing the relationships connected with referendums.

It should be noted that, under Paragraph 1 of Article 9 of the Constitution, conducting a referendum is subject, inter alia, to the principle of secret ballot.

As held by the Constitutional Court in its ruling of 1 October 2008, according to the principle of secret ballot, such conditions for expressing the will of voters during voting must be created under which nobody could control voters, influence their choice, or otherwise impede the free and unrestricted expression of their will.

Under Paragraph 1 of Article 9 of the Constitution, conducting a referendum is mutatis mutandis subject, inter alia, to the principle of free and fair elections. It should be noted that this principle should be interpreted by taking into account, inter alia, the imperative of fairness, which is implied by the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law. As held by the Constitutional Court, under the Constitution, the subjects of legal relationships are under the duty to behave in good faith and without violating law; this is required by the general legal principle of bona fides, which is inseparable from the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law (rulings of 27 June 2007 and 6 September 2007).

Thus, under the Constitution, inter alia, Paragraph 1 of Article 9 thereof, and the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law, it is obligatory to ensure a fair referendum process, inter alia, the free expression of will by citizens. This, inter alia, means that it is obligatory to create the preconditions enabling citizens, freely and without being subjected to control, to form their opinion and express their will on the issue put to a referendum, as well as to create the equal opportunities to campaign for both proponents and opponents of the decision put to a referendum; the imperative of a fair referendum process also implies the following requirements: the institution organising referendums (Central Electoral Commission) must be impartial; the institution calling referendums (Seimas) may not influence the referendum results while exercising these powers; the institution calling referendums, the institution organising referendums, and other state institutions may not abuse the powers conferred on them.

As mentioned before, the Constitution, inter alia, Paragraph 1 of Article 9 thereof, gives rise to the requirement that the same procedure for calling and conducting referendums be applied in deciding all the most significant issues concerning the life of the State and the Nation, with the exception of the special requirements provided for in the Constitution with regard to adopting decisions on certain of the most significant issues concerning the life of the State and the Nation. It should be noted that this requirement also arises from the constitutional imperative of a fair referendum process, under which, while remaining as neutral as possible, state institutions may not, selectively by their decisions, encourage or, on the contrary, hinder decision making in a referendum on certain of the most significant issues concerning the life of the State and the Nation once such issues are put to a referendum.

Under Paragraph 1 of Article 9 of the Constitution, conducting a referendum is also subject, inter alia, to the principle of a transparent and public referendum process. It should be noted that this principle implies the requirement that the publicity of meaningful information about the referendum must be ensured where such information is significant to citizens, as well as the requirement that citizens must be properly informed about the decision put to the referendum and about the arguments of the proponents and opponents of the decision.

It should also be noted that the principle of a transparent and public referendum process should be interpreted in the light, inter alia, of the requirements implied by the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law, inter alia, the requirements for the implementation of the powers of state authorities and officials. The Constitutional Court has held that transparency, as a principle of the activity of public authorities and officials, implies, among other things, that decisions taken must be reasoned and clear (inter alia, the rulings of 22 January 2008, 2 March 2018, and 12 April 2018). In view of this, the principle of a transparent and public referendum process implies the requirement that the institution calling referendums and the institution organising referendums must take reasonable, clear, and public decisions in relation to calling and conducting referendums.

In this context, it should also be noted that the above-mentioned principles of a fair, transparent, and public referendum process should be interpreted in the light, inter alia, of the imperative (implied by the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law) of legal certainty and clarity for a legal regulation. As more than once held by the Constitutional Court, legal certainty and legal clarity are among the essential elements of the principle of a state under the rule of law, which is consolidated in the Constitution; a legal regulation must be clear and harmonious; legal norms must be formulated precisely and they may not contain ambiguities. It needs to be emphasised that, in the light of the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law and in order to create the preconditions for ensuring a fair and transparent referendum process, the procedure for calling and conducting referendums, established by means of a law in accordance with Paragraph 4 of Article 9 of the Constitution, must also be clear and precise.

The requirement that, once a referendum is called, it must be provided that it is to take place on one day (Paragraphs 1 and 4 of Article 9 and Item 3 of Article 67 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 15 February 2019

... the Constitution, inter alia, Article 9 thereof, does not explicitly establish how many days may be scheduled for a referendum once it is called.

[...]

... Paragraph 1 of Article 9 of the Constitution, interpreted in the context of the provisions of Articles 2 and 4, Paragraph 1 of Article 33, and Article 34 thereof, gives rise to the imperative that the constitutionally consolidated democratic principles (stemming, inter alia, from the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law) governing elections to political representative institutions be mutatis mutandis applied to calling and conducting referendums. It should be noted that there are no constitutional grounds for applying other principles in regulating, by means of a law, as to how many days may be scheduled for a referendum once it is called.

[...]

It should be held that Article 57, Paragraph 4 of Article 58, Article 80, Paragraphs 2 and 3 of Article 81, Paragraph 1 of Article 87, and Paragraph 1 of Article 89 of the Constitution establish the requirement that elections to the Seimas and the elections of the President of the Republic must last one day (i.e. the provision is made that regular elections are held on the specific date), which must be a Sunday.

It should be emphasised that, under the Constitution, such a requirement is not an objective in itself. As the Constitutional Court held in its ruling of 19 September 2002, the provision of Article 1 of the Constitution that the State of Lithuania is an independent democratic republic, inter alia, means that free and periodic elections and the democratic process of decision making must be ensured in the state; this provision embodies the constitutional obligation not to deviate from the requirements of democracy; the said obligation is applicable to all state institutions, including the legislature. One of the essential characteristics of a democratic state is democratic elections to representative institutions of state power (inter alia, the conclusions of 23 November 1996 and 7 November 2008 and the ruling of 29 March 2012).

In view of this, it should be noted that the above-mentioned constitutional requirement that elections to the Seimas and the elections of the President of the Republic must last one day (i.e. the Constitution makes the precise provision for the specific date for regular elections and the procedure for determining the day of repeat or early elections) is aimed at ensuring the implementation of a necessary condition of democracy – free and periodic elections and the democratic process of decision making during elections. Establishing, in the Constitution, the precise day for regular elections and limiting, under the Constitution, the discretion to choose the day and duration of repeat or early elections precludes the state authority institutions that, under the Constitution, are vested with the powers to call elections from abusing these powers, inter alia, from influencing the election results while exercising the said powers. At the same time, this constitutes one of the preconditions for ensuring the fairness and transparency of the electoral process and revealing the actual will of voters in elections.

To sum up, it should be noted that, arising from Paragraph 1 of Article 9 of the Constitution, which should be interpreted in the context of Articles 2 and 4, Paragraph 1 of Article 33, and Article 34 of the Constitution, the imperative that the constitutionally consolidated democratic principles governing elections to political representative institutions (and stemming, inter alia, from the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law) be mutatis mutandis applied to calling and conducting referendums also implies, inter alia, the requirement that, once a referendum is called, it must be provided that it is to take place on one day (by analogy with elections to the Seimas and the elections of the President of the Republic, usually on a Sunday). Such a requirement is aimed at ensuring, in a referendum, the democratic process of decision making, which ... is implied by the provision of Article 1 of the Constitution, proclaiming that the State of Lithuania is an independent democratic republic. It should also be noted that such a requirement creates the preconditions for ensuring the fairness and transparency of the referendum process, inter alia, ensuring that the same procedure for calling and conducting referendums is applied in deciding all the most significant issues concerning the life of the State and the Nation; at the same time, the preconditions are created for ensuring the imperative, stemming from Paragraph 1 of Article 9 of the Constitution, to determine the actual will of the Nation in a referendum.

... according to Paragraph 4 of Article 9 of the Constitution, the legislature must establish the procedure for calling and conducting referendums while having regard to the requirements arising from the Constitution, inter alia, Paragraph 1 of Article 9 thereof. ... in the light of the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law and in order to create the preconditions for a fair and transparent referendum process, the procedure for calling and conducting referendums established by means of a law in accordance with Paragraph 4 of Article 9 of the Constitution must also be clear and precise.

Thus, Paragraphs 1 and 4 of Article 9 of the Constitution and the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law give rise to the requirement for the legislature, in regulating the procedure for calling and conducting referendums, inter alia, to prescribe that, once a referendum is called, it is permitted to provide that the referendum is to take place on only one day.

At the same time, it should be noted that, according to Item 3 of Article 67 of the Constitution, the Seimas “shall adopt resolutions on referendums”.

Thus, Item 3 of Article 67 of the Constitution, inter alia, implies that, having regard to the Constitution, inter alia, Paragraph 1 of Article 9 thereof, and the requirements stemming from the Constitution and the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law, the Seimas is under the duty to provide, in its resolution on calling a referendum, for the date of the referendum, i.e. to provide that the referendum is to take place on one day.

The duty of the legislature to establish the procedure for early voting in referendums for citizens who are unable to cast their votes on the day of a referendum (Paragraphs 1 and 4 of Article 9 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court’s ruling of 15 February 2019

... the requirement, arising from Paragraph 1 of Article 9 of the Constitution, that, once a referendum is called, it must be provided that it is to take place on one day may not be interpreted as preventing the legislature from establishing the procedure for early voting in referendums for those citizens who are unable to cast their votes on the day of a referendum. It should be emphasised that providing for the procedure for early voting in referendums is a constitutional duty of the legislature; it stems from the Constitution, inter alia, Paragraphs 1 and 4 of Article 9 thereof.

In this context, it should be mentioned that, in its ruling of 1 December 1994, the Constitutional Court held that a referendum (i.e. voting by citizens) is conducted on the date specified in the resolution of the Seimas and at the time prescribed by the law; citizens participate in a referendum earlier than on the designated voting day only in the cases and according to the procedure provided for under the law when they vote by mail.

... Paragraph 1 of Article 9 of the Constitution gives rise to the imperative that the constitutionally consolidated democratic principles governing elections to political representative institutions be mutatis mutandis applied to calling and conducting referendums; in exercising its powers, established in Paragraph 4 of the said article, to regulate the procedure for calling and conducting referendums, the legislature is bound by the democratic principles governing elections to political representative institutions. In this context, it should be noted that, when revealing the requirements that are implied by the democratic principles governing elections to political representative institutions, inter alia, the principle of personal (direct) voting, and that are to be followed by the legislature in establishing the electoral legal regulation, the Constitutional Court has stated that the constitutional imperative of democratic elections means the requirement to ensure the possibility of expressing will in elections for those voters who, on the scheduled day, are unable to arrive at the polling station due to illness, disability, imprisonment, the performance of official tasks, as well as due to a travel or other personal reasons; the legislature has the constitutional duty to establish such a legal regulation that gives citizens who are unable to vote on the day of the election the possibility of implementing their constitutional right at another time (conclusion of 5 November 2004).

Constitutional laws, except for the constitutional law establishing the list of constitutional laws, may be adopted and amended by referendum

See 1.8. The foundations of lawmaking and of the application of law, 1.8.4. The hierarchy of legal acts, 1.8.4.4. Constitutional laws, the ruling of 30 July 2020.

2.3.3. The electoral rights

The requirement that candidates for members of the Seimas must not be bound by an oath or a pledge to a foreign state (Paragraph 1 of Article 56 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 11 November 1998

The requirement of Paragraph 1 of Article 56 of the Constitution stipulating that candidates for members of the Seimas must not be bound by an oath or a pledge to a foreign state must, first of all, be interpreted on the basis of Paragraph 2 of Article 59 of the Constitution, which provides that “An elected Member of the Seimas ... [takes] an oath ... to be faithful to the Republic of Lithuania”. Paragraph 3 of the same article contains another important provision, which reads: “A Member of the Seimas who either does not take the oath according to the procedure established by law or takes a conditional oath shall lose the mandate of a Member of the Seimas.” Thus, the Constitution unconditionally requires that a member of the Seimas must take an oath to be faithful only to the State of Lithuania and that he/she must take the pledge to respect and execute its Constitution and laws. This is understandable, since only persons who are loyal to their state and where no doubts arise concerning the loyalty and reliability of such persons may work in the institutions of their state. It is obvious that, in cases where a person who is bound by an oath or a pledge to a foreign state takes the oath of a member of the Seimas, doubts might arise as to the certainty and credibility of his/her oath, and the legal and political situation of such a person would become ambiguous.

[...]

In the context of the case at issue, it is necessary to interpret the content of the constitutional notion “who is not bound by an oath or a pledge to a foreign state”. First of all, it must be emphasised that this notion is of an abstract nature, i.e. it should be understood as any oath or pledge to a foreign state. Second, interpreting this notion, it is necessary to remember the main objectives due to which this notion (together with other conditions) was laid down in the Constitution. These are essentially political objectives: to ensure the proper formation of the supreme political state institution, which embodies the idea of the representation of the legal nation in the state. It is obvious that the nation is represented only by the citizens of that state who are aware and capable of expressing the expectations and interests of their fellow citizens and who comprehend and are capable of forming the political will of their state. Thus, any commitments of a political nature to a foreign state where they arise out of a formally taken oath or pledge or where they occur as a political duty or a political loyalty requirement linked with the fact of holding citizenship of another state are to be treated as a pledge to a foreign state. The Constitutional Court emphasises that the best way to meet the constitutional condition, i.e. to be a person “who is not bound by an oath or a pledge to a foreign state”, is the renunciation of citizenship of a foreign state. The legislature, implementing such content of the aforesaid constitutional norm, may also establish additional requirements for the implementation of that constitutional norm.

The active and passive electoral rights of the permanent residents of an administrative unit in elections of municipal councils (Paragraph 2 (wording of 20 June 2002) of Article 119 of the Constitution)

See 10. Local self-government and governance, 10.2. Local self-government, the ruling of 24 December 2002.

Requirements for persons eligible to stand for election as the President of the Republic (Paragraph 2 of Article 34 and Paragraph 1 of Article 78 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 25 May 2004

Paragraph 1 of Article 78 of the Constitution provides that a Lithuanian citizen by descent who has lived in Lithuania for not less than the last three years, provided that he/she has reached the age of not less than 40 prior to the election day and may stand for election as a member of the Seimas, may stand for election as the President of the Republic. Under Paragraph 1 of Article 56 of the Constitution, any citizen of the Republic of Lithuania who is not bound by an oath or a pledge to a foreign state and who, on the election day, is not younger than 25 years of age and permanently resides in Lithuania may stand for election as a member of the Seimas. Paragraph 2 of this article provides that persons who have not served punishment imposed by a court judgment, as well as persons declared by a court to be legally incapacitated, may not stand for election as a member of the Seimas. According to Paragraph 1 of Article 79 of the Constitution, any citizen of the Republic of Lithuania who meets the conditions set out in Paragraph 1 of Article 78 and collects the signatures of not less than 20 000 voters is registered as a presidential candidate.

[...]

As mentioned before, under Paragraph 1 of Article 78 of the Constitution, a citizen of the Republic of Lithuania who, inter alia, may stand for election as a member of the Seimas, may stand for election as the President of the Republic. Since, under the Constitution, judges and the persons specified in Article 141 of the Constitution have no right to stand for election as members of the Seimas as long as they hold a particular office, they may not stand for election as the President of the Republic, either.

Under Paragraph 3 of Article 104 of the Constitution, the limitations established on work and political activities for the judges of courts also apply to the justices of the Constitutional Court. Thus, the constitutional limitation on standing for election as a member of the Seimas and as the President of the Republic also applies to the justices of the Constitutional Court.

Paragraph 2 of Article 34 of the Constitution prescribes: "The right to stand for election shall be established by the Constitution of the Republic of Lithuania and by the election laws."

If Paragraph 2 of Article 34 of the Constitution is interpreted only literally by applying the linguistic method of the interpretation of law, it would be possible to state that it is also allowed to establish in the election laws ... such requirements (conditions) for a person who may stand for election as the President of the Republic that are not provided for in the Constitution itself.

[...]

... the requirements for a person who may stand for election as the President of the Republic are established in the Constitution. Consequently, the provision "The right to stand for election shall be established ... by the election laws" of Paragraph 2 of Article 34 of the Constitution means that, under the Constitution, the legislature has the powers to establish in the election laws ... such requirements (conditions) for a person who may stand for election as the President of the Republic that are constitutionally justifiable. ... [the law] may not establish any such requirements (conditions) that would distort or deny the requirements (conditions) established in the Constitution for a person who may stand for election as the President of the Republic. The provision "The right to stand for election shall be established ... by the election laws" of Paragraph 2 of Article 34 of the Constitution also means that ... the procedure of the election of the President of the Republic, the procedures for the implementation of the right of a person to stand for election as the President of the Republic, etc. should be regulated under the election laws. A different interpretation of the provisions of Paragraph 2 of Article 34 of the Constitution would make legally meaningless the constitutional legal regulation that establishes the requirements (conditions) for a person who may stand for election as the President of the Republic because, if laws established a different legal regulation competing with the constitutional regulation, the constitutional norms and principles establishing the said requirements (conditions) and bearing the supreme legal force would be denied. This would be inconsistent with the principle of the supremacy of the Constitution, with the provision of Paragraph 1 of Article 6 of the Constitution, whereby the Constitution is a directly applicable legal act, and with Paragraph 1 of Article 7 of the Constitution, under which any law or other act that contradicts the Constitution is invalid.

[...]

Thus, according to the Constitution, a person who is a citizen of the Republic of Lithuania by descent, has lived in Lithuania for not less than the past three years, provided that he/she has reached the age of not less than 40 prior to the election day, and is not bound by an oath or a pledge to a foreign state may stand for election as the President of the Republic. Under the Constitution, a person may not stand for election as the President of the Republic if he/she has been the President of the Republic twice consecutively (for two consecutive terms). Under the Constitution, a person who has not served punishment imposed by a court judgment, as well as a person declared by a court legally incapacitated, may not stand for election as the President of the Republic, either. Under the Constitution, a person who has been removed from office or whose mandate of a member of the Seimas has been revoked according to the procedure for impeachment proceedings for a breach of the oath, a gross violation of the Constitution, or a crime by which the Constitution was grossly violated and the oath was breached may never stand for election as the President of the Republic. Under the Constitution, a judge of any court or a person holding the office specified in Article 141 of the Constitution may not stand for election as the President of the Republic.

Under the Constitution, a person who meets the established constitutional requirements (if no obstacles defined in the Constitution exist) for being registered as a candidate for the post of the President of the Republic must additionally collect the signatures of not less than 20 000 voters.

It needs to be stressed that the Constitution does not provide for any other requirements (conditions) that should be met by a person so that he/she would be eligible to stand for election as the President of the Republic. Under the Constitution, laws and other legal acts may not establish any such requirements (conditions) applicable to a person so that he/she would be eligible to stand for election as the President of the Republic that would distort or deny the requirements (conditions) established in the Constitution.

Requirements for the legal regulation governing the election of the members of the Seimas (Paragraphs 1 and 3 of Article 55 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's conclusion of 5 November 2004

... the principles of elections to the Seimas, the representation of the Nation, are established in the Constitution; it is not permitted to deny, distort, or limit them by means of any lower-ranking legal act. Under Paragraph 1 of Article 55 of the Constitution, the members of the Seimas are elected on the basis of universal, equal, and direct suffrage by secret ballot.

Paragraph 3 of Article 55 of the Constitution provides that the procedure for the election of the members of the Seimas is established by law. This constitutional provision means that the legislature has the duty to consolidate, by means of a law, a system of the election of the members of the Seimas, to establish the grounds and procedure for organising elections, inter alia, including the nomination of candidates for members of the Seimas, electoral campaigning, the procedure for voting, the establishment of the results of election, the procedures for settling electoral disputes, as well as the regulation of other relationships of the election of the members of the Seimas. In doing so, the legislature must pay regard to the Constitution; it may not deny, distort, or restrict the universal, equal, and direct suffrage and secret ballot, nor may it create any legal preconditions for other subjects to do so, as, otherwise, this would mean that the supreme sovereign power of the Nation is altogether denied through the representation of the Nation – the Seimas.

... the legislature, under the Constitution, has the duty to establish, by means of a law, such a legal regulation that would ensure that voters vote in person and by secret ballot and that, in the course of voting, it would be impossible to influence and control the will of voters. In particular, it is impermissible that the financing of elections would be non-transparent or uncontrollable, or that in an election campaign such election techniques would be used that are contrary to the morals, justice, and the harmony of society. It also needs to be emphasised that, under the Constitution, no motives may justify any direct or indirect buying of votes, or such a practice of an election campaign where voters, by means of presents or other rewards, are prompted to participate in or abstain from elections and/or to vote for or against one or another candidate. This is equivalent to the bribery of voters, meaning that citizens of the Republic of Lithuania are deprived of their right to freely express their genuine will on their own in the election of the Seimas, as well as that the Nation is deprived of its right to elect such representation of the Nation that would be able to express its genuine supreme sovereign power.

It needs to be emphasised that the Constitution gives rise to the duty of the legislature to establish, by means of a law, such a legal regulation that ensures the fairness and transparency of the process of election to the Seimas, both of which are necessary preconditions for the trust of the Nation in its representation.

If the legislature fails to comply with these requirements, which stem from the Constitution, and fails to establish a mechanism for ensuring democratic, free, and fair elections, there might always be doubts as to the legality of the election of the members of the Seimas.

The principle of voting in person (directly)

The Constitutional Court's conclusion of 5 November 2004

... the legislature, while regulating electoral relationships, may not establish any such a legal regulation that would create such preconditions where a different person votes for the voter (except when the voter is unable to implement such his/her constitutional right by himself/herself for health reasons).

Voting in person (directly) is one of the crucial guarantees of a free, thus, democratic, expression of the will of the electorate. The constitutional imperative of democratic elections requires that voters who, on the set day, are unable to appear at the polling-station due to illness, disability, imprisonment, the performance of official tasks, as well as due to a travel or other personal reasons, be granted the possibility of expressing their will in elections. The legislature has the constitutional duty to establish such a legal regulation ensuring that citizens who are unable to vote on the day of the election would have the possibility of implementing their constitutional right at another time. While regulating the relationships related to absentee voting, the legislature has discretion; however, it may not violate those principles of democratic elections that are consolidated in the Constitution.

One of the common forms of absentee voting in democratic states is voting by mail. The legislature, when deciding whether to opt for this form of absentee voting and regulating the relationships linked with voting by mail, must take into consideration not only the relevant legal factors, but also the particularities of the political culture of society, the level of civil maturity, public mentality, and other social factors, for they also determine whether voting by mail would be abused, whether the institution of voting by mail would become a means of the distortion of the actual will of voters, and whether it would deny the right of the Nation to elect such its representation that would express its genuine supreme sovereign power.

The discretion of the legislature to choose a system of elections to municipal councils (Article 34 and Paragraphs 2 and 3 of Article 119 of the Constitution)

See 10. Local self-government and governance, 10.2. Local self-government, the ruling of 9 February 2007.

The passive electoral right in elections to municipal councils (the requirement that, after the legislature chooses exclusively the proportional system of elections to municipal councils, permanent residents of administrative units must have the possibility of standing for election to municipal councils even where they are included in the lists of candidates that are drawn up by entities other than political parties)

See 10. Local self-government and governance, 10.2. Local self-government, the ruling of 9 February 2007.

The active and passive electoral rights (Article 34 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 1 October 2008

The provision of Article 34 of the Constitution whereby citizens who, on the day of the election, have reached 18 years of age have the electoral right (Paragraph 1) consolidates the so-called active electoral right, i.e. the possibility for persons to participate in elections to particular institutions of public power by freely choosing for which of the nominated candidate or candidates to vote. The provision of Paragraph 2 of the same article, whereby the right to stand for election is established by the Constitution of the Republic of Lithuania and by the election laws, consolidates the so-called passive electoral right, i.e. the possibility for a person to stand as a candidate in the election of the members of a particular elective public power institution under the procedure established by the Constitution and election laws, i.e. it consolidates the possibility of seeking to stand for election. Paragraph 3 of Article 34 of the Constitution establishes a restriction on the active and passive electoral rights – persons declared by a court to be legally incapacitated do not have this right.

All the provisions of Article 34 of the Constitution are interrelated. ... when interpreting the provision of Paragraph 1 of Article 34 together with Paragraphs 2 and 3 of Article 34, it needs to be noted that citizens who, on the day of the election, have reached 18 years of age and have not been declared by a court to be legally incapacitated have the right to elect only those persons as members of particular public power institutions who meet the requirements (conditions) laid down in the Constitution and laws that are not in conflict with the Constitution.

In this context, it needs to be noted that the articles of the Constitution that regulate the relationships of elections to particular public power institutions, i.e. Articles 55, 56, and 57 of the Constitution, consolidating the legal imperatives of the election of the members of the Seimas, Articles 78, 79 and 80 thereof, consolidating the legal imperatives of the election of the President of the Republic, and Article 119 of the Constitution, consolidating the legal imperatives of the election of members to municipal councils, are inseparable from the provisions of Article 34 of the Constitution, which consolidate the constitutional grounds for the active and passive electoral rights.

It should also be noted that, even though the constitutional nature of the said public power institutions, their place in the system of public power institutions, and their functions and powers determine the specific legal regulation of elections to each of these institutions, the legislature, while regulating the legal relationships of the election of the members of the Seimas, the President of the Republic, and members of municipal councils, must pay regard to the imperatives of the universal, equal, and direct suffrage and secret ballot, which stem from the Constitution.

The Constitution, inter alia, Articles 34, 55, and 56 thereof, gives rise to the duty of the legislature to consolidate, by means of a law, a system of the election of the members of the Seimas, to establish the grounds and procedure for organising elections, inter alia, including the nomination of candidates for members of the Seimas, electoral campaigning, the procedure for voting, the establishment of election results, the procedures for settling electoral disputes, as well as the regulation of other relationships of the election of the members of the Seimas. In this context, it needs to be emphasised that, when establishing the requirements that must be met by candidates for members of the Seimas, the legislature must pay regard to the Constitution; it may not deny, distort, or restrict the universal, equal, and direct suffrage and secret ballot, nor may it create any legal preconditions for other subjects to do so.

The principles of electoral law

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 1 October 2008

... the principles of the universal, equal, and direct suffrage, as well as secret ballot ... are established not only in Paragraph 1 of Article 55 of the Constitution, but also in other articles of the Constitution that regulate the legal relationships of the election of the President of the Republic (Paragraph 2 of Article 78) and members of municipal councils (Paragraph 2 of Article 119). First of all, these principles are applicable in the implementation of the active electoral right.

The principle of universal electoral right, which is consolidated in Paragraph 1 of Article 55 of the Constitution, means that the right to participate in elections of the members of the Seimas must be ensured for all citizens of the Republic of Lithuania who meet the requirements (conditions) stemming from the Constitution and laws that are not in conflict with the Constitution.

With regard to the principle of equal suffrage, it is universally recognised that this principle, inter alia, means that, in the course of organising and conducting elections, all voters must be treated equally, as well as that the vote of each voter is equal to the vote of any other voter and has equal weight when the results of voting are established.

The principle of direct suffrage requires that members of the Seimas must be elected without intermediaries. When interpreting the content of this principle, it needs to be noted that the Constitutional Court has held that the legislature, while regulating electoral relationships, may not establish any such a legal regulation that would create the preconditions for a different person to vote for the voter (except when the voter is unable to implement such his/her constitutional right by himself/herself for health reasons) (conclusion of 5 November 2004).

The principle of secret ballot requires that such conditions for expressing the will of voters during voting be created that nobody could control voters, exert influence on their choice, or otherwise impede their possibility of expressing their will freely and unrestrictedly.

The system of the election of the members of the Seimas

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 1 October 2008

... the Constitution does not establish a concrete system of the election of the members of the Seimas. According to the provision of Paragraph 3 of Article 55 of the Constitution, this is left to be decided by the legislature, which has broad discretion as regards this issue. It needs to be noted that a law may establish the exclusively proportional, or exclusively majoritarian, or a different system of the election of the members of the Seimas, inter alia, a mixed electoral system, which combines both the proportional and majoritarian electoral systems.

[...]

As such, a proportional system of elections, or a majoritarian system of elections, or a different system of elections, inter alia, a mixed electoral system, which combines both the proportional and majoritarian electoral systems, may not be regarded as creating the preconditions for violating the requirements of free and democratic elections, universal and equal suffrage, secret ballot, or other standards of elections in a democratic state under the rule of law. However, it also needs to be noted that, when consolidating a particular system of the election of the members of the Seimas, the legislature must respect the norms and principles of the Constitution, as well as the constitutional concept of the Seimas as the representation of the Nation.

... elections are a political process. The electoral rights (both active and passive ones) are closely related to the right of citizens of the Republic of Lithuania to participate in the governance of their state, as consolidated in Article 33 of the Constitution, as well as to the right of citizens to freely form political parties, as consolidated in Article 35 of the Constitution, provided that the aims and activities thereof are not contrary to the Constitution and laws. It needs to be noted that the purpose of establishing political parties, as well as their activity, is inseparable from seeking public power, therefore, as well as from participation in elections to the representative institutions of public power, inter alia, the Seimas.

Under the Constitution, whichever system of the election of the members of the Seimas (exclusively proportional, or exclusively majoritarian, or a different system, inter alia, a mixed electoral system, which combines both the proportional and majoritarian electoral systems) is chosen by the legislature, it is not allowed to establish any such a legal regulation that would prevent political parties and their nominated candidates from participating in the election of the members of the Seimas. In this ruling of the Constitutional Court, it has been held that, in itself, such a system of the election of the members of the Seimas where the proportional and majoritarian systems of elections are combined does not create the preconditions for violating the standards of universal, equal, and direct voting, as well as other electoral standards of a democratic state under the rule of law.

Thus, such a system of the election of the members of the Seimas where the candidates entered on the lists of political parties and the individual candidates nominated by political parties compete for the mandates of members of the Seimas is, under the Constitution, possible if it is also ensured that those citizens who are not entered on the lists of political parties or are not nominated by them have the possibility of standing for election as members of the Seimas.

When regulating the relationships of the election of the members of the Seimas by means of a law, the legislature is bound by the Constitution, inter alia, by the requirement, which stems from Paragraph 2 of its Article 35 thereof, whereby “No one may be compelled to belong to any ... political party ...”. Therefore, under the Constitution, the legislature may not establish any such a legal regulation whereby a person who wishes to make use of his/her passive electoral right (Paragraph 2 of Article 34 and Article 56 of the Constitution) in the election of the members of the Seimas would be compelled to become a member of a certain political party or to connect himself/herself with a certain political party by relationships other than those of formal membership.

The proportional electoral system; the requirement that, after the legislature chooses exclusively the proportional system of elections, persons must have the possibility of standing for election even when they are included in the lists of candidates that are drawn up by entities other than political parties

The Constitutional Court’s ruling of 9 November 2010

... if the legislature chooses exclusively the proportional system of elections, the candidates who are entered only on the lists made by the political parties (or other collective entities) participating in an election may be elected to political representative institutions or other democratic representative institutions. These lists are made from a certain number of candidates. It also needs to be noted that, upon choosing the proportional system of elections, such a situation where, in an election, not only the persons entered on the lists drawn up by political parties (or other collective entities), but also individual persons take part, is impossible, i.e. such a situation is impossible where individual persons compete with lists of candidates. The essence of the proportional system of elections would thus be distorted.

... under the Constitution, no such legal regulation is allowed that could prevent political parties or candidates nominated or supported by political parties from participating in elections to political representative institutions. [However,] this requirement may not be interpreted as consolidating the exclusive right of political parties (their members or candidates supported by political parties) to participate in forming political representative institutions.

Thus, the legislature, having chosen exclusively the proportional system of elections, must consolidate in a law not only the right of political parties to participate in elections, but also define other collective entities can participate and have the right to nominate candidates by presenting lists of their candidates in elections to political representative institutions.

[...]

... if the legislature, having chosen exclusively the proportional system of elections, established the legal regulation consolidating the exclusive right of political parties (their members or candidates supported by political parties) to participate in forming political representative institutions, it would also mean that the possibilities of implementing the passive electoral right of the citizens who are not members of political parties and are not linked by any ties with any political party would be burdened in a disproportionate manner in comparison with the possibilities of the persons who are members of political parties or who linked themselves to some political party with ties that are other than formal membership. It also needs to be noted that such a legal regulation would unreasonably eliminate other collective entities, i.e. political organisations, from participation in elections to political representative institutions, inter alia, from the nomination of candidates by drawing up lists of candidates in elections to these institutions. Consequently, such a legal regulation would create the preconditions for violating the imperatives of justice and proportionality stemming from the Constitution, inter alia, from the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law, and for disregarding the principles of electoral law that stem from the Constitution.

Electoral systems

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 11 May 2011

In elections held under the proportional electoral system, one or several multi-member constituencies are formed in which the competition among candidates enlisted in the lists of candidates drawn up by political parties (or other collective subjects) takes place; whereas, under the majoritarian electoral system, individual candidates stand as candidates in single-member constituencies; in democratic states there also exists the so-called mixed electoral system, which combines both the proportional and majoritarian electoral systems (ruling of 9 November 2010).

In this context, it needs to be noted that, under the mixed electoral system, the two separate electoral systems, the proportional and majoritarian one, are combined without changing their principal features, i.e. individual candidates compete only in single-member constituencies, whereas the candidates entered on the lists of candidates drawn up by political parties (or other collective subjects) compete only in multi-member constituencies.

[...]

... the election system under which a certain representative institution is elected is a whole complex of the rules, principles, and criteria consolidated in election laws; on the basis of the said rules, principles, and criteria, inter alia, the results of voting are established. None of the electoral systems may ensure that the established election results will reflect the vote of each voter participating in the election and that each candidate for whom at least a certain number of voters have cast their votes will participate in the distribution of mandates; nevertheless, it is important that the electoral system would not be favourable exclusively to certain subjects exercising their passive electoral right and that it would not create the preconditions for not reflecting the will of the majority of voters.

The discretion of the legislature to choose the manner of establishing the results of elections to municipal councils and of distributing mandates, as well as to consolidate electoral thresholds

See 10. Local self-government and governance, 10.2. Local self-government, the ruling of 11 May 2011.

The right of persons to stand for election as members of municipal councils; the right of the electorate to receive significant information about candidates for members of municipal councils, inter alia, about the fact that a candidate has been found by a court to be guilty of a criminal act (Article 25, Paragraph 2 of Article 34, Paragraphs 2 and 3 of Article 119 of the Constitution)

See 10. Local self-government and governance, 10.2. Local self-government, the ruling of 17 November 2011.

The requirements that persons who seek to participate in the electoral process must prove that they have certain political support of society (they must collect the established number of signatures) and must guarantee the validity of their intentions (they must pay the election deposit)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 29 March 2012

... in its ruling of 1 October 2008, the Constitutional Court noted that, in the Member States of the European Union and in other democratic states, special requirements are quite often established when regulating electoral relationships; upon the fulfilment (meeting) of such requirements (e.g. the requirement to collect a certain number of signatures that confirm the political support of a certain part of society, or the requirement to pay a certain deposit of elections), persons may nominate themselves as candidates for members of the parliament; elections are a responsible political process; therefore, the requirement that candidates for members of the parliament must prove to have a certain political support of society and/or guarantee the validity of their intentions by a certain (reasonable) financial obligation is recognised as a valid one.

[...]

... when regulating the electoral relationships connected, inter alia, with the electoral procedures of the election of the President of the Republic, the legislature, under the Constitution, may establish, inter alia, such constitutionally justifiable conditions for the implementation of the passive electoral right by means of which, while taking account of the specificity of the election of the President of the Republic and the conditions established in the Constitution that must be met by a candidate for the post of the President of the Republic, it is sought to proportionally ensure that the election of the President of the Republic would be a responsible political process and that this process would involve the participation of only those candidates (persons seeking to stand as candidates) who have serious intentions.

Consequently, in regulating electoral relationships, inter alia, the relationships connected with the electoral procedures of the election of the President of the Republic, the legislature, under the Constitution, may consolidate an election deposit as a legal institution; under the Constitution, the legislature also has the discretion, while being bound by the norms and principles of the Constitution, to establish the procedural stage of the election of the President of the Republic at which the election deposit must be paid, the persons that are allowed to pay the election deposit, the procedural stage of the election of the President of the Republic at which the election deposit is refunded to the person who paid it (or to stipulate that the election deposit is refunded after the said procedures are over), and the conditions of such refunding.

[...]

... while regulating the electoral relationships linked with the election procedures for elections to the Seimas, the European Parliament, or municipal councils, the legislature may, under the Constitution, establish, inter alia, such constitutionally justifiable procedures for implementing the passive electoral right that would, in view of the particularity of elections to the Seimas, the European Parliament, or municipal councils, ensure the responsibility of the process of these elections taking place at not identical levels (at the national (state) level, at the European level, or at the regional level) and the seriousness of the intentions of candidates for members of the Seimas, for members of the European Parliament, or for members of municipal councils, who participate in this process.

Consequently, while regulating the electoral relationships linked with elections to the Seimas, the European Parliament, or municipal councils (inter alia, preparation procedures for these elections), the legislature, under the Constitution, may generally choose an election deposit as a means of regulating electoral relationships and has the discretion bound by the norms and principles of the Constitution to stipulate, inter alia, that the amount of an election deposit is different in elections to the Seimas, the European Parliament, or municipal councils and that it changes according to whether the subjects who nominate candidates have (or have not) followed certain requirements of control over the financing of the political campaign, as well as that an election deposit must be paid at the same stage of the preparatory procedure for elections to the Seimas, the European Parliament, or municipal councils, i.e. before submitting the application documents of candidates.

The requirement that the subjects implementing the passive electoral right must submit information (significant to voters) about themselves (data about property, income, and private interests)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 29 March 2012

... the following provisions of the official constitutional doctrine should be mentioned:

– the Constitution guarantees and protects the interest of the public to be informed (inter alia, the rulings of 8 July 2005, 19 September 2005, 29 September 2005, 21 December 2006, and 17 November 2011);

– the interest of the public to be informed assumes especial importance in the process of elections to political representative institutions (ruling of 17 November 2011);

– to ensure the right of citizens to participate in the governance of their state, as consolidated in Paragraph 1 of Article 33 of the Constitution, inter alia, through democratically elected representatives, the legislature must create the preconditions for reflecting the will of voters, inter alia, the preconditions for ensuring the transparency of the electoral process and fair competition among subjects exercising their passive electoral right, as well as the publicity of information, important to voters, regarding those subjects (ruling of 17 November 2011);

– under the Constitution, the legislature has the powers to establish in election laws such requirements (conditions) for a person eligible to stand for election that are constitutionally justifiable.

Thus, under the Constitution, the legislature, while regulating the electoral relationships linked, inter alia, with electoral procedures, may establish, inter alia, such constitutionally justifiable procedures (applicable procedural requirements) for implementing the passive electoral right that are aimed at ensuring the transparency of the electoral process and the publicity of information significant to voters about the subjects implementing the passive electoral right.

... under the Constitution, the information significant to a voter about the subjects implementing the passive electoral right may be considered, inter alia, to include the relevant data on property, income, and private interests, submitted by candidates for members of political representative institutions in accordance with the procedure set by means of a law. Under the Constitution, the legislature may seek to ensure the public interest to be informed, as well as the fairness and transparency of the electoral process, by establishing, inter alia, such a legal regulation that would require that candidates for members of political representative institutions declare their property, income, and private interests.

It needs to be noted that the Constitution gives rise to the duty of the legislature to establish, by means of a law, such a legal regulation that would ensure the integrity and transparency of elections to the Seimas – the necessary preconditions for the trust in the representation of the Nation (conclusions of 5 November 2004 and 7 November 2008).

The said provision of the official constitutional doctrine is mutatis mutandis also applicable where the legislature regulates the relationships of other elections, inter alia, elections to the European Parliament. In this context, it needs to be noted that, as the Constitutional Court has already held, the European Parliament is not the representation of the Nation; however, it should be regarded as a political representative institution of the European Union, whose election procedure in a concrete Member State of the European Union is established by the legislature of that Member State (ruling of 9 November 2010).

... it should also be noted that, during the electoral process, real possibilities must be created for persons implementing the active electoral right, i.e. for those who decide on the eligibility of a candidate to be a member of the municipal council, to receive information about the major facts of the life of such a candidate, which may be of significance when representing the interests of voters and handling public affairs (ruling of 17 November 2011).

This provision of the official constitutional doctrine is mutatis mutandis also applicable in regulating all other electoral relationships, inter alia, those connected with elections to the Seimas and elections to the European Parliament.

The requirements for the fairness and financial transparency of election campaigns

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 29 March 2012

... the Constitutional Court has held that the Constitution gives rise to the duty of the legislature to establish, by means of a law, such a legal regulation that would ensure the fairness and transparency of the electoral process to the Seimas, i.e. the necessary preconditions for the trust in the representation of the Nation (conclusions of 5 November 2004 and 7 November 2008); this provision of the official constitutional doctrine is mutatis mutandis also applicable to the legal regulation of the elections of the President of the Republic, elections to municipal councils, and elections to the European Parliament.

Consequently, under the Constitution, when regulating the electoral relationships connected, inter alia, with the funding (and control over this funding) of election campaigns, which are part of the electoral process, the legislature has the discretion to choose (consolidate) such means that would ensure the fairness of election campaigns and the transparency of their funding.

[...]

... the legislature may seek to ensure the fairness and transparency of the electoral process by establishing, inter alia, such a legal regulation that would require that the funds allocated to finance a political campaign be handled and the legality of their accumulation and use be controlled not by a participant of the election campaign, but by another responsible person on the grounds and under procedure established by means of a law. When establishing such a legal regulation, the legislature is bound by the requirements stemming from the Constitution, inter alia, from the principle of proportionality, i.e. the legislature may not establish any such a legal regulation, inter alia, such requirements for the said responsible person, that would artificially impede the possibilities of participating in the election campaign by a person seeking to become a candidate in the respective election while implementing his/her passive electoral right guaranteed in the Constitution.

The legal regulation governing the relationships of the election of the members of the Seimas; the discretion of the legislature to consolidate election thresholds in elections to the Seimas

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 29 March 2012

... the Constitutional Court has held that:

– the majority principle is among the democratic principles of decision making (rulings of 22 July 1994 and 4 April 2006);

– none of the electoral systems may ensure that the established election results will reflect the vote of each voter participating in the election and that each candidate for whom at least a certain number of voters have cast their votes will participate in the distribution of mandates; nevertheless, it is important that the electoral system would not be favourable exclusively to certain subjects exercising their passive electoral right and that it would not create the preconditions for not reflecting the will of the majority of voters (ruling of 11 May 2011).

It also needs to be noted that, in its ruling of 1 October 2008, the Constitutional Court ... inter alia, held that:

– the Constitution does not establish a concrete system of the election of the members of the Seimas; according to the provision of Paragraph 3 of Article 55 of the Constitution, this is left to be decided by the legislature, which has broad discretion as regards this issue;

– the Constitution, inter alia, Articles 34, 55 and 56 thereof, gives rise to the duty of the legislature to consolidate, by means of a law, a system of the election of the members of the Seimas, to establish the grounds and procedure for organising elections, inter alia, including the nomination of candidates for members of the Seimas, electoral campaigning, the procedure for voting, the establishment of the results of election, the procedures for settling electoral disputes, as well as the regulation of other relationships of the election of the members of the Seimas;

– a law may establish the exclusively proportional, or exclusively majoritarian, or a different system of the election of the members of the Seimas, inter alia, a mixed electoral system, which combines both the proportional and majoritarian electoral systems;

– as regards elections in one multi-member constituency, it is universally recognised that, under the proportional system of elections to the parliament, candidates who are entered on the lists of political parties usually (traditionally) take part in such elections.

Consequently, under the Constitution, the legislature may also establish such a procedure of elections to the Seimas whereby a multi-member constituency of elections to the Seimas would be formed and the lists of candidates would compete in it; in addition, according to such a procedure, the election results would be established in this multi-member constituency by taking account of the proportions of the votes of voters cast for the lists of candidates.

It also needs to be noted that, in its ruling of 11 May 2011 ... and in its ruling of 17 November 2011 ... the Constitutional Court held, inter alia, that:

- the legislature, when regulating the relationships of the election of the members of municipal councils, has broad discretion as regards the choice of methods for establishing election results and for distributing mandates and as regards the consolidation of the so-called election thresholds;
- as a rule, an election threshold is established in order to avoid a serious fragmentation into small groups in an elected representative institution and to ensure its stability;
- the election threshold set by the legislature for electing a representative institution must not be too high, so that it does not create the preconditions for not reflecting the interests of different voters and violating their right to participate in deciding questions of self-government through democratically elected representatives.

It needs to be noted that the quoted provisions of the official constitutional doctrine should mutatis mutandis be applied in cases where the legislature establishes the procedure for the election of the members of the Seimas under Paragraph 3 of Article 56 of the Constitution.

It also needs to be noted that the non-fragmentation of the Seimas into small groups, as well as the stability of the Seimas, is a constitutional value, which creates the preconditions for ensuring, inter alia, the stability of the Government, the activity of which, under the Constitution, inter alia, Item 7 of Article 67 and Paragraph 5 of Article 92 thereof, is based on the confidence of the Seimas, once the Seimas assents to its programme, and which, as established in Paragraph 1 of Article 96 of the Constitution, is jointly and severally responsible to the Seimas for its general activities.

Consequently, when establishing the procedure for the election of the members of the Seimas, inter alia, the ways of establishing the results of the election to the Seimas and distributing the mandates of members of the Seimas in the multi-member electoral constituency, the legislature has the discretion to establish the so-called election thresholds, by means of which it is sought to avoid a large fragmentation of the Seimas into small groups, as well as to ensure the stability and efficiency of the work of the Seimas, i.e. to establish that only the lists of candidates that have received a certain percentage of votes take part in the distribution of the mandates of members of the Seimas in the multi-member electoral constituency.

It also needs to be noted that, when implementing its discretion to establish election thresholds as a way of establishing the results of the election to the Seimas and a way of distributing the mandates of members of the Seimas in the multi-member constituency, the legislature is bound by the Constitution, inter alia, by the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law and one of its elements – the constitutional principle of proportionality.

The mass and/or systemic bribery of the electorate is a gross violation of the principles of democratic, free, and fair elections

The Constitutional Court's conclusion of 26 October 2012

... the mass and/or systemic bribery of the electorate, inter alia, by offering gifts or other rewards, prompting voters or persons eligible to vote to attend or not to attend an election and/or to vote for or against one or another candidate during the electoral process (inter alia, during the election campaigning and the period of voting) should be regarded as a gross violation of the principles of democratic, free, and fair elections, inter alia, a gross violation of the principles of the fair and transparent electoral process. Such violations of the electoral principles create the preconditions for a reasonable doubt about the legitimacy and legality of the election results, thus, such violations can limit or deny altogether the expression of the supreme sovereign power of the Nation through the representation of the Nation – the Seimas.

[...]

... Since, as mentioned before, such violations create the preconditions for a reasonable doubt about the legitimacy and legality of the election results, such violations can limit or deny altogether the expression of the supreme sovereign power of the Nation through the representation of the Nation – the Seimas, it should be presumed that, as such, the said violations should be regarded to have an essential influence on the election results. Such a presumption may be denied by the Central Electoral Commission after it assesses other concrete circumstances of the electoral process that are significant for establishing the election results (e.g. a too small number of votes received by a political party or a candidate responsible for the gross violations of [the prohibition on bribing voters]).

... the one-off distribution of goods, money, or other gifts and/or the rendering of services free of charge for a considerable number of voters during rallies or other events meant for entire society or only its part at the time of the electoral process, thus prompting people to attend or not to attend an election and/or to vote for or against one or another candidate during the electoral process, should also be regarded as the mass bribery of voters and persons eligible to vote.

The legal regulation governing the formation, powers, and activity of the Central Electoral Commission and territorial institutions organising elections

The Constitutional Court's conclusion of 26 October 2012

In its conclusion of 23 November 1996, the Constitutional Court emphasised that, when democratic elections are held, the mechanisms of publicity and control are of crucial importance. In this context, it needs to be noted that, under Item 13 of Paragraph 1 of Article 67 of the Constitution, the Seimas forms the Central Electoral Commission and alters its composition. In its decision (no 5/94) of 11 July 1994, the Constitutional Court held that, under the said provision, the universal institution for the organisation of elections – the Central Electoral Commission – must be formed; the constitutional provision on the Central Electoral Commission must be implemented by consolidating, by means of a law, the mission of this commission based on the relevant constitutional provisions, as well as the principles of its formation and competence. It needs to be noted that a law must establish such a legal regulation of the procedure for forming the Central Electoral Commission and territorial institutions for organising elections that would create the preconditions for those institutions to adopt objective and efficient decisions on organising elections.

... the constitutional mission of the Central Electoral Commission to organise elections also implies its powers to exercise control and take measures so that the observance of the principles of democratic, free, and fair elections would be efficiently ensured, inter alia, that the principles of the fairness and transparency of the electoral process would be ensured. When taking account of the aforesaid, under the Constitution, the legislature should establish such a legal regulation on the electoral process whereby the Central Electoral Commission and the territorial institutions for organising elections would have the powers to act so that the adherence to the aforesaid electoral principles would be efficiently ensured, inter alia, violations of these principles would be prevented, such violations would be investigated, and sanctions would be applied to the participants of the electoral process and other persons that are responsible for such violations.

The Constitution consolidates the principle of responsible governance (ruling of 1 July 2004). ... this principle implies that all state institutions and officials, inter alia, the Central Electoral Commission and the territorial institutions for organising elections, are obliged to follow the Constitution and law while performing their functions and to properly implement the powers granted to them by the Constitution and laws by acting in the interests of the Nation and the State of Lithuania.

[...]

... if, prior to the day of voting, the Central Electoral Commission had the powers to cancel the registration of a candidate who has grossly violated the prohibition ... on bribing voters ... the legal preconditions would be created for ensuring the fairness and transparency of the electoral process without resorting to the strictest measure ... which is declaring the election results in a constituency invalid.

Forming political representative institutions in a democratic state

The Constitutional Court's conclusion of 10 November 2012

When emphasising the importance of elections to representative institutions, the Constitutional Court has held on more than one occasion that, in a constitutional democracy, the formation of political representative institutions is subject to special requirements. These institutions may not be formed in such a way that would raise doubts as to their legitimacy or legality, inter alia, doubts as to whether the principles of a democratic state under the rule of law were upheld in the course of the election of persons to political representative institutions. Otherwise, the trust of people in the representative democracy, state institutions, and the state itself would be undermined. Democratic elections are an important form of the participation of citizens in the governance of the state, as well as a necessary element of the formation of state political representative institutions. Elections may not be regarded as democratic or their results as legitimate and legal if elections are held by showing no consideration for the principles of democratic elections established in the Constitution and violating democratic electoral procedures (conclusion of 5 November 2004, the ruling of 1 October 2008, the conclusion of 7 November 2008, the rulings of 9 November 2010 and 29 March 2012, and the conclusion of 26 October 2012). In consolidating the provisions of electoral law in concrete laws, the legislature is obliged to follow the imperatives of a legal regulation that are consolidated in the Constitution (rulings of 1 October 2008 and 29 March 2012 and the conclusion of 26 October 2012).

The Constitution consolidates the following universally recognised democratic principles of elections to political representative institutions: elections must be conducted on the basis of universal, equal, and direct suffrage, and the ballot must be secret; under the Constitution, only such elections are allowed where there is free and fair competition for the mandate, where voters have the right and a real possibility of choosing from several candidates, where they can express their will freely and without being subjected to control at the time of voting; the requirements for transparency and publicity must be applied to the formation of a political representative institution (ruling of 9 November 2010).

Gross violations of the principles of democratic, free, and fair elections (inter alia, the mass and/or systemic bribery of the electorate)

The Constitutional Court's conclusion of 10 November 2012

... as it was held in the Constitutional Court's conclusion of 26 October 2012, mass and/or systemic bribery of the electorate, inter alia, by offering gifts or other rewards, prompting voters or persons eligible to vote to attend or not to attend an election and/or to vote for or against one or another candidate during the electoral process (inter alia, during the election agitation campaign and the period of voting) should be regarded as a gross violation of the principles of democratic, free, and fair elections, inter alia, that of the fair and transparent electoral process. Such violations of the electoral principles create the preconditions for a reasonable doubt about the legitimacy and legality of the election results; thus, such violations can limit or deny altogether the expression of the supreme sovereign power of the Nation through the representation of the Nation – the Seimas; therefore, it should be presumed that, as such, the said violations should be regarded as having an essential influence on the election results. Such a presumption may be denied by the Central Electoral Commission after it assesses other concrete circumstances of the electoral process that are significant for establishing the election results. It has also been emphasised in the aforesaid conclusion of the Constitutional Court that one-off distribution of goods, money, or other gifts and/or the rendering of services free of charge for a considerable number of voters during rallies or other events meant for entire society or only its part at the time of the electoral process, thus prompting people to attend or not to attend an election and/or to vote for or against one or another candidate during the electoral process, should also be regarded as the mass bribery of voters and persons eligible to vote.

... it needs to be noted that the provisions of the official constitutional doctrine regarding mass and/or systemic bribery of voters are also applicable to the bribery of voters by prompting them to vote in favour or against the list of this or that political party and/or to rank the candidates on a list in this or that manner.

... it ... needs to be emphasised that, unless denied by the respective authority, as such, the established gross violations of the principles of democratic, free, and fair elections, inter alia, the fairness and transparency of the electoral process, should be regarded as having an essential influence on the election results, i.e. unless denied by the respective authority, the said gross violations distort the genuine will of voters, which is the essential precondition for the legitimacy and lawfulness of election results, and preclude the establishment of the actual and correct results of elections; thus, the candidates whose election was sought by committing gross violations of the principles of democratic, free, and fair elections may not receive the mandate of a member of the Seimas; otherwise, the trust of the Nation in its representation and the state itself would be undermined.

[...]

... by the direct or indirect bribery of voters, inter alia, by offering gifts or other rewards, prompting them to cast preference votes for one or another candidate in the multi-member constituency, the genuine will of voters, which is the essential precondition for the legitimacy and lawfulness of election results, can be distorted; thus, in every situation where the Central Electoral Commission approves the final sequence of the lists of candidates for members of the Seimas, it has the duty to ascertain that there are no reasonable doubts that the genuine will of voters could be distorted, inter alia, when preference votes were cast for one or another candidate entered on the list of candidates of a party.

The powers of the Central Electoral Commission to declare election results invalid

The Constitutional Court's conclusion of 10 November 2012

... under the Constitution, the legislature should establish such a legal regulation on the electoral process whereby the Central Electoral Commission and the territorial institutions for organising elections would have the powers to act so that the adherence to the principles of democratic, free, and fair elections, inter alia, the fairness and transparency of the electoral process, would be effectively ensured. This means, among other things, that, under the Constitution, the Central Electoral Commission should have sufficient powers so that, upon establishing gross violations of the aforesaid electoral principles, it could effectively ensure that those violations would not distort the genuine will of voters and that the persons regarding the lawfulness of whose election there are doubts would not receive the mandate of a member of the Seimas. The Central Electoral Commission should have, inter alia, the powers to apply the strictest measure – to declare the results of an election invalid. It needs to be noted that the legislature should provide for the said measure as an ultima ratio, i.e. such a legal regulation of the electoral process should be established whereby the Central Electoral Commission would also have other measures to ensure that the genuine will of voters would not be distorted, inter alia, to recognise that the participants of the electoral process – the candidates whose election was sought by committing gross violations of the principles of democratic, free, and fair elections, inter alia, the fairness and transparency of the electoral process, or the entire list of a political party resorting to such tactics in its election campaign – have lost the right to participate in the election and to stand for election as members of the Seimas, or to recognise that a certain list of candidates has lost the right to participate in the distribution of the mandates of members of the Seimas; thus, declaring election results invalid should be regarded as a measure applicable in situations where it is impossible to achieve the non-distortion of the will of voters by other means.

... in the regulation of the said powers of the Central Electoral Commission by means of a law, account should be taken of the particularities of the electoral systems (inter alia, of the fact that the recognition of election results in the multi-member constituency and in a single-member constituency could give rise to essentially different effects); account should also be taken of the fact that, under Paragraph 2 of Article 55 of the Constitution, the Seimas is deemed elected when not less than 3/5 of the members of the Seimas are elected; therefore, when consideration is given to the damage that might be inflicted on the expectations of voters and on the stability of the system of state authority if the election results of an election to the Seimas conducted under the proportional electoral system are declared invalid, this measure (declaring election results invalid in the multi-member constituency) should be an ultima ratio.

The powers of the Seimas to adopt a final decision on the results of an election to the Seimas (Paragraph 3 of Article 107 of the Constitution)

See 5. The Seimas, 5.2. The functions and powers of the Seimas, 5.2.6. Other powers, the ruling of 27 May 2014.

The requirement that, after the legislature chooses exclusively the proportional system of elections, persons must have the possibility of standing for election even when they are included in the lists of candidates that are drawn up by entities other than political parties

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 13 October 2014

In its ruling of 9 November 2010, the Constitutional Court held that, under the Constitution, the legal regulation consolidating the exclusive right of political parties (their members or candidates supported by political parties) to participate in the formation of political representative institutions is not allowed; the legislature, having chosen exclusively the proportional electoral system, must, in a law, not only consolidate the right of political parties to participate in elections, but also establish what other collective entities can participate and have the right to nominate candidates, by presenting lists of their candidates, in elections to political representative institutions. The Constitutional Court drew attention to the fact that the Constitution consolidates not only the institution of political parties, but also that of political organisations: the constitutional concept of political organisations encompasses the organisations founded to serve various socially important needs and having political aspirations, inter alia, to participate in elections to political representative institutions; the same concept also encompasses such organisations that are founded for the purpose of implementing certain political aspirations, among other things, for participating in a concrete election, inter alia, to the European Parliament.

[...]

... the constitutional requirement [was] revealed in the Constitutional Court's ruling of 9 November 2010 that, if the legislature chooses exclusively the proportional electoral system, citizens of the Republic of Lithuania and citizens of other Member States of the European Union who permanently reside in Lithuania must be given the possibility of standing for election to the European Parliament also in cases when they are entered on the lists of candidates that are drawn up by entities other than political parties.

The passive electoral right in elections to political representative institutions, inter alia, the European Parliament (Paragraph 2 of Article 34 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 13 October 2014

The Constitutional Court has held that, under the Constitution, in the regulation of electoral relationships by means of a law, it is necessary to ensure an equal active electoral right of all voters (their right to vote, i.e. to exercise the active electoral right), as well as an equal passive electoral right of all candidates (their right to be registered in an election as a candidate, i.e. the right to stand for election) (rulings of 11 May 2011, 17 November 2011, and 29 March 2012).

The provision of Paragraph 2 of Article 34 of the Constitution, according to which the right to stand for election is established by the Constitution of the Republic of Lithuania and by the election laws, consolidates the so-called passive electoral right, i.e. the possibility for a person to stand as a candidate for a member of a particular elective institution of public power under the procedure established in the Constitution and election laws; thus, it consolidates the possibility of seeking to stand for election (rulings of 1 October 2008, 9 November 2010, and 29 March 2012).

[...]

The Constitutional Court has noted that the European Parliament is not the representation of the Nation; however, it should be regarded as a political representative institution of the European Union, whose election procedure in a concrete Member State of the European Union is established by the legislature of that Member State (ruling of 9 November 2010).

Thus, the provision of Paragraph 2 of Article 34 of the Constitution, according to which the right to stand for election is established by the Constitution of the Republic of Lithuania and by the election laws, means, inter alia, that, in regulating, by means of laws, the implementation of the passive electoral right in elections to representative political institutions, inter alia, the European Parliament, the legislature has the constitutional duty to respect the imperatives that arise out of the Constitution, i.e. it has to pay regard, inter alia, to the principles of electoral law (ruling of 9 November 2010).

In interpreting Paragraph 2 of Article 34 of the Constitution, the Constitutional Court has also held that the right of a person, which is guaranteed by the Constitution, to stand for election under the conditions provided for in the law is an important constitutional right of a person (ruling of 11 May 2011); in election laws, the legislature has the powers to establish the constitutionally justifiable requirements (conditions) for a person who is eligible to stand for election (rulings of 25 May 2004, 17 November 2011, and 29 March 2012).

The Constitution guarantees and safeguards the interest of the public to be informed (inter alia, the rulings of 23 October 2002, 8 July 2005, 21 December 2006, and 17 November 2011). In interpreting Paragraph 2 of Article 34 of the Constitution in conjunction with the right of the public to receive information, which is consolidated in Article 25 thereof, the Constitutional Court has emphasised that the interest of the public to be informed assumes especial importance in the process of elections to political representative institutions (rulings of 17 November 2011 and 29 March 2012).

The Constitutional Court has also noted that the legislature must ensure fair competition among subjects implementing the passive electoral right, as well as the publicity of information important to voters regarding those subjects (rulings of 17 November 2011 and 29 March 2012).

... Paragraph 2 of Article 34 of the Constitution gives rise to the duty of the legislature to establish such a legal regulation that would ensure the adherence to the principles of democratic elections, inter alia, the transparency of the electoral process, the equality of the candidates nominated by collective entities, fair competition, as well as the publicity of information important to voters about such entities. The ensuring of democratic electoral principles implies the establishment of the legal regulation creating the preconditions for informing voters in a proper manner about the collective entities that nominate candidates in an election, inter alia, the names of such entities; this information must be public, easily accessible, and it must not mislead voters; the collective entities that nominate candidates in an election must have the possibility of participating in the electoral process and presenting themselves under the name of their choice to voters. It should be noted that the name of these entities helps voters not only to recognise and distinguish them from other collective entities that nominate candidates, but also to decide about their values, strivings, etc. If their possibility of participating in the electoral process and presenting themselves under the name of their choice were restricted, the implementation of the passive electoral right of the persons entered on the lists of candidates nominated by such entities would be burdened and the principles of the transparency of the process of a democratic electoral process, of the equality of collective entities that nominate candidates in an election, and of fair competition would be violated.

At the same time, it needs to be noted that the collective entities that have the right to nominate candidates in elections to political representative institutions, when they choose their name under which they wish to present themselves to voters, and the legislature, when it regulates the respective relationships, are bound by the Constitution, inter alia, the constitutional principle of elections as a responsible political process, the constitutional imperatives to respect and protect the constitutional order, public order, to protect public morals, not to incite national, racial, religious, or social hatred, and not to incite violence or discrimination. The principles of democratic elections consolidated in the Constitution also give rise to the imperative for the legislature to establish such a legal regulation that would ensure that, during the electoral process, voters are properly informed about the collective entities that nominate candidates in a particular election, inter alia, the names of such entities, which must not be misleading to voters.

The requirement that the even distribution of the number of voters must be ensured in single-member constituencies (Paragraph 1 of Article 55 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 20 October 2015

... it should be noted that, having decided on such an electoral system where the members of the Seimas (or part thereof) are elected in single-member constituencies, the legislature is under the duty, which stems from the Constitution, inter alia, Paragraph 1 of Article 55 thereof, to establish a legal regulation ensuring that the number of voters in these constituencies does not differ to such an extent that creates the preconditions for distorting the equal weight of votes when the results of voting are established.

The greater the difference in the number of voters among separate constituencies, the greater the distortion of the equal weight of votes can be when the results of voting are established. However, this does not mean that, under the Constitution, any differences in the number of voters among separate constituencies are not possible at all.

In this context, it should be noted that the number of voters in constituencies is subject to change (increase or decrease) due to various objective reasons (inter alia, the migration of voters or other demographic factors). In view of this fact, it should be pointed out that, when constituencies are formed, it is not possible with complete accuracy to determine what the number of voters will be on the election day in each constituency. As held by the Constitutional Court on more than one occasion, legal acts may not require what is impossible (lex non cogit ad impossibilia). The Constitutional Court has also held that the Constitution does not require what is irrational (ruling of 27 June 2007). Thus, the Constitution does not require that such a legal regulation be established under which exactly the same number of voters in all constituencies would be ensured.

In its ruling of 13 October 2014, the Constitutional Court noted that fair competition among subjects exercising their passive electoral right and the transparency of the electoral process are the universally recognised principles of democratic elections. ... ensuring the aforementioned principles of democratic elections implies certain requirements for the formation of constituencies: constituencies must be formed transparently; they must satisfy the principle of connectivity and must be compact; their boundaries must be clear and understandable. Under the Constitution, while seeking to maintain a balance among various constitutional values, inter alia, to ensure the implementation of the requirements stemming with regard to the formation of constituencies from the universally recognised principles of democratic elections, such as equal suffrage, fair competition among subjects exercising their passive electoral right, and the transparency of the electoral process, it is permissible to establish such a legal regulation that allows certain differences in the number of voters among constituencies. However, there is no constitutional justification for a legal regulation that would allow such differences in the number of voters that would create the preconditions for distorting the equal weight of votes when the results of voting are established or the preconditions for denying the essence of equal suffrage as such.

Thus, once the legislature has chosen such an electoral system where the members of the Seimas (part thereof) are elected in single-member constituencies, the Constitution, inter alia, Paragraph 1 of Article 55 thereof, gives rise to the duty of the legislature, taking account of all circumstances significant for the formation of constituencies (inter alia, the migration of voters, other demographic factors, the principle of connectivity), to establish a legal regulation under which constituencies are formed in such a way that ensures, to the greatest possible extent, the even distribution of the number of voters among constituencies. This is an essential precondition for ensuring the equality and equal weight of all votes when the results of voting are established. When implementing this duty, which stems from the Constitution, and establishing the respective legal regulation, the legislature may not create any preconditions for denying, distorting, or unjustifiably limiting equal suffrage.

The day of regular elections and early elections to the Seimas (Article 57 and Paragraph 4 of Article 58 of the Constitution); the day of the regular elections, repeat elections, and early elections of the President of the Republic (Article 80, Paragraphs 2 and 3 of Article 81, Paragraph 1 of Article 87, and Paragraph 1 of Article 89 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 15 February 2019

Under Paragraph 1 of Article 57 of the Constitution, a regular election to the Seimas is held in the year of the expiry of the powers of the members of the Seimas on the second Sunday of October and, according to Paragraph 2 of the same article, a regular election to the Seimas following an early election to the Seimas is held at the time specified in the first paragraph of this article. Thus, Article 57 of the Constitution expressis verbis establishes the specific date for regular elections to the Seimas, i.e. one day for an election to the Seimas.

According to Paragraph 4 of Article 58 of the Constitution, the day of election to the new Seimas is specified in the resolution of the Seimas or in the act of the President of the Republic on the early election to the Seimas; the election to the new Seimas must be held within 3 months of the adoption of the decision on the early election. Taking account of Article 57 of the Constitution, the term “the day of election to the Seimas”, used in Paragraph 4 of Article 58 of the Constitution, should be interpreted as meaning that, under the Constitution, one day of an early election to the Seimas may be established, which must be a Sunday.

[...]

Under Article 80 of the Constitution, a regular election of the President of the Republic is held on the last Sunday two months before the expiry of the term of office of the President of the Republic. Under Paragraph 2 of Article 81 of the Constitution, if, during the first round of voting in the election of the President of the Republic, no single candidate gets the requisite number of votes, the second round of voting is held two weeks later with the two candidates who have received the greatest number of votes standing against each other. Taking account of Article 80 of the Constitution, the provision “the second round of voting is held two weeks later” of Paragraph 2 of Article 81 of the Constitution should be interpreted as meaning that the second round of voting with the two candidates who have received the greatest number of votes in the first round of voting in the election of the President of the Republic should be held on the Sunday after two weeks after the Sunday that is the last Sunday two months before the expiry of the term of office of the President of the Republic. It should be noted that the second round of voting in the election of the President of the Republic is not identical to the first round of voting in this election, i.e. in the second round of voting in the election of the President of the Republic, votes are cast not for all candidates, but only for the two candidates who have received the greatest number of votes in the first round of voting in the election of the President of the Republic.

Thus, Article 80 and Paragraph 2 of Article 81 of the Constitution expressis verbis establish the specific date of a regular election of the President of the Republic, i.e. one day of the election, as well as the specific date of the second round of voting in the election of the President of the Republic, i.e. one day of the election, on which votes are cast for the two candidates who have received the greatest number of votes in the first round of voting.

Under Paragraph 3 of Article 81 of the Constitution, if no more than two candidates take part in the first round, and neither of them receives the requisite number of votes, a repeat election is held. According to Paragraph 1 of Article 87 of the Constitution, after, in cases provided for in Paragraph 2 of Article 58 of the Constitution, the President of the Republic calls an early election to the Seimas, the newly elected Seimas may, by a 3/5 majority vote of all the members of the Seimas and within 30 days of the day of the first sitting, call an early election of the President of the Republic; also, under Paragraph 1 of Article 89 of the Constitution, the Seimas must, within 10 days, call an election of the President of the Republic, which must be held within two months (if the Seimas cannot convene and call the election of the President of the Republic, the election is called by the Government), in the event that the President of the Republic dies, resigns, or is removed from office according to the procedure for impeachment proceedings, or the Seimas decides that the state of health of the President of the Republic does not allow him/her to hold office (such election of the President of the Republic should also be considered an early election). In interpreting these provisions of the Constitution in the context of the provisions of Article 80 thereof, it should be noted that Paragraph 3 of Article 81 of the Constitution provides for a repeat election of the President of the Republic, Paragraph 1 of Article 87 thereof provides for an early election of the President of the Republic, and Paragraph 1 of Article 89 thereof stipulates that an election of the President of the Republic is called in the event that the President of the Republic dies, resigns, or is removed from office according to the procedure for impeachment proceedings, or the Seimas decides that the state of health of the President of the Republic does not allow him/her to hold office – in all these cases, the election must also take place on one day, which must be a Sunday.

It should be held that Article 57, Paragraph 4 of Article 58, Article 80, Paragraphs 2 and 3 of Article 81, Paragraph 1 of Article 87, and Paragraph 1 of Article 89 of the Constitution establish the requirement that elections to the Seimas and the elections of the President of the Republic must last one day (it is provided that regular elections are held on the specific date), which must be a Sunday.

