However, it should be noted once again that these requirements (which are laid down in legal acts), whereby a scientist who seeks to hold certain positions in state schools of higher education, scientific institutes under state universities, state scientific institutes, or state scientific establishments must have a certain amount of scientific works published in such publications that are reviewed in international databases, should not be regarded as absolute ones. The said formal requirements to have a certain amount of scientific works published in such publications that are reviewed in international databases may be one of especially important criteria for the significance of scientific works, thus, also for the assessment of the qualification of a scientist. However, solely the formal indicators such as a certain amount of published scientific works, their publishing in namely such publications that are reviewed in international databases, a certain period of time during which scientific works must be published, etc., or such a formal requirement that a publication must be reviewed before publishing it, etc. not always allow revealing the real qualification of a scientist and the value and significance of his/her scientific works. The system of requirements that must be fulfilled by a scientist so that he/her may be eligible for holding certain positions at state schools of higher education, scientific institutes under state universities, state scientific institutes, or state scientific establishments must be such that it would be possible to decide on the qualification and significance of the scientific work of such a scientist not only from the amount of his/her published scientific works, as well as not only from the fact during which period of time these scientific works (scientific articles) are published and in which scientific publications (which are reviewed in international databases or which are not reviewed in them) they are published, but, first of all, according to the value and significance of the scientific works published by the said scientist, inter alia, according to their novelty, originality, fundamentality, influence on the formation of the new areas of scientific research, etc. ... as such, the fact that scientific works are not published in publications that are reviewed in international databases does not mean that these scientific works are insignificant. In order to assess the value, significance and quality of scientific works, it is not enough that they meet some established formal requirements of imparting, including international imparting – in order to do that, first of all, an extremely qualified and impartial expert assessment of scientific works, including those that are published in publications that are reviewed in international databases, is necessary. When creating a system of the expert assessment of scientific works, it is necessary to give due consideration to the opinion of the scientific and academic community; in addition, the Constitution does not prohibit any such a legal regulation whereby an institution (or institutions) that genuinely represents (represent) the scientific and academic community and is (are) composed of scientists with solid credentials would have the powers to establish the respective systems of the expert assessment of scientific works, to lay down the criteria for assessing scientific works, and to regulate other most important relationships in this connection. Especially, when account is taken of the principle of the autonomy of schools of higher education, as consolidated in the Constitution, also such a legal regulation that would allow schools of higher education, while taking account of the general main requirements established by such an institution (or institutions) that genuinely represents (represent) the scientific and academic community and is (are) composed of scientists with solid credentials, to establish themselves specific criteria for assessing the qualification of a scientist would be compatible with the Constitution.

Qualification requirements for scientists who seek to hold a certain position at state institutions of science and studies

The Constitutional Court's decision of 1 February 2008

In its ruling of 5 May 2007, the Constitutional Court formulated a broad official constitutional doctrine of freedom of science and research, where the said doctrine is related to requirements, established by means of legal acts, that must be met by persons who work in the areas of humanities and social sciences and who are eligible for holding certain positions in state schools of higher education and other state scientific institutions, and where the said doctrine is also related to the autonomy of schools of higher education, which is consolidated in the Constitution. In addition, the said ruling emphasised the professional independence of the scientific community (as well as the communities representing certain scientific fields), as a community united by a scientific approach and professional interests, from state institutions, their independent institutionalisation and self-governance, free communication with scientific communities of other countries (inter alia, scientific and educational institutions). The state forms and pursues a certain scientific policy; however, scientific research is an activity that demands special professional knowledge; therefore, the institutions of public power that adopt decisions addressed to science, studies, or other scientific community (inter alia, institutions of science and studies), when regulating the respective relationships in their legal acts, must not ignore in any way and must pay sufficient attention to the opinion of the scientific community. Legal acts may establish qualification requirements that must be met by scientists who wish to hold a certain position at state schools of higher education, scientific institutes under state universities, state institutes of science, or state educational establishments; various ways of establishing such requirements are possible, inter alia, legal acts may establish such minimum requirements that must be fulfilled by scientists who seek to hold certain positions in the aforementioned institutions; however, legal acts of the state (its institutions) may establish only basic (more general) requirements, which are in turn made more detailed and specific by state schools of higher education and educational establishments in their own (i.e. local) legal acts. Still, the discretion of the Government to establish general minimum requirements (which must help to improve the quality of science of Lithuania and to promote its international imparting) applicable to scientists who seek to hold a certain position at state schools of higher education, scientific institutes under state universities, state scientific institutes, or state educational establishments is limited by the norms and principles of the Constitution, inter alia, the constitutional principle of proportionality. For instance, such a legal regulation that would impose such conditions related to the publication of the results of scientific research on scientists or researchers who wish to continue their scientific activity or make a scientific career (e.g. to hold certain office at a scientific or educational institution) that can hardly be met due to such reasons the possibilities of eliminating which by the State of Lithuania (institutions thereof) are small or no attempts to eliminate the said reasons are made by the State of Lithuania (institutions thereof) would be constitutionally unreasoned. The said ruling of the Constitutional Court also emphasised the need for a differentiated legal regulation: minimum qualification requirements not only may, but even must, be differentiated by taking into account the specificity of certain areas and fields of science, which also determine greater or smaller possibilities of their international imparting.

It was also held in the Constitutional Court's ruling of 5 May 2007 that, when establishing requirements that must be met by a scientist in order to become eligible for aspiring to a certain position at state schools of higher education, scientific institutes under state universities, state scientific institutes, or state educational establishments, it is also allowed to establish by means of government resolutions such a requirement whereby scientists who have published scientific works in such scientific publications that are reviewed in various international databases (thus, those scientific works are regarded by the scientific and academic community as authoritative ones and this gives reason to presume that these scientific works are important) may be eligible for holding certain positions at state schools of higher education, scientific institutes under state universities, state scientific institutes, or state educational establishments. However, such requirements may not be made absolute, since, as such, the fact that scientific works are not published in publications that are reviewed in international databases does not mean that these scientific works are insignificant: the importance of scientific works should be assessed not only according to the fact that they are published in scientific publications that are reviewed in various international databases, but, first of all, according to their novelty, original ideas, fundamentality, impact upon formation of new areas and/or fields of scientific research, etc., but not according to the said formal criterion only. Therefore, if the said formal requirement is established, the said acts must also at the same time establish an alternative – other requirements related to the importance of scientific works upon meeting which scientists would be allowed to hold a certain position. The system of requirements that should be met by scientists in order to become eligible for holding a certain position at state schools of higher education, scientific institutes under state universities, state institutes of science, or state educational establishments may not be such where scientific works published in Lithuanian are considered not fully fledged works, or are considered second-class works; due to the fact that the possibilities of scientists who work in the areas and fields of humanities and social sciences to publish scientific works and the results of scientific research in publications that are reviewed in international databases are often more complicated and limited, solely the formal indicators such as a certain amount of published scientific works, their publishing in namely such publications that are assessed in international databases, a certain period of time during which scientific works must be published, etc., or such a formal requirement that a publication must be reviewed before publishing it, etc. not always allow revealing the real qualification of a scientist and the value and importance of his/her scientific works – in order to do that, first of all, an extremely qualified and impartial expert assessment of scientific works, including those that are published in publications that are assessed in international databases, is necessary. When creating a system of the expert assessment of scientific works, it is necessary to give due consideration to the opinion of the scientific and academic community; in addition, the Constitution does not prohibit any such a legal regulation whereby an institution (or institutions) that genuinely represents (represent) the scientific and academic community and is (are) composed of scientists with solid credentials would have the powers to establish the respective systems of the expert assessment of scientific works, to lay down the criteria for assessing scientific works, and to regulate other most important relationships in this connection; especially, when account is taken of the principle of the autonomy of schools of higher education, as consolidated in the Constitution, also such a legal regulation that would allow schools of higher education, while taking account of the general main requirements established by such an institution (or institutions) that genuinely represents (represent) the scientific and academic community and is (are) composed of scientists with solid credentials, to establish themselves specific criteria for assessing the qualification of a scientist would be compatible with the Constitution.

The right of schools of higher education to establish concrete criteria for assessing the qualification of scientists and the responsibility of schools of higher education for the quality of higher education

... especially, when account is taken of the principle of the autonomy of schools of higher education, as consolidated in the Constitution, also such a legal regulation that would allow schools of higher education, while taking account of the general main requirements established by such an institution (or institutions) that genuinely represents (represent) the scientific and academic community and is (are) composed of scientists with solid credentials, to establish themselves specific criteria for assessing the qualification of a scientist would be compatible with the Constitution.

Consequently, the fact that legal acts adopted by the Government establish criteria by following which the importance of scientific works of persons who work in the areas of humanities and social sciences is assessed when it is decided as regards the habilitation of a certain scientist or his/her suitability to hold a certain position in a state institution of science and studies does not mean that schools of higher education do not have the right also to establish additional criteria for assessing such scientific works where the said criteria would allow assessing the value of scientific works published by a scientist, inter alia, according to their novelty, original ideas, fundamentality, impact upon formation of new areas and/or fields of scientific research, etc.

However, it needs to be emphasised that the autonomy of schools of higher education consolidated in the Constitution does not at all imply that the powers to establish concrete criteria for assessing the qualification of a scientist (by taking account of the main general requirements established by an institution that genuinely represents the scientific and academic community and is composed of scientists with solid credentials) may be granted to all schools of higher education. Quite to the contrary, the rights enjoyed by schools of higher education may be differentiated (by having regard to the Constitution) according to various important criteria, inter alia, according to the status of such schools of higher education (i.e. whether they are universities or not), the level of higher education provided by them to persons that study there, the syllabi they follow, their scientific potential, etc.

In addition, the fact that schools of higher education have the right to establish additional criteria for assessing scientific works by following which the importance of scientific works of persons who work in the areas of humanities and social sciences is assessed when it is decided as regards the habilitation of a certain scientist or his/her suitability to hold a certain position in a state institution of science and studies does not mean that it is allowed to disregard formal requirements for persons who seek the so-called habilitation and who work in the areas of humanities and social sciences, as well as formal general minimum qualification requirements (which are established by the state (its institutions) within its (their) competence (also, by having regard to the Constitution and the official constitutional doctrine set out in the Constitutional Court's ruling of 5 May 2007)) that must be met by scientists aspiring to hold the position of a professor or a chief scientific fellow.

... when interpreting and applying [the respective] ... provisions of legal acts and establishing the respective local legal regulation, as well as that related to the requirements for persons who seek the so-called habilitation and who work in the areas of humanities and social sciences, as well as with the qualification requirements that must be met by scientists aspiring to the position of a professor or a chief scientific fellow ... schools of higher education may not create any preconditions for situations where persons whose scientific works are not significant (thus, their qualification is not sufficient for the respective position) could fulfil the so-called habilitation procedure and hold the position of a professor and a chief scientific fellow. If such preconditions were created, scientific titles and the value of scientific works could really become devalued (not only in certain schools, but also in the entire country), the level of science of Lithuania would go into decline, and the quality of studies in schools of higher education would become worse ...

It needs to be especially emphasised that, under the Constitution, schools of higher education (both state and non-state ones) not only make use of their autonomy, but also fulfil an important social function – they provide higher education, while the provision of proper and quality higher education is impossible without scientific research of high level; thus, the provision of higher education is impossible without highly-qualified scientists. The autonomy of schools of higher education must be related to their mission to prepare specialists of various spheres who have acquired higher education, who meet the requirements of society and the state; thus, the autonomy of schools of higher education must also be related to great responsibility of schools of higher education for the quality of higher education.

The creation of the preconditions for devaluing scientific titles and scientific works would at the same time mean that preconditions are also created for the violation of the rights of other persons and, first of all, the human right, which stems from the Constitution, to seek higher education; the said right implies, as it was held by the Constitutional Court in its rulings of 14 January 2002 and 7 June 2007, the duty of the state to create the preconditions for implementing this right. It needs to be held that the said constitutional human right implies the duty of schools of higher education to provide not any education, but proper and quality education to students; the same constitutional right also implies the right of students to demand precisely this proper and quality higher education from the schools of higher education in which they are studying. If these constitutional imperatives were disregarded (while the creation of the preconditions for devaluing scientific titles and the value of scientific works would precisely mean that these imperatives are disregarded), there would be grounds for doubts whether a certain school of higher education reasonably and properly makes use of the autonomy consolidated in the Constitution and whether its status as a school of higher education is reasonably and lawfully recognised.

Criteria for assessing the significance of scientific works of persons working in humanities and social sciences

... in the course of assessing the importance of scientific works of persons who work in the areas of humanities and social sciences when it is decided on the habilitation of a certain scientist or his/her suitability to hold a certain position in a state institution of science and studies no formal (quantitative) requirements (inter alia, the amount of published scientific works, their volume, in what publications they were published, the time period within which scientific works must be published, the review of the publication before it is published, etc.) may be made absolute ... legal acts must also establish alternative criteria allowing an assessment of the value and significance of works published by a scientist, inter alia, according to their novelty, original ideas, fundamentality, impact on the formation of new areas and/or fields of scientific research, etc. ... While establishing a legal regulation linked with requirements for persons who seek the so-called habilitation and who work in the areas of humanities and social sciences, as well as with qualification requirements that must be met by scientists aspiring to hold the position of a professor or a chief scientific fellow, regard must be paid to the autonomy of schools of higher education, which is consolidated in the Constitution. ...

At the same time, it needs to be emphasised that it is not allowed to create the preconditions for devaluing scientific titles and the value of scientific works, thus, also for worsening the quality of studies in schools of higher education. In addition, the provisions set out herein do not mean that it is allowed to disregard formal requirements, which are established by the state (its institutions) within its competence, for persons who seek the so-called habilitation and who work in the areas of humanities and social sciences, as well as formal general minimum qualification requirements that must be met by scientists aspiring to hold the position of a professor or a chief scientific fellow.

The powers of the Government to establish the criteria for assessing the significance of scientific works of persons working in humanities and social sciences

... the discretion of the Government to establish criteria by following which the importance of scientific works of persons who work in the spheres of humanities and social sciences is assessed when it is decided on the habilitation of a certain scientist or his/her suitability to hold a certain position in a state institution of science and studies is limited – such discretion is limited by the Constitution. Resolutions of the Government must be based on laws; they may not contain any provisions competing with the legal regulation established in laws. The Government, when establishing the said criteria, must also pay regard to the autonomy of schools of higher education, which is consolidated in the Constitution. The Government may not establish only formal criteria by following which the importance of scientific works of persons who work in the spheres of humanities and social sciences is assessed when it is decided on the habilitation of a certain scientist or his/her suitability to hold a certain position in a state institution of science and studies, and the Government must not fail to establish such criteria for assessing scientific works that would allow the assessment of the value of scientific works published by scientists, inter alia, according to their novelty, original ideas, fundamentality, impact on the formation of new areas and/or fields of scientific research, etc.; in addition, the Government must not fail to grant the right to schools of higher education to establish additional criteria for assessing scientific works, where such criteria would also allow the assessment of the value of scientific works published by scientists, inter alia, according to their novelty, original ideas, fundamentality, impact on the formation of new areas and/or fields of scientific research, etc. Under the Constitution, it is also allowed to establish such a legal regulation where the said criteria are established by schools of higher education themselves while taking account of the general main requirements established by such an institution (or institutions) that genuinely represents (represent) the scientific and academic community and is (are) composed of scientists with solid credentials It also needs to be held that the powers of the Government to establish the said criteria also do not deny the powers of schools of higher education to interpret the legal regulation established by the Government in a manner that would also allow assessing the value and importance of published scientific works of a scientist, inter alia, according to their novelty, original ideas, fundamentality, impact on the formation of new areas and/or fields of scientific research, etc.

At the same time, it needs to be noted that schools of higher education must pay regard to the said formal criteria (which by no means may be made absolute and which must have alternatives (which allow an assessment of the value of the scientific works published by scientists, inter alia, according to their novelty, original ideas, fundamentality, impact upon the formation of new areas and/or fields of scientific research, etc.)) established by the Government within its competence.

The expert assessment of scientific works

The Constitutional Court's decision of 1 February 2008

... various systems of the expert assessment of scientific works (also systems of the assessment of the importance of scientific works of persons who work in the areas of humanities and social sciences when it is decided on the habilitation of a certain scientist or his/her suitability to hold a certain position in a state institution of science and studies) may be established.

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 5 May 2007 provided no interpretation as to what systems of the assessment there should or could be; this decision of the Constitutional Court will provide no interpretation with regard to this issue, either On the other hand, it was held that solely the formal indicators (such as a certain amount of published scientific works, their publishing in namely such publications that are reviewed in international databases, a certain period of time within which scientific works must be published, etc., or such a formal requirement that a publication must be reviewed before publishing it, etc.) not always allow revealing the real qualification of a scientist and the value and importance of his/her scientific works; it was also held that, in order to do that, an extremely qualified and impartial expert assessment of scientific works, including those that are published in publications that are reviewed in international databases, is necessary precisely because the possibilities of scientists who work in the areas and fields of humanities and social sciences to publish scientific works and the results of scientific research in publications that are reviewed in international databases are often more complicated and limited. It was also held that, when creating a system of the expert assessment of scientific works, it is necessary to give due consideration to the opinion of the scientific and academic community.

... it should also be held that a legal regulation linked with the said system of the expert assessment may also be established by the Government; in addition, it is allowed to establish such a legal regulation where a system (or systems) of expert assessment is (are) established and the main general requirements are established by an institution (or institutions) that genuinely represents (represent) the scientific and academic community and is (are) composed of scientists with solid credentials; however, it is also allowed to establish such a legal regulation where the said system (or systems) is (are) established by schools of higher education themselves by taking account of the general main requirements established by such an institution (institutions) that genuinely represents (represent) the scientific and academic community and is (are) composed of scientists with solid credentials ...

However, no matter which subject established a legal regulation linked with the system of the expert assessment of scientific works (including the system of the assessment of the importance of scientific works of persons who work in the areas of humanities and social sciences when it is decided on the habilitation of a certain scientist or his/her suitability to hold a certain position in a state institution of science and studies), it is necessary to ensure that the importance of published scientific works of scientists (including scientists who work in the areas of humanities and social sciences) when it is decided on the habilitation of a certain scientist or his/her suitability to hold a certain position in a state institution of science and studies would be assessed, inter alia, according to their novelty, original ideas, fundamentality, impact upon the formation of new areas and/or fields of scientific research, etc.

The duty of the state to support culture (Paragraph 2 of Article 42 of the Constitution)

... Paragraph 2 of Article 42 of the Constitution, inter alia, provides that “the state supports culture ... and takes care of the protection of ... artistic, and other cultural monuments, as well as other culturally valuable objects”. While interpreting Paragraph 2 of Article 42 of the Constitution in its ruling of 8 July 2005, the Constitutional Court held the following:

– ensuring freedom of culture, state support for culture, and the protection of cultural monuments and other culturally valuable objects constitute a public interest and an important function of the state; support for culture, as well as the protection of cultural monuments and other culturally valuable objects, is a necessary condition for freedom of culture as an innate freedom of an individual (which comprises freedom of creative activity and freedom of access to culturally valuable objects);

– the state is constitutionally obliged to support and foster culture as a national value of universal importance – the material and spiritual creative activity and its results, which should be passed on to future generations; according to the Constitution, the state must not only refrain from hindering the natural development of culture, but it must also encourage it by its positive decisions (inter alia, a legal regulation), and must support the creation, spread, promotion, and preserving of material and spiritual cultural values by using state funds or other resources;

– the constitutional imperative of access to culturally valuable objects implies the duty of the state to establish and maintain such state institutions (establishments or enterprises through which state functions are performed) whose objective is taking care of the development of culture (inter alia, establishments or enterprises providing public cultural services), or in other ways to initiate and encourage founding and maintaining other – non-state – institutions the purpose of which is taking care of the development of culture.

... the Constitution, inter alia, Paragraph 2 of Article 42 thereof, gives rise to the duty of the legislature, in order to implement the public interest, i.e. to ensure freedom of culture and state support for culture, to create, by means of a legal regulation, the preconditions for, inter alia, state (municipal) establishments providing public cultural services to effectively foster and develop culture as a national value of universal importance. In this regard, the Constitution, inter alia, Paragraph 1 of Article 48 thereof, which consolidates the right of everyone to freely choose an occupation, gives rise to the powers of the legislature to establish certain qualification and reputation requirements and/or other requirements for persons working in these establishments and, the more so, for persons who are heads of these establishments in cases where the legislature regulates the activity of state (municipal) establishments providing public cultural services. ... these powers must be exercised in accordance with the Constitution, inter alia, with the imperatives stemming from the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law.

The duty of the state to ensure the special protection of the Curonian Spit as a public interest protected by the Constitution (Paragraph 2 of Article 42 and Paragraph 1 of Article 54 of the Constitution)

See 2.4.2. Social rights, 2.4.2.3. The right to a healthy environment, the ruling of 25 November 2019.

2.4.3.3. The cultural rights of citizens belonging to ethnic communities

The rights of citizens belonging to ethnic communities (Article 37 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 21 October 1999

Article 37 of the Constitution prescribes: "Citizens belonging to ethnic communities shall have the right to foster their language, culture, and customs."

This constitutional norm guarantees that the ethnic identity of the ethnic communities residing in the territory of Lithuania will be preserved and that the continuity of their culture and national self-expression will be ensured.

2.5. CITIZENSHIP

The constitutional rights of citizens

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 30 December 2003

Citizenship determines the legal status of a person; the fact that a certain person holds citizenship constitutes the precondition for that person to exercise all the rights and freedoms consolidated in the Constitution and laws, as well as to perform established duties.

In this context, it should be noted that, under the Constitution, only citizens have certain rights: the right to participate in the governance of the state both directly and through democratically elected representatives (Paragraph 1 of Article 33); the right to submit to the Seimas a motion to alter or supplement the Constitution of the Republic of Lithuania (Paragraph 1 of Article 147); the right to vote in elections to the Seimas and the right to stand for election to the Seimas (Paragraph 1 of Article 34, Article 56); the right to vote in presidential elections and the right to stand for election as the President of the Republic (Paragraph 1 of Article 34, Article 56, Paragraphs 1 and 2 of Article 78); the right to be judges (Paragraph 1 of Article 112); the right to enter state service (Paragraph 1 of Article 33); the right to request that a referendum be called (Paragraph 3 of Article 9); the right of legislative initiative (Paragraph 2 of Article 68). The Constitution and laws also establish certain other rights enjoyed only by citizens of the Republic of Lithuania. Under the Constitution, only citizens of the Republic of Lithuania also have certain duties: the duty to defend the State of Lithuania against a foreign armed attack (Paragraph 1 of Article 139 of the Constitution); the duty to perform military or alternative national defence service (Paragraph 2 of Article 139 of the Constitution).

The permanent legal link between a person and the state, which is expressed by citizenship, implies the duty of the state to protect its citizens within the country, as well as outside its borders: under Paragraph 1 of Article 13 of the Constitution, "The State of Lithuania shall protect its citizens abroad". The state must take care of its citizens abroad in all cases, without taking account of whether or not a citizen of the Republic of Lithuania violated the laws of a host state. The prohibition has also been established in the Constitution against extraditing a citizen of the Republic of Lithuania to another state – a citizen of the Republic of Lithuania may only be extradited to another state only if an international treaty of the Republic of Lithuania provides so (Paragraph 2 of Article 13 of the Constitution). Such an international treaty may not be in conflict with the Constitution.

On the basis of Paragraph 1 of Article 32 of the Constitution, under which citizens may move and choose their place of residence in Lithuania freely and may leave Lithuania freely, and Paragraph 3 of Article 32 of the Constitution, under which citizens may not be prohibited from returning to Lithuania, the conclusion should be drawn that, under the Constitution, a citizen of the Republic of Lithuania may not be sent from Lithuania.

Article 2 of the Constitution prescribes: “The State of Lithuania shall be created by the Nation. Sovereignty shall belong to the Nation.” Under Article 4 of the Constitution, “The Nation shall execute its supreme sovereign power either directly or through its democratically elected representatives”. Paragraph 1 of Article 33 of the Constitution stipulates that “Citizens shall have the right to participate in the governance of their State both directly and through their democratically elected representatives”; under Paragraph 2 of Article 3 of the Constitution, “The Nation and each citizen shall have the right to resist anyone who encroaches on the independence, territorial integrity, and constitutional order of the State of Lithuania by force”.

It follows from these and other provisions of the Constitution that only the citizens of the Republic of Lithuania, i.e. the national community – the civil Nation, have the right to create the State of Lithuania, i.e. only citizens have the right to decide as to what State of Lithuania there must be, to establish the constitutional order of the State of Lithuania, the organisation of institutions implementing state power, the grounds of relationships between a person and the state, the system of the economy of the country, etc. When implementing the rights and freedoms of citizens, citizens participate in executing the sovereignty of the Nation.

The constitutional foundations of citizenship of the Republic of Lithuania (Article 12 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court’s ruling of 30 December 2003

The constitutional foundations of citizenship of the Republic of Lithuania are consolidated in Article 12 of the Constitution; Item 21 of Article 84 of the Constitution provides that the President of the Republic grants citizenship; under Article 85 of the Constitution, the President of the Republic decides questions of granting citizenship by issuing decrees and, to be valid, the decrees of the President of the Republic on granting citizenship must be signed by the Prime Minister or an appropriate minister.

Article 12 of the Constitution prescribes:

“Citizenship of the Republic of Lithuania shall be acquired by birth or on other grounds established by law.

With the exception of individual cases provided for by law, no one may be a citizen of both the Republic of Lithuania and another state at the same time.

The procedure for the acquisition and loss of citizenship shall be established by law.”

Paragraph 1 of Article 12 of the Constitution specifies the main way of the acquisition of citizenship of the Republic of Lithuania: citizenship of the Republic of Lithuania is acquired by birth; the same article also contains the provision that the procedure for the acquisition of citizenship is established by law.

Paragraph 2 of Article 12 of the Constitution consolidates the provision that a citizen of the Republic of Lithuania may not be a citizen of another state at the same time. Thus, the prohibition on dual citizenship is established in the Constitution; however, this prohibition is not absolute: under Paragraph 2 of Article 12 of the Constitution, in individual cases provided for by law, a citizen of the Republic of Lithuania may be a citizen of another state at the same time.

The provision of Paragraph 1 of Article 12 of the Constitution, whereby other grounds for the acquisition of citizenship can also be established by law, and the provision of Paragraph 3 of the same article, whereby the procedure for the acquisition and loss of citizenship is established by law, mean that the legislature has the duty to pass a law establishing the grounds for acquiring citizenship and regulating the procedure for the acquisition and loss of citizenship of the Republic of Lithuania.

In the course of establishing the grounds for acquiring citizenship of the Republic of Lithuania and regulating the procedure for the acquisition and loss of citizenship, the legislature has discretion. However, in doing so, the legislature may not deny the nature and meaning of the institution of citizenship, it must pay regard to the constitutional requirement that a citizen of the Republic of Lithuania may be a citizen of another state at the same time only in individual cases established by law. It should be emphasised that the provision of Article 12 of the Constitution, whereby a person may be a citizen of the Republic of Lithuania and, at the same time, a citizen of another state only in individual cases established by law, means that such cases established by law can be very rare (individual), that cases of dual citizenship must be extraordinarily rare and exceptional, that, under the Constitution, it is not permitted to establish any such a legal regulation under which cases of dual citizenship would be not extraordinarily rare exceptions, but rather a widespread phenomenon. Under the Constitution, the expansive interpretation of the provisions of [the law] consolidating the possibility of being a citizen of the Republic of Lithuania and a citizen of another state at the same time, where, according to the said interpretation, dual citizenship would entail not individual, extraordinarily rare exceptions, but rather a widespread phenomenon, is impermissible.

The powers of the President of the Republic to grant citizenship (Item 21 of Article 84 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 30 December 2003

Under Item 21 of Article 84 of the Constitution, the President of the Republic grants citizenship of the Republic of Lithuania according to the procedure established by law. This provision means that no other subject may grant citizenship of the Republic of Lithuania, that the President of the Republic, when he/she decides an issue of granting citizenship of the Republic of Lithuania, must follow the requirements established by law, that the President of the Republic is prohibited from granting citizenship of the Republic of Lithuania if he/she does not follow the requirements established by law, as well as the established procedure.

It needs to be noted that, when account is taken of the fact that citizenship of the Republic of Lithuania expresses legal membership of a person in the State of Lithuania and reflects the fact that he/she legally belongs to the national community – the civil Nation, the President of the Republic, when deciding whether to grant citizenship of the Republic of Lithuania to a person, must act in the interests of the Nation and the State of Lithuania.

... in all cases, granting citizenship of the Republic of Lithuania is an individual act – an act of application of law. A person to whom citizenship of the Republic of Lithuania is granted may acquire citizenship of the Republic of Lithuania only if the respective decree of the President of the Republic on granting citizenship of the Republic of Lithuania (thus, also on granting citizenship of the Republic of Lithuania by way of exception) has been issued without violating the Constitution and laws. If a decree of the President of the Republic on granting citizenship of the Republic of Lithuania is issued in violation of the Constitution and laws, a person may not acquire citizenship of the Republic of Lithuania on the grounds of the said decree of the President of the Republic, since the said decree violates the Constitution and laws.

Granting citizenship by way of exception

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 30 December 2003

... the Constitution ... [does not provide] as to what must be considered merit to the State of Lithuania. Under the valid legal regulation, only the President of the Republic decides on the merit to the State of Lithuania of a citizen of a foreign state or a stateless person.

Under Paragraph 2 of Article 77 of the Constitution, the President of the Republic performs everything with which he/she is charged by the Constitution and laws. Thus, when the President of the Republic decides whether to grant citizenship by way of exception, the President of the Republic is bound by the Constitution and [the law]: citizenship of the Republic of Lithuania may be granted to a citizen of a foreign state or a stateless person only in recognition of his/her merit to the Republic of Lithuania ... and only in accordance with the procedure for granting citizenship, as established in the law (Item 21 of Article 84 of the Constitution).

It needs to be noted that the phrase “to citizens of foreign states or stateless persons with merit to the Republic of Lithuania” ... of [the law] means that a citizen of a foreign state or a stateless person who requests citizenship of the Republic of Lithuania granted by way of exception must be of merit not to any entity, but to the State of Lithuania itself.

... in principle, a person must be of merit to the national community of Lithuania – the civil Nation – which, under the Constitution, has the sovereign powers and is the creator of the State of Lithuania, since the said citizen of a foreign state or stateless person aspires to become a member of this national community.

... financial, material, or any other support by a citizen of a foreign state or a stateless person rendered to a certain citizen or a group of citizens of the Republic of Lithuania, a state official, a certain enterprise, establishment, or organisation may be considered only support of the said citizen of a foreign state or stateless person for the said citizen or the group of citizens of the Republic of Lithuania, the said state official, the said enterprise, establishment, or organisation, but this support should not be considered merit to ... the Republic of Lithuania.

It also needs to be noted that ... in general, the fact whether a citizen of a foreign state or a stateless person is of merit to the State of Lithuania may not be evaluated by the mere amount of money or the amount of material and other support rendered by a citizen of a foreign state or a stateless person to a certain citizen or a group of citizens of the Republic of Lithuania, a state official, a certain enterprise, establishment, or organisation, or even to the State of Lithuania itself. It follows [neither] from the Constitution ... [nor] other laws that citizenship of the Republic of Lithuania may be acquired for financial, material, or any other support, i.e. that citizenship may be bought. In the context of the emergence of citizenship relationships, merit to the state may not be evaluated only on the basis of money transferred (donated) to a certain subject or other support. ... only such activity of a person should be considered merit to the Republic of Lithuania where he/she very significantly contributes to strengthening Lithuania’s statehood or to increasing the power of Lithuania and its authority in the international community and where it is evident that such a person has already been integrated into Lithuanian society. Only in such cases, the preconditions may arise for considering and deciding on whether a citizen of a foreign state or a stateless person is of merit to the Republic of Lithuania, as required by [the law].

The Constitutional Court notes that laws or other legal acts may not establish a final list of merit in recognition of which a citizen of a foreign state or a stateless person can be granted citizenship of the Republic of Lithuania by way of exception: as mentioned before, only the President of the Republic decides whether a citizen of a foreign state or a stateless person is of merit to the State of Lithuania. However, when deciding this, the President of the Republic may not disregard the requirement established in [the law] that a citizen of a foreign state or a stateless person must be of merit not to any entity, but to the State of Lithuania itself. The merit of a person who requests citizenship of the Republic of Lithuania granted by way of exception must be such and reasoned in such a manner that it would not cause any doubts as to the presence of such merit.

One of the conditions for granting citizenship of the Republic of Lithuania is requirement for permanent residence in Lithuania for the last ten years. Although [the law] provides that, in the course of granting citizenship of the Republic of Lithuania by way of exception, the conditions provided for in [the law] are not applied (one of such conditions, as mentioned before, is the requirement that a person must reside in Lithuania for the last ten years), however, [this provision] cannot be interpreted as permitting granting, by way of exception, citizenship of the Republic of Lithuania to such a citizen of a foreign state or a stateless person who is of merit to the Republic of Lithuania but is not linked with the State of Lithuania by permanent factual links and is not integrated into Lithuanian society. A different interpretation ... would deny the nature and essence of citizenship of the Republic of Lithuania itself: the permanent legal link between a citizen of a foreign state or a stateless person and the State of Lithuania can arise only on the basis of the permanent factual link between a citizen of a foreign state or a stateless person and the State of Lithuania, where such a link has existed for the period established under the law and exists at a given moment. Citizens of foreign states or stateless persons who are of merit to the Republic of Lithuania, but who are not linked with the State of Lithuania by permanent factual links and are not integrated into Lithuanian society, may be conferred awards of the State of Lithuania (orders, medals, and other decorations). ... citizenship of the Republic of Lithuania is not and may not be a state award. Therefore, if a citizen of a foreign state or a stateless person with merit to the Republic of Lithuania is not linked with the State of Lithuania by permanent factual links and is not integrated into Lithuanian society, there is no special – permanent and legal – link between such a person and the State of Lithuania, which is expressed by citizenship.