It should be emphasised that, under the Constitution, such a requirement is not an objective in itself. As the Constitutional Court held in its ruling of 19 September 2002, the provision of Article 1 of the Constitution that the State of Lithuania is an independent democratic republic, inter alia, means that free and periodic elections and the democratic process of decision making must be ensured in the state; this provision embodies the constitutional obligation not to deviate from the requirements of democracy; the said obligation is applicable to all state institutions, including the legislature. One of the fundamental characteristics of a democratic state is democratic elections to representative institutions of state power (inter alia, the conclusions of 23 November 1996 and 7 November 2008 and the ruling of 29 March 2012).

In view of this, it should be noted that the above-mentioned constitutional requirement that elections to the Seimas and the elections of the President of the Republic must last one day (i.e. the Constitution makes the precise provision for the specific date for regular elections and the procedure for determining the day of repeat or early elections) is aimed at ensuring the implementation of a necessary condition of democracy – free and periodic elections and the democratic process of decision making during elections. Establishing, in the Constitution, the precise day for regular elections and limiting, under the Constitution, the discretion to choose the day and duration of repeat or early elections precludes the state authority institutions that, under the Constitution, are vested with the powers to call elections from abusing these powers, inter alia, from influencing the election results while exercising the said powers. At the same time, this constitutes one of the preconditions for ensuring the fairness and transparency of the electoral process and revealing the actual will of voters in elections.

2.3.4. The right to enter state service

See 4. The state and its institutions, 4.3. State service.

2.3.5. The right to criticise the work of state institutions or their officials and to appeal against their decisions

The right to criticise the work of state institutions or their officials (Paragraph 2 of Article 33 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 10 March 1998

Paragraph 2 of Article 33 of the Constitution prescribes: “Citizens shall be guaranteed the right to criticise the work of state institutions or their officials and to appeal against their decisions. Persecution for criticism shall be prohibited.”

Between these norms and ... norms of Article 25 of the Constitution there is a connection as regards the fact that Article 25 ensures the freedom to have one's own convictions, while freedom of information is concretely expressed in Paragraph 2 of Article 33, i.e. citizens are guaranteed the right to express critical opinions or views, to disseminate critical information with respect to the work of state institutions or officials. The constitutionally established prohibition against the persecution of people for criticism is a solid guarantee for the implementation of this constitutional right. ...

It is worth noting that the function of the norms of Paragraph 2 of Article 33 of the Constitution is not limited only by guaranteeing the subjective right of citizens to criticise the work of state institutions or officials. The said constitutional norms are also linked with the implementation of the fundamental provision consolidated in the Chapter “The State of Lithuania” of the Constitution, according to which state institutions serve the people.

The right to criticise the work of state institutions or their officials (Paragraph 2 of Article 33 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's conclusion of 31 March 2004

Paragraph 2 of Article 33 of the Constitution provides that citizens are guaranteed the right to criticise the work of state institutions or their officials and to appeal against their decisions, and that persecution for criticism is prohibited. This constitutional civil right is inseparable from the right of everyone to have his/her own convictions and freely express them, from the right of everyone to impart information and ideas, which are enshrined in Article 25 of the Constitution. It should be noted that the freedom to express convictions and to impart information is incompatible with criminal actions – incitement to national, racial, religious, or social hatred, or incitement to violence or to discrimination, as well as defamation and disinformation.

The right to criticise state institutions or officials is a right of every citizen of the Republic of Lithuania, including state officials or politicians.

The right to criticise the work of state institutions or their officials and to appeal against their decisions (Paragraph 2 of Article 33 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 26 January 2006

Under Paragraph 2 of Article 33 of the Constitution, citizens are guaranteed the right to criticise the work of state institutions or their officials and to appeal against their decisions. This constitutional right of citizens is one of the rights by implementing which citizens may also participate in the governance of their state. The said provision of Paragraph 2 of Article 33 of the Constitution may not be interpreted only literally: it should [also] be interpreted [in the context of] Article 124 of the Constitution, under which the acts or actions of municipal councils or of their executive bodies or officials that violate the rights of citizens or organisations may be appealed against before a court. Thus, under Paragraph 2 of Article 33 of the Constitution, citizens are guaranteed the right to criticise not only the work of state institutions, but also the work of municipal institutions or their officials, and to appeal not only against decisions of state institutions, but also against decisions of municipal institutions or their officials.

... the right of citizens to criticise the work of state institutions or their officials and to appeal against their decisions, which is consolidated in Paragraph 2 of Article 33 of the Constitution, may not be identified with the right of petition of citizens, which is consolidated in Paragraph 3 of Article 33 of the Constitution, as each of these rights has its own specific content; this implies, inter alia, different procedures for implementing these rights, as well as certain particularities of their protection.

2.3.6. The right of petition

The right of petition (Paragraph 3 of Article 33 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 26 January 2006

The Constitution consolidates the right of citizens to participate in the governance of their state (Paragraph 1 of Article 33 of the Constitution). The constitutional right of petition is one of the rights by implementing which citizens may participate in the governance of their state. In the legal system of Lithuania, like in most European countries, a petition is usually understood as an application of an individual or a certain group to institutions of public power, which contains a demand (proposal) that a certain issue be resolved in cases where such an issue is important not only to the petitioner, but also to society or part thereof, and where, in order to resolve the said issue, it is necessary to amend or supplement an effective legal act or declare it no longer valid, or to pass a new legal act.

Under Paragraph 3 of Article 33 of the Constitution, the procedure for implementing the right of petition is established by law. Thus, the legislature has the duty to regulate the relationships connected with petitions not through any type of a legal act, but precisely by means of a law, in which all the most important elements of the procedure for implementing the right of petition must be established, i.e. such a law must define the reasons on the grounds of which it would be allowed to file a petition; it must define the institutions of public power with which petitions may be filed; it must define formal requirements with which petitions must comply; such a law must also define the procedure for filing petitions, the procedure for adopting decisions refusing to accept petitions, and for appealing against such decisions, etc.

According to the Constitution, when establishing the procedure for implementing the right of petition by law, the legislature has certain discretion; however, the legislature may not deny the very essence of the right of petition, nor may it artificially restrict or groundlessly burden the implementation of this constitutional right of citizens.

[...]

The constitutional concept of the right of petition implies that the constitutional right of petition of a citizen is deemed to have been implemented when a certain institution of public power with the respective powers considers a filed petition and makes a decision on granting or not granting the demands (proposals) of the petition.

The right to challenge before a court a decision, adopted by an institution of public power, not to deem an application to be a petition or to refuse to accept a petition for consideration

The Constitutional Court's decision of 28 June 2016

... when regulating the relationships connected with petitions and implementing the requirement, stemming from Paragraph 3 of Article 33 of the Constitution, to establish by law, inter alia, the procedure for adopting decisions on refusing to accept petitions and for filing appeals against such decisions, the legislature, invoking Paragraph 4 of Article 111 of the Constitution, whereby the competence of all the courts specified in Paragraphs 1 and 2 of Article 111 of the Constitution must be established by means of a law, has discretion to establish which court has the competence to consider cases on the protection of the constitutional right of petition of citizens, inter alia, cases dealing with refusals to grant a complaint filed against a decision not to deem an application to be a petition or not to accept a petition for consideration.

[...]

... under the Constitution, inter alia, Paragraph 1 of Article 30 and Paragraph 3 of Article 33 thereof, such a refusal of the Seimas (or another competent institution) to grant a complaint filed against a decision of the petitions commission not to deem an application to be a petition or to refuse to accept a petition for consideration where the said refusal is not based on the grounds laid down in ... laws or is based on such grounds that are not laid down in ... laws must be subject to the right to apply to a court. Consequently, a citizen who believes that his/her constitutional right consolidated in Paragraph 3 of Article 33 of the Constitution is violated (not implemented) due to the fact that an institution with the respective powers refused to deem his/her application a petition or to accept his/her petition not on the grounds laid down in ... laws must have the right to apply to a court regarding the defence of his/her possibly violated constitutional right of petition.

... it should be held that, under the Constitution, Paragraph 1 of Article 30 and Paragraph 3 of Article 33 thereof, the legislature, when regulating relationships connected with petitions and when establishing, by means of a law, inter alia, the procedure for filing petitions, as well as the procedure for adopting decisions on refusing to accept petitions and for filing appeals against such decisions, must establish such a legal regulation that would ensure the possibility of challenging before a court a final decision of an institution that accepts petitions where the said decision refuses to deem a particular application to be a petition or refuses to accept a petition and where such a decision is not based on the grounds laid down in ... laws or is based on such grounds that are not laid down in ... laws. The constitutional right of petition of citizens must be defended in a real and effective rather than perfunctory manner.

... a decision to refuse to deem an application filed by a citizen to be a petition or to refuse to accept a petition for consideration may be formalised by means of a substatutory legal act (as, for instance, a resolution of the Seimas, a resolution of the Seimas written in minutes, a decision of the Seimas, etc.); such a legal act must be adopted on the basis of the respective law and must not be in conflict with higher-ranking legal acts, inter alia (and, first of all), with the Constitution.

In view of the fact that, under the Constitution, while administering justice, courts (judges) must invoke only such laws that are not in conflict with the Constitution and may not apply any legal act that is in conflict with the Constitution and/or another higher-ranking legal act, in cases where the decision to refuse to deem an application filed by a citizen to be a petition or to refuse to accept a petition for consideration is adopted by a state institution (Seimas, the Government, or the President of the Republic) investigation into whose acts in terms of their lawfulness falls within the competence of the Constitutional Court, the court (judge) that considers the case, when faced with doubts over the lawfulness of such an act, has the duty to suspend the consideration of the case and to apply to the Constitutional Court for determining the compliance of the said decision adopted by a state institution with higher-ranking legal acts, inter alia (and, first of all), with the Constitution, where such a decision, in the opinion of the court considering the case, is not based on the grounds laid down in ... laws or is based on such grounds that are not laid down in ... laws. As held by the Constitutional Court, in cases where a court considering such a case has doubts over the compliance of a legal act applicable in that case with the Constitution and/or higher-ranking legal acts and decides not to apply to the Constitutional Court in order that the said doubts are removed and a legal act the constitutionality of which is not questionable is applied in the case, such a court would risk adopting an unfair decision (inter alia, the rulings of 16 January 2006, 28 March 2006, and 25 January 2013).

In cases where a court (judge) that considers a case, upon assessing the evidence and other material of the case and upon establishing the relevant important circumstances, is not faced with doubts over the compliance, with higher-ranking legal acts, of such an act adopted by an institution of state power that refuses to deem an application of a citizen to be a petition or refuses to accept a petition for consideration ... such a court (judge) has the constitutional powers to consider the said case on its merits.

... it should also be noted that the legislature must clearly indicate, in a law, the manner of applying to a court regarding the defence of the constitutional right of petition of persons and must therein clearly specify which court has the jurisdiction in such matters (e.g. a certain law may establish special competence exercised by courts of general jurisdiction or specialised courts, or a new specialised court may be founded under Paragraph 2 of Article 111 of the Constitution, etc.) so that citizens could apply to that court, inter alia, when their constitutional right of petition has been violated by the decision of an institution of public power to refuse to deem an application filed by the citizen to be a petition or to refuse to accept a petition for consideration in cases where such a decision is not based on the grounds laid down in ... laws or is based on such grounds that are not laid down in ... laws. If the legislature failed to introduce the real possibilities of defending the right of petition of citizens, which is guaranteed in Paragraph 3 of Article 33 of the Constitution, and, inter alia, if it failed to establish the procedure for challenging before a court a final decision to refuse to deem an application to be a petition or to refuse to accept a petition for consideration, the effectiveness of the constitutional right of petition of citizens would be denied, the practical implementation of the said right would be restricted and, at the same time, the right of persons to apply to a court regarding the defence of their right of petition would be violated.

2.3.7. The right to form political parties

See 2.2. Civil (individual) rights and freedoms, 2.2.10. Freedom of association.

2.4. ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL RIGHTS

Chapter IV “The National Economy and Labour” of the Constitution

The Constitutional Court’s ruling of 24 September 1998

Chapter IV “The National Economy and Labour” of the Constitution consolidates not only freedom of individual economic activity and the national economy based on private ownership, but also the regulation of economic activity so that it serves the general welfare of the nation. In the norms of this chapter, the economic and social spheres are not opposed, but supplement one another.

2.4.1.1. Freedom of economic activity and economic initiative

The protection of the interests of consumers (Paragraph 5 of Article 46 of the Constitution)The Constitutional Court's ruling of 18 October 2000

Paragraph 5 of Article 46 of the Constitution lays down the duty of the state to defend the interests of consumers. This constitutional provision implies that various measures to protect the interests of consumers must be established by means of legal norms and that state institutions must exercise control over how economic operators comply with the established requirements, etc.

The legal regulation of pharmaceutical activities as a special sphere of economic activity (for more information, see 2.4.2. Social rights, 2.4.2.2. The right to healthcare)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 14 March 2002

The specific nature of medicines and medicinal substances as goods constitutes the fact that pharmaceutical activities are a special area of economic activity. It is in the interest of every individual, all society, and the state that laws and other legal acts would establish such a legal regulation whereby pharmaceutical activities would be conducted only by individuals who have specialist training and hold the respective qualification. The duty of the legislature to establish such a legal regulation arises out of Paragraph 1 of Article 53 of the Constitution, according to which the state takes care of the health of people.

The protection of the interests of consumers (Paragraph 5 of Article 46 of the Constitution)The Constitutional Court's ruling of 17 March 2003

... the legislature, when regulating the relationships of a certain sector of economy in which a specific legal situation of certain economic operators is consolidated, and when providing for in other laws exceptions to the regulation governing the said relationships, must also establish additional legal measures that would ensure the protection of the rights and legitimate interests of consumers.

The guarantee of the protection of fair competition (Paragraph 4 of Article 46 of the Constitution)The Constitutional Court's ruling of 26 January 2004

The Constitutional Court, when interpreting the provision "The law ... shall protect freedom of fair competition" of Paragraph 4 of Article 46 of the Constitution, noted that the said provision also means the obligation of the legislature to establish, by means of a law, such a legal regulation whereby production and the market would not be monopolised, freedom of fair competition would be ensured, and measures for the protection of freedom of fair competition would be envisaged (ruling of 17 March 2003).

The constitutional guarantee of the protection of fair competition means, inter alia, the prohibition precluding state and municipal institutions that regulate economic activity from adopting decisions that distort or can distort fair competition.

The legal regulation of alcohol production and the alcohol market as a special sphere of economic activity*The Constitutional Court's ruling of 26 January 2004*

In its ruling of 9 July 1998, the Constitutional Court noted that the production, import, trade, or other realisation of alcohol need special regime of state regulation. However, economic activity must be regulated so that production and the market would not be monopolised, that fair competition and freedom of economic activity would be protected.

[...]

... the state and its institutions, having the discretion to establish a special legal regulation of alcohol production and the alcohol market, must not do so by choosing such means that would be inadequate to the objectives sought in cases where, by the said means, they would introduce the monopoly of the production of these products and their market and would groundlessly restrict freedom of economic activity and fair competition.

... various other means, except the introduction of a monopoly, may be established when seeking to attain socially significant objectives.

The constitutional values on which the national economy is based (Article 46 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 13 May 2005

The constitutional foundations of economic activity are established in Article 46 of the Constitution, which provides:

“The economy of Lithuania shall be based on the right of private ownership, freedom of individual economic activity, and economic initiative.

The State shall support economic efforts and initiative that are useful to society.

The State shall regulate economic activity so that it serves the general welfare of the Nation.

The law shall prohibit the monopolisation of production and the market, and shall protect freedom of fair competition.

The State shall defend the interests of the consumer.”

[...]

The provision “The economy of Lithuania shall be based on the right of private ownership, freedom of individual economic activity, and economic initiative” of Paragraph 1 of Article 46 of the Constitution defines the foundation of the national economy; the said foundation comprises these values: the right of private ownership, individual freedom of economic activity, and economic initiative (ruling of 14 March 2002). These three values – the right of private ownership, individual freedom of economic activity, and economic initiative – are interrelated; individual freedom of economic activity and economic initiative may not be separated from the right of private ownership. In its rulings of 20 April 1995 and 14 March 2002, the Constitutional Court held that freedom of economic activity and economic initiative are based on the innate personal freedom of an individual and the innate right to possess property. In its ruling of 14 March 2002, the Constitutional Court also held that the constitutional right of a person to property is an essential condition for implementing individual economic freedom and that, if the ownership right of a person is limited, individual economic freedom is also limited. In its ruling of 27 October 1998, the Constitutional Court held that Paragraph 1 of Article 46 of the Constitution attaches a fundamental role to private ownership – one of the main values on which the national economy is based.

[...]

The principles consolidated in Article 46 of the Constitution make up the whole – the constitutional foundation of the economy of this country (rulings of 6 October 1999, 6 December 2000, and 17 March 2003). The Constitutional Court has held that all provisions of Article 46 of the Constitution are interrelated and supplement one another (rulings of 23 February 2000, 18 October 2000, and 26 January 2004), that the principles established therein are reconciled, that there is a balance among them, and that each of these constitutional principles must be interpreted without denying another constitutional principle (rulings of 6 October 1999 and 17 March 2003).

Freedom of individual economic activity and economic initiative (Paragraph 1 of Article 46 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 13 May 2005

In its rulings, the Constitutional Court has held on more than one occasion that freedom of individual economic activity and economic initiative are a whole complex of legal possibilities, which creates the preconditions for a person to independently adopt decisions necessary for his/her economic activity.

Constitutional freedom of individual economic activity creates the conditions for implementing various strivings of a person (rulings of 6 October 1999, 14 March 2002, and 26 January 2004).

The provisions of Article 46 of the Constitution must also be interpreted in connection with other provisions of the Constitution. In its rulings, the Constitutional Court has held more than once that the notion of freedom of individual economic activity and economic initiative, as consolidated in Paragraph 1 of Article 46 of the Constitution, is a broad one: it implies, inter alia, the right of a person to freely choose an occupation or business, the freedom to conclude contracts, freedom of fair competition, etc. Freedom of individual economic activity is also inseparable from the requirement that regard must be paid to the equality of the rights of economic operators. Freedom of individual economic activity and economic initiative also imply the possibilities of restructuring economic operators without restrictions, changing the nature of their activity, as well as not obstructing the establishment of new economic operators or the liquidation of the existing ones when reacting to changes in the market; freedom of economic activity is inseparable from the possibility of entering the market without artificial barriers and exiting it without artificial barriers in cases where the said possibility is created for a person who is willing to engage in an economic activity or, conversely, who is willing to cease the said activity.

The Constitutional Court has stressed that freedom of economic activity is not absolute; a person makes use of it only when he/she follows certain obligatory requirements and limitations (rulings of 20 April 1995, 18 October 2000, 14 March 2002, and 9 April 2002). However, it is impermissible to deny, by means of established limitations, such essential provisions of freedom of economic activity as the equality of the rights of economic entities, fair competition, etc. Under the Constitution, the state is not allowed in an unrestricted manner to interfere with the economic activity of a person (ruling of 20 April 1995).

The obligation of the state to support economic efforts and initiative that are useful to society (Paragraph 2 of Article 46 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 13 May 2005

Paragraph 2 of Article 46 of the Constitution and other paragraphs of this article consolidate the obligation of the state to support economic efforts and initiative that are useful to society, which is also one of the main rules of regulating the national economy (ruling of 27 October 1998).

Interpreting the legal regulation consolidated in Paragraph 2 of Article 46 of the Constitution, the Constitutional Court has held that the provision “The State shall support economic efforts and initiative that are useful to society” of this paragraph means that the Constitution provides for the possibility for state institutions to assess the areas of economic activity according to their usefulness to society, that it is permitted to support certain areas of economic activity or certain economic efforts only after such an assessment is made, and that such an assessment of economic activity creates the necessary preconditions for the state to regulate economic activity so that it serves the general welfare of the nation (ruling of 13 February 1997). The said provision of Paragraph 2 of Article 46 of the Constitution creates the constitutional legal preconditions for a possible differentiated regulation of economic activity where the main criterion of this regulation would be the general welfare of the nation.

This provision also implies the duty of state institutions and their officials, as well of municipal institutions and their officials, not to hinder, by any their decisions or actions, any expression or development of the initiative of persons and not to disrupt or preclude their economic efforts, provided that their initiative or economic activities are not harmful to society, even if the usefulness of such initiative or economic efforts to society is not evident. Any decision or actions of state institutions and their officials, as well of municipal institutions and their officials, that do not permit the expression or development of the initiative of persons and that preclude certain economic efforts must be determined by the harmfulness of a particular initiative or economic efforts to society; otherwise, the requirements of Paragraph 2 of Article 46 of the Constitution would be deviated from.

Regulating economic activity so that it serves the general welfare of the nation (Paragraph 3 of Article 46 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 13 May 2005

The provision “The State shall regulate economic activity so that it serves the general welfare of the Nation” of Paragraph 3 of Article 46 of the Constitution is also directly linked with the provision “The economy of Lithuania shall be based on the right of private ownership, freedom of individual economic activity, and economic initiative” of Paragraph 1 of the same paragraph. Interpreting the legal regulation consolidated in Paragraph 3 of Article 46 of the Constitution, the Constitutional Court has held that, in the course of implementing individual freedom of economic activity (which ... is not absolute), the interests of society are impacted in various respects; therefore, the state regulates economic activity; in its rulings, the Constitutional Court has held on more than one occasion that the provision “The State shall regulate economic activity so that it serves the general welfare of the Nation” consolidates the constitutional principle that outlines the objectives, directions, means, and limits of the regulation of economic activity.

Interpreting the legal regulation consolidated in Paragraph 3 of Article 46 of the Constitution in a systemic manner (by relating it with, inter alia, the legal regulation consolidated in Paragraph 1 of the same article), the Constitutional Court has held that the state, in regulating economic activity, must follow the principle of balancing the interests of a person and society and ensure the interests of both a private person (economic operator) and society (rulings of 18 October 2000, 9 April 2002, 17 March 2003, and 26 January 2004).

As a rule, the regulation of economic activity is connected with the establishment of certain conditions for economic activity, the regulation of certain procedures, control over economic activity, as well as with certain limitations and prohibitions set with regard to this activity. In its ruling of 31 March 1994, the Constitutional Court held that, when a person takes part in economic activity, he/she may be subject to special limitations (inter alia, limitations on the right of ownership), which must be established by means of a law. In its rulings, the Constitutional Court has held more than once that, under the Constitution, it is allowed to limit the rights and freedoms of a person, as well as freedom of economic activity, if the following conditions are observed: the limitations are established by means of a law; the limitations are necessary in a democratic society in order to protect the rights and freedoms of other persons, the values consolidated in the Constitution, and the constitutionally important objectives; the limitations do not deny the nature and essence of rights and freedoms; and the constitutional principle of proportionality is followed.

It needs to be noted that the phrase “The State shall regulate economic activity” of Paragraph 3 of Article 46 of the Constitution means not the right of the state to administer all or certain economic activity at its discretion, but its right to establish the legal regulation of economic activity, i.e. to establish limitations (prohibitions) and conditions of economic activity, as well as to establish, in legal acts, a regulation governing the respective procedures, as well as control over economic activity where the said control would be based on the limitations (prohibitions), conditions, and procedures of economic activity that are established in legal acts. In this context, it needs to be noted that, in its ruling of 6 October 1999, interpreting the legal regulation consolidated in Article 46 of the Constitution, the Constitutional Court held: “A legal regulation is a form of establishing certain social order. The particularities of a legal regulation depend on the specific nature of the regulated social relationships. One area of such relationships is economic activity. The constitutional principle of freedom of individual economic activity and economic initiative determines that an intrinsic feature of the regulation of economic activity is the method of general permission: everything that is not forbidden is allowed. Thus, prohibitions are one of the ways of regulating economic activity. The economic activity of persons may be subject to limitation where it is necessary to defend the interests of consumers, to protect fair competition and other values consolidated in the Constitution. The prohibitions provided for in a law must be reasonable, non-discriminatory, and clearly formulated. Due to the complexity of economic activity and the dynamism of particular relationships, the regulation in this area may not be the same all the time, i.e. the proportion of prohibitions and permissions may change; however, in the course of the alteration of the content of the legal regulation, the principles of the regulation concerning the national economy, which are consolidated in the Constitution, may not be denied.” It was also held in the same ruling of the Constitutional Court that “an individual may engage in any economic activity that is not prohibited by means of laws. A prohibition, established by means of a law, on freedom of economic activity of persons must be clear in every particular case and must be designated for the protection of the values consolidated in the Constitution, i.e. those of fair competition, the interests of consumers, etc.”

It also needs to be noted that not only the right but also the obligation of the state to regulate economic activity by means of legal acts so that it serves the general welfare of the nation is consolidated in the provision “The State shall regulate economic activity so that it serves the general welfare of the Nation” of Paragraph 3 of Article 46 of the Constitution. Thus, the Constitution consolidates the obligation of the state to seek the general welfare of the nation and the duty of the state, when seeking the general welfare of the nation, to regulate the economic activity in this country. Neither legislative power nor executive power, while enjoying the respective powers in the area of economic activity, may opt out of this constitutional obligation.

The legal regulation governing economic activity is not an objective in itself, but rather a means of social engineering and a way to achieve the welfare of the nation through law. In its rulings, the Constitutional Court has held that the right of the state, which is consolidated in Paragraph 3 of Article 46 of the Constitution, to regulate economic activity creates the constitutional preconditions for passing laws by which it is possible to react to situations in the national economy, as well as to the diversity of and changes in economic and social life (rulings of 28 February 1996, 15 March 1996, and 18 October 2000).

It needs to be stressed that Paragraph 3 of Article 46 of the Constitution clearly prescribes the direction of the legal regulation of economic activity: economic activity must serve the general welfare of the nation. The Constitutional Court has held that the general welfare of the nation is a rather general and broad criterion the application of which may be based on the concept of general welfare, as well as on the arguments of expediency (ruling of 13 February 1997). As a rule, the welfare of the nation is reflected by the consumption of material goods; however, the notion “the general welfare of the nation” may not be interpreted only by taking account of the satisfaction of the material needs of an individual, since it is possible to judge regarding the general welfare of the nation according to various criteria and from various manifestations – the social development of the nation, the possibilities of the self-expression of an individual, etc.; the content of the notion “the general welfare of the nation” is revealed in each concrete case by taking account of economic, social, and other important factors (rulings of 6 October 1999, 18 October 2000, and 26 January 2004). The Constitutional Court has emphasised that the welfare of the nation must not be perceived only in a material (or financial) sense; in addition, the Constitutional Court has stated that it is unlikely that it would be fair and right to seek material welfare in such a way that is harmful to human health (ruling of 13 February 1997).

At the same time, it needs to be stressed that the notion “the general welfare of the nation” of Paragraph 3 of Article 46 of the Constitution implies that, by means of regulating economic activity, the state must seek the welfare of not individual persons, but precisely the general welfare of the nation. On the other hand, “the general welfare of the nation”, which is indicated in Paragraph 3 of Article 46 of the Constitution, and the welfare, rights, and legitimate interests of an economic operator itself, i.e. an operator whose activity is regulated, as well as the interests of other persons who have established and hold the said economic operator or are otherwise related to that economic operator, may not be opposed. When taking account of the principle of balancing the interests of a person and society, which is consolidated in the Constitution, as well of the fact that, in the Constitution, freedom of individual economic activity and economic initiative are related to the right of private ownership, it is not allowed to substantiate or justify, by reference to serving the general welfare of the nation, which is indicated in Paragraph 3 of Article 46 of the Constitution, such a regulation governing economic activity that would limit the rights and legitimate interests of a certain economic operator more than necessary in order to ensure the public interest and to protect constitutional values; a legal regulation where a certain economic activity is unduly limited or prohibited due to the fact that, from the standpoint of the legislature, such activity, although not harmful, is not useful to society, also must not be justified on the grounds of serving the welfare of the nation. The direction of the legal regulation of economic activity pointed out in Paragraph 3 of Article 46 of the Constitution must be interpreted as the constitutional obligation of the legislature and other law-making institutions to ensure a favourable legal environment for an economic activity that, while satisfying the interests of an economic operator, would also serve the general welfare of the nation. The Constitutional Court has held that the state, when regulating economic activity, may not establish any such a legal regulation whereby unfavourable and unequal economic conditions are established for economic operators, whereby their initiative is restricted and possibilities for the expression of such an initiative are not created (ruling of 9 April 2002). It also needs to be noted that, in its rulings of 14 March 2002 and 26 January 2004, the Constitutional Court held that, under the Constitution, no such legal regulation may be established whereby inappropriate conditions are created for the implementation of freedom of economic activity.

The constitutional values upon which the national economy is based are tightly linked to other constitutional values. The provisions of Article 46 of the Constitution must be interpreted by relating them with other provisions of the Constitution.

For instance, the Constitutional Court has held that all paragraphs of Article 46 of the Constitution are, first of all, designed for consolidating and strengthening private ownership in the economy of this country (ruling of 27 October 1998). If legal acts established such a legal regulation whereby the right of ownership is denied, freedom of individual economic activity and economic initiative, as well as freedom of fair competition, which is consolidated in Article 46 of the Constitution, would be limited in substance and other provisions of Article 46 of the Constitution would be violated (ruling of 23 February 2000).

Under the Constitution, the state, when regulating economic activity, must have regard to the constitutional requirement for the equality of the rights of economic operators, which is directly linked with the principle of the equality of the rights of all persons, as consolidated in Article 29 of the Constitution. Otherwise, the legal regulation of economic activity would not be considered to serve the general welfare of the nation. On the other hand, in its rulings, the Constitutional Court has also held on more than one occasion that, as such, the constitutional principle of the equality of the rights of persons (in this case, the equality of the rights of economic operators) does not deny the possibility of establishing, by means of a law, a diverse and differentiated legal regulation with respect to certain persons (in this case, economic operators) that belong to different categories provided that between those persons (in this case, economic operators) there are differences of such a nature that can objectively justify a differentiated regulation. A differentiated legal regulation in cases where it is applied to certain groups of persons that are characterised by the same features and where it pursues positive and socially meaningful objectives, or where the establishment of certain limitations or conditions is linked with the particularities of the regulated social relationships, should not be regarded as discriminatory (ruling of 11 November 1998). Singling out individual economic operators and the differentiated establishment of their legal situation must be linked with the objectives raised by the state in the sphere of economy, as well as with the striving for the respective arrangement of the economy of this country; therefore, the legislature, when taking account of the importance and nature of the regulated economic relationships, may regulate economic activity in a differentiated manner or establish certain conditions for the said activity (ruling of 18 October 2000).

As mentioned before, due to a specific nature, variety, and dynamism of economic activity, the regulation of concrete relationships in this area may not be the same all the time, i.e. the proportion of prohibitions and permissions is subject to change. In this context, it needs to be noted that the legal regulation of economic activity may also be changed in order to ensure the public interest. In changing the legal regulation of the relationships of economic activity, the state may also change the conditions of economic activity or may, in general, establish such a legal regulation under which certain economic activity must be discontinued. However, when changing the conditions of economic activity or discontinuing certain economic activity, the state must pay regard to the norms and principles of the Constitution, as well as the principle of the protection of legitimate expectations.

[...]

... if an economic operator acquired the right to engage in a certain economic activity and implemented this right under valid laws and other legal acts, in cases where the legal regulation of such economic activity is changed in a manner that the conditions of this economic activity are worsened or this economic activity is discontinued at all, then taking account of why the legal regulation of the said economic activity has been changed and to what extent it has been changed, also taking account of other important circumstances, the state may be under the duty to recompense (compensate) the economic operators and other persons for the losses that they have sustained due to the changed legal regulation.

... the foundations of the national economy, which are consolidated in Paragraph 1 of Article 46 of the Constitution, should also be interpreted by taking account of the provisions of Article 54 of the Constitution. The state must regulate economic activity so that, without denying the foundations of the national economy – the right of private ownership and individual freedom of economic activity and initiative – it would also ensure the public interest consolidated in Article 54 of the Constitution – the protection of the natural environment, wildlife and plants, individual objects of nature, areas of particular value, as well as the sustainable use of natural resources, their restoration and increase; the state is under the constitutional obligation to guarantee the said public interest.

Hunting as economic activity (on the right of owners to prohibit hunting on the plots of land that belong to them, see 2.2. Civil (individual) rights and freedoms, 2.2.5. The right of ownership, 2.2.5.3. Special objects of the right of ownership; on the protection of wildlife, see 2.4.2. Social rights, 2.4.2.3. The right to a healthy environment)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 13 May 2005

... hunting is a certain type of economic activity or, more precisely, a constituent part of broader economic activity. It should be noted in this connection that, on the one hand, professional hunting as a source of income of a person is possible; on the other hand, the economic activity of a person can also include the planning and arrangement of hunting.

[...]

... In order to ensure the public interest – the protection and rational use, as well as the restoration and increase of wildlife (its resources) – the state, when regulating hunting as economic activity, may establish specific conditions of economic activity by means of a law, inter alia, the sizes of hunting grounds; they are established after taking account of, inter alia, the amount of the resources of huntable animals and the need for regulating their number. In doing so, the constitutional principle of proportionality must be applied and the ownership rights of owners of private plots of land, forests, and water bodies, as well as freedom and initiative of their economic activity, may not be denied.

Regulating economic activity in order to protect human health

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 29 September 2005

... human health and public health are among the most important values of society ... the protection of the health of people is a constitutionally important objective and a public interest; taking care of the health of people is a state function. Therefore, such a limitation on economic activity that aims at protecting the health of people should be treated as one designed for ensuring the general welfare of the nation and, as such, if the requirements that stem from the Constitution are observed, may not be regarded as violating the Constitution.

Under the Constitution, the state must regulate economic activity in order to ensure the implementation of the state function to take care of the health of people. Therefore, the state, while regulating economic activity, by means of laws, and while paying regard to the Constitution, may establish specific limitations on the economic activity that is, inter alia, related to the protection of human health, including advertising medicines and other information about medicines, the imparting of which can create the preconditions for inflicting harm on human health.

Regulating economic activity in order to ensure the protection of the natural environment

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 14 March 2006

Paragraph 3 of Article 46 of the Constitution prescribes that the state regulates economic activity so that it serves the general welfare of the nation. It is also necessary to pay regard to this constitutional imperative when regulating, by means of legal acts, the relationships linked with the ownership and use of land, forests, or water bodies, including those that are in areas of particular value, as well as with other activity in such locations.

In this context, it should be noted that, as the Constitutional Court held in its ruling of 13 May 2005, in order to ensure the protection of the natural environment, wildlife and plants, individual objects of nature, as well as the sustainable use of natural resources, their restoration and increase, and when regulating economic activity, the state may establish specific conditions and procedures for economic activity and means of control over economic activity, as well as certain limitations or prohibitions on the economic activity related with the use of particular natural resources; when regulating the relationships in connection with the protection of the natural environment and its individual objects, the use of natural resources, as well as their restoration and increase, when restricting the use of individual objects (natural resources) of the natural environment, or when obligating certain subjects of legal relationships to act in a corresponding manner or to refrain from certain actions, the state is bound by the imperative of social harmony, the principles of justice, reasonableness, and proportionality, which are consolidated in the Constitution, inter alia, in cases where such restrictions or obligations create interference with the implementation of the constitutional rights and freedoms of a person.

Forming and pursuing the state economic policy and the possibilities of challenging the compliance of the legal regulation of economic activity with higher-ranking legal acts

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 31 May 2006

... law, when it regulates social relationships (including those related to the national economy), defines the limits of the content of the state policy (also the economic policy) and establishes the permissible measures and methods for carrying out the said policy. However, it should be noted that, in itself, this does not deny the autonomy of the political process, the specificity of forming and pursuing the state policy (also the economic policy), or the independence of the legislative and the executive as state political powers or that of the institutions formed in a democratic way in establishing (according to their competence) the content of the state policy (also the economic policy) (by choosing, inter alia, its priorities), or the measures and methods for pursuing the said policy.

Under the Constitution, the Seimas, as the legislative state institution, and the Government, as a state institution of executive power, have very broad discretion to form and pursue the state economic policy (each according to its competence), as well as to regulate the economic activity by means of legal acts in the respective manner, certainly, without violating the Constitution and laws under any circumstances, inter alia, without exceeding the powers of these state institutions established in the Constitution and laws, by having regard to the requirements of the due process of law, which stem from the Constitution, as well as the constitutionally consolidated principles of a state under the rule of law, the separation of powers, responsible governance, the protection of legitimate expectations, legal clarity, legal certainty, and legal security. ... as such, an assessment of the content (inter alia, priorities), measures, and methods of the state economic policy (regardless of who assesses them), including the aspect of their reasonableness and expediency, even if it turns out later that there were better alternatives for choosing the economic policy (thus, also the fact that this economic policy formulated and carried out previously might reasonably be assessed negatively from the aspect of reasonableness and expediency), may not be a pretext to question the compliance of the legal regulation of economic activity where such a legal regulation conformed to the said economic policy (formulated and carried out previously) with higher-ranking legislation, inter alia, with the Constitution (also by initiating the respective constitutional justice cases at the Constitutional Court), with the exception of the situation where such a legal regulation already at the time of its establishment in legal acts is clearly directed against the welfare of the nation, the interests of the State of Lithuania and its society and clearly denies the values defended and protected by the Constitution.

Moreover, neither the fact that legal acts establish a differentiated legal regulation with respect to a certain economic sector in cases where the said differentiated legal regulation is different from the legal regulation of other economic sectors, nor the fact that the legal regulation of a certain economic activity is changed in response to changes both in the market and in the economic conjuncture (as well as in the international economic conjuncture), may serve in itself as the aforementioned pretext, since ... the legal preconditions for a differentiated legal regulation of economic activity (when account is taken of the importance and nature of the regulated relationships) stem from the Constitution itself (inter alia, Paragraph 2 of Article 46 of the Constitution), the differentiated establishment of the legal situation of separate economic operators should be related to the objectives raised by the state in a certain economic sector and the striving for arranging the economy of this country in the respective manner; besides, due to a specific nature, variety, and dynamism of economic activity, the legal regulation of economic activity may not be the same all the time, i.e. the proportion of prohibitions and permissions is subject to change, inter alia, in order to ensure the public interest.

A differentiated legal regulation of the production of sugar as economic activity

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 31 May 2006

With regard to the scope of sugar production in Lithuania and to the significance of this sector of economy for a large part of Lithuanian people working in agriculture, taking into account the seasonal prevalence and other characteristics of sugar production, it needs to be held that a differentiated legal regulation may be established in legislation for this sector of economic activity, which may be different from the legal regulation of other sectors of economy; in addition, the legal regulation of this economic activity may be amended with response to the changing market and economic conjuncture. This differentiated legal regulation may also be such that sugar production as economic activity may be supported by the state, inter alia, by also using such means and applying such measures that would be different from those where the state supports other economic sectors (including agriculture). The provision of the envisaged support may be linked to the establishment of certain conditions for such economic activity.

It also needs to be noted that there are no legal preconditions for the Constitutional Court to assess the content of the state sugar policy or to assess the measures and methods of this policy with regard to their reasonableness and expediency, inter alia, to assess whether supporting (if so, then to what extent) sugar production (growing and processing sugar beets) is useful, promising, or expedient in any other regard and, if so, whether this economic activity should be supported more than any other economic (inter alia, agricultural) activity. The formation and pursuit of the state sugar policy, as well as choosing the means for its pursuit, is within the competence of the Seimas and the Government (which must follow, inter alia, laws passed by the Seimas). In doing so, the Seimas and the Government must observe the Constitution and laws, inter alia, they must not exceed the powers established for the said institutions in the Constitution and laws, and must pay regard to the constitutional principles of a state under the rule of law, the separation of powers, responsible governance, the protection of legitimate expectations, as well as the constitutional principles of legal clarity, legal certainty, and legal security.

Licensing economic activity (trade in alcohol products)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 21 January 2008

The ... special state regulation regime, inter alia, the fact that wholesale and retail trade in alcoholic products is a licensed activity, as well as the fact that sanctions may and must be established for violations of this special state regulation regime, is a reasonable and constitutionally justifiable matter, inter alia, due to universally known negative consequences that may be caused by alcohol consumption for human health, public order, and the security of members of society, as well as for other values that are protected and defended by law. ...

It needs to be held that the legislature must establish not only the necessary requirements that must be complied with by the economic operators that seek to get licences to engage in wholesale and retail trade in alcoholic products (as well as in any other licensed activity), but also the requirements that must be followed by persons who received such licences, as well as the grounds and procedure for revoking the validity of the issued licences.

The protection of fair competition (inter alia, in the sphere of trade in alcohol products)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 21 January 2008

... compliance with the conditions of licences and supervision over that compliance is a necessary precondition for fair competition in the respective market (in the market of trade in alcoholic products in the considered case). The protection of fair competition is a constitutional obligation of the state (Paragraph 4 of Article 46 of the Constitution).

[...]

... as held by the Constitutional Court, freedom of individual economic activity and economic initiative, among other things, imply freedom of fair competition (ruling of 31 May 2006). It has been held in this ruling of the Constitutional Court that, compliance with the conditions of licences and supervision over that compliance is a necessary precondition for fair competition in the respective market. Thus, freedom of economic activity of an economic operator that has violated the rules of fair competition laid down in the licence not only may, but normally must be limited.

Regulating trade in alcohol products as economic activity; the powers of municipal councils in forming, coordinating, and implementing the state alcohol policy

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 21 January 2008

Trade in alcoholic beverages is economic activity. In its acts, the Constitutional Court has held more than once that freedom of economic activity is not absolute; under Paragraph 3 of Article 46 of the Constitution, the state regulates economic activity so that it serves the general welfare of the nation.

[...]

... the legislature, especially when taking into account, inter alia, universally known negative consequences that may be caused by alcohol consumption for human health, public order, and the security of members of society, as well as for other values that are protected and defended by law ... as well as the fact that the state special regulation regime is reasonably applied to this field of activity, may establish, by means of a law, the powers of municipal councils to participate in the formation and coordination of the state alcohol control policies and the implementation thereof, inter alia, the legislature has the powers to limit or prohibit, in the territory of that municipality (as well as in enterprises that engage in retail trade and in public catering enterprises), trade in alcoholic beverages on official holidays and mass event days, which, as is known, are related to the increased intensity and activeness of social life, where this is necessary in order to attain positive universally important objectives, inter alia, to protect the rights and freedoms of other persons, as well as other values that are protected and defended by law.

[...]

It needs to be emphasised that the respective decisions of municipal councils must be clearly and rationally reasoned; they must not be arbitrary or voluntaristic. It also needs to be emphasised that all limitations and prohibitions on trade in alcoholic beverages must be strictly defined in terms of time and place; the economic activity of this kind (as well as any other economic activity) may not be limited more than necessary in order to ensure the protected and defended values, since, otherwise, the constitutional principle of proportionality would be disregarded.

In addition, information about the established limitations and prohibitions must be public; legal subjects must be informed about them in advance. Otherwise, the constitutional principle of the protection of legitimate expectations would be disregarded.

It also needs to be emphasised that the aforementioned limitations and prohibitions on trade in alcoholic beverages may not be selective; it is not allowed to discriminate against any persons (inter alia, economic operators) or grant privileges to any persons by means of the said limitations or prohibitions.

The essential conditions of economic activity must be laid down by means of a law

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 15 March 2008

In its ruling of 31 May 2006, the Constitutional Court held that, even though certain relationships of economic activity may only be regulated by means of laws, whereas other relationships of economic activity may be regulated by means of government resolutions, and still other relationships may be regulated by means of lower-ranking statutory legal acts, under the Constitution, the essential conditions for economic activity, as well as prohibitions and limitations that have an essential impact on the said activity, and various sanctions for certain violations of law may only be established by means of a law; thus, only by means of a law, it is permitted to establish such economic measures that may have an essential impact on economic activity and that may be applied when the established obligations are not fulfilled or are fulfilled improperly. The same also applies to the so-called economic sanctions categorised under the institution of administrative liability – such sanctions create the preconditions for making a negative impact on the economic situation of economic operators that are held legally liable (rulings of 3 November 2005 and 21 January 2008).

Licensing the purchase of the scrap and waste of non-precious metals meant for realisation as economic activity

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 15 March 2008

... the purchase of the scrap and waste of non-precious metals meant for realisation is a licensed activity; the licence is issued if an economic operator meets certain necessary requirements. There are not and there may not be any legal arguments that would allow stating that the licensing of the purchase of the scrap and waste of non-precious metals meant for realisation and the establishment of requirements for persons engaged in this economic activity are constitutionally groundless (inter alia, in particular, taking account of the fact that attempts may be made to sell to the purchasers also such scrap or waste of non-precious metals meant for realisation that was acquired by stealing property of another person, i.e. by committing a criminal act). Compliance with the conditions of this licensed activity and supervision over that compliance is a necessary precondition for the defence of the values consolidated in the Constitution, inter alia, the rights of ownership, the health of people, public order, the system of the economy of the state, the financial order, as well as fair competition.

It needs to be noted that the legislature has the powers to establish the necessary requirements that must be followed by the economic operators that seek to acquire licenses for engagement in the purchase of the scrap and waste of non-precious metals meant for realisation, the requirements that must be observed by persons who have acquired such licences, as well as enforcement measures (sanctions) applicable for violations of such requirements. It must be presumed that all economic operators that engage in licensed activity according to the available licences are aware of and understand the conditions that are laid down in legal acts and must be observed, and that they also know that, upon the violation of some of those conditions, the sanctions and enforcement measures established by means of laws will be applied to them. Freedom of economic activity of an economic operator that violates the rules of fair competition laid down in the licence not only may, but normally must, be limited (also by applying prohibition sanctions).

The obligation of the state to support economic efforts and initiative that are useful to society; state loan (Paragraph 2 of Article 46 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 30 June 2008

When interpreting the legal regulation laid down in Paragraph 2 of Article 46 of the Constitution, the Constitutional Court has held that the provision “The State shall support economic efforts and initiative that are useful to society” of this paragraph means that the Constitution provides for the possibility of state institutions to assess the areas of economic activity according to their usefulness to society, that it is permitted to support certain areas of economic activity or certain economic efforts only after such an assessment is made, and that such an assessment of economic activity creates the necessary preconditions for the state to regulate economic activity so that it serves the general welfare of the nation (rulings of 13 February 1997 and 13 May 2005).

It needs to be noted that, under the Constitution, while satisfying the public interest, the state may choose various forms of supporting economic efforts and initiative. One of them may be support provided by the state to economic operators, inter alia, a state loan. The purpose of providing such support, inter alia, granting a state loan, to economic operators is to satisfy the public interest.

State support for economic operators is determined by various factors, inter alia, an economic situation in the state, the priorities of the development of the national economy, or the necessity to support certain social projects that are useful to society when seeking the general welfare of the nation.

Under the Constitution, state support provided to economic operators, inter alia, a state loan, must be based on a law. Laws must establish, inter alia, state institutions that have the right to adopt decisions regarding granting a state loan, as well as the grounds for providing such support. When regulating support for economic efforts and initiative that are useful to society, as well as granting a state loan, the legislature is bound by the requirements that stem from the Constitution, inter alia, the principles of responsible governance, transparency, lawfulness, the equality of rights, and fair competition.

When regulating the provision of state support, inter alia, granting a state loan, to economic operators, it is not allowed to establish any such a legal regulation whereby economic operators would be granted privileges or their initiative would be restricted.

In this context, account should be taken of the fact that, as the Constitutional Court held in its rulings of 30 September 2003, 8 July 2005, 5 July 2007, and 20 March 2008, it is not permitted to establish any such a legal regulation according to which property that belongs to the state by right of ownership would be possessed, used, or disposed of in such a manner that the interests or needs of only one social group or individual persons are satisfied or that this property does not serve the public interest, the need of society, or the welfare of the nation.

The relationships regarding a loan that emerge between the state and a person (economic operator) must be based, inter alia, on the principle of the freedom to conclude contracts; this principle must be assessed as a guarantee of the constitutional level. The freedom to conclude a contract is, first of all, a free expression of the will of its parties seeking to conclude a contract (ruling of 30 November 1996). This is the right of the parties to independently decide the questions of the content of a contract by not violating the requirements that stem from the Constitution and the respective provisions of laws that are not in conflict with the Constitution, as well as by not restricting the rights and freedoms of other persons.

It also needs to be noted that a person (economic operator), when making use of the support of the state, inter alia, a state loan, must fulfil the assumed obligations and not abuse law; it is necessary to ensure control over the proper use of such support and its repayment on time.

The obligation of the state to support economic efforts and initiative that are useful to society (Paragraph 2 of Article 46 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 2 March 2009

The Constitutional Court has held on more than one occasion that the provision of Paragraph 2 of Article 46 of the Constitution, whereby the state supports economic efforts and initiative that are useful to society, is one of the main rules of regulating the national economy, it creates, inter alia, the constitutional legal preconditions for a possible differentiated regulation of economic activity according to the criterion of the general welfare of the nation and implies the duty of state institutions and municipal institutions not to hinder any expression or development of initiative of persons, provided this initiative is not harmful to society.

The Constitutional Court has also held that it would be incorrect to understand the provision of Article 46 of the Constitution, under which the state supports economic efforts and initiative that are useful to society, as meaning “the duty of the state to indiscriminately support any economic efforts or activity”, since the state has the possibility of choice (ruling of 13 February 1997).

The legal regulation of economic activity in the electricity sector

The Constitutional Court’s ruling of 2 March 2009

... in order to regulate economic activity in such a way that it would serve the general welfare of the nation, the state may establish a differentiated legal regulation, which would be determined by the specificity of a certain economic activity; therefore, the state, taking account of the specificity of an economic activity, may use various measures of a legal regulation; the options of the legislature to establish the measures in order to ensure the general welfare of the nation in the electricity sector are determined by the particularities of electricity, inter alia, by limited resources of electricity, as well as by material, financial, and other important factors; the Constitution (inter alia, the provision of Paragraph 3 of Article 46 thereof, under which the state regulates economic activity so that it serves the general welfare of the nation) gives rise to the constitutional duty of the legislature to lay down such a legal regulation that would ensure the general welfare of the nation in view of the resources of the state and society, their material and financial capacities, as well as other important factors (ruling of 2 March 2009).

... the principles and values consolidated in the provisions of Article 46 of the Constitution, inter alia, the fact that the state regulates economic activity so that it serves the general welfare of the nation, as well as the fact that the law prohibits the monopolisation of production and the market, and protects freedom of fair competition, may not be opposed. When seeking the general welfare of the nation, a differentiated legal regulation is justified when taking account of the specificity of the sphere of the regulated economic activity. The said particularity of electricity – limited resources of electricity – determine the limited possibilities of the legislature to choose alternative measures in order to ensure the general welfare of the nation in the sphere of electricity. Thus, in order to ensure the general welfare of the nation in the sphere of electricity, a special legal regulation with regard to the specificity of electricity is necessary.

The prohibition on monopolising production and the market, as well as the guarantee of the protection of fair competition (Paragraph 4 of Article 46 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court’s ruling of 2 March 2009

Paragraph 4 of Article 46 of the Constitution prescribes that the law prohibits the monopolisation of production and the market, and protects freedom of fair competition.

The Constitutional Court has held on more than one occasion that the provision “the law shall prohibit the monopolisation of production and the market” means that it is not allowed to introduce a monopoly, i.e. it is not allowed to grant, by means of a law, exceptional rights to an economic operator to operate in a certain sector of economy due to which this sector would become monopolised; however, the prohibition on the monopolisation of production and the market does not mean that it is prohibited to state in a law, under certain circumstances, the existence of a monopoly in a certain sector of economy or otherwise to reflect factual monopolistic relationships and to regulate them accordingly, i.e. to create the legal preconditions in order to apply the respective requirements (including, inter alia, the restriction on the establishment of discriminatory prices, a state regulation of the size of prices and rates for the goods of the monopolistic market, the establishment of requirements for the quality of goods for the monopolistic subject of economy, as well as the control carried out by state institutions over how the economic operators follow the established requirements) with respect to the monopoly while defending the rights and legitimate interests of other economic operators and consumers. In addition, as held by the Constitutional Court, a monopoly is the exclusive right of a person, a group of persons, or the state to operate in a certain field (rulings of 20 April 1995 and 15 March 1996). A monopoly is such a state or a situation where a certain person or organisation may act without competition in a certain field (ruling of 20 April 1995). In addition, as the Constitutional Court held in its ruling of 26 January 2004, under the Constitution, the introduction of a monopoly also means the unfounded granting of privileges to a certain subject of economy (groups thereof) and, at the same time, it is discrimination against other economic operators and a restriction on their freedom of economic activity; granting privileges to a certain group of economic operators should also be linked with discrimination against other economic operators and a restriction on their freedom of economic activity and initiative; this is incompatible with the requirements of Articles 29 and 46 of the Constitution; various other means, except the introduction of a monopoly, may be established when seeking to attain socially significant objectives.

The Constitutional Court has held on more than one occasion that the protection of fair competition is the main method to ensure harmony between the interests of a person and society while regulating economic activity, as well as to create the self-regulation of economy as a system, which promotes the optimal distribution of economic resources and their efficient use, economic growth, and the improvement of the welfare of consumers. However, as such, freedom of economic activity of a person does not guarantee competition; therefore, the state must protect fair competition. Thus, the constitutional guarantee of the protection of fair competition obliges the institutions of state power and municipal institutions to ensure freedom of fair competition by legal measures; such measures are the prohibition of such agreements among economic operators that seek to limit competition, or limit or may limit competition, the prohibition of abusing a dominant position, control over market concentration and the respective prohibitions on concentration, the prohibition of unfair competition, control over compliance with the rules for the protection of fair competition that are established in laws, and responsibility for violations thereof (rulings of 6 October 1999, 9 April 2002, 17 March 2003, and 26 January 2004).

The protection of the interests of consumers (Paragraph 5 of Article 46 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 2 March 2009

The Constitutional Court has held that the provision consolidated in Paragraph 5 of Article 46 of the Constitution, whereby the state defends the interests of the consumer, implies that laws and other legal acts should establish various measures of the protection of the interests of consumers, that state institutions should control economic operators as to how they observe such measures, and that the duty falls on state authority institutions to establish an additional legal regulation that would ensure the protection of the interests of consumers if production and the market are virtually concentrated in the area of certain economic relationships (rulings of 18 October 2000, 17 March 2003, 26 January 2004, and 5 March 2008).

... the constitutional duty of the state to defend the interests of consumers must be implemented, first of all, by the legislature by establishing the general measures and, taking account of the concrete specificity of the regulated economic activity, special measures of the protection and defence of the rights and interests of consumers.

... the specific features of relationships in certain spheres of economic activity are typical of the said spheres only; such specific features may imply, inter alia, the particularities of the regulation governing the relationships of the protection and defence of the rights and interests of consumers in certain fields of economic activity; in particular, the content of economic activity, its specific features, and the particularities of certain fields of economy may determine the necessity and need for a special regulation governing the ... relationships of the protection and defence of the rights and interests of consumers in a certain sphere of economic activity. Thus, the measures of the protection and defence of the rights and interests of consumers in certain spheres of economic activity may differ depending on the specific features of relationships in a concrete economic activity.

The specificity, diversity, and dynamism of economic activity implies that the regulation of concrete relationships in a certain sphere need not be the same all the time, i.e. it may change; this, inter alia, applies to the regulation of the relationships of the protection and defence of the rights and interests of consumers where this regulation may change and, in certain cases, must be changed.

The guarantee of the effective protection and defence of the rights and interests of consumers implies, inter alia, the fact that the legislature has the duty to establish an institutional system of the protection of consumer rights and interests, i.e. the legislature must establish, by means of a law, the respective state institutions, clearly define their competence, and create the legal preconditions for such state institutions to ensure the real protection and defence of the rights and interests of consumers in the respective sphere of economic activity.

The protection of the interests of electricity consumers

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 29 September 2010

The imperatives consolidated in Article 46 of the Constitution, whereby the state regulates the economic activity so that it serves the general welfare of the nation (Paragraph 3) and whereby the state defends the interests of the consumer (Paragraph 5), give rise to the duty of the legislature to define, by means of a law, not only the criteria for the establishment of limits on electricity prices, but also the criteria for services, inter alia, criteria for the establishment of tariffs for connecting electricity equipment to the distribution network so that the said tariffs could be differentiated on the basis of customers who are objectively in different positions, also on the basis of the services required by customers, inter alia, the required costs related to the connection of the equipment of customers to the network, as well as on the basis of the fact whether a property contribution has been made by customers when connecting their equipment to the electricity network. Such criteria must be clear and reasonable so that, when establishing tariffs for such services, no preconditions would be created for abuse and, thus, violations of the rights and interests of electricity consumers. The imperatives of the protection of the rights of consumers, which are consolidated in Paragraph 5 of Article 46 of the Constitution, give rise to the duty of the legislature also to establish such a legal regulation that would ensure the effective protection of the rights of electricity consumers.

A differentiated legal regulation governing the organisation of games of chance as economic activity

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 21 June 2011

... the Constitution, inter alia, Articles 46 and 53 thereof, gives rise to the requirement that, when regulating the relationships of economic activity in the area of organising games of chance and taking account of the fact that organising games of chance may result in negative consequences for the health of people, public order, the security of members of society, and for other values that are protected and defended by law, the legislature must establish the grounds for organising games of chance as economic activity, as well as that the legislature may and, in certain situations, also must establish limitations and prohibitions on the activity of organising games of chance, inter alia, it must provide for cases where gaming activities are limited, as well as prohibit such activities in certain places in general.

[...]

... the legislature, by following the Constitution, inter alia, Paragraph 2 of Article 120 and Article 46 thereof, may confer on municipal councils the right to adopt a concrete decision regarding permission to organise games of chance in their local territory on the grounds established in laws.

At the same time, it needs to be noted that the Constitution, inter alia, Article 46 thereof, as well as the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law, gives rise to the requirement that the respective decisions of municipal councils must be clearly substantiated and rationally reasoned, as well as that these decisions must not discriminate against any persons, nor may they grant any privileges to any persons.

Regulating the economic activity of operators administering pension funds

See 2.4.2. Social rights, 2.4.2.1. The right to social security, the ruling of 29 June 2012 (“The discretion of the legislature to choose a model of the system of old-age pensions, inter alia, where such a model is based on the accumulation of funds designated for future old-age pensions in special pension funds; regulating the economic activity of economic operators administering pension funds (Articles 46 and 52 of the Constitution)”).

Regulating economic activity so that it serves the general welfare of the nation (transfer of state-owned property into the ownership of other subjects) (Paragraph 3 of Article 46 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 2 April 2013

Under the Constitution, the state, when regulating economic activity, must ensure that state property is managed in such a manner that there would be no contradiction with the requirement, consolidated in Paragraph 3 of Article 46 of the Constitution, that the state must regulate economic activity so that it serves the general welfare of the nation (rulings of 24 January 1996 and 2 March 2009).

The provision of Paragraph 3 of Article 46 of the Constitution that the state regulates economic activity so that it serves the general welfare of the nation implies the duty of the state, as well as of the state institutions implementing state power and other state institutions, when paying regard to the norms and principles of the Constitution and taking account of a situation in the national economy, the variety and changes in the economy and social life, to establish such a legal regulation of economic activity that would serve the general welfare of the nation (rulings of 30 June 2008 and 6 January 2011).

The Constitutional Court has held on more than one occasion that it is not permitted to establish any such a legal regulation according to which property that belongs to the state by right of ownership would be transferred into the ownership of other subjects in order to satisfy the interests or needs of only one social group or separate persons where this would not serve the public interest, the needs of society, or the welfare of the nation (rulings of 30 September 2003, 8 July 2005, 5 July 2007, 23 November 2007, and 20 March 2008).

In the jurisprudence of the Constitutional Court, it has been held on more than one occasion that the implementation of the public interest, as an interest of society recognised by the state and protected by law, is one of the most important conditions for the existence and evolution of society itself (inter alia, the rulings of 6 May 1997, 13 May 2005, 21 September 2006, and 6 January 2011).

The transfer of state-owned property into the ownership of other subjects (including privatisation) may be constitutionally justifiable only when this may provide larger benefits to society, when the purpose of such transfer is the satisfaction of important and constitutionally justifiable needs and interests of society; such transfer (both repayable and non-repayable) would be constitutionally unfounded if it inflicted evident harm on society and violated the rights of other persons (rulings of 30 September 2003, 8 July 2005, and 23 November 2007).

The public interest is dynamic and subject to change (rulings of 8 July 2005, 21 September 2006, 15 May 2007, 30 June 2008, and 6 January 2011). The state may and, in certain cases, must change (expand, abridge, or otherwise modify) the regulation of economic activity (rulings of 30 June 2008 and 6 January 2011). Neither the legislative nor executive power, while enjoying the respective powers in the area of economic activity, may opt out of this constitutional obligation (ruling of 13 May 2005).

The legislature, when paying regard to the Constitution and taking account of various factors, may establish the regime (conditions and procedure for the use) of the property that is transferred into the ownership of other subjects in order to continue to ensure the interests of society and the welfare of the nation and to implement the values consolidated in the Constitution (rulings of 30 September 2003 and 8 July 2005).

Not only laws adopted by the legislature for regulating the transfer of state-owned property into the ownership of other subjects (inter alia, the privatisation of such property), but also the decisions of executive power regarding the implementation of these laws, must serve the public interest and the general welfare of the nation.

... the legislative and executive state powers, when amending the regulation of economic activity related to privatisation, are not allowed to deny the public interest and the requirements stemming from Article 46 of the Constitution (inter alia, Paragraph 3 thereof, under which the state regulates economic activity so that it serves the general welfare of the nation), as well as the constitutional principle of responsible governance.

The regulation of economic activity in cases where, inter alia, legal acts related to privatisation are adopted may be linked with the implementation of the rights and legitimate interests of various economic operators, shareholders, or creditors. The Constitution, inter alia, Article 46 thereof, as well as the constitutional principle of responsible governance, gives rise to the duty of the legislature, when it regulates the relationships of privatisation, to precisely define the powers of employees and officials of state and municipal institutions and to determine their responsibility. Decisions adopted by the institutions of executive power in the area of privatisation (especially those through which certain previous decisions establishing particular obligations are amended) must be rationally reasoned and the impact of such decisions on, inter alia, the economy of this country and the finances of the state must be properly assessed. The said decisions may not be arbitrary.

The regulation of the activity of healthcare establishments where this activity is understood as economic activity

See 2.4.2. Social rights, 2.4.2.2. The right to healthcare, ruling of 16 May 2013 (“The regulation of the activity of healthcare establishments where this activity is understood as economic activity; the distribution of public funds among healthcare establishments (Article 46 and Paragraph 1 of Article 53 of the Constitution)”).

The legal regulation of economic activity in the financial sector

The Constitutional Court’s ruling of 5 July 2013

The Constitutional Court has noted that, in order to regulate economic activity in such a way that it would serve the general welfare of the nation, the state may establish a differentiated legal regulation determined by the specificity of a certain economic activity; the state, by taking account of the specificity of a certain economic activity, may use different measures laid down in a legal regulation (rulings of 2 March 2009, 3 February 2010, and 24 May 2013). The state, when regulating economic activity, must follow the principle of the reconciliation of the interests of a person and society and must ensure the interests of both a private person (economic operator) and society (inter alia, the rulings of 13 May 2005, 6 January 2011, 21 June 2011, and 24 May 2013).

The Constitutional Court has also pointed out that the establishment of certain exceptions to a certain general legal regulation may be constitutionally justified if these exceptions are aimed at ensuring a constitutionally justifiable and universally important interest, and only to the extent to which this is sought; the said exceptions must be proportionate to the sought constitutionally justifiable objective and must not limit the rights of the subjects concerned more than necessary to ensure the said constitutionally justifiable and universally significant interest (rulings of 12 December 2005, 2 March 2009, and 24 May 2013).

The economic activity carried out in the area of finances, inter alia, the provision of financial services, constitutes one of the specific types of economic activity; the said activity is characterised, inter alia, by the fact that when this activity is carried out, a direct influence is exerted on the national financial system, as well as the entire national economy; the stability and efficiency of the financial system constitute a significant public interest and, in terms of the functioning of the market, form an essential condition that determines the growth of the national economy; therefore, under the Constitution, inter alia, Paragraph 3 of Article 46 thereof, in order to regulate financial economic activity in such a way that it would serve the general welfare of the nation, the legislature is obliged to establish such a legal regulation that would ensure the security, stability, and reliability of the financial system functioning in this country; when establishing such a legal regulation, the legislature must pay regard to the imperatives stemming from the Constitution, inter alia, from the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law (ruling of 24 May 2013).

... one of the means of guaranteeing the security, stability, and reliability of the financial system is to establish such a legal regulation that would be aimed at ensuring the trust of persons in financial institutions, inter alia, in banks. The said objective can be achieved by various means: inter alia, it is possible to establish a legal regulation under which the creditors (depositors, investors) of a bank in bankruptcy proceedings would be, under the established conditions, compensated for the incurred losses. The legislature may opt for various models of compensation for losses, inter alia, the insurance of deposits and investment. When establishing such a legal regulation, the legislature must observe the principle of the reconciliation of the interests of a person and those of society, as well as other constitutional imperatives.

[...]

... the legislature, when establishing a legal regulation aimed at ensuring the stability and effectiveness of the financial system, is obliged to pay regard to the constitutional principle of the equality of the rights of subjects taking part in financial activity. In order to regulate financial economic activity in such a way that it would serve the general welfare of the nation, and in order to consolidate the legal regulation aimed at ensuring the security, stability, and reliability of the financial system functioning in this country, the legislature may establish a diverse and differentiated legal regulation with respect to the creditors of a financial institution (inter alia, a bank) who belong to different categories. When establishing a differentiated legal regulation in the area of financial activity, the legislature is obliged to pay regard to the requirements concerning the balance of constitutional values and social harmony, also the constitutional principles of justice and proportionality, as well as the requirements stemming from Paragraph 2 of Article 127 and Paragraph 1 of Article 128 of the Constitution.

Freedom of individual economic activity and economic initiative (Paragraph 1 of Article 46 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 9 May 2014

Paragraph 1 of Article 46 of the Constitution prescribes that the economy of Lithuania is based on the right of private ownership, freedom of individual economic activity, and economic initiative. In its rulings, the Constitutional Court has held on more than one occasion that the notion of freedom of individual economic activity and economic initiative, which is consolidated in Paragraph 1 of Article 46 of the Constitution, is broad and is based on the innate personal freedom of an individual and the innate right to possess property. This notion includes the right to freely choose a business, the right to freely conclude contracts, the freedom of fair competition, the equality of the rights of economic operators, etc. Freedom of individual economic activity and economic initiative are a whole complex of legal possibilities, which creates the preconditions for a person to independently adopt decisions necessary for his/her economic activity. Freedom of economic activity is not absolute and a person may exercise it in observance of certain mandatory requirements and limitations (rulings of 13 May 2005, 31 May 2006, 5 March 2008, and 6 January 2011). On the other hand, under the Constitution, the state is not allowed to interfere with individual economic activity without any limitations; therefore, it is impermissible, by means of the established limitations, to deny such essential provisions of freedom of economic activity as the equality of the rights of economic operators, fair competition, etc.

Regulating economic activity in order to protect human health and the environment (Paragraph 3 of Article 46, Paragraphs 1 and 3 of Article 53, and Article 54 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 9 May 2014

... when the legislature regulates economic activity, it faces the requirement stemming from the Constitution, inter alia, Paragraph 3 of Article 46, Paragraphs 1 and 3 of Article 53, and Article 54 thereof, to establish such limitations on the said activity where those limitations would aim to ensure the general welfare of the nation, inter alia, to protect against harmful impacts on human health and the environment, to use natural resources in a rational manner, and to remedy the damage caused to the natural environment. In the course of fulfilling this requirement, regard must be paid to the requirements that stem from the Constitution, inter alia, from the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law. Among other things, this means that, by means of legal regulation, it is possible to establish such duties of economic operators that would not restrict freedom of their activity more than necessary in order to achieve the constitutionally significant objectives regarding the protection of human health and environmental protection.

It should be noted that, when a law establishes the duties of economic entities in relation to the protection of human health and environmental protection against harmful influences, as well as in relation to the rational use of natural resources and compensation for the harm caused to the natural environment, the Government may also be assigned to adopt statutory legal acts necessary for the implementation of such a law and, inter alia, for the regulation of the performance of the duties of economic operators where such duties are established by the said law.

[...]

... when regulating the organisation of waste management as one of the types of economic activity, the legislature must take account of the fact that improperly managed waste endangers the environment, as well as human and public health, and it must also have regard to the imperative of using natural resources in a rational manner. Therefore ... it is possible to establish the duty of economic operators, where it is technically possible, first of all, to recycle waste in such a way that would allow making products from it intended for the same or other purposes or, if there is no possibility of recycling this waste, to use it otherwise without making any significant negative impacts on human and public health, as well as the environment; the procedure for the fulfilment of this duty may be specified in detail by the legal acts of the Government.

The legal regulation of the economic activity of passenger carriers

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 15 January 2015

The Constitutional Court has ... held that the legislature, being under the duty to regulate economic activity so that it serves the general welfare of the nation, also regulates, by means of laws, the economic activity of passenger carriers, lays down conditions for it, requirements for carrying out this activity, limitations and prohibitions on this activity, as well as control over the economic activity of passenger carriers (ruling of 5 March 2008). In doing so, the legislature must pay regard to the imperatives stemming from the Constitution, inter alia, Articles 29 and 46 thereof.

It should also be noted that the legislature, when regulating economic activity in the area of the carriage of passengers, may and, in some cases, also must delegate some functions of the organisation of this activity to municipalities. Under the Constitution, the functions of municipalities may be established only by means of a law; none of the functions assigned to municipalities means absolute autonomy of municipalities in the respective area (rulings of 24 December 2002, 8 July 2005, and 5 March 2008); while performing the assigned functions, municipalities must pay regard to the Constitution and laws (ruling of 5 March 2008).