The legal regulation established in [the law] means that, before the President of the Republic issues a decree on granting citizenship, it is necessary to verify and ascertain in all cases, including cases where citizenship of the Republic of Lithuania is granted by way of exception to citizens of a foreign state or stateless persons with merit to the Republic of Lithuania, whether there are any circumstances ... due to which citizenship of the Republic of Lithuania may not be granted to persons. To state the fact that there are not any such circumstances is a duty arising out of [the law]; the said duty falls on the institutions preparing documents for granting citizenship. However, as mentioned before, although the said duty falls on the institutions preparing documents for granting citizenship, this does not mean that the President of the Republic does not have the duty to demand the confirmation from the institutions (their officials) preparing documents for granting citizenship that there are not any such circumstances due to which citizenship of the Republic of Lithuania may not be granted: the President of the Republic must ascertain this prior to the issuing of a decree on granting citizenship of the Republic of Lithuania, including that on granting citizenship to a citizen of a foreign state or a stateless person with merit to the Republic of Lithuania.

It also needs to be noted that, in the course of granting citizenship of the Republic of Lithuania by way of exception, it is not enough to assess whether a person is of merit to the Republic of Lithuania and whether there are any circumstances ... due to which citizenship of the Republic of Lithuania may not be granted to such a person. Granting citizenship means the statement that there is a permanent legal link between the respective person and the state and that such a person has become a member of the national community – the civil Nation. The state, as the organisation of all society, may not be indifferent about persons who become its citizens. Therefore, even in cases where a citizen of a foreign state or a stateless person is of merit to the Republic of Lithuania, is linked with the State of Lithuania by permanent factual links, and is integrated into Lithuanian society, in the course of deciding on whether to grant citizenship of the Republic of Lithuania to such a person by way of exception, it is necessary to assess all circumstances characterising such a person and to act in the interests of the Nation and the State of Lithuania.

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 13 November 2006

When interpreting the constitutional institution of citizenship of the Republic of Lithuania, the Constitutional Court has held that: citizenship is a permanent, uninterrupted legal link between a person and the state; citizenship arises when a person becomes a citizen and continues until the death of the person or until his/her loss of citizenship; the legal link of a citizen with the state persists no matter where he/she might be: whether in the state a citizen of which he/she is, or outside its borders, i.e. in another state; after a citizen has departed for another state, his/her legal link with the state a citizen of which he/she is persists; it is the permanent (uninterrupted) legal link between a citizen and the state that enables distinguishing this special legal link from the legal link that arises between the state and a foreigner or a stateless person who resides in it permanently or temporarily: when a foreigner or a stateless person leaves the state, his/her legal link with the state discontinues. When a citizen leaves for another state, his/her legal link with the state whose citizen he/she is persists (ruling of 30 December 2003).

Citizenship of the Republic of Lithuania expresses the legal membership of a person in the State of Lithuania and reflects the fact that a person legally belongs to the civil Nation – the national community. The link between citizens and the state is mutual: citizenship grants a person and guarantees him/her civil (political) rights and establishes his/her certain duties to the state; certain duties arise from citizenship relationships for the state to its citizens. Citizenship, as a particular legal link with the State of Lithuania, allows citizens to be guaranteed all rights and freedoms that are enjoyed only by citizens of the Republic of Lithuania, as well as enables citizens to have the protection of the state both in Lithuania and abroad.

The constitutional ground for establishing easier conditions for acquiring citizenship of the Republic of Lithuania with respect to Lithuanians residing abroad (Paragraph 4 of Article 32 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 13 November 2006

... the provision of Paragraph 4 of Article 32 of the Constitution, whereby everyone who is Lithuanian may settle in Lithuania, means that all Lithuanians who reside abroad, wherever their permanent residence, have the right to come back to Lithuania, their ethnical homeland, at any time. Under the Constitution, it is not allowed to establish any such a legal regulation that would cut off Lithuanians living abroad from the Lithuanian nation. Lithuanians who reside abroad may not be deprived of the possibility of participating in the life of the Lithuanian nation if they so request. Lithuanians residing abroad are an inseparable part of the Lithuanian nation.

This is the constitutional ground for establishing, by means of a law, such a legal regulation whereby Lithuanians residing abroad would have the right to become citizens of the Republic of Lithuania under different (easier) conditions compared with those established for other persons who seek citizenship of the Republic of Lithuania (inter alia, where the usual naturalisation conditions would not be applied to Lithuanians who reside abroad and seek citizenship of the Republic of Lithuania). This is also the constitutional ground for consolidating, in laws, the institution of retaining citizenship of the Republic of Lithuania, applicable to Lithuanians residing abroad who seek citizenship of the Republic of Lithuania, particularly, if they, their parents, grandparents, or great-grandparents were linked with Lithuania by citizenship relationships.

The relation between citizenship of the Republic of Lithuania and citizenship of the European Union

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 13 November 2006

After the Republic of Lithuania became a Member State of the European Union on 1 May 2004, citizens of the Republic of Lithuania became citizens of the European Union.

... citizenship of the European Union does not change the content of the national institution of citizenship of any Member State; thus, it does not change the content of the institution of citizenship of the Republic of Lithuania, either. With respect to citizenship of the Republic of Lithuania, citizenship of the European Union is complementary, additional, as only a person who holds citizenship of a Member State of the European Union, in this case, the Republic of Lithuania, may be a citizen of the European Union. The limitation on dual citizenship consolidated in the Constitution is not applicable to citizenship of the European Union, a Member State of which the Republic of Lithuania is.

... the continuity of the State of Lithuania gives rise to the continuity of citizenship of the Republic of Lithuania, which, inter alia, implies that, from the viewpoint of international law and Lithuanian constitutional law, the imposition of USSR citizenship upon the citizens of the Republic of Lithuania in 1940, as a consequence of the aggression of the USSR, was an act that was null and void; thus, this act was not a legal ground to lose citizenship of the Republic of Lithuania. Consequently, during the years of the Soviet occupation, the citizens of the Republic of Lithuania (persons who held citizenship of the Republic of Lithuania on 15 June 1940 and their descendants) were also not bound by the unlawfully imposed obligations related to USSR citizenship, inter alia, the general military obligation of the USSR, which was introduced in the occupied territory of the Republic of Lithuania.

As the Constitutional Court held in its ruling of 13 November 2006, “‘Citizenship of the USSR’ and ‘citizenship of the Lithuanian SSR’, which were imposed by force, were and are null and void”; “even though the citizens of the Republic of Lithuania temporarily used the passports of citizens of the USSR ... they could not be treated as citizens of the USSR, i.e. as citizens of the state that declared them as its citizens against their own will”.

It also needs to be noted that the imposition of citizenship of an occupying state upon the population of the occupied territory and the forced conscription of this population into the military service of the occupying state is forbidden under the universally recognised international legal norms. ...

... the compulsory “actual military service” established by the USSR legal acts and imposed upon the citizens of the Republic of Lithuania (persons who held citizenship of the Republic of Lithuania on 15 June 1940 and their descendants) subsequent to call-up is reasonably considered forced military service to a foreign state, and all citizens of the Republic of Lithuania (persons who held citizenship of the Republic of Lithuania on 15 June 1940 and their descendants) were forced to such service during the period of the occupation of the territory of the Republic of Lithuania (from 15 June 1940 until the restoration of the independence of the Republic of Lithuania on 11 March 1990) unlawfully. In this context, it needs to be noted that, according to the norms of international law ... compelling the residents of the occupied territory to serve in the armed forces of an occupying (hostile) state is considered a war crime.

There is no ground to assess the forced military service of the citizens of the Republic of Lithuania in the USSR armed forces when such service was performed after the restoration of the independence of the Republic of Lithuania on 11 March 1990 in a different manner. ...

In this context, it needs to be noted that, as mentioned before, during the years of the Soviet occupation, the citizens of the Republic of Lithuania (persons who held citizenship of the Republic of Lithuania on 15 June 1940 and their descendants) were also not bound by the unlawfully imposed obligations related to USSR citizenship, inter alia, the general military obligation of the USSR, which was introduced in the occupied territory of the Republic of Lithuania. Thus, forcing the citizens of the Republic of Lithuania to serve to a foreign state after the restoration of the independence of the Republic of Lithuania on 11 March 1990 all the more so could not be lawful. It also needs to be noted that, as mentioned before, from the provision of the Act of the Supreme Council of the Republic of Lithuania on the Re-establishment of the Independent State of Lithuania of 11 March 1990 that the constitution of no other state is valid on the territory of the Republic of Lithuania, it is obvious that the introduction of the validity of the constitution of any other state (inter alia, the USSR), inter alia, the imposition of the duties established by such a constitution on the citizens of the Republic of Lithuania, was unlawful.

Dual citizenship (Paragraph 2 of Article 12 of the Constitution)The Constitutional Court's decision of 13 March 2013

Paragraph 2 of Article 12 of the Constitution prescribes: “With the exception of individual cases provided for by law, no one may be a citizen of both the Republic of Lithuania and another state at the same time.”

This provision of the Constitution consolidates the general prohibition on holding both citizenship of the Republic of Lithuania and citizenship of another state simultaneously: “no one may be a citizen of both the Republic of Lithuania and another state at the same time”. However, as the Constitutional Court noted in its ruling of 13 November 2006, this prohibition of dual citizenship consolidated in the Constitution is not absolute: under Paragraph 2 of Article 12 of the Constitution, the law may and must provide for individual cases when a person may be a citizen of both the Republic of Lithuania and another state at the same time.

It needs to be noted that the phrase “with the exception of individual cases provided for by law” means that the law regulating citizenship relationships may establish only exceptional cases when a person may be a citizen of both the Republic of Lithuania and another state at the same time, i.e. the legal regulation must be such that the cases of dual (multiple) citizenship would be an exception to the prohibition of such citizenship, expressed by the formula “no one may”, but not a rule denying this prohibition.

Thus ... under the Constitution, the legislature cannot follow the provision that it is not necessary to limit cases of dual (multiple) citizenship.

... such a legal regulation under which citizens of the Republic of Lithuania who departed from the Republic of Lithuania to reside in other states after the restoration of the independence of the Republic of Lithuania on 11 March 1990 and acquired citizenship of those states could be citizens of the Republic of Lithuania and of another state at the same time would ... create the preconditions for dual (multiple) citizenship to be not an individual and extraordinarily rare exception, but rather a widespread phenomenon; thus, the said legal regulation would be incompatible with Paragraph 2 of Article 12 of the Constitution.

In its ruling of 13 November 2006, the Constitutional Court emphasised that, if the legislature really followed the provision that the limitation on dual citizenship is unnecessary, it would, first of all, start the revision of the relevant provisions of the Constitution, inter alia, Article 12 thereof, and would do that by following the procedure that is established in the Constitution itself. In this context, the Constitutional Court noted that Article 12 of the Constitution, which consolidates the basis for the legal regulation of citizenship relationships in the Republic of Lithuania, is contained in Chapter I “The State of Lithuania” of the Constitution – an integral act; particularly considerable constitutional protection is established for the provisions of the said chapter: under Paragraph 2 of Article 148 of the Constitution, the provisions of Chapter I of the Constitution may be altered only by referendum.

Thus, without making any amendments to the Constitution, inter alia, without having altered Paragraph 2 of Article 12 of the Constitution by referendum, it is not allowed to establish, by means of a law, any such a legal regulation ... whereby the citizens of the Republic of Lithuania who departed from the Republic of Lithuania to reside in other states after the restoration of the independence of the Republic of Lithuania on 11 March 1990 and acquired citizenship of those states could be citizens of the Republic of Lithuania and of another state at the same time.

Acquiring citizenship through naturalisation (according to the general procedure) (Article 12 and Item 21 of Article 84 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court’s decision of 13 March 2013

The discretion of the legislature (which stems from Article 12 of the Constitution) to establish the grounds for acquiring citizenship of the Republic of Lithuania and to regulate the procedure of the acquisition and loss of citizenship is bound, inter alia, by Item 21 of Article 84 of the Constitution, under which the President of the Republic grants citizenship of the Republic of Lithuania according to the procedure established by law. The provision of Item 21 of Article 84 of the Constitution means that no other subject may grant citizenship of the Republic of Lithuania, that the President of the Republic, when he/she decides an issue of granting citizenship of the Republic of Lithuania, must follow the requirements established by law, and that the President of the Republic is prohibited from granting citizenship of the Republic of Lithuania if he/she does not follow the requirements established by law, as well as the established procedure (ruling of 30 December 2003).

It needs to be noted that the provision of Item 21 of Article 84 of the Constitution implies the duty of the legislature to establish the general ground – naturalisation – for granting citizenship to citizens of foreign states and stateless persons. In its rulings of 30 December 2003 and 13 November 2006, the Constitutional Court noted that it is also possible to acquire citizenship by way of naturalisation, i.e. citizenship is granted to a person who meets the conditions established under the law; as a rule, such conditions are the requirements for permanent residence in the state for a certain time period established under the law and the knowledge of the state language; these requirements are based on the provision that a person wishing to acquire citizenship and the state must be linked by a permanent factual link before citizenship is granted, that permanent residence in the state during a certain time period established under the law and the knowledge of the state language are necessary preconditions for a foreigner or a stateless person to integrate himself/herself into society, to perceive the mentality of the Nation and its strivings, the constitutional order of the state, to become acquainted with the history, culture, customs, and traditions of the Nation and the state, and to be prepared to take responsibility for the present and future of the state. Thus, under the Constitution, the necessary conditions for granting citizenship of the Republic of Lithuania by way of naturalisation are a permanent factual link of a person with the State of Lithuania and integration into Lithuanian society, the necessary preconditions whereof are permanent residence in the state during a certain time period established under the law, the knowledge of the state language, as well as other significant circumstances provided for under the law, which indicate, inter alia, that a person perceives the strivings of the Nation and the constitutional order of the state, is acquainted with the history and culture of the Nation, and is prepared, as a member of society, to participate when the affairs of the Nation and the state are decided.

It also needs to be noted that, when regulating the acquisition of citizenship by way of naturalisation, it is necessary to pay regard to the general prohibition on holding citizenship of both the Republic of Lithuania and another state simultaneously, which is consolidated in Paragraph 2 of Article 12 of the Constitution, i.e. granting citizenship to citizens of foreign state under the general procedure must be linked to the loss or renunciation of citizenship of another state; the loss, renunciation, or non-holding of citizenship of another state must be one of the essential conditions necessary for granting citizenship of the Republic of Lithuania by way of naturalisation.

It also needs to be noted that, when account is taken of the fact that citizenship of the Republic of Lithuania expresses the legal membership of a person in the State of Lithuania and reflects the fact that he/she belongs to the national community – the civil Nation, the President of the Republic, when he/she decides whether to grant citizenship of the Republic of Lithuania to a person, must act in the interests of the Nation and the State of Lithuania (rulings of 30 December 2003 and 13 November 2006). Thus, the provision of Item 21 of Article 84 of the Constitution implies the right, but not the duty, of the President of the Republic to grant citizenship by way of naturalisation to citizens of foreign states or stateless persons who meet the conditions of naturalisation prescribed under the law; in cases where granting citizenship of the Republic of Lithuania is not in the interests of the Nation and the State of Lithuania, even such persons who meet the said conditions may not necessarily be granted citizenship of the Republic of Lithuania. Thus, when the President of the Republic decides whether to grant citizenship of the Republic of Lithuania by way of naturalisation, all circumstances describing a person who requests citizenship must be assessed, i.e. not exclusively the circumstances due to which, under the law, granting citizenship is prohibited. Thus, the President of the Republic has not only the duty to require, from the respective state institutions and officials, the confirmation that there are not any such circumstances due to which citizenship of the Republic of Lithuania may not be granted, but also the right to receive any information they have that describes a person that requests citizenship, which may be significant when assessing whether granting citizenship is in the interests of the Nation and the State of Lithuania.

Granting citizenship by way of exception in recognition of merit to the State of Lithuania

... such a way of the acquisition of citizenship of the Republic of Lithuania as granting citizenship by way of exception in recognition of merit to the State of Lithuania is not explicitly provided for in the Constitution; in the course of establishing the grounds for acquiring citizenship of the Republic of Lithuania and regulating the procedure for the acquisition and loss of citizenship, the legislature has discretion. The provision of Item 21 of Article 84 of the Constitution which, as mentioned before, implies the duty of the legislature to provide for the general procedure of granting citizenship – by way of naturalisation – to citizens of foreign states and stateless persons does not mean the requirement that the legislature must also establish a certain different procedure for granting citizenship. Thus, the establishment of the procedure for granting citizenship by way of exception in recognition of merit to the State of Lithuania is the discretion of the legislature; such a procedure for granting citizenship is a matter of a law that regulates citizenship relationships. When exercising this discretion, the legislature must pay regard to the Constitution ... the legislature may not deny the nature and meaning of the institution of citizenship; among other things, the legislature must pay regard to the constitutional requirement that a citizen of the Republic of Lithuania may also be a citizen of another state at the same time only in individual cases established by means of a law.

As the Constitutional Court noted in its ruling of 13 November 2006, granting citizenship of the Republic of Lithuania by way of exception is an exceptional, special, and extraordinary case. In this context, it needs to be noted that granting citizenship of the Republic of Lithuania to citizens of foreign states or stateless persons by way of exception implies exceptions to the general procedure of granting citizenship – by way of naturalisation – to citizens of foreign states and stateless persons. This may, first of all, be an exception to the general prohibition on holding both citizenship of the Republic of Lithuania and citizenship of another state simultaneously, which is consolidated in Paragraph 2 of Article 12 of the Constitution.

It has been mentioned that the legislature must pay regard to the constitutional requirement that a citizen of the Republic of Lithuania may also be a citizen of another state at the same time only in individual cases established by law; in its rulings of 30 December 2003 and 13 November 2006, the Constitutional Court emphasised that the provision of Article 12 of the Constitution, whereby, with the exception of individual cases provided for by law, no one may be a citizen of both the Republic of Lithuania and another state at the same time, means that such cases established by law can be very rare (individual), that cases of dual citizenship must be extraordinarily rare and exceptional, that, under the Constitution, it is not permitted to establish any such a legal regulation under which cases of dual citizenship would be not extraordinarily rare exceptions, but rather a widespread phenomenon.

Thus, such a legal regulation of granting citizenship to citizens of foreign states and stateless persons by way of exception, under which citizenship of the Republic of Lithuania would be granted under this procedure only on such an exceptional ground that would constitutionally justify the exception to the general prohibition on holding both citizenship of the Republic of Lithuania and citizenship of another state, would comply with the Constitution. As it is obvious from the Constitutional Court's ruling of 13 November 2006, such an exceptional ground for granting citizenship to a citizen of a foreign state or a stateless person by way of exception is only special merit to the State of Lithuania: in the same ruling, the Constitutional Court noted that the phrase "by way of exception" means that such merit of a citizen of a foreign state to Lithuania must be exceptional, special, and extraordinary ...

When revealing the concept (compatible with the Constitution) of merit to the State of Lithuania for which citizenship of the Republic of Lithuania may be granted to citizens of foreign states or stateless persons, in its rulings of 30 December 2003 and 13 November 2006, the Constitutional Court held that:

... only such activity of a person should be considered merit to the Republic of Lithuania where a person very significantly contributes to strengthening Lithuanian statehood and to increasing the power of Lithuania and its authority in the international community; only in such cases the preconditions may arise for considering and deciding on whether a citizen of a foreign state or a stateless person is of merit to the Republic of Lithuania; the merit of a citizen of a foreign state for Lithuania must be exceptional, special, and extraordinary;

– laws or other legal acts may not establish a final list of merit for which a citizen of a foreign state or a stateless person can be granted citizenship of the Republic of Lithuania by way of exception;

– only the President of the Republic decides on the merit to the State of Lithuania of a citizen of a foreign state or a stateless person; when deciding on this issue, the President of the Republic may not disregard the requirement, established in [the law], that a citizen of a foreign state or a stateless person must be of merit not to any entity, but to the State of Lithuania itself;

– the merit of a person who requests citizenship of the Republic of Lithuania by way of exception must be such and reasoned in such a manner that it would not cause any doubts as to the presence of such merit;

– when deciding whether a citizen of a foreign state or a stateless person is of merit to the Republic of Lithuania, it is necessary to assess only such very significant activity for the State of Lithuania itself that was performed when a person in question was a citizen of a foreign state or a stateless person.

In this context, it needs to be noted that, when revealing the content of the constitutional institution of state awards, the Constitutional Court interpreted the concept of merit to the State of Lithuania in a similar way in its rulings of 12 May 2006 and 7 September 2010. In the said rulings of the Constitutional Court, inter alia, the following was held: persons who performed exceptional deeds demanding extraordinary efforts or even self-sacrifice where the said deeds provided exceptional benefits to the State of Lithuania, its society, or certain spheres of life of this country, in recognition of their merit to the State of Lithuania, are honoured in the name of the state by means of state awards.

When summarising the concept of merit to the State of Lithuania for which citizenship of the Republic of Lithuania may be granted to citizens of foreign states or stateless persons by way of exception, it needs to be noted that:

– this must be special and undoubted merit to the State of Lithuania itself;

– the activity of a person must be regarded as special merit to the Republic of Lithuania when such a person very significantly contributes to strengthening Lithuanian statehood and to increasing the power of Lithuania and its authority in the international community, i.e. exceptional deeds demanding extraordinary efforts or even self-sacrifice where the said deeds provided exceptional benefits to the State of Lithuania, its society, or certain spheres of the life of this country;

– such merit to the State of Lithuania is a particularly significant activity that was performed by a person who requests citizenship of the Republic of Lithuania by way of exception when this person was a citizen of a foreign state or a stateless person, i.e. any likely future activity of a person, even though significant to the State of Lithuania, after citizenship of the Republic of Lithuania is granted, may not be considered such merit;

– when considering the request to grant citizenship of the Republic of Lithuania by way of exception and assessing all significant circumstances, the President of the Republic decides in each case whether a certain person is of special and undoubted merit to the State of Lithuania.

... in addition to the aforementioned exception to the general prohibition on holding both citizenship of the Republic of Lithuania and citizenship of another state, while regulating granting citizenship to citizens of foreign states or stateless persons by way of exception, it is possible to establish exceptions to other conditions of naturalisation – different criteria applicable when establishing a permanent factual link with the State of Lithuania and integration into Lithuanian society.

However, as mentioned before, the legislature may not deny the nature and meaning of the institution of citizenship, inter alia, the fact that citizenship is a permanent, uninterrupted legal link between a person and the state, that citizenship of the Republic of Lithuania expresses the legal membership of a person in the State of Lithuania, and reflects the fact that a person legally belongs to the civil Nation – the national community. In its ruling of 13 November 2006, the Constitutional Court emphasised the constitutional imperative that a citizen of a foreign state to whom citizenship of the Republic of Lithuania is granted in recognition of his/her merit to Lithuania and who becomes a member of the Lithuanian national community – civil society must be linked with the State of Lithuania by permanent factual links and must be integrated into Lithuanian society. A different interpretation would deny the nature and essence of citizenship of the Republic of Lithuania itself: the legal link between a citizen of a foreign state or a stateless person and the State of Lithuania can arise only on the basis of the permanent factual link between a citizen of a foreign state or stateless person and the State of Lithuania, where such a link existed for the period established under the law and exists at a given moment (ruling of 30 December 2003). In its ruling of 30 December 2003, the Constitutional Court noted that citizens of foreign states or stateless persons who are of merit to the Republic of Lithuania but are not linked with the State of Lithuania by permanent factual links and are not integrated into Lithuanian society may be conferred awards of the State of Lithuania (orders, medals, and other decorations); if a citizen of a foreign state or a stateless person with merit to the Republic of Lithuania is not linked with the State of Lithuania by permanent factual links and is not integrated into Lithuanian society, there is no special – permanent and legal – link between such a person and the State of Lithuania, which is expressed by citizenship.

In the Constitutional Court's ruling of 13 November 2006, it was held that the preconditions for violation of Paragraph 2 of Article 12 of the Constitution may arise not only when such a legal regulation is established whereby dual citizenship becomes not an especially rare exception, but rather a widespread phenomenon, but also when citizenship of the Republic of Lithuania is granted (also by way of exception) to persons who hold citizenship of another state, are not linked by a permanent factual link with the State of Lithuania, and are not integrated into Lithuanian society; in both cases, citizenship of the Republic of Lithuania may be devaluated.

While summarising the conditions of granting citizenship by way of exception in recognition of merit to the State of Lithuania linked to the establishment of a permanent factual link with the State of Lithuania and integration into Lithuanian society of a person who requests citizenship, it needs to be noted that:

- when regulating the granting of citizenship by way of exception in recognition of merit to the State of Lithuania, the legislature must pay regard to the constitutional imperative that a person who is granted citizenship of the Republic of Lithuania in recognition of merit to the State of Lithuania must be linked with the State of Lithuania by permanent factual links and must be integrated into Lithuanian society; however, a law may establish requirements (related to the permanent factual link of a person who requests citizenship with the State of Lithuania and his/her integration into Lithuanian society) that are not identical to the respective conditions of naturalisation;

- a law may establish requirements different from those of naturalisation, where such requirements are related, inter alia, to the permanent residence of a person in the state and the knowledge of the state language, as well as criteria different from those of permanent residence in the state, confirming the permanent factual link of a person with the State of Lithuania that has formed during a certain time and is still continuing, as well as his/her integration into Lithuanian society, inter alia, the fact that the activity of a person shows that he/she perceives the strivings of the Nation, the constitutional order of the state, is acquainted with the history and culture of the Nation and the state, and is prepared, as a member of society, to participate when the affairs of the Nation and the state are decided;

- a law may also establish such a procedure for establishing a permanent factual link of a person with the State of Lithuania and integration into Lithuanian society that would be different from that of naturalisation; when considering the request to grant citizenship of the Republic of Lithuania by way of exception and assessing all significant circumstances, the President of the Republic decides in each case whether a certain person is linked with the State of Lithuania by a permanent factual link and is integrated into Lithuanian society.

... the provision of Item 21 of Article 84 of the Constitution, as in the case of naturalisation, implies the right, but not the duty, of the President of the Republic to grant citizenship to citizens of foreign states or stateless persons by way of exception prescribed by the law. As the Constitutional Court noted in its ruling of 30 December 2003, the President of the Republic has the right, but not the duty, to grant citizenship by way of exception to citizens of foreign states or stateless persons who are of special merit to the Republic of Lithuania; however, even though a citizen of a foreign state or a stateless person is of merit to the Republic of Lithuania, citizenship of the Republic of Lithuania may not necessarily be granted to him/her by way of exception; this is decided by the President of the Republic at his/her discretion.

In this context, it needs to be noted that, in the Constitutional Court's ruling of 13 November 2006, it was held that, even in those cases where a citizen of a foreign state or a stateless person is of merit to the Republic of Lithuania, is linked with the State of Lithuania by permanent factual links, and is integrated into Lithuanian society, when deciding whether to grant citizenship of the Republic of Lithuania to such a person by way of exception, it is necessary to assess all circumstances characterising such a person and to act in the interests of the Nation and the State of Lithuania. Thus, as in the case of naturalisation, citizenship of the Republic of Lithuania may not necessarily be granted even to persons who meet the conditions of granting citizenship by way of exception in recognition of their merit to the State of Lithuania prescribed under the law, if granting citizenship does not serve the interests of the Nation and the State of Lithuania. Thus, when the President of the Republic decides whether to grant citizenship of the Republic of Lithuania by way of exception in recognition of merit to the State of Lithuania, all circumstances describing a person who requests citizenship must be assessed, i.e. not exclusively the circumstances due to which, under the law, granting citizenship is prohibited. The President of the Republic has not only the duty to require, from the respective state institutions and officials, the confirmation that there are not any such circumstances due to which citizenship of the Republic of Lithuania may not be granted, but also the right to receive any information they have that describes a person that requests citizenship, which may be significant when assessing whether granting citizenship is in the interests of the Nation and the State of Lithuania.

It also needs to be noted that, as the Constitutional Court held in its ruling of 30 December 2003, the circumstance that only the President of the Republic has the right to decide whether a citizen of a foreign state or a stateless person can be granted citizenship of the Republic of Lithuania by way of exception may not be interpreted as meaning that the President of the Republic, when deciding whether to grant citizenship of the Republic of Lithuania to a citizen of a foreign state or stateless person who is of merit to the Republic of Lithuania, may disregard the requirements established in the Constitution and [the law]. Thus, the discretion of the President of the Republic to decide regarding granting citizenship by way of exception in recognition of merit to the State of Lithuania is bound by the requirements that stem from the Constitution and are established under the law, inter alia, by the constitutional imperatives that a person must have special and undoubted merit to the State of Lithuania itself and that a person who has such merit must be linked with the State of Lithuania by permanent factual links and must be integrated into Lithuanian society.

In its ruling of 22 February 2013, the Constitutional Court also noted that the continuity of the State of Lithuania gives rise to the continuity of citizenship of the Republic of Lithuania, which, inter alia, implies that, from the viewpoint of international law and Lithuanian constitutional law, the imposition of USSR citizenship upon the citizens of the Republic of Lithuania in 1940, as a consequence of the aggression of the USSR, was an act that was null and void; thus, this act was not a legal ground to lose citizenship of the Republic of Lithuania; consequently, during the years of the Soviet occupation, the citizens of the Republic of Lithuania (persons who held citizenship of the Republic of Lithuania on 15 June 1940 and their descendants) were also not bound by the unlawfully imposed obligations related to USSR citizenship. In addition, the Constitutional Court recalled that the imposition of citizenship of an occupying state upon the population of the occupied territory and the forced conscription of this population into the military service of the occupying state is forbidden under the universally recognised international legal norms ...

Thus, in this context, it should also be noted that, according to the universally recognised international legal norms, the citizens of the Republic of Lithuania had an inalienable right to resist the aggression of another state, inter alia, the Soviet occupation; the organised armed fight of the citizens of the Republic of Lithuania in 1944–1953 against the Soviet occupation should be assessed as the self-defence of the State of Lithuania.

Consequently, in view of the fact that the aggression of the USSR was carried out against the Republic of Lithuania, also in view of the continuity of the State of Lithuania and the continuity of citizenship of the Republic of Lithuania, the organised armed partisan forces should be regarded as the armed forces of the Republic of Lithuania that resisted the occupation, i.e. as volunteer forces of a party to an international armed conflict, whose members have the status of a combatant. ...

In this context, it should also be noted that, in its ruling of 22 February 2013, the Constitutional Court held that service to the State of Lithuania was possible only in the structures (inter alia, in the Lithuanian Freedom Fight Movement) of the organised armed resistance against the occupation, which took place for a certain time in the occupied territory of the Republic of Lithuania.

The principle of the continuity of citizenship of the Republic of Lithuania

The Constitutional Court's decision of 5 September 2019

In its rulings of 22 February 2013 and 18 March 2014, the Constitutional Court emphasised that it is obvious from the provisions “the execution of the sovereign powers of the State of Lithuania abolished by foreign forces in 1940 is re-established, and henceforth Lithuania is again an independent state” of the Act of 11 March 1990 that the restoration of the Independence of the Republic of Lithuania was based on the continuity of the State of Lithuania (which means that the aggression started by the USSR against the Republic of Lithuania on 15 June 1940 (inter alia, the occupation and annexation of the territory of the Republic of Lithuania) did not end the existence of the State of Lithuania as a subject of international law or its sovereign powers) and that the continuity of the State of Lithuania gives rise to the continuity of citizenship of the Republic of Lithuania, which, inter alia, implies that, from the viewpoint of international law and Lithuanian constitutional law, imposing citizenship of the USSR on the citizens of the Republic of Lithuania in 1940, as a consequence of the aggression of the USSR, was an act that was null and void; thus, this act was not a legal ground to lose citizenship of the Republic of Lithuania; thus, during the years of the Soviet occupation, the citizens of the Republic of Lithuania (persons who held citizenship of the Republic of Lithuania on 15 June 1940 and their descendants) were also not bound by the unlawfully imposed obligations related to citizenship of the USSR.

Therefore, in these rulings, the Constitutional Court emphasised, among others, the importance of the fact of holding citizenship of the Republic of Lithuania on 15 June 1940 in applying the principle of the continuity of citizenship of the Republic of Lithuania.

3. LEGAL RESPONSIBILITY

On the constitutional responsibility, see 4. The state and its institutions, 4.4. The responsibility of the authorities to society. The constitutional responsibility of the highest-ranking state officials.

3.1. GENERAL PROVISIONS

A criminal conduct simulation model

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 8 May 2000

... the obligation of the state and its institutions is prevention of crime. A criminal conduct simulation model may only serve as one of the measures in the detection of a crime prepared by a person or in the detection of a crime at an early stage of its commission. State institutions may not establish any such a legal regulation that would permit state special services to incite or provoke a person to commit a crime so that after it there would emerge the grounds for prosecuting the said person.

It needs to be noted that by means of the model it is only permitted to “join” to long-lasting or continuing crimes, or to crimes that are in progress, but are not finished. Such criminal acts continue without the efforts of undercover agents taking part in operational activities. The undercover agents only imitate the actions of the preparation of a crime or those of a crime that is in progress. It is not permitted, by means of the model, to incite or provoke the commission of a new crime or to incite the commission of a criminal act that was only prepared by an individual, but later the said individual stopped such an act. ... The disregard of the limits of the application of the model established in [the law], provoking the commission of a crime or any other abuse by means of the model makes the use of the model unlawful. The investigation and assessment of such circumstances are a matter of judicial consideration.

Performing the actions exhibiting elements of a crime, undercover agents may not use physical or psychological coercion against persons suspected of having committed a crime, may not put them under any active pressure, or incite or provoke them to commit a crime. ...

The model is carried out in a covert manner, i.e. a person to whom it is applied is unaware of it, as, otherwise, it would become ineffective. Persons to whom lawful actions that exhibit elements of crime are applied acquire the real possibility of filing a complaint against, in their opinion, the unreasonable and unlawful actions of undercover agents only after they become aware of the model applied against them; however, this is justifiable. ...