... the legislature, having delegated certain functions of the organisation of the activities of the carriage of passengers to municipalities, must, in accordance with the imperatives stemming from Article 46 of the Constitution, inter alia, the requirement that economic activity must serve the general welfare of the nation, as well as the requirements for fair competition and the protection of consumer rights, which are consolidated in the said article, and also in accordance with the imperative of the equality of the rights of persons, as consolidated in Article 29 of the Constitution, establish such a legal regulation that municipalities would ensure freedom of fair competition (inter alia, would ensure that the means and methods of its protection are provided for and that the market for the carriage of passengers is not monopolised) and consumer rights in the area of the carriage of passengers (inter alia, would ensure that consumers receive quality and affordable services in line with their interests even in cases where the provision of such services is disadvantageous), as well as would not deny the equality of the rights of passenger carriers.

The duty of the legislature to reconcile different constitutional values when regulating economic activity (inter alia, in the area of waste management); the duty of municipalities organising waste management to pay regard to the Constitution and laws

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 5 March 2015

... the principles consolidated in Article 46 of the Constitution make up the whole – the constitutional basis for the economy of this country; the constitutional values on which the national economy is based are tightly linked with other constitutional values. In view of this fact, it should be noted that the duty, consolidated in Paragraph 3 of Article 46 of the Constitution, that the state must regulate economic activity so that it serves the general welfare of the nation implies the requirement that the legislature, in regulating economic activity (inter alia, in the area of waste management), must reconcile different constitutional values, inter alia, those protected under Articles 29, 46, 53, and 54 of the Constitution: freedom of individual economic activity and economic initiative, freedom of fair competition, the protection of consumer interests, the equality of the rights of economic operators, and the protection of human health and the environment.

... the legislature, in cases where it regulates the relationships connected with waste management and delegates certain functions to municipalities in the area of the organisation of waste management, under Paragraph 3 of Article 46 of the Constitution, is obliged to regulate this activity in such a way that it serves the general welfare of the nation: inter alia, the legislature must pay regard to the imperatives stemming from Article 46 of the Constitution, inter alia, the requirements, consolidated therein, for ensuring freedom of individual economic activity and economic initiative and protecting fair competition and consumer rights, also the imperative, consolidated in Article 29 of the Constitution, for the equality of the rights of persons, as well as the imperatives, consolidated in Articles 53 and 54 of the Constitution, for the protection of human health and the environment. Having regard to these constitutional imperatives, the legislature must lay down such a legal regulation governing the organisation of waste management under which, in the area at issue, municipalities would ensure freedom of fair competition (inter alia, would ensure that the market in waste management is not monopolised and the equality of the rights of participants in this market is not denied), as well as the protection of consumer rights, human health, and the environment (inter alia, the accessibility, as well as the uninterrupted provision and good quality, of waste management services).

[...]

... under the Constitution, municipalities, while acting freely and independently within their competence defined by the laws regulating economic activity (inter alia, waste management), are bound by the principles forming the constitutional foundation of the economy of this country, as well as by other constitutional imperatives. This means that, in the area of waste management, municipalities must pay regard to the requirement, as implied by the constitutional imperative of fair competition, that waste managers must be selected by means of a tender according to their capability to provide uninterrupted, good quality, and accessible services. It is possible to waive this requirement only on the objectively justified grounds; such grounds should not include the mere fact that there is an economic operator set up by a municipality and operating in the area of waste management.

The protection of the interests of consumers (inter alia, in the energy sector) (Paragraph 5 of Article 46 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 3 April 2015

... the Constitutional Court has held that the provision consolidated in Paragraph 5 of Article 46 of the Constitution, whereby the state defends the interests of the consumer, implies that laws and other legal acts must establish various measures of the protection of the interests of consumers and that state institutions must exercise control over how economic operators observe such measures (inter alia, the rulings of 18 October 2000, 17 March 2003, 2 March 2009, and 29 September 2010).

The Constitution, inter alia, from Paragraph 5 of Article 46 thereof, gives rise to the imperative of the guarantee of the effective protection of the rights and interests of consumers. This imperative implies that the legislature must establish such a legal regulation that would create the preconditions for each consumer to receive electricity under non-discriminatory conditions and would ensure that electricity is supplied to all consumers in a safe and reliable manner (rulings of 2 March 2009 and 29 September 2010). The establishment of limits on prices is one of the ways to defend the interests of consumers; the legislature has the duty to define, by means of a law, the criteria for the establishment of limits on electricity prices; such criteria and the methodology and procedure for establishing them must be clear, transparent, and reasonable so that no preconditions would be created for abuse when establishing electricity prices and, thus, so that no preconditions would be created for violating the rights and interests of the consumers of electricity (ruling of 2 March 2009).

These provisions of the official constitutional doctrine mutatis mutandis also apply in the sphere of the protection of the rights and interests of consumers of natural gas.

Regulating economic activity in the energy sector in order to ensure the security and reliability of the energy system

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 3 April 2015

... the economic activity conducted in the sphere of energy, inter alia, the provision of all consumers with energy resources (inter alia, natural gas), is a specific economic activity; such an activity is characterised, among other things, by the fact that conducting this activity has a direct influence on the entire national economy. The security and reliability of the energy system is a constitutionally important objective that justifies a particular differentiated legal regulation of economic activity in this sphere on the grounds of the public interest. Thus, when regulating, in accordance with the Constitution, inter alia, Paragraph 3 of Article 46 thereof, the economic activity in the sphere of energy so that it serves the general welfare of the nation, the legislature is obliged to establish such a legal regulation that would ensure the security, stability, and reliability of the energy system, inter alia, the possibility of receiving energy supplies from multiple sources (suppliers) under non-discriminatory conditions and at fair prices. For this purpose, the projects of special importance for the state designed for eliminating the dependence of the national economy upon a monopolist supplier of certain energy resources (inter alia, natural gas) may be implemented under the procedure and conditions established by means of a law. The special importance of these projects for the state implies that the legislature, having established the legal regulation assigning certain state-controlled economic operators to implement these projects, must also establish an effective mechanism of control over the implementation of such projects.

... under Paragraph 3 of Article 46 of the Constitution, the legislature, when regulating the economic activity in the sphere of energy so that it serves the general welfare of the nation and being under the obligation to ensure the effective implementation of the projects of special importance for the state, may, inter alia, establish such a legal regulation that would enable the financing of the said projects from multiple sources, inter alia, including the funds raised from consumers of energy resources. These funds may be accumulated by applying the rate of a state-regulated price, where such a rate is established, inter alia, in view of the law-established obligations of the economic operators implementing the aforesaid projects of special importance for the state to provide public services in the sphere of energy – to install and operate the energy infrastructure aimed to ensure that energy resources would be supplied in a secure and reliable manner.

Having chosen such financing of the projects of special importance for the state that is based, inter alia, on the funds raised from consumers of energy resources, the legislature, while following the imperative, arising out of Paragraph 5 of Article 46 of the Constitution, for ensuring the protection of the rights and interests of consumers, must establish an effective mechanism of control over the justified costs of the implementation of such projects so that the inclusion of these costs into the price of energy resources would not create the preconditions for abuse and, thus, for violating the interests of consumers.

The Constitutional Court has held on more than one occasion that the constitutional values on which the national economy is based are tightly linked with other constitutional values.

The content of the provisions of Article 46 of the Constitution should be interpreted in a systemic manner and in the context of the entire constitutional regulation, by taking account, inter alia, of the provisions of Paragraph 2 of Article 128 of the Constitution (ruling of 2 March 2009).

In interpreting Paragraph 2 of Article 128 of the Constitution, which provides that the procedure for the possession, use, and disposal of state-owned property are established by law, the Constitutional Court has held that, under the Constitution, the state is a subject of the right of ownership (rulings of 17 June 1997, 30 September 2003, and 30 October 2008); property that belongs to the state by right of ownership must be managed in such a way that it would serve the general welfare of the nation and the interest of society at large (rulings of 30 September 2003, 30 October 2008, and 24 October 2012).

The provisions of Paragraph 2 of Article 128 of the Constitution should be interpreted bearing in mind the constitutional concept of the state. The Constitutional Court has held that, in performing its functions, the state should act in the interests of society at large (inter alia, the rulings of 13 December 2004, 30 October 2008, and 8 June 2009); the mission of the state is to ensure human rights and freedoms, as well as to guarantee the public interest (inter alia, the rulings of 30 December 2003, 13 December 2004, and 21 December 2006); the public interest, as a common interest of the state, all society or part of society, must be balanced with the autonomous interests of individuals, because not only the public interest, but also the rights of persons, are constitutional values; a fair balance must be ensured in this sphere (ruling of 21 September 2006).

In its ruling of 30 September 2003, the Constitutional Court held that the provisions of Paragraph 2 of Article 128 of the Constitution are inseparable from the provisions of the Constitution that consolidate such constitutional values as the independence of the state and the integrity of its territory, the security of the state, the welfare of the nation, public order, and justice. One of the fundamental constitutional values consolidated in Article 1 of the Constitution – the independence of the state – is closely interrelated with the geopolitical orientation of the State of Lithuania, which is consolidated in the Constitution and implies, inter alia, membership of the Republic of Lithuania in the EU, as well as the necessity to fulfil the respective international obligations related to the said membership (rulings of 7 July 2011 and 24 January 2014). ... the obligations of the Republic of Lithuania arising from its membership in the EU in the sphere of energy, by means of which efforts are made to ensure the security and reliability of the energy system, are inseparable from the duty of the state, consolidated in Paragraph 3 of Article 46 of the Constitution, to ensure the general welfare of the nation.

The content of the provisions of Article 46 of the Constitution should be interpreted by taking account of the provisions of Article 94 thereof, which consolidate the powers of the Government as an institution of state power (ruling of 26 February 2010). Under Item 1 of Article 94 of the Constitution, the Government manages national affairs and guarantees state security. In interpreting the provisions of Article 94 of the Constitution, the Constitutional Court has held that, when the Government exercises the functions established for it by the Constitution, its powers may depend on the economic and social situation of this country, the problems at issue, and a number of other circumstances, upon the change of which the content and scope of the powers of the Government may also be changed; only the main powers of the Government are provided for in the Constitution (ruling of 23 November 1999). Everything that the Government performs, when implementing the powers established for it in the Constitution and laws, falls within managing the affairs of state governance (ruling of 29 November 2001). Under the Constitution, the Government, as an institution of the executive, has broad discretion in forming and pursuing the economic policy of the state and in regulating economic activity accordingly (ruling of 23 May 2007).

In the context of the constitutional justice case at issue, it should be noted that, under the Constitution, inter alia, under Paragraph 3 of Article 46 thereof, if it is interpreted together with Item 1 of Article 94, which establishes the competence of the Government to manage national affairs and guarantee state security, and Paragraph 2 of Article 128, which consolidates the constitutional grounds for the possession, use, and disposal of state-owned property, the legislature, in regulating the economic activity in the sphere of energy so that it serves the general welfare of the nation, may consolidate, by means of both general norms and special norms of a legal regulation, the powers of the Government to use state-controlled economic operators as an instrument of the economic policy in order to meet public interests in the sphere of economy. In implementing these powers and choosing a concrete state-controlled economic operator for carrying out a certain project that is of special importance for the state, the Government must pay regard, inter alia, to the constitutional principle of responsible governance.

The legal regulation of economic activity in the electricity sector

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 29 October 2015

... the specific nature of the economic activity carried out in the energy sphere, inter alia, the supply of all consumers with energy resources, also the necessity (arising, inter alia, from the obligations of membership of the Republic of Lithuania in the European Union) to ensure the security and reliability of the energy system, as well as the objective to ensure environmental protection by promoting, in various ways, the use of renewable energy sources, determine the particularities of the legal regulation governing the public interest services that are provided with a view to achieving the said objectives. Having regard to the Constitution, inter alia, the principle of the reconciliation of the interests of a person and society, and ensuring the possibility of obtaining energy resources from various sources, it is possible to establish such a legal regulation of public services in the electricity sphere that lays down the duty for all persons consuming electricity to pay for these services once they are ensured the possibility of receiving electricity required for satisfying their needs.

Regulating economic activity related to the use of the subsurface (Paragraph 3 of Article 46, Paragraphs 1 and 3 of Article 53, and Article 54 of the Constitution)

See 2.4.2. Social rights, 2.4.2.3. The right to a healthy environment, the ruling of 16 December 2015 (“The duty of the state, when regulating economic and other activity related to the use of the subsurface, to ensure the protection of the subsurface and other objects of the natural environment (land, water, air, plants, wildlife) and human health, as well as the rational use of natural resources (Paragraph 3 of Article 46, Paragraphs 1 and 3 of Article 53, and Article 54 of the Constitution)”).

The protection of the interests of consumers in the heat sector

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 7 June 2016

... the specific nature of the economic activity carried out in the energy sphere – the supply of all consumers with energy resources – is determined, inter alia, by the necessity, in accordance with the public interests (arising, inter alia, from the obligations of membership of the Republic of Lithuania in the European Union), to ensure energy efficiency as a means of striving for the security and reliability of the energy system and to reduce greenhouse gas emissions.

[...]

... the Constitution, inter alia, the provision of Paragraph 5 of Article 46 of the Constitution, whereby the state defends the interests of consumers, gives rise to the duty of the legislature to adopt such a legal regulation governing the relationships related to heat supply where this regulation would consolidate the provisions prohibiting heat suppliers from acting as the supervisors of the heating and hot water systems of buildings; having established that the interests of certain persons associated with the heat supplier are contrary to the interest of heat consumers to consume heat energy in an economical and rational manner, the duty stems from the Constitution, inter alia, Paragraph 5 of Article 46 thereof, for the legislature to impose the above-mentioned prohibiting provisions also on the said persons; if it transpires that the provisions that are consolidated in laws and prohibit certain persons, inter alia, operators of a certain type or those conducting economic activity in a certain territory, from acting as the supervisors (operators) of the heating and hot water systems of buildings do not (would not) ensure the rendering, at competitive prices, of appropriate quality services related to the supervision of the heating and hot water system of a building, the Constitution, inter alia, Paragraph 3 of Article 46 thereof, gives rise to the duty of the legislature to establish such a legal regulation that would provide for the respective exceptions to the prohibition, applied to heat suppliers and certain related persons, on acting as the supervisors (operators) of the heating and hot water systems of buildings.

It should also be noted that, in cases where, in the sphere of the economic activity related to heat supply, the circumstances leading to the conflict of interests between a certain person (persons) and heat consumers arise or cease to exist, the Constitution, inter alia, the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law, gives rise to the duty of the legislature to accordingly amend the legal regulation that defines the circle of persons prohibited from acting as the supervisors (operators) of the heating and hot water systems of buildings.

[...]

... in view of the fact that it is in the equal interest of all owners of flats or other premises in blocks of flats, who are consumers of heat and hot water, to receive quality services in the maintenance of the heating and hot water systems of buildings and on the basis of the provision of the official constitutional doctrine, according to which legal acts may not demand impossible things (lex non cogit ad impossibilia), it should be held that the Constitution, inter alia, Paragraph 3 of Article 46 thereof, and the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law give rise to the duty of the legislature, after assessing the particularities of the municipal heat sector, the circle of operators carrying out or having the possibility of carrying out the activity related to the maintenance of the heating and hot water systems of buildings, and other important circumstances, to determine the size of residential areas in which the imposed limitations on certain persons on providing the services of the maintenance of the heating and hot water systems of buildings would ensure the protection of the rights of the aforementioned consumers and, conversely, the size of residential areas in which, in the absence of any operator (operators) capable of carrying out the said maintenance, the interest of the owners, as well as the public interest, to ensure the proper maintenance of the heating and hot water systems of buildings would be denied.

The protection of the interests of consumers in the sphere of the administration of common-use objects of blocks of flats

The Constitutional Court's ruling (no KT25-N12/2016) of 5 October 2016

... the Constitution, inter alia, the provision of Paragraph 5 of Article 46 of the Constitution, whereby the state defends the interests of consumers, gives rise to the duty of the legislature to adopt such a legal regulation governing the relationships related to the administration of common-use objects of blocks of flats where this regulation would consolidate the provisions prohibiting the suppliers of heat, electricity, gas, or drinking water, as well as persons providing the services of waste transportation and regular maintenance of lifts, from acting as the administrators of common-use objects of blocks of flats; having established that the interests of certain persons associated with the aforesaid persons are contrary to the interest of the owners of flats and other premises that the purchase of services in connection with the maintenance of the block of flats would be made on terms advantageous to these owners, as well as that the implementation of such contracts would be properly controlled, the Constitution, inter alia, Paragraph 5 of Article 46 thereof, gives rise to the duty of the legislature also to impose the aforementioned prohibition on such persons; if it transpires that the provisions that are consolidated in laws and prohibit certain persons, inter alia, operators of a certain type or those carrying out economic activity in a certain territory, from acting as the administrators of common-use objects of blocks of flats do not (would not) ensure the rendering, at competitive prices, of appropriate quality services related to common-use objects, the Constitution, inter alia, Paragraph 3 of Article 46 thereof, gives rise to the duty of the legislature to establish such a legal regulation that would provide for the respective exceptions to the prohibition, applied to persons providing services to blocks of flats, on acting as the administrators of common-use objects of blocks of flats.

[...]

... in view of the fact that it is in the equal interest of all owners of flats or other premises in blocks of flats to receive quality services that meet their interests and that are necessary for the maintenance of blocks of flats, on the basis of the provision of the official constitutional doctrine according to which legal acts may not demand impossible things (lex non cogit ad impossibilia), it should be held that the Constitution, inter alia, Paragraph 3 of Article 46 thereof, and the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law give rise to the duty of the legislature, after assessing the circle of operators carrying out or having the possibility of carrying out the activity related to the administration of common-use objects in blocks of flats and other important circumstances, to determine the size of residential areas in which the imposed limitations on certain persons for providing the services of the administration of common-use objects in blocks of flats would ensure the protection of the rights of the aforementioned consumers and, conversely, the size of residential areas in which, in the absence of any operator (operators) capable of providing the aforementioned services, the interest of the owners, as well as the public interest, to ensure the proper use and maintenance of blocks of flats would be denied.

Licensing economic activity (inter alia, the organisation of waste management)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 30 May 2017

As a rule, the regulation of economic activity is connected with the establishment of conditions for economic activity, the regulation of certain procedures, control over economic activity, as well as with certain limitations and prohibitions set with regard to this activity; when a person takes part in an economic activity, he/she may be subject to special limitations established under laws (inter alia, the rulings of 13 May 2005, 21 June 2011, and 9 May 2014).

In regulating economic activity in such a way that it serves the general welfare of the people, the state may establish a differentiated legal regulation, which is determined by the specific nature of economic activity; the state, taking account of the specific nature of economic activity, may use different measures laid down in a legal regulation (inter alia, the rulings of 2 March 2009, 24 May 2013, and 3 April 2015).

One of the measures of the legal regulation of economic activity is the establishment of a state authorisation system (licensing) in order to ensure greater state control necessary in certain specific areas of economic activity. The Constitutional Court has noted that, when regulating licensed economic activity, the legislature must establish not only the necessary requirements that must be complied with by the economic operators seeking to receive the licences to engage in licensed activities, but also the requirements that must be complied with by persons who have received such licences, as well as the grounds and procedure for revoking the validity of the issued licences; compliance with the conditions of licences and oversight over this compliance is a necessary precondition for fair competition in the respective market (ruling of 21 January 2008); the freedom of economic activity of an economic operator that has violated the rules of fair competition laid down in the licence not only may, but normally must, be limited (rulings of 21 January 2008 and 15 March 2008).

[...]

... in regulating the economic activity of waste management, inter alia, the organisation of waste management, the ensuring of which should, under the Constitution, be regarded as a public interest, the state must reconcile different constitutional values, inter alia, those protected under Articles 46, 53 and 54 of the Constitution: freedom of individual economic activity and economic initiative, freedom of fair competition, and the protection of human health and the environment against harmful influences; the state must also ensure the constitutional imperative to regulate economic activity so that it serves the general welfare of the people. In view of the above, the legislature must establish such conditions for the activity of the organisation of waste management and effective control measures (inter alia, licensing of this economic activity) that would prevent damage to the environment and human health caused by the improperly managed waste.

Thus, when regulating the licensed economic activity in the sphere of the organisation of waste management, under the Constitution, the legislature must establish not only the necessary requirements that must be complied with by the economic operators seeking to receive the licences to engage in licensed activities, but also the requirements that must be complied with by persons who have received such licences, as well as the grounds and procedure for revoking the validity of the issued licences. The freedom of economic activity of an economic operator that has violated the rules of the licensed economic activity not only may, but normally must, be limited in accordance with the principle of proportionality, stemming from the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law; under the principle of proportionality ... freedom of economic activity may not be limited more than necessary in order to achieve the constitutionally significant objectives of the protection of human health and the environment; such limitations may not in themselves deny freedom of economic activity, which is guaranteed under Paragraph 1 of Article 46 of the Constitution, and state support for economic efforts and initiative useful to society, which is guaranteed under Paragraph 2 of the same article. One of such measures limiting the economic activity of the organisation of waste management may be revoking the validity of licences for those economic operators that grossly and/or repeatedly (systematically) violate the conditions, prescribed by means of laws, for the activity of waste management, inter alia, the organisation of waste management.

Legal persons as specific entities of legal relationships

See 2.2. Civil (individual) rights and freedoms, 2.2.10. Freedom of association, the ruling of 4 May 2018.

The regulation of the maintenance of forestry as economic activity (Article 46 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 16 April 2019

... the foundations for the regulation of the maintenance of forestry, as of any other economic activity, are consolidated in Article 46 of the Constitution. Interpreting the provisions of this article, among other things, the Constitutional Court has held the following:

- under the Constitution, the essential conditions for economic activity, as well as prohibitions and limitations that have an essential impact on the said activity, may be established only by means of a law (rulings of 31 May 2006 and 15 March 2008);
- the duty of the state, consolidated in Paragraph 3 of Article 46 of the Constitution, to regulate economic activity so that it serves the general welfare of the people implies the requirement for the legislature, when regulating this activity, to reconcile different constitutional values, inter alia, those protected under Articles 46 and 54 of the Constitution (rulings of 5 March 2015, 16 December 2015, and 24 May 2018).

[...]

... the Constitution, inter alia, Articles 46 and 54 and Paragraph 2 of Article 128 thereof, and the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law give rise to the duty of the legislature to establish, by means of a law, the essential conditions for forestry management; the legislature must establish a clear and reasoned model of forestry management, inter alia, the respective subjects responsible for the management of forests belonging to the state by right of ownership, or the criteria for determining such subjects. It should also be noted that, while establishing the legal regulation governing forestry management, the legislature must observe, inter alia, the duty of the state, which stems from Paragraph 3 of Article 46 of the Constitution, to regulate economic activity so that it serves the general welfare of the people and, at the same time, the legislature must implement the requirements, which stem from Article 54 and Paragraph 2 of Article 128 of the Constitution, inter alia, to ensure the proper protection of forests, as well as the rational management and use of forests as state-owned property.

The prohibition of unfair actions in economic activity (inter alia, in the milk sector)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 6 February 2020

Interpreting Paragraph 1 of Article 46 of the Constitution, under which the economy of Lithuania is based on the right of private ownership, freedom of individual economic activity, and economic initiative, the Constitutional Court has held that the notion of freedom of individual economic activity and economic initiative is broad; it is based on personal freedom and the right to possess property; this notion includes the right to freely choose a business, the right to freely conclude contracts, freedom of fair competition, the equality of the rights of economic operators, etc. (inter alia, the rulings of 27 March 2009, 6 January 2011, and 9 May 2014); freedom of individual economic activity and economic initiative constitute the whole complex of legal possibilities, which creates the preconditions for a person to independently adopt decisions necessary for the respective economic activity and implies, inter alia, the freedom to conclude contracts (inter alia, the rulings of 2 March 2009, 8 October 2009, and 3 February 2010); the freedom to conclude contracts is, first of all, a free expression of the will of the parties to the contract in seeking to conclude the contract; this is the right independently, together with the contractor, to decide on the questions of the content of the contract without violating the respective imperative requirements of the law and without restricting the rights and freedoms of other persons (ruling of 20 November 1996); freedom of individual economic activity and economic initiative are inseparable from the possibility for a person, willing to engage in economic activity or, on the contrary, to withdraw from it, to enter the market or to leave the market without artificial barriers (inter alia, the rulings of 31 May 2006, 29 April 2009, and 5 March 2015).

[...]

Interpreting Paragraph 3 of Article 46 of the Constitution, under which the state regulates economic activity so that it serves the general welfare of the people, the Constitutional Court has held that this provision consolidates the constitutional principle that outlines the objectives, directions, means, and limits of the regulation of economic activity (inter alia, the rulings of 6 October 1999, 9 May 2014, and 21 December 2018).

As a rule, the regulation of economic activity is connected with the establishment of conditions for economic activity, the regulation of certain procedures, control over economic activity, as well as with certain limitations and prohibitions set with regard to this activity; when a person takes part in an economic activity, he/she may be subject to special limitations established by means of laws (inter alia, the rulings of 13 May 2005, 9 May 2014, and 21 December 2018).

Regulating economic activity in such a way that it serves the general welfare of the people, the state may establish a differentiated legal regulation, which is determined by the specific nature of economic activity; the state, taking account of the specific nature of economic activity, may use different measures laid down in a legal regulation (inter alia, the rulings of 2 March 2009, 3 April 2015, and 21 December 2018). The differentiated establishment of the legal situation of separate economic operators and the consolidation of the respective conditions of economic activity, by taking account of the importance and nature of the regulated economic relationships, should be related to the objectives raised by the state in the economic sphere and the aim to arrange the national economy accordingly (inter alia, the rulings of 18 October 2000, 31 May 2006, and 5 July 2013). Due to the specific nature, variety, and dynamism of economic activity, the regulation of economic activity cannot be the same all the time; the proportion of prohibitions and permissions is subject to change, inter alia, in order to ensure the public interest (inter alia, the rulings of 13 May 2005, 31 May 2006, and 16 December 2015).

[...]

... under the Constitution, inter alia, Paragraphs 1 and 3 of Article 46 thereof, and the constitutional principles of a state under the rule of law and justice and the general legal principle of bona fides, while taking into account the specific nature of a certain economic activity, inter alia, the production and processing of milk and trade in milk, and having assessed the situation and significance of a certain economic sphere for Lithuanian economy, as well as seeking to ensure a balance between the interests of economic operators and to prevent these economic operators from unfair economic activity and from abusing their dominant position in the market, the legislature may establish such a legal regulation of economic activity in the respective sphere, inter alia, in the milk sector, that would establish the special limitations applied to economic operators operating in that economic sphere, inter alia, the imperative provisions prohibiting the specific unfair actions as defined under these provisions in the field of contractual relationships of the said economic operators; by this legal regulation, the legislature may also provide for control over compliance with these provisions and responsibility for violations thereof. In doing so, the legislature must respect the Constitution, inter alia, the constitutional principle of proportionality, and must not deny the essential provisions of freedom of economic activity, which are consolidated in Article 46 of the Constitution, such as the freedom to conclude contracts, the equality of the rights of economic operators, fair competition, etc.

The regulation of economic activity in the area of waste management; the legislature must establish, by means of a law, the essential conditions for the economic activity of waste management

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 18 February 2020

... under the Constitution, inter alia, the principle that the state takes care of the health of people, and the imperatives of the protection of the natural environment and environmental protection against harmful influences, ensuring waste management should be regarded as a public interest (ruling of 5 March 2015); when regulating the organisation of waste management as one of the types of economic activity, the legislature must take account of the fact that improperly managed waste endangers the environment, as well as human and public health (rulings of 9 May 2014 and 30 May 2017); it is possible to establish the duty of economic operators, where it is technically possible, first of all, to recycle waste in such a way that would allow producing products from it that are intended for the same or other purposes or, if there is no possibility of recycling this waste, to use it otherwise without making any significant negative impact on human and public health, as well as on the environment (ruling of 9 May 2014); in regulating the economic activity of waste management, ensuring which should, under the Constitution, be regarded as a public interest, the state must reconcile different constitutional values, inter alia, those protected under Articles 46, 53, and 54 of the Constitution, i.e. freedom of individual economic activity and economic initiative, freedom of fair competition, and the protection of human health and the environment against harmful influences, and it must ensure the constitutional imperative to regulate economic activity so that it serves the general welfare of the people (ruling of 30 May 2017).

... the imperatives of the protection of the natural environment, environmental protection against harmful influences, and the protection of public health, which are consolidated in the Constitution, inter alia, Articles 53 and 54 thereof, and the duty of the state to regulate economic activity so that it serves the general welfare of the people, which is consolidated in Paragraph 3 of Article 46 of the Constitution, give rise to the requirement for the legislature to regulate waste management as one of the types of economic activity in such a way as to ensure the use of waste for economic, social, and environmental purposes, where possible not by disposing but, first of all, by recycling or using it in another way, inter alia, for energy recovery.

[...]

... in order to ensure the public interest under Articles 53 and 54 of the Constitution that waste would be managed properly and would not endanger the environment and public health, the Constitution, inter alia, Paragraphs 1 and 3 of Article 46 thereof, and the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law give rise to the duty of the legislature to establish, by means of a law, the essential conditions for the economic activity of waste management, inter alia, the clear criteria for determining the operators that may carry out the respective activity of waste management.

In regulating the organisation of waste management as one of the types of economic activity, inter alia, in establishing the requirements and conditions for the economic activity of waste management so that this legal regulation would comply with the requirement to serve the general welfare of the people, which is established in Paragraph 3 of Article 46 of the Constitution, the legislature must pay regard to the requirement, stemming from the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law, not to establish such a legal regulation under which, for economic operators willing to engage in the economic activity of waste management, the possibilities (implied by freedom of individual economic activity and economic initiative, which are consolidated in Paragraph 1 of Article 46 of the Constitution) of managing waste in the manner that is most favourable to the environment and public health would be disproportionately complicated, or it would altogether be impossible to engage in this economic activity.

2.4.1.2. The right to work

The foundations of the protection of human labour rights

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 24 September 1998

Chapter IV “The National Economy and Labour” of the Constitution consolidates not only freedom of individual economic activity and the national economy based on private ownership, but also the regulation of economic activity so that it serves the general welfare of the nation. In the norms of this chapter, the economic and social spheres are not opposed, but supplement one another. Therefore, it is no coincidence that the foundations of the protection of human labour rights are enshrined in the Constitution. For instance, Article 48 of the Constitution prescribes that everyone may freely choose an occupation or business, and shall have the right to have proper, safe, and healthy conditions at work, as well as to receive fair pay for work and social security in the event of unemployment. Article 49 of the Constitution guarantees every person the right to rest and leisure, as well as to annual paid leave. It is provided for therein that the length of working time is established by law. Other norms of the Constitution provide for the ways of the protection of economic and social interests of employees, guarantee social assistance, etc.

It is possible to assert that human labour rights, as established in the Constitution, constitute an integral group that is part of the constitutional status of an individual. The Constitution views a working individual from a humanistic standpoint. An individual is understood not as an abstract social, economic, or professional category or as a participant in production relationships, but as a free personality, whose human dignity must be protected.

The legal regulation governing employment relationships

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 24 September 1998

The parties of employment relationships are an employee and an employer. These are subjects who are different with respect to their rights and duties. The duty of the state is to ensure cooperation between the subjects of employment relationships on the grounds of social partnership and to protect the rights of an employee as he/she is, as a rule, from the economic and social standpoint, the weaker party. The system of values that is established in the Constitution determines the fact that the legal norms regulating employment relationships and the areas linked with them must not only provide for the protection of an employee in the process of work, but also ensure a whole spectrum of the guarantees of the rights of a working individual in order to avoid the groundless domination of one party of employment relationships and the dependency of the other party. It should be noted that these aims determine the legal regulation of employment relationships.

The following principles are characteristic of the legal regulation of employment relationships: the equality of the parties of an employment contract; the establishment of supplementary guarantees in respect to most vulnerable groups of citizens; the prohibition against any unilateral change of the conditions agreed upon by the parties; the right of an employee to cancel the employment contract under the procedure established by means of laws; the possibility for an employer to cancel the employment contract only on the grounds established by means of laws; the equality of the rights of employees irrespective of their gender, race, nationality, citizenship, political views, attitude towards religion, or other circumstances not related to the performance characteristics of employees.

In order to ensure a balance between an employer and an employee, certain guarantees are established in employment relationships for employees; such guarantees may not be reduced by an agreement of the parties. These guarantees are as follows: minimum remuneration for work, compensation for idle time in cases provided for by means of a law, retirement benefits, a strict regulation of cancelling an employment contract on the initiative of an employer, etc. The implementation of these measures provided for by means of a law is linked with certain expenses incurred by an employer. However, these measures are necessary in order to protect the social needs of an employee.

Both the sufficient protection of the property interests of an employer and the protection of the employment rights of an employee are necessary preconditions for normal economic activity in modern society. The legislature must reconcile different interests and ensure the balance of constitutional values.

2.4.1.2.1. The right to freely choose an occupation or business

The right to freely choose an occupation or business includes the right to enter state service (Paragraph 1 of Article 33 and Paragraph 1 of Article 48 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 13 December 2004

State service is professional activity, i.e. work activity, carried out by the employees of state or municipal institutions. Thus, the right to enter on equal terms the state service of the Republic of Lithuania, as consolidated in Paragraph 1 of Article 33 of the Constitution, is related to the right of everyone to freely choose an occupation or business, which is established in Paragraph 1 of Article 48 of the Constitution. In this respect, the relations between the provision “Citizens shall have the right ... to enter on equal terms the State Service of the Republic of Lithuania” of Paragraph 1 of Article 33 of the Constitution and the provision “Everyone may freely choose a job or business” of Paragraph 1 of Article 48 thereof may be regarded as relations between lex specialis and lex generalis.

It should be noted that the right of each person to freely choose an occupation in Paragraph 1 of Article 48 of the Constitution is formulated broader, i.e. as the right of each person to “freely choose a job or business”. The Constitutional Court has held that the provision of Paragraph 1 of Article 48 of the Constitution, whereby everyone may freely choose an occupation or business, is a norm of general nature based on the universally recognised concept of human freedom (ruling of 4 March 1999), which means the possibility of choosing the type of occupation at one’s own discretion, i.e. by deciding freely on this matter (ruling of 10 July 1996) and that the freedom to freely choose an occupation or business, which is consolidated in Paragraph 1 of Article 48 of the Constitution, is one of the necessary conditions for satisfying human vital needs and ensuring the appropriate place of an individual in society (rulings of 4 March 1999 and 4 July 2003).

Thus, under the Constitution, a person who seeks to implement his/her constitutional right to work has the right to decide freely whether to choose an occupation in the private sector or a private business, or to seek to be employed in state service. The provision “Everyone may freely choose a job or business” of Paragraph 1 of Article 48 of the Constitution implies the duty of the state and the legislature to create the legal conditions for the implementation of this right (rulings of 4 March 1999 and 4 July 2003).

The right to freely choose an occupation or business; the right to freely choose and acquire a profession (Paragraph 1 of Article 48 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 20 February 2008

Under Paragraph 1 of Article 48 of the Constitution, everyone may freely choose an occupation or business. The constitutional freedom of each individual to choose an occupation or business is a necessary condition for satisfying the vital needs of an individual, securing his/her appropriate position in society and implies the duty of the legislature to create the legal preconditions for implementing this freedom; the legislature, while creating such preconditions, has the powers to establish, when taking account of the nature of an occupation or business and having regard to the Constitution, the conditions for the implementation of the right to freely choose an occupation or business (rulings of 25 November 2002, 4 July 2003, 29 December 2004, 13 August 2007, and 7 January 2008). The human right to freely choose one or another type of occupation or business is first linked with various natural requirements, i.e. the abilities and potential of every person; such requirements may include: holding certain education, moral and other qualities (e.g. with regard to physicians, teachers, judges, public prosecutors, etc.), the acquisition of a special right (e.g. with regard to drivers), etc. (ruling of 15 March 1996). The requirements related to certain qualifications, professional knowledge, and skills for persons who aspire to do complex or responsible work are indisputable and, as a rule, universally recognised (ruling of 10 July 1996).

The constitutional freedom of each individual to choose an occupation or business also implies the right to freely choose and acquire a profession. This right is related with the right to education, which is often a necessary condition for the acquisition of the respective professional qualification. Higher education, which is awarded upon completing studies in higher education, is necessary for certain professions.

[...]

When the constitutional rights of a person to work, education, and profession are interpreted in the context of the constitutional principles of legal certainty, legal security, and transparency, it should be held that the state has the duty to ensure that the requirements defining the education necessary for doing a certain job or holding a certain position would be public and clear; the main requirements must not be changed in an arbitrary and voluntaristic manner; otherwise, people would be unable to properly plan the choice of their profession and education.

The possibility of freely choosing an occupation or business must not be restricted on the grounds that a pension has been granted and paid to a person (Paragraph 1 of Article 48 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 6 February 2012

In the jurisprudence of the Constitutional Court, it has ... been held more than once that, when regulating pensionary relationships, it is necessary to have regard to Paragraph 1 of Article 48 of the Constitution, which, inter alia, enshrines the possibility of an individual to choose an occupation or business at his/her own discretion (i.e. by his/her own free decision); the constitutional freedom of each individual to choose an occupation or business implies the duty of the legislature to create the legal preconditions for implementing this freedom; the official constitutional doctrine of human rights is also based on the principled provision that, under the Constitution, it is not allowed to establish any such a legal regulation by which a person, in implementing a certain constitutional right, would lose the possibility of implementing another constitutional right; thus, under the Constitution, it is not permitted to establish such a legal regulation that would impose such a restriction on a person who has been granted and paid an old-age pension that is designed to limit the possibility of freely choosing an occupation or business specifically because of the fact that such a person has been granted and paid an old-age pension, although he/she meets the conditions, provided for by means of a law, that make it possible for him/her to have a certain occupation or conduct a certain business; such a legal regulation under which a person may not freely choose an occupation or business due to the fact that, upon the implementation of this right, he/she would not be paid the granted old-age pension or part thereof that was paid until then must also be considered a restriction on the possibility of freely choosing an occupation or business; this provision must mutatis mutandis be applied to other types of pensions, inter alia, state pensions provided for by means of a law (ruling of 22 October 2007 and the decision of 20 April 2010).

2.4.1.2.2. Professional competence requirements

The powers of the legislature to establish the conditions for implementing the right to freely choose an occupation or business, as well as to establish professional competence requirements

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 13 December 2004

The Constitutional Court has held that, when creating the legal preconditions for implementing the right to freely choose an occupation or business, the legislature is empowered to establish, by taking account of the nature of an occupation, the conditions for implementing the right to freely choose an occupation; in doing so, the legislature must observe the Constitution (ruling of 4 July 2003). In its ruling of 4 March 1999, the Constitutional Court held the following: "Implementing its obligation to ensure national security and proper guidance of young people, to ensure education, credible financial system, the protection of state secrets, etc., the state is entitled to establish additional, special requirements for those who wish to work in the main areas of economy and business." It was held in the Constitutional Court's ruling of 10 July 1996 that, “however, certain qualifications, professional knowledge, and skills are necessary for complex work; therefore, the respective requirements for persons who aspire to do complex or responsible work are indisputable and, as a rule, universally recognised”, as well as that “the requirements of professional competence do not contradict the human right to freely choose an occupation or business”.

Establishing the standards of the quality of higher education that must be met by persons aspiring to hold certain positions or be engaged in a certain professional activity (for more on control over higher education quality, see 2.4.3. Cultural rights, 2.4.3.1. The right to education, 2.4.3.1.2. The right to seek higher education)

The Constitutional Court’s ruling of 20 February 2008

... The standards of the quality of higher education that must be met by a person aspiring to hold a certain position or to be engaged in a certain professional activity must be established by means of a law; ensuring such standards and control over compliance with these standards may also be established by means of statutory legal acts, as well as by means of legal acts of schools of higher education; requirements for certain fields of studies may also be established by means of statutory acts, the legal regulation established wherein must not compete with that established in laws. The importance of such standards is especially evident in certain professions, inter alia, the professions controlled by the state, where especially complex and responsible work is linked with the acquisition of such professions; the importance of such standards is also especially evident in such positions in institutions of public power where certain functions related to the implementation of public power (first of all, state power) are entrusted only to such representatives of a certain profession who have especially high qualification ... it is especially evident that the said standards are necessary for the legal profession (and not only for it).

The legal profession; requirements for the professional qualification of lawyers (on higher education in law, also see 2.4.3. Cultural rights, 2.4.3.1. The right to education, 2.4.3.1.2. The right to seek higher education)

The Constitutional Court’s ruling of 20 February 2008

The legal profession is an inseparable part of the legal system. In a democratic state under the rule of law, high requirements are raised for this profession, because it is possible to ensure such fundamental legal values as the rule of law, justice, the rights and freedoms of persons, legal security and legal certainty, the right to a fair trial, legal assistance, etc. only in such a legal system where lawyers have the necessary professional competence; only lawyers who have the necessary professional competence may be entrusted with the functions of ensuring that the rights and freedoms of persons are protected and defended by legal means, as well as with the functions in deciding cases (settling legal disputes) in courts. This is particularly true for positions in institutions of public power where professional lawyers are entrusted with performing certain functions linked with the implementation of public power (first of all, state power) as, for instance, the function of the administration of justice, as well as for professions controlled by the state (i.e. such professions in which persons perform the functions of ensuring the public interest), engaging in which is entrusted only to persons who have the qualification of a lawyer, thus, also the education of a lawyer. The professional activity of lawyers, inter alia, judges, who are properly prepared and of high professional qualification determines the trust of the public in the state and its legal system. It needs to be noted that the processes of globalisation and European integration (which also do not bypass Lithuania) determine the fact that lawyers must have good knowledge not only of the legal system of their own country, but also of the legal systems of other countries, as well as of supranational law.

The legal profession is inseparable from higher education in law: higher education in law is a conditio sine qua non of professional and effective legal practice (both private and one practised in institutions of public power). The legal profession is also inseparable from the activity of universities: one of the most characteristic features of the western legal tradition, which was formed many centuries ago and to which Lithuania also belongs, is the fact that lawyers of the highest qualification are prepared precisely in universities. In the western legal tradition, the acquisition of the highest professional qualification of a lawyer is related specifically with university higher education in law. In general, this does not mean that it would be impermissible to prepare lawyers also outside universities or that it would be impermissible (also in schools of higher education) to prepare lawyers of lower qualification (or legal specialists of narrower legal profile, who seek to acquire knowledge only in a certain area of law) whose legal education is not regarded as one corresponding to legal education awarded by universities and who can virtually do legal work of applied nature, which is less creative (and, thus, more simple); however, the principled position is taken that non-university education in law (as well as that acquired in schools of higher education) does not in itself imply the possibility for persons who have acquired it to seek to hold any type of position in the legal profession (inter alia, positions in institutions of public power) or to engage in any type of professional activity of a lawyer (inter alia, a profession controlled by the state). Therefore, in the countries of the western legal tradition, the requirement of precisely university higher education in law, but not simply higher education in law, for certain professional activity as a lawyer, including situations where a person could become a judge, is, in general, not impossible.

[...]

The jurisprudence of the Constitutional Court has revealed not only the meaning of higher education in law, but also the meaning of university higher education in law for legal practice. ... It was held in [the Constitutional Court's ruling of 10 July 1996] that the requirement of university higher education in law for advocates should be treated as the qualification requirement for persons who wish to work at the bar and as an increased requirement for educational qualifications for lawyers of this profession where the said requirement for educational qualifications is aimed to secure the rendering of more qualified legal assistance and to strengthen the guarantees of the protection and defence of human rights and freedoms The legal position of the Constitutional Court (ratio decidendi) was reasoned, inter alia, by the fact that not only the abundance of knowledge, but also broadness and fundamentality, are characteristic of university education, since persons who have university education acquire supplementary and universal knowledge that is necessary when adopting crucial decisions in various spheres of life, while other higher educational establishments perform a narrower function – they grant higher education that is the foundation of professional activity in a particular area; the same legal position was also reasoned by the fact that the purpose of university legal education is to prepare specialists with multidisciplinary profiles, who are able to assess the entire legal system and decide difficult problems. A much wider and varied syllabus of university studies, fundamental studies that take place for a longer time period, greater attention to general subjects of humanities, private law, etc. help to achieve the said purpose of university legal education. Therefore, the education in law acquired in the said other schools of higher education may not be unconditionally regarded as corresponding to university education, even though the former is deemed to be higher education.

Requirements for the professional qualification (education) of judges (applicants for the positions of judges)

See 9.1. Courts, 9.1.4. The constitutional status of judges. The appointment of judges, their professional career, and their release from duties. The judicial self-governance institutions, ruling of 20 February 2008.

2.4.1.2.3. The right to have proper, safe, and healthy conditions at work

The right to have proper, safe, and healthy conditions at work (Paragraph 1 of Article 48 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 29 April 2008

Paragraph 1 of Article 48 of the Constitution prescribes: "Everyone may freely choose a job or business, and shall have the right to have proper, safe, and healthy conditions at work, as well as to receive fair pay for work and social security in the event of unemployment."

The constitutional right to have proper, safe and healthy working conditions means, inter alia, that every employee has the right to such conditions at work (work environment, work nature, the time of work and rest, tools of work, etc. must be regarded as working conditions) that would not exert negative influence on his/her life, health, and would be in line with the requirements of safety and hygiene (ruling of 9 April 2002). At the same time, this constitutional right implies the duty of an employer to ensure proper, safe, and healthy conditions at work. The human right to have proper, safe and healthy conditions at work, which stems from the Constitution, inter alia, Paragraph 1 of Article 48 thereof, also does not deny the duty of every employee to follow the requirements of safety at work.

It needs to be noted that the provision of Paragraph 1 of Article 48 of the Constitution, under which everyone has the right to have proper, safe, and healthy conditions at work, also implies the duty of the state to establish a legal regulation under which the legal preconditions for implementing this right would be created. In doing so, the state must also establish the effective mechanisms of control over the implementation of this right.

The right to have proper, safe, and healthy conditions at work (Paragraph 1 of Article 48 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 9 May 2013

The provision "Everyone ... shall have the right to have proper, safe, and healthy conditions at work" of Paragraph 1 of Article 48 of the Constitution, Article 49 thereof, and the provision "The State shall take care of the health of people" of Paragraph 1 of Article 53 thereof give rise to the duty of the state to establish a legal regulation that would create the legal preconditions for ensuring the right of an individual to have proper, safe, and healthy conditions at work, the right to rest and leisure, as well as to annual paid leave. ... the said provisions of the Constitution imply the duty of the legislature to regulate, by means of a law, the essential conditions for the implementation of these rights, inter alia, to define working and rest time by taking into consideration the nature and conditions of work, the maximum duration of the working time of the employees whose working hours are fixed, and to regulate the duration of annual paid leave.

The provision "Everyone ... shall have the right to have proper, safe, and healthy conditions at work" of Paragraph 1 of Article 48 of the Constitution, if interpreted in the context of Paragraph 2 of Article 49 and Paragraph 1 of Article 53 thereof, implies the discretion of the legislature to establish or to assign the Government or another law-making subject to establish for employees the guarantees of work and rest, inter alia, the duration of working and rest time; taking account of the particularities of the working environment where the said particularities may be varied and depend on the nature of activity, a differentiated duration of working and rest time of employees must be established. ... the legal regulation on working and rest time may be amended in view of changes in the working environment and conditions.

2.4.1.2.4. The right to receive fair pay for work

The powers of the legislature to amend the legal regulation of remuneration upon the emergence of a particularly difficult economic and financial situation in the state

The Constitutional Court's decision of 20 April 2010

The right to receive fair pay for work is a constitutional human right (Paragraph 1 of Article 48 of the Constitution). This constitutional right is a precondition for implementing numerous other constitutional rights, inter alia, this right is one of the most important preconditions for implementing the right of ownership, which is consolidated in Article 23 Constitution (rulings of 13 December 2004, 20 March 2007, and 11 December 2009).

It needs to be noted that the right to receive fair pay for work, which is enshrined, inter alia, in Paragraph 1 of Article 48 of the Constitution, is inseparable from the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law, which also includes the principle of the protection of legitimate expectations. The constitutional principle of the protection of legitimate expectations means that, in cases where certain remuneration for work has been established for a person by legal acts, it must be paid for the established time. ... it also should be noted that the constitutional principle of the protection of legitimate expectations does not mean that the remuneration for work paid to state servants from the funds of the state budget or a municipal budget may not be reduced at all; such reduction of remuneration of state servants is possible only in exceptional cases and only if it necessary in order to protect other values consolidated in the Constitution; however, even in such exceptional cases, remuneration for work must not be reduced in violation of the balance consolidated in the Constitution between the interests of a person and those of society; it is not allowed to reduce the remuneration for work of only separate categories of employees who are remunerated for their work from the funds of the state budget or a municipal budget; the reduction of remuneration for work must be in conformity with the constitutional principle of proportionality (rulings of 18 December 2001, 13 December 2004, 20 March 2007, and 11 December 2009).

A particularly difficult economic and financial situation in the state is one of exceptional cases where it is allowed to reduce the remuneration for work of officials of institutions that are financed from the funds of state and municipal budgets (and of other employees who are paid for their work from the funds of state and municipal budgets), as well as that of state servants.

The Constitutional Court has noted more than once that, when, due to a particularly difficult economic and financial situation in the state, the legislature adopts the decision to reduce the remuneration for work of officials and other state servants (employees) of institutions that are funded from state or municipal budgets, the legislature must ascertain that the economic and financial situation of the state is so difficult that it calls for a necessity to reduce the remuneration for work of the said officials and state servants (employees) (decision of 15 January 2009 and the ruling of 11 December 2009); such reduction of remuneration for work must be temporary and based on the circumstances of a particularly difficult economic and financial situation in the state as, for instance, where the collection of state budget revenue is disordered to the extent that, due to this, the state is unable to perform the obligations undertaken by it, and such a situation in the state is not short-term (decision of 15 January 2009 and the ruling of 11 December 2009). Under such circumstances, the legislature may change the legal regulation governing the remuneration of various persons and may consolidate such a legal regulation on remuneration that would be less favourable to these persons if this is necessary in order to ensure the vital interests of society and the state and to protect other constitutional values (rulings of 28 March 2006, 22 October 2007, and 11 December 2009 and the decision of 15 January 2009); however, also in such cases, the legislature must keep the balance between the rights and legitimate interests of persons for whom the less favourable legal regulation is established, on the one hand, and the interests of society and the state, on the other hand, i.e. the legislature must pay regard to the requirements of the principle of proportionality (rulings of 28 March 2006, 22 October 2007, and 11 December 2009 and the decision of 15 January 2009).

The aforesaid provision of the official constitutional doctrine – the reduction of remuneration for work must be temporary – implies that, in cases where the economic and financial situation of the state deteriorates considerably and the legislature decides to amend the legal regulation governing remuneration for various persons and to lay down a less favourable legal regulation with respect to those persons, i.e. adopts the decision to reduce the remuneration for work of officials of institutions financed from the funds of state and municipal budgets (and other employees who are paid for their work from the funds of state and municipal budgets), as well as that of state servants, the reduced remuneration may only be paid on a temporary basis, i.e. as long as there is a certain extreme situation in the state. When a particularly difficult economic and financial situation is over, the legislature must reintroduce the application of those amounts of the remuneration of officials of institutions financed from the funds of state and municipal budgets (and other employees who are paid for their work from the funds of state or municipal budgets), as well as those amounts of the remuneration of state servants, that were established in the state prior to the emergence of the said situation.

The provision that the reduction of remuneration for work must be temporary may not be interpreted as meaning that the state, after the legislature has reduced the remuneration for work of officials of institutions financed from the funds of state and municipal budgets (and other employees who are paid for their work from the funds of state and municipal budgets), as well as that of state servants, is released from the duty to look for ways of securing the accumulation of the funds necessary to pay remuneration in the amounts that were prior to their reduction. Quite to the contrary, if, before the end of an economic crisis, the possibility arises to accumulate (receive) the funds necessary to pay remuneration in the amounts that were before the reduction of remuneration, the legislature must repeal the legal regulation under which the remuneration for work of officials of institutions financed from the funds of state and municipal budgets (and other employees who are paid for their work from the funds of state and municipal budgets), as well as that of state servants, was reduced.

[...]

... the constitutional concept of the state budget, inter alia, the constitutional institution of a budget year, implies that, in cases where there is an extreme situation in the state (economic crisis etc.) due to which the economic and financial situation in the state changes to the extent that, inter alia, it is impossible to ensure the accumulation of the funds necessary for the payment of the remuneration for work of officials and state servants of institutions funded from state and municipal budgets (remuneration for work of other employees who are remunerated for work from the funds of state and municipal budgets) ... and where, due to this, the respective legal regulation needs to be modified by reducing the remuneration ... of the said persons, it is allowed to reduce remuneration ... for no longer than one budget year. The constitutional institution of a budget year gives rise to the duty of the legislature, in the course of deliberating and approving the state budget for a subsequent year, to reassess the actual economic and financial situation in the state and to decide whether the said situation is still very difficult, inter alia, whether the collection of the revenue of the state budget is still disordered to the extent that, due to this, the state is unable to perform the obligations undertaken by it and, therefore, whether it is also necessary to establish, for the subsequent budget year, such a legal regulation whereby the reduced remuneration ... would have to be paid.

The right to receive fair pay for work (Paragraph 1 of Article 48 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 14 February 2011

In its rulings of 13 December 2004 and 11 December 2009, the Constitutional Court held that the right of every citizen to receive fair pay for work, which is consolidated in Paragraph 1 of Article 48 of the Constitution, is a precondition for implementing most other constitutional rights, inter alia, that this right is one of the most important preconditions for implementing the right of ownership, which is consolidated in Article 23 of the Constitution; under the Constitution, a person who has completed the assigned work has the right to demand that the whole work remuneration (remuneration) that is due under legal acts be paid to him/her and that it be paid in due time; thus, the work remuneration of state servants must also be paid within the time established by means of laws; this right of a person is guaranteed, protected, and defended as the right of ownership; under the Constitution, such a legal situation where a state servant who has fulfilled the assigned work is not paid, or is paid not in due time, or is paid in an amount that is lower than it is due under laws and other legal acts passed on the basis of laws is impermissible.

The Constitutional Court has also held more than once (inter alia, in the rulings of 18 December 2001, 13 December 2004, and 11 December 2009) that:

- the right to receive fair pay for work, which is guaranteed in the Constitution, is directly related to the principle of the equality of all persons before the law, the court, and other state institutions; it is prohibited to diminish remuneration for work on the basis of gender, race, nationality, citizenship, political views, attitude towards religion, or other circumstances not related to the performance characteristics of an employee if the functions of the work of the employee, the scope of his/her work, etc. have not been changed;

- the constitutional right to receive fair pay for work is also connected with one of the elements of the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law, i.e. with the constitutional principle of the protection of legitimate expectations; in cases where certain pay for work is established for a state servant (or another employee) by legal acts, it must be paid for the established time; state servants (and other employees) have the right to reasonably expect that their rights acquired under valid legal acts will be retained for the established period of time and can be implemented in reality; the legal regulation may be changed only by following the procedure established in advance and by not violating the principles and norms of the Constitution; it is necessary, inter alia, to follow the principle of lex retro non agit; no changes in the legal regulation are allowed to deny the legitimate interests and legitimate expectations of a person ...

The specific nature of the activities of state and municipal politicians that is important for the legal regulation governing their work remuneration (Paragraph 1 of Article 48 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 30 April 2013

The right to receive fair pay for work, which is guaranteed in Paragraph 1 of Article 48 of the Constitution ... must be ensured, inter alia, by regulating the activity of state politicians and municipal politicians. ...

... when establishing the legal regulation governing the activity of state politicians and municipal politicians, account must be taken, inter alia, of the specificity of this activity, which is determined by the function of politicians to represent the interests of the Nation, the state, or residents of a certain municipality (this function stems from the Constitution (inter alia, Articles 4 and 5, Paragraph 1 of Article 55, Articles 77, 97, 98, and 119 thereof)); account must also be taken of the powers of politicians to decide questions in relation to the formation and implementation (and control over implementation) of the policy in the spheres within the competence of the state, the competence of a certain sphere of its governance, or municipal competence, as well as the related requirements for accountability to the public, the publicity requirement, the duties of representation, and other duties. ...

... from the point of view of work organisation, the activity of state politicians and municipal politicians is specific and the legal regulation governing the said activity cannot be absolutely identical to the general regulation of employment relationships, inter alia, when establishing requirements for the structure of working time and the accounting of working time. Consideration must be given to the said specificity of the activity of politicians also when establishing, by means of a law, the amount of their work remuneration and the duration of their rest and paid annual leave ...

[...]

Thus, the specificity of the activity of state politicians or municipal politicians ... determine the differences in their legal situation vis-à-vis other working persons due to which they may be treated in a manner different compared with other working persons; therefore, such a legal regulation governing their pay for work may be established that would be different compared with other working persons.

The right to receive fair pay for work (Paragraph 1 of Article 48 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 1 July 2013

... the right to receive fair pay for work, which is consolidated in Paragraph 1 of Article 48 of the Constitution, is related to the constitutional principle of justice and means the right of a person to receive remuneration for work that would be fair in terms of, inter alia, the specificity of work, the complexity and amount of work functions, responsibility for carrying out those functions, the particularities of the positions held, and the professional level and qualification of a person. In this context, it needs to be emphasised that, under the Constitution, there is no tolerance for any such a legal regulation that would establish a unified or substantially the same amount of remuneration for persons who hold the positions that are different in terms of the complexity and amount of the performed functions and responsibility that falls upon them, who have different professional level and qualification, and who are remunerated from the funds of the state or municipal budget.

The powers of the legislature to amend the legal regulation of remuneration upon the emergence of a particularly difficult economic and financial situation in the state

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 1 July 2013

In providing the interpretation of the right to receive fair pay for work, which is consolidated in Paragraph 1 of Article 48 of the Constitution, and of the content of the principle of proportionality in the context of the reduction of the remuneration of state servants (and other employees who are paid for their work from the funds of the state or municipal budget), in its ruling of 11 December 2009 and its decision of 20 April 2010, the Constitutional Court held that:

- the remuneration of state servants may be reduced on a temporary basis when a particularly difficult economic and financial situation occurs in the state; however, in such a case, regard must be paid to the requirements of the principle of proportionality; the constitutional principle of proportionality is inseparable from other norms and principles of the Constitution, inter alia, the constitutional principles of the equality of rights and justice;

- the constitutional principle of proportionality means, inter alia, that, when there is a particularly difficult economic and financial situation in the state and when, due to this, there is a necessity for a temporary reduction of the remuneration of state servants in order to secure vitally important interests of society and the state and to protect other constitutional values, the legislature is under the obligation to establish a uniform and non-discriminatory scale of the reduction of the remuneration of state servants, according to which, with respect to all categories of state servants (and other employees financed from the funds of the state or municipal budget), the remuneration would be reduced by not violating the proportions of the amounts of the remuneration established with regard to different categories of state servants prior to the emergence of the particularly difficult economic and financial situation in the state;

- the constitutional institution of state service implies a certain hierarchical system of state servants and differentiated amounts of remuneration paid to them; the differences in the amounts of the remuneration of state servants depend on a number of objective particularities of state service as, for instance, the nature of the functions assigned to a state institution, the complexity and extent of the functions assigned to a state servant, responsibility for the fulfilment of those functions, the particularities of the positions held, the professional level and qualification of a state servant, etc.;

- the Constitution does not tolerate any such situations where the remuneration of state servants, when there is a difficult economic and financial situation in the state, is reduced in a disproportionate manner, inter alia, where the amount of the remuneration of a state servant of high qualification, who performs complex work, is approximated to or even made equal with the remuneration of a state servant of lower qualification, who performs less complex work, or where the remuneration of state servants of certain groups is reduced by taking into consideration not the entire work remuneration received, but only individual constituent parts of the work remuneration of state servants, etc.; in such situations, not only the constitutional principles of proportionality, the equality of rights, and justice would be denied, but also the constitutional concept of state service, as well as the provision of Paragraph 1 of Article 48 of the Constitution, which consolidates the human right to receive fair pay for work, would be deviated from;

- the constitutional principles of a state under the rule of law, justice, and proportionality mean that it is allowed to establish a limit on the amount of the remuneration of a state servant below which the remuneration established for state servants (and other employees who are paid for their work from the funds of the state or municipal budget) would not be reduced even where there is a particularly difficult economic and financial situation in the state; in establishing this limit, account must be taken of the circumstance that, under the Constitution, it is not allowed to establish any such a legal regulation whereby the remuneration of a state servant becomes reduced to such an amount that would not secure the minimum socially acceptable needs and the living conditions compatible with human dignity.

... these provisions of the official constitutional doctrine reveal the requirements, stemming from the Constitution, for the legal regulation governing the reduction of the amount of the remuneration of state servants upon the emergence of a particularly difficult economic and financial situation in the state; such requirements are also mutatis mutandis applicable to the legal regulation governing the reduction of the remuneration of judges.

[...]

... the constitutional principle of social solidarity implies that the burden of fulfilling certain obligations to a certain extent must also be distributed among members of society; however, such distribution must be constitutionally justifiable; it must not be disproportionate; it must not deny the social orientation of the state and the obligations stemming from the Constitution for the state. ... upon the emergence of a particularly difficult economic and financial situation in the state and when, due to this, the state is incapable of fulfilling, to the full extent, its obligations undertaken to members of society, inter alia, the obligations related to the payment of remuneration to state servants and judges, the constitutional principle of social solidarity implies a proportionate distribution of the incurred losses among members of society, inter alia, among state servants and judges.

In addition, it needs to be noted that the constitutional principle of social solidarity, when interpreted in the context of other constitutional principles (inter alia, those of proportionality and justice), does not imply any social egalitarianism, inter alia, it does not deny the requirement for the differentiation of the amounts of remuneration paid from the funds of the state or municipal budget, where consideration is given to the nature of the functions performed by the persons that receive it, the complexity and amount of the performed functions, the responsibility that falls upon them for performing those functions, the particularities of the position held, as well as the professional level and qualification of the persons holding those positions; it is also necessary to pay regard to this requirement in establishing the measures of reducing pay for work upon the emergence of a particularly difficult economic and financial situation.

It needs to be emphasised that the constitutional principle of social solidarity, if interpreted in the context of the constitutional principle of the equality of the rights of persons, implies the duty of the legislature to establish non-discriminatory extent of the reduction of the remuneration of persons who are paid for their work from the funds of the state or municipal budget. Such non-discriminatory extent of reduction means that remuneration is reduced in a proportionate manner for all categories of those persons regardless of where (in which state or municipal institutions) they work and which positions they hold.

The duty of the legislature to establish a mechanism for compensating for losses incurred by persons whose remuneration was reduced in a disproportionate manner

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 1 July 2013

... after the Constitutional Court declared the legal regulation that laid down the disproportionate extent of the reduction of the remuneration of persons who are paid for their work from the funds of the state budget or a municipal budget to be in conflict with the provision “Everyone ... shall have the right ... to receive fair pay for work” of Paragraph 1 of Article 48 of the Constitution, the legislature must, pursuant to the requirement stemming from Article 23 of the Constitution, establish a mechanism for compensating those persons for the losses incurred; this means, among other things, that a procedure must be established on the grounds of which the state, within a reasonable time, in a fair manner, and to the extent that the incurred losses were disproportionate, will compensate for such losses.

The powers of the legislature to postpone the establishment (implementation) of a mechanism for compensating for losses incurred as a result of the disproportionate reduction of remuneration

The Constitutional Court's decision of 16 April 2014

The implementation of the duty of the legislature to establish a mechanism for compensating persons for the incurred losses, as provided for in the provisions ... of the Constitutional Court's ruling of 1 July 2013, is related to an economic and financial situation in the state and the capabilities of the state to accumulate the funds necessary for such compensation. Thus, these provisions should be interpreted in the context of the provisions of Item 14 of Article 67 and Paragraph 1 of Article 131 of the Constitution, which consolidate the powers of the Seimas to approve a draft state budget. ...

[...]

... the legislature, while following the constitutional principle of responsible governance, may postpone the establishment and/or implementation of a mechanism for compensating for losses incurred as a result of the disproportionate reduction of remuneration for a reasonable time, which should be determined in view of an assessment of the existing economic and financial situation in the state and in the light of the consequences of a special situation and the capabilities of the state, including various obligations assumed by the state, which, inter alia, are related to financial discipline, thus, also to the imperative of balancing the revenue and expenditure of the state budget. Society must be presented with concrete criteria upon which the assessment of the economic and financial situation of the state is based, determining the postponement of the establishment or implementation of a mechanism for compensating for the incurred losses. When a special situation in the state is over, the legislature must immediately establish a compensation mechanism by passing a legal act (law) so that the legitimate expectations of persons who incurred the said losses would be ensured.

The implementation of the right to compensation for losses incurred as a result of the disproportionate reduction of remuneration

The Constitutional Court's decision of 16 April 2014

... under the Constitution, inter alia, under the constitutional imperative of social harmony, fair compensation for the losses incurred as a result of the disproportionate reduction of remuneration by persons who are paid remuneration for work from the funds of the state budget or municipal budgets may be properly ensured only on the grounds of the amounts, time limits, and other essential elements of compensation for the incurred losses where the said amounts, time limits, and other essential elements of compensation are established by the legislature.

Consequently, the legislature has the duty to establish a compensation mechanism and must assess which of the incurred losses were disproportionate. The duty of the legislature to establish, within a reasonable time, a fair mechanism for compensating for losses creates the legitimate expectation for the persons who incurred such losses that their losses will be fairly compensated without unreasonable delay.

It should be noted that, as long as the legislature, without violating the requirement of the establishment of a mechanism for compensating for the incurred losses, has not fulfilled its duty, the following is not clear:

- the extent of fair compensation of these losses so that the requirement for compensating for the disproportionately reduced amount of remuneration would be met;

- from when, in what portions, and within what timeframe in reality (upon the assessment of the economic and financial situation in the state, in view of the consequences of a special situation and the capabilities of the state, including various obligations assumed by the state, which, inter alia, are related to financial discipline, thus, also to the imperative of balancing the revenue and expenditure of the state budget) it is possible to compensate for the aforesaid losses.

Therefore, the right of persons who incurred losses due to the disproportionate reduction of remuneration to compensation for such losses must be implemented through a mechanism, established by the legislature, which would ensure fair compensation within a reasonable time.

... everyone who believes that their rights or freedoms have been violated has the right to judicial defence of their constitutional rights and freedoms that have been violated; the constitutional right of persons to apply to a court may not be artificially restricted and the implementation of this right may not be unreasonably burdened; otherwise, it would have to be stated that this constitutional right is a mere declaration.

Therefore, in cases where the legislature unreasonably delays the establishment of a mechanism for compensating for the incurred losses or where an unfair mechanism is established (from the point of view of the time limits and amounts of the payment of compensation), the persons who incurred those losses may defend their violated rights under judicial procedure.

Balancing the interests of employees, employers, and society; statutory limitation on claims for the judicial award of work remuneration and other amounts connected with employment relationships

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 8 May 2014

... the provisions of Paragraph 1 of Article 48 of the Constitution should be interpreted in the light of Paragraph 3 of Article 46 of the Constitution, which provides: "The State shall regulate economic activity so that it serves the general welfare of the Nation." In its ruling of 4 March 1999, the Constitutional Court held that, in the relationships of the labour market in the area of private business, the state is under the obligation to ensure, by means established under the law, a balance between the interests of employers and those of persons offering their labour force and skills and to reconcile such interests with those of society. It should be noted that this is also mutatis mutandis applicable to legal relationships in situations where the employer is the state itself.

In view of this fact, it should be noted that one of the legal guarantees for a balance between the interests of employees and those of employers and the reconciliation of such interests with those of society is the procedural institution of statutory limitation on claims, which, inter alia, establishes the period during which the parties of employment relationships are allowed to defend their rights by making a claim.

... the legislature has broad discretion to establish the period of statutory limitation on claims regarding the judicial award of work remuneration and other amounts connected with employment relationships. However, when implementing such discretion, the legislature must establish the period ensuring the effective protection of the constitutional right to receive fair pay for work and the stability of legal relationships safeguarding the interests of an employer against unreasonably delayed claims. This period could also be shorter than the general period of statutory limitation applicable to employment relationships.

Regulating the work remuneration relationships of persons remunerated from the funds of the state (municipal) budget (Paragraph 1 of Article 48 and Paragraph 1 of Article 128 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 29 September 2015

Revealing the content of the constitutional right of a person to receive fair pay for work, the Constitutional Court, among other things, has noted that the work remuneration of state servants, which is one of the main preconditions for implementing their other legitimate interests, must be established by means of a law and must be paid at the time that is established by means of a law (rulings of 18 December 2001 and 13 December 2004). The Constitutional Court has also held that the provisions of the official constitutional doctrine on the work pay of state servants are mutatis mutandis applicable to all persons who receive remuneration from the state (municipal) budget (ruling of 20 March 2007). In view of this fact, the following doctrinal provisions ... should be noted (formulated, inter alia, in the rulings of 13 December 2004, 20 March 2007, 11 December 2009, and 30 April 2013):

- the relationships of state service, to the extent that they are linked with human rights and freedoms, must be regulated by means of laws, while the procedural relationships of state service (as well as those related to it) may be regulated by means of substatutory acts; however, this must be done so that there would be no competition with the legal regulation established by means of laws; clear criteria on the basis of which the amount of pay for work (work remuneration) is established with regard to state servants constitute an essential element of the right to receive fair pay for work, and they must be established by means of a law;

- the legislature has broad discretion in choosing and consolidating, in laws, a certain system of payment for the work of state servants; such a system is possible where a salary of a fixed amount is established, or where the minimum or maximum salaries are established for a particular position, or where remuneration for work is regulated by applying a coefficient based on a certain established value; such remuneration for work may also be composed of several constituent parts;

- since the professional activity of state servants is remunerated from the state (municipal) budget, this budget must provide for the funds for the work remuneration of state servants.