... no forms of operational activities, including a criminal conduct simulation model, may be applied against the President of the Republic.

[...]

The immunity of a member of the Seimas is narrower than that of the President of the Republic: if there is the consent of the Seimas, a member of the Seimas may be held criminally liable. Therefore, the provisions of the Constitution do not prohibit such a legal regulation by which the application of the model and other forms of operational activities against a member of the Seimas, as well as against other persons, are permissible.

Ignorance of the law exempts no one from responsibility (Paragraph 3 of Article 7 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 8 May 2000

Under Paragraph 3 of Article 7 of the Constitution, ignorance of the law exempts no one from responsibility. The laws of the Republic of Lithuania prohibiting certain acts and providing for responsibility in cases of their commission are accessible and known to the public. All laws and legal acts are officially published in the official gazette Valstybės žinios. Therefore, it is presumed that every individual, when violating prohibitions established in laws, is aware of the fact that this will lead to the particular reaction of state law enforcement institutions and comprehends that for a committed crime the state will apply strict measures against him/her, and that such measures will correct, hinder, or stop his/her unlawful conduct.

The prohibition on compelling persons to give evidence against themselves, or their family members, or close relatives (Paragraph 3 of Article 31 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 19 September 2000

... Article 31 of the Constitution contains the provision that persons must not be compelled to give evidence against themselves, or their family members or close relatives. In penal laws, there are norms permitting a witness to refuse to testify on such a basis. However, in cases where such persons, being aware that they have the right to refuse to testify, agree to give evidence as witnesses but, later, intentionally commit perjury, they may be held criminally liable.

The proportionality of responsibility for violations of law

Establishing administrative responsibility for violations of law, the legislature must observe the principles consolidated in the Constitution. The entire legal system must be based on the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law; the said principle also implies the proportionality of established legal responsibility.

The Constitutional Court has held that the measures established by the state for violations of law must be proportionate to a violation of law, must be in line with the legitimate and generally important objectives sought, and must not restrain a person clearly more than necessary in order to achieve these objectives. The constitutional principles of justice and a state under the rule of law also mean that “there must be a fair balance (proportion) between the objective sought and the means to attain this objective, as well as between the violations of law and the penalties established for these violations. These principles preclude imposing such penalties for violations of law and such sizes of fines that would evidently be disproportionate to the violation of law and the objective sought” (ruling of 6 December 2000).

Thus, in the course of the legislative establishment of responsibility and its implementation, a fair balance must be sustained between the interests of society and those of a person so as to avoid unreasonable limitations on the rights of persons. On the basis of this principle, the rights of persons may be limited, by means of a law, to the extent only necessary for the protection of public interests, and there must be a reasonable relation between the adopted measures and the legitimate and generally important objective sought. In order to achieve this objective, such measures may be established that would be sufficient and would not limit the rights of persons more than necessary.

The established punishments must provide courts with the possibility of administering justice (Article 109 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 10 June 2003

According to Article 109 of the Constitution, in the Republic of Lithuania, justice is administered only by courts (Paragraph 1); when administering justice, judges and courts are independent (Paragraph 2); when considering cases, judges obey only the law (Paragraph 3). Therefore, punishments established in a penal law and their system must be such that a court would be able to administer justice when imposing punishments.

Under the Constitution, it is not allowed to establish in a penal law such a legal regulation (punishments or their sizes) on the basis of which a court, taking account of all circumstances of a case and applying a penal law, would not be able to individualise the punishment that is imposed on a concrete person for a concrete criminal act.

The legislature, having the constitutional powers to establish punishments for criminal acts and sizes of these punishments, has the duty to provide maximum limits of punishments for certain criminal acts. If the maximum limit of the punishment for a particular criminal act were not established in a penal law, the preconditions for imposing unreasonably strict punishments and, thus, for violating human rights and freedoms would be created. According to the Constitution, the legislature may also establish minimum limits of punishments for certain criminal acts.

By specifying certain acts as crimes and establishing minimum and maximum limits of punishments for such acts, the legislature may use various ways of consolidating the sizes of the said punishments, and may indicate the minimum or maximum limit of a punishment in the sanction of the norm of a penal law that establishes responsibility for a certain criminal act.

Having chosen such a way of formulating a sanction for the commission of a criminal act where the article itself, establishing responsibility for the specified criminal act, provides for such a minimum punishment of imprisonment that is strict, the legislature must, at the same time, by means of a law, establish such a legal regulation according to which a court, by imposing a punishment for this criminal act, must have the possibility of taking account of all circumstances of the case that mitigate criminal responsibility, as well as of circumstances that are not expressis verbis specified in the law, and to impose a punishment that is milder than that provided for under the law.

It should be noted that the constitutional right to a fair trial means, inter alia, not only that the principles and norms of criminal procedure law must be observed in court proceedings, but also that the punishment established in a penal law and imposed by a court must be just; a penal law must provide for all opportunities for a court to impose, in consideration of all circumstances of the case, a just punishment on the person who committed a criminal act. The imposition of an unjust punishment would imply that the right of a person to a fair trial is violated; consequently, this would imply that Paragraph 2 of Article 31 of the Constitution and the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law are also violated.

Imposing a milder punishment

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 10 June 2003

According to the Constitution, the legislature, specifying certain acts as crimes in a penal law and establishing punishments for them and the minimum limit of these punishments, is also empowered to establish the grounds under which a punishment that is milder than that provided for by law may be imposed.

... having chosen such a way of formulating a sanction for the commission of a criminal act where the article itself, establishing responsibility for the specified criminal act, provides for such a minimum punishment of imprisonment that is strict, the legislature must, at the same time, by means of a law, establish such a legal regulation according to which a court, by imposing a punishment for this criminal act, must have the possibility of taking account of all circumstances of the case that mitigate criminal responsibility, as well as of circumstances that are not expressis verbis specified in the law, and to impose a punishment that is milder than that provided for under the law.

... the Constitution consolidates human rights and freedoms, other constitutional values that must be protected and defended ... one of the means for protecting human rights and freedoms and other constitutional values is criminal responsibility for criminal acts. Therefore, the imposition of a punishment that is milder than that provided for under the law is not a rule, but an exception: a court may impose a punishment that is milder than that provided for under the law only if there exist special circumstances mitigating responsibility, where a punishment imposed without taking account of those circumstances would obviously be unjust. A court has the duty to apply the institution of a punishment that is milder than that provided for under the law especially attentively and carefully, so that the interests of a victim, society, and those of the state would not be violated. In each particular case, the decision of a court to impose a punishment that is milder than that provided for under the law must be reasoned. If a punishment that is milder than that provided for under the law is imposed groundlessly and unreasonably, justice would not be administered. This would be in conflict with justice and the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law.

The presumption of innocence (Paragraph 1 of Article 31 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 29 December 2004

Paragraph 1 of Article 31 of the Constitution prescribes: "A person shall be presumed innocent until proved guilty according to the procedure established by law and declared guilty by an effective court judgment."

The presumption of innocence consolidated in Paragraph 1 of Article 31 of the Constitution is one of the most important guarantees of the administration of justice in a democratic state. It is a fundamental principle of administering justice in the process of criminal cases and an important guarantee of human rights and freedoms. It is presumed that a person has not committed a crime until his/her guilt is proved according to the procedure established by law and he/she is declared guilty by an effective court judgment. The presumption of innocence is inseparably linked with respect for and the protection of other constitutional human rights and freedoms, as well as acquired rights. It is especially important that state institutions and officials respect the presumption of innocence. It should be noted that public persons should in general restrain from referring to a person as a criminal until the said person is proved guilty of committing a crime according to the procedure established by law and declared guilty by an effective court judgment. Otherwise, human honour and dignity could become violated and human rights and freedoms could be undermined.

The presumption of innocence consolidated in Paragraph 1 of Article 31 of the Constitution may not be interpreted only linguistically and as one that is linked only with the administration of justice in the process of criminal cases. The presumption of innocence, which is consolidated in Paragraph 1 of Article 31 of the Constitution, when evaluated in the context of other provisions of the Constitution, has a broader content and must not be linked only with criminal legal relationships.

Crimes; the obligation of the state to ensure effective protection against criminal attempts

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 29 December 2004

Crimes are violations of law by which human rights and freedoms, as well as other values protected and defended by the Constitution, are grossly violated. The mission of the state as the political organisation of all society is to ensure human rights and freedoms and to guarantee the public interest; therefore, when fulfilling its functions and acting in the interests of all society, the state has the obligation to ensure the effective protection of human rights and freedoms, other values protected and defended by the Constitution, every individual and all society against, inter alia, criminal attempts.

The Constitution takes a negative attitude to crimes as social evil; this attitude is reflected in various articles of the Constitution, inter alia, the ones in which the notions "crime", "criminal actions", "criminal" are used directly. For example, according to Paragraph 2 of Article 24 of the Constitution, without the consent of the resident, it is not be permitted to enter his/her home otherwise than, inter alia, according to the procedure established by law when this is necessary to apprehend a criminal; according to Paragraph 4 of Article 25 of the Constitution, the freedom to express convictions and to impart information is incompatible with criminal actions – incitement to national, racial, religious, or social hatred, incitement to violence or to discrimination, as well as defamation and disinformation; according to Article 27 of the Constitution, convictions, practised religion, or belief may not serve as a justification, inter alia, for a crime; according to Article 31 of the Constitution, a person is presumed innocent until proved guilty according to the procedure established by law and declared guilty by an effective court judgment (Paragraph 1); a person charged with committing a crime has the right to a public and fair hearing of his/her case by an independent and impartial court (Paragraph 2); punishment may be imposed or applied only on the grounds established by law (Paragraph 4); no one may be punished twice for the same offence (Paragraph 5); a person suspected of committing a crime, as well as the accused, is guaranteed, from the moment of his/her apprehension or first interrogation, the right to defence, as well as the right to an advocate (Paragraph 6); one of the grounds for removing from office the highest-ranking state officials specified in Article 74 of the Constitution (or revoking the mandate of a member of the Seimas) is “found to have committed a crime”.

To ensure the safety of each human being and all society from crimes is a duty of the state and one of its priority tasks, since crimes violate not only human rights and freedoms, as well as other values protected and defended by the Constitution, but also make a negative impact on the living conditions and subsistence level of people; in addition, crimes have a detrimental effect on the foundations of the life of the state and society. If the state fails to take proper actions in order to prevent crimes, the trust in state authority and laws would be destroyed and disrespect for legal order and various social institutions would increase. Therefore, according to the Constitution, the state as the organisation of all society, which must guarantee the public interest, has not only the right, but also the duty to take various lawful measures preventing crimes, as well as restricting and reducing crime. Measures established and applied by the state must be effective.

In a democratic state under the rule of law, the legislature has the right and, at the same time, the duty to prohibit, by means of laws, such acts by which essential harm is inflicted on the interests of persons, society, or those of the state, or if a threat occurs where, due to such acts, the said damage will be inflicted. According to the Constitution, it is allowed to define what acts are criminal and to establish criminal responsibility for such acts only by means of a law. It should be noted that a law may recognise as criminal acts only such acts that are truly dangerous and by which harm is really inflicted on the interests of persons, society, or the state, or if a threat occurs where, due to such acts, the said damage will be inflicted.

Repressive and preventive measures for restricting and reducing crime

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 29 December 2004

The legislature, having considered the threat caused by crimes, the scope of crimes, their occurrence, dynamics, structure, as well as various criminogenic factors, has the duty to establish measures the purpose of which is to protect a person, society, and the state from criminal attempts. Under the Constitution, the legislature has the right to choose various measures of restricting and reducing crime, as well as to establish the conditions and procedure of the application thereof. In doing so, the legislature must pay regard to the Constitution.

Both legal and other than legal (organisational, economic, etc.) measures should be applied when seeking to restrict and to reduce crime. ... the legal measures of restricting and reducing crime differ also in whether they are aimed at reacting to the already committed crime and deterring persons who have already committed crimes and other persons from new criminal attempts (repressive measures), or at preventing crimes, where the risk of committing them is greater in cases where no such measures are taken (preventive measures).

The repressive measures of restricting and reducing crime comprise, inter alia, the fact that laws define which acts are criminal and establish punishments for committing such acts. These measures are aimed not only at establishing the legal grounds for punishing persons guilty of committing a crime, but also, by threatening with punishments and establishing the legal grounds for punishing persons who commit crimes, at protecting every person, all society, and the state from criminal attempts. According to the Constitution, the state prosecutes persons who commit crimes, their guilt is proved according to the procedure established by law, and the punishments, established by law, for committed crimes are imposed on them.

When restricting and reducing crime, it is necessary to apply not only repressive, but also preventive measures. In its 9 December 1998 ruling, the Constitutional Court stressed the importance of the system of various effectively applied preventive measures in preventing crimes. It has been mentioned that preventive measures are aimed at preventing such crimes where the risk of committing them is greater if no such measures are taken.

It should be noted that, although the final objective of the repressive and preventive measures of restricting and reducing crime is the same – they are aimed at eliminating crime, they still have objective differences: they differ in the grounds of their application, direct aim, content, as well as in the legal consequences of their application. Repressive measures are a reaction to an already committed crime and seek to deter persons who have already committed crimes and other individuals from new criminal attempts, while preventive measures are aimed at preventing such crimes where the risk of committing them is greater if no such measures are taken. ... a punishment may be imposed on a person who has committed a crime, whereas preventive measures do not constitute a punishment – their purpose is to prevent a person from committing a crime and, thus, also to protect the public interest. Moreover, in such a way, a person who, according to the data received in a legal manner, would tend to commit a crime unless deterred by preventive measures is ultimately also protected. In addition, it should be noted that preventive measures, which are aimed at restricting and reducing crime, are normally linked with a particular limitation on the implementation of human rights and freedoms; it should be stressed that the said limitation must not deny the essence of these rights and freedoms.

The aforementioned objective differences between repressive and preventive measures also determine the particularities of their legal regulation.

Special danger posed by organised criminal groups (syndicates); the duty of the state to create an effective system of restricting and reducing organised crime

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 29 December 2004

... organised criminal groups (syndicates), crimes committed by them, or the fact that they are going to commit such crimes pose a special threat to a person, his/her rights and freedoms, society, and the state.

It is worth stressing that the majority of especially dangerous crimes, for example, terrorism, trafficking in people, criminal trade in weapons and drugs, money laundering, as well as financial crimes and crimes related to corruption, are often committed namely by organised criminal groups (syndicates). If organised crime were not prevented and organised criminal groups (syndicates) were not prosecuted, a threat would be posed to the constitutional values, inter alia, the rights and freedoms of a person, the legal bases of the life of society, which are consolidated in the Constitution, the state as the organisation of all society, as well as to all society.

... Lithuania as a democratic state under the rule of law ... has the duty to establish and apply both repressive and preventive measures adequate to the threat posed by organised crime. When assessing these measures, it should be noted that, in general, the interpretation that the constitutional recognition of the innate nature of human rights and freedoms, the broad catalogue of innate human rights and freedoms, which is consolidated in the Constitution, and other constitutional institutions do not permit the establishment and application of effective and, if needed, quite strict measures for restricting and reducing organised crime would be misleading. Quite to the contrary, the duty of the state as the organisation of all society to protect a person and the state from the threat caused by crimes obligates it to establish and to unhesitatingly apply effective measures for restricting and reducing crime, including organised crime.

In this context, it should be noted that the Constitution consolidates such a concept of a democratic state where the state not only seeks to protect and defend a person and society from crimes and other dangerous violations of law, but also is able to do this effectively. Thus, the state must create and effectively apply such a system of measures for restricting and reducing crime, especially organised crime, that would also comprise preventive measures adequate to the threat posed by organised crime. Otherwise, according to the Constitution, the duty of the state to ensure the security of each individual and all society, as well as the legal order based on the constitutional values, would not be implemented.

On the other hand, the concept of a democratic state under the rule of law, as entrenched in the Constitution, where such a democratic state seeks and is able to protect and defend a person and society from crimes and other dangerous violations of law, may not become a basis for violating human rights and freedoms, for restricting them more than necessary in order to achieve legitimate objectives important to society, or for denying by such restrictions the essence of human rights and freedoms. Therefore, preventive measures aimed at restricting and reducing crime, including organised crime, must be established by means of a law that must provide for the grounds and objectives of the application of these measures; a law must also consolidate a system of control over imposing and applying various preventive measures, comprising, inter alia, judicial control and the right of a person to apply to a court regarding a violation of his/her rights.

Establishing and applying preventive measures aimed at restricting and reducing organised crime

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 29 December 2004

... when deciding whether a law by which the implementation of the rights and freedoms of a person are limited infringes the constitutional principle of proportionality as one of the elements of the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law, it is necessary to assess whether the measures established in the law are in compliance with the legitimate objectives important to society, whether these measures are necessary in order to attain the specified objectives, and whether these measures restrict the rights and freedoms of a person clearly more than necessary in order to attain the said objectives.

... jurisdictional and other law-applying institutions, when applying preventive measures aimed at restricting and reducing organised crime that are linked with limitations on the implementation of particular rights and freedoms of a person, must thoroughly assess in every case a concrete situation, investigate all significant circumstances, find out whether it is possible to achieve the same objectives without limiting the implementation of human rights and freedoms, and, having find out that such a limitation is necessary in order to attain the said objectives of applying preventive measures, must ensure that the implementation of these rights and freedoms is not limited more than necessary in order to achieve the said objectives. If this is not done, human rights and freedoms could be violated.

... in cases where the data, received in accordance with the procedure established under the law, about the relations of persons with organised criminal groups, criminal syndicates, or their members, constitute a sufficient basis for considering that these persons may commit grave crimes, i.e. when particular activity of persons or their relations prove the threat to constitutional values, inter alia, human rights and freedoms, the constitutional order, the safety of society and the state, as well as public order, it is allowed to establish, by means of a law, preventive measures that provide for certain control over the conduct of such persons. As such, the preventive measures that are aimed at restricting and reducing organised crime should not be considered a constitutionally unreasonable limitation on the human right to privacy, but only on the condition that they are established by means of a law, if they are necessary in a democratic society in order to ensure the rights and freedoms of other persons and values consolidated in the Constitution, if they do not deny the nature and essence of the right of an individual to privacy, and if they are proportionate to the objective sought when this objective may not be attained by any other means. When applying the aforementioned preventive measures, jurisdictional and other law-applying institutions must assess in every case a particular situation, investigate all important circumstances, and find out whether the same objectives may be attained without interfering with the private life of an individual and the privacy of family life and without limiting the human right to privacy more than necessary in order to achieve the said important social and constitutionally justifiable objective.

In order to protect a person from an arbitrary and unlawful restriction on his/her privacy, the preventive measures interfering with the exercise of the human right to private life may be imposed only on the grounds established under the law, only by following the procedure prescribed in the law, and only by providing for the right of a person to file a complaint against an imposed preventive measure with a court.

... As such, the preventive measures that are aimed at restricting and reducing organised crime should not be considered a constitutionally unreasonable limitation on freedom of movement of a person, as well as the right to freely choose the place of residence in Lithuania and the right to leave Lithuania freely; however, these provisions are applicable only if they are established by means of a law, if they are necessary in a democratic society in order to protect the values defended and protected by the Constitution, if they do not deny the nature and essence of freedom of movement of a person, as well as the right to freely choose the place of residence in Lithuania and the right to leave Lithuania freely, and if they are proportionate to the sought objective that may not be achieved in any other manner. The jurisdictional and other law-applying institutions, when applying the aforementioned preventive measures, must thoroughly assess in every case the specific situation, must investigate all significant circumstances, must find out whether it is possible to achieve the same objectives without interfering into freedom of movement of a person, the right to freely choose the place of residence in Lithuania, and the right to leave Lithuania freely, without limiting freedom of movement of a person more than necessary in order to achieve the said socially important and constitutionally reasonable objective.

The proportionality of responsibility for violations of law; the differentiation (individualisation) of sanctions for violations of law

The constitutional principle of justice requires that established penalties for violations of law (thus, also imposed administrative penalties and monetary fines) be differentiated so that, when applying them, it would be possible to take into consideration the nature of a violation of law, circumstances mitigating responsibility, and other circumstances so that, in view of that, it would be possible to impose a penalty that is milder than the minimum penalty provided for in the sanction (ruling of 26 January 2004).

If a law does not establish differentiated amounts of monetary fines, but rather consolidates considerably high monetary fines of strictly defined amounts, and, if the respective law or other laws provide no possibility of differentiating legal responsibility for the respective violation of law, then, when a monetary fine is imposed, there is no possibility of individualising its amount when taking account of the character, dangerousness (gravity), scale, and other features of a violation of law, as well as of the circumstances mitigating responsibility and of other circumstances (due to which a particular monetary fine would be too high for the violator of law, since it would be disproportionate (inadequate) for a committed violation of law; thus, it would be unjust); such a legal regulation would not be in line with the principles of justice and a state under the rule of law, which are entrenched in the Constitution.

... the constitutional principle of justice, thus, the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law as well, would also be deviated from if a law consolidated not a monetary fine of a strictly defined amount for violations of law, but such minimum and maximum monetary fines that would permit individualising the amount of an imposed fine to a certain extent, however, notwithstanding this, these monetary fines would be too strict for violators of law just the same, i.e. they would be considerably high and if, in the course of the application of these sanctions – the imposition of monetary sanctions, it would not be permitted to take account of the character, dangerousness (gravity), scale, and other features of a violation of law (due to which a particular monetary fine would be too high for a violator of law, since it would be disproportionate (inadequate) for a committed violation of law; thus, it would be unjust) and to impose on a violator of law a monetary fine that is smaller than the minimum level of the sanction consolidated in the law.

In this context, it needs to be noted that, under Article 109 of the Constitution, in the Republic of Lithuania, justice is administered only by courts (Paragraph 1); when administering justice, judges and courts are independent (Paragraph 2); when considering cases, judges obey only the law (Paragraph 3). ... penalties established in laws and the system of such penalties must be such that a court would be able to administer justice when imposing penalties.

The fact of essential importance is that the legislature, by choosing such a way of formulating the sanction – a monetary fine – for the commission of an unlawful act where the article that establishes legal responsibility for the said unlawful act provides for such a monetary fine that is considerably high, i.e. such a sanction that is strict for violators, must, at the same time, by means of a law, establish a legal regulation whereby a court, when applying the sanction for the said unlawful act, could, while imposing a monetary fine, take account of all circumstances mitigating responsibility, including those that are not expressis verbis specified in the law, and provided there are such circumstances mitigating responsibility or other circumstances due to which a particular monetary fine would clearly be too high for a violator of law, since it would be disproportionate (inadequate) to the committed violation of law and, thus, unjust, impose on a violator a monetary fine that is smaller than that established in the law.

Under the Constitution, the legislature may not establish any such legal regulation whereby a court that, according to the law, adopts a decision on the imposition of a monetary fine for a violation of law would not be able, in general, by taking account of the character, dangerousness (gravity), the scale, and other features of a violation of law (due to which a particular monetary fine would be too high for a violator of law, since it would be disproportionate (inadequate) for a committed violation of law; thus, it would be unjust) and being guided by the criteria of justice and reasonableness, to individualise the amount of a considerably high monetary fine, i.e. a strict (for violators of law) penalty, and to impose a monetary fine smaller than the minimum monetary fine (lowest level of the sanction) or than the monetary fine of a strictly defined amount established in a law. Thus, the powers of a court would be restricted, i.e. the exceptional powers of a court to administer justice, which are consolidated in Paragraph 1 of Article 109 of the Constitution, would be limited and the preconditions would be created for violating the constitutional rights of subjects, inter alia, the constitutional right of persons to a fair trial.

The procedural guarantees for persons held legally liable

... provided the size (severity) of certain sanctions established in laws amounts to criminal punishments, regardless of whether these sanctions may be categorised as belonging to a certain type of legal responsibility (criminal, administrative, disciplinary, or other legal responsibility), and no matter how the respective sanctions are named in laws, laws must necessarily establish for persons who are held legally liable under particular laws the procedural guarantees that stem from the Constitution, inter alia, from Article 31 thereof. In this context, it needs to be emphasised that the provisions of Article 31 of the Constitution may not be interpreted as meant only for persons who are held criminally liable.

It is also not permitted to disregard this imperative in the cases where laws establish certain sanctions that, although are referred to as “economic sanctions” in laws, according to their content and other features, should be categorised as belonging to the institution of administrative legal responsibility, but their size (severity) amounts to criminal punishments. In such cases, the said procedural guarantees, which stem from the Constitution, for persons who are held administratively liable may be established in laws that consolidate these sanctions and/or other laws regulating the administrative responsibility of subjects (including economic operators) and the administrative process (inter alia, administrative legal proceedings), as well as in laws that regulate the activity of courts or in other laws.

The prohibition on punishing a person twice for the same violation of law (non bis in idem) (Paragraph 5 of Article 31 of the Constitution); acts committed repeatedly

Paragraph 5 of Article 31 of the Constitution prescribes: “No one may be punished twice for the same offence.”

Paragraph 5 of Article 31 of the Constitution consolidates the principle of non bis in idem. This constitutional principle means the prohibition on punishing a person twice for the same unlawful act, i.e. for the same crime, as well as for the same violation of law that is not a crime (rulings of 7 May 2001 and 2 October 2001).

The aforementioned constitutional principle does not mean that different types of responsibility may not be applied to a person for a violation of law (ruling of 7 May 2001).

As such, the constitutional principle of non bis in idem does not deny the possibility of applying more than one sanction of the same type (i.e. where such sanctions are defined by the norms of the same branch of law) to a person for the same violation, i.e. the main and additional punishment or the main and additional administrative penalty.

The constitutional principle of non bis in idem also means, inter alia, that, if a person who commits an unlawful act is held administratively, but not criminally liable, i.e. he/she is imposed a sanction – a penalty for an administrative violation of law, but not for a crime, he/she must not additionally be held criminally liable for the said act.

It should also be mentioned that the constitutional principle of non bis in idem may not be interpreted as meaning that it does not allow prosecuting and punishing a person for a violation of law for which legal prosecution in respect of that person was started, but was later dismissed on the grounds that, according to the procedure established by means of laws, were subsequently declared unreasonable and/or illegal, and the person concerned was not held legally liable – no sanction was applied to (no punishment or penalty was imposed on) him/her.

As such, the exemption of a person from one type of legal responsibility on the grounds and procedure established in laws may not be an obstacle for solving the issue on bringing him/her to legal responsibility of another type on the grounds and procedure established in laws.

... the principle of non bis in idem, which is consolidated in the Constitution, does not mean that the institution of repeatedly performed actions may not be consolidated in the legal system; it should also be noted that the institution of repeatedly performed actions also includes such a legal regulation where, in the case of a person who commits the same or a different violation of law defined in the same branch of law, i.e. who violates the same or a different legal norm that, according to the law, belongs to the same branch of law, the circumstance that this violation of law is committed repeatedly (therefore, it shows that such a person tends to disregard legal requirements) is incriminated as a circumstance under which the person for a repeatedly committed violation of law may be brought to other, more severe legal responsibility of the same kind, i.e. another, stricter sanction can be applied to him/her for this violation, i.e. a different, stricter punishment or penalty can be imposed on him/her compared with a person who commits the same act for the first time.

However, it should be emphasised that the constitutional principle of non bis in idem does not allow treating repetition (from the discussed aspect) as a circumstance under which the kind of administrative legal responsibility established for certain violations of law may be replaced by criminal responsibility due to the fact that a person who has already been punished by an administrative penalty for a certain violation of law has again committed an administrative violation of law.

... the legislature, while consolidating (from the discussed aspect) the institution of repeatedly performed acts and paying regard to the Constitution, may choose various ways of formulating a legal text. For instance, laws may lay down such a legal regulation where repetition (from the discussed aspect) is treated as an aggravating circumstance for the respective legal responsibility for a repeatedly committed violation of law, which is formally the same as a former violation, whereas the respective article (part thereof) of the law does not specify a formally different violation of law of the same kind. However, the legislature is not prohibited from legislatively establishing such a legal regulation where repetition (from the discussed aspect) would be treated as a circumstance formally qualifying another violation of law of the same kind (i.e. defined by the norms of the same branch of law) and a repeatedly committed violation of law of the same kind (i.e. the same as the former violation or as another violation that is defined by means of the norms of law of the same branch) would formally be named in the respective article (part thereof) as another violation of law of the same kind.

Thus, the constitutional principle of non bis in idem does not mean that it is not allowed, by means of a law, to establish such a legal regulation whereby, in the event that a person who has already been punished for a violation of law commits the same violation of law again, this violation would be qualified according to another norm of the same branch of law, formally treating such a violation as another violation of law, and another, stricter sanction (compared with a person who commits the same act for the first time) would be imposed on a person who has repeatedly committed the same unlawful act. Such a legal regulation, established by means of a law, where a repeated commission of a violation of law of the same kind (violation of the same or another provision which, according to the law, belongs to law of the same branch) is treated as a circumstance formally qualifying another unlawful act, which determines that the person may be brought to another, stricter legal responsibility, i.e. another, stricter sanction can be applied to him/her for this violation – a different, stricter punishment or penalty may be imposed on him/her compared with a person who commits the same act for the first time, should not be regarded as creating the legal preconditions for punishing a person twice for the same act – a previously committed violation of law.

It should also be emphasised that it is not permitted to establish any such legal regulation whereby, when holding a person legally liable for a repeatedly committed violation of law, repetition (from the discussed aspect) would be treated both as a circumstance formally qualifying another violation of law of the same kind and as a circumstance aggravating the legal responsibility for the said violation of law, which would formally be another violation of law. Such a legal regulation would deviate from the non bis in idem principle, which is consolidated in Paragraph 5 of Article 31 of the Constitution.

Establishing legal responsibility for unlawful acts

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 10 November 2005

In a democratic state under the rule of law, the legislature has the right and duty to prohibit by means of laws such acts that may essentially harm people, society, or the interests of the state, or where there might be a threat of such harm to appear (rulings of 8 May 2000, 10 June 2003, and 29 December 2004).

When establishing in laws which acts are unlawful, as well as establishing legal responsibility for unlawful acts, the legislature has broad discretion. This discretion also includes the discretion to establish circumstances that would determine sanctions applicable for violations of law. ...

It should be noted that the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law would be violated if: (1) legal responsibility were established in a law for such an act that is not dangerous to society; therefore, such an act need not be legally prohibited; (2) a law established such a strict sanction (legal responsibility) for an unlawful act under which a punishment or penalty imposed on a violator would obviously be too harsh, because it would be disproportionate (inadequate) for the committed violation of law; therefore, the said sanction would be unjust; (3) persons who are held liable were not able to make use of certain rights (inter alia, the right to the due process of law) that they have according to the Constitution and/or were not able to make use of certain rights that, according to laws, are enjoyed by other persons who are in an analogous situation; in the second case, the constitutional principle of the equality of the rights of persons, thus also Paragraph 1 of Article 29 of the Constitution, would be violated.

In order to prevent illegal acts, it is not always expedient to deem certain acts to be crimes and to impose the most severe measures – criminal punishments – for such acts; every time when it is necessary to decide whether to deem a certain act to be a crime or another violation of law, it is very important to assess what results may be achieved when applying other measures (which are not linked with the application of criminal punishments), inter alia, administrative sanctions (ruling of 13 November 1997).

Thus, the legislature, paying regard to the Constitution, inter alia, to the imperatives of consistency and internal non-contradiction of the legal system, which arise from the Constitution, may choose by means of which norms of a particular branch of law to define certain violations of law and what sanctions (criminal, administrative, etc.) to establish for them.

When assessing whether legal responsibility should be categorised as belonging to administrative or criminal law, it should be emphasised that there are a number of similarities between administrative and criminal legal responsibility, though there are also essential differences. The dangerousness of administrative violations of law and criminal acts is not the same; the consequences for holding persons administratively or criminally liable are also different. Administrative penalties may be similar to criminal punishments (ruling of 13 November 1997). However, it should be emphasised that the legislature must seek to achieve the inter-branch compatibility of administrative and criminal sanctions.

The legal situation of persons who are held administratively liable and of those who are held criminally liable must not be the same, because the grounds themselves of this legal responsibility are different: the former have committed administrative violations of law ... while the latter have committed crimes or other violations of law that are established in a penal law. As such, the establishment of legal responsibility of various kinds for violations of law may not be the grounds to question the compliance of the respective legal regulation established in laws with the constitutional principles of the equality of rights and a state under the rule of law. Thus, the mere fact that, according to laws, certain unlawful acts are defined as administrative violations of law (even though the severity of administrative penalties established for them amounts to criminal punishments), while other unlawful acts are defined as crimes or other acts violating penal laws, does not mean that the constitutional principles of the equality of the rights of persons and a state under the rule of law are deviated from.

The proportionality of responsibility for violations of law; the differentiation (individualisation) of sanctions for violations of law

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 10 November 2005

When establishing sanctions for violations of law, it is necessary to respect the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law, inter alia, the requirements of reasonableness, justice, and proportionality. The principle of proportionality, which arises from the Constitution, means that the established legal measures must be necessary in a democratic society and suitable for achieving legitimate and universally important objectives sought (there must be a balance between such objectives and measures); the said measures may not restrict the rights of persons more than necessary in order to achieve the said objectives and, if those legal measures are related to the sanctions for a violation of law, in such a case, the aforementioned sanctions must be proportionate to a committed violation of law (rulings of 13 December 2004 and 29 September 2005). It is not permitted to establish for violations of law such punishments or penalties (inter alia, such sizes thereof) that would obviously be disproportionate (inadequate) to violations of law and to the purpose of punishments or penalties. Thus, laws must formulate sanctions in such a way that, in the course of their application, it would be possible to take account of the nature of a violation of law and circumstances mitigating responsibility or other circumstances so that a punishment or penalty would not be unjust or inadequate to a committed violation of law.