The constitutional requirements to be complied with in regulating the relationships of work pay from the funds of the state (municipal) budget also stem from the provisions of the Constitution that consolidate the constitutional powers of the Seimas and the Government in the sphere of public finance.

[...]

In view of the fact that the funds of the state (municipal) budget allocated for the pay for work of the employees of establishments through which various functions of the state are implemented and which are financed from the said budget represent a significant part of the expenditure of the state (municipal) budget, it should be held that the financial liabilities of the state that determine the said expenditure and are linked with the work pay of these employees must be considered basic property liabilities of the state and, under Paragraph 1 of Article 128 of the Constitution, decisions concerning these liabilities must be adopted by the Seimas upon the proposal of the Government. Therefore, the most important elements (which have essential influence on the amount of the expenditure of the state (municipal) budget) of the work pay of the employees of establishments financed from the said funds must be established by means of a law.

... the Constitution, inter alia, the right of a person to receive fair pay for work, which is consolidated in Paragraph 1 of Article 48 thereof, as well as the provision (interpreted in the context of other constitutional powers of the Seimas and the Government in the sphere of public finance) of Paragraph 1 of Article 128, whereby decisions concerning basic property liabilities of the state must be adopted by the Seimas upon the proposal of the Government, gives rise to the duty of the legislature to establish, by means of a law, the essential conditions for the work pay of persons who receive remuneration from the funds of the state (municipal) budget, where such conditions determine their work remuneration (such as the system of payment, the components of work remuneration, the criteria on which work remuneration should depend, and their influence on work remuneration). While regulating the relationships of the work pay of these persons by means of its resolution, the Government may only detail and particularise the legal regulation established by means of a law, as well as establish the procedure for its implementation and regulate the procedural aspects of work pay.

The work pay of state servants

The Constitutional Court's ruling (no KT29-N15/2016) of 27 October 2016

Developing the official constitutional doctrine of the work pay of state servants, the Constitutional Court has held the following in its jurisprudence (inter alia, the rulings of 13 December 2004, 11 December 2009, and 29 September 2015):

- under the Constitution, the legislature has broad discretion in choosing and consolidating in laws a certain system of payment for the work of state servants; such a system is possible where a salary of a fixed amount is established, or where the minimum or maximum salaries are established for a particular position, or where remuneration for work is regulated by applying a coefficient based on a certain established value; such remuneration for work may also be composed of several constituent parts; in view of the particularities of remuneration for work, the legislature also has the discretion to establish limitations on one or several (or total sum of) constituent parts of remuneration for work;

- the constitutional institution of state service implies a certain hierarchical system of state servants and differentiated amounts of remuneration paid to them; differences in the amounts of the remuneration of state servants depend on a number of objective particularities of state service as, for instance, the nature of the functions assigned to a state institution, the complexity and extent of the functions assigned to a state servant, responsibility for the fulfilment of those functions, the particularities of the position held, the professional level and qualification of a state servant, etc.;

- since the professional activity of state servants is remunerated from the state (municipal) budget, this budget must provide for the funds for the work remuneration of state servants; the Constitution gives rise to the duty of the legislature to establish, by means of a law, the essential conditions of the work pay of persons who receive remuneration from the funds of the state (municipal) budget where the said conditions would determine their work remuneration (such as the system of payment, the components of work remuneration, the criteria on which work remuneration should depend, and their influence on work remuneration);

- when regulating the relationships in connection with the remuneration of state servants, the legislature must observe the right of a person to receive fair pay for work, which stems from Paragraph 1 of Article 48 of the Constitution; this constitutional right must be guaranteed for a state servant to the extent not lower than for other employees; however, due to the type of state service as a specific work activity, the implementation of the said right may have certain particularities;

– the right of every individual to receive fair pay for work, which is consolidated in Paragraph 1 of Article 48 of the Constitution, is an important precondition for implementing most of other constitutional rights, inter alia, this right is one of the most important preconditions for implementing the right to ownership, which is consolidated in Article 23 of the Constitution; under the Constitution, a person who has completed the assigned work has the right to demand that the whole work remuneration (remuneration) due under legal acts be paid to him/her; this right of a person is guaranteed, protected, and defended as the right of ownership also under Article 23 of the Constitution; according to the Constitution, such a legal situation is impermissible where a state servant who has completed the assigned work is not paid, or is paid not in due time, or is paid an amount lower than it is due under laws and other legal acts passed on the basis of laws; such a legal situation would mean that the legal preconditions are created for violating, by means of legal acts, not only Paragraph 1 Article 48 and Article 23 of the Constitution, but also the constitutional right of ownership;

– the right to receive fair pay for work, which is consolidated in Paragraph 1 of Article 48 of the Constitution, is related to the constitutional principle of justice and means the right of a person to receive the payment for work that would be fair in view of, inter alia, the nature of the work, the complexity and amount of the work functions, responsibility for carrying out those functions, the particularities of the positions held, and the professional level and qualification of a person; under the Constitution, there is no tolerance for any such a legal regulation that would establish unified or substantially the same amounts of remuneration for persons who hold the positions that are different in terms of the complexity and amount of the performed functions and the responsibility that falls upon them, who have different professional level and qualification, and who are remunerated from the funds of the state or municipal budget;

– the diversity of state service implies that state servants may do different work and perform various tasks; state servants may perform their duties during days off and on holidays, as well as at night; they may also work in harmful, highly harmful, hazardous, or other conditions that deviate from the routine work regime; under the Constitution, there may not be any such a situation where a state servant who works during days off and on holidays, as well as at night, also in harmful, highly harmful, or hazardous conditions, or who performs duties above the usual workload or completes additional assignments that exceed the established length of working time, would not be paid or his/her work would be paid unjustly.

... under the Constitution, inter alia, the provision “Everyone ... shall have the right ... to receive fair pay for work” of Paragraph 1 of Article 48 thereof, if this provision is interpreted in the context of the constitutional concept of state service, the legislature, having broad discretion in choosing and establishing, by means of laws, a certain system of payment for the work of state servants and, inter alia, in establishing the constituent parts of the remuneration of state servants, is not obliged to establish such constituent parts of remuneration as additional pay and/or extra pay; having consolidated the legal regulation under which additional pay and/or extra pay are the constituent parts of remuneration paid to state servants, the legislature has the discretion to establish the maximum amount (or maximum total amount) of these constituent parts. When exercising this discretion, the legislature must observe the requirement to ensure the right of state servants to receive fair pay for work, which stems from Paragraph 1 of Article 48 of the Constitution; it is impermissible to establish such a legal regulation under which a state servant would not be paid for certain work or pay for his/her work would not be fair. On the other hand, while establishing such a legal regulation under which, in addition to the main part of the remuneration of state servants, additional pay and/or extra pay are provided for, the legislature must also observe other constitutional imperatives, inter alia, the requirements of justice and reasonableness, which stem from the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law, and the constitutional concept of state service as a hierarchical system.

In view of these requirements, it should also be noted that the constitutional requirements of justice and reasonableness, which stem from the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law, would not be observed and the preconditions for distorting the differentiation of the remuneration of state servants (in line with the hierarchical system of state servants) would be created if such a legal regulation governing the work pay of state servants were established under which, for extra work not exceeding the established length of working time, state servants would be paid in the same way as for work exceeding the established length of working time, inter alia, if such a legal regulation were established under which a constituent part of the remuneration of state servants – pay for certain extra work (inter alia, for activity exceeding normal workload) not exceeding the established length of working time – could be equal to the main part of remuneration, let alone exceed it.

The legal regulation governing the remuneration of municipal politicians (Paragraph 1 of Article 48 and Paragraph 3 of Article 119 of the Constitution)

See 10. Local self-government and governance, 10.2. Local self-government, the ruling of 29 May 2019.

2.4.1.2.5. The right to social security in the event of unemployment

The right to social security in the event of unemployment (Paragraph 1 of Article 48 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 24 December 2008

Paragraph 1 of Article 48 of the Constitution, inter alia, consolidates the right of every individual to social security in the event of unemployment. If, due to certain reasons, a person loses his/her employment and cannot take care of his/her welfare, the duty arises for the state to establish such a legal regulation under which social assistance would be ensured for such a person in the event of unemployment; the legislature may choose and consolidate, in laws, a model for the provision of the said assistance, inter alia, various forms thereof; however, the legislature must not establish any such a legal regulation that would create the preconditions for the emergence of such a situation where persons who, due to certain reasons, have lost their employment would not receive adequate social assistance. In this context, it needs to be noted that the duty also arises for the legislature to regulate ... social assistance relationships in such a way that preconditions would be created for each member of society to take care of his/her own welfare by himself/herself and not to rely solely on state social security.

The right to social security in the event of unemployment (Paragraph 1 of Article 48 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 7 February 2013

... the constitutional principle of social solidarity also implies that the legislature, when taking into account, inter alia, the mission of social assistance in the event of unemployment and the financial capacities of the state and society, may establish such a legal regulation whereby persons who receive different social welfare according to laws, where the said social welfare is rendered by the state in a financial form (inter alia, a disability pension) and where such social welfare is capable of ensuring the conditions of living in line with human dignity, would be provided with social security not in the form of financial assistance, but in a different form in the event of unemployment.

2.4.1.2.6. The right to rest and leisure, as well as to annual paid leave

The specific nature of the activities of state and municipal politicians that is important for the legal regulation governing the organisation of their work, rest, and annual paid leave (Article 49 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 30 April 2013

The ... right of each working person to rest, which is guaranteed in Paragraph 1 of Article 49 [of the Constitution], must be ensured, inter alia, by regulating the activity of state politicians and municipal politicians. Paragraph 2 of Article 49 of the Constitution prescribes that the length of working time is established by law. This constitutional provision does not mean that it is required to establish such a legal regulation of work organisation that would be the same for all categories of working persons, inter alia, for state servants, state politicians, and municipal politicians.

It should also be noted that, when establishing the legal regulation governing the activity of state politicians and municipal politicians, account must be taken, inter alia, of the specificity of this activity, which is determined by the function of politicians to represent the interests of the Nation, the state, or residents of a certain municipality (this function stems from the Constitution (inter alia, Articles 4 and 5, Paragraph 1 of Article 55, Articles 77, 97, 98, and 119 thereof)); account must also be taken of the powers of politicians to decide questions in relation to the formation and implementation (and control over implementation) of the policy in the spheres within the competence of the state, the competence of a certain sphere of its governance, or municipal competence, as well as the related requirements for accountability to the public, the publicity requirement, the duties of representation, and other duties. When taking account of this specificity, laws or other legal acts must establish certain requirements for the organisation of the activity of state politicians and municipal politicians, leaving for the politicians themselves to decide (either collegially or personally) other questions of the organisation of this activity. The nature of the functions and duties of state politicians and municipal politicians determine, inter alia, the fact that it is impossible to record all the time designated for performing these functions and duties – the time necessary to perform the functions and duties of politicians may not be identified with the prescribed working time of a certain establishment or a certain category of workers, as well as the fact that it is also, more often than not, necessary to perform their functions also on the established days off or public holidays.

Thus, from the point of view of work organisation, the activity of state politicians and municipal politicians is specific and the legal regulation governing the said activity cannot be absolutely identical to the general regulation of employment relationships, inter alia, when establishing requirements for the structure of working time and the accounting of working time. Consideration must also be given to the said specificity of the activity of politicians when establishing, by means of a law ... the duration of their rest and paid annual leave.

The right to leisure (Paragraph 1 of Article 49 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 30 April 2013

Paragraph 1 of Article 49 of the Constitution prescribes: "Every working person shall have the right to rest and leisure, as well as to annual paid leave."

Thus, Paragraph 1 of Article 49 of the Constitution consolidates, inter alia, the constitutional right to leisure, which is guaranteed to every working person.

This constitutional right must be interpreted, inter alia, as meaning the right of a working person, in cases and under the procedure established by the legislature, to receive time free from work when this person, due to the circumstances deemed important by the legislature, may not perform the functions of his/her work. The legislature must establish such a legal regulation that would ensure the possibility for working persons to make use of this right in reality.

The right to annual paid leave (Paragraph 1 of Article 49 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 30 April 2013

When interpreting Paragraph 1 of Article 49 of the Constitution, the Constitutional Court has ... noted that the right of a working person to annual paid leave is his/her constitutional right. Thus, the essential conditions of the implementation of this right must be established by means of a law (ruling of 7 December 2007).

... when establishing, in a law, the essential conditions for the implementation of the constitutional right to annual paid leave, which stems from Paragraph 1 of Article 49 of the Constitution, the legislature must consolidate such a legal regulation that would ensure the possibility for working persons to make use of such their constitutional right in reality.

The duty of the legislature to lay down the essential conditions for the implementation of the right to rest and leisure, as well as to annual paid leave (Article 49 of the Constitution) (on working time and leisure time, also see 2.4.1.2.3. The right to have proper, safe, and healthy conditions at work)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 9 May 2013

The provision "Everyone ... shall have the right to have proper, safe, and healthy conditions at work" of Paragraph 1 of Article 48 of the Constitution, Article 49 thereof, and the provision "The State shall take care of the health of people" of Paragraph 1 of Article 53 thereof give rise to the duty of the state to establish a legal regulation that would create the legal preconditions for ensuring the right of an individual to have proper, safe, and healthy conditions at work, the right to rest and leisure, as well as to annual paid leave. ... the said provisions of the Constitution imply the duty of the legislature to regulate, by means of a law, the essential conditions for the implementation of these rights, inter alia, to define working and rest time by taking into consideration the nature and conditions of work, the maximum duration of the working time of employees whose working hours are fixed, and to regulate the duration of annual paid leave.

2.4.1.2.7. Trade unions

The constitutional status of trade unions (Article 50 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 30 September 2003

Article 50 of the Constitution formulates the basic principles of the status and activities of trade unions and indicates their functions.

When interpreting these provisions of the Constitution, the Constitutional Court held in its ruling of 14 January 1999 that trade unions are voluntary and independent organisations of employees. The employees join trade unions in order to defend their professional, economic, and social rights in an organised way. A person who joins a trade union of his/her own free will chooses this organisation as one of the forms of the protection of his/her aforesaid rights and interests. Article 50 of the Constitution is linked with Article 35 of the Constitution, which guarantees the right of citizens to freely form societies, political parties, and associations provided that the aims and activities thereof are not contrary to the Constitution and laws.

The status and principles of the activities of trade unions, as established by the Constitution, together with the striving for an open, just, and harmonious civil society and a state under the rule of law, as well as the democratic nature of the State of Lithuania, which is established in the Constitution, imply the principle of the autonomy of trade unions with respect to the state and its institutions.

In this context, it should be noted that the provision of Paragraph 1 of Article 50 of the Constitution, whereby trade unions are established freely and function independently, means, inter alia, that trade unions are independent of state authority and other state institutions, that they are independent of employers and their organisations, as well as of other organisations. Only freely united trade unions that are functioning independently of state authority and other state institutions, employers and their organisations, as well as independently of other organisations, can protect the professional, economic, and social rights and interests of employees. Under the Constitution, it is not allowed to lay down any such a legal regulation that would restrict or deny the constitutional right of trade unions to be established freely and to function independently while defending the professional, economic, and social rights and interests of employees.

State support for trade unions (Article 50 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 30 September 2003

The provision of Paragraph 1 of Article 50 of the Constitution, whereby trade unions are established freely and function independently, draws the limits of interaction between the state and trade unions. At the same time, the constitutional limits of support rendered by the state to trade unions are drawn. Without violating the provisions of the Constitution and taking account of the fact that, under the Constitution (Paragraph 2 of Article 50), all trade unions have equal rights, at the initial stage of the establishment and activities of free trade unions, the state could render material (including financial) support for trade unions that were in the process of establishment or to newly established trade unions (their alliances) in Lithuania so that they could start their activities and perform independently the trade union functions consolidated in the Constitution. Such state support cannot be permanent. At this initial stage, state support rendered to trade unions should be linked not with the performance of functions by trade unions that, according to the Constitution, act independently, but with the establishment and beginning of the activities of trade unions as one of the elements of civil society. Under the Constitution, it is not allowed to lay down any such a legal regulation under which the state would render the said support for trade unions or would render it in such ways that would create the legal preconditions for violating the independence of the activities of trade unions, for making them dependent on the state and, thus, for restricting the possibilities of trade unions to defend the professional, economic, and social rights and interests of employees. Also, it is not permitted to establish any such a legal regulation whereby the state would render such support for trade unions or would render it in such ways that would violate the equality of the rights of trade unions.

2.4.2. Social rights

The principle of social solidarity

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 2 September 2009

The Constitutional Court has held on more than one occasion that, in civil society, the principle of solidarity does not deny personal responsibility for one's own fate; therefore, the legal regulation of social security should be such that would create the preconditions and incentives for all members of society to take care of their own welfare by themselves rather than to rely solely on social security guaranteed by the state. In its ruling of 5 March 2004, the Constitutional Court noted that social assistance must not create any preconditions for a person not to seek higher income and not to search, by one's own efforts, the possibilities of ensuring for oneself and one's own family the living conditions that are in line with human dignity; social assistance must not become a privilege.

The principles of social solidarity and the social orientation of the state

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 26 May 2015

The Constitutional Court has held that, under the Constitution, the State of Lithuania is socially oriented. The social orientation of the state is reflected in various provisions of the Constitution, which consolidate human economic, social, and cultural rights, as well as civil and political rights, the relationships between society and the state, the foundations of social assistance and social security, the principles of the organisation and regulation of the national economy, the foundations of the organisation and activity of state institutions, etc. (inter alia, the rulings of 5 March 2004 and 6 February 2012).

A socially oriented state is under the constitutional obligation to assume (and it must assume) the burden of fulfilling certain obligations. The social solidarity principle, consolidated in the Constitution, implies that the burden of the fulfilment of certain obligations should also be distributed to a certain extent among members of society; however, such distribution should be constitutionally justifiable; it must not be disproportionate; and it must not deny the social orientation of the state and the obligations to the state that arise from the Constitution (inter alia, the rulings of 7 June 2007 and 1 July 2013).

[...]

... the jurisprudence of the Constitutional Court defends the legal position that the social orientation of the state implies the discretion of the legislature to establish exceptions to the general legal regulation based on social solidarity and to apply them to certain groups of socially most sensitive persons who need specific social assistance (rulings of 6 February 2012 and 16 May 2013).

The principles of social solidarity and the social orientation of the state

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 24 January 2018

The Constitutional Court has held on more than one occasion that, under the Constitution, the State of Lithuania is socially oriented; thus, it is under the constitutional obligation to assume (and it must assume) the burden of fulfilling certain obligations; the constitutional principle of social solidarity also implies the possibility of distributing this burden to a certain extent among members of society; however, this distribution must be constitutionally justified; it may not be disproportionate; it may not deny the social orientation of the state and the obligations of the state that stem from the Constitution.

... seeking to ensure the financial stability of the state social insurance system and following the constitutional principle of social solidarity, as well as distributing, to a certain extent, the burden of the implementation of the obligations stemming for the state from Article 52 of the Constitution among members of society, the legislature has the duty to establish such a relation between the contribution made (state social insurance contributions paid) by persons participating in this system and the amount of financial support (benefits) granted to persons that would ensure a balance between the interests of persons who finance the state social insurance system by paying their contributions and persons who receive benefit from this system.

2.4.2.1. The right to social security

The right to social security; old-age pensions (Article 52 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 25 November 2002

Article 52 of the Constitution prescribes: “The State shall guarantee its citizens the right to receive old-age and disability pensions, as well as social assistance in the event of unemployment, sickness, widowhood, the loss of the breadwinner, and in other cases provided for by law.”

Under the Constitution, every citizen has the right to social security. Social security is consolidated in the Constitution in various aspects. The pensions and social assistance indicated in Article 52 thereof are among the forms of social security.

The phrase “the state shall guarantee” used in Article 52 of the Constitution means that the (old-age and disability) pensions and types of social assistance (in the event of unemployment, sickness, widowhood, the loss of the breadwinner) enumerated in the same article must be provided for by means of a law and that other pensions and types of social assistance (not specified in Article 52 of the Constitution) may also be provided for by means of a law.

The provisions of Article 52 of the Constitution, while guaranteeing the right to social assistance to citizens, obligate the state to establish sufficient measures of the implementation of the right in question and its legal defence. Thus, not only the types of pensions and social assistance indicated in this article of the Constitution must be established by means of a law, but also the proper implementation and legal protection of the human right to receive a pension or social assistance must be ensured. The provisions of Article 52 of the Constitution imply the duty of the legislature to establish such a legal regulation that would ensure the accumulation of funds necessary for pensions and social assistance and that would ensure the payment of these pensions and the rendering of social assistance.

An old-age pension is one of the types of pensions that are expressis verbis pointed out in Article 52 of the Constitution. ... under Article 52 of the Constitution, a law must establish the age upon reaching which a person has the right to receive an old-age pension; a law must also establish the grounds and conditions for the granting and payment of this pension (as well as the amounts thereof). The legislature, when establishing this by means of a law, must pay regard to the norms and principles of the Constitution.

Attention should be paid to the fact that the collecting of the funds necessary to pay old-age pensions and the granting of these pensions are, as a rule, based on social insurance. The payment of social insurance contributions implies the right of a person to receive an old-age pension of a particular amount and this amount must depend on the paid contributions of social insurance. ...

Under the Constitution, the state, as the organisation of all society, has the obligation to take care of its members in the event of old age, disablement, unemployment, sickness, widowhood, the loss of the breadwinner, and in other cases provided for by the Constitution and laws.

In its ruling of 12 March 1997, the Constitutional Court held that the measures of social provision express the idea of public solidarity and that they help persons to protect themselves from possible social risks.

The principle of solidarity in civil society does not deny personal responsibility for one's own fate; therefore, the legal regulation of social security should be such that would create the preconditions and incentives for every member of society to take care of one's own welfare, but not to rely solely on social security guaranteed by the state.

... it is impossible to interpret the solidarity principle as establishing the discretion of the legislature to regulate the granting and payment of old-age pensions in a manner that, in the system of old-age pensions based on social insurance, the amounts of old-age pensions would not or would insignificantly depend on the amounts of contributions that have been paid when creating the material preconditions for paying such pensions. The amounts of social insurance contributions are the basis for the differentiation of the amounts of old-age pensions.

The possibility of freely choosing an occupation or business must not be restricted on the grounds that an old-age pension has been granted and paid to a person (Paragraph 1 of Article 48 and Article 52 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 25 November 2002

In its ruling of 30 June 2000, the Constitutional Court held that, under the Constitution, it is not allowed to establish any such a legal regulation by which a person, in implementing a certain constitutional right, would lose the possibility of implementing another constitutional right.

... under the Constitution, it is not permitted to establish a legal regulation that would impose such a restriction on a person who has been granted and paid an old-age pension that is designed to limit the possibility of freely choosing an occupation or business specifically because of the fact that such a person has been granted and paid an old-age pension, although he/she meets the conditions, provided for under the law, that make it possible for him/her to have a certain occupation or conduct a certain business. Such a legal regulation under which a person may not freely choose an occupation or business due to the fact that, upon the implementation of this right, he/she would not be paid the granted old-age pension or part thereof that was paid until then must also be considered a restriction on the possibility of freely choosing an occupation or business.

The right to a pension from the aspect of the protection of legitimate expectations

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 4 July 2003

... after the types of pensions, the persons entitled to a pension, the grounds and conditions for granting and paying pensions, and their amounts have been established by means of laws, the state is under the duty to follow the constitutional principles of legal certainty and the protection of legitimate expectations in the area of the relationships connected with pension provision. Therefore, the amendments to the established legal regulation that result in the worsening of pension provision are allowed only when an extreme situation occurs in the state and when this is necessary for the protection of other constitutional values. This may be done only by means of a law and without violating the Constitution (ruling of 23 April 2002).

A person who meets the conditions established in a law acquires the right to a pension established by the law. This person may reasonably expect that this right will be protected and defended by the state. When a pension established by means of a law that is not in conflict with the Constitution is granted and paid, this right and legitimate expectation acquired by a person must also be related to the protection of the rights of ownership of this person.

At the same time, it needs to be noted that the constitutional protection of acquired rights and legitimate expectations does not mean that the system of pension provision established by means of a law may not be reorganised. While reorganising this system, the Constitution must be observed in every case. The system of pensions may be reorganised only by means of a law, only by guaranteeing the old-age and disability pensions provided for by the Constitution, as well as by observing the undertaken obligations by the state, which are not in conflict with Constitution, to pay particular benefits to persons who meet the requirements established by means of a law. If, while reorganising the system of pensions, the pensions that are established by means of a law and are not directly specified in Article 52 of the Constitution were eliminated, or the legal regulation of these pensions were amended in substance, the legislature would be obligated to establish a fair mechanism for compensating, for the incurred losses, the persons who were granted and paid such pensions.

It should also be noted that the legislature, while reorganising the system of pensions in a manner that the grounds for pension provision, persons to whom a pension is granted and paid, the conditions for the granting and payment of pensions, and the amounts of pension provision are changed, must provide for a sufficient transitional time period during which the persons who have a particular job or perform particular service that entitles them to a particular pension under the previous regulation would be able to prepare for such changes.

Old-age pensions (Article 52 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 3 December 2003

In its ruling of 25 November 2002, the Constitutional Court held that it is impossible to interpret the solidarity principle as establishing the discretion of the legislature to regulate the granting and payment of old-age pensions in a manner that, in the system of old-age pensions based on social insurance, the amounts of old-age pensions would not or would insignificantly depend on the amounts of contributions that have been paid when creating the material preconditions for paying such pensions.

The creation of the material preconditions for the payment of old-age pensions is determined both by the time period during which a person pays state social insurance contributions himself/herself or someone pays contributions for him/her and by the total amount of state social pension insurance contributions paid to the state social insurance budget. Thus, in cases where the system of old-age pensions is based on social insurance, the total contribution of a person (total amount of the obligatory state social pension insurance contributions of a person) while creating the material preconditions for the payment of a state social insurance pension could also be one of the criteria that should be taken into account when establishing the conditions for receiving a state social insurance pension.

A legal regulation that would establish the retirement age entitling to a state social insurance old-age pension where the said retirement age would enable persons to retire too early or too late or a legal regulation that would established such grounds for granting this pension that would distort the meaning of a personal contribution when creating the material preconditions for the payment of this pension or that would establish such conditions of the granting and payment of this pension that would deny the participation of a person in the creation of the material preconditions for the payment of this pension would be in conflict with the Constitution.

Paying regard to the norms and principles of the Constitution, the legislature has the right to establish the minimum state social pension insurance period, entitling to a state social insurance pension, as one of the conditions for receiving such a pension. It should also be noted that, when establishing the conditions that must be met by a person who has reached the age entitling to an old-age pension so that the said person could receive an old-age pension, the legislature should take account of all important circumstances, as well as of the personal contribution when forming the preconditions of the payment of an old-age pension, which is established in Article 52 of the Constitution. Otherwise, the legal regulation of old-age pensions would be insufficient and one-sided. It is also important that a person, having reached the age entitling to an old-age pension, would not be left without social assistance altogether.

The right to a pension from the aspect of the protection of property (Articles 23 and 52 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 3 December 2003

When interpreting the provisions of Article 23 of the Constitution, the Constitutional Court has held on more than one occasion that the inviolability of property and the protection of the rights of ownership mean, inter alia, that an owner, as the holder of subjective rights to property, has the right to demand that other persons not violate his/her rights and that the state has the duty to ensure the defence and protection of the rights of ownership.

... the Constitution is an integral act ... its provisions are interrelated and constitute a harmonious system. While revealing the content of the constitutional institution of the protection of the rights of ownership, account must be taken not only of Article 23 of the Constitution, but also other provisions of the Constitution that reveal different aspects of the constitutional concept of the said right, as well as of Article 52 of the Constitution. In its ruling of 4 July 2003, the Constitutional Court held that the claims of a person for the payment of the pension granted to him/her are defended not only under Article 52 of the Constitution, but also under Article 23 of the Constitution. It should be noted that, in such a case, the right to demand that pension provision benefits that are established in the Constitution or in laws not in conflict with the Constitution be paid arises also out of Article 52 of the Constitution, while, under Article 23 of the Constitution, the property aspects of this right are defended.

... the state has the duty to fulfil those obligations of property nature that it has undertaken establishing, by means of a law, such a legal regulation according to which a person who meets the conditions provided for by means of a law acquires the right to a certain pension. Thus, a person who meets the conditions established by means of a law in order to receive an old-age pension and who has been granted and paid this pension has the right to the monetary benefit of a particular amount, i.e. the right to property. Under Article 23 of the Constitution, this right must be protected and defended.

Thus, under Article 23 of the Constitution, the persons who have been granted and paid a pension established by the Constitution or the law have the right to demand that they should be continued to be paid the pension benefits in the amounts granted and paid previously. The law that establishes the grounds for such pension provision, the persons who are granted and paid pensions, the conditions for the granting and payment of pensions, as well as the amounts of pensions, must be in conformity with the norms and principles of the Constitution.

... pensions that have been granted and paid under the Constitution may be reduced only in the event of an extreme situation in the state (economic crisis, a natural disaster, etc.), when there is an objective lack of funds for the fulfilment of state functions and for satisfying public interests, including the payment of pensions. In such a case, the granted and paid pensions may be reduced to the extent that is necessary to ensure the vitally important interests of society and to protect other constitutional values. At the same time, it should be noted that the reduced pensions may only be paid on a temporary basis. In addition, when implementing the reform of the pensionary system, some pensions may be eliminated and the amounts of others may be reduced. In such a case, the legislature must establish a fair mechanism for compensating persons for the losses that have been incurred due to such an amendment of the said regulation. Otherwise, the legal regulation according to which the payment of a granted and paid pension is terminated or reduced should be judged to be in violation of Paragraph 2 of Article 23 of the Constitution, which provides that the rights of ownership are protected by law.

Pensions for service to the State of Lithuania

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 13 December 2004

When establishing such a legal regulation according to which persons who meet the conditions provided for by means of a law (retirement from service, the length of service, age, etc.) acquire the right to a certain pension for service established by means of a law, the state at the same time assumes the obligation to grant and pay such a pension. A person who meets the conditions established by means of a law has the right to demand that the state fulfil the obligation undertaken under the law and pay the benefits of the established amount (ruling of 4 July 2003). ...

The particularities of the constitutional institution of state service determine, inter alia, the fact that the legislature has the constitutional powers to establish, by means of a law, the pensions and/or types of social assistance granted solely to state servants (or separate groups of state servants, whose distinction is objectively justified). A law may also establish pensions for service to the State of Lithuania. When establishing such a pension for service to the State of Lithuania, the legislature is bound by the norms and principles of the Constitution (ruling of 4 July 2003) and, inter alia, by the constitutional imperative of social harmony, the principles of justice, reasonableness, and proportionality.

... in its ruling of 4 July 2003, the Constitutional Court held that pensions for certain service to the State of Lithuania may be established by means of a law; thus, state pensions of officials and servicemen may also be established by means of a law. By their nature and character, since they are granted to persons for their service to the State of Lithuania and are paid from the state budget, such pensions differ from state social insurance pensions (thus, also from old-age pensions). When establishing such a pension for service, the legislature is bound, inter alia, by the constitutional striving for an open, just, and harmonious civil society and a state under the rule of law.

If, by paying regard to the Constitution, a law provides for a pension other than that directly specified in Article 52 of the Constitution, such a pension must be guaranteed to the specified persons on the grounds and in the amounts established in the law (ruling of 10 February 2000).

When establishing the pension of officials and servicemen for service, the legislature must not establish any such a legal regulation according to which a person would be able to retire unreasonably early, or an unreasonably short length of service or work would be required in order to receive such a pension, or the amount of the remuneration of an official or serviceman would not be taken into consideration when determining the amount of a granted pension, or the principles of justice, reasonableness, and proportionality would be violated in some other way. If, in regulating pension provision for officials and servicemen, the legislature paid no regard, inter alia, to the imperatives of an open, just, and harmonious civil society and a state under the rule of law, which are consolidated in the Constitution, and, in particular, if the legislature took no account of the specificity of service performed by officials and servicemen, the nature of specific duties, or other significant circumstances, the granting and payment of such a pension would become a privilege; thus, such pension provision could not be guaranteed under the Constitution (ruling of 4 July 2003).

The powers of the legislature to modify the legal regulation of pensions upon the emergence of a particularly difficult economic and financial situation in the state

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 13 December 2004

... such an extreme situation in the state (economic crisis, a natural disaster, etc.) can occur where there is an objective lack of funds for the payment of pensions. In such exceptional cases, the legal regulation of pensionary relationships may be modified also by reducing pensions to the extent that is necessary to ensure vitally important interests of society and protect other constitutional values. The reduced pensions may be paid only on a temporary basis, i.e. only as long as there is an extreme situation in the state (rulings of 23 April 2002, 25 November 2002, and 4 July 2003). Still, even in such exceptional cases, pensions must not be reduced in violation of the balance between the interests of a person and society, which is consolidated in the Constitution; such reduction of pensions must be in line with the constitutional principle of proportionality (ruling of 4 July 2003).

The discretion of the legislature to choose a system of pensions

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 26 September 2007

The content of the legal regulation of social security, social provision, and social assistance is determined by various factors, inter alia, the resources and the material and financial possibilities of the state and society. The legislature, when paying regard to the Constitution, has broad discretion in this area, inter alia, to choose a system of pensions. The fact that, in Lithuania, such a system of pensions was chosen in which funds collected from compulsory state social insurance contributions is the main source of financing the system of pensions may not be questioned with regard to its compliance with the Constitution.

State pensions

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 22 October 2007

... under the Constitution, a law may also establish pensions other than those directly named in the Constitution; for instance, the particularities of the constitutional institution of state service determine, inter alia, the fact that the legislature has the constitutional powers to establish, by means of a law, the pensions and/or types of social assistance granted exclusively to state servants or separate groups of state servants, whose distinction is objectively justified; a law may also establish pensions for service to the State of Lithuania.

[...]

In some cases, state pensions (which, as mentioned before, are not directly named in the Constitution) are granted for certain service and, in other cases, they are granted in recognition of merit to the State of Lithuania, or to victims as compensation. In establishing persons who are granted and paid state pensions, the grounds and conditions for granting and paying state pensions, as well as the amounts of such pensions, the legislature is obliged to pay regard to the constitutional imperative of social harmony and the principles of justice, reasonableness, and proportionality; the granting and payment of a state pension must not become a privilege. If the legislature, when establishing, by means of a law, the grounds for the aforesaid pension provision, persons who are granted and paid the aforesaid pensions, the conditions for granting and paying these pensions, as well as their amounts, did not pay regard to the Constitution (e.g. if the legislature granted state pensions to persons who may not be granted such pensions, or set unreasonably large or small amounts of these pensions, or established unreasonable conditions for granting and paying these pensions), then such pension provision could not be defended under the Constitution. For example, when establishing the state pension of officials and servicemen for service, it is not allowed to establish any such a legal regulation according to which a person would be able to retire unreasonably early, or an unreasonably short length of service or work would be required in order to receive such a pension, or the amount of the remuneration of an official or serviceman would not be taken into consideration when determining the amount of a granted pension, or the principles of justice, reasonableness, and proportionality would be violated in some other way; if no regard is paid to the particularities of the service of officials and servicemen, the particular type of duties, or other important circumstances, the granting and payment of such a pension would become a privilege; therefore, such pension provision could not be guaranteed under the Constitution (rulings of 4 July 2003 and 13 December 2004). In addition, state pensions differ as to their nature and character from state social insurance pensions and are paid from the state budget; thus, taking account of all significant circumstances and having regard to the Constitution, the legislature may, by means of a law, establish the maximum amount of such pensions and consolidate various ways for determining this amount. The legislature, taking account of the Constitution, may also establish certain cases where a state pension is not granted to a person (under the conditions provided for in the law); having regard to the Constitution, the legislature may also establish, by means of a law, the cases where a granted state pension is no longer paid. On the other hand, in the case of the state pensions that are granted for certain service, or in recognition of merit to the State of Lithuania, or to victims as compensation, the provision regarding the obligation undertaken by the state to grant and pay the respective pension to a person who meets the conditions established by means of a law and regarding the right of the said person to demand that the state fulfil such an obligation undertaken under the law is also effective. However, the Constitution does not prevent reorganising the system of pension provision, inter alia, in a manner that would eliminate the pensions that are established by means of laws, but are not directly specified in Article 52 of the Constitution; in such a case, the legislature would be obligated to establish a fair mechanism for compensating, for the incurred losses, the persons who were granted and paid such pensions; the legislature would also have to provide for a sufficient transitional time period during which the persons who have a particular job or perform particular service that entitles them to a particular pension (i.e. a state pension) under the previous regulation would be able to prepare for such changes.

The protection of acquired rights in the course of reorganising the system of social guarantees

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 22 November 2007

... the Constitution protects and defends the acquired rights; therefore, the modification of the social policy, the reorganisation of the system of social guarantees or of individual social guarantees of the state must be constitutionally justifiable; if, in the course of the reorganisation of the system of social guarantees or the structure of individual social guarantees, the extent of social guarantees is reduced, let alone certain social guarantees disappear, a mechanism of fair compensation for the incurred losses should be established for individuals to whom those social guarantees were reasonably established and, if those guarantees have to compensate the losses that an individual may incur due to his/her own activities (inter alia, due to his/her service to the state), a sufficient time period should also be envisaged so that it would enable those persons (who have a particular job or perform particular service that entitles them to particular social guarantees under the previous regulation) to prepare for the respective changes. If the necessity to establish a particular social guarantee arises from the Constitution, such a social guarantee may not generally be subject to cancellation prior to the consolidation of the other one instead.

It should also be noted that the social orientation of the state consolidated in the Constitution generally obligates the state to respect the imperative of the reality of the guarantees of a social (material) nature; thus, it obligates the state to accordingly revise (increase the amounts of) social (material) guarantees once established (and applied) if an economic and social situation changes in such a way that those established (and applied) guarantees depreciate considerably, let alone become nominal altogether (at the same time, making a reservation regarding the proportional and provisional reduction of benefits whenever this is necessary for the protection of other constitutional values) (ruling of 22 October 2007).

The right of persons whose health was impaired as a result of improper, unsafe, or unhealthy conditions at work to social assistance (Paragraph 1 of Article 48, Article 52, and Paragraph 1 of Article 53 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 29 April 2008

Interpreting Article 52 of the Constitution together with Paragraph 1 of Article 48 thereof, whereby everyone may freely choose an occupation or business and has the right to have proper, safe, and healthy conditions at work, as well as to receive, inter alia, social security in the event of unemployment, and with Paragraph 1 of Article 53 of the Constitution, whereby the state also takes care of the health of people, and taking account of the constitutional principle of justice and the imperative of social harmony, which is enshrined in the Constitution, it needs to be held that the state is constitutionally obligated to render the respective social assistance to a person whose health was impaired as a result of improper, unsafe, or unhealthy conditions at work (including accidents at work and occupational diseases) and to ensure the provision of the respective social assistance; the legislature may choose and consolidate, in laws, a certain model of the provision of the said assistance, inter alia, various forms thereof (state, private, etc.); however, it is not permitted to establish any such a legal regulation that would create the preconditions for the emergence of a situation where a person whose health was impaired as a result of improper, unsafe, or unhealthy conditions at work (including accidents at work and occupational diseases) would not receive adequate social assistance.

When taking account of various factors, inter alia, the resources and the material and financial possibilities of the state and society, and accordingly regulating the relationships linked with the provision of social assistance to a person whose health was impaired as a result of improper, unsafe, or unhealthy conditions at work (including accidents at work and occupational diseases), the legislature has broad discretion. Certain grounds, conditions, and amounts of the granting and payment of such social assistance that are established by means of a law may be varied.

The right to a disability pension (Article 52 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 2 September 2009

... when interpreting Article 52 of the Constitution together with the provision of Paragraph 1 of Article 53 of the Constitution, according to which the state, inter alia, takes care of the health of people, with the provision of Paragraph 2 of Article 21 of the Constitution, which consolidates the protection of human dignity, as well as with Paragraph 1 of Article 48 of the Constitution, according to which everyone may freely choose an occupation or business and has the right to have proper, safe, and healthy conditions at work and to receive social security in the event of unemployment, and taking account of the constitutional principles of proportionality and the equality of the rights of persons, as well as the imperative of social harmony, which is enshrined in the Constitution, it should be held that the state has the constitutional obligation to ensure the creation of such a social protection system (inter alia, a system of social assistance and disability pensions) that a person who, due to health disorders (caused by illness, an accident, an occupational disease, innate health disorders, etc.), permanently or temporarily did not acquire or lost the possibility of earning a living from work or business income, or where such possibilities significantly diminished for the said person, would receive social assistance and/or a disability pension in the cases provided for by means of a law.

The legislature, by taking account of various factors, inter alia, the resources and the material and financial possibilities of the state and society, also has broad discretion to regulate the relationships linked with granting social assistance and/or a disability pension to a person who, due to health disorders (caused by illness, an accident, an occupational disease, innate health disorders, etc.), permanently or temporarily did not acquire or lost the possibility of earning a living from work or business income, or where such possibilities significantly diminished for the said person.

[...]

At the same time, it needs to be noted that the legislature may not establish any such a legal regulation that would create the preconditions for such a situation where a person who, due to health disorders (caused by illness, an accident, an occupational disease, innate health disorders, etc.), permanently or temporarily did not acquire or lost the possibility of earning a living from work or business income, or where such possibilities significantly diminished for the said person, would not receive the respective social assistance and/or a disability pension.

[...]

... it is also not allowed to establish any such a legal regulation whereby the acquisition of the right to receive a disability pension or the retention of the said right, which is guaranteed under the Constitution for a person who, due to health disorders (caused by illness, an accident, an occupational disease, innate health disorders, etc.), permanently or temporarily did not acquire or lost the possibility of earning a living from work or business income, or where such possibilities significantly diminished for the said person, would be linked with constitutionally unjustified conditions, subjective decisions of any institutions or officials, or other circumstances that do not encourage persons to take care of their health.

... under Article 52 of the Constitution, the right to a disability pension is guaranteed to such persons and on such grounds that are provided for by means of laws. The regulation of social assistance relationships that is laid down under laws is one of the most important guarantees of the constitutional right to a disability pension.

A law must establish ... what should be deemed to be disability, as well as the grounds for granting and payment of [a disability] pension, its conditions and amounts (rulings of 3 December 2003 and 22 October 2007).

[...]

... in the course of regulating the relationships connected with granting a disability pension to a person, taking into account the grounds established by means of a law and various factors, first of all, the type of the health impairment (disorder) of a person, a disability pension may be granted and paid temporarily (for a certain period) or permanently. The time period of paying a disability pension that is granted to a person

(inter alia, the minimum and maximum periods, the criteria differentiating these periods) is one of the conditions of paying a disability pension; therefore, such a time period must be established by means of a law.

The legislature may differentiate the conditions for granting and paying a disability pension (including the time periods of disability and those of paying a disability pension) and their amounts on various grounds, by taking into account, inter alia, the state of health of a person, and other factors; as regards the amounts of pensions, the legislature may also take into consideration the participation of the person in insurance against particular social risks.

The constitutional requirements of legal certainty, legal security, and the protection of legitimate expectations imply that the conditions (which must be established by means of a law) for granting and paying a disability pension (including the time period (term) of paying a pension that is granted to a person) must be clear and non-discriminatory; meanwhile, the established period (term) of paying a disability pension during which the granted pension is paid must be neither unreasonably short nor changed too often. Otherwise, human dignity and human health may become undermined and the imperatives that stem from Paragraph 1 of Article 53 and Article 21 of the Constitution may be disregarded.

The powers of the legislature to modify the legal regulation of pensions upon the emergence of a particularly difficult economic and financial situation in the state

The Constitutional Court's decision of 20 April 2010

... the phrase “the state shall guarantee” used in Article 52 of the Constitution implies the duty of the legislature to establish such a legal regulation that would ensure the accumulation of the funds necessary to pay pensions and the payment of pensions. However, such an extreme situation (economic crisis etc.) in the state can occur when there is an objective lack of funds for the payment of pensions. In such exceptional cases, the legal regulation of pensionary relationships may be modified also by reducing pensions to the extent that is necessary to ensure the vitally important interests of society and protect other constitutional values. The reduced pensions may be paid only on a temporary basis, i.e. only as long as there is an extreme situation in the state (rulings of 23 April 2002, 25 November 2002, 4 July 2003, 3 December 2003, 13 December 2004, and 24 December 2008).

... the emergence of a particularly difficult economic and financial situation (due to an economic crisis) in the state does not in itself imply the right of the legislature to modify the legal regulation of pensionary relationships – to reduce the granted and paid pensions; when there is a particularly difficult economic and financial situation, the state must take all possible measures in order to overcome the economic crisis and to secure the accumulation of the funds necessary for paying pensions. In this context, it also needs to be noted that the state institutions forming and pursuing the state economic and finance policies may not first resort to such measures (inter alia, to reduce pensions and other social guarantees) for overcoming an economic and financial crisis in the course of the implementation of which the burden of overcoming the crisis is put upon persons. The measures for overcoming a difficult economic and financial situation in the state must be implemented in a complex manner; they must be coordinated, inter alia, in such a way that the balance between the interests of a person and society, which is consolidated in the Constitution, would not be disturbed. Only in an exceptional case, where it is impossible to accumulate (no success is made in accumulating) the amount of funds necessary to pay pensions after all internal and external possibilities have been used, the pensionary legal regulation may be modified by reducing pensions. It needs to be emphasised that, even in such exceptional cases, the granted and paid pensions must not be reduced in violation of the balance of the interests of a person and society, which is consolidated in the Constitution, i.e. in violation of the constitutional principle of proportionality.

[...]

It has been mentioned that the reduced pensions may be paid only on a temporary basis, i.e. as long as there is an extreme situation (inter alia, an economic crisis) in the state; however, this doctrinal provision may not be interpreted as meaning that the state, after the legislature has reduced the granted and paid pensions, is exempted from the duty to look for ways for the accumulation of the funds necessary for the payment of pensions. Quite to the contrary, if, before the end of an economic crisis, the possibility arises to accumulate (receive) the funds necessary to pay the pensions in the amounts that were before the reduction of the pensions, the legal regulation under which the pensions were reduced must be repealed.

Under the Constitution, inter alia, under the constitutional principles of a state under the rule of law and responsible governance, the state institutions forming and pursuing state economic and financial policies must also assess the fact that, due to extreme circumstances (economic crisis etc.), a particularly difficult economic and financial situation may arise in the state. Therefore, the state institutions must take all possible measures in order to predict the tendencies in the economic development of the state and to prepare for the possible emergence of such very difficult economic and financial situations.

[...]

... it needs to be held that the modification of the legal regulation by reducing old-age pensions even due to the fact that there is an extreme situation (economic crisis etc.) in the state means a limitation on the constitutional social guarantee of a person – an old-age pension. ... the modification of the legal regulation whereby old-age pensions are reduced due to the fact that, upon the emergence of an extreme situation (economic crisis etc.), the economic and financial situation changes in such a way that the accumulation of the funds necessary to pay old-age pensions is not ensured also means that such a legal regulation, to a certain extent, limits the right of property of a person to whom an old-age pension was granted and paid.

Thus, the legislature, upon the emergence of an extreme situation, when, inter alia, due to an economic crisis, it is impossible to accumulate the amount of the funds necessary to pay old-age pensions, must, while reducing old-age pensions, provide for a mechanism for compensating, for the incurred losses, the persons who were granted and paid such pensions; based on this mechanism, after the said extreme situation is over, the state would undertake the obligation to such persons to compensate them, within a reasonable time and in a fair manner, for the losses incurred due to the reduction of old-age pensions.

These provisions are also mutatis mutandis applied with regard to compensation for losses incurred due to the reduction of disability pensions.

... under the Constitution, it is also allowed to establish, by means of a law, pensions other than those expressis verbis specified in Article 52 of the Constitution. At present, such pensions include state pensions. ...

... the modification of the legal regulation whereby state pensions are reduced to a large extent due to the fact that, upon the emergence of an extreme situation (economic crisis etc.), the economic and financial situation changes in such a way that the accumulation of the funds necessary to pay state pensions is not secured is an essential amendment to the legal regulation of these pensions. Thus, the legislature, upon the emergence of an extreme situation when, inter alia, due to an economic crisis, it is impossible to accumulate the amount of the funds necessary to pay state pensions, must, while reducing state pensions to a large extent, provide for such a mechanism for compensating, for the incurred losses, the persons to whom such pensions were granted and paid whereby, after the said extreme situation is over, the state would undertake the obligation to such persons to compensate them, in a fair manner and within a reasonable time, for the losses incurred by them due to the reduction of state pensions.

... state pensions differ as to their nature and character from state social insurance old-age pensions, as well as from other state social insurance pensions; these particularities imply that, when there is a particularly difficult economic and financial situation in the state and when, due to this, it is necessary to temporarily reduce pensions in order to secure the vitally important interests of society and the state and to protect other constitutional values, the legislature may reduce these pensions to the extent that is greater than the reduction of old-age or disability pensions. ... it needs to be held that these particularities also imply that the losses incurred due to the reduction of state pensions may be compensated to the extent that is lower than compensation for the losses incurred due to the reduction of old-age or disability pensions.

The pension of judges as a social (material) guarantee of judges (Articles 52 and 109 of the Constitution)

See 9.1. Courts, 9.1.3. The independence of judges and courts and the guarantees of their independence), the ruling of 29 June 2010.

The right to social assistance in the event of the loss of the breadwinner (Article 52 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 14 December 2010

... when interpreting Article 52 of the Constitution, which provides, inter alia, that the state guarantees social assistance in the event of the loss of the breadwinner, it needs to be stated that, by taking account of the imperative of social harmony, which is consolidated in the Constitution, the state is constitutionally obligated to render the respective social assistance to persons who lost their breadwinner. Under the Constitution, when establishing, by means of a law, social assistance in the event of the loss of the breadwinner, the legislature has discretion. This discretion includes, inter alia, the discretion to establish the types of social assistance in the event of the loss of the breadwinner, the persons who are granted concrete social assistance, and the conditions for granting and paying this social assistance; the said discretion also includes the discretion to differentiate the amount of social assistance granted to persons where their status is objectively different. At the same time, it needs to be noted that this assistance must be such that would ensure the living conditions compatible with human dignity.

The legislature, taking account of the resources and the material and financial possibilities of the state and society, may choose which social assistance must be rendered to underage children (inter alia, to disabled ones) who have lost their parents. Separate types of social assistance may be varied. The legislature may, by means of a law, also establish a pension for underage children who have lost their parents, inter alia, to the disabled (ones with incapacities) (by naming it, inter alia, the pension of orphans). It needs to be noted that the provision of Paragraph 6 of Article 38 of the Constitution consolidates the duty of parents to support their children until they reach the age of majority. Thus, the establishment of a pension for underage children who have lost their parents may be regarded as certain compensation for the support that, under the provision of Paragraph 6 of Article 38 of the Constitution, had to be provided to them by their parents.

The legislature has broad discretion when implementing the social policy; however, the conditions for granting and paying the said pension, inter alia, the age limit (majority) up to which this pension may be granted, as well as the age limit up to which the granted pension may be paid, must be established by means of a law.

... the period of payment of the said pension to children with incapacities (disabled children) who have lost their parents may be also related, inter alia, to such age up to which children who have lost their parents generally seek the respective education.

The grounds for pension provision and social assistance (Article 52 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 6 February 2012

When forming the official constitutional doctrine of a socially oriented state, inter alia, revealing the imperatives that stem from the Constitution, where the said imperatives must be complied with when pensionary relationships are regulated by legal acts, the Constitutional Court has held the following (inter alia, the rulings of 22 October 2007, 24 December 2008, and 2 September 2009 and the decision of 20 April 2010):

– the provisions of Article 52 of the Constitution express the social orientation (social character) of the state, while social provision, i.e. the contribution of society to the maintenance of such its members who are incapable of providing themselves from work or other means or who are not sufficiently provided due to important reasons established by means of laws is given the status of a constitutional value; the measures of social security express the idea of social solidarity and help a person to protect himself/herself from possible social risks; the provisions of Article 52 of the Constitution, which guarantee the right of citizens to social provision, obligate the state to establish sufficient measures to implement and legally protect the said right; the state is obliged to create such a system of social provision that would help to maintain the conditions of living in line with human dignity and, where necessary, would provide a person with essential social assistance;

– Article 52 of the Constitution lays down the grounds for pension provision and social assistance; according to this article of the Constitution, while implementing the constitutional principle of public solidarity and by helping a person to protect himself/herself from possible social risks and, at the same time, creating the preconditions for every member of society to take care of his/her own welfare (rather than to rely solely on state social security), the legislature must establish, by means of a law, old-age pensions and disability pensions, as well as social assistance in the event of unemployment, sickness, widowhood, or the loss of the breadwinner; under the Constitution, a law may also provide for other pensions or social assistance in addition to those indicated in Article 52 of the Constitution;

– the right of a person to social security should be interpreted by taking account of the imperatives consolidated in the Constitution in relation to social harmony and justice, as well as of the constitutional principles of the equality of the rights of persons and proportionality;

– the principle of solidarity in civil society does not deny personal responsibility for one's own fate; therefore, the legal regulation of social security should be such that would create the preconditions and incentives for all members of society to take care of their own welfare by themselves rather than to rely solely on social security guaranteed by the state; social support must not create any preconditions for a person not to seek higher income and not to search, by one's own efforts, the possibilities of ensuring for oneself and one's own family the living conditions that are in line with human dignity; social support must not become a privilege; the recognition of mutual responsibility between a person and society is important in ensuring social harmony, as well as in guaranteeing freedom of a person and the possibility for a person to protect himself/herself from difficulties that the person alone would be unable to overcome;

– the provisions of Article 52 of the Constitution imply the duty of the legislature to establish such a legal regulation that would ensure the accumulation of funds necessary for pensions and social assistance, the payment of these pensions, and the rendering of social assistance; on the other hand, the burden of the obligations undertaken by the state falls upon entire society; therefore, the said legal regulation should create the preconditions for distributing (certainly, by taking account, inter alia, of the constitutional principle of solidarity, the constitutional imperatives of social harmony and justice) the respective burden of the state among members of society; however, this burden must be distributed in such a manner that the fulfilment of the duty to pay state social insurance contributions would not become an overly heavy burden and a person, due to the fact that he/she is fulfilling this duty, would not become in need of social assistance himself/herself;

– under the Constitution, the grounds for pension provision, persons who are granted and paid pensions, the conditions for granting and paying pensions, as well as the amounts of pensions, are established exclusively by means of a law;

– the wording “the state shall guarantee” used in Article 52 of the Constitution means, inter alia, that pensions and various types of social assistance are guaranteed for persons on the grounds and in the amounts that are established in laws and that persons who meet the conditions provided for under laws have the right to demand that the state grant and pay this pension to them; after the types of pensions, the persons entitled to a pension, the grounds and conditions for granting and paying pensions, and their amounts have been established by means of laws, the duty arises for the state to follow the constitutional principles of the protection of legitimate expectations and legal certainty in the area of pension provision relationships; – statutory acts may establish only the procedure for the implementation of the laws regulating social security relationships; the statutory legal regulation of these relationships may comprise the establishment of the respective procedures, as well as such a legal regulation based on laws where the need to provide more details about and particularise, in statutory legal acts, the legal regulation established in laws is objectively caused by the necessity in the law-making process to draw on expert knowledge or special (professional) competence in a certain area.

The right to a pension from the aspect of the protection of property (Articles 23 and 52 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 6 February 2012

In its acts, the Constitutional Court has held on more than one occasion that the right to demand the pension provision benefits that are established in the Constitution and in laws not in conflict with the Constitution arises from Article 52 of the Constitution, while the property aspects of this right are defended under Article 23 thereof (rulings of 4 July 2003, 3 December 2003, 22 October 2007, and 24 December 2008 and the decision of 20 April 2010); under Article 23 of the Constitution, persons who have been granted and paid a pension established in the Constitution or the law have the right to demand that the pension benefits be paid further to them in the amounts that were granted and paid previously (rulings of 4 July 2003, 3 December 2003, 24 December 2008, and 2 September 2009 and the decision of 20 April 2010). In this context, it needs to be noted that the concept of the constitutional right to a pension as a periodic monetary benefit may not be identified with the concept of the right of property in ordinary law, inter alia, civil law.

The right to an old-age pension (Article 52 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 6 February 2012

One of the types of pensions specified expressis verbis in Article 52 of the Constitution is an old-age pension. Under Article 52 of the Constitution, the age upon reaching which a person has the right to receive an old-age pension, the grounds for granting and paying such a pension, the conditions and amounts thereof must be established by means of a law; when establishing this, the legislature must pay regard to the norms and principles of the Constitution (rulings of 25 November 2002, 3 December 2003, and 22 October 2007 and the decision of 20 April 2010). A person who meets the conditions established under the law in order to receive an old-age pension and who has been granted and paid this pension has the right to the monetary benefit of a particular amount, i.e. the right to property; this right must be protected and defended also under Article 23 of the Constitution (rulings of 25 November 2002, 3 December 2003, and 13 December 2004 and the decision of 20 April 2010). The Constitutional Court has on more than one occasion drawn attention to the fact that the payment of social insurance contributions entails the right of a person to receive an old-age pension of a particular amount and that it is necessary to ensure that this amount would depend on the amounts of contributions that have been paid (rulings of 25 November 2002, 3 December 2003, and 26 September 2007 and the decision of 20 April 2010); the amounts of social insurance contributions are the basis for the differentiation of the amounts of old-age pensions (ruling of 25 November 2002 and the decision of 20 April 2010).

State pensions

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 6 February 2012

The Constitutional Court has held that state pensions, which are not directly named in Article 52 of the Constitution, differ as to their nature and character from state social insurance pensions: state pensions are granted to persons for service or in recognition of their merit to the State of Lithuania, as well as to victims specified in the law as compensation; state pensions are paid from the state budget (rulings of 4 July 2003, 3 December 2003, 22 October 2007, 24 December 2008, and 29 June 2010 and the decision of 20 April 2010); the receipt of these pensions is linked not with the social insurance pension contributions of an established amount, but with the particular status of a certain person (his/her service, merit, or other circumstances upon which the granting of a state pension depends); the particularities of state pensions permit the legislature, taking account of all significant circumstances and having regard to the norms and principles of the Constitution, to establish the respective conditions for granting these pensions (rulings of 24 December 2008 and 29 June 2010 and the decision of 20 April 2010); the discretion of the legislature in establishing the granting of state pensions is broader than in regulating other pensions; the conditions for granting state pensions may be very different and may depend on, inter alia, the particularities of service and the economic capacities of the state (ruling of 24 December 2008); the legislature may establish, by means of a law, the maximum amount of such pensions and consolidate various ways for determining this amount; on the other hand, in the case of state pensions, the provision regarding the obligation undertaken by the state under the law to grant and pay the respective pension to a person who meets the conditions established by means of a law and regarding the right of the said person to demand that the state fulfil such an obligation undertaken under the law is also effective (rulings of 22 October 2007 and 29 June 2010 and the decision of 20 April 2010).

The possibility of freely choosing an occupation or business must not be restricted on the grounds that a pension has been granted and paid to a person

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 6 February 2012

In the jurisprudence of the Constitutional Court, it has ... been held more than once that, when regulating pensionary relationships, it is necessary to have regard to Paragraph 1 of Article 48 of the Constitution, which, inter alia, enshrines the possibility for an individual to choose an occupation or business at his/her own discretion (i.e. by his/her own free decision); the constitutional freedom of each individual to choose an occupation or business implies the duty of the legislature to create the legal preconditions for implementing this freedom; the official constitutional doctrine of human rights is also based on the principled provision that, under the Constitution, it is not allowed to establish any such a legal regulation by which a person, in implementing a certain constitutional right, would lose the possibility of implementing another constitutional right; thus, under the Constitution, it is not permitted to establish such a legal regulation that would impose such a restriction on a person who has been granted and paid an old-age pension that is designed to limit the possibility of freely choosing an occupation or business specifically because of the fact that such a person has been granted and paid an old-age pension, although he/she meets the conditions, provided for by means of a law, that make it possible for him/her to have a certain occupation or conduct a certain business; such a legal regulation under which a person may not freely choose an occupation or business due to the fact that, upon the implementation of this right, he/she would not be paid the granted old-age pension or part thereof that was paid until then must also be considered a restriction on the possibility of freely choosing an occupation or business; this provision must mutatis mutandis be applied to other types of pensions, inter alia, state pensions provided for by means of a law (ruling of 22 October 2007 and the decision of 20 April 2010).

The powers of the legislature to modify the legal regulation of pensions upon the emergence of a particularly difficult economic and financial situation in the state

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 6 February 2012

... as it was held in the Constitutional Court's decision of 20 April 2010, the requirements that stem from the constitutional principles of a state under the rule of law, the equality of rights, justice, proportionality, the protection of legitimate expectations, legal certainty, legal security, and social solidarity, as well as other constitutional imperatives, must be also be complied with when there is an extreme situation in the state (economic crisis etc.) due to which the economic and financial situation in the state, despite various other measures that are applied for overcoming the economic crisis, has changed to the extent that, inter alia, the accumulation of the funds necessary for the payment of pensions is not ensured and, due to this, the legal regulation is modified by reducing pensions.

It needs to be noted that, in its final acts, the Constitutional Court has revealed quite a few requirements that stem from the Constitution and must be complied with while modifying the legal regulation of the relationships connected with pension provision in a particularly difficult economic and financial situation in the state.

The Constitutional Court has held on more than one occasion that such an extreme situation in the state (economic crisis etc.) can occur when there is an objective lack of funds for the payment of pensions and that, in such exceptional cases, the legal regulation of pensionary relationships may also be modified by reducing pensions to the extent that is necessary to ensure the vitally important interests of society and protect other constitutional values; the reduced pensions may be paid only on a temporary basis, i.e. only as long as there is an extreme situation in the state (rulings of 25 November 2002, 4 July 2003, 3 December 2004, 13 December 2004, and 24 December 2008 and the decision of 20 April 2010).

The Constitutional Court has emphasised that, in itself, the emergence of a particularly difficult economic and financial situation (due to an economic crisis) in the state does not imply the right of the legislature to modify the legal regulation of pensionary relationships – to reduce the granted and paid pensions; when there is a particularly difficult economic and financial situation, the state must take all possible measures in order to overcome the economic crisis and to ensure the accumulation of the funds necessary for paying pensions; only in an exceptional case, where it is impossible to accumulate (no success is made in accumulating) the amount of funds necessary to pay pensions after all internal and external possibilities have been used, the pensionary legal regulation may be modified by reducing pensions (decision of 20 April 2010). Even in such exceptional cases, the granted and paid pensions may not be reduced in violation of the balance of the interests of a person and society, which is consolidated in the Constitution, i.e. in violation of the constitutional principle of proportionality (rulings of 25 November 2002, 4 July 2003, 3 December 2003, 13 December 2004, and 24 December 2008 and the decision of 20 April 2010).

As it was held in the Constitutional Court's decision of 20 April 2010, the principle of proportionality implies that the reduction of granted and paid pensions must be in line with the legitimate objectives that are important to society; such reduction must be necessary to reach the said objectives and must not restrict the rights and freedoms of a person clearly more than necessary in order to reach those objectives.

The constitutional principle of proportionality, inter alia, also means that when there is a particularly difficult economic and financial situation in the state and when, due to this, it is necessary to temporarily reduce the granted and paid pensions in order to ensure the vitally important interests of society and the state and to protect other constitutional values, the legislature is under the obligation to establish such a uniform and non-discriminatory scale of the reduction of pensions whereby pensions would be reduced in a manner not violating the proportions of the amounts of pensions established with regard to pensioners of the same category prior to the emergence of a particularly difficult economic and financial situation in the state (decision of 20 April 2010).

The Constitutional Court has also held that the particularities of state pensions, whose nature and character are different from those of old-age pensions and disability pensions, imply that the legislature may modify the legal regulation of such pensions of a different nature by reducing these pensions to the extent that is greater than the reduction of old-age pensions and disability pensions; however, when doing so, it is not allowed to violate the proportions of the amounts of state pensions established prior to the emergence of a particularly difficult economic and financial situation in the state (decision of 20 April 2010).

... the constitutional imperatives of a state under the rule of law, justice, proportionality, the equality of rights, as well as social solidarity, inter alia, mean that the burden of an economic and financial crisis should be evenly and proportionately shared by all society. At the same time, it needs to be noted that, as held by the Constitutional Court, the constitutional principles of a state under the rule of law, the equality of rights, justice, and proportionality do not mean that it is not allowed to establish such a limit on the amounts of pensions below which pensions would not be reduced even when there is a particularly difficult economic and financial situation in the state; while establishing this limit, it is necessary to take into account the circumstance that, under the Constitution, it is not allowed to establish any such a legal regulation whereby pensions would be reduced to such an amount where the person receiving the pension would not be secured minimal socially acceptable needs and living conditions compatible with human dignity; a pension that secures only minimal socially acceptable needs and living conditions compatible with human dignity for a person who receives such a pension may not be reduced at all (decision of 20 April 2010).

... the social orientation of the state, which is enshrined in the Constitution, implies the discretion of the legislature, in a particularly difficult economic and financial situation in the state and, thus, if necessary, to reduce pensions and other social benefits temporarily, upon the assessment of the resources and the material and financial possibilities of the state and society, as well as other significant circumstances, to establish exceptions that would also be applicable to certain other groups of socially most sensitive persons who need special social assistance, i.e. to establish that pensions and other social benefits are not reduced for these groups of persons or are reduced to a smaller extent in order to ensure the conditions of living in line with human dignity. When establishing these exceptions, it is necessary to follow, inter alia, the imperatives of a state under the rule of law, the equality of rights, justice, proportionality, and social solidarity, which are enshrined in the Constitution.

In its decision of 20 April 2010, the Constitutional Court emphasised that, even when there is an extreme situation in the state (economic crisis etc.) because of which pensions may be reduced, it is also necessary to pay regard to the requirement, which arises from the Constitution, not to establish such a legal regulation under which the possibility for a person who has been granted and paid a pension, inter alia, an old-age pension, would be restricted, due to this, to freely choose an occupation and business, although he/she meets the conditions provided for by means of a law that make it possible for him/her to have a certain occupation or conduct a certain business (decision of 20 April 2010). In this decision, it was also held that, when there is a particularly difficult economic and financial situation in the state and when, due to this, it is necessary to temporarily reduce granted and paid pensions in order to secure the vitally important interests of society and the state and to protect other constitutional values, it is not permitted to establish any such a legal regulation whereby an old-age or disability pension granted and paid to persons who have a certain occupation or conduct a certain business would be reduced, due to this, to the extent that is greater compared with persons who do not have any occupation or do not conduct any business. As mentioned before, the Constitutional Court has noted that the provision “such a legal regulation under which a person may not freely choose an occupation or business due to the fact that, upon the implementation of this right, he/she would not be paid the granted old-age pension or part thereof that was paid until then must also be considered a restriction on the possibility of freely choosing an occupation or business” of the official constitutional doctrine is mutatis mutandis also applicable with regard to other pensions, inter alia, state pensions provided for by means of a law.

... it needs to be held that when there is a particularly difficult economic and financial situation in the state and when, due to this, there is the necessity temporarily to reduce the pensions in order to secure the vitally important interests of society and the state and to protect other constitutional values, it is not permitted to establish any such a legal regulation whereby a state pension granted and paid to persons who have a certain occupation or conduct a certain business would be reduced, due to this, to the extent that is greater compared with persons who do not have any occupation and do not conduct any business.

In the Constitutional Court’s decision of 20 April 2010, it was held that the modification of the legal regulation by reducing old-age pensions due to the fact that there is an extreme situation in the state (economic crisis etc.) means a limitation on the constitutional social guarantee of a person – an old-age pension; such a legal regulation limits, to a certain extent, the right of ownership of a person to whom an old-age pension was granted and paid; thus, the legislature, upon the emergence of an extreme situation, when, inter alia, due to an economic crisis, it is impossible to accumulate the amount of the funds necessary to pay old-age pensions, must, while reducing old-age pensions, provide for such a mechanism for compensating, for the incurred losses, the persons to whom such pensions were granted and paid whereby, after the said extreme situation is over, the state would undertake the obligation to compensate such persons, within a reasonable time and in a fair manner, for the losses incurred due to the reduction of old-age pensions; these provisions are mutatis mutandis also applicable with regard to compensation for the losses that are incurred due to the reduction of disability pensions.

In the acts of the Constitutional Court, it has also been held that the modification of the legal regulation by means of which state pensions are reduced to a great extent due to the fact that, upon the emergence of an extreme situation (economic crisis etc.), the economic and financial situation changes in such a way that the accumulation of the funds necessary to pay state pensions is not secured is an essential amendment to the legal regulation of these pensions; thus, the legislature, upon the emergence of an extreme situation where, inter alia, due to an economic crisis, it is impossible to accumulate the amount of the funds necessary to pay state pensions, must, while reducing state pensions to a large extent, provide for such a mechanism for compensating, for the incurred losses, the persons to whom such pensions were granted and paid whereby, after the said extreme situation is over, the state would undertake the obligation to compensate such persons, in a fair manner and within a reasonable time, for the losses incurred by them due to the reduction of state pensions; the particularities of state pensions also imply that the losses incurred due to the reduction of state pensions may be compensated to the extent that is lower than in the event of the losses incurred due to the reduction of old-age or disability pensions (decision of 20 April 2010 and the ruling of 29 June 2010).