It should be noted that, as such, the consolidation of strict sanctions (for violators of law) for violations of law (inter alia, high monetary fines for administrative violations of law) in laws may not be simply (without assessing the character of a violation of law, its dangerousness (gravity), scale, as well as its other features and circumstances) interpreted as unjust or inadequate to those violations of law.

An imposed punishment or penalty must be just. According to the Constitution, when imposing a sanction for a violation of law, a court must have the possibility of taking account of all circumstances mitigating responsibility, as well as of those that are not expressis verbis established in the law and the possibility of imposing on a violator such a sanction – punishment or penalty – that would be milder than that established in the law. Having chosen such a way of formulating the sanction – a monetary fine – for committing an unlawful act where the article that lays down legal responsibility for the said unlawful act establishes such a monetary fine that is considerably high, i.e. such a sanction that is strict for violators, the legislature must, at the same time, establish, by means of a law, such a legal regulation whereby a court, when applying the sanction for the said unlawful act, could, while imposing a monetary fine, take account of all circumstances mitigating responsibility, including those that are not expressis verbis specified in the law, and provided there are such circumstances mitigating responsibility or other circumstances due to which a particular monetary fine would clearly be too high for a violator of law, since it would be disproportionate (inadequate) to the committed violation of law, thus, unjust, impose on a violator a monetary fine that is smaller than that established in the law, i.e. a monetary fine that is smaller than the minimum monetary fine (lowest level of the sanction) or the fine of a strictly determined amount that is established in the law (rulings of 10 June 2003 and 3 November 2005). The imposition of a smaller monetary fine than that established in the law must not be the rule, but an exception – it can be imposed by a court only under such special circumstances mitigating responsibility or in such other circumstances where the disregard of which would lead to the imposition of a fine in the amount established in the law where the said fine would obviously be unjust. A court, when imposing fines smaller than those established in the law, must do that especially attentively and carefully in order not to violate the interests of a person, society, and the state.

... provided the size (severity) of certain sanctions established in laws amounts to criminal punishments, regardless of whether these sanctions may be categorised as belonging to a certain type of legal responsibility (administrative, disciplinary, or other legal responsibility), and no matter how the respective sanctions are named in laws, laws must necessarily establish, for persons who are held legally liable under particular laws, the procedural guarantees that stem from the Constitution, inter alia, from Article 31 thereof, the provisions of which may not be interpreted as meant only for persons who are held criminally liable (ruling of 3 November 2005). The said procedural guarantees, which arise from the Constitution, are the independence and impartiality of a court, the presumption of innocence, the prohibition on compelling persons to give evidence against themselves, or their family members or close relatives, the application of a sanction (imposition of a punishment or penalty) only on the basis of a law, the prohibition on punishing a person twice for the same unlawful act (non bis in idem), the right of a person to defence from the moment of detention or the first interrogation, the right to have an advocate, the principle of adversarial argument during a trial, the right of a person with no knowledge of Lithuanian to participate in judicial actions through a translator, etc.

The prohibition on punishing a person twice for the same violation of law (non bis in idem) (Paragraph 5 of Article 31 of the Constitution)

... the constitutional principle of non bis in idem does not prohibit applying to a person the prohibition sanction – a preventive measure – together with another administrative penalty.

Thus, as such, the constitutional principle of non bis in idem does not deny the possibility of imposing more than one sanction on a person for the same violation of law. It is possible to answer whether the respective legal regulation violates the said constitutional principle only upon assessing the nature of violations of law for which the respective sanctions are established, as well as socially significant objectives that are sought by the legislature. The fact whether a certain administrative penalty (or punishment) established under the law is assigned to the main or additional categories, or whether it is not assigned to any of these categories, is of no significance from the aspect of the compliance of the respective legal regulation with the constitutional principle of non bis in idem, because the division of administrative penalties (as well as punishments) into main and additional ones stems not from the Constitution, but from a law, i.e. from ordinary law.

The proportionality of responsibility for violations of law; the differentiation (individualisation) of sanctions for violations of law

The Constitutional Court has held that the constitutional principles of justice and a state under the rule of law also imply that the measures established by the state for violations of law must be proportionate (adequate) to the violation of law, they must be in line with the legitimate and generally important objectives sought, they may not restrain a person clearly more than necessary in order to reach these objectives; there must be a fair balance (proportionality) between the pursued objective to punish the violators of law and to ensure the prevention of the violations of law and the measures chosen for reaching this objective; the constitutional principle of justice requires that established penalties be differentiated so that, when applying them, it would be possible to take account of the nature of a violation of law, circumstances mitigating responsibility, and other circumstances, so that, in view of that, it would be possible to impose a penalty that is milder than the minimum penalty provided for in the sanction, etc.; monetary fines established in laws for violations of law must be of such an amount that is necessary in seeking the legitimate and socially significant objective – to ensure that laws are observed and that established duties are carried out (rulings of 6 December 2000, 2 October 2001, 26 January 2004, 3 November 2005, and 10 November 2005).

The powers of a court in considering cases of administrative violations of law

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 28 May 2008

When considering a case of an administrative violation of law, a court (judge) must objectively and impartially investigate, verify, and assess the data (evidence) present in the case of the commission of an administrative violation of law and must adopt a fair decision regarding the guilt of a person who is accused of committing this violation of law. It needs to be noted that such situations are also possible where, during the consideration of a case in a court, such circumstances come to light that are important in order to adopt a fair decision, but which were not established by the person who drew up the administrative law violation protocol, or where the material submitted to a court is not sufficient in order to adopt a fair decision. In such case ... a court (judge), when seeking to objectively and comprehensively investigate all circumstances of a case and to establish the truth in it, has the powers to perform the necessary procedural actions, since the administration of justice may not depend only on what material is submitted to a court. ... when performing procedural actions, a court must act in such a way that would not create any preconditions for doubting its impartiality or independence.

It needs to be noted that the powers of a court (judge) to collect evidence when considering the case of an administrative violation of law certainly do not mean that persons who draw up administrative law violation protocols are exempted from the duty to collect evidence.

Crimes; the obligation of the state to ensure effective protection against criminal attempts; criminal responsibility for criminal acts

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 8 June 2009

The Constitutional Court has held the following on more than one occasion:

– the striving for an open, just, and harmonious civil society and a state under the rule of law, which is consolidated in the Preamble to the Constitution, implies that it is obligatory to try to ensure the safety of every individual and all society from criminal attempts against them (rulings of 8 May 2000 and 16 January 2006);

– crimes are violations of law that especially grossly violate human rights and freedoms, as well as other values protected and defended by the Constitution, make negative impact on the living conditions and the subsistence level of people, and are detrimental to the foundations of the life of the state and society (rulings of 8 May 2000, 29 May 2004, and 16 January 2006);

– one of the means for protecting human rights and freedoms, as well as other constitutional values, is criminal responsibility for criminal acts (rulings of 10 June 2003 and 4 July 2003);

– the mission of the state as the political organisation of all society is to ensure human rights and freedoms and to guarantee the public interest; therefore, while exercising its functions and acting in the interests of all society, the state has the obligation to ensure the effective protection of human rights and freedoms, other values protected and defended by the Constitution, every person and all society against, inter alia, criminal attempts (rulings of 29 December 2004 and 16 January 2006);

– if the state fails to take proper actions in order to prevent crimes, the trust in state authority and laws would be destroyed and disrespect for legal order and various social institutions would increase. Therefore, according to the Constitution, the state as the organisation of all society, which must guarantee the public interest, has not only the right, but also the duty to take various lawful measures in order to prevent crimes, as well as to restrict and reduce crime (rulings of 8 May 2000 and 16 January 2006);

– the measures, established and applied by the state, for preventing crimes, as well as restricting and reducing crime, must be effective (rulings of 8 May 2000 and 16 January 2006);

– in a state under the rule of law, the legislature has the right and, at the same time, the duty to prohibit, by means of laws, such acts by which essential harm is inflicted on the interests of persons, society, or those of the state, or if a threat occurs where, due to such acts, the said damage will be inflicted; laws define which acts are considered crimes and establish punishments for committing such acts; by threatening with criminal punishments, laws protect individuals and society from criminal attempts against them and establish the grounds for punishing persons who commit crimes in order to correct them (rulings of 8 May 2000, 10 June 2003, and 16 January 2006);

– the legislature, when regulating the relationships connected with the establishment of criminal responsibility for criminal acts, has broad discretion; in view of the nature, dangerousness (gravity), scale, and other features of criminal acts, as well as in view of other significant circumstances, it may, inter alia, consolidate a differentiated legal regulation and establish different legal responsibility for particular criminal acts. However, this discretion of the legislature is not absolute: the legislature must pay regard to the norms and principles of the Constitution, inter alia, the imperatives of regularity and inner consistency of the legal system, which arise from the Constitution (ruling of 16 January 2006).

Criminal responsibility of legal persons

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 8 June 2009

... the Constitution does not expressis verbis prescribe that only a natural person may be a subject of criminal responsibility and that a legal person may not be a subject of such responsibility.

... the specificity of a legal person is determined, inter alia, by the fact that, having legal capacity and capability, a legal person is a participant of legal relationships through natural persons (its head, an authorised representative, etc.). ... the activity of a legal person is inseparable from the activity of particular natural persons through which such a legal person acts and without the activity of which the activity of such a legal person would be essentially impossible. ... when establishing criminal responsibility of a legal person, the legislature must also take account of the aforementioned specificity of a legal person as a subject of legal relationships. The specificity of a legal person also determines the particularities of the application of certain legal institutions of criminal law to legal persons. In this context, it also needs to be noted that, due to such specificity of a legal person (compared with a natural person), it is not allowed to apply, to a legal person, certain norms of criminal law that are established for natural persons.

Thus, the specificity of a legal person as a subject of legal relationships is determined by the fact that [the law] may establish a differentiated legal regulation linked with the criminal responsibility of a natural person and a legal person. However, in this context, it needs to be noted that, when also regulating criminal responsibility of legal persons, the legislature must pay regard to the norms and principles of the Constitution, inter alia, those consolidated in Article 31 thereof.

... under the Constitution, inter alia, Article 31 thereof, as well as according to the principle of a state under the rule of law, the legislature, when regulating the relationships connected with the criminal responsibility of a legal person, must establish such a legal regulation that a court, when deciding the question of the criminal responsibility of a legal person, inter alia, the question of the imposition of a punishment on such a legal person, could take account of all circumstances, inter alia, the circumstances that increase or decrease the dangerousness of a criminal act committed by that legal person. In this context, it needs to be noted that the specificity of a legal person as a subject of legal relationships (inter alia, the fact that a legal person has an independent structure and is a participant of legal relationships through certain natural persons) also implies that a law may also recognise such circumstances as circumstances increasing or decreasing the dangerousness of a criminal act committed by a legal person that, normally, may not be regarded as circumstances increasing or decreasing the dangerousness of a criminal act committed by a natural person. For instance, the dangerousness of a criminal act committed by a legal person may be determined by the policy, strategy, organisational culture, etc. of the activity of a legal person. For example, the dangerousness of a criminal act committed by a legal person is assessed in one way when the policy of the activity of a legal person and its organisational structure are targeted in order that the said legal person could not act criminally, while it is assessed in a different way when the strategy of the activity of a legal person and its internal procedures create the preconditions for that legal person to act in a criminal manner (or are even oriented in order that the said legal person would act in a criminal manner), when such a legal person recognises the results of a criminal act committed for its benefit ex post facto, etc.

It also needs to be noted that the existence or non-existence of the said circumstances in a criminal act committed by a legal person may be of crucial importance for the exemption of such a legal person from criminal responsibility.

The specificity of a legal person as the subject of a criminal act, i.e. the fact that it is an independent subject of legal relationships having legal capacity and capability, independent name, and organisational integrity, that its property is separated from the property of its participants, but also that it is a participant of legal relationships through the natural persons who act on its behalf, also implies the specificity of its guilt. The guilt of a legal person must be linked with the guilt of a natural person who acts for the benefit or in the interests of the said legal person. ...

Punishment may be imposed or applied only on the grounds established by law (Paragraph 4 of Article 31 of the Constitution)

... Paragraph 4 of Article 31 of the Constitution, according to which punishment may be imposed or applied only on the grounds established by law, means, inter alia, that, under the Constitution, the legislature has the duty to establish, by means of a law, which acts are crimes, as well as criminal responsibility for such acts. By establishing which acts are crimes, as well as criminal responsibility for them, the legislature is bound by the principles of natural justice and proportionality, which are established in the Constitution, and by other requirements found in a state under the rule of law. Under the Constitution, the legislature may specify by means of a penal law only such acts as crimes where the said acts are really dangerous and by which huge harm is inflicted on the interests of persons, society, and those of the state. Paragraph 4 of Article 31 of the Constitution, according to which punishment may be imposed or applied only on the grounds established by law, also means that the legislature must establish punishments for criminal acts and sizes of such punishments only by means of a law; punishments must be established for each criminal act. The principle of natural justice consolidated in the Constitution implies that punishments established by means of a penal law must be just. The constitutional principles of justice and a state under the rule of law mean, inter alia, that the measures that are applied by the state must be adequate to the objective sought. Thus, punishments must be adequate to the criminal acts for which they are established; it is not permitted to establish such punishments and their sizes for criminal acts that would obviously be inadequate to a criminal act and the purpose of a punishment. Punishments and their sizes must be differentiated in a penal law when taking account of the dangerousness of criminal acts (ruling of 10 June 2003) ...

The prohibition on punishing a person twice for the same violation of law (non bis in idem) (Paragraph 5 of Article 31 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 8 June 2009

When interpreting the constitutional principle consolidated in Paragraph 5 of Article 31 of the Constitution ... it needs to be noted that the principle of non bis in idem means that it is prohibited to punish twice the same person for the same criminal act; however, this constitutional principle does not deny the possibility of holding criminally liable two or more persons whose guilt is proved.

... when holding a natural person criminally liable for having committed an act that was committed by the said natural person, who has certain defined features, and a legal person that is recognised guilty of the fact that the said natural person with certain defined features committed a criminal act for the benefit (or in the interests) of the legal person, two different subjects – a natural person and a legal person – are held criminally liable for one act. Therefore, a natural person and a legal person, as subjects of criminal responsibility, may not be equated one with the other.

Establishing administrative responsibility for dangerous acts

... the Constitution does not prohibit defining, by means of a law, administrative violations of law – acts that are less dangerous than criminal acts – and establishing administrative responsibility for such acts. Only those acts that are less dangerous than criminal acts and by which damage is inflicted on the interests of a person, society, or the state may be declared, by means of a law, administrative violations of law.

Under the Constitution, the legislature, when regulating the relationships connected with the establishment of administrative responsibility for committing administrative violations of law, has broad discretion; inter alia, it may, taking account of the nature, dangerousness, and other features of administrative violations of law, as well as of other important circumstances, consolidate a differentiated legal regulation and establish different administrative responsibility for particular administrative violations of law. However, this discretion of the legislature is not absolute: while doing so, the legislature must pay regard to the norms and principles of the Constitution, inter alia, the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law, as well as the principle of the equality of the rights of persons, which is consolidated in the Constitution, inter alia, Article 29 thereof.

... the legislature, when regulating the relationships connected with administrative responsibility for committing administrative violations of law, inter alia, when imposing limitations on the administrative responsibility of some subjects for committing administrative violations of law, must pay regard to the imperatives, arising from Article 29 of the Constitution, that legal responsibility for the same administrative violations of law must be established by means of a law and applied to all persons, save the exceptions provided for in the Constitution.

In this context, it also needs to be noted that, under the Constitution, it is only the President of the Republic who has immunity not only from criminal, but also from administrative responsibility: while in office, he/she may be neither detained nor held criminally or administratively responsible (Paragraph 1 of Article 86 of the Constitution). In its ruling of 8 May 2000, the Constitutional Court held that the legal status of the President of the Republic as the Head of State is an individual one and is different from that of the rest of citizens.

Under the Constitution, the members of the Seimas, ministers, and judges also have partial immunity from certain administrative measures: the members of the Seimas may not be held criminally liable or be detained, or have their liberty restricted otherwise, without the consent of the Seimas (Paragraph 2 of Article 62 of the Constitution); the Prime Minister, ministers, and judges may not be held criminally liable or be detained, or have their liberty restricted otherwise, without the prior consent of the Seimas or, in the period between the sessions of the Seimas, without the prior consent of the President of the Republic (Article 100 and Paragraph 2 of Article 114 of the Constitution).

It needs to be noted that, under the Constitution, any other persons, inter alia, servicemen and statutory state servants (officials), do not have any immunity from administrative responsibility.

Differentiating criminal responsibility

The legislature may, taking account of the nature, dangerousness (gravity), scale, and other features of criminal acts, as well as other significant circumstances, consolidate a differentiated legal regulation and establish different legal responsibility for particular criminal acts. However, this discretion of the legislature is not absolute: the legislature must pay regard to the norms and principles of the Constitution (rulings of 16 January 2006 and 8 June 2009), inter alia, the principles of natural justice and proportionality, other requirements of the principles found in a state under the rule of law, as well as the principle of the equality of rights, which is enshrined in Article 29 of the Constitution.