In this context, it needs to be emphasised that, while seeking to ensure that losses incurred due to the reduction of old-age or disability pensions, as well as the reduction of state pensions to a great extent, would be compensated within a reasonable time and in a fair manner after the said extreme situation is over, the legislature must, without unreasonable delay, by means of a law, establish such essential elements (grounds, amounts, etc.) of compensation for the reduced pensions on the basis of which it would be possible to draft the procedure for compensation for the reduced pensions.

It has been mentioned that reduced pensions may be paid only temporarily, i.e. only as long as there is an extreme situation (economic crisis, etc.) in the state, when there is an objective lack of the funds necessary for the payment of pensions.

In the Constitutional Court's decision of 20 April 2010, it has been held that the constitutional concept of the state budget, inter alia, the constitutional institution of a budget year implies that when there is an extreme situation in the state (economic crisis etc.) due to which the economic and financial situation in the state changes in such a way that, inter alia, the accumulation of the funds necessary for the payment of pensions is not secured and, due to this, the legal regulation has to be modified by reducing pensions, the reduction of pensions is allowed for no longer than one budget year; the constitutional institution of a budget year gives rise to the duty of the legislature, in the course of deliberating and approving the state budget for the next year, to reassess the actual economic and financial situation in the state and to decide whether the said situation is still a particularly difficult one, inter alia, whether the collection of the state budget revenue is still disordered to the extent that, due to this, the state is unable to perform the undertaken obligations and whether, due to this, it is necessary to establish such a legal regulation whereby the reduced pensions would have to be paid also for the next budget year.

The discretion of the legislature to choose a model of the system of old-age pensions, inter alia, where such a model is based on the accumulation of funds designated for future old-age pensions in special pension funds; regulating the economic activity of economic operators administering pension funds (Articles 46 and 52 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 29 June 2012

... while making use of the discretion to choose a system of pensions, the legislature may establish various models of the system of old-age pensions, which are guaranteed in Article 52 of the Constitution, inter alia, those based upon the collection of the funds necessary to pay old-age pensions from the income of working persons at that time, or based upon the accumulation of funds designated for future old-age pensions in special pension funds, as well as based upon the combination of these models. While establishing a model of the system of old-age pensions by means of a law, the legislature must comply with the requirements arising from Article 52 of the Constitution, the constitutional imperative of social harmony, the principles of justice, reasonableness, and proportionality.

Having chosen such a model of the system of old-age pensions where the funds (or part thereof) designated for old-age pensions are accumulated in special pension funds administered by state or private economic operators, the legislature must also pay regard to the provisions of Paragraphs 2 and 3 of Article 46 of the Constitution, whereby the state supports economic efforts and initiative that are useful to society and regulates economic activity so that it serves the general welfare of the nation. As it has been held by the Constitutional Court on more than one occasion, while regulating economic activity, the state must follow the principle of balancing the interests of a person and society and must guarantee the interests of both a private person (economic operator) and society; as a rule, the regulation of economic activity is linked with the establishment of conditions for economic activity, the regulation of certain procedures, control over economic activity, as well as with certain limitations and prohibitions on this activity (inter alia, the rulings of 13 May 2005, 6 January 2011, and 21 June 2011).

In this context, it needs to be noted that, if the legislature, while carrying out the constitutional obligation to guarantee the right of a person to an old-age pension, provides that an old-age pension (or part thereof) is accumulated in special funds administered by state or private economic operators, the imperatives consolidated in Articles 46 and 52 of the Constitution give rise to the duty of the legislature to regulate the economic activity of these operators so that the interests of a person (economic operator) and society would be balanced: inter alia, it is necessary to establish the licencing and control of this activity, limitations upon administering the funds (inter alia, the investing thereof) transferred to pension funds, conditions for paying pension benefits, and other necessary conditions of the economic activity of economic operators administering pension funds.

The right to funds accumulated in pension funds is related to the protection of the rights of ownership

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 29 June 2012

... even though the funds designated for old-age pensions and accumulated in pension funds may not be identified with cumulative pensions themselves (with payable benefits), the amount of which depends on the results of the economic activity (inter alia, investing) of the economic operators administering particular pension funds, the right of a person to funds already accumulated in these funds must be related to the protection of the rights of ownership, and the property aspects of this right are protected under Article 23 of the Constitution.

The powers of the legislature, upon the emergence of a particularly difficult economic and financial situation in the state, to reduce the part of funds that is transferred to pension funds in order to accumulate future old-age pensions

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 29 June 2012

... the legislature, having established that a certain part of the funds designated for old-age pensions is transferred to special pension funds in order to accumulate future old-age pensions, in the event of necessity (e.g. during an economic crisis etc.), when the economic and financial situation of the state changes in a such way that, inter alia, the collection of the funds necessary to pay old-age pensions is not ensured from the income of persons working at that time, has the powers, inter alia, to decide to temporarily reduce such part of the funds collected from the said income that is transferred to special pension funds in order to accumulate future old-age pensions; however, in doing so, the legislature must follow the imperatives arising from the Constitution, inter alia, the requirements of justice, reasonableness, proportionality, and the equality of rights.

[...]

Thus, when there is a particularly difficult economic and financial situation in the state and in order to secure the vitally important interests of society and the state, as well as to protect other constitutional values, in cases where it is necessary to reduce the part of funds that is transferred to special pension funds and is designated for the accumulation of old-age pensions (or part thereof), the legislature may establish only such extent of the reduction that is necessary in order to reach the aforesaid objectives and that would not deny the essence of a cumulative pension.

[...]

In the jurisprudence of the Constitutional Court, it has ... been noted that the state must also observe the constitutional principles of legal certainty and the protection of legitimate expectations in the relationships connected with pension provision; therefore, amendments to the established legal regulation that worsen pension provision are possible only when there arises an extreme situation (economic crisis, a natural disaster, etc.) in the state and when there is an objective lack of funds for the fulfilment of state functions and the satisfying of public interests, as well as the payment of pensions; such amendments must be necessary for the protection of other constitutional values, they must be done only by means of a law and without violating the Constitution (rulings of 23 April 2002, 4 July 2003, and 3 December 2003).

It needs to be noted that the amount of funds that are transferred to special pension funds and are designated for the accumulation of old-age pensions (or part thereof) is one of the preconditions for achieving good results of the economic activity (inter alia, investment) of the economic operators administering these funds; therefore, if the legislature, in the event of necessity (e.g. upon the emergence of an economic crisis), decides to reduce this amount, it not only must not deny the essence of a cumulative pension, but also must seek to achieve a situation where persons that have accumulated this pension would not sustain great losses; whereas in cases where such losses are unavoidable, the legislature must, while taking into account, inter alia, the financial and economic capacities of the state, establish fair compensation for such losses; various ways of such compensation may be chosen.

Reorganising the system of pension provision (inter alia, upon the emergence of a particularly difficult economic and financial situation in the state)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 29 June 2012

The Constitutional Court has held that the system of pension provision established by means of a law may be subject to reorganisation (inter alia, the ruling of 4 July 2003, the decision of 20 April 2010, and the ruling of 14 December 2010). While reorganising this system, the Constitution must be observed in every case; the system of pensions may be reorganised only by means of a law, only guaranteeing the old-age and disability pensions provided for by the Constitution, as well as observing the obligations undertaken by the state, where such obligations are not in conflict with the Constitution, to pay the respective benefits to persons who meet the requirements established by means of a law (inter alia, the rulings of 4 July 2003, 3 December 2003, and 24 December 2008 and the decision of 20 April 2010). The Constitutional Court has also noted that, if, in the course of reorganising the system of social guarantees or the structure of individual social guarantees, the amount of social guarantees is reduced, let alone certain social guarantees disappear, a mechanism of fair compensation for the incurred losses must be established for the individuals to whom those social guarantees were reasonably established (inter alia, the rulings of 22 November 2007 and 2 September 2009).

In the Constitutional Court's decision of 20 April 2010, it was held that, even when, due to special circumstances (economic crisis etc.), there is an extremely difficult economic and financial situation in the state, the legislature, if it decides to reorganise the system of pensions in such a manner that the pensions established by means of a law, but not directly specified in Article 52 of the Constitution, would be eliminated or the legal regulation of these pensions would be amended in essence must establish a fair mechanism for compensating, for the incurred losses, the persons who were granted and paid such pensions.

... it needs to be noted that the legislature, upon the emergence of a particularly difficult economic and financial situation in the state due to special circumstances (economic crisis etc.), if it decides to reorganise the system of old-age pensions in such a manner that the legal regulation on collecting the funds designated for old-age pensions and on paying such pensions would undergo essential changes, inter alia, in such a way that the funds designated for old-age pensions or part thereof would no longer be accumulated in special pension funds, must seek to achieve a situation where the participants of the pension system would not sustain losses. If, in the course of reorganising the system of old-age pensions the losses sustained by its participants, especially when such losses are essential, are unavoidable, the legislature must establish fair compensation for such losses.

The legal regulation governing social assistance relationships in the event of unemployment (Article 52 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 7 February 2013

... Article 52 of the Constitution, which, inter alia, lays down the grounds for social assistance, must be interpreted together with Paragraph 1 of Article 48 of the Constitution, whereby everyone has the right, inter alia, to receive social security in the event of unemployment, with the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law, as well as with other related norms and principles of the Constitution.

When interpreting the duty of the state to guarantee the right of every individual, inter alia, to social security in the event of unemployment, which is consolidated in Paragraph 1 of Article 48 of the Constitution, the Constitutional Court has held that, if, due to certain reasons, a person loses his/her employment and cannot take care of his/her welfare, the duty arises for the state to establish such a legal regulation under which social assistance would be ensured for such a person in the event of unemployment. The legislature may choose and consolidate in laws a model for the provision of the said support, inter alia, various forms thereof; however, the legislature must not establish any such a legal regulation that would create the preconditions for the emergence of such a situation where persons who, due to certain reasons, have lost their employment would not receive adequate social assistance (ruling of 24 December 2008).

[...]

... the constitutional principle of social solidarity also implies that the legislature, when taking into account, inter alia, the mission of social assistance in the event of unemployment and the financial capacities of the state and society, may establish such a legal regulation whereby persons who receive different social welfare according to laws, where the said social welfare is rendered by the state in a financial form (inter alia, a disability pension) and where such social welfare is capable of ensuring the conditions of living in line with human dignity, would be provided with social security not in the form of financial assistance, but in a different form in the event of unemployment.

The purpose of social insurance (Article 52 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 15 February 2013

The Constitutional Court has ... held that the purpose of social insurance is to provide persons with funds and services necessary for living if, for reasons established by means of a law, they are unable to subsist on their earned income or other income or, for valid reasons established by means of a law, they have additional expenses (ruling of 12 March 1997). The purpose of the designed social insurance system is not only to pay social insurance pensions and allowances, but, first of all, to collect all funds provided for by means of a law (ruling of 12 March 1997). The provisions of Article 52 of the Constitution, which guarantee the right of citizens to pension provision and social assistance, imply the duty of the legislature to establish such a legal regulation that would create the preconditions for the state to implement its constitutional obligation to guarantee the right of citizens to social security, would ensure the accumulation of funds that are necessary for pensions and social assistance, and would ensure the payment of these pensions and the rendering of social assistance (inter alia, the rulings of 13 December 2004 and 22 October 2007 and the decision of 20 April 2010). Otherwise, the duty of the state to establish sufficient measures for the implementation and legal defence of the rights consolidated in the Constitution would not be realised (ruling of 3 December 2003).

The legal regulation should create the preconditions for distributing among members of society (of course, by taking account of, inter alia, the constitutional principle of solidarity, the constitutional imperatives of social harmony and justice) the burden that falls upon the state; however, the said burden must be distributed in such a manner that the fulfilment of the duty to pay state social insurance contributions would not become an overly heavy burden and a person, due to the fact that he/she is fulfilling this duty, would not become in need of social assistance himself/herself (rulings of 26 September 2007 and 22 October 2007). When establishing the duty for working persons (those who pursue active economic activities) to pay state social insurance contributions, various conditions are possible, which determine the emergence of this duty; in addition, various criteria defining these conditions are also possible. It is also possible to relate the payment of state social insurance contributions with the fact that a person receives insured income and it is possible to establish, by means of a law, the minimum amount of such income (ruling of 26 September 2007).

The state pensions of officials and servicemen

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 22 February 2013

In its ruling of 24 December 2008, the Constitutional Court noted that the purpose of the state pension of officials and servicemen, which is consolidated in [the law] is, inter alia, to compensate for difficult, responsible, often risk-involving, and dangerous service for the state; the particularities of state pensions permit the legislature, taking account of all significant circumstances and having regard to the norms and principles of the Constitution, to establish the respective conditions for granting these pensions; the receipt of these pensions is related to the particular status of a certain person (his/her service, merit, or other circumstances upon which the granting of a state pension depends).

When consideration is given to such a concept of the state pensions of officials and servicemen ... it needs to be noted that, after such a state pension has been established by means of a law, the granting and receipt of this pension must specifically be related to service performed by a person to the State of Lithuania. In this context, it needs to be emphasised that service to another state, inter alia, the USSR (including the Lithuanian SSR), may not be considered service to the State of Lithuania. However, under the Constitution, the legislature has the discretion, while taking account of significant circumstances, to establish such a legal regulation of granting the state pensions of officials and servicemen under which the period of service to another state may be compared with a certain part of the period of service of a person to the State of Lithuania necessary in order to grant this pension in cases where the said service was performed under the circumstances when it was objectively impossible to perform service to the State of Lithuania (inter alia, during the period prior to the restoration of the independence of the Republic of Lithuania on 11 March 1990, when the only institutions of the State of Lithuania were the Republic of Lithuania's diplomatic missions and consular posts abroad or when the service to the State of Lithuania was possible only in the structures (inter alia, in the Lithuanian Freedom Fight Movement) of the organised armed resistance against the occupation, which took place for a certain time on the occupied territory of the Republic of Lithuania). While implementing this discretion, the legislature is bound by the aforementioned purpose of the state pension of officials and servicemen. Thus, the legislature may not establish such a legal regulation under which the state pensions of officials and servicemen would be granted to persons who did not serve to the State of Lithuania or to persons who, while doing service to the state that had occupied the territory of the Republic of Lithuania, participated in suppressing the resistance against the occupation or in committing criminal acts against the Lithuanian population.

The right to social assistance in the event of unemployment (Article 52 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 14 February 2014

Under the Constitution, inter alia, Article 52 thereof, the legislature, when regulating the relationships of social assistance in the event of unemployment, which is one of the types of social assistance, must establish such a legal regulation that would ensure that persons who, due to certain reasons, have lost their employment, would receive adequate social assistance; the same legal regulation must, inter alia, also establish certain sufficient measures for the implementation of the right to social assistance in the event of unemployment. The legal regulation governing social assistance in the event of unemployment must, among other things, create the preconditions for all members of society who have, due to certain reasons, lost their employment to take care of their own welfare by themselves rather than to rely solely on state social security.

Under the Constitution, inter alia, Article 52 thereof, and the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law, after establishing, by means of a law, the legal regulation governing social assistance in the event of unemployment, inter alia, the grounds and conditions for granting social assistance in the event of unemployment, the legislature may assign another subject (inter alia, the Government) to establish, by means of a statutory legal act and based on the relevant law, the procedure for granting social assistance in the event of unemployment, as well as for paying the respective benefits granted on the grounds and under the conditions established by the relevant law in the event of unemployment. When the procedure for paying the respective benefit in the event of unemployment is established by means of a statutory legal act (including a resolution of the Government), regard must be paid to the requirements stemming from the Constitution, inter alia, Article 52 thereof, as well as from the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law; among other things, the said legal regulation may create no preconditions for the emergence of any such situations where the implementation of the right to receive social assistance in the event of unemployment would be disproportionately burdened.

The duty of the state to fairly compensate for losses incurred as a result of the reduction of old-age pensions; the powers of the legislature to establish a mechanism for such compensation

The Constitutional Court's decision of 7 March 2014

In [the Constitutional Court's ruling of 6 February 2012], inter alia, it was held:

"... the modification of the legal regulation by reducing old-age pensions even due to the fact that there is an extreme situation (economic crisis etc.) in the state means a limitation on the constitutional social guarantee of a person – an old-age pension; such a legal regulation limits, to a certain extent, the right of ownership of a person to whom an old-age pension was granted and paid; thus, the legislature, upon the emergence of an extreme situation, when, inter alia, due to an economic crisis, it is impossible to accumulate the amount of the funds necessary to pay old-age pensions, must, while reducing old-age pensions, provide for such a mechanism for compensating, for the incurred losses, the persons to whom such pensions were granted and paid whereby, after the said extreme situation is over, the state would undertake the obligation to such persons to compensate them, within a reasonable time and in a fair manner, for the losses incurred due to the reduction of old-age pensions ...

In this context, it needs to be emphasised that, while seeking to ensure that losses incurred due to the reduction of old-age or disability pensions, as well as the reduction of state pensions to a great extent, would be compensated within a reasonable time and in a fair manner after the said extreme situation is over, the legislature must, without unreasonable delay, by means of a law, establish such essential elements (grounds, amounts, etc.) of compensation for the reduced pensions on the basis of which it would be possible to draft the procedure for compensation for the reduced pensions."

[...]

It should be noted that the cited provisions of the official constitutional doctrine imply, inter alia, that:

- under the Constitution, inter alia, Articles 23 and 52 thereof, the duty stems for the state to compensate, in a fair manner, all persons whose old-age pensions were reduced due to an extreme situation (economic crisis etc.) in the state for the losses incurred by them;
- the aforementioned losses must be compensated for within a reasonable time after the extreme situation is over in the state by following a legal act (law) that is adopted by the legislature, without unreasonable delay, and that provides for a mechanism for compensation for the said losses;
- the wording "without unreasonable delay", inter alia, means that this mechanism for compensation must be established after the extreme situation is over in the state when the preconditions arise for assessing, according to objective data (economic indicators, inter alia, indicators of economic growth, funds accumulated by the state), the respective capacities of the state to ensure compensation for the losses incurred after the reduction of old-age pensions.

Consequently, a special legal act (law) that establishes the amounts, terms, and other essential elements of compensation for all persons for the losses incurred by them after the reduction of old-age pensions must be adopted immediately after the extreme situation is over in the state and after the preconditions arise for assessing, according to objective data (economic indicators, inter alia, indicators of economic growth, funds accumulated by the state), the respective capacities of the state to ensure compensation for the said losses.

[...]

It should be noted that, under the Constitution, inter alia, under the constitutional imperative of social harmony stemming from it, fair compensation to all persons whose old-age pensions were reduced (inter alia, by means of the provisions of a law that are declared in conflict with the Constitution) due to an extreme situation (economic crisis etc.) in the state for the losses incurred may be ensured as appropriate only by invoking the amounts, terms, and other essential elements of compensation for the losses incurred, as established by the legislature.

It should also be noted that fair compensation for the losses incurred must be ensured as appropriate (according to the capacities of the state) while taking account of the losses that were incurred after old-age pensions were reduced by means of: the provisions of a law that are declared in conflict with the Constitution (these losses must be fully compensated for); and the provisions of a law that are declared not in conflict with the Constitution (these losses must be compensated for, according to the capacities of the state, in a fair manner, but not necessarily fully).

[...]

It should be noted that the legislature, when it establishes a mechanism for compensation for the losses incurred due to the reduction of old-age pensions, inter alia, the starting date of the payment of compensation and a reasonable period of time during which the said losses will be compensated for, is bound by the Constitution, inter alia, the constitutional imperative of reasonableness stemming from it; thus, the legislature must take account, inter alia, of the consequences of an extreme situation and the capacities of the state.

In this context, it should also be noted that the capacities of the state are determined, inter alia, by various obligations assumed by the state, which, inter alia, are related to financial discipline, thus, also to the imperative of balancing the revenue and expenditure of the state budget.

Social assistance in the event of widowhood (Article 52 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 3 July 2014

One of the types of social assistance guaranteed by the state, as expressis verbis indicated in Article 52 of the Constitution, is social assistance in the event of widowhood. Thus, under this article of the Constitution, the state is constitutionally obliged to provide social assistance in the event of widowhood, i.e. to partly compensate for the family income lost by a person as a result of the death of his/her wife (husband). The provision of this social assistance is guaranteed to a widow(er), i.e. a person who was the wife (husband) of the deceased person at the time of the death of the latter.

The Constitution does not lay down any grounds and conditions for providing social assistance in the event of widowhood, nor any duration and amounts of this social assistance – this must be established by the legislature; however, the legislature is bound by the norms and principles of the Constitution (inter alia, the constitutional principles of social solidarity, social harmony, justice, reasonableness, proportionality, and the equality of rights), as well as by the capacities of the state and society.

[...]

... the mere fact that a person is the widow(er) of a person who had belonged to a group of persons with a certain social status (distinction of which is objectively justified) and who, by virtue of that status, had acquired the right to receive social assistance (pension) is not in itself a ground to objectively justify any such a legal regulation that would consolidate the right of the said widow(er) to receive in the event of widowhood such social assistance (pension) that would, in substance, differ from that ensured for the widow(er)s of other persons; the deceased person's social status alone is not in itself a constitutionally justifiable ground to ensure for the widow(er) of that person social assistance of a much larger amount than that ensured for other widow(er)s.

... if such a legal regulation were established under which, on the grounds of the mere fact of becoming the widow(er) of a person who had belonged to a group of persons with a certain social status (distinction of which is objectively justifiable) and who, by virtue of that status, had acquired the right to receive social assistance (pension), the said widow(er) were granted the right to receive such social assistance (pension) that would, in substance, differ from that ensured for the widow(er)s of other persons, that legal regulation should be judged as consolidating a privilege on the grounds of the social status of the person.

[...]

... the fact that, under the Constitution, it is not permitted to establish any such a legal regulation under which, in the event of widowhood, social assistance (pension) of a certain amount would be provided for certain persons merely on the grounds that they are the widow(er)s of the persons who had belonged to a group of persons with a certain social status (whose distinction is objectively justified) and who, by virtue of that status, had acquired the right to receive social assistance (pension), does not mean that it is on the whole not permitted to establish social assistance of different amounts in the event of widowhood.

In view of the fact that, as mentioned before, social assistance provided in the event of widowhood partly compensates for the family income lost by a person as a result of the death of his/her wife/husband, under the Constitution, a ground for establishing different amounts of social assistance provided in the event of widowhood would be the amount of family income lost by a person as a result of the death of his/her wife/husband. However, when establishing different amounts of social assistance provided in the event of widowhood, the legislature must pay regard to the capacities of the state and society and not violate the constitutional imperatives of justice, reasonableness, proportionality, and social harmony.

The powers of the legislature to modify the legal regulation of pensions upon the emergence of a particularly difficult economic and financial situation in the state

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 14 May 2015

... under the Constitution, inter alia, Article 52 thereof, and, according to the constitutional principles of a state under the rule of law, the equality of the rights of persons, justice, and proportionality:

– upon the emergence of an especially difficult economic and financial situation in the state, if the state pensions (as regards their nature and character, they are different from old-age and disability pensions) are reduced to a greater extent than old-age and disability pensions, inter alia, a longer term of paying the reduced state pensions may be established;

– the constitutional duty of the state to accumulate the funds necessary to pay pensions and to repeal the legal regulation by which such pensions were reduced if the possibility arises to accumulate (receive) the funds necessary for paying pensions in the amounts before the reduction thereof may not be understood as the duty to decide on repealing the legal regulation by which pensions were reduced only when the possibility arises to accumulate (receive) all funds necessary for restoring the amounts of all pensions that had existed before the reduction; if the possibility arises to accumulate (receive) a certain part of such funds, the legislature, by taking account of the economic and financial situation existing in the state and of the capacities of the state, as well as of various obligations undertaken by the state, when taking a decision on repealing the legal regulation reducing the pensions, may decide to restore, not necessarily at the same time and not necessarily to the full extent, the previous amounts of pensions that are of different nature and different character; if it makes such a decision, the legislature is bound by the Constitution, inter alia, by the requirements arising from the constitutional principles of a state under the rule of law, the equality of the rights of persons, justice, and proportionality, including the requirement that, in the course of establishing a different legal regulation, account should be taken of concrete legal circumstances and an assessment must first be made of the differences of the legal situation of persons and objects to which such different legal regulation is applied.

The legal regulation governing social security relationships, inter alia, social assistance relationships (Article 52 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 26 May 2015

Article 52 of the Constitution prescribes: "The State shall guarantee its citizens the right to receive old-age and disability pensions, as well as social assistance in the event of unemployment, sickness, widowhood, the loss of the breadwinner, and in other cases provided for by law."

The Constitutional Court has formulated in its acts an extensive official constitutional doctrine of social security, inter alia, social assistance, and has revealed the constitutional imperatives that should be complied with in regulating the respective relationships by means of legal acts.

The Constitutional Court has held on more than one occasion that the provisions of Article 52 of the Constitution express the social orientation (social character) of the state and recognise that social provision, i.e. the contribution of society to the maintenance of those its members who, due to important reasons specified under the law, are unable to support themselves through work or other income, or are insufficiently provided for, has the status of a constitutional value; the measures of social security express the idea of social solidarity and help persons to protect themselves from possible social risks (inter alia, the rulings of 14 December 2010 and 14 April 2014).

The Constitutional Court has noted that the principle of solidarity in civil society does not deny personal responsibility for one's own fate; therefore, the legal regulation of social security should be such that would create the preconditions and incentives for every member of society to take care of one's own welfare, but not to rely solely on the social security guaranteed by the state (inter alia, the rulings of 25 November 2002, 2 September 2009, and 3 July 2014); social assistance must not create any preconditions for a person not to seek higher income and not to search, by one's own efforts, the possibilities of ensuring for oneself and one's own family the living conditions that are in line with human dignity; social assistance must not become a privilege (inter alia, the rulings of 2 September 2009 and 3 July 2014); the recognition of mutual responsibility of a person and society is important in ensuring social harmony, guaranteeing freedom of a person and the possibility of protecting oneself from difficulties that could not be overcome by the person alone (inter alia, the rulings of 12 March 1997, 6 February 2012, and 27 February 2012). Thus, under the Constitution, the legislature is under the duty to establish, by means of a law, such grounds or conditions for rendering social assistance, as well as such types and amount of social assistance, that would create the preconditions and incentives to encourage the attempts of each person to take care of one's own or one's family welfare by one's own efforts first of all and to contribute to the welfare of all society (ruling of 7 February 2013).

In addition, it needs to be noted that the jurisprudence of the Constitutional Court defends the legal position that the social orientation of the state implies the discretion of the legislature to establish exceptions to the general legal regulation based on social solidarity and apply them to certain groups of socially most sensitive persons who need specific social assistance (rulings of 6 February 2012 and 16 May 2013).

The Constitutional Court has noted on more than one occasion that the legislature, while having regard to the Constitution, in regulating the relationships of social security and social assistance, has broad discretion (inter alia, the rulings of 29 June 2012 and 15 February 2013) and that, under the Constitution, a law may also provide for other pensions and social assistance in addition to those expressis verbis indicated in Article 52 of the Constitution (inter alia, the rulings of 4 July 2003 and 6 February 2012).

Article 52 of the Constitution, the striving for an open, just, and harmonious civil society and a state under the rule of law, as established in the Preamble to the Constitution, and the constitutional principles of the social orientation and social solidarity of the state imply that the content of the legal regulation of social assistance relationships may be determined by various factors, inter alia, by the resources and the material and financial possibilities of the state and society, the need to ensure the financial stability, economic sustainability, and development of the state; the legislature, taking account of these factors and correspondingly regulating the said relationships, has broad discretion to choose and consolidate, by means of a law the types of social assistance; in the situations where a person, according to laws, meets the requirements in order to receive the social assistance of several types, the legislature, taking account, inter alia, of the purpose of social assistance and the financial possibilities of the state and society, may establish the conditions under which this assistance will be rendered (ruling of 7 February 2013). In itself, the constitutional status of social rights does not deny the right of the legislature to establish certain conditions for or limitations on the emergence of the aforesaid rights (rulings of 6 May 1998 and 7 February 2013).

[...]

In interpreting Article 52 of the Constitution, the Constitutional Court has held that the regulation of the relationships of social assistance by means of a law is one of the most important guarantees of the constitutional right to social assistance (rulings of 5 March 2004 and 7 February 2005). The phrase “the state shall guarantee” of Article 52 of the Constitution means, inter alia, that various types of social assistance are guaranteed for the persons on the grounds and in the amounts that are established in laws (inter alia, the rulings of 23 April 2002 and 6 February 2012). Separate types of social assistance, the persons who are granted social assistance, the grounds and conditions for granting and paying social assistance, and the amounts thereof may be established exclusively by means of a law (inter alia, the rulings of 5 March 2004 and 14 April 2014).

A statutory legal regulation governing the relationships of social security and social assistance may comprise the establishment of the respective procedures; it may also comprise such a legal regulation where, based on a law, the need to provide more details about and particularise in statutory legal acts a certain legal regulation established by means of a law is objectively caused by the necessity in the law-making process to draw on expert knowledge of a certain area or special (professional) competence (inter alia, the rulings of 7 February 2005, 14 December 2010, 31 October 2012, and 14 February 2014). No statutory legal regulation may establish any conditions for the emergence of the right of an individual to social assistance, nor may it limit the scope of this right (inter alia, the rulings of 7 February 2005, 2 September 2009, 14 December 2010, and 14 February 2012).

The link between the duty of the state to provide social assistance and its obligation to protect and defend human dignity; social assistance in helping persons lacking access to housing to obtain such access (Articles 21 and 52 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court’s ruling of 26 May 2015

The Constitutional Court has noted that the state must create such a system of social provision that would make it possible to maintain the living conditions in line with the dignity of a person and, in the event of need, it would render the necessary social assistance to a person (inter alia, the rulings of 26 September 2007 and 3 July 2014). In interpreting the provisions of Article 21 of the Constitution that consolidate the protection and defence of human dignity, the Constitutional Court has held that dignity is an integral characteristic of an individual as the greatest social value; every member of society has innate dignity; the fact that the legislature, while regulating the relationships connected with the implementation of human rights and freedoms, must guarantee their proper protection constitutes one of the conditions for ensuring human dignity as a constitutional value (rulings of 29 December 2004 and 2 September 2009).

Thus, it is impossible to interpret the duty of the state to render the social assistance provided for in laws, as consolidated in Article 52 of the Constitution, separately from, inter alia, the obligation of the state to protect and defend human dignity, as consolidated in Article 21 of the Constitution. ... the imperative of the protection and defence of human dignity as a special constitutional value, as consolidated in Article 21 of the Constitution, and the social orientation of the state give rise to the duty of the state, by taking account to the capacities of the state and society, to help persons lacking access to housing, who are unable to obtain such access through work and/or other income, to obtain access to a home meeting at least the socially acceptable minimum needs. While regulating the relationships of social assistance for such persons in obtaining access to housing, the legislature has broad discretion in choosing the forms of rendering such assistance, inter alia, it can provide for financial assistance for acquiring or renting a residential property, it can provide for granting access to state-owned or state-leased housing, etc. It needs to be emphasised that the social orientation of the state also implies the duty of the legislature, when it regulates these relationships, to create the preconditions for taking into consideration the needs of certain groups of socially most sensitive persons who need specific social assistance.

... under the Constitution, the legislature, while regulating the relationships of social assistance in helping persons lacking access to housing to obtain such access, must define the persons who are unable to obtain access to housing through work and/or other income and who, due to this reason, are rendered state assistance in obtaining access to housing. The legislature must also define the grounds and conditions for rendering such assistance and amounts thereof. In the event that the legislature links the rendering of state assistance in obtaining access to housing with the sizes of the property or income of persons (families), such sizes may be relative, i.e. they may be linked with the sizes established by the Government or another competent institution by taking account of certain economic indicators.

After establishing that the rendering of state assistance in obtaining access to housing is linked with the sizes of the property or income of persons (families), the legislature must define the level of the property or income of persons (families) upon reaching which the rendering of such assistance is discontinued. When defining such a level, regard should be paid to the norms and principles of the Constitution, inter alia, to the state obligation to protect and defend human dignity, as consolidated in Article 21 thereof, and the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law (inter alia, regard should be paid to the constitutional requirements for justice and proportionality) that determine the fact that the rendering of such assistance may not be discontinued if particular persons (families) are unable to obtain access to a home meeting at least the socially acceptable minimum needs.

State pensions

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 26 November 2015

... while implementing its discretion deriving from the Constitution to establish the conditions for granting and paying state pensions, the legislature may stipulate that persons who meet the conditions established in the law for receiving several state pensions must be paid only one of these pensions; in addition, taking into consideration the economic capacities of the state and other important circumstances and having regard to the constitutional imperative of social harmony, the principles of justice, reasonableness, and proportionality, as well as other norms and principles of the Constitution, the legislature may establish individual constitutionally justified situations where persons may be paid more than one state pension.

The right to social assistance in the event of unemployment (Paragraph 1 of Article 48 and Article 52 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 31 October 2019

In its ruling of 7 February 2013, the Constitutional Court noted that Article 52 of the Constitution, which, inter alia, lays down the grounds for social assistance, should be interpreted in conjunction with Paragraph 1 of Article 48 of the Constitution, which stipulates: "Everyone ... shall have the right ... to receive ... social security in the event of unemployment."

... Paragraph 1 of Article 48 of the Constitution consolidates, inter alia, the right of every person to receive social security in the event of unemployment, which includes, inter alia, the right to receive social assistance, guaranteed by the state under Article 52 of the Constitution.

Interpreting Article 52 of the Constitution in conjunction with Paragraph 1 of Article 48 of the Constitution, the Constitutional Court has held the following:

– if, due to certain reasons, a person loses his/her job and cannot take care of his/her welfare, the duty arises for the state to establish such a legal regulation under which social assistance would be ensured for such a person in the event of unemployment; the legislature may choose and consolidate, in laws, a model for the provision of the said assistance; however, the legislature must not establish any such a legal regulation that would create the preconditions for the emergence of such a situation where persons who,

due to certain reasons, have lost their employment would not receive the respective social assistance (inter alia, the ruling of 7 February 2013 and the decision of 10 January 2019);

– the principle of social solidarity, which is consolidated in the Constitution, does not deny personal responsibility for one’s own fate; therefore, the legal regulation of social security should be such that would create the preconditions and incentives for all members of society to take care of their own welfare by themselves rather than to rely solely on social security guaranteed by the state (inter alia, the rulings of 6 February 2012, 7 February 2013, and 26 May 2015);

– social assistance must not become a privilege; it must not create any preconditions for a person, by one’s own efforts, not to seek higher income or possibilities of ensuring, for oneself and one’s own family, the living conditions that are in line with human dignity (ruling of 7 February 2013).

[...]

... under the Constitution, inter alia, the provision of Article 52 thereof that the state guarantees its citizens the right to receive social assistance in the event of unemployment, the legislature has discretion to choose and establish, in laws, a model of this social assistance, inter alia, the grounds and conditions for its provision. Having chosen a model based on unemployment social insurance for the provision of social assistance in the event of unemployment, the legislature must ensure that the constitutional right, consolidated, as mentioned before, in Paragraph 1 of Article 48 and Article 52 of the Constitution, to social assistance in the event of unemployment is effectively ensured for persons, if they have contributed to this social insurance to the extent prescribed by means of a law, in cases where these persons lose employment but are actively seeking it and are unable to find it due to objective reasons.

It should be emphasised that the Constitution, inter alia, Paragraph 1 of Article 48 and Article 52 thereof, gives rise to the requirement for the legislature to regulate the provision of social assistance in the event of unemployment in such a manner that persons, upon losing their employment, could not rely solely on social assistance guaranteed by the state, but the preconditions and incentives would be created for these persons for actively seeking employment and, at the same time, the state would contribute to ensuring the conditions in line with human dignity for the life of these persons and their families.

It should be noted that, when the provision of social assistance in the event of unemployment is regulated by means of a law, regard must be paid, inter alia, to the requirements implied by the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law. This, among other things, means that, in regulating the provision of social assistance by means of a law, it is impermissible to prescribe that the exercise of the constitutional right to social assistance in the event of unemployment be subject to constitutionally unjustifiable conditions, which would create the preconditions for the situation to appear in which a person who has lost employment but is actively seeking it and is unable, due to objective reasons, to find it would not receive the respective social assistance.

[...]

... it would be constitutionally unjustifiable to establish such a condition whereby, upon losing employment, a person implementing the constitutional right to higher education and, at the same time, seeking to exercise the constitutional right to social assistance in the event of unemployment would be compelled to choose a particular form of studies at a higher education school, even though, upon choosing another form of studies, the person would equally be able to combine studies with professional and/or another type of employment.

The legal regulation of the grounds and conditions of pension accumulation

The Constitutional Court’s ruling of 10 February 2020

... in implementing the duty of the state, stemming from Article 52 of the Constitution, to guarantee the right of a person to an old-age pension and having chosen such a model of the system of old-age pensions that is based, inter alia, on the accumulation of funds or part thereof designated for future old-age pensions in special pension funds, the legislature must consolidate, in a law, the grounds and conditions for the participation in pension accumulation. While paying regard, inter alia, to the constitutional principles of the social orientation and social solidarity of the state and the imperatives of social harmony and justice, under which the burden of social security falling on the state is distributed among all members of society, the legislature may establish such a legal regulation on the framework of the participation in pension accumulation that would create the preconditions and incentives for members of society to take care of their own welfare by themselves by participating in the accumulation of funds or part thereof designated for old-age pensions and, thus, to contribute to the welfare of all society. Having regard to the Constitution, inter alia, the imperatives of the equality of the rights of persons and non-discrimination, which stem from Article 29 of the Constitution, and taking account of various social, demographic, and economic factors, inter alia, the material and financial possibilities of the state, the legislature may also establish such a legal regulation that would create the incentives for a group of members of society of a certain age to take decisions as early as possible concerning the participation in the accumulation of funds or part thereof designated for old-age pensions so that the preconditions would be created for the accumulation of a significant part of funds designated for future old-age pensions and for ensuring the harmonious functioning of the whole old-age pension system.

... if the legislature, while carrying out the constitutional obligation to guarantee the right of a person to an old-age pension, establishes that an old-age pension or part thereof is accumulated in special pension funds administered by economic operators, the duty stems from Paragraph 3 of Article 46 of the Constitution for the legislature to regulate economic activity in the field of pension accumulation so that it serves the general welfare of the people. The economic activity of economic operators administering pension funds is linked to the implementation of one of the most important social rights of a person – the right to receive an old-age pension; therefore, this activity must be regulated and supervised by the state. Under the Constitution, inter alia, Articles 46 and 52 thereof, and the constitutional imperatives of social harmony and justice, in regulating economic activity in the field of pension accumulation, the legislature must balance the interests of a person and society, various constitutional values, among other things, social security, the protection of consumer interests, and freedom of individual economic activity and economic initiative, which also includes, inter alia, the freedom to conclude contracts.

The state pensions of scientists

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 3 June 2020

The Constitutional Court has held on more than one occasion that, under the Constitution, a law may also provide for other pensions in addition to those expressis verbis specified in Article 52 of the Constitution. ...

[...]

The Constitutional Court has noted that the state pension of scientists is also one of the types of pensions that are consolidated by means of a law and are not directly named in Article 52 of the Constitution; the purpose of this pension is, inter alia, compensation for scientific work whose duration is established by means of a law and which is significant to civil society and the State of Lithuania and requires special qualification (ruling of 14 May 2015). In this context, it should be mentioned that, under Paragraph 2 of Article 42 of the Constitution, the state supports, inter alia, science.

... the legislature, having established, under the Constitution, inter alia, Article 52 thereof, the state pension of scientists, has broad discretion, taking into account all significant circumstances, to establish, inter alia, the conditions for granting and paying this pension. However, in exercising this discretion, the legislature must respect the norms and principles of the Constitution, inter alia, the constitutional principles of the equality of the rights of persons and a state under the rule of law. Therefore ... it is not allowed to lay down a legal regulation that, in order to receive the state pension of scientists, would establish an unreasonably short length of scientific service for which the state pension of scientists is granted and paid or that, in another way, would violate, inter alia, the principles of justice, reasonableness, and proportionality. Failure to take into account the purpose of the state pension of scientists, the specific nature of scientific work, and other significant circumstances would make granting and paying such a pension a privilege and such pension provision could not be guaranteed under the Constitution.

... seeking that granting and paying the state pension of scientists would not become a privilege and having regard to the principles of justice, reasonableness, and proportionality, the legislature, under the Constitution, inter alia, Article 52 thereof, has the powers to establish such a legal regulation under which the state pension of scientists is not granted and not paid to persons as long as they are engaged in scientific work for which this state pension is granted and paid.

2.4.2.2. The right to healthcare

The legal regulation governing pharmaceutical activity (Paragraph 1 of Article 53 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 14 March 2002

The specific nature of medicines and medicinal substances as goods constitutes the fact that pharmaceutical activities are a special area of economic activity. It is in the interest of every individual, all society, and the state that laws and other legal acts would establish such a legal regulation whereby pharmaceutical activities would be conducted only by individuals who have specialist training and hold the respective qualification. The duty of the legislature to establish such a legal regulation arises out of Paragraph 1 of Article 53 of the Constitution, according to which the state takes care of the health of people.

[...]

... the provision "The State shall take care of the health of people" of Paragraph 1 of Article 53 of the Constitution implies that laws and other legal acts must establish such a legal regulation of pharmaceutical activities that would lay down the preconditions for creating a wide network of pharmacies, also that pharmacies would have sufficient stock of high quality, effective, and safe medicines, that the system of supply of medicines would operate smoothly, that the prices of medicines would be regulated, that the acquisition of medicines would not be inconvenienced, that the information about medicines and their use would be easily accessible and properly published, etc. Under the Constitution, pharmaceutical activities must be regulated in order that freedom of individual economic activity and initiative, as well as fair competition, would not be restricted. The state must exercise control so that pharmaceutical activities would be conducted for the sake of the health of people and public health promotion.

[...]

As such, the owner of an enterprise licensed for pharmaceutical activities (i.e. a pharmacy) may not be identified with pharmacists or other persons conducting pharmaceutical activities. As mentioned before, only the persons who have pharmaceutical education and who hold the necessary qualification may conduct pharmaceutical activities. Laws may also establish additional requirements for the persons linked with compounder, custody, control, and sale of medicines, which would ensure the protection of the health of people.

... A pharmacy is an enterprise licensed for pharmaceutical activities, i.e. activities that are part of public health activities and are related to goods of a specific nature – medicines and medicinal substances; therefore, laws may and must impose such limitations on the subjective rights of the owners of pharmacies that, in the pharmacies owned by them, only the individuals who have pharmaceutical education and hold the necessary qualification would be able to control the professional activities of the pharmacists working in such pharmacies, would be able to head such pharmacies, and would be able to conduct managerial control. Under the Constitution, laws must establish such a regulation of pharmaceutical activities in order that the economic interests of owners of pharmacies would not cast into the shade the activities of pharmacies conducted in the interest of the health of people and public health promotion.

... The requirements relating to pharmaceutical education and the necessary qualification must be imposed on persons conducting pharmaceutical activities in pharmacies. It is not permitted to impose requirements relating to education on such persons who wish to hold pharmacies by right of ownership.

The constitutional foundations of health protection (Paragraph 1 of Article 53 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 16 May 2013

The constitutional foundations of health protection are consolidated in Paragraph 1 of Article 53 of the Constitution that prescribes: "The State shall take care of the health of people and shall guarantee medical aid and services for a person in the event of sickness. The procedure for providing medical aid to citizens free of charge at state medical establishments shall be established by law."

The health of a person and of society is one of the most important values of society (inter alia, the rulings of 11 July 2002, 29 September 2005, and 21 June 2011). In interpreting the constitutional provision that the state takes care of the health of people, the Constitutional Court has held on more than one occasion that the protection of the health of people is a constitutionally important objective, a public interest; looking after the health of people is a state function (inter alia, the rulings of 26 January 2004, 29 September 2005, and 21 June 2011).

The provision of Paragraph 1 of Article 53 of the Constitution that the state takes care of the health of people expresses the constitutional principle that is also reflected from various aspects in other provisions of the Constitution (first of all, in those of the same paragraph, but also in those beyond that paragraph). All activity of the state related to the health of people must be based on the said principle.

The connections of the human right to the best possible health and the right to healthcare with other constitutional values

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 16 May 2013

The constitutional obligation of the state to take care of the health of people, inter alia, including the duty of the state to ensure medical aid and services in the event of sickness, is determined both by the innate human right to the best possible health (this right is inseparable from human dignity and the right to life) and by the social right to healthcare.

Human life and dignity are exceptional values expressing the integrity and singular essence of a human being (ruling of 9 December 1998). The state is under the constitutional obligation to protect and defend those values. The Constitutional Court has held that innate human rights are the innate possibilities of an individual that ensure his/her human dignity in the spheres of social life; the fact that the legislature, while regulating the relationships connected with the implementation of human rights and freedoms, must guarantee their proper protection constitutes one of the conditions for ensuring human dignity as a constitutional value (rulings of 29 December 2004 and 2 September 2009 and the decision of 20 April 2010). It is clear that human dignity, the right to life, and the right to the best possible health are so tightly interrelated that, on the one hand, in cases where proper health protection is not ensured, the protection of the human right to life and human dignity will no longer be a fully fledged one; on the other hand, the right to sustaining and saving life in the event that the life of a person is in danger is an inseparable and fundamental part of the human right to the best possible health. Therefore, in interpreting the provisions of Paragraph 1 of Article 53 of the Constitution, inter alia, account must be taken of their connections with Article 18 of the Constitution, wherein the principle of acknowledging the innate nature of human rights and freedoms is consolidated, and with the provisions of Articles 19 and 21 of the Constitution where the said provisions ensure the protection of the special constitutional values – human life and dignity.

In this context, it should be noted that the human right to the best possible health and the right to healthcare must also be interpreted in the light of the guarantees, consolidated in other provisions of the Constitution, for the protection of various constitutional values, inter alia, the inviolability of private life, including the inviolability of the health of a person, as ensured in Article 22 of the Constitution, the grounds (and the guarantees thereof) of the national economy as consolidated in Article 46 thereof, the right to have proper, safe, and healthy conditions at work as consolidated in Paragraph 1 of Article 48 thereof, as well as the duty of the state and each person to protect the environment from harmful influences as established in Paragraph 3 of Article 53 thereof.

The constitutional obligation of the state to take care of the health of people (Paragraph 1 of Article 53 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 16 May 2013

In order to implement the constitutional obligation of the state to take care of the health of people, inter alia, where the state must ensure medical aid and services for persons in the event of sickness, an efficient system of health protection and proper conditions for its activity must be created. The Constitutional Court has noted that the state has the duty to protect persons from threats to health (to reduce dangers to health and, in certain cases, as far as possible, to prevent them), to improve the ability of a person and society to overcome dangers to health, and to ensure access to medical services in the event of illness (ruling of 2 September 2009). Thus, the state must create the legal and organisational preconditions for the operation of the system of health protection that would ensure quality healthcare (not only the expressis verbis guaranteed medical aid and services for persons in the event of sickness, inter alia, medical aid to citizens free of charge at state medical establishments, but also other healthcare services for persons and society) accessible to everyone, as well as other health activity (as, for instance, pharmaceutical activity) that is necessary so that it would be possible to implement, in reality and efficiently, the innate human right to the best possible health.

While carrying out this constitutional function, the state institutions that form and implement state health policy must, among other things: take measures in order to satisfy the public need for a sufficient number of healthcare and pharmaceutical specialists of high professional qualification, inter alia, predict how many of them will be needed in the future and allocate the necessary state funds for their training; create the conditions in order that healthcare services would actually be accessible to everyone, i.e. in order that the necessary infrastructure would be created and that it would operate so that establishments (including the state-owned ones) providing various healthcare services and pharmacies could be distributed in a manner that would enable the timely rendering of efficient medical aid and other healthcare services; supervise health promotion activity, exercise control over the quality of healthcare services and medicines; create the healthcare funding system that would ensure the financial accessibility to (affordability of) necessary healthcare services and indispensable medicines.

Free-of-charge medical aid to citizens at state medical establishments (Paragraph 1 of Article 53 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 16 May 2013

Paragraph 1 of Article 53 of the Constitution consolidates the guarantee of medical aid to citizens free of charge at state medical establishments. This guarantee obligates the state to ensure the necessary conditions for its implementation, i.e. not only to create the required network of state healthcare establishments, but also to cover the costs of providing such medical aid by state funds. Thus, while implementing its discretion to form the state health policy and to choose a model of healthcare funding, the legislature may not disregard the fact that a certain part of healthcare services, in particular, free-of-charge medical aid guaranteed to citizens, must be covered by state budget funds.

The constitutional provision that the procedure for providing medical aid to citizens free of charge at state medical establishments must be established by law does not define expressis verbis the amount of the guaranteed aid, but in no way does it mean that, purportedly, all medical aid (let alone other healthcare services) provided to citizens in those establishments should be paid for from state budget funds unconditionally and without paying regard to the financial capacities of the state, since such an interpretation would violate a balance between the constitutional values, would disregard the duty of the Seimas, stemming from the constitutional imperatives of an open, just, harmonious civil society and responsible governance, when it approves the state budget, to take into account, inter alia, the existing economic and social situation, the needs and possibilities of society and the state, the available and predicted financial resources, as well as state obligations. Thus, having assessed, inter alia, the financial capacities of the state and paying regard to the balance between constitutional values and the constitutional principles of social harmony, responsible governance, reasonableness, the equality of the rights of persons, and other constitutional imperatives, the legislature must establish the amount of medical aid provided free of charge to citizens where such aid should be covered by state budget funds. However, in doing so, the legislature may not deny the substance of this constitutional guarantee and the state obligation to take care of the health of people. As mentioned before, in interpreting the provisions of Paragraph 1 of Article 53 of the Constitution, inter alia, account should be taken of their connection to the state duty to protect human life as consolidated in Article 19 of the Constitution; the right to sustaining and saving life in the event that the life of a person is in danger is an inseparable and fundamental part of the human right to the best possible health. This relation between the constitutional values implies the fact that medical aid free of charge for all citizens must be ensured insofar as it is necessary to save and preserve the life of a person. If a lower extent of such aid were established (by failing to ensure even the minimal vitally important free-of-charge medical aid), the constitutional guarantee for the said aid would in general become meaningless; at the same time, the constitutional obligations of the state to protect the life of a person and to take care of the health of people would also be violated. It needs to be emphasised that free-of-charge medical aid guaranteed to citizens must be in line with the requirements of accessibility and quality raised for healthcare services; the said aid must be given under such conditions and procedure in order that human dignity would be respected.

In this context, it also needs to be noted that the guarantee of free-of-charge medical aid to citizens in namely state medical establishments determines the duty of the state to ensure the provision of vitally important medical aid in state medical establishments, inter alia, the permanent operation of the required network of state healthcare establishments providing such aid; however, such a guarantee may not be interpreted as meaning that free-of-charge medical aid covered by state budget funds should be confined only to those establishments. The striving for ensuring the best possible accessibility to vitally important medical aid is also determined by the fact that, in the situations where, due to certain circumstances, such aid cannot be given in state medical establishments in a timely and quality manner, it may also be given in other healthcare establishments that are able to provide such aid in a quality and safe manner; the costs incurred by the latter establishments in the course of providing such aid must be covered by state budget funds.

Thus, the provision of Paragraph 1 of Article 53 of the Constitution, whereby the procedure for providing medical aid to citizens free of charge at state medical establishments is established by law, is a constitutional guarantee for the right of citizens to receive, in a timely manner, vitally important quality medical aid free of charge in state medical establishments; the implementation of the said guarantee must be ensured by state budget funding.

The aforementioned guarantee is not identical to the right to healthcare that is ensured, with regard to citizens as well as other persons, in the course of the implementation of the state obligation, consolidated in Paragraph 1 of Article 53 of the Constitution, to take care of the health of people and to guarantee medical aid and services for a person in the event of sickness.

It should be noted that the state may also assume greater financial obligations than implied by the constitutional guarantee of free-of-charge medical aid for citizens; however, as mentioned before, in such a case account must be taken of the state financial capacities, which are not and cannot be limitless, and regard must be paid to the constitutional imperatives of a balance of values, social harmony, responsible governance, and other constitutional imperatives. The state budget cannot bear the burden mismatched with the financial capacities of the state so that, due to the said burden, the state would be unable to perform its other functions or the fulfilment of such functions would be much more difficult.

The duty of the state to create a system of healthcare funding by public funds based on social solidarity (Paragraph 1 of Article 53 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 16 May 2013

While carrying out its constitutional function of taking care of the health of people, the state must ensure not only the funding of free-of-charge medical aid provided to citizens, but also the funding of other healthcare services. The state must, inter alia, guarantee that the healthcare services for individuals, where the said services are not covered by free-of-charge medical aid provided to citizens, would be accessible, according to the needs, to everyone – including the most socially sensitive groups of persons. Thus, the state must create such a system of funding the said services that would enable the accumulation of the funds necessary for paying for the provision of these services. Otherwise, if persons were required to pay (entire price) for such services, they would become unaffordable, thus, in reality, inaccessible. However, under the Constitution, it is not required that all those needs be funded from the state budget. The budget funds of the state as the organisation of all society that must act in the interests of all society in order that social harmony would be ensured must be allocated for carrying out various state functions and for providing various public services; therefore, the balance of constitutional values and social harmony would be violated if, without taking into consideration the financial capacities of the state, the state budget would have to bear such a healthcare funding burden due to which it would no longer be able to perform its other functions or the fulfilment of such functions would be much more difficult.

Thus, when it chooses a model of healthcare funding, the legislature is bound not only by its duty to provide, in the state budget, for the funds necessary to render free-of-charge medical aid to citizens, but also by other constitutional obligations of the state and its financial capacities. The legislature is not allowed to establish any such model of healthcare funding where it would not be based on a balanced assessment of the needs of both society and the state and the financial capacities of the state and where the implementation of such a model by the state would clearly and obviously be impossible; the establishment of such a model would violate the balance of constitutional values and would be in conflict with the constitutional imperatives of social harmony and responsible governance.

Consequently, if it is impossible to allocate the necessary state budget funds in order to ensure the sufficient accessibility, irrespective of the income of a person, to healthcare services for individuals not covered by free-of-charge medical aid guaranteed to citizens, the legislature, while implementing the obligation of the state to take care of the health of people and to guarantee medical aid and services for a person in the event of sickness, as consolidated in Paragraph 1 of Article 53 of the Constitution, not only may, but also must provide for another method, based on social solidarity, of the accumulation of the needed public funds, inter alia, may choose compulsory health insurance.

In addition, it needs to be noted that the state duty to create a system of healthcare funding from public funds based on social solidarity, where such a system would allow ensuring sufficient accessibility to healthcare, may not be interpreted as meaning that society should bear the burden of funding all possible healthcare services for persons. In this sphere, it is necessary to find decisions ensuring a balance between the interests of a person as a consumer of healthcare services (patient) and those of all society. The Constitutional Court has held on more than one occasion that the principle of solidarity in civil society does not deny personal responsibility for one's own fate; the recognition of mutual responsibility of a person and society is important in ensuring social harmony, guaranteeing freedom of a person and the possibility of protecting oneself from difficulties that could not be overcome by a person alone (rulings of 12 March 1997 and 26 September 2007, the decision of 20 April 2010, and the rulings of 6 February 2012 and 27 February 2012). The legal regulation governing funding the healthcare of persons should create incentives for everyone to take care of his/her health, to assume the obligation to contribute, as far as possible, to the health funding and to use healthcare services in a responsible and rational manner. Thus, under the Constitution, the legislature also has the powers to stipulate that certain healthcare services must be paid for from the resources of private funding, as, for instance, from voluntary health insurance funds, or by persons themselves paying directly, etc.

Compulsory health insurance as a source for financing healthcare

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 16 May 2013

Having chosen the model of healthcare funding based, inter alia, on compulsory health insurance, the legislature must define persons covered by this insurance, the amount (amounts) of the insurance contributions, the terms of payment, sanctions for failure to pay those contributions or for overdue payment thereof, possible concessions, the period of insurance validity, the powers of the institutions that maintain the said insurance, the healthcare services funded by insurance funds, the principles of the distribution of funds among healthcare establishments, and other substantial elements of this insurance. When it regulates the relationships of compulsory health insurance, the legislature is bound by the requirement, stemming from Paragraph 1 of Article 53 of the Constitution, for ensuring the accessibility, equal to all, to quality healthcare services, by the constitutional imperatives of solidarity, social harmony and justice, as well as by the constitutional principles of responsible governance, reasonableness, proportionality, and the equality of the rights of persons. This implies, among other things, that compulsory health insurance must be universal, i.e. it must cover all members of society, the amount of contributions must depend on the income of persons, this amount must be such that the preconditions could be created for the accumulation of the necessary funds ensuring the sufficient accessibility to quality healthcare services. It needs to be emphasised that, after the legislature chooses compulsory health insurance, the obligation to pay compulsory health insurance contributions, as established under the law, becomes a constitutional duty; as such, the said duty may not be treated as a limitation on the rights of a person.

In this context, it should also be noted that, while seeking to ensure the healthcare accessibility to all regardless of the income of persons, the legislature, inter alia, may place on the state the burden of the compulsory health insurance of the most socially sensitive groups of persons; however, this must be done in a responsible manner, by not distorting the essence of social solidarity, without denying the incentives of persons to take care of their health and their duty to contribute, as far as possible, to health funding; thus, this must be done in such a manner that social harmony and a balance between the interests and responsibility of a person and society would not be disturbed.

In the light of the constitutional principle of social solidarity, the period of the entry into validity of compulsory health insurance and the discontinuation thereof could depend, inter alia, on the length of the period during which the compulsory health insurance contributions of a person have been duly paid under the procedure established by means of a law. While regulating the relationships in connection with the period of the entry into the validity of compulsory health insurance and the discontinuation thereof, the legislature has a certain degree of discretion; however, in the course of implementing the said discretion it must comply, first of all, with the requirements stemming from the Constitution, inter alia, Paragraph 1 of Article 53 thereof, from the constitutional principles of justice, reasonableness, proportionality, and the equality of the rights of persons, as well as from the requirements of EU law and the international treaties of the Republic of Lithuania.

Having chosen compulsory health insurance as one of the sources of healthcare funding, the legislature must clearly define the scope of healthcare services for persons. This can be done by specifying the services provided to insured persons and covered by the funds of this insurance, or, conversely, by specifying those services the provision of which is not covered by insurance funds and which must be covered by private resources; if it is impossible to point this out precisely, sufficiently clear criteria must be established according to which this can be decided in every concrete situation.

It needs to be emphasised that, after the legislature chooses compulsory health insurance based on social solidarity, such insurance must ensure sufficient accessibility to healthcare services.

In addition, it also needs to be emphasised that, after the legislature has chosen the model of healthcare funding based, inter alia, on compulsory health insurance, the funds of this insurance may only be used for financing healthcare services for the insured persons that are not covered by free-of-charge medical aid that must be provided from state budget funds to all citizens regardless of whether they are insured by compulsory health insurance. It is not allowed to cover by the funds of compulsory health insurance healthcare services provided to persons not covered by such insurance or to those that have not obtained the said insurance themselves.

[...]

... citizens not insured by this insurance (or those that have not obtained such insurance themselves), as well as all other citizens, have the right, as guaranteed in Paragraph 1 of Article 53 of the Constitution, to medical aid free of charge at state medical establishments in the amount established by means of a law.

The regulation of the activity of healthcare establishments where this activity is understood as economic activity; the distribution of public funds among healthcare establishments (Article 46 and Paragraph 1 of Article 53 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 16 May 2013

Having chosen the model of healthcare funding based, inter alia, on compulsory health insurance, the legislature, while regulating the distribution of the funds of this insurance among healthcare establishments, must take into consideration the systemic ties of Paragraph 1 of Article 53 of the Constitution with Article 46 thereof that stands at the head of Chapter IV “The National Economy and Labour” and consolidates the constitutional foundations of the national economy.

The economy of Lithuania is based on the right of private ownership, freedom of individual economic activity, and economic initiative (Paragraph 1 of Article 46 of the Constitution). The Constitutional Court has held that among the rules for regulating the economy of this country is the obligation of the state to support the efforts and initiative that are useful to society and are based on private ownership (rulings of 27 October 1998 and 13 May 2005). While regulating economic activity so that it serves the general welfare of the nation, the state must balance the interests of a person and society and must not deny the principle of fair competition and other principles of the economy of Lithuania, which are consolidated in the Constitution (ruling of 17 March 2003).

The Constitutional Court has also held on more than one occasion that, as a rule, the regulation of economic activity is linked with laying down conditions for economic activity, with regulating certain procedures and controlling economic activity, as well as with certain limitations and prohibitions on this activity (inter alia, the rulings of 13 May 2005, 29 April 2009, 26 February 2010, and 29 June 2012). While taking account of the particularities of economic activity, the legislature may regulate economic activity in a differentiated manner; however, in doing so, it may not deny the foundations of the economy of Lithuania, which are consolidated in the Constitution (ruling of 17 March 2003).

The activity of healthcare establishments is related to implementing one of the most important innate human rights; therefore, such activity must be regulated and supervised by the state. According to the Constitution, the state must regulate the economic activity in this sphere so that, without denying the constitutional values on which the national economy is based – the private ownership rights as well as freedom of economic activity and initiative – it would ensure the appropriate fulfilment of its constitutional function of taking care of the health of people and the proper implementation of the innate human right to the best possible health and the right to healthcare.

As mentioned before, while carrying out this constitutional function, the state institutions that form and implement the state health policy have the duty to ensure the existence of an adequately distributed and continually operating sufficient network of establishments (including state medical establishments specified expressis verbis in Paragraph 1 of Article 53 of the Constitution) that provide various healthcare services. The state must also supervise the activities of all healthcare establishments and control the quality of services provided by them.

The specific nature of healthcare as a sphere of economic activity is determined by the fact that most of healthcare services are funded from public funds that can also be accumulated if the legislature chooses to establish compulsory health insurance. The state, which has the duty to create a system of healthcare funding from public funds based on social solidarity, must, under the Constitution, inter alia, the constitutional principle of responsible governance, also take care of the fact that those funds should be used in a responsible and rational manner. Because of the fact that, due to the increasing demand for healthcare services and their increasingly higher standards, due to the more complex and more expensive healthcare technologies, the costs of rendering those services are constantly increasing, while the funds, inter alia, the compulsory health insurance funds, allocated in order to cover such costs, are limited, the legislature is faced with the duty to establish such a legal regulation governing funding healthcare services by compulsory health insurance funds that would create the preconditions for the state for planning such funding and distributing the funds among the healthcare establishments in a manner that, without denying the obligation of the state to support the economic efforts and initiative that are useful to society and are based on private ownership, without denying fair competition between healthcare establishments, and without denying the right of the consumer of healthcare services (patient) to choose a healthcare establishment, it would be possible to ensure high quality of healthcare services funded by those funds and sufficient accessibility to the said services, i.e. their adequate distribution, as well as the continual operation of the required network of state healthcare establishments.

Thus, while being bound by the duty to ensure the rational distribution of the limited funds of compulsory health insurance among the establishments that provide healthcare services, the legislature may lay down the conditions for and limitations on funding such services, inter alia, such a procedure for the distribution of those funds, according to which they would be allocated to cover the costs of the healthcare services provided only by those institutions that have, under the conditions established in the law, concluded an agreement with an institution authorised by the state regarding the provision of services funded from compulsory health insurance funds. The procedure for concluding such agreements should be based on the objective and non-discriminatory criteria, known in advance, that would not deny freedom of fair competition and other principles of the economy of Lithuania consolidated in the Constitution. These principles must also be respected when regulating other aspects of financing healthcare services funded by compulsory health insurance funds, as, for instance, when economically justified rates for healthcare services are established. At the same time, it needs to be noted that the legal regulation governing funding healthcare services from compulsory health insurance funds should induce not only fair competition between healthcare establishments, but also their joint work in order to ensure the continuity of healthcare, high quality services, as well as the rational and efficient use of resources.

2.4.2.3. The right to a healthy environment

The protection of the natural environment (Article 54 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 13 May 2005

Article 54 of the Constitution lays down the constitutional foundations for the legal regulation governing the relationships connected with using and protecting the natural environment and its individual objects.

Article 54 of the Constitution prescribes:

“The State shall take care of the protection of the natural environment, wildlife and plants, individual objects of nature, and areas of particular value, and shall supervise the sustainable use of natural resources, as well as their restoration and increase.

The destruction of land and subsurface, the pollution of water and air, radioactive impact on the environment, as well as the depletion of wildlife and plants, shall be prohibited by law.”

The Constitution treats the natural environment, wildlife and plants, individual objects of nature, and areas of particular value as national values of universal importance. Protecting the natural environment, wildlife and plants, individual objects of nature, and areas of particular value and ensuring the sustainable use of natural resources, as well as their restoration and increase, as consolidated in Article 54 of the Constitution, constitute a public interest to guarantee which is a constitutional obligation of the state. In its ruling of 6 May 1997, the Constitutional Court held that the implementation of the public interest, which is recognised by the state and is protected by law, is one of the most important conditions for the existence and evolution of society itself.

Article 54 of the Constitution gives rise to the obligation of the state to establish such a legal regulation and to act in such a way that the natural environment and its individual objects would be protected, and that the rational use of natural resources as well as their restoration and increase would be ensured. For this purpose, a particular system of state institutions must be created and must function properly, and necessary funds must be provided for in the state budget in order to protect the natural environment and its individual objects, and to ensure the rational use of natural resources as well as their restoration and increase.

Article 54 of the Constitution gives rise to the following duties of all persons in the territory of the Republic of Lithuania: they must refrain from any action that would inflict damage on land, the subsurface, water, air, plants, or wildlife. The legislature must prohibit any actions that inflict damage on the natural environment and its objects, and must establish legal responsibility for such actions. Such prohibitions and legal responsibility for disregarding them must be established only by means of a law, whereas the procedure of implementing these prohibitions may also be regulated in statutory legal acts.

The state, being under the constitutional obligation to act in order that the protection of the natural environment and its individual objects, the rational use of natural resources, as well as their restoration and increase, would be ensured, may establish, by means of a law, such a legal regulation whereby the use of individual objects (natural resources) of the natural environment would be limited and certain subjects of legal relationships would be obliged to act accordingly or refrain from certain actions.

While protecting the natural environment and its individual objects and ensuring the rational use of natural resources, as well as their restoration and increase, the state must also guarantee the balance of values consolidated in the Constitution.

When regulating the relationships in connection with the protection of the natural environment and its individual objects, the use of natural resources, as well as their restoration and increase, when restricting the use of individual objects (natural resources) of the natural environment, or when obligating certain subjects of legal relationships to act in the respective manner or to refrain from certain actions, the state is bound by the imperative of social harmony, the principles of justice, reasonableness, and proportionality, which are consolidated in the Constitution, inter alia, when such restrictions or obligations create interference with the implementation of the constitutional rights and freedoms of a person.

Article 54 of the Constitution names as national values of universal importance various objects of the natural environment: wildlife, plants, land, the subsurface, waters, air, and areas of particular value.

The protection and rational use of wildlife (Article 54 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 13 May 2005

... the conclusion should be drawn from the provision "The State shall take care of the protection of ... wildlife ... and shall supervise the sustainable use of natural resources, as well as their restoration and increase" of Paragraph 1 of Article 54 and from the provision "the depletion of wildlife ... shall be prohibited by law" of Paragraph 2 of Article 54 of the Constitution that animals, including wildlife (its resources), is among the natural resources that, under the Constitution, must be protected and whose rational use, restoration, and increase must be ensured.

Wildlife, which is very important for the normal functioning and survival of various ecologic systems, is part of the natural environment. Wildlife is a distinctive aesthetic, scientific, cultural, recreational, and economic value of the natural heritage of society and the entire humankind. Due to this, wildlife is not only a national value: it also has universal and transnational importance. There is no doubt that it is necessary to preserve it and pass it on to posterity.

Wildlife is a notably broad and general notion including all kinds of undomesticated animals. The particularity of wildlife as a value protected and defended under the Constitution also constitutes the fact that it is very dynamic, that wild animals that exist in freedom often change the place of their presence; therefore, it is impossible to manage wildlife as a whole or possess it (as an object).

However, Article 54 of the Constitution gives rise to the obligation of the state to ensure that the populations (species) of wild animals are properly managed (regulated and controlled) in order that the protection and rational use of wildlife as a national value of universal importance is ensured. If the populations (species) of wild animals were not managed (i.e. not regulated and not controlled), or were managed improperly, other objects of the natural environment as well as certain kinds of wild animals themselves and various ecological systems could be harmed. If the proper management (i.e. regulation and control) of the populations (species) of wild animals were not ensured, the preconditions would be created for violating the values (life, health, property, etc.) consolidated in and protected and defended by the Constitution; thus, the preconditions would also be created for violating the rights and interests of persons.

In this context, it should be held that, under Article 54 of the Constitution, the state (its institutions that create law) may and, in certain cases, by taking account of various circumstances, must establish a legal regulation making it possible to properly and effectively manage (i.e. to regulate and control) the populations (species) of wild animals (size, spreading, migration, etc. of populations) in order to ensure the protection of wildlife, its rational use, restoration, and increase and to ensure that no preconditions are created for impoverishing wildlife – a national value of universal importance. While regulating the relationships connected with the management (i.e. regulation and control) of the populations (species) of animals by means of legal acts, the state must comply with the requirements for humane treatment of animals and must not tolerate any cruel and inhumane treatment of animals by other persons.

The state (its institutions) may choose various ways and means of the proper management of the populations (species) of wild animals. On the other hand, while paying regard to the imperative of social harmony and the principles of justice, reasonableness, and proportionality, which are consolidated in the Constitution, the state (its institutions) cannot choose the ways and means of the management (i.e. regulation and control) of the populations (species) of wild animals that could unreasonably restrict or in general deny the rights and legitimate interests of persons or social groups and could violate their legitimate expectations.

[...]

... The state must regulate economic activity so that, without denying the foundations of the national economy – the right of private ownership and individual freedom of economic activity and initiative – it would also ensure the public interest consolidated in Article 54 of the Constitution – the protection of the natural environment, wildlife and plants, individual objects of nature, areas of particular value, as well as the sustainable use of natural resources, their restoration and increase; the state is under the constitutional obligation to guarantee the said public interest.

Hunting as a way of the management of wild animal populations; the right of hunting as an acquired right

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 13 May 2005

... one of the ways of the management (i.e. regulation and control) of the populations (species) of wild animals is hunting – a long-standing tradition of human activity and a social institution. At the same time, it needs to be noted that hunting is applied together with other ways of the management (i.e. regulation and control) of the populations (species) of wild animals where the said ways are of no less importance and also have strong traditions. Hunting and other types of human activity may not be opposed. A reasonable and fair balance must be found between the rights and legitimate interests of persons engaged in hunting and the rights and legitimate interests of other persons.

As a type of human activity and a social institution, hunting is a diverse phenomenon, including: (1) the management (i.e. regulation and control) of the populations (species) of wild animals; (2) pastime activity; (3) economic activity. The said three aspects of hunting are interrelated.

First, as mentioned before, hunting is one of the ways of the management (i.e. regulation and control) of the populations (species) of wild animals, thus, also one of the means of the protection and rational use of wild animals. If compared with other ways of the management (i.e. regulation and control) of the populations (species) of wild animals, the specific characteristic of hunting is, inter alia, determined by the fact that, traditionally, private persons – hunters, who, as a rule (but not necessarily), form certain hunting associations (hunting circles, societies, or other organisations) – are entrusted with the exercise of such control over the populations (species) of animals. However, hunting could also be planned and arranged not exclusively through private persons – hunters – or not exclusively through them alone. No matter on what organisational principles hunting and related relationships are based, under the Constitution, the state cannot opt out of the control and supervision of hunting activity.

Second, as a rule, hunting is a pastime activity for hunters (private persons). Hunting as a pastime activity is linked with the implementation of an acquired right: only such persons can engage in this activity who have acquired the right of hunting. It needs to be emphasised that the right of hunting is not a constitutional right: it arises from lower-ranking legal acts and must be implemented as provided for in legal acts. This right is defended as an acquired right.

Third, hunting is a certain type of economic activity or, more precisely, a constituent part of broader economic activity. It should be noted in this connection that, on the one hand, professional hunting as a source of income of a person is possible; on the other hand, the economic activity of a person can also include the planning and arrangement of hunting.

As mentioned before, the right of hunting is an acquired right. The Constitution does not employ the notion of hunting. Hunting and related relationships are regulated in laws and substatutory acts.

In choosing a model of planning and arrangement of hunting, thus, that of hunting and related relationships, and establishing it in legal acts, the state has broad discretion. While implementing this discretion, the state (law-making subjects according to their competence) may establish the procedure for forming hunting grounds, their sizes, the manner of hunting, the time and other conditions of hunting, it may specify wild animals whose hunting is permitted or prohibited, etc. When regulating these relationships, the state must create the preconditions for ensuring the rational use of huntable wild animals and their protection, by taking account of, inter alia, the amount of these resources and the need for regulating their size. In doing so, law-making subjects are bound by the constitutional imperative of social harmony, the principles of justice, reasonableness, and proportionality, which are consolidated in the Constitution, as well as by other norms and principles of the Constitution.

It needs to be noted that in the course of the management (i.e. regulation and control) of populations (species) of wild animals, hunting is applied together with other ways of the management (i.e. regulation and control) of the populations (species) of wild animals. Thus, hunting and other types of human activity may not be opposed; in addition, it is not allowed to create opposition between the rights and legitimate interests of the members of society who are engaged in or otherwise related to hunting and the rights and legitimate interests of other members of society. ... the Constitution gives rise to the obligation for the state, when the state regulates hunting and related relationships, to keep a fair balance between the interests of society and a person, to ensure the public interest, and to avoid any unreasonable limitation on the rights of a person.

Wildlife is also a specific constituent part of the natural environment in the sense that the living environment of wild animals is, inter alia, plots of land, forests, and water bodies that, in their turn (with no links to the wild animals that exist in/on them), can be a matter of various legal relationships. ... it needs to be noted that the plots of land, forests, or water bodies that constitute the living surroundings of wild animals may belong to various persons by right of ownership, inter alia, to those who own such plots of land, forests, or water bodies.

In addition, as mentioned before, the management (i.e. regulation and control) of the populations (species) of wild animals, where hunting is a type of such management, may also be linked with economic activity; hunting can be a certain type of economic activity or, more precisely, a constituent part of broader economic activity.

Thus, when regulating hunting and related relationships, regard must be paid, inter alia, to the provisions of Paragraphs 1 and 2 of Article 23 of the Constitution concerning the inviolability and protection of property and the provisions of Paragraph 1 of Article 46 concerning the values constituting the basis of the national economy – the right of private ownership, individual economic freedom and initiative ...

[...]

As mentioned before, hunting is a certain type of economic activity or, more precisely, a constituent part of broader economic activity of a person. In order to ensure the public interest – the protection and rational use, as well as the restoration and increase of wildlife (its resources) – the state, when regulating hunting as economic activity, may establish specific conditions of economic activity by means of a law, inter alia, the sizes of hunting grounds; they are established after taking account of, inter alia, the size of the resources of huntable animals and the need for regulating their number. In doing so, the constitutional principle of proportionality must be applied and the ownership rights of owners of private plots of land, forests, and water bodies, as well as freedom and initiative of their economic activity, must not be denied.

The obligation of the state to ensure the rational use and protection of land as a limited natural resource (Article 54 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 30 March 2006

Land is an important part of the ecosystem, it determines the existence and change of other natural resources (inter alia, water bodies, plants, and wildlife). Land is also a special natural resource because it cannot be replaced by something else; it cannot be newly created or increased otherwise. Thus, land is a limited resource.

The proper use of land as a limited resource is a condition for the survival of human beings and society as well as the basis of the welfare of the nation; ensuring the rational use of land as a natural resource is a public interest; the state is under the constitutional obligation to guarantee such an interest (rulings of 13 May 2005 and 14 March 2006). The duty of the state is to ensure that land should be used rationally and be protected. The said duty arises, inter alia, from the provisions of Article 54 of the Constitution, whereby the state takes care of the protection of the natural environment, wildlife and plants, individual objects of nature, and areas of particular value, and supervises the sustainable use of natural resources, as well as their restoration and increase (Paragraph 1) and, inter alia, the destruction of land and subsurface, the pollution of water as well as the depletion of wildlife and plants, are prohibited by law (Paragraph 2). The aforementioned duty also arises from the constitutional imperative of social harmony and other provisions of the Constitution. It needs to be noted that the rational use of land is inseparable from its protection, inter alia, from the preservation of rich soil and the landscape, from the protection of land from contamination, improper use, and other negative factors, as well as from ensuring freedom of agricultural business.

The protection of areas of particular value (Article 54 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 5 July 2007

Land, forests, parks, and water bodies are special objects of the right of ownership, since the proper use and protection of land, forests, parks, and water bodies is a condition for the survival and development of human beings and society, and the basis of the welfare of the nation. Under the Constitution, the natural environment, wildlife and plants, individual objects of nature, and areas of particular value are national values of universal importance; protecting such values and ensuring their rational use and increase are a public interest; the state is under the constitutional obligation to guarantee such an interest (rulings of 13 May 2005 and 14 March 2006).

Article 54 of the Constitution provides that the state takes care of the protection of the natural environment, wildlife and plants, individual objects of nature, and areas of particular value, and supervises the sustainable use of natural resources, as well as their restoration and increase (Paragraph 1) and that the destruction of land and subsurface, the pollution of water and air, radioactive impact on the environment, as well as the depletion of wildlife and plants, are prohibited by law (Paragraph 2). It also needs to be mentioned that, under Paragraph 3 of Article 53 of the Constitution, the state and each person must protect the environment from harmful influences.

The general notion “areas of particular value” of Paragraph 1 of Article 54 of the Constitution implies that certain parts (areas) of the territory of Lithuania which, due to their ecological, cultural, historical, scientific and other significance, differ from other parts (areas) of the territory of Lithuania, provided this is constitutionally justifiable, not only may, but also must be categorised as areas of particular value. Under the Constitution, the legislature has the powers and discretion to decide which areas should be categorised as areas of particular value; however, the categorisation of concrete areas as areas of particular value must be reasoned. Individual areas may be categorised as areas of particular value according to the criteria established in legal acts (taking account of their ecological, cultural, historical, scientific, and other value, etc.).

In the context of the notion “areas of particular value”, as a general notion, of Paragraph 1 of Article 54 of the Constitution, it needs to be mentioned that the Constitution does not prevent the usage of the words or formulas in laws and other legal acts that are different from those used in the text of the Constitution Thus, the areas of particular values mentioned in Article 54 of the Constitution may be named in laws differently, provided that, due to this, the content of the constitutional notion “areas of particular value” is not distorted or denied.

[...]

Since the legislature has the powers to categorise certain areas as areas of particular value, when taking account of a special imperishable value of the objects of nature that are in the territories of special value, their significance and the necessity to preserve them for posterity, the constitutional duty that falls on the state to take care of the preservation of the areas of particular value and the rational use thereof, it also has the powers to establish a special regime of the protection and use of such areas. It was held in the Constitutional Court’s ruling of 14 March 2006 that such a special legal regime implies, inter alia, certain conditions of, and limitations and prohibitions on, the economic and other activity in these areas, where, as a result of such actions, the landscape and the individual objects that are in particular areas can be changed, etc.

Under the Constitution, the state also has the duty to take care of such natural objects of state significance which belong by right of ownership to other persons, but not to the state, and to secure their protection. This duty of the state may not be interpreted as releasing the owners of particular natural objects from the duty to contribute themselves to the preservation of the said natural objects and to observe the legal regime established with regard to those natural objects.

Thus, due to the fact that, in the areas of particular value, natural and other objects can belong by right of ownership to very varied subjects – the state, municipalities, as well as legal and natural persons – the discussed limitations and prohibitions may be imposed not only on the state and municipalities, but also on natural and legal persons. In order to ensure the protection of the areas of particular value, it is allowed to interfere by such limitations and prohibitions with the rights of ownership of all owners, including those of private land plots, forests, parks, or water bodies. All said limitations and prohibitions must be constitutionally justifiable, they must not restrict the rights of the owners and other persons more than it is necessary to achieve the universally important objectives (ruling of 14 March 2006).

The right to a healthy environment

The Constitutional Court’s ruling of 2 September 2009

... the right of a person to a healthy environment is a necessary condition for both dignified life and the exercise of many other constitutional rights.

Requirements for the legal regulation governing construction relationships (Article 54 and Paragraph 1 of Article 109 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court’s ruling of 31 January 2011

... the legislature must establish such a legal regulation of construction relationships that would ensure the public interest protected under the Constitution, inter alia, the protection of the natural environment, the individual objects of nature, protected territories, and the protection of the areas of particular value, as well as the proper and rational use of land, forests, and water bodies. The public interest protected under the Constitution to properly and rationally use land, forests, and water bodies implies the duty of the legislature to establish, in the course of regulating construction relationships by means of a law, such a legal regulation that would ensure the sustainable development of a particular territory, the formation of a healthy environment for living, as well as proper conditions for developing both the infrastructure of residential areas and other spheres of activity.

[...]

While interpreting the provisions, which originate from the Constitution, whereby ownership includes obligations and the right of ownership is not absolute, in conjunction with Article 54 of the Constitution, the Constitutional Court has held that all owners, possessors, and users of plots of land, forests, or water bodies, must pay regard to the constitutional imperative of the protection of the natural environment, must protect the natural environment, must not deteriorate its state, and must not inflict harm on the natural environment (rulings of 14 March 2006 and 22 June 2009).

... the legislature, while seeking to ensure the public interest defended under the Constitution, inter alia, the protection of the natural environment, the individual objects of nature, protected territories, and the areas of value, as well as the proper and rational use of land, forests, and water bodies, may provide for different measures aimed at removing the consequences of the construction that violates the requirements of legal acts. Such measures may, inter alia, include the obligation to demolish a structure that is being built (or has been built) or to properly restructure it (to demolish part of the structure, to rebuild it, etc.). When establishing the said measures, consideration must be given to the principle of proportionality. According to this principle, measures provided for in laws must be in line with the pursued objectives that are essential to society and constitutionally justifiable. These measures must be necessary in order to protect the rights and freedoms of other persons, the values consolidated in the Constitution, and/or constitutionally important objectives.

The Constitution, inter alia, Paragraph 1 of Article 109 thereof, and the constitutional principles of justice and a state under the rule of law give rise to the duty of the legislature, when it regulates the relationships connected with the removal of the consequences of the construction that violates the requirements of legal acts, to establish the criteria under which and/or the situations where a court that decides on the legal consequences of the construction that violates the requirements of legal acts, after assessing all circumstances of the case and while following the principles of justice, reasonableness and proportionality, would have the possibility of choosing a proper measure for the removal of the consequences of the construction that violates the requirements of legal acts.

The right to a healthy and clean environment; the duty to preserve nature and to compensate for any harm inflicted on the natural environment; the obligation of the state to ensure the protection of both the natural environment and areas of particular value (Paragraph 3 of Article 53 and Article 54 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 16 December 2015

Paragraph 3 of Article 53 of the Constitution provides that the state and each person must protect the environment from harmful influences. Under Article 54 of the Constitution, the state takes care of the protection of the natural environment, wildlife and plants, individual objects of nature, and areas of particular value, and supervises the sustainable use of natural resources, as well as their restoration and increase (Paragraph 1); the destruction of land and subsurface, the pollution of water and air, radioactive impact on the environment, as well as the depletion of wildlife and plants, are prohibited by law (Paragraph 2).

When interpreting the provisions of the Constitution consolidating the constitutional foundations of environmental protection, the Constitutional Court has noted that:

– these provisions express one of the objectives of the activities of the state, i.e. to ensure the rights of people to a healthy and clean environment; environmental protection is the concern and obligation of the state and every resident, and both public and private interests must be devoted to improve the quality of the environment (rulings of 1 June 1998, 31 January 2011, and 9 May 2014); these provisions give rise to the duty of all persons to preserve nature and to compensate for any harm (losses) inflicted by them on the natural environment (rulings of 29 October 2003 and 9 May 2014);

– under the Constitution, the natural environment, wildlife and plants, individual objects of nature, and areas of particular value are national values of universal importance; protecting such values and ensuring their rational use and increase are a public interest; the state is under the constitutional obligation to guarantee such an interest (rulings of 13 May 2005 and 14 March 2006);

– all persons in the territory of the Republic of Lithuania must refrain from any action that would inflict damage on land, the subsurface, water, air, plants, or wildlife; the legislature must prohibit any actions that inflict damage on the natural environment and its objects, and must establish legal responsibility for such actions; while such prohibitions and legal responsibility for disregarding them must be established only by means of a law, the procedure of implementing these prohibitions may also be regulated in statutory legal acts (ruling of 13 May 2005);

– the state, being under the constitutional obligation to act so that the protection of the natural environment and its individual objects, the rational use of natural resources, their restoration and increase would be ensured, may establish, by means of a law, such a legal regulation under which the use of individual objects (natural resources) of the natural environment would be limited and certain subjects of legal relationships would be obliged to act accordingly or refrain from certain actions; in doing so, the state is bound by the constitutional imperative of social harmony, and by the principles of justice, reasonableness and proportionality, which are consolidated in the Constitution (rulings of 13 May 2005 and 14 March 2006).

Regulating economic activity in order to ensure the protection of the natural environment and human health (Paragraph 3 of Article 46, Paragraphs 1 and 3 of Article 53, and Article 54 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 16 December 2015

When interpreting the provisions of Paragraph 3 of Article 53 and Article 54 of the Constitution in conjunction with both Paragraph 3 of Article 46 thereof, according to which the state regulates economic activity so that it serves the general welfare of the nation, and the provision of Paragraph 1 of Article 53 thereof, whereby the state takes care of the health of people, the Constitutional Court has noted in its jurisprudence that:

– in order to ensure the protection and rational use of both natural environment and individual objects of nature, their restoration and increase, and while regulating economic activity, the state may establish the specific conditions and procedures of, and means of control over economic activity, as well as certain limitations or prohibitions on the economic activity related to the use of certain natural resources (rulings of 13 May 2005 and 14 March 2006);

– when the legislature regulates economic activity, it faces the requirement stemming from the Constitution, inter alia, Paragraph 3 of Article 46, Paragraphs 1 and 3 of Article 53, and Article 54 thereof, to establish such limitations on this activity that would aim to ensure the general welfare of the nation, inter alia, to protect against harmful impacts on human health and the environment, to use natural resources in a rational manner, and to remedy the damage caused to the natural environment (ruling of 9 May 2014).

In this context, it should also be noted that the duty of the state consolidated in Paragraph 3 of Article 46 of the Constitution to regulate, by taking account of the resources of the state, its material and financial possibilities and other important factors, the economic activity so that it would serve the general welfare of the nation implies the requirement for the legislature, when it regulates such activity, to balance different constitutional values, inter alia, those protected under Articles 46, 53, and 54 of the Constitution: freedom of individual economic activity and economic initiative, freedom of fair competition, the protection of the interests of consumers, the protection of human health and environment (rulings of 5 March 2015, 3 April 2015, and 29 October 2015).

The duty of the state, when regulating economic and other activity related to the use of the subsurface, to ensure the protection of the subsurface and other objects of the natural environment (land, water, air, plants, wildlife) and human health, as well as the rational use of natural resources (Paragraph 3 of Article 46, Paragraphs 1 and 3 of Article 53, and Article 54 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 16 December 2015

The subsurface is among the objects of natural environment directly mentioned in Article 54 of the Constitution; thus, the state is under the constitutional obligation to ensure the protection and rational use of the subsurface.

In this context, it should be mentioned that, under Paragraph 1 of Article 47 (wording of 23 January 2003) of the Constitution, the subsurface belongs by right of exclusive ownership to the Republic of Lithuania. The subsurface is a special object of the natural environment, it belongs by right of exclusive ownership to the state and may never become the property of anyone else. The fact that the subsurface is under the exclusive ownership of the state provides the constitutional ground for establishing a special and specific legal regime of the protection and exploitation of the subsurface compared with other objects of nature.

Thus, the constitutional obligation of the state to ensure the proper protection and rational use of the subsurface as a national value of universal importance that belongs to the state by right of exclusive ownership implies a special legal regulation of the protection and use of the subsurface, inter alia, the special conditions, as well as limitations and prohibitions, of the economic and other activity related to the use of the subsurface.

As mentioned before, the duty, consolidated in Paragraph 3 of Article 46 of the Constitution, for the state to regulate economic activity so that it serves the general welfare of the nation implies the requirement that the legislature, when it regulates such activity, should balance different constitutional values, inter alia, those protected under Articles 46, 53, and 54 of the Constitution: freedom of individual economic activity and economic initiative, freedom of fair competition, the protection of consumer interests, and the protection of human health and the environment.

In the context of the constitutional justice case at issue, it should be noted that, in regulating the economic activity related to the use of the subsurface, account should be taken, inter alia, of the economic interests of the state, inter alia, the necessity to ensure the security and reliability of the energy system as a constitutionally important objective and a public interest. Under the Constitution, inter alia, Paragraph 3 of Article 46 thereof, when regulating the economic activity in the sphere of energy so that it serves the general welfare of the nation, the legislature is obliged to establish such a legal regulation that would ensure the security, stability, and reliability of the energy system, inter alia, the possibility of receiving energy supplies from multiple sources (rulings of 3 April 2015 and 29 October 2015). Thus, under the Constitution, in an attempt to ensure, among other things, the security and reliability of the energy system, inter alia, the possibility of receiving energy resources from various sources, the legal regulation governing the economic activity related to the use of the subsurface should be established whereby the conditions could be created for appropriate exploration of the subsurface and for rational use of the resources thereof.

At the same time, it needs to be emphasised that, under the Constitution, inter alia, under the provisions of Paragraph 3 of Article 46, Paragraphs 1 and 3 of Article 53, and Article 54 thereof, while regulating the economic or other activity related to the exploitation of the subsurface, the state must ensure the protection of the subsurface, other objects of the natural environment (land, water, air, wildlife, plants), and human health against harmful impacts, must prevent the destruction and pollution of the environment, must prevent both radioactive impact on the environment and the depletion of wildlife and plants, and must ensure the rational use of natural resources.

The economic or other activity related to the use of the subsurface may pose a threat to the environment and human health; therefore, according to the provisions of Paragraph 3 of Article 46, Paragraphs 1 and 3 of Article 53 and Article 54 of the Constitution, when implementing its discretion to form the state economic policy, inter alia, the policy of using the subsurface, the legislature must regulate this activity so that different constitutional values might be balanced and, in an effort to ensure the state economic interests, inter alia, the security and reliability of the energy system, must at the same time create the necessary legal preconditions for protecting the environment and human health against any possible harmful impact caused by such activity, and prevent the emergence of any possible damage on the environment and human health. In addition, the legislature has the powers to ban completely a certain activity related to the subsurface, as, for instance, the use of subsurface specific resources or the application of a certain method (technology) of the exploration and/or extraction of such resources.

In the context of this case, it should be noted that, under the Constitution, inter alia, the provisions of Paragraph 3 of Article 46, Paragraphs 1 and 3 of Article 53, and Article 54 thereof, such a legal regulation of economic activity is also possible, which is established by the legislature and is designed for ensuring the general welfare of the nation, as well as related to using the subsurface, whereby it is allowed to apply the ways (technologies) of researching the subsurface and extracting its resources where such ways (technologies) might pose a threat to the environment or human health. At the same time, it needs to be emphasised that the legislature, when regulating the possibility of applying such methods (technologies) for exploring and/or extracting subsurface resources, must also establish effective measures that could create preconditions for the proper protection of the environment or human health and would not allow any such economic activity by which inevitable harm could be inflicted on the environment or human health. The said measures must ensure, among other things, that the economic activity related to the exploitation of the subsurface is assessed in terms of its possible impact on the environment, also that this economic activity is subject to the conditions aimed at protecting the environment and human health, as well as that an effective supervision is carried out over such activity (inter alia, its compliance with the technological requirements).

[...]

... if it transpired that the measures for protecting human health and the environment, as established in laws, were not effective enough, the Constitution, inter alia, the provisions of Paragraph 3 of Article 46, Paragraphs 1 and 3 of Article 53, and Article 54 thereof, would give rise to the duty of legislature to establish additional measures for the protection of human health and the environment, and, should it prove impossible to do so, the legislature would have to prohibit conducting certain activity related to the subsurface, as, for instance, using certain subsurface resources or applying a certain method (technology) for exploring or extracting such resources.

The protection of the natural environment; the legal regulation of forestry management in order to ensure the protection of forests (Article 54 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 16 April 2019

... under Article 54 of the Constitution, the state takes care of the protection of the natural environment, wildlife and plants, individual objects of nature, and areas of particular value, and supervises the sustainable use of natural resources, as well as their restoration and increase (Paragraph 1); the destruction of land and subsurface, the pollution of water and air, radioactive impact on the environment, as well as the depletion of wildlife and plants, shall be prohibited by law (Paragraph 2).

The Constitutional Court has noted that land, forests, parks, and water bodies are special objects of the right of ownership, since the proper use and protection of land, forests, parks, and water bodies is a condition for the existence of human beings, the survival and development of human beings and society, and the basis of the welfare of the people; under the Constitution, the natural environment, wildlife and plants, individual objects of nature, and areas of particular value are national values of universal importance; protecting such values and ensuring their rational use and increase is a public interest; the state is under the constitutional obligation to guarantee such an interest (rulings of 14 March 2006 and 5 July 2007).

[...]

... the Constitution, inter alia, Articles 46 and 54 and Paragraph 2 of Article 128 thereof, and the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law give rise to the duty of the legislature to establish, by means of a law, the essential conditions for forestry management; the legislature must establish a clear and reasoned model of forestry management, inter alia, the respective subjects responsible for the management of forests belonging to the state by right of ownership, or the criteria for determining such subjects. It should also be noted that, while establishing the legal regulation governing forestry management, the legislature must observe, inter alia, the duty of the state, which stems from Paragraph 3 of Article 46 of the Constitution, to regulate economic activity so that it serves the general welfare of the people and, at the same time, the legislature must implement the requirements, which stem from Article 54 and Paragraph 2 of Article 128 of the Constitution, inter alia, to ensure the proper protection of forests, as well as the rational management and use of forests as state-owned property.

The legal regulation of hunting and related relationships

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 11 July 2019

... under the Constitution, inter alia, Article 54 thereof, seeking to ensure the public interest of the protection and rational use of wildlife resources, as well as their restoration and increase, the legislature may exercise its broad discretion to regulate hunting and related relationships by establishing also such a legal regulation under which hunting in the particular hunting grounds would be permitted exclusively upon obtaining, under the procedure and conditions provided for in the law, a permit to use wildlife resources in these hunting grounds. ... in order to ensure the said public interest, the legislature may establish, by means of a law, such a legal regulation according to which the users of hunting grounds may also include associations uniting persons who meet the requirements laid down in legal acts and have acquired the right to hunt.

... under the Constitution, inter alia, Articles 23 and 54 thereof, having chosen to regulate hunting and related relationships in such a way that allows hunting in the particular hunting grounds exclusively upon obtaining the respective permit under the procedure and conditions provided for in the law, the legislature must, by means of a legal regulation, create the preconditions for reconciling, on the one hand, the interests of an owner of a private land plot of a certain size if this land plot is located in hunting grounds and this owner is not a user of these hunting grounds but wishes to exercise the acquired right to hunt in the land plot under the ownership of this owner and, on the other hand, the interests of the respective user of hunting grounds, inter alia, an association uniting persons who meet the requirements laid down in legal acts and have acquired the right to hunt. Such a legal regulation must pay regard to the Constitution, inter alia, freedom of association, consolidated in Article 35 thereof.

The duty of the state to ensure the special protection of the Curonian Spit as a public interest protected by the Constitution (Paragraph 2 of Article 42 and Paragraph 1 of Article 54 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 25 November 2019

... in view of the enduring value of the Curonian Spit for the present and future generations, as it is a unique natural and human-made landscape complex, which is part of the national and world natural, historical, and cultural heritage, in accordance with Paragraph 2 of Article 42 and Paragraph 1 of Article 54 of the Constitution, the Curonian Spit is a particularly valuable area to be protected and a natural and cultural heritage site of global significance; the state is under the constitutional obligation to ensure that the part of the Curonian Spit that belongs to the Republic of Lithuania is under special protection as a public interest protected by the Constitution.

This, inter alia, means that, under the Constitution, inter alia, Paragraph 2 of Article 42 and Paragraph 1 of Article 54 thereof, the state must preserve the identity and integrity of the Curonian Spit, as a particularly valuable area and a natural and cultural heritage site of global significance, inter alia, its valuable features, among other things, unique landscape, cultural, natural, and historical heritage, unique architectural objects, and archaeological sites. The fulfilment of this constitutional duty requires that legal acts provide for a special regime for the protection and use of the Curonian Spit, which, inter alia, implies, the means of protecting natural and cultural objects in this area, as well as the special conditions, limitations, and prohibitions on economic activities, construction, and any other activities that can change the landscape or individual objects in this area.

It should be noted that, in implementing the powers, consolidated in Article 94 of the Constitution, inter alia, to manage national affairs, execute laws and the resolutions of the Seimas on the implementation of laws, and to perform other duties prescribed to the Government by the Constitution and other laws, the Government must establish the measures for implementing the special regime for the protection and use of the Curonian Spit. Otherwise, no preconditions would be created for the effective fulfilment of the duty of the state, stemming from the Constitution, inter alia, Paragraph 2 of Article 42 and Paragraph 1 of Article 54 thereof, to preserve the identity and integrity of the Curonian Spit, as a particularly valuable area and a natural and cultural heritage site of global significance, thus, also to ensure the special protection of the Curonian Spit as a public interest protected by the Constitution.

The special regime for the protection and use of the Curonian Spit, which has been established in implementing the duty of the state, stemming from the Constitution, inter alia, Paragraph 2 of Article 42 and Paragraph 1 of Article 54 thereof, to ensure the special protection of the Curonian Spit and which, inter alia, implies limitations and prohibitions on economic activities, construction, and any other activities, must be applied to the state, municipalities, and other owners and users of the respective objects located in the Curonian Spit. In view of the fact that the implementation of this special regime for the protection and use of the Curonian Spit, which is necessary in order to ensure the special protection of the Curonian Spit as a public interest protected by the Constitution, inter alia, the requirement to restore what has been changed, destroyed, or otherwise infringed in violation of the special regime for the protection and use of the Curonian Spit, should be regarded as a constitutionally justifiable objective, due to which the property rights of the owners and users of objects located in the Curonian Spit may be subject to limitations, the measures of implementing the special regime for the protection and use of the Curonian Spit cannot in themselves be regarded as a violation of property rights, protected under Article 23 of the Constitution.

In view of the requirement to respect the general legal principle of ex injuria jus non oritur (illegal acts cannot create law), which stems from the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law and according to which no one can take advantage of his/her own illegal act, as well as in view of the constitutional principle of justice, it should be noted that the constitutionally consolidated duty of the state to preserve the identity and integrity of the Curonian Spit and to ensure its special protection as a public interest protected by the Constitution means that the consequences of non-compliance with the special regime, established under Paragraph 2 of Article 42 and Paragraph 1 of Article 54 of the Constitution, for the protection and use of the Curonian Spit, as well as non-compliance with the limitations and prohibitions implied by this regime, may not be legalised by any decisions or agreements of state or municipal institutions or officials; such decisions or agreements, among other things, may not create the preconditions for disrespecting the imperative, which stems from the Constitution, inter alia, Article 109 thereof, as well as from the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law and the constitutional principle of justice, to execute effective court decisions, which are, as mentioned before, binding on all institutions of state power and governance and all other legal and natural persons and which, inter alia, may impose the obligation on the owners and users of the respective objects located in the Curonian Spit to restore what has been changed, destroyed, or otherwise infringed in violation of the special regime for the protection and use of the Curonian Spit.

2.4.2.4. The duty of the state to ensure the protection of family, motherhood, fatherhood, and childhood

The protection of the rights of underage children (Paragraph 3 of Article 39 of the Constitution)
The Constitutional Court's ruling of 13 June 2000

Paragraph 3 of Article 39 of the Constitution prescribes: “Under-age children shall be protected by law.”

This provision of the Constitution means that sufficient and effective protection must be guaranteed for the rights and legitimate interests of underage children, and that the legislature and other state institutions regulating both the legal situation of underage children and other relationships must respect the rights and legitimate interests of underage children.

The duty of parents to support their children (Paragraph 6 of Article 38 of the Constitution); supporting children who have reached the age of majority

The Constitutional Court’s ruling of 7 June 2007

While interpreting the provision of Paragraph 6 of Article 38 of the Constitution, whereby the right and duty of parents is to support their children until they reach the age of majority, it needs to be noted that this provision is designed to regulate the relationships between parents and their underage children. It does not regulate the relationships between parents and their children after the children reach the age of majority.

It also needs to be noted that this constitutional provision may not be interpreted as meaning that, purportedly, the legislature cannot, in general, establish the duty of parents to support their children of the age of majority who require support if such a duty may be based on other provisions of the Constitution.

... the said provision of Paragraph 6 of Article 38 of the Constitution may not be interpreted as meaning that, purportedly, the legislature cannot, in general, establish the duty of parents to support their children of the age of majority who require support in order that they could acquire particular education.

For instance, taking account of the fact that, in Lithuania, secondary education is usually acquired when a pupil has already reached the age of majority (has turned 18), it is obvious that the parents have the duty to support their child for the period of time during which the pupil, studying honestly and showing good results, may acquire secondary education, as well as such secondary education which could be provided together with professional one. Such a duty of parents should be derived not only from laws, but also from the entirety of the provisions of the Constitution, inter alia, from the constitutional consolidation of the value of relationships between parents and children, the striving for a just and harmonious civil society, and the social orientation of the state.

The possibility of the legislative consolidation of the duty of parents to provide material support for their children of the age of majority when they study at schools of higher education, inter alia, their day-time departments, should be assessed differently. The legislature cannot disregard the circumstance that, in this case, legal relationships emerge between the persons of the age of majority – a student of a school of higher education and one of his/her parents or both parents.

The Constitutional Court has held that the principle of solidarity, which is enshrined in the Constitution, does not deny personal responsibility for one’s destiny (rulings of 12 March 1997, 25 November 2002, 3 December 2003, 5 March 2004, and 13 December 2004). It needs to be emphasised that relationships between parents and children, even when the latter reach the age of majority, in most aspects are special ones and their ties are constitutionally valuable. However, in itself it does not mean that it is possible to establish such a legal regulation that the burden of implementing the decisions that were independently adopted by children who reached the age of majority would unconditionally be transferred to their parents who no longer have ... and may not have (under the Constitution) any power (power of parents) over their children of the age of majority who adopt those decisions. ...

It is obvious that parents also have moral obligations to their children who reached the age of majority, as well as that children have moral obligations to their parents. However, it needs to be emphasised that it is impossible to ensure the fulfilment of moral obligations (or their fulfilment “to the full extent”) by laying down analogous legal duties in legal acts.

Article 38 of the Constitution consolidates not only the right and duty of parents to bring up their children to be honest people and faithful citizens, and to support them until they reach the age of majority (Paragraph 6), but also, inter alia, the duty of children to respect their parents, to take care of them in their old age, and to preserve their heritage (Paragraph 7).

After the legislature decides to establish, by means of a law, the duty of parents to provide material support for their children of the age of majority who require support when they study at schools of higher education, it is not permitted to deny any of the rights (inter alia, the right of ownership) and legitimate interests of parents or the rights and legitimate interests of other persons defended and protected under the Constitution. It is not permitted to restrict, let alone deny the powers of courts to administer justice, either. For instance, while consolidating the said duty of parents, regard must be paid to the possibilities of parents and their duties to other persons (inter alia, underage children, other members of the family, dependants). It is not allowed to establish any such a legal regulation that would create the preconditions (because of the fulfilment of such a duty by parents as established by law) for substantially worsening the situation of parents or other persons, let alone to establish such a duty of parents to provide material support for their children of the age of majority who require support when they study at schools of higher education where, in general, such support could not be carried out by parents without inflicting substantial harm on their own rights or the rights of other persons. In addition, it is not allowed to establish any such a legal regulation whereby a court, in all cases, when parents or one of the parents has certain income or other property, especially when this income or other property is not large (it needs to be emphasised that the size or sufficiency thereof may not be assessed only according to such formal criteria as the minimum standard of living, the minimum monthly salary, the average remuneration for work, etc. that are established in legal acts at present), would have the duty to award support for a child of the age of majority who requires support when he/she learns at a school of higher education. It should particularly be emphasised that it is not permitted to establish any such a legal regulation whereby support could be awarded from such parents who themselves need support, guardianship, etc.

It also needs to be noted that, under the Constitution, the legal regulation whereby a court could award the support of parents for a person of the age of majority who seeks to acquire additional higher education, even though he/she requires support, as well as the legal regulation whereby a court could award the support of parents for such a person of the age of majority seeking education (inter alia, higher education) who studies dishonestly, underachieves in studies, and abuses the rights of the family, would be intolerable.

These as well as other imperatives that defend the rights and legitimate interests of parents and other persons are determined by the fact that ... the institution of support of the children of the age of majority who require support and who study at the day-time departments of schools of higher education essentially differs from the institution of support of underage children; the court award of support for persons of the age of majority may not be based on the same principles as for underage children. Otherwise, the concept of the age of majority itself, as consolidated in the Constitution and in the whole legal system, would be denied.

It needs to be emphasised that, on deciding to establish, by means of a law, the duty of parents to provide material support for their children of the age of majority who require support when they study at schools of higher education, the legislature must not be limited exclusively to the establishment of the said duty, especially when the extent of this duty becomes clear only when a court decides a case regarding the award of support, but it must establish all essential elements of this legal institution. Otherwise, legal ambiguity and uncertainty would be created; at the same time, the preconditions would be created for the emergence of legal situations where the possibilities of a court to administer justice would be worsened (where it would be sometimes impossible to administer justice at all); thus, the rights and freedoms of a person, as well as other constitutional values, could be violated.

It also needs to be noted that, on deciding to establish, by means of a law, the duty of parents to provide material support for their children of the age of majority who require support when they study at schools of higher education, the legislature may establish only such a legal regulation whereby it would be possible to award the support of parents to the said person who requires support only in cases where this person has made use of all reasonable possibilities of providing himself/herself with the funds necessary for his/her learning (studies) at a school of higher education.

It also needs to be noted that, under the Constitution, the State of Lithuania is socially oriented and it is thus under the constitutional obligation to assume (and it must assume) the burden of fulfilling certain obligations. The constitutional principle of social solidarity also implies the possibility of distributing this burden to a certain extent among the members of society; however, such distribution must be constitutionally justifiable; it may not be disproportionate; and it may not deny the social orientation of the state and the obligations to the state that stem from the Constitution.

The obligation of the state to ensure the protection of family, motherhood, fatherhood, and childhood; the constitutional concept of family (Paragraphs 1 and 2 of Article 38 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 28 September 2011

Paragraph 1 of Article 38 of the Constitution prescribes: "The family shall be the basis of society and the State"; Paragraph 2 of this article prescribes: "Family, motherhood, fatherhood, and childhood shall be under the protection and care of the State."

The Constitutional Court has held that the provisions of Paragraphs 1 and 2 of Article 38 of the Constitution express the obligation of the state to establish, by means of laws and other legal acts, such a legal regulation that would ensure that family, as well as motherhood, fatherhood, and childhood, as constitutional values, would be fostered and protected in all ways possible (rulings of 13 June 2000 and 5 March 2004), and that Paragraphs 1 and 2 of Article 38 of the Constitution consolidate the constitutional principles of the most general nature (ruling of 5 March 2004).

The meaning of family as a fostered and protected constitutional value is confirmed by the fact that various aspects of the concept of family are also enshrined in other provisions of articles of the Constitution, inter alia, in the provision of Paragraph 1 of Article 39, whereby the state takes care of families raising and bringing up children at home, and renders them support according to the procedure established under the law, in the provision of Paragraph 4 of Article 22, whereby the law and courts protect everyone from arbitrary or unlawful interference with his/her private and family life, in the provision of Paragraph 5 of Article 26, whereby parents and guardians take, without restrictions, care of the religious and moral education of their children and wards according to their own convictions, in the provision of Article 31, whereby it is prohibited to compel anyone to give evidence against himself/herself, or his/her family members or close relatives, in the provisions of Article 146, whereby the state takes care of and provides for the families of servicemen who lose their lives or die during military service, also whereby the state provides for the families of citizens who lose their lives or die in defence of the state. The said constitutional provisions form the basis for the state family policy.

The provisions of Paragraph 1 of Article 38 of the Constitution should be interpreted by taking account of other provisions of the same article of the Constitution, inter alia, Paragraph 2, which provides that family, motherhood, fatherhood, and childhood are under the protection and care of the state, Paragraph 3, which provides that marriage is concluded on the free mutual consent of man and woman, also Paragraph 5, which provides that the rights of spouses are equal in the family.

... the constitutional concept of family may not be derived solely from the institution of marriage, which is consolidated in the provisions of Paragraph 3 of Article 38 of the Constitution. The fact that the institutions of marriage and family are consolidated in the same Article 38 of the Constitution indicates an inseparable and unquestionable relationship between marriage and family. Marriage is one of the grounds of the constitutional institution of family for the creation of family relationships. It is a historically established family model that has undoubtedly had an exceptional value in the life of society and ensures the viability of the Nation and the state, as well as their historical survival.

Nonetheless, this does not mean that the Constitution, inter alia, the provisions of Paragraph 1 of Article 38 thereof, does not (do not) protect and does not (do not) defend families other than those founded on the basis of marriage, inter alia, such as the relationships of a man and a woman living together without concluding a marriage, which are based on the permanent bonds of emotional affection, reciprocal understanding, responsibility, respect, the shared upbringing of children, and similar ones, as well as on the voluntary determination to take on certain rights and duties, which form the basis for the constitutional institutions of motherhood, fatherhood, and childhood.

Thus, the constitutional concept of family is based on mutual responsibility between family members, understanding, emotional affection, assistance, and similar bonds, as well as on the voluntary determination to take on certain rights and duties, i.e. the said concept is based on the content of relationships, whereas the form of expression of these relationships has no essential significance for the constitutional concept of family.

The duty, stemming from Paragraph 1 of Article 38 of the Constitution, for the state to establish, by means of a law and other legal acts, such a legal regulation that would ensure the protection of the family as a constitutional value implies not only the obligation of the state to establish such a legal regulation that, inter alia, would create the preconditions for the proper functioning of a family, would strengthen family relationships, and would defend the rights and legitimate interests of family members, but also the obligation of the state to regulate, by means of a law and other legal acts, family relationships in such a way that no preconditions would be created for discrimination against certain participants in family relationships (as, for instance, a man and a woman who live together without having registered their union as a marriage, their children (adopted children), single parents who are raising their child (adopted child), etc.).

[...]

... the Seimas, as the institution of legislative power, has broad discretion in forming the state policy in various areas of social life, inter alia, the state family policy, as well as in regulating, by legal acts, social relationships in these areas in a corresponding manner. While implementing its powers to form the state policy in certain areas of public and state life, inter alia, the state family policy, the Seimas is obliged to pay regard to the norms and principles of the Constitution.

... under the Constitution, inter alia, the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law, the Seimas, as the institution of legislative power, when exercising its constitutional powers and regulating, by legal acts, family relationships, inter alia, formulating the notions of subjects of these relations, must pay regard to the Constitution and the requirements stemming therefrom, inter alia, those of the equality of rights, human dignity, and respect for private life. Under the Constitution, inter alia, the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law, in the course of regulating family relationships in laws and other legal acts and defining the family as a subject of legal relationships, the duty arises for the Seimas, as the institution of legislative power, to take account of the specific nature of the relationships under regulation, inter alia, the particularities of the subjects of legal relationships; the said particularities objectively determine the necessity to define these subjects in the context of those concrete relationships the participants of which they are.

[...]

The constitutional concept of family must also be interpreted by taking account of the international obligations of the State of Lithuania that were undertaken after it had ratified the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms ...

The obligation of the state to ensure the protection of family, motherhood, fatherhood, and childhood (Paragraphs 1 and 2 of Article 38 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 27 February 2012

The constitutional grounds for protecting family, motherhood, fatherhood, and childhood are consolidated in Articles 38 and 39 of the Constitution.

Paragraphs 1 and 2 of Article 38 of the Constitution prescribe:

“The family shall be the basis of society and the State.

Family, motherhood, fatherhood, and childhood shall be under the protection and care of the State.”

The Constitutional Court has held that these provisions of Paragraphs 1 and 2 of Article 38 of the Constitution express the obligation of the state to establish, by means of laws and other legal acts, such a legal regulation that would ensure that the family, as well as motherhood, fatherhood and childhood, as constitutional values, would be fostered and protected in all ways possible (rulings of 13 June 2000, 5 March 2004, and 28 September 2011). Paragraphs 1 and 2 of Article 38 of the Constitution consolidate the constitutional principles of the most general nature (rulings of 5 March 2004 and 28 September 2011).

The state protection and care guaranteed in Paragraph 2 of Article 38 of the Constitution is implemented in various ways by creating a favourable environment for family, motherhood, fatherhood and childhood as constitutional values. The constitutional self-obligation of the state to protect and care for family, motherhood, fatherhood and childhood is also from certain aspects expressed, as a general principle, in other provisions of the Constitution, inter alia, in the following paragraphs ... thereof – Paragraph 1 of Article 39 wherein the state care and support is guaranteed to families that raise and bring up children at home, and Paragraph 2 of the same article wherein working mothers are guaranteed paid leave before and after childbirth, as well as favourable working conditions and other concessions. However, the imperative consolidated in Paragraph 2 of Article 38 of the Constitution, whereby family, motherhood, fatherhood, and childhood are under the protection and care of the state, may not be interpreted as including the protection guarantees only of the aforementioned constitutional values consolidated in Paragraphs 1 and 2 of Article 39 of the Constitution – in the course of implementing the constitutional obligation of the state to create a favourable environment for family, motherhood, fatherhood and childhood, various forms of the protection and support thereof may be developed, inter alia: the conditions are ensured for parents to combine work (professional) activities and the duties related to raising and bringing up children; a sufficient network of child care and education institutions is created, assisting families in performing the functions of upbringing and education of children, other necessary infrastructure necessary for fostering family, motherhood, fatherhood and childhood as constitutional values is developed; while taking account of the needs of families and the capabilities of society and the state, a certain level of support is also guaranteed to non-working mothers, as well as support for families raising underage children of various age, and not exclusively children of early age, at home. In this area, the legislature, taking account of various social, demographic, and economic factors, inter alia, the material and financial possibilities of the state, has broad discretion to choose concrete instruments of protection and support.

In addition, in this context, it needs to be noted that the self-obligation of the state to protect and care for family, motherhood, fatherhood, and childhood, which is consolidated in Paragraph 2 of Article 38 of the Constitution, may not be interpreted in isolation from, inter alia, the right and duty of parents, which are consolidated in Paragraph 6 of this article, to bring up their children to be honest people and faithful citizens and to support them until they reach the age of majority; this implies that it is parents who are, first of all, responsible for raising and bringing up their children as well as supporting them until they reach the age of majority.

The state care and support for families raising and bringing up children at home, inter alia, leave granted for raising and bringing up children at home and financial support during such leave (Paragraph 1 of Article 39 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 27 February 2012

Paragraph 1 of Article 39 of the Constitution prescribes: “The State shall take care of families raising and bringing up children at home, and shall render them support according to the procedure established by law.”

The state guarantee of care and support for families raising and bringing up children at home is consolidated in Paragraph 1 of Article 39 of the Constitution. The legislature may establish various forms of the implementation the said guarantee, inter alia: provide for the rendering of financial support; ensure the possibility for working parents to make use of leave for raising and upbringing children at home; develop flexible forms of work that create favourable conditions for working parents to combine raising and upbringing children at home and work (professional) activities; give an opportunity not only to the mother, but also to the father to raise and bring up a child at home, while in their absence – to give such a possibility to other working members of the family.

The guarantee of state care and support for families raising and bringing up children at home, which is consolidated in Paragraph 1 of Article 39 of the Constitution, as well as the obligation of the state of a more general character, stemming from Paragraph 2 of Article 38 thereof, to protect and care for family, motherhood, fatherhood, and childhood, may not be interpreted in isolation from the right and duty of the parents, as consolidated in Paragraph 6 of Article 38 of the Constitution, to bring up their children to be honest people and faithful citizens and to support them until they reach the age of majority; as mentioned before, it is parents who are, first of all, responsible for raising and bringing up their children as well as supporting them until they reach the age of majority, whereas the duty of the state is to provide support, within its capabilities, to families raising and bringing up children at home.

While taking account of the fact that state support for families that raise and bring up children at home may be rendered, inter alia, as social assistance in cases provided for under laws, which is guaranteed in Article 52 of the Constitution, it also needs to be noted that, as it has been held in the acts of the Constitutional Court more than once, the principle of solidarity in civil society does not deny personal responsibility for one's own fate; therefore, the legal regulation of social security should be such so as to create the preconditions for each member of society to take care of one's own welfare, but not to rely solely on social security guaranteed by the state (rulings of 12 March 1997, 25 November 2002, 3 December 2003, 5 March 2004, 26 September 2007, and 2 September 2009, the decision of 20 April 2010, and the ruling of 6 February 2012); social assistance should not create any preconditions for a person to decide not to seek higher income and not to search for possibilities of ensuring to oneself and one's family by one's own effort the living conditions that are in line with human dignity; social assistance should not become a privilege (rulings of 5 March 2004 and 2 September 2009, the decision of 20 April 2010, and the ruling of 6 February 2012); the recognition of mutual responsibility of a person and society is important in ensuring social harmony, guaranteeing freedom of a person and the possibility of protecting oneself from difficulties that could not be overcome by a person alone (rulings of 12 March 1997 and 26 September 2007, the decision of 20 April 2010, and the ruling of 6 February 2012). Thus, the Constitution does not prohibit the legislature from establishing, by means of a law, such grounds and conditions for providing social assistance, as well as such amounts of social assistance, that would encourage everyone to attempt, to the extent possible and, first of all, by themselves, to take care of their own and their family welfare, as well as to contribute to the welfare of all society (ruling of 5 March 2004).

As it was held in the Constitutional Court's ruling of 5 March 2004, the Constitution does not expressis verbis establish any grounds, conditions, terms, and amounts of giving support for families that raise and bring up children at home; this should be established by the legislature in compliance with the norms and principles of the Constitution; the capabilities of society and the state should be taken into account when regulating, by means of a law, the relationships of support given to families that raise and bring up children at home; the legislature has broad discretion in this field; however, it is inadmissible to link the support given by the state to a family with such circumstances (conditions) that would artificially complicate the receipt of such support.

The legislature may choose various forms of care and support for families that raise and bring up children at home, the conditions of rendering such care and support, etc.; however, while implementing its discretion, the legislature is not allowed to deny, in general, the essence of the guarantee consolidated in Paragraph 1 of Article 39 of the Constitution and the obligation of the state stemming from Paragraph 2 of Article 38 thereof to protect and care for the constitutional values – family, motherhood, fatherhood, and childhood.

... under Paragraph 1 of Article 39 of the Constitution, the legislature, while implementing its discretion to choose various forms of care and support for families that raise and bring up children at home, is allowed, after it takes account of a special need of children of early age for protection and supervision, to establish such a legal regulation that would create conditions for at least one working parent (in their absence – for another working member of the family) to raise and bring up a child at home for some time without being engaged in work (professional) activities (or by combining such activities and raising and bringing up a child) by receiving the respective support from the state during this time period. The law may also provide for leave of other types for working parents, inter alia, leave given to fathers from the moment of childbirth.

The Constitution does not establish any grounds and conditions for giving leave for raising and bringing up children at home, or the length of such leave, or any amounts of financial support to be rendered during such leave – it must be established by the legislature by paying regard to the norms and principles of the Constitution (inter alia, the constitutional imperatives of a state under the rule of law, justice, reasonableness, proportionality, the protection of acquired rights and legitimate expectations, legal certainty and legal security, the equality of rights, a balance among constitutional values, and social harmony).

The legislature also has discretion to choose the sources from which the support for families raising and bringing up children at home will be funded: such support, inter alia, may be funded from the state budget; in addition, such a legal regulation may be established whereby the rendering of the said support would be based on social insurance; or a different model of funding such support may be chosen.

... having chosen such a form of the care and support (guaranteed in Paragraph 1 of Article 39 of the Constitution) as leave for raising and bringing up children at home, the legislature, while taking account of the purpose of such leave, which is the creation of possibilities for parents to raise and bring up children at home for some time without being engaged in work (professional) activities, as well as of the purpose of financial support to be rendered during such leave, which is compensation, within the capabilities of the state, of all lost income or part thereof, may establish such a legal regulation whereby the said support would be rendered while taking into consideration other income (received for work performed at the time of the said leave) of the persons making use of such leave. At the same time, it needs to be noted that it is not allowed to establish any such a legal regulation whereby the income received for work performed not during the said leave, but at some other time, would influence the amount of the financial support rendered at the time of leave for raising and bringing up children at home, since the aforesaid work does not deny the purpose of such leave in any way.

Granting working mothers paid leave before and after childbirth (Paragraph 2 of Article 39 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 27 February 2012

Paragraph 2 of Article 39 of the Constitution prescribes: “The law shall make a provision for working mothers to be granted paid leave before and after childbirth, as well as favourable working conditions and other concessions.”

Paragraph 2 of Article 39 of the Constitution establishes, inter alia, the constitutional guarantee of paid leave before and after childbirth for working mothers, by taking account of a special condition and need of healthcare of women for some time before and after childbirth and of a special link between mother and child for some time after childbirth. The purpose of this constitutional guarantee is to secure the protection of the physiological condition of a pregnant woman and a woman after childbirth, to secure the special link between mother and child during the first weeks of life of the child, by creating the possibility for a working woman to withdraw, for a reasonable time, from her work (professional) activities before and after childbirth.

It needs to be noted that, when account is taken of this constitutional purpose, paid leave before and after childbirth to working mothers is a specific constitutional institution of the protection of motherhood and childhood. The paid leave of a reasonable length of time before and after childbirth to working mothers guaranteed under Paragraph 2 of Article 39 of the Constitution implies that the legislature, in regulating the implementation of the right to this leave and taking into consideration the constitutional purpose thereof, while paying regard to other norms and principles of the Constitution (inter alia, the constitutional imperatives of a state under the rule of law, justice, reasonableness, and the equality of rights), must establish, inter alia, the conditions for giving such leave, a reasonable (minimum and maximum) length of such leave, as well as such a legal regulation that would secure, at the time of this leave, the payment of benefits the amount of which would comply with the average remuneration received during a reasonable time prior to such leave.

The legislature has the discretion to choose the sources from which leave for working mothers before and after childbirth will be paid: such leave, inter alia, may be funded from the state budget; in addition, such a legal regulation may be established whereby the funding of the said leave would be based on social insurance, or a different model of funding such leave may be chosen.

... under the Constitution, the legislature, while taking account of the constitutional purpose of paid leave before and after childbirth, may establish such a legal regulation whereby such leave would be paid by taking account of other income (received for work performed at the time of the said leave) of the women on such leave. At the same time, it needs to be noted that it is not allowed to establish any such a legal regulation whereby income received for work performed not during the said leave, but at some other time, would influence the payment for leave before and after childbirth, since the aforesaid work does not deny the purpose of such leave in any way.

It needs to be emphasised that, while regulating the right of paid leave before and after childbirth, which is guaranteed in Paragraph 2 of Article 39 of the Constitution, the legislature must take into account, inter alia, the particularities (which may be of importance for the possibilities of women concerned to make use of such a right) of the work (professional) activities of women engaged in work or business.

State financial support rendered during leave for raising and bringing up children at home (Paragraph 1 of Article 39 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 5 March 2013

... financial support rendered during leave granted for raising and bringing up children at home (one of the forms of the care and support guaranteed by the state under Paragraph 1 of Article 39 of the Constitution for families raising and bringing up children at home, where the said form is chosen by the legislature and may be implemented, inter alia, as social assistance guaranteed by Article 52 of the Constitution in the cases provided for under laws), by its nature, temporary (time-limited) character, and purpose, differs from the pensions guaranteed by Article 52 of the Constitution, as well as from other benefits of pension provision provided for by means of laws, where the right to the said benefits is related to the protection of ownership rights as consolidated in Article 23 of the Constitution. The said difference is particularly distinct in the light of the fact that the financial support provided for under the law is a targeted one, i.e. it should be linked to a concrete period of raising and bringing up a child at home, as well as to the support of such an amount that depends on the capabilities of the state and society.

Reducing financial support rendered during leave for raising and bringing up children at home upon the emergence of a particularly difficult economic and financial situation in the state

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 5 March 2013

... when providing support for families raising and bringing up children at home, the state must observe the constitutional principles of the protection of legitimate expectations, legal certainty, legal security, the equality of rights, and proportionality also in the event of the emergence of a particularly difficult economic and financial situation in the state. Persons who, under the law, have acquired the right to financial support in the amount established under the law during leave granted for raising and bringing up children at home have no legal expectation that support will not be reduced on the emergence of a particularly difficult economic and financial situation in the state; however, they have the legitimate expectation that in the event of the reduction of the said support on the emergence of a particularly difficult economic and financial situation in the state, inter alia, the constitutional principles of the equality of rights and proportionality will be observed.

It should also be noted that, in exceptional cases, while reducing, on the emergence of a particularly difficult economic and financial situation in the state, the financial support rendered in an established amount during leave granted for raising and bringing up children at home, the legislature is under the duty to establish an even and non-discriminatory extent of the reduction of such granted financial support, ensuring that the said support is reduced so that the proportions of the previously established (prior to the emergence of a particularly difficult economic and financial situation in the state) amounts of that support would not be violated.

It should be noted that, while reducing, on the emergence of a particularly difficult economic and financial situation in the state, the funding of various areas financed by the state, inter alia, the budgetary funding of all state institutions and financial support rendered during leave granted for raising and bringing up children at home, where such financial support is calculated on the basis of the work remuneration of parents, the legislature is also under the obligation to stipulate that the work remuneration of persons who, under the law, have the right to receive the said support and who are remunerated from state funds would not be reduced to a greater extent if compared with the aforesaid support.

[...]

... the particularities of financial support rendered during leave granted for raising and bringing up children at home, i.e. its nature, temporary (time-limited) character, and purpose, implies that, on the emergence of a particularly difficult economic and financial situation in the state and in the event of the necessity, arising due to the said situation, to temporarily reduce the aforesaid support with a view to ensuring certain vitally important interests of society and the state, as well as protecting other constitutional values, no duty arises for the legislature to provide for compensation for the losses incurred as a result of the reduction of the aforesaid support, while the reduction itself does not deny the essence of the right acquired under the law to the financial support in the amount provided for under the law during leave granted for raising and bringing up children at home.

The state care and support for families raising and bringing up children at home, inter alia, leave granted for raising and bringing up children at home and financial support provided during such leave (Paragraph 1 of Article 39 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 24 January 2018

... state support for families raising and bringing up children at home, which is guaranteed under Paragraph 1 of Article 39 of the Constitution and may be provided in various forms chosen by the legislature, inter alia, by providing for leave granted to working parents for raising and bringing up children at home, as well as for financial support granted during this leave, substantially differs from the guarantee of paid leave granted before and after childbirth to working mothers, as consolidated in Paragraph 2 of the said article. Paragraph 1 of Article 39 of the Constitution does not consolidate the duty for the legislature to establish specifically such a form of support as leave for raising and bringing up children at home; nor does it establish the amounts of financial support provided during this leave.

[...]

... having chosen to provide for leave granted for raising and bringing up children at home as one of the forms of state support for families, as guaranteed in Paragraph 1 of Article 39 of the Constitution, the legislature has, under the Constitution, broad discretion to establish the grounds and conditions for granting this leave, its duration, and the amounts of financial support provided during this leave; the legislature, inter alia, is not obliged to prescribe such an amount of this support that would correspond to the average remuneration received before such leave by the recipient of this support.

The Constitutional Court has noted that state support for families raising and bringing up children at home may be rendered, inter alia, as social assistance in cases provided for by law, which is guaranteed in Article 52 of the Constitution (inter alia, the rulings of 27 February 2012 and 5 March 2013).

[...]

... seeking to ensure the financial stability of the state social insurance system and following the constitutional principle of social solidarity, as well as distributing, to a certain extent, the burden of the implementation of the obligations stemming for the state from Article 52 of the Constitution among members of society, the legislature has the duty to establish such a relation between the contribution made (state social insurance contributions paid) by persons participating in this system and the amount of financial support (benefits) granted to persons that would ensure a balance between the interests of persons who finance the state social insurance system by paying their contributions and persons who receive benefit from this system.

Paid leave of working mothers before and after childbirth (Paragraph 2 of Article 39 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 19 December 2018

The constitutional guarantee of paid leave before and after childbirth for working mothers, which is consolidated in Paragraph 2 of Article 39 of the Constitution ... should be interpreted with reference to Paragraph 1 of Article 48 of the Constitution, which, among other things, provides that everyone may freely choose an occupation or business.

[...]

In view of this, under Paragraph 2 of Article 39 of the Constitution, the guarantee of paid leave before and after childbirth may be applied not only to those mothers who, in implementing their constitutional right to work, have chosen an occupation under an employment contract or have entered state service. ... having chosen the model of payment for paid leave before and after childbirth based on social insurance and having established that this insurance covers not only persons who have employment or state service relationships, but also persons engaged in other working (professional) activities, inter alia, self-employed persons, the legislature must, under Paragraph 2 of Article 39 of the Constitution, also ensure the constitutional guarantee of paid leave before and after childbirth for those mothers who are self-employed. It should also be noted that such a legal regulation must comply with the norms and principles of the Constitution, inter alia, the constitutional principles of the equality of the rights of persons and justice.

[...]

... once the legislature has chosen the model of payment for paid leave before and after childbirth (provided for in Paragraph 2 of Article 39 of the Constitution) based on social insurance and has established that this insurance covers not only persons who have employment or state service relationships, but also self-employed persons, the principle of the equality of the rights of persons, which is consolidated in Article 29 of the Constitution, and the constitutional principle of justice give rise to the prohibition to differently treat mothers who have employment or state service relationships and those who do not have such relationships, inter alia, self-employed mothers, who have contributed to social insurance to the same extent established under the law (have paid the respective social insurance contributions or these contributions have been paid for them) ...

The obligation of the state to ensure the protection of family, motherhood, fatherhood, and childhood (Paragraph 2 of Article 38 of the Constitution); the discretion of the state, stemming from the said obligation, to provide mothers other than those who are working with the same protection as consolidated in Paragraph 2 of Article 39 of the Constitution

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 19 December 2018

Paragraph 2 of Article 39 of the Constitution, under which working mothers are guaranteed paid leave before and after childbirth, as well as favourable working conditions and other concessions, expresses, from a certain aspect, the constitutional obligation of the state, which is consolidated in Paragraph 2 of Article 38 of the Constitution, to protect and take care, among others, of family, motherhood, and childhood (inter alia, the ruling of 27 February 2012).

The Constitutional Court has held on more than one occasion that the state protection and care guaranteed in Paragraph 2 of Article 38 of the Constitution is implemented in various ways by creating a favourable environment for family, motherhood, fatherhood, and childhood as constitutional values; in the course of implementing the constitutional obligation of the state to create a favourable environment for family, motherhood, fatherhood, and childhood, various forms of the protection and support thereof may be developed; in this area, the legislature, taking account of various social, demographic, and economic factors, inter alia, the material and financial possibilities of the state, has broad discretion to choose concrete instruments of protection and support (inter alia, the rulings of 27 February 2012 and 14 December 2012).

... the obligation of the state to protect and take care of motherhood and childhood, which is consolidated in Paragraph 2 of Article 38 of the Constitution, implies the discretion of the state, with regard to its financial and material possibilities, to provide the same guarantee as consolidated in Paragraph 2 of Article 39 of the Constitution for mothers other than those who are working mothers; having chosen the model of payment for paid leave before and after childbirth based on social insurance, the legislature may also grant such a guarantee to those mothers who have contributed to social insurance to the extent provided for under the law (have paid the respective social insurance contributions or these contributions have been paid for them) but ceased their working (professional) activity before the day on which, in accordance with the procedure established in laws, they would become entitled to paid leave before and after childbirth. It should also be noted that such a legal regulation must also comply with the norms and principles of the Constitution, inter alia, the constitutional principles of the equality of the rights of persons and justice.

[...]

... once the legislature has chosen the model of payment for paid leave before and after childbirth (provided for in Paragraph 2 of Article 39 of the Constitution) based on social insurance and has established that this insurance covers not only persons who have employment or state service relationships, but also self-employed persons, the principle of the equality of the rights of persons, which is consolidated in Article 29 of the Constitution, and the constitutional principle of justice give rise to the prohibition to differently treat mothers who have employment or state service relationships and those who do not have such relationships, inter alia, self-employed mothers, who have contributed to social insurance to the same extent established in the law (have paid the respective social insurance contributions or these contributions have been paid for them); this also applies mutatis mutandis to those mothers who ceased their working (professional) activity before the day on which, in accordance with the procedure established in laws, they would become entitled to paid leave before and after childbirth where, in implementing its discretion stemming from the obligation of the state to protect and take care of motherhood and childhood, which is consolidated in Paragraph 2 of Article 38 of the Constitution, the legislature grants the said mothers the same guarantee as consolidated in Paragraph 2 of Article 39 of the Constitution.

The obligation of the state to ensure the protection of family, motherhood, fatherhood, and childhood; the constitutional concept of the family; the constitutional concept of marriage (Paragraphs 1–3 of Article 38 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 11 January 2019

Paragraphs 1 and 2 of Article 38 of the Constitution prescribe:

“The family shall be the basis of society and the State.

Family, motherhood, fatherhood, and childhood shall be under the protection and care of the State.”

... Paragraph 3 of Article 38 of the Constitution stipulates: “Marriage shall be concluded upon the free mutual consent of man and woman.”

The Constitutional Court has held that Paragraphs 1 and 2 of Article 38 of the Constitution consolidate the constitutional principles of the most general nature; these provisions express the obligation of the state to establish such a legal regulation that would ensure that family, motherhood, fatherhood, and childhood, as constitutional values, are fostered and protected in all ways possible (inter alia, the rulings of 28 September 2011, 27 February 2012, and 22 September 2015).

In its ruling of 28 September 2011, the Constitutional Court held that the constitutional concept of the family may not be derived solely from the institution of marriage, consolidated in Paragraph 3 of Article 38 of the Constitution; marriage is one of the grounds of the constitutional institution of the family for the creation of family relationships; however, this does not mean that the Constitution, inter alia, Paragraph 1 of Article 38 thereof, does not protect and defend families other than those founded on the basis of marriage; the constitutional concept of the family is based on mutual responsibility between family members, understanding, emotional affection, assistance, and similar bonds, as well as on the voluntary determination to take on certain rights and duties, i.e. the said concept is based on the content of relationships, whereas the form of expression of these relationships has no essential significance for the constitutional concept of the family; the duty, stemming from Paragraph 1 of Article 38 of the Constitution, for the state to establish, by means of laws and other legal acts, a legal regulation that would ensure the protection of the family as a constitutional value implies the duty of the state not only to establish such a legal regulation that, inter alia, would create the preconditions for the proper functioning of families, strengthen family relationships, and defend the rights and legitimate interests of family members, but also to regulate, by means of laws and other legal acts, family relationships in such a way that no preconditions would be created for discrimination against participants in family relationships (as, for instance, discrimination against a man and a woman who live together without having registered their union as a marriage, their children (adopted children), single parents raising their child (adopted child), etc.).

In this context, it should be noted that Paragraph 3 of Article 38 of the Constitution consolidates the constitutional concept of marriage concluded by free mutual consent of a man and a woman. It needs to be emphasised that a different concept of marriage may not be consolidated in the laws of the Republic of Lithuania unless Paragraph 3 of Article 38 of the Constitution is amended accordingly.

The Constitutional Court has noted that marriage is one of the grounds of the constitutional institution of family for the creation of family relationships; it is a historically established family model, which has undoubtedly had an exceptional value in the life of society and ensures the viability of the Nation and the state, as well as their historical survival (ruling of 28 September 2011).

... unlike the constitutional concept of marriage, the constitutional concept of the family, among other things, is neutral in terms of gender. Under Paragraphs 1 and 2 of Article 38 of the Constitution, interpreted in conjunction with the principle of the equality of persons and the prohibition of discrimination, as established in Article 29 of the Constitution, the Constitution protects and defends all families that meet the constitutional concept of the family, which is based on the content of permanent or long-lasting relationships between family members, i.e. mutual responsibility between family members, understanding, emotional affection, assistance, and similar bonds, as well as on the voluntary determination to take on certain rights and duties.

On the other hand, this does not mean that the Constitution, inter alia, Paragraph 2 of Article 38 thereof, under which motherhood, fatherhood, and childhood are also under the protection and care of the state, precludes the establishment of a differentiated legal regulation governing family care and family support by the state where objective and constitutionally justifiable criteria are taken into account.

The right to reunification for a family in the context of the free movement of persons within the European Union and migration (Paragraphs 2 and 3 of Article 21, Paragraphs 1 and 4 of Article 22, Articles 29 and 32, and Paragraphs 1 and 2 of Article 38 of the Constitution and the Constitutional Act on Membership of the Republic of Lithuania in the European Union)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 11 January 2019

... under the Constitution, inter alia, the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law, the legal regulation governing family reunification in the context of the free movement of persons within the EU and migration must be based on the principle of respect for human dignity and the private and family life of a person, as well as the principle of the equality of the rights of persons. When establishing this legal regulation, under the Constitution, inter alia, the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law, the legislature must also pay regard to the specificity of the relationships in question, inter alia, the specificity of the free movement of persons within the EU and migration, inter alia, to the fact that the family of a citizen of the Republic of Lithuania, of a citizen of any other EU Member State, or of a third-country national lawfully residing in Lithuania, whose family members wish to enter Lithuania and reside there for reasons of family reunification, may have been founded not only in the Republic of Lithuania, but also under the law of another EU Member State or under that of a third country, which may also allow marriages or registered partnerships, inter alia, between two persons of the same sex.

... under the Constitution, inter alia ... the provisions of Paragraphs 2 and 3 of Article 21, Paragraphs 1 and 4 of Article 22, Article 29, and Paragraphs 1 and 2 of Article 38 thereof, and the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law, the legislature must lay down such a legal regulation related to the free movement of persons within the EU and migration that would provide for the right to reunification for a family founded by two same-sex persons in another state through a legally concluded marriage or registered partnership, i.e. the right of a foreign national to enter Lithuania and reside there together with his/her family member – a citizen of the Republic of Lithuania or a foreign national lawfully residing in Lithuania, with whom a marriage or registered partnership has lawfully been concluded in another state. With respect to a foreign national who is a family member of a citizen of the Republic of Lithuania or a family member of a non-national Lithuanian entering Lithuania for residence, with whom the foreign national has lawfully concluded a marriage or registered partnership in another state, the said duty of the legislature also arises from the provisions of Article 32 of the Constitution.

It should also be noted that the duty of the State of Lithuania to consolidate the said right to reunification for a family created on the basis of a marriage or registered partnership lawfully concluded by two persons of the same sex in another EU country, i.e. the right of a citizen of a country other than EU Member State to enter Lithuania and reside there together with a citizen of the EU, inter alia, a citizen of the Republic of Lithuania, with whom a marriage or registered partnership has lawfully been concluded in another EU Member State, also arises from the constitutional imperative of full participation by the Republic of Lithuania in the EU and Article 1 of the Constitutional Act on Membership of the Republic of Lithuania in the European Union. ... the constitutional provisions related to the free movement of EU citizens, inter alia, citizens of the Republic of Lithuania, within the EU, inter alia, the Republic of Lithuania, should also be interpreted in the light of the respective EU legal provisions.

... it should be emphasised that, under the Constitution, the exercise of the right to reunification by a family founded by two persons, inter alia, same-sex persons, through a marriage or registered partnership lawfully concluded in another state is not absolute. The right of a foreign national to enter Lithuania and reside there together with his/her family member – a citizen of the Republic of Lithuania or a foreign national lawfully residing in Lithuania, with whom a marriage or registered partnership has lawfully been concluded in another state, under the Constitution, may be limited by means of a law where necessary in a democratic society for reasons of national or public security, public order, the protection of human health, or similar constitutionally important objectives; at the same time, regard must be paid to the constitutional principles of the equality of the rights of persons and proportionality.

It should be emphasised that the said limitations must be necessary in order to reach the constitutionally important objectives, specifically, in a democratic society, where respect should be paid to the human dignity of everyone without discriminating, inter alia, on the grounds of gender identity and/or sexual orientation. ... in a democratic state under the rule of law, the attitudes or stereotypes prevailing in a certain period of time among the majority of members of society may not, based on the constitutionally important objectives, inter alia, ensuring public order, serve as constitutionally justifiable grounds for discriminating against persons solely on the basis of their gender identity and/or sexual orientation. In other words, the constitutionally important objectives may not serve as a justification for a limitation on exercising the right to reunification by a family founded by two persons, inter alia, same-sex persons, in another state through a lawfully concluded marriage or registered partnership if such a limitation is incompatible with Article 29 of the Constitution, under which ... one of the forms of prohibited discrimination is the restriction of the rights of a person on the grounds of his/her gender identity and/or sexual orientation, or with Paragraphs 2 and 3 of Article 21 of the Constitution, which protect human dignity and prohibit its degrading.

Taking account of this, it should be held that, although the objective to protect the constitutional concept of marriage, as concluded upon the free mutual consent of a man and a woman, as well as the historically established model of the family, which is based on this concept, may be considered constitutionally important, under the Constitution, such an objective may not serve as a justification for a legal regulation whereby, solely on the grounds of gender identity and/or sexual orientation, a foreign national would not be allowed to enter Lithuania and reside there together with his/her family member – a citizen of the Republic of Lithuania or a foreign national lawfully residing in Lithuania, with whom a marriage or registered partnership has lawfully been concluded in another state, i.e. such a legal regulation whereby a foreign national would be allowed to enter Lithuania and reside there exclusively in cases where he/she has lawfully concluded a marriage or registered partnership in another state with an opposite-sex citizen of the Republic of Lithuania or an opposite-sex foreign national lawfully residing in Lithuania.

In this context, it should be noted that the above-mentioned duty, stemming from the Constitution, for the legislature to lay down such a legal regulation related to the free movement of persons within the EU and migration that would provide for the right to reunification for a family founded in another state by two same-sex persons through a legally concluded marriage or registered partnership may not be interpreted as changing the concept of marriage consolidated in Paragraph 3 of Article 38 of the Constitution.

The obligation of the state to protect and take care of childhood; the constitutional imperative of the priority of the interests of the child; the duty of parents to support their children (Paragraphs 1, 2, and 6 of Article 38 and Paragraphs 1–3 of Article 39 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 8 November 2019

Article 38 of the Constitution, inter alia, prescribes:

“The family shall be the basis of society and the State.” (Paragraph 1)

Family, motherhood, fatherhood, and childhood shall be under the protection and care of the State.” (Paragraph 2)

“The right and duty of parents shall be to bring up their children to be honest people and faithful citizens, and to support them until they reach the age of majority.” (Paragraph 6)

As held by the Constitutional Court, Paragraphs 1 and 2 of Article 38 of the Constitution consolidate the constitutional principles of the general nature; these provisions express the obligation of the state, by means of laws or other legal acts, to establish such a legal regulation that would ensure that family, motherhood, fatherhood, and childhood, as constitutional values, are fostered and protected in all ways possible (inter alia, the rulings of 27 February 2012, 22 September 2015, and 24 January 2018).

The Constitutional Court has noted that the state protection and care guaranteed in Paragraph 2 of Article 38 of the Constitution is implemented in various ways by creating a favourable environment for family, motherhood, fatherhood, and childhood as constitutional values (rulings of 27 February 2012 and 24 January 2018).

... childhood is consolidated in Paragraph 2 of Article 38 of the Constitution as a particularly protected and fostered constitutional value, in view that childhood is a special period in the life of an individual, during which the development of the personality, insofar as this development is linked to physical, mental, and social maturity, takes place, as well as in view that children constitute a socially sensitive and particularly vulnerable part of society due to the particularities of their developing personality (inter alia, their insufficient physical and social maturity). It should be noted that care by the state for childhood, as a particularly protected and fostered constitutional value, is an important precondition for implementing the striving, consolidated in the Preamble to the Constitution, for an open, just, and harmonious civil society. Therefore, under Paragraph 2 of Article 38 of the Constitution, specific protection and support is necessary for children, so that the conditions are created for their healthy and full development, inter alia, for their growing up to be honest people and faithful citizens.

The Constitutional Court also noted that the general obligation of the state, stemming from Paragraph 2 of Article 38 of the Constitution, to protect and take care of family, motherhood, fatherhood, and childhood may not be interpreted in isolation from the right and duty of the parents, as consolidated in Paragraph 6 of this article, to bring up their children to be honest people and faithful citizens and to support them until they reach the age of majority; it is parents who are, first of all, responsible for raising and bringing up their children, as well as supporting them until they reach the age of majority; whereas the duty of the state is to provide support, within its capabilities, for families raising and bringing up children at home (rulings of 27 February 2012 and 24 January 2018).

It should be noted that, under Paragraph 6 of Article 38 of the Constitution, parents have the duty to support their children until they reach the age of majority. As the Constitutional Court noted in its ruling of 7 June 2007, the provision of Paragraph 6 of Article 38 of the Constitution is designed to regulate the relationships between parents and their under-age children; it does not regulate the relationships between parents and their children after the children reach the age of majority. In this context, the Constitutional Court also noted that Paragraph 6 of Article 38 of the Constitution may not be interpreted as meaning that, purportedly, the legislature cannot, in general, establish, by means of a law, the duty of parents to support their children of the age of majority if they need support, inter alia, in order that they could acquire the respective (as, for instance, secondary or secondary together with professional) education if such a duty may be based on other provisions of the Constitution; such a duty of parents should be derived not only from laws, but also from the entirety of the provisions of the Constitution, inter alia, from the constitutional consolidation of the value of relationships between parents and children, the striving for a just and harmonious civil society, and the social orientation of the state (ruling of 7 June 2007).

In view of the above, it should be pointed out that the provisions of the Constitution, inter alia, Paragraph 2 of Article 38 thereof, the striving for an open, just, and harmonious civil society, as established in the Preamble to the Constitution, and the constitutional principle of the social orientation of the state, imply the possibility of establishing, by means of a law, the duty of parents also to support their children who have reached the age of majority in cases where they are unable to take care of themselves and support themselves because of their disability. It should be noted at the same time that the duty of parents, as consolidated in Paragraph 6 of Article 38 of the Constitution, to support their children until they reach the age of majority, in certain cases where the child is able to exercise all his/her rights and fulfil all his/her duties independently (for instance, in the case of the emancipation of a person as provided for under the law), may end before the child reaches the age of majority established under the law.

In its rulings of 27 February 2012 and 24 January 2018, when interpreting, inter alia, Paragraph 2 of Article 38 of the Constitution, the Constitutional Court noted that the constitutional obligation of the state to protect and take care of family, motherhood, fatherhood and childhood, as a general principle, is from certain aspects also expressed in other provisions of the Constitution, inter alia, in Paragraph 1 of Article 39, wherein state care and support is guaranteed to families raising and bringing up children at home, and Paragraph 2 of the same article, wherein working mothers are guaranteed paid leave before and after childbirth, as well as favourable working conditions and other concessions; however, the imperative consolidated in Paragraph 2 of Article 38 of the Constitution cannot be interpreted as including only the guarantees consolidated in Paragraphs 1 and 2 of Article 39 of the Constitution for the protection of the above-mentioned constitutional values – in the course of implementing the constitutional obligation of the state to create a favourable environment for family, motherhood, fatherhood, and childhood, various forms of the protection and support thereof may be developed; the legislature, taking account of various social, demographic, and economic factors, inter alia, the material and financial possibilities of the state, has broad discretion to choose concrete instruments of protection and support.

The obligation of the state to protect and take care of childhood, which is consolidated in Paragraph 2 of Article 38 of the Constitution, should be interpreted in conjunction with Paragraph 3 of Article 39, which stipulates the following: “Under-age children shall be protected by law.”

The provision of Paragraph 3 of Article 39 of the Constitution means that sufficient and effective protection must be guaranteed for the rights and legitimate interests of under-age children, as well as that the legislature and other state institutions, when regulating the situation of under-age children and other relationships by means of legal acts, must respect the rights and legitimate interests of under-age children (rulings of 13 June 2000 and 22 September 2015).

In this context, it should be noted that the constitutional imperative of the priority of the interests of the child stems from the Constitution, inter alia, from Paragraph 2 of Article 38 thereof, which, as mentioned before, consolidates childhood as a particularly protected and fostered constitutional value, also from Paragraph 3 of Article 39 of the Constitution, under which the state must, by means of a law, guarantee the sufficient and effective protection of the rights and legitimate interests of under-age children, as well as from the striving, consolidated in the Preamble to the Constitution, for an open, just, and harmonious civil society. This imperative implies the duty of the state to ensure that account is, first of all, taken of the interests of the child and no preconditions are created for violating these interests in the course of adopting laws and other legal acts, as well as in the course of applying them and deciding on other issues related to the child.

... under Paragraph 2 of Article 38 and Paragraph 3 of Article 39 of the Constitution, the state has the duty to defend the interests of children in cases where their parents (one of their parents) fail(s) to fulfil their constitutionally consolidated duties, inter alia, the duty to support their children, which is consolidated in the Constitution, inter alia, Paragraph 6 of Article 38 thereof. Under the Constitution, it is also allowed to establish, by means of a law, such a form of ensuring the right of the child to maintenance as the provision of financial support by the state for children who are not maintained by their parents (one of their parents). However, it should be emphasised that, once the obligation of the state to provide children with the said financial support has been established by means of a law, no preconditions may be created for releasing parents from their constitutional duty to support their children, i.e. a law must lay down the duty of the state to recover the funds spent on the provision of this support from parents who have failed to fulfil their constitutional duty to support their children.

At the same time, it should be noted that, when establishing, by means of a law, such a form of ensuring the right of the child to maintenance as the provision of financial support by the state for children who are not maintained by their parents (one of their parents), as well as when establishing the conditions for the provision of this support, the legislature must pay regard to the constitutional imperative of the priority of the interests of the child, which stems from the Constitution, inter alia, Paragraph 2 of Article 38 and Paragraph 3 of Article 39 thereof, and which, as mentioned before, implies the duty of the state to ensure that account is, first of all, taken of the interests of the child and no preconditions are created for violating these interests in the course of adopting laws and other legal acts, as well as in the course of applying them and deciding on other issues related to the child.

2.4.3. Cultural rights

2.4.3.1. The right to education

2.4.3.1.1. General provisions

The duty of the state to ensure free-of-charge education accessible to everyone in state or municipal schools of general education, vocational schools, and schools of further education (Paragraphs 1 and 2 of Article 41 of the Constitution); financing the additional education of children

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 13 June 2000

Paragraph 1 of Article 41 of the Constitution provides that education is compulsory for persons under the age of 16, while Paragraph 2 thereof provides that education at state and municipal schools of general education, vocational schools, and schools of further education is free of charge. These constitutional norms mean that the state (its institutions) have the duty to ensure that all persons under the age of 16 have real possibilities of acquiring free education in state and municipal schools of general education, vocational schools, and schools of further education and that studies in these establishments are equally accessible to everyone.

Teaching is a constituent part of education. Education is a very diverse process determined by many factors: the influence of the family, the activities of both teachers and establishments of teaching and education, social and family values, social, demographic, economic, political, and cultural processes taking place in society, financial, organisational, and infrastructural possibilities of the state, etc. The purposefulness, quality, and diversity of education must be guaranteed not only by the state and municipal establishments of teaching and education, which are pointed out in the Constitution, but also by parents (legal guardians), who have the constitutional right to take care of the religious and moral education of their children (wards) in conformity with their own convictions and who have the constitutional duty to bring them up to be honest people and faithful citizens, as well as to support them until they reach the age of majority. Implementing these constitutional rights and freedoms, parents (legal guardians) may not refuse to cover part of the expenses for the education of their children.

... additional education is related, first of all, neither to general, vocational, or further education, which is free under the Constitution, nor to syllabi (curricula) prepared and approved (confirmed) by competent state and municipal institutions or by state or municipal establishments of teaching and education, but rather to the wish of pupils (or that of their parents or legal guardians). Therefore, the provision that instruction at establishments of additional education is paid in part is reasonable. This part of the expenses for education may be borne by the state, but it is not obligated to do so. On the other hand, this provision does not mean that state or municipal institutions, taking account of the needs of society (residents) and state (municipal) financial and organisational possibilities, may not establish and maintain or support in any other way state (municipal) establishments of additional education.

The duty of the state to supervise the activity of establishments of teaching and education (Paragraph 4 of Article 40 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 13 June 2000

Paragraph 4 of Article 40 of the Constitution prescribes: "The State shall supervise the activities of establishments of teaching and education."

Paragraph 4 of Article 40 of the Constitution establishes not only the right, but also the duty of the state to supervise the activities of establishments of teaching and education.

The supervision of the activities of establishments of teaching and education includes supervision and control over how the Constitution and laws are observed. In this connection, the state (its institutions) may use various ways and forms of control established under the law.

The supervision over the activities of establishments of teaching and education exercised by the state ensures the equal observance of standards of education and studies, as well as guarantees the compliance of the content and level of education and teaching with qualification recognised by the state.

Under the Constitution, the legislature is entitled to establish which state institution (or institutions) must supervise the implementation of the state education policy and which competent institution of the executive must approve the regulations for such supervision.

Municipal establishments of teaching and education (Paragraph 1 of Article 40, Paragraph 2 of Article 41, and Paragraph 2 of Article 120 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 13 June 2000

The phrase "municipal establishments of teaching and education" of Paragraph 1 of Article 40 of the Constitution, and the phrase "municipal schools of general education, vocational schools, and schools of further education" of Paragraph 2 of Article 41 of the Constitution, when account is taken of the norm of Paragraph 2 of Article 120 of the Constitution, mean that there must be establishments of teaching and education that are linked with municipalities by dependence ties. This, among other things, implies the right of municipalities (their institutions) to found, reorganise, or close down establishments of teaching and education, and to have other rights and duties linked with their foundation, reorganisation, or closing down.

However, this right of municipalities is not unlimited. The aforesaid formulations of Paragraph 1 of Article 40 and Paragraph 2 of Article 41 of the Constitution, when account is taken of the norm of Paragraph 2 of Article 120 of the Constitution, implies the right of the legislature to establish the procedure for the foundation, reorganisation, and closing down of the said municipal establishments, as well as to regulate their activities and other relationships in connection with such establishments. It is important that laws would not deny the right of municipalities to found, reorganise, or close down their establishments of teaching and education, and to have other rights and duties related to their foundation, reorganisation, or closing down.

The duty of the state to supervise the activities of establishments of teaching and education (Paragraph 4 of Article 40 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 19 September 2019

... the duty of the state, under Paragraph 4 of Article 40 of the Constitution, to supervise the activities of establishments of teaching and education includes, inter alia, the duty of the state to ensure compliance with the uniform education and learning standards in state and municipal establishments of teaching and education, as well as in non-state establishments of teaching and education, and to guarantee the compliance of the content and level of education and teaching with the qualification recognised by the state.

In implementing this duty of the state, under the Constitution, inter alia, Paragraph 4 of Article 40 thereof, the legislature has discretion to determine the measures, laid down in the law or in other legal acts, to ensure the education of proper quality and compliance with the uniform education and learning standards established by the state in state and municipal establishments of teaching and education, as well as in non-state establishments of teaching and education.

Non-state establishments of teaching and education (Paragraphs 2 and 4 of Article 40 and Paragraphs 1 and 3 of Article 46 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 19 September 2019

... under Paragraph 2 of Article 40 thereof, non-state establishments of teaching and education may be founded according to the procedure established by laws. It should be noted that, when regulating the procedure for the founding of such non-state establishments of teaching and education and/or their activities, the legislature must pay regard to the constitutional imperatives consolidated in Article 46 of the Constitution, inter alia, freedom of individual economic activity and economic initiative, consolidated in Paragraph 1 of Article 46 of the Constitution, as well as the duty of the state to regulate economic activity so that it serves the general welfare of the people, established in Paragraph 3 of this article.

[...]

... under Paragraph 2 of Article 40 of the Constitution, the legislature, when regulating the founding and activities of non-state establishments of teaching and education, must coordinate the duty of the state, enshrined in Paragraph 3 of Article 46 of the Constitution, to regulate economic activity so that it serves the general welfare of the people with freedom of individual economic activity and economic initiative, established in Paragraph 1 of Article 46 of the Constitution. In view of this, the Constitution, to a certain extent, allows a differentiated legal regulation governing the activities of non-state establishments of teaching and education and the activities of state and municipal establishments of teaching and education. When establishing such a legal regulation, it is necessary to observe the requirements of the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law, inter alia, the principle of proportionality, which means that the state, in supervising, under Paragraph 4 of Article 40 of the Constitution, inter alia, the activities of non-state establishments of teaching and education, must not restrict the right of the owners of these establishments to take autonomous decisions that are necessary for their activities to the extent greater than is needed in order to ensure the proper education quality and compliance with the uniform education and learning standards established by the state.

2.4.3.1.2. The right to seek higher education

The right to seek higher education according to individual abilities (Paragraph 3 of Article 41 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 14 January 2002

Paragraph 3 of Article 41 of the Constitution prescribes: “Higher education shall be accessible to everyone according to individual abilities. Citizens who are good at their studies shall be guaranteed education at state schools of higher education free of charge.”

The Constitution is an integral act (Paragraph 1 of Article 6 of the Constitution). The interpretation of certain provisions of the Constitution must not deny its other provisions. The content of the provisions contained in Paragraph 3 of Article 41 of the Constitution ... should be interpreted in a systemic manner in the context of the whole body of constitutional regulation.

Under the Constitution, everyone has the right to higher education accessible according to individual abilities. Citizens who are good at their studies have the right to education at state schools of higher education free of charge. The human right to seek higher education is an important condition for the implementation of different rights and legitimate interests of an individual. The constitutional human right to seek higher education implies the duty of the state to create the preconditions for implementing this right.

Paragraph 3 of Article 41 of the Constitution should be interpreted in the context of the striving for an open, just, and harmonious civil society and a state under the rule of law, as well as public solidarity. The availability of higher education to everyone according to their individual abilities and the guarantee of education free of charge in state establishments of higher education for citizens who are good at their studies are aimed at ensuring not only the interest of these persons, but also the interest of society and the state – a need for specialists with higher education in different areas.

According to Paragraph 3 of Article 41 of the Constitution, everyone has the right to higher education accessible according to individual abilities.

Paragraph 3 of Article 41 of the Constitution refers to state schools of higher education. Under Paragraph 2 of Article 40 thereof, non-state establishments of teaching and education may be founded according to the procedure established by law. These provisions imply that not only state schools of higher education, but also non-state schools of higher education may function in Lithuania. State schools of higher education must be allocated state funds that have to be provided for in the state budget.

The constitutional provision that higher education is accessible to everyone according to individual abilities means that both state schools of higher education and non-state schools of higher education founded according to the procedure established by means of a law, i.e. the entire system of higher education establishments, must be accessible to every individual. This provision also means that those who seek higher education may not be subjected to requirements that are based on criteria other than their abilities. The said provision is inseparable from the principle of the equality of persons, which is enshrined in Article 29 of the Constitution, as well as from the provision of Paragraph 2 thereof, whereby human rights may not be restricted and no one may be granted any privileges on the grounds of gender, race, nationality, language, origin, social status, belief, convictions, or views.

It should be noted that state institutions have the duty not to impose any requirements inconsistent with the constitutional principle of the equality of persons on those who seek higher education, as well as to ensure that schools of higher education themselves do not lay down such requirements. A law must provide for such a legal regulation that would ensure that everyone has the possibility of seeking higher education according to individual abilities.

There must be a balance between the legitimate interests of a person and the needs of society and the state. The financial capacity of the state (including its capacity to fund higher education) is not and cannot be unlimited. The constitutional provision that higher education is accessible to everyone according to individual abilities may not be interpreted as imposing the duty on the state to ensure the funding of any higher education for anyone capable of seeking it without proper consideration of the needs and capacities of society and the state. The constitutional provision that higher education is accessible to everyone according to individual abilities may not be interpreted in a way that would deny the constitutional right of an individual to seek higher education according to his/her abilities even when the state does not finance his/her education because that would exceed the needs and capacities of society and the state. The need of society and the state to have graduate specialists in various areas and the possibility of financing only a certain number of specialists must not be an obstacle for an individual to seeking higher education according to his/her abilities by other than state funds even when this exceeds the needs and capacities of society and the state.

It follows from Paragraph 3 of Article 41 of the Constitution that, if a state school of higher education is able to provide higher education in accordance with the requirements set by the state not only to persons whose studies are financed by the state, but also to those who seek higher education in a state school of higher education by other than state funds, then it is not allowed to establish such a legal regulation that would obstruct or even prohibit a state school of higher education from admitting such persons to studies at that school of higher education.

The right of citizens who are good at their studies at state schools of higher education to acquire higher education free of charge (Paragraph 3 of Article 41 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 14 January 2002

Paragraph 3 of Article 41 of the Constitution consolidates the right of all citizens who are good at their studies at a state school of higher education to acquire higher education free of charge. This right implies that funds must be provided in the state budget to guarantee higher education at state schools of higher education free of charge for citizens who are good at their studies.

According to the Constitution, the state must cover tuition for citizens who are good at their studies at state schools of higher education if there are the following three conditions: (1) the student is a citizen of the Republic of Lithuania; (2) he/she studies at a state school of higher education; (3) he/she is good at his/her studies, i.e. his/her academic results meet the established criteria of good academic results.

Under Paragraph 3 of Article 41 of the Constitution, the higher education tuition of citizens who are students at state schools of higher education and are good at their studies may not be imposed on these persons themselves in whatever form. The higher education of citizens who are students at state schools of higher education and are good at their studies is financed by the state. According to the Constitution, the state has the duty to provide for the principles and procedure of the allocation of state funds necessary to finance the tuition of citizens who are students at state schools of higher education and are good at their studies, as well as to establish control over the lawfulness of the use of such funds.

On the other hand, the Constitution does not contain any prohibition precluding the state from assuming higher financial obligations, in accordance with its capacities, to students of schools of higher education. The assuming of higher financial obligations than implied in the constitutional provision stipulating that citizens who are good at their studies are guaranteed education at state schools of higher education free of charge must not deny the striving for a just and harmonious society enshrined in the Constitution.

The constitutional provision that citizens who are good at their studies are guaranteed education at state schools of higher education free of charge means that a citizen who is good at his/her studies has the right that his/her education at a state school of higher education would be financed by the state. According to the Constitution, it is financed from state budget funds. Therefore, the criteria making it possible to establish which persons are regarded as good at their studies and, accordingly, as prescribed by the Constitution, have the right that their education at state schools of higher education be financed by the state should be established by means of a law.

The autonomy of schools of higher education (Paragraph 3 of Article 40 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 14 January 2002

Paragraph 3 of Article 40 of the Constitution prescribes that schools of higher education are granted autonomy. "Traditionally, the autonomy of a school of higher education is conceived as the right to independently determine and establish in its regulations or statute the organisational and governmental structure, relationships with other partners, the order of research and studies, academic syllabus, the procedure of student enrolment, as well as how to resolve other related questions, to use property given over by the state (or newly acquired property), to possess certain territory and buildings, as well as other property allocated for the needs of research and studies, and to have the guarantee of inviolability. For this purpose, a school of higher education is guaranteed institutional autonomy, i.e. a certain status, which means that there are certain spheres of activities independent of control exercised by executive power” (ruling of 27 June 1994). The Constitution guarantees autonomy for both state and non-state schools of higher education.

State funds must be allocated to state schools of higher education so that they would perform their functions

The Constitutional Court’s ruling of 14 January 2002

The fact that, under the Constitution, the system of establishments of higher education, including state schools of higher education, must be available to everyone according to individual abilities, that citizens who are good at their studies are guaranteed education at state schools of higher education free of charge, and the fact that the Constitution establishes the autonomy of schools of higher education imply that, in order that state schools of higher education would perform their functions, state funds must be allocated to them. Such state funds must be provided for in the state budget. The essential guarantee of the autonomy of state schools of higher education is such a legal regulation where the law on the state budget provides not only for allocations to higher education in general, but also funds to each state school of higher education. When providing for state budget funds to state schools of higher education, consideration should be given to the needs of society and the state ensured by these schools, their existing and future programmes, also their way of ensuring adherence to the set teaching standards, the compliance of the content and level of teaching with qualification recognised by the state, state obligations to these schools, etc.

The autonomy of schools of higher education (Paragraph 3 of Article 40 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court’s ruling of 5 February 2002

The system of higher education ensures the development of science and culture, the social sphere and economy. The mission of higher education is to create, accumulate, and disseminate knowledge of science and cultural values, as well as to educate personalities and society. Therefore, society is interested in creating conditions for schools of higher education in order to ensure all-round education of a personality, freedom of teaching, as well as freedom of scientific research and creative activities. Accordingly, schools of higher education have to react to changes in social needs and coordinate their activities with the interests of society. Consequently, the principle of the autonomy of schools of higher education must be balanced with the principle of responsibility and accountability to society, other constitutional values, with the duty of schools of higher education to observe the Constitution and laws, and with the interaction and reconciliation of interests of schools of higher education and society. ... It should be noted that “the right of the state to regulate external affairs of a school of higher education does not contradict its autonomy unless it impairs freedom of research and teaching in the school of higher education” (ruling of 27 June 1994).

Paragraph 3 of Article 40 of the Constitution prescribes that schools of higher education are granted autonomy. The diversity of goals of higher education determines the fact that there may be a variety of types of schools of higher education. In its ruling of 10 July 1996, the Constitutional Court noted that universities differ from other schools of higher education in the nature of offered studies, their goals, the level of the preparation of specialists, etc. Taking into consideration the fact that there may be a variety of types of schools of higher education, laws may provide for the autonomy of different scope for different types of schools of higher education (depending on whether they are universities or colleges, on whether they are founded by the state or by other entities, or on other conditions); laws may regulate the governance and self-governance of schools of higher education in a different manner.

The provision of Paragraph 3 of Article 40 of the Constitution may not be interpreted as prohibiting against establishing, by means of laws, uneven limits of autonomy for different types of schools of higher education. As such, the different establishment, by means of laws, of governance forms of schools of higher education of various types and of schools of higher education (state and non-state) founded by various founders, as well as the different establishment of the institutions of their governance, the procedure for the formation of such institutions, and the functions and powers of such institutions, does not deny the constitutional principle of the autonomy of schools of higher education.

The discretion of the legislature to establish the manner and means of control over the use of state funds allocated to schools of higher education

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 5 February 2002

... For the purpose of the implementation of their functions, state schools of higher education are allocated state funds provided for in the state budget.

A school of higher education that receives funds from the state budget must account for the proper use of the received funds. It is within the discretion of the legislature to establish, by means of a law, the manner and means of control over the use of such funds.

Paragraph 1 of Article 134 of the Constitution provides that the National Audit Office supervises the lawfulness of the possession and use of state-owned property and the execution of the state budget; however, this does not mean that the legislature does not have the right to establish also other forms of supervision.

The right to seek higher education according to individual abilities (Paragraph 3 of Article 41 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 20 February 2008

The constitutional freedom of each individual to choose an occupation or business also implies the right to freely choose and acquire a profession. This right is related to the right to education, which is often a necessary condition for the acquisition of the respective professional qualification. Higher education, which is awarded upon completing studies in higher education, is necessary for certain professions.

According to Paragraph 3 of Article 41 of the Constitution, everyone has the right to higher education accessible according to individual abilities. This constitutional human right is an important condition for implementing various rights and legitimate expectations of an individual and implies the duty of the state to create the preconditions for implementing this right (rulings of 14 January 2002 and 7 June 2007). ... the constitutional human right to seek higher education according to individual abilities and the constitutional human right to have access to profession implies, among other things, the duty of the state to ensure that the documents (diplomas of higher education) confirming acquired higher education (i.e. the completed studies of higher education and an acquired qualification degree) that are issued by schools of higher education on the basis of legal acts (based on the Constitution and laws) passed by state institutions (thus, such schools of higher education operate legally and are recognised by the state), would be recognised as proof that a certain person has acquired higher education (profession) of a certain field and/or level, which is required so that he/she could do a certain job or hold a certain position.

When the constitutional rights of a person to work, education, and profession are interpreted in the context of the constitutional principles of legal certainty, legal security, and transparency, it should be held that the state has the duty to ensure that the requirements defining the education necessary for doing a certain job or holding a certain position would be public and clear; the main requirements must not be changed in an arbitrary and voluntaristic manner; otherwise, people would be unable to properly plan the choice of their profession and education.

The provisions of Paragraph 3 of Article 41 of the Constitution, which consolidate the human right to seek higher education according to individual abilities, should be interpreted by taking account of the provision of Paragraph 3 of Article 40 of the Constitution, whereby schools of higher education are granted autonomy, and of the provision of Paragraph 1 of Article 42 of the Constitution, whereby science and research are free.

University and non-university higher education in law

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 20 February 2008

... not only the abundance of knowledge, but also broadness and fundamentality, are characteristic of university education, since persons who have university education acquire supplementary and universal knowledge that is necessary when adopting crucial decisions in various spheres of life, while other higher educational establishments perform a narrower function – they grant higher education that is the foundation of professional activities in a particular area ... the purpose of university legal education is to prepare specialists with multidisciplinary profiles who are able to assess the entire legal system and decide difficult problems. A much wider and diverged syllabus of university studies, studies that take place a longer time period and are more fundamental, greater attention to general subjects of humanities, private law, etc. help to achieve the said purpose of university legal education. Therefore, the education in law acquired in said other schools of higher education may not be unconditionally regarded as corresponding to university education, even though the former is deemed to be higher education.

Supervision over the activity of schools of higher education (control over the quality of higher education) (Paragraph 4 of Article 40 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 20 February 2008

... the autonomy of schools of higher education does not mean that the activity of such schools may not be subject to state control; quite to the contrary, this activity, since it is related, inter alia, to the implementation of human rights and freedoms, as well as with the use of state budget funds, must be subject to regulation and supervision; this also stems from the provision of Paragraph 4 of Article 40 of the Constitution, whereby the state supervises the activities of establishments of teaching and education. The Constitutional Court has held that, under the Constitution, the legislature is entitled to establish which state institution (or institutions) must supervise the implementation of the state education policy and which competent institution of the executive must approve the regulations for such supervision (ruling of 13 June 2000); this is mutatis mutandis also applicable to supervision over the activities of schools of higher education. However, the right of the state to regulate external relationships of schools of higher education may not limit freedom of scientific and educational activities of schools of higher education (rulings of 27 June 1994 and 5 February 2002).

It also needs to be mentioned that the autonomy of schools of higher education, which is consolidated in the Constitution, does not at all imply that the respective powers may be granted to all schools of higher education; quite to the contrary, the rights enjoyed by schools of higher education may be differentiated (by having regard to the Constitution) according to various important criteria, inter alia, according to the status of such schools of higher education (i.e. whether they are universities or not), the level of higher education provided by them to persons that study there, the syllabi they follow, their scientific potential, etc. (decision of 1 February 2008).

The guarantee (which arises from the Constitution) of the recognition of higher education (profession) provided by legally operating schools of higher education implies the powers of the respective state institutions to control the quality of higher education and ensure that the level of provided higher education, which is marked by various qualification degrees, would meet certain uniform standards of the quality of higher education – both general standards and those concretising them, i.e. those defining the requirements for certain fields of studies. The said standards must be established by the state institutions that, within their competence, form the policy of higher education, as well as organise and carry out supervision over the activities of schools of higher education. The standards of the quality of higher education that must be met by a person aspiring to hold a certain position or to be engaged in a certain professional activity must be established by means of a law; ensuring such standards and control over compliance with them may also be established by means of substatutory legal acts, as well as by means of legal acts of schools of higher education; requirements for certain fields of studies may also be established by means of substatutory acts the legal regulation established wherein must not compete with that established in laws. The importance of such standards is especially evident in certain professions, inter alia, the professions controlled by the state, where especially complex and responsible work is linked with the acquisition of such professions; the importance of such standards is also especially evident in such positions in institutions of public power where certain functions related to the implementation of public power (first of all, state power) are entrusted only to such representatives of a certain profession who have especially high qualification; in the context of the constitutional justice case at issue, it needs to be noted that it is especially evident that the said standards are necessary for the legal profession (and not only for it).

Requirements for higher legal studies; the duty of the state to ensure that the level of higher education in law would comply with the quality standards set for such education (on the requirements for the professional qualification of lawyers, also see 2.4.1. Economic rights, 2.4.1.2. The right to work, 2.4.1.2.2. Professional competence requirements; on the requirements for the professional qualification of judges, see 9.1. Courts, 9.1.4. The constitutional status of judges. The appointment of judges, their professional career, and their release from duties. The judicial self-governance institutions)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 20 February 2008

... taking account of the role of the legal profession in the state and its legal system, it should be held that, although schools of higher education establish their study programmes by themselves and, due to this, these programmes can be rather varied ones (since there is a great variety of jobs for the occupation of a lawyer, and this occupation is characterised by the fact that different jobs need higher education in law that is of a different level), the state has the duty to ensure that the level of higher education in law (which is marked by qualification degrees) provided in different schools of higher education according to various programmes of studies of law would comply with certain uniform standards of the quality of higher education in law. Of course, if there is a need (taking account of various important factors, inter alia, changes in the legal system and in the European legal area, as well as in international practice), these standards may be modified.

Taking account of the principles of legal certainty and legal security, which are consolidated in the Constitution, the fact that a person has completed university studies in the field of law leads to the presumption that such a person is eligible for a job for which university higher education in law is necessary (of course, if he/she meets all the conditions that need not be limited only to the requirement of university higher education in law, but may also include the requirements for a certain work period as a lawyer, the practice performed, etc.). The same can be said as regards, inter alia, citizens who wish to apply for the position of a judge. Thus, the programmes of university studies in the field of law of schools of higher education must be such that the theoretical preparedness and practical abilities (acquired during the time of the studies) of persons who have completed these studies would raise no doubts, while the professional qualification acquired by them would allow them to be eligible for holding positions (professions) in order to hold which (in order to engage in which) university higher education in law is required.

Therefore, whatever forms of studies, the scope of a study programme designed for the acquisition of the same qualification degree (professional qualification) must be not lower than the established standard; while this standard, in its turn, must be oriented to such core of university higher studies in law that is universally recognised in the countries of the western legal tradition (especially, in the continental legal tradition), as the said core is ... universal and more or less stable; the said standard must include all areas of law that are traditionally and universally recognised as the most important ones – the so-called main subjects of studies ... which are in line with the concept of fully fledged university higher education in law, and the said standard may not be limited only to one area of law. Only in such a case will the qualification of a lawyer be reasonably recognised for persons who completed higher studies in law.

... in this ruling of the Constitutional Court, it was held that ... [the] main subjects of [university legal] studies are the legal theory, the history of law, constitutional law, administrative law and administrative procedure law, finance law, criminal law and criminal procedure law, civil law and civil procedure law, labour law, international public law, and European Union law; also, as a rule, students are required to study even more legal disciplines, as well as certain non-legal (social, humanities) subjects.

It has also been held that the transformation of the model of the preparation of lawyers – that of the system of higher education in law – is hardly the grounds or a stimulus for abandoning the core of university higher studies in law that is universally recognised in the countries of the western legal tradition (especially, in the continental legal tradition), where such studies comply with the concept of fully fledged university higher education in law: and, if the model of two-cycle university studies in the field of law is chosen, it is necessary to ensure that the above-discussed main study subjects in the field of law, as well as other legal subjects and certain subjects in non-legal fields, would be studied.

Thus, the same professional standards (the same standards as for fully fledged single-cycle studies in the field of law) are also applicable to university higher education in law when the studies are conducted under the programmes assigned to other models of higher studies in law; the occurred diversification of the preparation of lawyers and the emergence of new models of higher (first of all, university) studies in law may not serve as grounds for diminishing these standards or negating them at all. Quite to the contrary, no matter what new models of studies, which have not existed in Lithuania before, came into being, the diversification of the preparation of lawyers must be oriented to the standards (of qualification, professional knowledge, abilities) of the legal profession that come from the western legal tradition.

[...]

It needs to be noted that the mere fact that studying the study subjects that include the legal areas traditionally and universally recognised as the most important ones is joined with studying some other subjects (which, as a rule, are tightly related to law) composing a comparatively significant part (module) of the study programme, also the fact that certain study programmes are named as programmes of non-legal studies, but their names reflect an additional field (module) of these studies, in themselves do not mean and may not be regarded as grounds for asserting that persons who complete such studies are groundlessly awarded the qualification degree of bachelor of law or master of law (thus, also the qualification of a lawyer). The important thing is that these studies encompass the study subjects (disciplines) that compose such core of university higher studies in law that is generally recognised in the countries of the western legal tradition (especially, in the continental legal tradition).

[...]

... when persons who have the degree of bachelor that was acquired upon finishing studies under a non-university bachelor study programme in the field of law are admitted to university master studies in the field of law, additional studies must be organised for such persons.

It needs to be noted that the discussed requirement of “levelling” studies is not applicable to situations where a person who has the qualification degree of bachelor in any field of studies that was acquired at a university is admitted to studies under a university integrated studies programme in the field of law, inter alia, such a study programme upon completing which the qualification degree of master of law is granted.

In addition, higher studies in law (as any other studies) must be organised and continue inasmuch as there is enough time realistically to study the theoretical subjects provided for in the study programme and to acquire practical abilities; no matter what form of studies (full-time studies, part-time studies, studies by correspondence, or another form of studies) there is, the time (expressed in study credits) assigned to the studies, including professional practice, must be the same.

Regard must also be paid to the requirement arising from the Constitution to ensure that the requirements defining the legal education necessary in order to work in a certain job or to hold a certain position would be public and clear and that they would not be changed in an arbitrary and voluntaristic manner.

State institutions and schools of higher education within their competence must ensure that the established standards of university higher education in law would be followed.

The state higher education policy

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 20 March 2008

Paragraph 1 of Article 40 of the Constitution expressis verbis mentions state schools of higher education; Paragraph 2 of Article 40 of the Constitution provides that “non-state establishments of teaching ... may be founded according to the procedure established by law”; Paragraph 4 of Article 40 of the Constitution provides that “The State shall supervise the activities of establishments of teaching”; Paragraph 3 of Article 41 of the Constitution provides that “Higher education shall be accessible to everyone according to individual abilities. Citizens who are good at their studies shall be guaranteed education at state schools of higher education free of charge”; Paragraph 2 of Article 42 of the Constitution provides that “The State shall support ... science”. These provisions of the Constitution imply the duty of the state to establish a system of state schools of higher education and to support state schools of higher education. Under the Constitution, the state also has the duty to define, by means of a law, the procedure of founding non-state schools of higher education.

The state forms and executes the higher education policy, which should conform to the public interest and needs of society. This policy includes, inter alia, the establishment of strategic areas (fields) of the development of higher education, the choosing of a model of financing higher education that corresponds to state needs and capacities, the determination of the demand for specialists of various areas (fields), and the establishment of measures allowing the ensuring of the quality of studies. Under the Constitution, inter alia, Paragraph 3 of Article 41 thereof, the state must undertake the obligations to finance the preparation of a certain number of specialists. Such obligations – which must be announced in advance – are in conformity with the need of society and the state to have a certain number of specialists of certain areas (fields) with higher education, as well as the capacities of society and the state to finance their preparation.

When forming and executing the higher education policy, the state must pay regard to the interests of schools of higher education, i.e. the interests of both state schools of higher education and non-state schools of higher education, since higher education and science in general can be fostered and developed only without overly detailed state administration of scientific activity and teaching. In this context, it needs to be noted that, under Paragraph 1 of Article 42 of the Constitution, culture, science and research, and teaching are free. However, it needs to be emphasised that funds allocated by the state to schools of higher education must be used efficiently and in compliance with requirements of legal acts.

The right to seek higher education according to individual abilities; the duty of the state to create an effective system of loans and support for persons studying at schools of higher education (Paragraph 3 of Article 41 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 20 March 2008

According to Paragraph 3 of Article 41 of the Constitution, everyone has the right to higher education accessible according to individual abilities. ...

However, it needs to be emphasised that the accessibility of higher education to everyone according to individual abilities does not at all mean that higher education is universally compulsory, nor does it mean that it is required to establish such standards of higher education that would worsen the quality of higher education.

State budget funds must be allocated to state schools of higher education. Upon assignment by the state, specialists of certain areas (fields) may also be prepared at non-state schools of higher education from state budget funds. In addition, it is permitted to support citizens who study in schools of higher education of other states from state budget funds.

In this context, it needs to be mentioned that, as it was held by the Constitutional Court, under the Constitution, the state must create such a system of support for persons who seek to acquire higher education where every person who learns at a school of higher education and requires support would have the possibility of getting a state loan necessary for his/her studies (ruling of 7 June 2007). Such a system of supporting persons who seek to acquire higher education must also ensure the possibilities for persons who study at schools of higher education, who meet constitutionally reasonable criteria, and who need support to receive support of a different nature (grants, allowances, etc.). The state may establish various forms of granting state loans to persons studying at state schools of higher education, as well as those of supporting these persons, and it has wide discretion in this area. However, it needs to be emphasised that the system of granted loans and support must ensure the accessibility to higher education according to individual abilities; the constitutional principles of non-discrimination, clarity, and transparency must be respected. The system of loans to those studying at state schools of higher education and support of those studying at schools of higher education must be effective and reliable.

The Constitutional requirement to ensure accessibility to higher education according to individual abilities does not mean that this must be done only by state funds. In the Constitutional Court's ruling of 14 January 2002 ... it was held that, if a state higher school is able to provide higher education in accordance with requirements set by the state not only to persons whose studies are financed by the state, but also to those who seek higher education in a state higher school by other than state funds, it is not allowed to establish such a legal regulation that would obstruct or even prohibit a state school of higher education from admitting such persons to studies at that school of higher education. However (especially due to the fact that ... in Lithuania, state schools of higher education are dominant), it needs to be emphasised that the right of state schools of higher education, which stems from the Constitution, also to provide higher education to persons who seek education at their own expense (providing the respective school of higher education has the possibilities of providing higher education that complies with the quality standards established by the state) must not create in any cases the preconditions for worsening the quality of studies at state schools of higher education, inter alia, for deteriorating the conditions of studies for persons who seek to acquire higher education by state funds.

The right of citizens who are good at their studies at state schools of higher education to acquire higher education free of charge (Paragraph 3 of Article 41 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 20 March 2008

... under Paragraph 3 of Article 41 of the Constitution, the state has the duty to guarantee citizens who are good at their studies education at state schools of higher education free of charge.

The Constitution does not expressis verbis define which citizens should be regarded as those who are good at their studies. The content of the expression "a citizen who is good at his/her studies" is revealed in the official constitutional doctrine: a citizen who is good at his/her studies should be regarded as the one who "is good at his/her studies, i.e. his/her study results meet the established criteria of good learning" (ruling of 14 January 2002); the criteria making it possible to establish which persons are regarded as good at their studies and, consequently, as prescribed by the Constitution, have the right that their education at state schools of higher education be financed by the state should be established by means of a law (ruling of 7 June 2007). These criteria must be known in advance, they must be clear and transparent, they must not deviate not only from the constitutional concept of good learning, but also from such a concept of good learning that arises from the social experience of society and does not deny the meaning of the word "good" as understood by everyone and generally recognised. In the context of the constitutional justice case at issue, it needs to be emphasised that such law-established criteria according to which persons whose studies are funded by the state are regarded as those who are good at their studies must not be formalistic; moreover, it is not permitted to establish in advance a number (either absolute or relative) of citizens who are allegedly "good at their studies", i.e. it is not permitted to establish any quota regarding this matter, since it is impossible to predict in advance precisely how many students will actually be good in their studies and how many of them will not. The establishment of such quotas would completely distort the constitutional concept of good learning. On the one hand, there can actually be more citizens who are good at their studies than it is provided for by establishing a quota a priori; therefore, some citizens who, according to the generally recognised criteria, are doubtlessly regarded as good in their studies would remain outside of the quota; in such cases, the state would not fulfil its constitutional duty to finance the studies of all students who are good in their studies at state schools of higher education. On the other hand, there can actually be fewer citizens who are good at their studies than it is provided for by establishing a quota a priori; still, it would be necessary to fund the studies of such citizens studying at state schools of higher education who were covered by the said quota accidentally and whose study results, according to the generally recognised criteria, are doubtlessly not regarded as good; in such cases, state funds would be used in a manner that is constitutionally unreasonable and unfair from the social standpoint.

It needs to be specially emphasised that it is impossible to interpret the constitutional provision whereby citizens who are good at their studies are guaranteed education at state schools of higher education free of charge as meaning that the Constitution guarantees higher education covered from state budget funds for all citizens who are good at their studies at state schools of higher education no matter under what conditions they were admitted to such schools, i.e. also for those citizens who are good at their studies who, however, in the course of admittance to a state school of higher education, were not admitted to the places whose number announced in advance conforms to the obligation of the state to fund the preparation of a certain number of specialists, but were admitted to study at a state school of higher education at their own expense. The said provision of the Constitution should be interpreted as consolidating the duty of the state to guarantee higher education funded from the state budget only for those citizens who are good at their studies at state schools of higher education who are trained in order to satisfy the state-determined need for specialists of the respective areas (fields). ... support of higher education must be regulated by means of legal acts in such a manner that the expenses of studies of citizens who are good at their studies at state schools of higher education and are trained in order to satisfy the established need for specialists of the respective areas (fields) would by no means fall upon those persons.

Supervision over the activity of schools of higher education (Paragraph 4 of Article 40 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 20 March 2008

... the constitutional provision that the state shall supervise the activities of establishments of teaching, the constitutional imperative of balancing the interests of schools of higher education and those of society, the constitutional obligation of the state to ensure the effectiveness of the system of higher education also imply the duty of the state to adopt the respective decisions linked with financing higher education in state schools of higher education by assessing whether higher education is provided in these schools of higher education according to confirmed programmes of studies, also, by assessing the quality of these programmes and that of their execution, and by assessing the capabilities of schools of higher education regarding the preparation of a certain number of good quality specialists of the respective areas (fields); it is also necessary to assess whether there are necessary conditions in state schools of higher education to provide higher education that meets the standards established by the state to persons whose studies are financed from state budget funds, as well as to persons who study at their own expense.

[...]

... under the Constitution, the state, while having the duty to supervise the activity of establishments of teaching, must also supervise whether state-owned property transferred to state schools of higher education is possessed, used, and disposed of in compliance with the public interest and needs of society.

[...]

... state schools of higher education may also provide higher education that conforms to the standards established by the state to persons who study at their own expense provided that the respective state school of higher education has such possibilities. Thus, persons studying in schools of higher education should also be treated as consumers of higher education services. While providing higher education to persons studying at their own expense, state schools of higher education compete with one another and with non-state schools of higher education.

The provision “The State shall supervise the activities of establishments of teaching and education” of Paragraph 4 of Article 40 of the Constitution, the provision “The law ... shall protect freedom of fair competition” of Paragraph 4 of Article 46 thereof, and the provision “The State shall defend the interests of the consumer” of Paragraph 5 of the same article, give rise to the duty of the state to establish, when regulating the relationships connected with a school of higher education, such a legal regulation that would not distort fair competition and to consolidate various measures of the protection of consumers of higher education services. When the respective relationships are regulated by legal acts, it is necessary to pay regard to the fact that ... state budget funds are allocated to state schools of higher education and certain property belonging to the state by right of ownership is transferred to them.

The specific nature of the work of teachers of schools of higher education

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 20 March 2008

In order that schools of higher education would be able to perform their constitutional obligation – to provide higher education that meets the standards established by the state – it is especially important that highly-qualified teachers work in them. This condition of good-quality higher education is inseparable not only from freedom of science, research, and teaching, which is consolidated in the Constitution, but also from the existing infrastructure of higher education and state investment into this infrastructure, from the structure of schools of higher education (which should not be regulated by state legal acts in a manner that would stop the dynamism of scientific and pedagogical activity and the mobility of teachers and scientists), as well as from the respective social guarantees established for teachers, inter alia, from the establishment of remuneration that corresponds to the social function (protected by the Constitution) of this profession, secures dignified life, that would make it possible to devote all working time to pedagogical and scientific activity, as well as to increasing qualification. Teaching and scientific activity are a special activity that requires creativity; such activity is not similar to other types of professional activities and it is impossible to identify it with those other types of activities. Studies do not mean working solely in lecture rooms; therefore, the work of teachers in preparing qualified specialists is by no means linked exclusively with the time spent with individuals studying in lecture rooms etc.; a very important part of the quality, thus, creative, work time of a teacher of a school of higher education is given for preparation for classes with the students, for guiding students in their independent studies, for heading scientific activities, for professional communication with other scientists and researchers, etc., i.e. for activities that are often conducted outside the premises of a school of higher education, and, sometimes, such activities cannot be conducted on these premises (all the more so because, as it is generally known, in Lithuania, teachers in schools of higher education do not have individual premises for work). This specificity of teachers of schools of higher education determines that the account of their workload may not be based upon the mere formal criterion – the time spent in a lecture room or on the premises of a school of higher education in general. The account of the workload of teachers of schools of higher education must be regulated by legal acts in a manner that the said specificity of their work would be taken into consideration; the constitutional guarantee of the autonomy of schools of higher education implies that, in this connection, the legislature must provide for a special legal regulation, while the greater part of the legal regulation of the said relationships should be composed by a local legal regulation established by schools of higher education, which must be based on the legal regulation established by the legislature. Schools of higher education must be guaranteed the possibilities of preparing qualified specialists; otherwise, the value of higher education acquired in schools of higher education of Lithuania would be diminished.

Financing higher education; establishing the cost of studies

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 20 March 2008

The Constitutional Court has held that: while preparing a draft state budget, the Government must take account of the existing economic and social situation, the needs and capacities of society and the state, the available and potential financial resources and state liabilities, as well as other important factors; the state capacity to finance higher education is limited; the state capacity to finance higher education is and must be related to the interest of society and the state – the need to have specialists of various areas with higher education (rulings of 14 January 2002 and 11 July 2002). Thus, the state is under the duty to determine the need for specialists of various areas (fields) by taking account of not only the existing demand for such specialists, but also of the demand for such specialists in the future, and to allocate the necessary funds in order to prepare such specialists. It has been held in this ruling of the Constitutional Court that the state obligations, which are announced in advance, to finance the preparation of a certain number of specialists are in conformity with the need of society and the state to have a certain number of specialists of certain areas (fields) with higher education, as well as the capacities of society and the state to finance their preparation.

The state budget funds allocated to schools of higher education also include funds for financing the studies of citizens who are good at their studies at state schools of higher education. However, it needs to be noted that, as it has been held in this ruling of the Constitutional Court, the Constitution guarantees higher education covered by state funds not to all citizens who are good at their studies at state schools of higher education, no matter under what conditions they were admitted to such schools (i.e. not to all those citizens who are good at their studies and who, however, in the course of admission to a particular state school of higher education, are not admitted to the places whose number, announced in advance, conforms to the obligation of the state to fund the preparation of a certain number of specialists, but who are admitted to study at a state school of higher education at their own expense), but only to those citizens who are good at their studies at state schools of higher education and who are prepared in order to meet the state-determined need for specialists of the respective areas (fields). It is for financing their studies that it is necessary to provide the required funds in the state budget. If the study results of these citizens do not correspond to the criteria of good learning established under the law, the state is not obliged to finance their studies.

The state, which, under the Constitution, has the duty to support science, ensure accessibility to higher education, and guarantee free-of-charge higher education in state schools of higher education to those citizens who are good at their studies and who are prepared by meeting the established need for specialists of the respective areas (fields), may choose and establish in laws various models of financing higher education. In doing so, the legislature is bound by the constitutional obligations of the state, as well as the financial capacities of the state, which, as mentioned before, are limited. A law may not establish any such model of financing higher education where it would not be based on a balanced assessment of the needs of both society and the state and the financial capacities of the state and where the implementation of such a model by the state would clearly and obviously be impossible; the establishment of such a model would be in conflict, inter alia, with the constitutional imperative of social harmony and would not allow the state to perform its various other obligations.

Therefore, when establishing a model of financing higher education and regulating, by means of legal acts, the relationships linked thereto, account must be taken of the fact that higher education that would meet the quality standards established by the state can be provided by such schools of higher education that have highly qualified teachers, the indispensable training facilities, the necessary infrastructure, etc. ... under the Constitution, the rights enjoyed by schools of higher education may be differentiated (by having regard to the Constitution), inter alia, according to the status of these schools of higher education (i.e. whether they are universities or not), the level of higher education provided by them to persons that study there, the syllabi they follow, their scientific potential, etc. Thus, when account is taken of all this, the funding of state schools of higher education from the state budget may also be different and, in certain respects, it must be different. There is not any provision of the Constitution that could be interpreted as implying egalitarianism in this area.

The planning of funds for state schools of higher education in the budget is inseparable from the reasonable and fair computation of expenses of studies, i.e. how much funds are necessary for the arrangement of good quality studies in those schools of higher education and the maintenance of the proper level of scientific activity. The expenses of studies (also those in state schools of higher education) are determined by various factors; in different schools of higher education the expenses of studies even of the same area (fields) and of the same quality can be different. The state, while taking account of the position of schools of higher education, has the powers to establish the composition of the expenses of studies in state schools of higher education; by means of state legal acts, the rational, clear, transparent, and reasonable criteria may and must be established where such criteria would enable state schools of higher education to compute realistic expenses of studies conducted in them according to areas (fields), cycles, and forms of studies so that the financing of these studies from the state budget would correspond to its purpose, i.e. so that this would allow the ensuring of good quality preparation of specialists of various areas (fields). Therefore, the computation of the expenses of studies must not be pressed on schools of higher education. Such a legal regulation that creates the preconditions for ignoring the position of schools of higher education based on rational arguments regarding the realistic expenses of studies conducted in them would doubtlessly violate the autonomy of schools of higher education, which is guaranteed by the Constitution; the said legal regulation would also violate other values consolidated, defended, and protected by the Constitution, inter alia, the right of an individual to seek good-quality higher education. When assigning a school of higher education to admit a certain number of students, the state must guarantee that the state budget will provide for the respective funds and that these state funds will cover their expenses of studies, of course, providing the study results of such students will correspond to the criteria of good learning established under the law.

... the computed realistic expenses of studies are an important guideline in establishing the cost of studies that must be paid for studies at state schools of higher education by persons who are prepared by satisfying the need (established by the state) for the specialists of various areas (fields) if their study results do not correspond to the criteria of good learning established under the law (since, as mentioned before, although the funds necessary for their studies must be provided for in the state budget, if the study results of these citizens do not correspond to the criteria of good learning established under the law, the state will not be obliged to finance their studies).

The said expenses of studies are also an important guideline in establishing the cost of studies that must be paid by persons who are not admitted to the places whose number, announced in advance, corresponds to the established obligation of the state to finance the preparation of a certain number of specialists, but who are admitted to studies in a state school of higher education at their own expense. There are no legal arguments that would allow maintaining that the cost that must be paid by such students for their studies must in all cases be the same as the cost that must be paid by persons who are prepared by satisfying the need (established by the state) for the specialists of various areas (fields) if their study results do not correspond to the criteria of good learning established under the law. As mentioned before, the teaching of such students depends on the capacities of a school of higher education to provide good-quality higher education without creating any preconditions for the deterioration of the quality of studies in state schools of higher education, inter alia, by giving less attention to the persons who seek to acquire higher education by state funds; thus, due to the creation of particular possibilities, additional expenses may also arise and, if the state assigns the admission of fewer students than schools of higher education are capable of preparing, the expenses for studies may decrease. Consequently, the discussed cost of studies could not necessarily be the same.

It needs to be emphasised that state schools of higher education have the powers to establish the cost of studies. In addition, it needs to be emphasised that this cost must be rationally reasoned, it must not create any preconditions for violating the constitutional principle of accessibility to higher education according to individual abilities, the imperatives (consolidated in the Constitution) of social harmony and justice, and it may not increase social exclusion. From the viewpoint of the Constitution, it would be unjustifiable to establish such cost for studies that would also create the preconditions for covering such expenses by means of studying persons that are not necessary so that particular persons who pay for their studies would acquire good-quality higher education, i.e. that are not necessary for the arrangement of good-quality studies in those schools of higher education and the maintenance of the proper level of scientific activity.

The organisational and governance structure of a school of higher education; the financial independence of schools of higher education

The Constitutional Court's decision of 28 October 2009

The organisational structure of a school of higher education comprises the units of the school of higher education in which studies are organised and scientific research is performed (e.g. faculties, their affiliates, institutes, departments, laboratories, etc.).

The governance structure of a school of higher education in the broad sense is understood to be a system of certain single-person and/or collegial institutions that adopt decisions on issues of the governance of school of higher education, that perform the functions of administration and control (e.g. the rector, vice-rectors, the senate, the council, the administration, etc.). According to their purpose, these institutions perform different functions.

The Constitutional Court has held that laws may regulate the governance and self-governance of schools of higher education in a different manner; as such, the different establishment, by means of laws, of governance forms of schools of higher education of various types and of schools of higher education (state and non-state) founded by various founders, as well as the different establishment of the institutions of their governance, the procedure for the formation of such institutions, and the functions and powers of such institutions, does not deny the constitutional principle of the autonomy of schools of higher education (ruling of 5 February 2002).

The Constitutional Court has also held that the constitutional guarantee of the autonomy of schools of higher education implies that, in this connection, the legislature must provide for a special legal regulation, while the greater part of the legal regulation of the said relationships should be composed by a local legal regulation established by schools of higher education, which must be based on the legal regulation established by the legislature (ruling of 20 March 2008).

It should be held that, under the Constitution, the legislature, while not denying the principle of the autonomy of schools of higher education, may establish, by means of laws, the grounds for the organisational and governance structure of schools of higher education.

[...]

... in order to ensure the constitutional implementation of the principle of academic freedom and the public interests so that the conditions would be created in schools of higher education to ensure all-round education of a personality and that schools of higher education would have freedom of teaching, scientific research, and creative activities, the institutions of governance that fulfil the self-governance functions of schools of higher education must be consolidated in the governance structure of schools of higher education. The imperative of the autonomy of schools of higher education, which stems from the Constitution, could be guaranteed only in this way.

At the same time, it should be noted that the Constitutional Court has held that the fact that the Constitution establishes the autonomy of higher schools allows making the presumption that, in order to perform their functions, state higher schools need to be allotted state funds. Such state funds must be provided for in the state budget. The essential guarantee of the autonomy of state higher schools is such a legal regulation where the law on the state budget provides not only for allocations to higher education in general, but also funds for each state school of higher education (ruling of 14 January 2002).

It should be held that it would be impossible to ensure the autonomy of schools of higher education, inter alia, the constitutional principle of academic freedom, if schools of higher education did not have financial independence, i.e. if their governance institutions that implement the functions of self-governance of the school of higher education had no possibility of adopting (on the basis of laws) decisions on the use of financial funds and other property for performing their mission. Consequently, the function of adopting decisions, based on laws, concerning the use of funds and other property, which is necessary for carrying out the mission of the school of higher education, must be assigned, inter alia, to the functions of the governance institutions of schools of higher education that implement the function of self-governance of the school of higher education.

In view of the fact that ... the constitutional notion of freedom of science, research, and teaching implies the professional independence of scientific community, which is inseparable from the self-governance of schools of higher education and which constitutes one of the fundamental conditions of the implementation of the autonomy of a school of higher education, it should be noted that self-governance must be implemented through the institutions of schools of higher education, the procedure of forming which should not be such that would not enable the academic community of a school of higher education to influence the adoption of decisions on managing the affairs of the school of higher education. For this reason, the governance institutions of schools of higher education that fulfil the self-governance functions of schools of higher education must be formed by schools of higher education themselves after they establish in their by-laws or statutes, on the basis of laws, the ways and procedure of forming such institutions. Only in this way the constitutional implementation of the principle of academic freedom would be guaranteed. At the same time, the imperative of the autonomy of schools of higher education that stems from the Constitution would be guaranteed.

It should be noted that, as a rule, these institutions of schools of higher education are formed from members of their academic community. The autonomy of schools of higher education implies the right of schools of higher education to provide that not exclusively members of the academic community of the respective school of higher education could become members of the said institutions.

[...]

... in order to enable the state to implement its obligation to supervise the activity of educational establishments, as well as to ensure the reconciliation of the principle of autonomy of schools of higher education with the principle of responsibility and accountability to society, to guarantee the quality of studies and development of scientific research, in the administrative structure of the school of higher education, as a rule, it is necessary to provide for an institution that would perform the functions of control and supervision; the purpose of such an institution would be to ensure the responsibility and accountability of a school of higher education to society; however, the said institution would not be directly related to the implementation of the principle of academic freedom. In this context, it should be noted that such an institution that performs the functions of control and supervision and the purpose of which is to ensure the responsibility and accountability of the school of higher education to society may be formed not exclusively from members of the academic community of the respective school of higher education – inter alia, representatives of institutions of the executive power of the state may also be appointed to it.

It should be held that, while not denying the principle of the autonomy of schools of higher education, the legislature may, by means of a law, establish the ways and procedure of forming such institutions within the governance structure of schools of higher education, which would perform the functions of control and supervision; the purpose of the said institutions would be to ensure the responsibility and accountability of schools of higher education to society.

In this context, it should be noted that it is not allowed to establish any such a legal regulation whereby an institution that performs the functions of control and supervision where the purpose of such an institution is to ensure the responsibility and accountability of a school of higher education to society would, in addition to the functions of control and supervision, also perform the governance functions of the school of higher education, which are, as mentioned before, assigned to the governance institutions of schools of higher education, where the latter institutions fulfil the self-governance functions of the school of higher education and are usually formed from members of the academic community of the respective schools of higher education.

The assignment by the state of a non-state school of higher education to prepare specialists of individual areas (fields) from state budget funds (Paragraph 3 of Article 41 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's decision of 18 December 2009

... it is impossible to interpret the Constitution, inter alia, Paragraph 3 of Article 41 thereof, as meaning that, upon assignment by the state, specialists of certain areas (fields) may not be prepared at non-state schools of higher education from state budget funds. Also, such situations are possible where specialists of certain areas (fields) cannot be prepared at state schools of higher education due to objective circumstances (for instance, situations are possible where state schools of higher education do not possess special training facilities, etc. in order to prepare the specialists of certain areas (fields) that are necessary for the state). At the same time, it needs to be noted that, in such cases, the assignment given by the state to a non-state school of higher education to prepare the specialists of certain areas (fields) from state budget funds must be based on a balanced assessment of the needs of both society and the state and that of the financial capacities of the state and it may not be in conflict with, inter alia, the constitutional imperative of social harmony. In such cases, the state, when assigning non-state schools of higher education, must guarantee that the expenses of learning (studies) of such specialists will be covered from state funds in cases where their study results will meet the criteria of good learning established by means of a law.

The assessment of the knowledge of individuals who study at state schools of higher education (Paragraph 3 of Article 40 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's decision of 18 December 2009

... as it has been held in the rulings of the Constitutional Court on more than one occasion, under Paragraph 3 of Article 40 of the Constitution, schools of higher education are granted autonomy; such autonomy includes, inter alia, the right to independently establish the procedure of science and studies, as well as syllabi, and to decide other related issues.

In the course of establishing the procedure of science and studies, the procedure for assessing the knowledge acquired in a state school of higher education must also be established. Such a procedure must be known in advance; it must be clear and objective.

It needs to be noted that the knowledge of the individuals who study at state schools of higher education must be assessed on a regular basis within the respective periods of studying at these schools. Legal acts may name these periods in a varied manner. As a rule, the basic assessment of the knowledge of individuals who study at Lithuanian state schools of higher education as regards the studied subjects is regularly conducted after each period of academic studies – a semester.

It needs to be mentioned that the procedure (established in a state school of higher education) of assessing the knowledge acquired in a state school of higher education must, inter alia, be such that would allow assessing whether the study results of citizens studying at state schools of higher education upon assignment by the state (i.e. those who are prepared in order to meet the state-determined need for the specialists of the respective areas (fields)) correspond to the criteria of good learning established under the law.

It should be noted that citizens who are good at their studies at state schools of higher education and who study at state schools of higher education upon assignment by the state (i.e. in order to meet the state-determined need for the specialists of the respective areas (fields)) must be guaranteed education free of charge as long as their study results correspond to the criteria of good learning established under the law.

In addition, it needs to be noted that citizens who were admitted to state schools of higher education to study upon assignment by the state (i.e. in order to meet the state-determined need for the specialists of the respective areas (fields)) must be guaranteed education free of charge until the first main assessment of the knowledge of the subjects studied by them.

[...]

... the assessment of the results of studying (according to the criteria of good learning established by means of a law) of citizens who study at state schools of higher education upon assignment by the state (i.e. in order to meet the state-determined need for the specialists of the respective areas (fields)) must be conducted on a regular basis after assessing the knowledge of studied subjects after each period of academic studies.

The duty of schools of higher education and scientific research institutes to account for the use of state budget funds

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 22 December 2011

A school of higher education, which receives funds from the state budget, must account for the proper use of the received funds; it is within the discretion of the legislature to establish, by means of a law, the manner and means of control over the use of such funds (ruling of 5 February 2002 and the decision of 28 October 2009). These provisions of the constitutional doctrine are also applicable to the legal regulation related to the allocation of state budget funds to scientific research institutes.

In this context, it should be noted that, when combining the autonomy of schools of higher education with their responsibility and accountability to society, the legislature has the duty to establish such a legal regulation by which all (state and non-state) schools of higher education and all state and non-state scientific research institutes should inform society of the use of state budget funds allocated to them.

[...]

The Constitution, inter alia, Paragraph 2 of Article 128 thereof, gives rise to the requirement that state-owned property must be used sparingly, not wasted, and managed rationally (rulings of 30 September 2003, 5 July 2007, and 20 March 2008). It needs to be noted that Paragraph 2 of Article 128 of the Constitution implies, inter alia, the requirement to establish such a legal regulation that would ensure the proper use of state budget funds allocated to institutions of science and studies. Thus, the legislature, when regulating the allocation and use of state budget funds to institutions of science and studies, must establish the duty of all institutions of science and studies to account for the use of state budget funds allocated to them.

The autonomy of schools of higher education and the self-governance of the academic community; the powers of the legislature to regulate the activity of schools of higher education, inter alia, their organisational and governance structure (Paragraph 3 of Article 40 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 22 December 2011

... the academic autonomy and institutional autonomy of schools of higher education are inseparably interrelated, i.e. without academic autonomy it is impossible to guarantee institutional autonomy – the self-governance of a school of higher education, while without institutional autonomy it is impossible to ensure academic autonomy, which stems, inter alia, from constitutional freedom of science and research. In its decision of 28 October 2009, the Constitutional Court held that the constitutional concept of freedom of science, research, and teaching implies the professional independence of scientific community, which is inseparable from the self-governance of schools of higher education, which constitutes one of the fundamental conditions of implementation of autonomy of a school of higher education; in order to ensure the constitutional implementation of the principle of academic freedom and the public interests so that the conditions would be created in schools of higher education to ensure all-round education of a personality and that schools of higher education would have freedom of teaching, scientific research, and creative activities, the institutions of governance that fulfil the self-governance functions of schools of higher education must be consolidated in the governance structure of schools of higher education. The imperative of the autonomy of schools of higher education, which stems from the Constitution, could be guaranteed only in this way.

Thus, the autonomy of schools of higher education, which is guaranteed in Paragraph 3 of Article 40 of the Constitution, implies the self-governance of the academic community (scientific community) of these schools, which is implemented, inter alia, through the governance institutions of the respective school of higher education that represent the said community of that school.

It needs to be noted that the self-governance of the academic community of schools of higher education should be related, inter alia, to democratic principles of government. In the context of the autonomy of schools of higher education, which is guaranteed in Paragraph 3 of Article 40 of the Constitution, the said principles include, inter alia, the direct participation of the academic community in, and its decisive influence on, the formation of the governance institution (institutions) of a school of higher education that is (are) vested with the most considerable powers, as well as the limitation of the number of the terms of office of members of other governance, control, and supervision institutions of the school of higher education and the number of the terms of office of persons fulfilling the functions of one-person institutions or holding the office of the head of a collegial institution. It needs to be emphasised that, in establishing the governance and organisational structure of schools of higher education, inter alia, when regulating the reorganisation of that structure, the legislature should pay regard to democratic principles of government and create no preconditions for their violation. A legal regulation that is not in line with these principles could create the preconditions, inter alia, for the state to unreasonably interfere with the governance of schools of higher education and/or to deny the self-governance of the academic community of schools of higher education and, thus, to violate the autonomy of schools of higher education, which is guaranteed in Paragraph 3 of Article 40 of the Constitution.

[...]

... it has been mentioned that, when having regard to the autonomy of schools of higher education, the legislature has wide discretion to choose and regulate a concrete model of the organisation of science and studies, which meets best the needs of the development of the progress of the state and society in a particulate period of time. Thus, the autonomy of schools of higher education, which is consolidated in Paragraph 3 of Article 40 of the Constitution, does not deny the right of the legislature to regulate activities of schools of higher education, inter alia, to establish, by taking account of the interests of society and its changing needs, various types of institutions of science and studies, different limits of the autonomy of these institutions, and the grounds for their organisational and governance structure. While not denying the autonomy of schools of higher education, inter alia, the self-governance thereof based on democratic principles of government, the legislature may establish various models of the governance structure of schools of higher education, inter alia, provide for a single institution directly representing the academic community and implementing the self-governance of that community, which would be empowered to decide on all the most important questions relating to both the academic and institutional autonomy of the school of higher education, or several such institutions that would decide on the most important governance questions relating to academic autonomy and institutional autonomy separately, as well as an institution of control and supervision, which would be composed not exclusively of members of the academic community (or not of such members); the said institution of control and supervision could also perform advisory functions in the course of adopting governance decisions of the school of higher education.

... it also needs to be noted that the constitutional guarantee of the autonomy of schools of higher education implies that, in this connection, the legislature is obliged to provide for a special legal regulation on the basis of which the greater part of the legal regulation of the said relationships should be composed by means of a local legal regulation established by schools of higher education themselves (ruling of 20 March 2008 and the decision of 28 October 2009). Therefore, the general legal regulation established by means of laws and applicable to all schools of higher education should not be too much detailed and should not limit the right of schools of higher education, stemming from the principle of their autonomy, to regulate their activities by means of local legal acts.

[...]

... the provision of Paragraph 3 of Article 40 of the Constitution does not prohibit differentiating, when taking account of various important criteria, the legal status of schools of higher education of different types or the rights and limits of the autonomy of schools of higher education of the same type. When taking account of this, in the context of the constitutional justice case at issue, it needs to be noted that, while differentiating, according to various important criteria, the status of schools of higher education, account must be taken, inter alia, of the historical traditions and established traditions of self-governance based on democratic principles of government that are peculiar to a concrete school of higher education, as well as fostering the continuity of these traditions. The foregoing means that, inter alia, under Paragraph 3 of Article 40 of the Constitution, in certain cases, with respect to concrete schools of higher education, it is allowed to establish special norms defining the rights, limits of autonomy, and the organisational and governance structure of these schools, which will differ from those established by the general legal regulation provided for by means of laws with respect to all schools of higher education.

[...]

... the legislature, when implementing the constitutional powers to establish the length of powers (and grounds for the expiry thereof) of the governance bodies of a state school of higher education, is bound by the Constitution, thus, also by the principle of a state under the rule of law implying legal certainty, legal stability, and the protection of legitimate expectations; the legislature is also bound by the prohibition, arising from Paragraph 3 of Article 40 of the Constitution, on restricting the self-governance of schools of higher education and on violating the continuity of the governance bodies of schools of higher education, which implement such self-governance. Therefore, under the Constitution, the legislature may establish only such grounds for the termination of the powers of the governance bodies (and members thereof) of schools of higher education before the expiry of the term of office thereof due to which they generally may not continue to hold office (inter alia, due to such a legal fact as the age established under the law, the change of the place of work, the liquidation of the school of higher education, or the essential reorganisation of the organisational and governance structure thereof). It needs to be noted that this requirement is mutatis mutandis applicable to members of the academic community of schools of higher education (teachers, scientific workers, and other researchers).

The legal regulation governing the conditions of admission to state-funded student places in schools of higher education

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 22 December 2011

... in the context of the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law, the provision "Citizens who are good at their studies shall be guaranteed education at state schools of higher education free of charge" of Paragraph 3 of Article 41 of the Constitution implies, inter alia, the requirements for the legislature to lay down such a legal regulation that the conditions of admission to state-funded student places in schools of higher education, inter alia, the criteria of admission to studies and the meaning of these criteria, would be clear, consistent, and announced in advance in order that persons seeking higher education free of charge could be aware in advance of what will be required of them so that they would be able to efficiently implement their constitutional right in question.

[...]

... the right of schools of higher education to set the procedure for admission of students, inter alia, the conditions of their admission (criteria and the meaning (weighted value) of these criteria), is one of the essential elements of autonomy of schools of higher education. The state, inter alia, the institutions of the executive power thereof, in regulating and supervising the implementation of the said right, may exercise no essential influence over the independent implementation of that right provided that the constitutional human rights and freedoms, inter alia, the constitutional [right] of citizens who are good at their studies at state schools of higher education to education free of charge, are not violated.

... it has been mentioned that the constitutional guarantee of the autonomy of schools of higher education implies that, in this connection, the legislature must provide for a special legal regulation, while the greater part of the legal regulation of the said relationships should be composed by a local legal regulation established by schools of higher education, which must be based on the legal regulation established by the legislature; therefore, the general legal regulation established by means of laws and applicable to all schools of higher education should not be too much detailed and should not limit the right of schools of higher education, stemming from the principle of their autonomy, to regulate their activities by means of local legal acts.

... the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law implies that a legal regulation is subject to certain obligatory requirements, inter alia, that legal acts may contain no provisions simultaneously regulating the same public relationships in a different manner. The foregoing implies, inter alia, the requirement that the implementation of the constitutional right to education free of charge at state schools of higher education, inter alia, the conditions of admission to state-funded student places in schools of higher education, be not simultaneously regulated in a different manner.

Thus ... in view of the imperative of balancing the interests of schools of higher education and those of society, in the context of the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law, the guarantee of the autonomy of schools of higher education, which is consolidated in Paragraph 3 of Article 40 of the Constitution, implies, inter alia, that the legal regulation established by the state must create the legal preconditions for combining the legal regulation laid down by state institutions supervising the carrying out of the policy on higher education and the legal regulation laid down by schools of higher education regarding the conditions of the admission of persons to state-funded student places in schools of higher education.

Financing higher education from state budget funds

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 22 December 2011

... when interpreting the state duty to fund state schools of higher education from the state budget, the Constitutional Court held in its ruling of 20 March 2008 that, upon assignment by the state, specialists of certain areas (fields) may also be prepared at non-state schools of higher education from state budget funds; in addition, it is permitted to support citizens who study in schools of higher education of other states from state budget funds.

Thus, upon assessing the needs of society and the state and the capacities of the state, in cases where specialists of certain areas cannot be prepared at state schools of higher education due to objective reasons, they may be prepared, upon assignment by the state, not only at non-state schools of higher education, but also at foreign schools of higher education, including the branches of foreign schools of higher education established in the Republic of Lithuania.

[...]

... the provision "Citizens who are good at their studies shall be guaranteed education at state schools of higher education free of charge" of Paragraph 3 of Article 41 of the Constitution implies the right of citizens who are good at their studies, namely at state schools of higher education, to receive higher education free of charge and it implies the duty of the state to provide for the respective funds in the state budget in order to guarantee free-of-charge education for citizens who are good at their studies, namely at state schools of higher education.

[...]

On the other hand, the Constitution does not contain any prohibition precluding the state from undertaking higher financial obligations, in accordance with its capacities, to citizens studying at schools of higher education (ruling of 14 January 2002).

It also needs to be noted that the possibility for the state to undertake financial obligations higher than those arising from the provision "Citizens who are good at their studies shall be guaranteed education at state schools of higher education free of charge" of Paragraph 3 of Article 41 of the Constitution with regard to citizens studying at schools of higher education means, inter alia, the right of the state to guarantee free-of-charge education in some cases to citizens studying at non-state schools of higher education, i.e. to those citizens who, under Paragraph 3 of Article 41 of the Constitution, do not have the right to free-of-charge higher education and whose studies need not be financed by the state.

[...]

... whatever model of higher education funding is chosen, the legislature must pay regard to the requirement, arising from the provision "Citizens who are good at their studies shall be guaranteed education at State schools of higher education free of charge" of Paragraph 3 of Article 41 of the Constitution, that, upon assessing the needs of society and the state and the financial capacities of the state, the state must determine the need for specialists of certain areas (fields) and assign, first of all, state schools of higher education to prepare such specialists and, only in cases where specialists of certain areas (fields) cannot be prepared at state schools of higher education due to objective circumstances, the state may assign the preparation of these specialists at non-state schools of higher education.

[...]

... the provision "Citizens who are good at their studies shall be guaranteed education at state schools of higher education free of charge" of Paragraph 3 of Article 41 of the Constitution does not imply the requirement for the legislature to establish only such a model of funding higher education where all state budget funds meant for schools of higher education would be assigned to the state budget appropriations allocated individually to every state school of higher education; funds must be provided for in the state budget individually for each state school of higher education in order to implement the purposes and the mission of that school of higher education. Thus, the legislature may also choose such a model where certain state budget appropriations would be provided for higher education in general, inter alia, for funding the studies of citizens who are good at their studies and who are prepared to satisfy the state-established demand for specialists of certain areas (fields); during the budget year, the Government, which is responsible for the execution of the state budget, may distribute these appropriations to schools of higher education in accordance with the established procedure, while taking account, inter alia, of the choice between schools of higher education made by enrolling persons.

The period during which it is necessary to assess the study results of citizens who study at state schools of higher education upon assignment by the state (Paragraph 3 of Article 40 and Paragraph 3 of Article 41 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 10 November 2014

In its ruling of 22 December 2011, the Constitutional Court noted that the legal regulation by which, in order to establish whether the study results of a person whose studies are funded by the state meet the criteria of good learning, their study results are assessed irregularly, i.e. not after each period of academic studies after which the main assessment of the knowledge of studied subjects of persons studying in schools of higher education is conducted, would not be in conformity with the provision of Paragraph 3 of Article 41 of the Constitution, whereby citizens who are good at their studies are guaranteed education at state schools of higher education free of charge.

The Constitutional Court has held on more than one occasion that, under Paragraph 3 of Article 40 of the Constitution, schools of higher education have a special legal status – they are guaranteed autonomy; the autonomy of a school of higher education is understood, inter alia, as the right to independently establish its procedure for its scientific activities and studies, as well as its study programmes, to consolidate them in its by-laws or statute, and to decide other related issues.

... this right of schools of higher education must be ensured by means of such a legal regulation that establishes the period of academic studies after which the main assessment of the knowledge of persons who study at schools of higher education is carried out and it is decided whether the study results of citizens who study upon assignment by the state in order to meet the state-determined need for the specialists of certain areas (fields) meet the criteria of good learning established by means of a law.

... the provision “Citizens who are good at their studies shall be guaranteed education at state schools of higher education free of charge” of Paragraph 3 of Article 41 of the Constitution, when this provision is interpreted in the context of the right of schools of higher education to independently establish the procedure for their scientific activities and studies, their study programmes, to consolidate them in their by-laws or statute, and to decide other related issues gives rise to the requirement that, in the course of establishing the period after which it is decided whether the study results of citizens who study upon assignment by the state in order to meet the state-determined need for the specialists of certain areas (fields) meet the criteria of good learning established by means of a law, account must be taken, inter alia, of the specific nature of the study process, the study forms, the study programmes organised in a school of higher education, the specific nature of the study subjects, and the possibility of assessing the results of the entire studies of a particular study programme and form by higher education school students of the same year of studies during the respective period.

[...]

It should be noted that an academic year is the longest possible period allowed to be established under the law and by means of acts of schools of higher education so that it would be possible to ensure the adherence to the requirements, arising out of the provision “Citizens who are good at their studies shall be guaranteed education at state schools of higher education free of charge” of Paragraph 3 of Article 41 of the Constitution, that the assessment of the study results of citizens who study at state schools of higher education upon assignment by the state must be carried out regularly, that a period must be established after which it is possible to decide whether the study results of citizens who study upon assignment by the state meet the criteria of good learning established by means of a law and that account must be taken, inter alia, of the possibility of assessing the results of the entire studies of a particular study programme and form by higher education school students of the same year of studies during the respective period.

The autonomy of higher education schools (Paragraph 3 of Article 40 of the Constitution); supervision over the activities of higher education schools (control over higher education quality) (Paragraph 4 of Article 40 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 19 June 2018

... the autonomy of higher education schools, which is granted to them under Paragraph 3 of Article 40 of the Constitution and which means that they have the right to autonomously determine, inter alia, the procedure for carrying out science and studies, as well as study programmes, does not deny the right of the state (which forms and pursues a higher education policy and is under the obligation, arising, inter alia, from Paragraph 4 of Article 40 of the Constitution, to ensure the effectiveness of the higher education system) to establish the quality standards for higher education provided by the institutions of science and studies, as well as the instruments for evaluating the quality of studies, the quality of their implementation, and their compliance with the established quality standards for higher education, inter alia, to establish the instruments periodically applied for evaluating the quality of studies. It should also be noted that as, during a certain period, needs for the progressive development of the state and society change, under Paragraph 4 of Article 40 of the Constitution, the quality standards for higher education provided by the institutions of science and studies should be changed accordingly, thus aiming to ensure that higher education schools effectively carry out their mission, which is linked to their autonomy, guaranteed under Paragraph 3 of Article 40 of the Constitution, in preparing specialists with higher education in various fields and implement their responsibility for higher education quality.

... when establishing and modifying the established quality standards for higher education provided by the institutions of science and studies, as well as when establishing and modifying the established instruments for evaluating the quality of studies, the quality of their implementation, and their compliance with the established quality standards for higher education, inter alia, the instruments periodically applied for evaluating the quality of studies, the legislature must respect the Constitution, inter alia, the requirements implied by the constitutional principles of a state under the rule of law and responsible governance, inter alia, the requirement not to establish such a legal regulation that would demand the impossible (lex non cogit ad impossibilia) and the requirement to provide for an appropriate vacatio legis – a reasonable period of time from the moment of the official publication of the law laying down these new standards and new instruments until its entry into force (beginning of its application), during which, inter alia, higher education schools would be able to properly prepare for the implementation of the modified requirements, resulting from the said law, for the quality of studies and the quality of their implementation. Otherwise, not only no regard would be paid to the constitutional principles of a state under the rule of law and responsible governance, but also the duty of the legislature, inter alia, implied by Paragraph 4 of Article 40 of the Constitution, to regulate the activities of higher education schools in such a way that insures higher education quality would be implemented improperly, as well as the right of higher education schools to establish the procedure for carrying out science and studies and study programmes would be violated, and no preconditions would be created for the effective implementation of their mission to train specialists with higher education in various fields and their responsibility for higher education quality; therefore, the autonomy guaranteed to higher education schools under Paragraph 3 of Article 40 of the Constitution would be disregarded; accordingly, no regard would also be paid to Paragraph 2 of Article 5 of the Constitution, under which the scope of power is limited by the Constitution.

The autonomy of higher education schools (Paragraph 3 of Article 40 of the Constitution); the right of the state to reform the system of state schools of higher education (Paragraph 4 of Article 40 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 29 June 2018

... the autonomy of higher education schools, which is guaranteed under Paragraph 3 of Article 40 of the Constitution, does not deny the right of the state (which, under the Constitution, inter alia, Paragraph 4 of Article 40 thereof, forms and pursues a higher education policy and has the duty to establish a system of state schools of higher education) to reform the system of state schools of higher education, inter alia, to reorganise or liquidate them, by taking into account the interests and changing needs of society and seeking to fulfil the constitutional obligation to ensure the effectiveness of the higher education system.

At the same time, it should be noted that, in reorganising the system of state schools of higher education, it is necessary to pay regard to the right (stemming from Paragraph 3 of Article 40 of the Constitution) of the collegial bodies directly representing the academic community of a higher education school and exercising its self-governance to autonomously solve strategic and other major issues related to the governance of the higher education school. This means that these bodies of the self-governance of state schools of higher education and other institutions that are formed or appointed by the said self-governance bodies and perform the functions of the governance of higher education schools should be given the opportunity to express their opinion and submit proposals regarding the reform of the system of state schools of higher education, inter alia, their reorganisation or liquidation, as well as to prepare or participate in preparing documents necessary for such reorganisation or liquidation. The autonomy of higher education schools, which is enshrined in Paragraph 3 of Article 40 of the Constitution, implies the duty of state authority institutions (which, according to the laws, perform the functions of the state as the founder of a state school of higher education and the owner of its property) to assess, by giving reasons, this opinion and proposals of the state school of higher education. However, the state authority institution that performs the functions of the state as the founder of a state school of higher education has the right, under Paragraph 4 of Article 40 of the Constitution, to take the final decision on the reform of the system of state schools of higher education, inter alia, the reorganisation or liquidation of a state school of higher education, even if this higher education school does not assent to this decision.

It should be emphasised that, when the state decides to carry out a reform of the system of state schools of higher education, inter alia, to reorganise or liquidate state schools of higher education, it is necessary, in the course of implementing these decisions, to observe the requirements arising from the Constitution, inter alia, from the constitutional principles of responsible governance, reasonableness, the protection of legitimate expectations, legal certainty, and legal security, as well as to respect, among other things, the legitimate interests and legitimate expectations of the members of the community of a state school of higher education, inter alia, those of the persons working and studying at this higher education school.

[...]

... under the Constitution, inter alia, Paragraph 1 of Article 5 thereof, in view of the constitutional nature of the Seimas and its functions, including the founding function, and in view of the constitutional status of the Government as the executive institution that implements state governance, manages national affairs, and is responsible for the planning and execution of the state budget, laws can establish such a legal regulation governing the adoption of decisions on founding, reorganising, or liquidating state schools of higher education whereby these decisions are adopted by the Seimas on the recommendation of the Government.

... the Seimas and the Government, as state authority institutions that form and carry out the state policy of higher education, when implementing their powers conferred on them in laws to establish and reform the system of state schools of higher education (among other things, by adopting decisions on founding state schools of higher education or other decisions exerting decisive influence on their activity, inter alia, decisions on their reorganisation or liquidation), must respect the constitutional principle of responsible governance, which implies the duty to evaluate and weigh, in a responsible manner, the interests and capabilities of both society and the respective communities of state schools of higher education so that the long-term effectiveness of the higher education system would be ensured. When these decisions are adopted, account should also be taken, inter alia, of the historical traditions of a specific higher education school and the need to maintain their continuity.

2.4.3.2. Freedom of culture, science, research, and teaching

Freedom of culture; the duty of the state to support and safeguard culture (Article 42 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 8 July 2005

... in Paragraph 1 of Article 42 of the Constitution, the principle of freedom of culture is enshrined expressis verbis, whereas Paragraph 2 thereof consolidates the constitutional duty of the state to support culture, as well as to protect cultural monuments and other culturally valuable objects.

The notion of culture is used in the Constitution not only in the indicated provisions of Article 42 of the Constitution, but also in other articles (paragraphs) thereof. The constitutional concept of culture is especially broad. It comprises various values held and fostered by the Nation and separate communities, the models and norms of behaviour that have originated in the society (including law, customs, and traditions), historical experience, spoken and written language, institutions, worldview and convictions, etc. On the other hand, the constitutional concept of culture (inter alia, Article 42) stresses the targeted, both material and spiritual, creative activity of people and its results – art, science, education, architecture, technology, etc. Cultural values are transferred to future generations, they are the foundation of the survival and continuity of the Nation and the state; thus, such values are protected and defended by the Constitution. Culture is a national value of universal importance. The Constitution obligates the state to ensure freedom of culture, to support culture, as well as to protect cultural monuments and other culturally valuable objects. The ensuring of freedom of culture, state support for culture, the protection of cultural monuments and other culturally valuable objects are a public interest and an important function of the state – the function of the state support for culture and the safeguard thereof.

In this context, it is especially necessary to stress the importance of the provisions that are set out in the Preamble to the Constitution: it is stated therein that the Lithuanian nation, having created the State of Lithuania many centuries ago, having based its legal foundations on the Lithuanian Statutes and the Constitutions of the Republic of Lithuania, having for centuries staunchly defended its freedom and independence, having preserved its spirit, native language, writing, and customs, embodying the innate right of the human being and the Nation to live and create freely in the land of their fathers and forefathers – in the independent State of Lithuania, fostering national concord in the land of Lithuania, striving for an open, just, and harmonious civil society and a state under the rule of law, by the will of the citizens of the reborn State of Lithuania, adopts and proclaims this Constitution. Thus, the Lithuanian nation has obligated the state created by it to foster the cultural values that are consolidated in the Preamble to the Constitution and not to give them up under any circumstances. All other provisions of the Constitution, including the ones that are set out in Article 42, must be interpreted in a manner that would not deviate from the imperatives deriving from the Preamble to the Constitution.

Freedom of culture, which is enshrined in Paragraph 1 of Article 42 of the Constitution, should be interpreted by taking account of the fact that, as mentioned before, the constitutional concept of culture defines the targeted material and spiritual creative activity of people and its results. In this regard, the concept of freedom of culture also comprises freedom of science and research, as well as freedom of teaching, which is also mentioned in Paragraph 1 of Article 42 of the Constitution. It should also be noted that cultural activity is not limited to scientific work, research, and teaching; thus, the concept of freedom of culture is not limited to freedom of scientific work, research, and teaching; the said concept is much broader.

The Constitution distinguishes between two aspects of freedom of culture as an innate freedom of an individual. Freedom of culture, which is enshrined in the Constitution, comprises: (1) freedom of creative activity, which in turn comprises the right of every person to freely create material and spiritual cultural values (freedom of the creative process) and the right to spread or distribute in any other way created material and spiritual cultural values (freedom of distributing products of creative activity); (2) freedom of access to culturally valuable objects, i.e. freedom of every person to use the existing culturally valuable objects.

[...]

It is possible to enjoy freedom of culture (comprising freedom of creative activity and freedom of access to culturally valuable objects), like most other constitutional rights and freedoms, not only individually, but also through the unions provided for in Article 35 of the Constitution. It is not permitted to establish any requirements for or limitations on the activity of artists, nor is it allowed to prevent them or other persons from founding associations that spread culture and/or defend material and spiritual interests of artists.

Support for culture, as well as the protection of cultural monuments and values, is a necessary condition of freedom of culture as an innate freedom of an individual (which comprises freedom of creative activity and freedom of access to culturally valuable objects). It has been mentioned that Paragraph 2 of Article 42 of the Constitution provides that the state supports culture and science, and takes care of the protection of Lithuanian historical, artistic, and other cultural monuments, as well as other culturally valuable objects. It has been held in this ruling of the Constitutional Court that the support and protection of culture by the state is an important function of the state and a public interest. It should be stressed that the provisions of Paragraph 2 of Article 42 of the Constitution are imperative: they not only specify that culture must be supported and that cultural monuments and culturally valuable objects must be protected, but they also consolidate the subject that has both the positive and negative duties to ensure that culture is supported and cultural monuments and culturally valuable objects are protected, which is namely the state.

Paragraph 2 of Article 42 of the Constitution should be interpreted by taking account of the fact that, as mentioned before, the constitutional concept of culture comprises various values held and nourished by the Nation and individual communities, including historical experience, spoken and written language, etc., as well as by taking into consideration the fact that the constitutional concept of culture stresses the targeted material and spiritual creative activity of individuals and its results, inter alia, art and science. In this regard, the constitutional grounds consolidated in Paragraph 2 of Article 42 of the Constitution also comprise the state duty, which is established in this paragraph, to support science, while the constitutional grounds for the protection of cultural monuments and culturally valuable objects, which are consolidated in Paragraph 2 of Article 42 of the Constitution, also comprise the state duty, which is consolidated in this paragraph, to take care of monuments of Lithuanian history and art.

The provisions of Paragraph 2 of Article 42 of the Constitution, whereby the state supports culture and science, and takes care of the protection of Lithuanian historical, artistic, and other cultural monuments, as well as other culturally valuable objects, mean that the state is constitutionally obligated to support and foster culture as a national value of universal importance – the material and spiritual creative activity and its results that should be transferred to future generations; according to the Constitution, the state must not only refrain from hindering the natural development of culture (inter alia, from discriminating against any creative activity), but also, by its positive decisions (inter alia, a legal regulation), encourage and support, by using state funds and other resources the creation, spreading, propagation, and preserving material and spiritual cultural values. It should be noted that decisions of institutions of public authority regarding state support for institutions or separate artists engaged in cultural activity, as well as separate initiatives (projects, programmes) developing culture, must be adopted while paying regard to the principles of the equality of the rights of all persons and honest competition, as well as the requirement of publicity, which are consolidated in the Constitution. The imperative of a just society and social harmony, which is consolidated in the Constitution, implies that, when supporting culture (inter alia, creative activity), regard must be paid to the resources and the material and financial possibilities of the state and society, and other important factors, inter alia, expediency.

It has been held in this ruling of the Constitutional Court that state support for culture and the protection of cultural monuments and culturally valuable objects is a public interest and an important function of the state. ... under the Constitution, there may be no such legal regulation where the state does not substantially support the system of institutions contributing to the development of culture. The constitutional consolidation of culture as a publicly important value results in the support of culture on the national scale.

The Seimas has the discretion to establish which institutions form and implement a cultural policy, as well as perform the function of state support for culture and its protection. In Lithuania (as in numerous other states), there is the established tradition that it is the Ministry of Culture that has a wide range of powers in implementing the cultural policy.

[...]

... The spread of culture is, first of all, its spread in the closest environment, in territorial surroundings among those who live in the area n the territory of which certain cultural objects are located; access to culturally valuable objects implies, first of all, their accessibility for the members and residents of a particular community on the territory of which particular cultural objects are located; cultural establishments (museums, theatres, libraries, concert organisations, etc.) function in certain administrative territorial units, localities; cultural monuments and other objects of culture are also located on certain territories; the local authorities (their institutions or officials) that administer such territories may not avoid the respective obligations related to the maintenance of these monuments, the ensuring of their accessibility, etc.; creators are also members of territorial communities; associations of creators function in particular administrative territorial units; thus, state support for creators and their associations may be rational and efficient only if account is taken of the local conditions in which creators act and their associations function, etc. Moreover, the state support and development of culture as a constitutionally protected and defended value would be impossible if culture were not developed in regions, separate parts of the territory of the state, separate self-governing territorial communities, which form part of the entire national community – the civil Nation.

The extent to which the performance of the function of supporting and protecting culture should be transferred to municipalities is subject to the state cultural policy. The legislature has wide discretion in this sphere. However, it must pay regard to the independence of municipalities and freedom of their activity within their competence defined by the Constitution and laws, the principles of balancing the interests of municipalities and those of the state, as well as the constitutional concept of local self-government.

At the same time, it should be noted that the fact that the support and protection of culture as a state function must be to a certain extent transferred to municipalities does not mean that the state (its institutions) may opt out from the performance of this function. ... under the Constitution, no matter to what extent the performance of the aforementioned function is transferred to municipalities, the state still has the duty to ensure that this function is performed properly.

[...]

... under the Constitution, the state has the duty to found and provide funding to the state institutions (establishments or enterprises, through which state functions are performed) whose objective would be taking care of the development of culture (inter alia, establishments or enterprises providing public cultural services), or to initiate or encourage founding and providing support for other – non-governmental – institutions the purpose of which is taking care of the development of culture ... according to the Constitution, there may be no such legal regulation where the state does not substantially maintain the system of institutions contributing to the development of culture.

Freedom of creative activity

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 8 July 2005

In its ruling of 1 July 2004, the Constitutional Court held the following: “According to the Constitution, creative activities are activities in the area of science, technology, culture or art, aimed at creating a certain result, i.e. qualitatively new, original, and specific material or spiritual values of science, technology, culture, or art, which have never existed before. Creative activities may be continuous, professional, and one-off (episodic).” The creation of material and spiritual values is impossible without freedom of creative activity.

The imperative of freedom of creative activity is consolidated not only in Article 42 of the Constitution (inter alia, Paragraph 1 thereof) and other articles of the Constitution (parts thereof) that consolidate human rights and freedoms, but also in the provision of the Preamble to the Constitution that consolidates the innate right of the human being and the Nation to live and create freely in the independent State of Lithuania. The creation of material and spiritual values is the realisation of creative potential and abilities of a human being. Thus, freedom of creative activity (comprising freedom of the creative process and freedom of distributing products of creative activity) is one of the most important manifestations of freedom of self-expression, which is one of the universally recognised innate human rights and is consolidated, protected, and defended by the Constitution; on the other hand, the content of freedom of self-expression is broader than that of freedom of creative activity and is not limited by the latter. Freedom of creative activity (as freedom of self-expression in general) is inseparably related to the human right, which is consolidated in Article 25 of the Constitution, to have convictions and freely express them (freedom of convictions and their expression) and freedom of seeking, receiving, and imparting information and ideas (freedom of information), which in turn are directly interrelated.

[...]

... freedom of creative activity of every human being (which comprises freedom of the creative process and freedom of distributing products of creative activity), which is consolidated in the Constitution, has much in common with the constitutional freedoms of convictions of a human being and their expression, as well as freedom of information. Constitutional freedom of creative activity of every human being (which comprises freedom of the creative process and freedom of distributing products of creative activity), as an innate right, implies the right of every individual to realise without hindering his/her creative powers or abilities in any area of targeted creative activity of individuals, where such activity may (but not necessarily does) result in certain material or spiritual values (art, science, architecture, technology, etc.) that, from the standpoint of the Nation and/or individual communities, should be held and fostered. In this regard, freedom of creative activity is a condition of pluralism in society, as well as the richness and variety of public life.

A human being uses freedom of the creative process without any hindrance and control, he/she acts only at his/her own discretion, by following his/her own convictions. An infringement upon freedom of the creative process may also be linked with a violation of his/her right to privacy and freedom of convictions. It should be noted that the Constitution guarantees that every human being has freedom of the creative process irrespective of true or supposed talents, abilities, his/her personal or other characteristics, legal status (inter alia, the fact whether or not a certain individual belongs to any association of artists), as well as irrespective of possible results of creative activity of that person, i.e. irrespective of the fact whether or not these results will be regarded as cultural values (achievements) that have any permanent value. In its ruling of 1 July 2004, the Constitutional Court held the following: “The concept of creative activities, which is consolidated in the Constitution, is integral and its content does not depend, inter alia, on persons who are engaged in them.” According to the Constitution, the state may not discriminate any creative activity, prohibit or restrict any trend of creative activity only due to the fact that, in the opinion of the legislature, this creative activity and/or its possible results are not useful to society, though they are not harmful, either. The constitutional duty of the state to ensure freedom of the creative process for every human being comprises not only its duty not to discriminate any creative activity itself, but also to protect and defend this freedom of a human being from unlawful infringement upon it by other persons. At the same time, it should be stressed that it is not allowed to interpret freedom of the creative process of every human being, which stems from the Constitution, as the one that also implies the possibility for a human being to realise his/her creative powers and abilities when such activity violates laws or infringes the rights and freedoms of other persons; freedom of the creative process does not deny the responsibility of a person for his/her activity aimed at creating certain material or spiritual cultural values.

Freedom of distributing products of creative activity is not absolute; the limits (which are established in the Constitution) of freedom of distributing products of creative activity are narrower in comparison to freedom of the creative process. Since the constitutional concept of freedoms of information and expression of convictions does not comprise the alleged freedom (which virtually denies constitutional values) of spreading such ideas, attitudes, etc. by which national, racial, or social hatred, violence or discrimination are incited, persons are defamed or society and its individual members are disinformed, thus, in a similar manner, the constitutional concept of freedom of distributing products of creative activity does not comprise the alleged freedom (which virtually denies constitutional values) of spreading such ideas, attitudes, etc. by which national, racial, or social hatred, violence or discrimination are incited, persons are defamed or society and its individual members are disinformed orally, in writing, in signs, or by applying other ways or means of transmitting information, i.e. it does not comprise the aforementioned alleged freedom, which denies constitutional values, to engage in the criminal actions indicated in Paragraph 4 of Article 25 of the Constitution. The Constitution does not tolerate such situations where freedom of distributing products of creative activity, as well as freedom of expression in general or any other constitutional human right or freedom, is abused by using it as a cover for actions by which certain values consolidated and protected by the Constitution are denied in essence. The state has the constitutional duty to establish such a legal regulation that would ensure that freedom of distributing products of creative activity will not be used as a cover when seeking to attain the aforementioned unconstitutional objectives. It should also be noted that, according to the Constitution, freedom of distributing products of creative activity, as well as freedom of information and freedom of the expression of convictions, may be restricted upon the procedure established by law and this may be done in cases where it is necessary to protect the values indicated in Paragraph 3 of Article 25 of the Constitution – human health, honour, human dignity, private life, and morals, or to defend the constitutional order (it may be, inter alia, temporarily limited by imposing martial law or by declaring a state of emergency). However, any restrictions on freedom of distributing products of creative activity must be based on the same constitutional criteria as restrictions on other fundamental human rights and freedoms: this freedom may be restricted only if this is done by means of a law; only if such restrictions are necessary in a democratic society in order to protect the rights and freedoms of other persons, the values consolidated in the Constitution, as well as constitutionally important objectives; only if the restrictions do not deny the nature and essence of rights and freedoms; and only if the constitutional principle of proportionality is followed.

By ensuring freedom of creative activity (comprising freedom of the creative process and freedom of distributing products of creative activity) and freedom of culture in general, pursuant to the Constitution, the state has not only duties with negative content (inter alia, not to discriminate against any creative activity and to protect this freedom from unlawful infringement upon it by other persons), but also duties with positive content.

The right to use freely culturally valuable objects

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 8 July 2005

... every human being has the right to use the existing culturally valuable objects. The Constitution consolidates freedom of access to culturally valuable objects. This freedom, which is protected and defended by the Constitution, is related to the freedom of a human being, which is consolidated in Article 25 of the Constitution, to seek and receive information and ideas, and the compulsory condition of the aforementioned freedom – freedom of a human being to form convictions and views by himself/herself, which also stems from the Constitution. Freedom of access to culturally valuable objects is also related to the imperative of open society, which is consolidated in the Constitution: if this freedom is not ensured, the striving for an open society would also be harmed.

Freedom of access to culturally valuable objects, which is enshrined in the Constitution, also implies the negative duty of the state to ensure that a human being is not hindered from free use of the existing culturally valuable objects and the positive duty of the state to adopt such decisions that would create material, organisational, and legal preconditions for making culturally valuable objects available to a larger number of people, and for allocating funds from the state budget to the protection of monuments of science, art, history, architecture, other cultural monuments, culturally valuable objects, as well as to cultural establishments (museums, theatres, libraries, organisations arranging concerts, etc.). The constitutional imperative of access to culturally valuable objects implies the duty of the state to establish and maintain such state institutions (establishments or enterprises through which state functions are performed, inter alia, establishments or enterprises providing public cultural services) that would be aimed at maintaining, propagating, and developing national culture, the value protected and defended by the Constitution, or to initiate or encourage in another way the establishment and maintenance of other, non-governmental, institutions the purpose of which is the development of culture. The legislature has broad discretion in the area of the establishment of the grounds for the system of the cultural establishments and other institutions (inter alia, of the establishments or enterprises providing public cultural services) the purpose of which is to take care of the development of culture; the institutions of the executive branch, within their competence, also have broad discretion in this area; the establishment of the grounds for the system of cultural institutions (inter alia, of the establishments or enterprises providing public cultural services) the purpose of which is to take care of the development of culture is a matter of the cultural policy of the state. On the other hand, when forming and implementing the cultural policy, regard must be paid to the resources of the state and society, the material and financial possibilities of the state and society, as well as other important factors, inter alia, expediency. However, it should be stressed that, according to the Constitution, there may be no such legal regulation where the state does not substantially support the system of institutions contributing to the development of culture.

The duty of the state to ensure the protection of cultural objects of state importance (Paragraph 2 of Article 42 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 8 July 2005

When taking account of the special continuous value and significance of cultural objects of state importance, as well as the need to preserve them for future generations, the state has the constitutional duty to take care of these objects and to protect them. It should be noted that the provision of Paragraph 2 of Article 42 of the Constitution, whereby the state supports culture and science, and takes care of the protection of Lithuanian historical, artistic, and other cultural monuments, as well as other culturally valuable objects, implies that, in cases where certain cultural objects of state importance (and various other objects indicated in Paragraph 1 of Article 47 of the Constitution, except the subsurface) belong by right of ownership not to the state, but to other persons, the state is not relieved from the duty to ensure the protection of the said objects and to take care of them.

In this context, it needs to be emphasised that the constitutional status of cultural objects of state importance implies the duty of the state to keep records of cultural objects of state importance, inter alia, the duty of the legislature to set, by means of a law, a list of cultural objects of state importance and to mark separately which cultural objects of state importance belong to the state and which of them belong to other owners. If necessary, such a list must be revised in accordance with the established procedure by taking into account the fact whether the need exists during a particular phase of the development of society and the state to include additional cultural objects in the said list (and/or whether the need exists to exclude certain cultural objects from the aforementioned list). It should be stressed that the inclusion of cultural objects of state importance in the aforementioned list may not depend on the fact whether particular cultural objects belong by right of ownership to the state or to other legal or natural persons. It should also be stressed that the recognition that particular cultural objects that belong by right of ownership not to the state, but to other persons are ones of state importance does not mean their nationalisation.

[...]

It should be stressed that the duty of the state, which stems from the Constitution, also to take care of cultural objects of state importance that belong not to the state, but to other persons by right of ownership, and to ensure their protection may not be interpreted as the one that relieves their owners from the duty to contribute themselves to the preservation of the aforementioned cultural objects or from the duty to follow the legal regime established in regard of these cultural objects that may comprise, inter alia, various prohibitions, obligations, other limitations, or restrictions related to the possession, use, or disposal of these cultural objects. It should be emphasised that the aforementioned prohibitions, obligations, limitations, and restrictions must be reasoned – they must create the preconditions for ensuring the preservation of cultural objects of state importance, as well as their accessibility to the public; they must be proportionate to the sought objective of universal importance and must not restrict the rights of an owner more than necessary in order to attain the aforementioned objectives.

The state (its institutions or officials), when exercising, under the Constitution, the powers to control how the legal regime established in regard to cultural objects of state importance is observed, also has the powers to control how the owners to whom these objects belong by right of ownership and the state or municipal institutions that possess these objects by right of trust or by other (non-property) right observe this legal regime.

In some cases, owners (e.g. natural persons) themselves may be unable to efficiently guarantee that the cultural objects of state importance belonging to them by right of ownership will be preserved. It should be emphasised that the entire burden of the preservation of the aforementioned cultural objects and taking care of them must not be placed on the owners. In this area, it is necessary to find such solutions that would ensure a fair balance between the respective duties of an owner and the state.

It should also be noted that the legislature must establish such a legal regulation that would provide the possibility of ensuring both access to cultural objects of state importance, which belong not to the state but to other persons by right of ownership, for the public (thus, also guaranteeing freedom of access to culturally valuable objects) and the protection of the rights and legal interests of an owner, where the said legal regulation would not create any preconditions for inflicting damage on the aforementioned cultural objects. In cases where cultural objects of state importance belong by right of ownership not to the state, but to other persons, the entire burden of ensuring access to the aforementioned objects of culture for the public must not be placed on owners, either. In this area, it is necessary to find solutions guaranteeing a fair balance between the rights of an owner, inter alia, the ownership rights and the right to privacy, and the rights of other persons.

The discretion of the legislature to choose a system of scientific degrees

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 5 May 2007

... the Constitution neither explicitly nor implicitly establishes what system of scientific degrees must be laid down in laws; inter alia, it does not provide whether, in Lithuania, only the scientific degree of a doctor (i.e. whether a single-level system of scientific degrees must be consolidated) or also the scientific degree of a habilitated doctor (i.e. whether a two-level system of scientific degrees must be consolidated) must be granted. Under the Constitution, in this sphere, the legislature has discretion; it may also establish the ways for the acquisition of scientific degrees. The provision that science and research are free, which is consolidated in Article 42 of the Constitution, the provision that schools of higher education are granted autonomy, which is enshrined in Paragraph 3 of Article 40, the constitutional imperatives of an open and harmonious society and other provisions of the Constitution also imply that, when establishing scientific degrees in Lithuania and ways in which they are acquired, it is necessary to give careful consideration to the opinion of the scientific and academic community, as well as that of state and other authoritative institutions of science, which unite scientists of various spheres of science. When choosing the system of scientific degrees in Lithuania and consolidating it by means of a law, it is also important to assess the experience of other countries, especially Member States of the European Union, as well as how much and in what manner this experience must and can be applied in Lithuania.

The discretion of the legislative and executive powers to choose a model of organising and managing scientific activity and establishing and assessing its results

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 5 May 2007

... [the choice of such a model of organising and managing scientific activity or establishing and assessing its results] is a function of legislation, as well as a function of the executive power, which adopts decisions and acts according to laws On the other hand, it should be stressed that the legislature, while establishing, by means of laws, the respective legal regulation (as well as executive power institutions, when regulating the respective relationships within their competence) must not only have regard to the Constitution, but also in no way ignore the opinion of the scientific and academic community, and pay proper attention to it.

Freedom of science and research (Paragraphs 1 and 2 of Article 42 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 5 May 2007

According to Article 42 of the Constitution, culture, science and research, and teaching are free (Paragraph 1); the state supports culture and science (Paragraph 2).

Constitutional freedom of science and research is inseparable from the freedom to have convictions and express them, which is consolidated in Article 25 of the Constitution and implies, among other things, the freedom of a person to form his/her own convictions and to choose worldview values (Paragraph 1 of Article 25 of the Constitution); constitutional freedom of science and research is also inseparable from freedom of information, which is consolidated in the same article of the Constitution and means that an individual may not be hindered from seeking, receiving, and imparting information and ideas (Paragraph 2 of Article 25 of the Constitution), as well as from the striving for an open, just, and harmonious civil society and a state under the rule of law, as proclaimed in the Preamble to the Constitution, and from various other provisions of the Constitution, which consolidate, inter alia, human rights and freedoms, as well as democracy. The constitutional freedom of science and research is a condition for personal expression and creation, the pluralism of ideas, the maintaining and strengthening of constitutionally valuable social relationships, the social and technical progress and the progress of art, and that of pithiness and variety of public life.

The constitutional concept of freedom of science and research is very ample, it comprises various aspects of science and research. The constitutional freedom of science and research means, inter alia, that every person has the right to freely decide by himself/herself whether to engage in science and research, including the right to freely choose the sphere of scientific research and methods of investigating particular subjects, to form his/her scientific worldview. According to the Constitution, no scientific views may be thrust upon a person; a person may not be forced to choose a certain sphere of scientific research or be prevented from choosing it (save the exceptions stemming from the Constitution); a person may not be forced to perform certain scientific research or be prohibited from performing certain scientific research (save the exceptions stemming from the Constitution), nor he/she may be forced to publish or not to publish the results of the performed scientific research. This is a matter of the discretion of a person and his/her free choice.

The Constitution consolidates such a concept of freedom of science and research where science and research may not be made a political or ideological issue, where a scientist may not be forced to accept any scientific views and values, where scientists or researchers may not be discriminated on the basis of the fact that the area or field of their scientific research is not in line with someone's political or ideological views. A different interpretation of the concept of constitutional freedom of science and research would mean that it is also permitted to deviate from the constitutional imperatives of democracy, an open, just, and harmonious civil society, and to create conditions for violating various values, inter alia, human rights and freedoms, which are consolidated, protected, and defended by the Constitution.

It should be stressed that the constitutional concept of freedom of science and research implies the professional independence of the scientific community (as well as communities representing certain scientific fields), as a community united by a scientific view and professional interests, from state institutions, their independent institutionalisation and self-governance, free communication with scientific communities of other countries (inter alia, scientific and educational institutions). The constitutional concept of freedom of science and research (especially having taken account of the content of scientific research as an activity for which special professional knowledge is needed) also implies the duty of institutions of public power, which adopt decisions (inter alia, the ones that regulate by their legal acts the respective relationships) aimed at science, studies and other scientific community (inter alia, scientific and educational institutions), not to ignore the opinion of the scientific community and take proper account of it.

It should be noted at the same time that constitutional freedom of science and research is not absolute. According to Article 28 of the Constitution, while implementing his/her rights and exercising his/her freedoms, everyone must observe the Constitution and laws and must not restrict the rights and freedoms of other people. Thus, freedom of science and research may not be interpreted as permitting such making use of this freedom so that the rights and freedoms of other persons, other constitutional values, inter alia, human health, honour, and dignity, as well as morals, the security of society, and public order become violated. In its rulings, the Constitutional Court has held on more than one occasion that, according to the Constitution, it is permitted to impose limitations on human rights and freedoms if the following conditions are observed: the limitations are established by means of a law; the limitations are necessary in a democratic society in order to protect the rights and freedoms of other persons, the values consolidated in the Constitution, and the constitutionally important objectives; the limitations do not deny the nature and essence of rights and freedoms; and the constitutional principle of proportionality is followed.

In this context, it should be noted that certain limits on freedom of science and research (which, as mentioned before, is inseparable from constitutional freedom of convictions and their expression, as well as freedom of information) are established also in relation to some other provisions of the Constitution. For example, according to Article 25 of the Constitution, the freedom to express convictions, as well as to receive and impart information, may not be limited otherwise than by means of a law when this is necessary to protect human health, honour or dignity, private life, or morals, or to defend the constitutional order (Paragraph 3); the freedom to express convictions and to impart information is incompatible with criminal actions – incitement to national, racial, religious, or social hatred, incitement to violence or to discrimination, as well as defamation and disinformation (Paragraph 4). It is established in Paragraph 4 of Article 21 of the Constitution that no one may be subjected to scientific or medical experimentation without his/her knowledge and free consent. Paragraph 3 of Article 42 of the Constitution provides that the law protects and defends the spiritual and material interests of an author that are related to scientific, technical, cultural, and artistic work.

It is generally known that modern science is developed not only in individual states, it is not only part of national culture of separate countries – it transcended national boundaries long time ago. Modern science is international; no country's science and research may be isolated from the global tendencies and scientific standards, as well as scientific progress of other states. The international imparting of science, exchange in scientific information and results of scientific research is a fundamental condition of the successful development of science in every country. Therefore, the state has the duty (which stems, inter alia, from Paragraph 2 of Article 42 of the Constitution) to prompt and support in every possible way the imparting of Lithuanian science around the world, and representing it beyond Lithuanian borders. Moreover, upon considering the fact that, due to the occupational Soviet regime, many spheres of science in Lithuania (inter alia, humanities and social sciences, as well as other sciences) were separated from the global scientific trend, it is obvious that the state faces an extremely significant task of helping Lithuanian scientists and its science to integrate in the international scientific process as much as possible.

According to the Constitution, a person has the right, without any hindrance, to impart, orally, in writing, in other ways and by other means of transmitting information scientific ideas and to publish the results of scientific research, to become familiarised with publicly presented scientific works and scientific ideas of other persons. Thus, according to the Constitution, a person who is engaged in science and research may not be hindered from free communication with scientists and researchers of Lithuania and other countries.

... announcing the results of scientific research is a condition of the productivity of further scientific activity of both the entire scientific community and a particular scientist. Productive scientific activity is impossible without communication among scientists, exchange in scientific information, and sharing ideas (inter alia, the results of scientific activity) with scientists both from this country and foreign countries. Due to insufficient aforementioned communication, insufficient exchange in scientific information, or the insufficient sharing of ideas, scientific activity would become inefficient, while science would become provincial (first of all, in respect of methodology, as well as the reliability and importance of results, rather than the subject of research), poor, and not fully fledged; it is more than likely that, without due exchange in scientific information, without sharing ideas with other scientists and researchers, or without integration into the international imparting of science, inter alia, without submitting the results of scientific research for reading and assessing to the international scientific community, scientific activity would deviate from global scientific tendencies and would fall short of global scientific standards. This would finally inflict harm on the normal life of the whole scientific and academic community as a self-governing community that is united by scientific views and professional interests. Moreover, a low level of science and research could create the preconditions for violating or even denying other constitutional values, inter alia, the constitutional right of a person to seek higher education, and for inflicting harm on the fulfilment of international obligations of the Republic of Lithuania.

Due to the importance of science and research to the economic and social development of society and the state, the state must inevitably form and pursue a certain scientific policy. It should be noted (especially, while taking account of the provision of Paragraph 2 of Article 42 of the Constitution, whereby the state supports culture and science) that not only such a national scientific policy where freedom of science and research is limited and the development of science is prevented in an artificial way, but also such a policy where science and research are not supported by the state, would be constitutionally unreasoned and unjustified. The Constitution in no way implies that science and research (especially fundamental research) must exist solely on the market principles; quite to the contrary, the state support for science is an imperative that is expressis verbis consolidated in the Constitution.

When forming and pursuing, within their competence, the scientific policy, institutions of public power may and must adopt the respective (as well as law-making) decisions on the funding etc. of separate fields of science (areas of research), scientific and educational institutions, and scientists and researchers. The content and implementation of such decisions depend not only on established objectives and goals, but also on the financial and economic capacities of the state. It should be stressed that some scientific and educational institutions or separate fields of science (areas of research) may get more funding in comparison to others, and that a different and differentiated legal regulation of the respective relationships in itself does not mean that some scientists or researchers (respective scientific and educational institutions) are unreasonably privileged or discriminated, nor does it mean that scientists or researchers are forced to choose a certain area or field of scientific research and to perform certain scientific research instead of other. It is obvious that the funds of taxpayers should be used, first of all, to support such scientific research that is perspective, productive, meets the objectives and tasks that are already faced and/or may be faced by society and the State of Lithuania, as well as assists the State of Lithuania in performing its functions that stem from the Constitution. Virtually the same can be said about such scientific research that represents Lithuanian science beyond Lithuanian borders.

... the state has certain duties that stem from the Constitution and are related to ensuring the possibility for scientists and researchers to publish results of their scientific research, including the possibility of publishing such results in Lithuania. ... it should be emphasised that such a legal regulation that would impose such conditions related to the publication of the results of scientific research on scientists or researchers who wish to continue their scientific activity or make a scientific career (e.g. to hold certain office at a scientific or educational institution) that can hardly be met due to such reasons the possibilities of eliminating which by the State of Lithuania (institutions thereof) are small or no attempts to remove the said reasons are made by the State of Lithuania (institutions thereof) would be constitutionally unreasoned. In this context, it should especially be noted that, first of all, this can be said about scientists and researchers whose research (which could even be of especially high scientific level) cannot arouse much interest within wider scientific community virtually due to the fact that the subject of research is related, first of all, with this country, Lithuania. When forming and pursuing the scientific policy of the state, it is necessary to find ways of how, without deviating from the Constitution, on the one hand, to prompt the international imparting of Lithuanian science and its sufficient representation in the world and, on the other hand, to prompt such scientific research that is significant to Lithuania even if it virtually cannot arouse much interest among scientists and researchers of other states and could not be imparted wider on the international level.

Establishing requirements for scientists who wish to hold a certain position at state institutions of science and studies; a differentiated legal regulation of various areas and fields of science; the institution representing the scientific and academic community

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 5 May 2007

Legal acts may establish requirements that must be met by scientists who wish to hold a certain position at state schools of higher education, scientific institutes under state universities, state institutes of science, or state educational establishments. Various ways of establishing such requirements are possible. For example, according to the Constitution, it is not prohibited to establish by legal acts of the state (its institutions) certain general minimum requirements that should be met by scientists who wish to hold a certain position at the aforementioned institutions. The Constitution does not prohibit choosing and consolidating in legal acts such a way of establishing the said minimum requirements where legal acts of the state (its institutions) establish only basic (more general) requirements, which are made more detailed and specific by state schools of higher education and educational establishments in their own (i.e. local) legal acts.

[...]

The establishment of general minimum requirements for scientists who wish to hold a certain position at state schools of higher education, scientific institutes under state universities, state scientific institutes, or state educational establishments is part of the procedure of implementing the constitutional right of an individual to freely choose an occupation. It does not follow from the Constitution that such requirements (especially detailed ones) must be established precisely by means of a law, notably because such lawmaking must necessarily be based on expert knowledge and special (professional) competence; therefore, the respective relationships may also be regulated by statutory acts, inter alia, government resolutions that ... may not be in conflict with laws.

It should be noted that the discretion of the Government to establish general minimum requirements applicable to scientists who wish to hold a certain position at state schools of higher education, scientific institutes under state universities, state institutes of science, or state educational establishments is limited by the norms and principles of the Constitution, inter alia, the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law and the principle of proportionality, which stems from and is inseparably related to the former and which requires that applicable measures established by legal acts must be proportionate to the objective sought and must not limit the rights of a person more than necessary in order to achieve a legitimate, universally significant, and constitutionally reasoned objective. When establishing the aforementioned general minimum requirements, regard must be paid to Article 14 of the Constitution, according to which Lithuanian is the state language.

It has been mentioned that modern science is international one, that it transcended national boundaries long time ago, that the international imparting of science and exchange in scientific information and the results of scientific research form a fundamental condition of the successful development of science in every country. It has also been mentioned that the state faces an especially significant task of assisting Lithuanian scientists and science of Lithuania to be integrated as much as possible in the global scientific progress.

... the Government, when establishing general minimum requirements for scientists who wish to hold a certain position at state schools of higher education, scientific institutes under state universities, state scientific institutes, or state educational establishments, may follow the provision that these requirements must assist in the enhancement of the quality of Lithuanian science and in prompting its international imparting, that they must prevent Lithuanian science from becoming detached within the borders of this country, isolated from global scientific tendencies, and not oriented to global scientific standards.

If the international imparting of Lithuanian science is not prompted, there would appear conditions for the slow-down of the development of Lithuanian science and its lagging behind the global tendencies of scientific progress; in addition, the isolation of Lithuanian science, publishing the results of scientific activity only in Lithuania would create conditions for the provincialism of Lithuanian science.

... science and scientific research constitute a special sphere of creative activity of a human being ... the areas and fields of science are very diverse and each has its own specificity. For example, physical, biomedical, and technological sciences, as well as a considerable part of research made in these sciences, are oriented towards technological progress and results that may be applied technologically; while humanities and social sciences are mostly oriented towards problems of a particular national, cultural, or political community; they reveal the historical change of this community; one of the most significant functions of such sciences is to search for social, political, ethical, aesthetic, cultural, and other meanings, to create and convey common values, as well as to sustain the value-based, cultural, and national identity of society. The said specificity of areas and fields of science also determines the specificity of the international imparting of the results of these areas and fields of science, i.e. due to their content and tasks, the greater imparting of results is common to physical, biomedical, and technological sciences; meanwhile, the international imparting of humanities and social sciences is usually more complicated, inter alia, due to the fact that the results of their scientific research (namely, due to their function) are often published in the official (state) language of the respective country (in Lithuania, they are often published in the Lithuanian language) and that the results of these areas of science are often not so much universal compared with the results of physical, biomedical, and technological sciences, because, first of all, they are particularly significant to the concrete national, cultural, or political community.

The increasing specificity (determined by the development of science) of certain areas and fields of science implies the need for a differentiated legal regulation. This means that the Government, when establishing minimum qualification requirements that should be met by scientists in order to become eligible for holding a certain position at state schools of higher education, scientific institutes under state universities, state institutes of science, or state educational establishments, may not establish absolutely identical requirements for all areas and fields of science; minimum qualification requirements not only may, but even must, be differentiated by taking into account the specificity of certain areas and fields of science, which also determines greater or smaller possibilities of their international imparting.

[...]

... constitutional freedom of science and scientific research, the autonomy of schools of higher education, other constitutional imperatives also imply that the respective institution (institutions) representing the scientific and academic community, which is formed from scientists elected or delegated by the scientific and academic community, may be established in Lithuania.

[...]

It is possible to reasonably presume that such an institution (institutions) representing the scientific and academic community and formed from scientists elected or delegated by the scientific and academic community should namely be deemed to be an institution that has special (professional) competence needed for the regulation of relationships in such a specific sphere of creative activity of a human being like science and/or academic activity; therefore, a law or a government resolution may establish various powers for this institution so that it could regulate the respective relationships related to science and/or academic activity, inter alia, the powers to set the respective requirements that should be met by scientists in order to become eligible for holding a certain position at state schools of higher education, scientific institutes under state universities, state institutes of science, or state educational establishments, as well as the powers to provide for the areas and fields of science where, due to their specificity, certain requirements established by means of a government resolution may be applied differently.

The requirement that scientists who have published scientific works that are regarded as significant may be eligible for holding a certain position at state institutions of science and studies; the requirement to have a certain amount of scientific works published in publications that are reviewed in international databases

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 5 May 2007

... the Constitution does not prohibit, but, on the contrary, especially having taken account of the membership of the Republic of Lithuania in the European Union, it even encourages the establishment, by legal acts, such requirements related to holding certain positions at state schools of higher education, scientific institutes under state universities, state institutes of science, or state educational establishments that would prompt scientists to publish their scientific works not only in Lithuanian, but also in other languages, and to arrange such publishing in authoritative scientific publications, which are recognised by scientific society and are published both in Lithuania and abroad. Publishing scientific works in foreign scientific publications and their publishing in various foreign languages encourage Lithuanian scientists to examine problems that are significant not only to Lithuanian science, but to modern science in general, to participate in the general international process of creating science, to get involved in the turnover of knowledge and ideas, to search for new and original solutions, to strive for the recognition of their scientific research not only in Lithuania, but also on the international level.

When establishing requirements that should be met by a scientist in order to become eligible for holding a certain position at state schools of higher education, scientific institutes under state universities, state institutes of science, or state educational establishments, it is allowed to establish by means of government resolutions also such a requirement that a scientist who has published scientific works that are regarded as significant may be eligible for holding certain positions at state schools of higher education, scientific institutes under state universities, state institutes of science, or state educational establishments. It is also allowed to establish by means of government resolutions such a requirement that scientists who have published scientific works in such scientific publications that are treated as authoritative by the scientific and academic community and in such scientific publications that are reviewed in various international databases may be eligible for holding a certain position at state schools of higher education, scientific institutes under state universities, state institutes of science, or state educational establishments. The fact that scientific works are published in publications that are recognised by the scientific and academic community as authoritative ones and are reviewed in various international databases gives reason to presume that these scientific works are significant.

At the same time, it should be noted that the requirements to have a certain amount of scientific works published in publications that are reviewed in international databases may not be made absolute. The importance of scientific works should be assessed not only according to the fact that they are published in scientific publications that are reviewed in various international databases, but, first of all, according to their novelty, original ideas, fundamentality, impact upon the formation of new areas and/or fields of scientific research, etc.

... as such, the fact that scientific works are not published in publications that are reviewed in international databases does not mean that these scientific works are insignificant.

Consequently, if legal acts stipulate that certain positions at state schools of higher education, scientific institutes under state universities, state institutes of science, or state educational establishments may be held by scientists who have published scientific works in publications that are reviewed in international databases, such a requirement may not be made an absolute one; the said legal acts must at the same time establish an alternative – other requirements related to the significance of scientific works upon meeting which a scientists may hold a certain position.

It should be noted that, in view of the fact that the discussed requirements are related to the possibility of holding a certain position at state schools of higher education, scientific institutes under state universities, state institutes of science, or state educational establishments, the aforementioned alternative requirements should be such that would ensure that certain positions in the said institutions would be held by scientists holding the qualification necessary for that purpose. The most important criterion proving the competence of a scientist is, of course, the significance of scientific works published by him/her; this importance may not be determined solely according to the fact whether these scientific works were published specifically in publications that are reviewed in international databases. It is obvious that really significant scientific works are also often published even in very authoritative scientific publications recognised by scientific society at large that are not reviewed in international databases; besides, really significant scientific works are also often published in other ways (e.g. by issuing a significant monograph or another publication, collections of articles by various authors, in which important problems are examined, etc.).

It should also be noted that the system of requirements that should be met by scientists in order to become eligible for holding a certain position at state schools of higher education, scientific institutes under state universities, state institutes of science, or state educational establishments may not be such where the Lithuanian language is treated in such a way that scientific works published in this language are considered not fully fledged works, or are considered second-class works, as this would basically mean that it is the Lithuanian language – a special constitutional value – that is not a fully fledged language or is a second-class language. This would not be in line with the constitutional status of Lithuanian as the state language.

On the other hand, the fact that it has been held in this ruling of the Constitutional Court that the requirements to have a certain amount of scientific works published in publications that are reviewed in international databases may not become absolute ones does not mean and must not be interpreted in a manner that they are negative as such and that the said requirements violate freedom of science and scientific research, the autonomy of schools of higher education, the status of Lithuanian as the state language, or other constitutional values, and that the said requirements as such are incompatible with the Constitution. As mentioned before, the said requirements may be established, but they may not be made absolute ones.

The areas and fields of science, including humanities and social science, are very diverse and have their own specificity. The particularities of humanities and social sciences are especially distinct. Only due to the reason that ... humanities and social sciences are oriented towards national, cultural, and political problems of a certain community, that the results of their scientific research are often published in the official (state) language of the respective country, as well as that the results of these sciences are, first of all, important specifically to the respective national, cultural, or political community, the possibilities of international imparting of these sciences, including publishing in publications that are reviewed in international databases, are quite often more complicated and limited.

The specificity of areas and fields of science, especially the particularities of humanities and social sciences, which determine the fact that the possibilities of scientists who work in these areas and fields of science to publish the results of scientific research in publications that are reviewed in international databases are often more complicated and limited, implies the necessity to establish a differentiated legal regulation of the respective relationships. Such a differentiated legal regulation means that the requirements that must be met by scientists in order to become eligible for a certain position at state schools of higher education, scientific institutes under state universities, state institutes of science, or state educational establishments may not be absolutely identical in regard to publishing scientific works and the results of scientific research in all areas and fields of science, including their publishing in publications that are reviewed in international databases.

... the aforementioned differentiated legal regulation must be applied to humanities and social sciences.

It should be noted that the Constitution does not prohibit the consolidation of such a legal regulation where the Government, upon taking account of the specificity of areas and fields of science, as well as upon taking account of the possibilities of publishing scientific works and results of scientific research in publications that are reviewed in international databases, establishes itself, by its resolution, differentiated minimum requirements applicable to various areas or fields of science, which should be met by scientists in order to become eligible for certain positions at state schools of higher education, scientific institutes under state universities, state institutes of science, or state educational establishments. It has been mentioned that one of such requirements could be the requirement to have scientific works published in publications that are reviewed in international databases, but this requirement, as already stated, may not be made absolute.

On the other hand, taking account of the fact that, in order to establish the areas and fields of science in which the possibilities of publishing the results of conducted scientific research in publications that are reviewed in international databases are more difficult and limited due to the specificity of the areas and fields of science and that special (professional) competence is necessary, it is also allowed to establish, by means of a government resolution, such a legal regulation that the institution (institutions) (which has (have) already been indicated in this ruling of the Constitutional Court) that represent(s) the scientific and academic community and is (are) composed of scientists with solid credentials elected from the scientific and academic community or delegated by it would establish the aforementioned areas and fields of science in which the respective requirements may be applied differently.

It should be especially stressed in the constitutional justice case at issue that the requirements established by the Government to publish scientific works in publications that are reviewed in international databases is only one of the ways permitted by the Constitution by which it is possible to prompt the imparting of Lithuanian science in the world and the participation of Lithuanian scientists in the international scientific creative process.

This way may not be made an absolute one. If this way is chosen, legal acts may and must consolidate other ways of prompting the imparting of Lithuanian science in the world. It is the competence of the respective law-making subjects to choose and establish such methods; they have wide discretion in this area.

[...]

At the same time, attention must be paid to the fact that, while establishing in legal acts also such requirements that a scientist who wishes to hold a certain position at state schools of higher education, scientific institutes under state universities, state scientific institutes, or state scientific establishments must have a certain amount of scientific works published in publications that are assessed in international databases, as well as in the publications that are included in the databases of the Institute for Scientific Information, account must also be taken of the fact that there are various international databases in the world in which various scientific publications are assessed. Thus, upon stipulating that a scientist who wishes to hold a certain position at state schools of higher education, scientific institutes under state universities, state scientific institutes, or state scientific establishments must have a certain amount of scientific works published in publications that are assessed in international databases, such a legal regulation implies, inter alia, that, while deciding which international databases are deemed to be recognised in Lithuania, account must be taken of the specificity of the areas and fields of science, particularly of humanities and social sciences, where the said specificity determines more difficult or even limited international imparting possibilities of the scientific works of scientists who work in these spheres of science.

It also needs to be noted that, upon consolidating in the legal acts also such a requirement that a scientist who wishes to hold a certain position at a state school of higher education, a scientific institute under state universities, a state scientific institutes, or a state scientific establishment must have a certain amount (number) of scientific works published in publications that are assessed in international databases, it is also allowed to establish such a legal regulation whereby the respective international databases, particularly of humanities and social sciences, may also be created in Lithuania – the scientific articles of scientists who work in the areas of humanities and social sciences that are published in publications assessed in such databases may be regarded as articles upon publishing which a certain scientist may seek to hold the position of a professor or a chief scientific worker. If such a requirement is consolidated, founding the said international databases in Lithuania must even be prompted.

It needs to be noted that the list of the international databases that are deemed to be recognised ... must be constantly revised and updated. When approving the list of the international databases that are deemed to be recognised in Lithuania, it is also necessary to specify the list of publications that are assessed in the said specific databases (at the respective period of time). Such a legal regulation would create the possibilities for scientists who wish to hold certain positions in state schools of higher education, scientific institutes under state universities, state scientific institutes, or state scientific establishments to know in advance which publications that represent the area or field of their science are assessed in the international databases that are deemed to be recognised in Lithuania; this would, in its turn, encourage scientists to publish their scientific works specifically in such publications where their scientific works published in the said publications would be regarded as meeting the requirements established in legal acts so that they could be eligible for holding certain positions at state schools of higher education, scientific institutes under state universities, state scientific institutes, or state scientific establishments.

Establishing the procedure for verifying the qualification of a scientist

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 5 May 2007

The provision of Article 42 of the Constitution, whereby science and research are free, the provision of Paragraph 3 of Article 40 of the Constitution, whereby schools of higher education are granted autonomy, the constitutional imperatives of an open and harmonious society, and other provisions of the Constitution also imply that, when deciding whether or not it is established in a law that it is necessary to lay down the procedure for verifying (assessing) the fact whether the competence of a scientist is sufficient so that he/she may be eligible for holding certain positions at state schools of higher education, scientific institutes under state universities, state institutes of science, or state educational establishments, it is necessary to give due consideration to the opinion of the scientific and academic community, as well as that of state and other authoritative institutions of science, which unite scientists of various spheres of science. When establishing this, it is also important to assess the experience of other countries, especially the Members of the European Union, the tendencies that prevail in them, as well as how much and in what manner this experience must and can be applied in Lithuania. When deciding what requirements should be met by a scientist in order to make it possible to hold that his/her competence is such that allows him/her to become eligible for holding certain positions at state schools of higher education, scientific institutes under state universities, state institutes of science, or state educational establishments, it is necessary to give due consideration to the opinion of state and other authoritative institutions of science, which unite scientists of various areas and fields of science.

The legislature may consolidate in a law that it is necessary to establish a procedure in the course of the application of which it is verified (assessed) whether the qualification of a scientist is such that he/she may be eligible for holding certain positions at state schools of higher education, scientific institutes under state universities, state institutes of science, or state educational establishments. However, it does not follow from the Constitution that the said requirements and procedure for verifying the qualification of a scientist must be consolidated solely by means of a law. The establishment of such requirements, if, in the course of their establishment, regard is paid to the discussed imperatives that arise from the Constitution, is virtually part of the procedure for implementing the human right to be eligible for holding a certain position at state schools of higher education, scientific institutes under state universities, state institutes of science, or state educational establishments; therefore, such relationships may also be regulated by means of government resolutions – substatutory legal acts. In addition, if such powers stem from laws and/or government resolutions based on them, the said relationships may be regulated by means of substatutory legal acts that are issued by an institution (institutions) (which also has (have) special (professional) competence necessary to regulate the relationships in the sphere of science and/or academic activity and which has (have) the powers to regulate certain relationships linked with science and/or academic activity, where such competence is established for it by means of a law or by means of a government resolution) that represents (represent) the scientific and academic community and is (are) formed from scientists elected or delegated by the scientific and academic community.

In the course of regulating these relationships (no matter by what legal acts they are regulated), regard must be paid to the norms and principles of the Constitution, inter alia, the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law including, among other things, legal certainty, legal clarity, and legal security, which implies the necessity to ensure the protection of legitimate expectations.

Assessing the qualification of a scientist

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 5 May 2007

... when forming and pursuing the scientific policy of the state, it is necessary to find ways of how, without deviating from the Constitution, on the one hand, to prompt the international imparting of Lithuanian science and its sufficient representation in the world and, on the other hand, to prompt such scientific research that is significant to Lithuania even if it virtually cannot arouse much interest among scientists and researchers of other states and could not be imparted wider on the international level. It has been also held that, under the Constitution, it is not prohibited to establish in legal acts of the state (its institutions) certain general minimum requirements that should be fulfilled by scientists who seek to hold certain positions in state schools of higher education, scientific institutes under state universities, state scientific institutes, or state scientific establishments, and that one of such requirements may also be the requirement to have a certain amount of scientific works published in such publications that are assessed in international databases.

... the system of requirements that must be fulfilled by a scientist so that he/she may be eligible for holding the position of a professor or a chief scientific fellow must be such that would allow assessing whether the qualification of a scientist is really such that he/she is ready to hold the said positions of a professor or a chief scientific fellow. One of the requirements that must be fulfilled by a scientist may also be the requirement to have a certain amount of scientific works published in such publications that are reviewed in international databases.