The principle of natural justice, which is consolidated in the Constitution, implies that punishments established in a penal law must be just; punishments and their sizes must be differentiated in a penal law when taking account of the dangerousness of criminal acts (rulings of 10 June 2003 and 8 June 2009). The dangerousness of criminal acts is determined, inter alia, by the values that are infringed upon by these acts.

It needs to be noted that, when establishing criminal responsibility for criminal acts, the legislature has the discretion to differentiate the said responsibility, taking into account family relationship (and the degree thereof) between a person who committed a criminal act and the one who suffered from that act.

The life of an individual, the inviolability of his/her person, close family relationships, family, motherhood, fatherhood, and childhood are constitutional values; the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law implies the discretion of the legislature to establish that persons who attempt on the life and health of their close relatives or family members are subject to strict criminal family relationship, which would be differentiated by taking account, inter alia, of the dangerousness of such an attempt.

The powers of a court to individualise penalties imposed for administrative violations of law

In its jurisprudence, the Constitutional Court has expressed its position more than once that a court, when taking account of the significant circumstances of a case, must have the possibility of individualising strict penalties consolidated in the law and imposing a penalty that is smaller than the minimum one provided for in the sanction or a penalty softer than the one provided for under the law (rulings of, inter alia, 26 January 2004, 3 November 2005, 10 November 2005, 21 January 2008, and 17 September 2008).

... under the Constitution, inter alia, Paragraph 1 of Article 109 thereof and the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law, the law by which the administrative legal responsibility of persons is established may not consolidate such a legal regulation (penalties, their sizes) whereby a court, when taking account of all circumstances significant for a case, would not be allowed to individualise a strict penalty imposed on a concrete person for a concrete violation of law. By means of a legal regulation, it is necessary to create the legal preconditions for a court to investigate all circumstances significant for a case and to adopt a just decision. Conversely, a legal regulation may not be such that a court would not be allowed, when taking account of all circumstances significant for a case and by following law, without violating the imperatives of justice and reasonableness, which arise from the Constitution, to adopt a just decision and, thus, to administer justice. Otherwise, the powers of a court to administer justice, which arise from the Constitution, inter alia, Article 109 thereof, would be violated and the constitutional concept of a court as the institution that administers justice in the name of the Republic of Lithuania, as well as the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law, would be deviated from.

It should also be noted that, when individualising penalties imposed on infringers, courts must thoroughly assess, in concrete situations, the dangerousness of a violation of law for human rights and freedoms, as well as the interests of society and the state. The situations where it is allowed to impose a penalty for administrative violations of law that is smaller than the minimum one provided for in the sanction, or to impose a softer penalty than provided for in the sanction, or not to impose an administrative penalty at all, must be exceptional and related to the statement of the existence of exceptional circumstances.

The duty of the state to ensure the safety of the public and public order; the powers of the legislature to establish the conditions and procedure for the entry of weapons and ammunition into civilian circulation and for holding and using them, as well as for issuing and withdrawing permits to acquire a weapon

... the Constitutional Court has noted that, under the Constitution, the institutions of state power and governance are under the obligation to ensure the safety of the public and public order, to protect a person against any attempt on his/her life and health and to defend human rights and freedoms. Weapons and ammunition may be a danger to public order and the safety of the public, to human life and health; therefore, the legislature, when taking account of the necessity to ensure public order and the safety of the public and to protect human rights and freedoms, is empowered to establish the conditions and procedure for the entry of weapons and ammunition into civilian circulation and for holding and using them, as well as for issuing permits to acquire a weapon (ruling of 12 April 2001).

It needs to be noted that weapons and ammunition may be a danger not only to a person possessing weapons and ammunition himself/herself, but to other members of the public, as well as to public order; therefore, the legislature has the duty to establish such conditions and procedure for the entry of weapons and ammunition into civilian circulation and for holding and using them, as well as for issuing and withdrawing permits to acquire a weapon, that would create the preconditions for protecting a person possessing weapons and ammunition, as well as other members of the public, against a possible threat and to ensure public order. When fulfilling the said duty and while exercising broad discretion, the legislature is under the obligation to observe the Constitution; inter alia, when establishing the measures limiting the right to acquire and possess the respective weapons and ammunition, which are granted to a person under the conditions and procedure consolidated under the law, the legislature is obliged to pay regard to the principle of proportionality.

The prohibition on compelling persons to give evidence against themselves, or their family members or close relatives (Paragraph 3 of Article 31 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 12 April 2013

Paragraph 3 of Article 31 of the Constitution prescribes: "It shall be prohibited to compel anyone to give evidence against himself, or his family members or close relatives."

The Constitutional Court, when interpreting the guarantee consolidated in Paragraph 3 of Article 31 of the Constitution, held that the provision of the Constitution in question is, in substance, related to the particularities and legal situation of a natural person as a subject of legal relationships (ruling of 8 June 2009).

The guarantee consolidated in Paragraph 3 of Article 31 of the Constitution means that a natural person may refuse to give evidence on the basis of which this person himself/herself, his/her family member or close relative could be brought to criminal responsibility, as well as to another type of legal responsibility, if a possible sanction by its nature and size (severity) amounted to a criminal punishment. The legal regulation established in Paragraph 3 of Article 31 of the Constitution may not, however, be interpreted as meaning that a natural person may not voluntarily (i.e. without anybody compelling him/her) give evidence against himself/herself, his/her family members or close relatives (ruling of 8 June 2009).

When interpreting Paragraph 3 of Article 31 of the Constitution in conjunction with Article 23, it should be noted that an individual, enjoying the guarantee consolidated in Paragraph 3 of Article 31, is not allowed, inter alia, not to comply with the duties established by means of laws for him/her as the owner of an object of ownership.

Establishing criminal responsibility for international crimes

... in order to be in line with the commitment of the Republic of Lithuania, as prescribed in Paragraph 1 of Article 135 of the Constitution, to fulfil, in good faith, its international obligations arising under the universally recognised norms of international law (general international law), inter alia, under the jus cogens norms that prohibit international crimes, the criminal laws of the Republic of Lithuania that are related to responsibility for international crimes, inter alia, genocide, may not establish any such standards that would be lower than those established under the universally recognised norms of international law. Disregard for the said requirement would be incompatible with the striving for an open, just, and harmonious civil society and a state under the rule of law, as consolidated in the Preamble to the Constitution and expressed through the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law.

Punishment may be imposed or applied only on the grounds established by law (Paragraph 4 of Article 31 of the Constitution)

Paragraph 4 of Article 31 of the Constitution prescribes: "Punishment may be imposed or applied only on the grounds established by law." Thus, the principle of nulla poena sine lege, which is consolidated in the said provision of the Constitution, means that no person may be punished for an act that was not punishable by law at the time when it was committed.

It should be noted that the said principle also stems from the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law. As the Constitutional Court noted in its rulings of 13 December 2004 and 16 January 2006, when law is applied, inter alia, it is necessary to observe the following requirements arising under the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law: responsibility (sanction, punishment) for any violations of law must be established in advance (nulla poena sine lege); no act is criminal unless it is defined as such by means of a law (nullum crimen sine lege).

Thus, it should be noted that the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law integrates the following two interrelated principles ...: nulla poena sine lege and nullum crimen sine lege.

... in view of Paragraph 1 of Article 135 of the Constitution and the striving for an open, just, and harmonious civil society and a state under the rule of law, as expressed through the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law, the principle of nullum crimen, nulla poena sine lege, which is consolidated in Paragraph 4 of Article 31 of the Constitution and stems from the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law, is not absolute. Under the Constitution, criminal laws may provide for an exception to the said principle, which would be applicable to crimes established under international law or the general principles of law, inter alia, the crime of genocide as defined under the universally recognised norms of international law (i.e. the crime of genocide directed exclusively against national, ethnical, racial, or religious groups); only in that way, regard would be paid to the requirement, which stems from Paragraph 1 of Article 135 of the Constitution and is linked with the striving for an open, just, and harmonious civil society and a state under the rule of law, as expressed through the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law, that the criminal laws of the Republic of Lithuania related to responsibility for international crimes would not establish any such standards that would be lower than those established under the universally recognised norms of international law. This requirement and, thus, also the principle of nullum crimen, nulla poena sine lege, which is consolidated in Paragraph 4 of Article 31 of the Constitution and stems from the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law, would be disregarded if criminal laws laid down a retroactive effect on the crimes defined exclusively under national law.

... under the Constitution, as well as under the universally recognised norms of international law, the exception to the principle of nullum crimen, nulla poena sine lege is also applicable to deliberate actions that are considered to constitute genocide, i.e. deliberate actions aimed at destroying a significant part of any national, ethnical, racial, or religious group that has an impact on the survival of an entire protected group, comprising certain social or political groups.

It should also be noted that, under the Constitution, as well as under the universally recognised norms of international law, the exception to the principle of nullum crimen, nulla poena sine lege, which permits the retroactivity of the criminal laws establishing criminal responsibility for crimes recognised under international law or the general principles of law, is also applicable to crimes against humanity and war crimes, which may be directed, inter alia, against certain social or political groups of people.

Establishing the period of the application of criminal responsibility

The Constitutional Court has also held that, when defining criminal acts by means of laws and establishing criminal responsibility for such acts, the legislature has also the discretion to establish the time limits within which criminal responsibility may be applied to persons who commit criminal acts; establishing such time limits, the legislature must take into account, inter alia, the nature and dangerousness (gravity) of a criminal act; such criteria may also determine such a legal regulation to the effect that no time limits are applied as regards criminal responsibility for the gravest crimes (ruling of 18 March 2014).

... under the Constitution, the legislature has the discretion to establish various models of calculating the time limits during which criminal responsibility could be applied to persons who committed criminal acts. For instance, it is allowed to establish absolute time limits or they may be related to certain circumstances, for example, filing a charge. When establishing such time limits, the legislature must pay regard to the requirement, which stems from the Constitution, inter alia, Paragraph 2 of Article 31 thereof, that such preconditions must be created for a court considering a criminal case that it could act in a way that would make it possible to establish the truth in the criminal case and the issue of the guilt of a person accused of committing a crime would be decided in a fair manner.

... the Constitution, inter alia, Paragraphs 1 and 2 of Article 31 thereof, and the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law imply the duty of the legislature, when regulating criminal procedure relationships in cases where the time limits during which criminal responsibility may be applied to persons who committed criminal acts have expired, to balance the constitutional values – the presumption of innocence and the right of a person to the due court process. The legislature is under the duty to establish such a legal regulation that would create the preconditions for ensuring that a court decision adopted after the time limits during which criminal responsibility may be applied to persons who committed criminal acts have expired would solve the issue of whether the accused person was reasonably charged with committing a criminal act in order to drop the charge in the case where a court decision does not recognise that a person is guilty of having committed a criminal act.

... during a pretrial investigation, justice is not administered ... a pretrial investigation involves collecting and assessing information that is necessary for deciding whether public charges must be brought against a person and a criminal case must be referred to a court. Consequently, the termination of a pretrial investigation upon the expiry of statutory limitation periods for criminal responsibility means that, within the prescribed periods, no necessary data has been collected to bring charges against a certain person and that there are no grounds to believe that the accused has committed a crime.

It should also be noted that, as mentioned before, the Constitution, inter alia, Paragraphs 1 and 2 of Article 31 thereof, and the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law imply the duty of the legislature, when regulating criminal procedure relationships in cases where the time limits during which criminal responsibility may be applied to persons who committed criminal acts have expired, to lay down such a legal regulation that would create the preconditions for ensuring that a charge is dropped in the case where such a charge is not confirmed. Consequently, in cases where, upon the expiry of statutory limitation periods, it is ascertained that charges brought against the accused for having committed a crime were unfounded, a court must deliver an acquittal.

Establishing criminal responsibility for criminal acts

When regulating the relationships related to the establishment of criminal responsibility for criminal acts, the legislature has broad discretion; in view of the nature, dangerousness (gravity), scale, and other characteristics of criminal acts, as well as in view of other significant circumstances, it may, inter alia, lay down a differentiated legal regulation and establish different legal responsibility for the respective criminal acts. However, this discretion of the legislature is not absolute: the legislature must pay regard to the norms and principles of the Constitution, inter alia, the imperatives of the consistency and internal non-contradiction of the legal system, which stem from the Constitution (rulings of 16 January 2006, 8 June 2009, and 18 March 2014).

... under the Constitution, the criminalisation of concrete acts and the differentiation of criminal responsibility for them is, first of all, a matter of the criminal policy pursued by the state, which is decided by the legislature while exercising its wide discretion and taking into account the dangerousness and scale of the said acts, the priorities of crime prevention, as well as other significant circumstances, but without violating the Constitution and the imperatives arising from the Constitution. Thus, even though the legislature must, in every concrete case, assess the expediency of declaring a concrete act to be a criminal one by assessing, at the same time, what results may be achieved by means of other measures, the mere existence of doubts as to the expediency of criminalising a certain act or as to the effectiveness of such a legal regulation does not give grounds for questioning the compliance of this legal regulation with the Constitution, unless it transpires that the said legal regulation, already at the time of its consolidation in legal acts, was clearly directed against the welfare of the Nation and the interests of the State of Lithuania and its society, and clearly denied the values consolidated, defended, and protected by the Constitution.

The legal regulation of the imposition and execution of sentences; the suspension of the execution of sentences

... under the Constitution, inter alia, the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law, taking into account the dangerousness and scale of criminal acts, the priorities of crime prevention, and other significant circumstances, the legislature has broad discretion to decide issues of the criminal policy pursued by the state, inter alia, issues of the criminalisation of specific acts and the differentiation of criminal responsibility, among other things, to establish a legal regulation governing the imposition and execution of sentences. In doing so, the legislature must respect, inter alia, the requirements, arising from the constitutional principles of a state under the rule of law and justice, that the penal system established in the criminal law is harmonious, stable, and balanced, that such sentences and their lengths for criminal acts are established that are commensurate with the criminal act and the purpose of the penalty, and that sentences and their lengths are differentiated according to the dangerousness of the criminal acts. In this context, it should be noted that the legal regulation establishing the system of penalties in the criminal law may not be changed by taking into account only the attitude developed in society over a certain period of time to certain criminal acts.

... under the Constitution, inter alia, Paragraph 2 of Article 31 and Paragraph 1 of Article 109 thereof, and the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law, when exercising its broad discretion to decide issues of the criminal policy pursued by the state, the legislature must, by means of a legal regulation laid down in the criminal law, create the preconditions for a court, by taking into account all the circumstances of the case, to impose a fair sentence on the person who has committed a criminal act, inter alia, in exceptional cases, to impose a less severe sentence than that provided for under the law; the criminal law may also provide for the possibility for the court to suspend the execution of the imposed sentence, where this is justified having regard to the gravity of the committed criminal act, the personality of the guilty person, the circumstances mitigating his/her criminal responsibility, and other circumstances.

Thus, under the Constitution, inter alia, Paragraph 2 of Article 31 and Paragraph 1 of Article 109 thereof, and the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law, the legislature has the right to provide for the possibility of suspending the execution of sentences imposed for certain criminal acts, inter alia, those that are most serious under the criminal law, but it is not obliged to do so.

The conditions for issuing and withdrawing permits to acquire and possess weapons (ammunition)

... under the Constitution, inter alia, the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law, implementing its duty to establish the conditions and procedure for issuing and withdrawing permits to acquire weapons and ammunition, in order to create the preconditions for ensuring public order and the security of society and protecting human rights and freedoms, the legislature may lay down such measures for limiting the right, acquired under the conditions and in accordance with the procedure laid down by the law, to acquire and possess weapons and ammunition whereby persons having been convicted for committing a criminal act would not be issued permits to acquire weapons and ammunition for a certain period of time specified by the legislature, while the issued permits would be withdrawn. It should also be noted that such a legal regulation must create the possibility of assessing, to the extent possible, the individual situation of each person and, in view of all the important circumstances, refusing to issue a permit to acquire weapons and ammunition to a person having committed a criminal act if, even after the expiry of the time period set by the legislature, this person continues posing a threat to the security of society and public order. In addition, such a legal regulation under which persons having committed certain particularly serious crimes, for which the most severe penalties are provided for, may never be issued permits to acquire certain weapons and ammunition would also be in line with the Constitution, inter alia, with the constitutional principle of proportionality.

The conditions for granting the right to drive a vehicle; the sanctions of prohibiting the exercise of the right to drive a vehicle

... under the Constitution, inter alia, the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law, ensuring traffic safety, inter alia, road traffic safety, is the public interest. Therefore, the legislature must establish such traffic safety requirements that are necessary to ensure public order and the security of society, as well as human life and health, inter alia, it must establish the respective requirements for road users; among others, such requirements must also be laid down for persons seeking to acquire the right to drive vehicles that are related to, inter alia, their age, health condition, the knowledge of traffic safety rules, the ability to drive vehicles, and the behaviour of these persons. When establishing such requirements, the legislature must take into account, inter alia, the danger to traffic safety caused by road users under the influence of alcohol or drugs, as well as by road users committing gross and/or systematic violations of traffic rules. Thus, under the Constitution, inter alia, the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law, in order to ensure traffic safety, the legislature may establish such a legal regulation on granting the right to drive vehicles under which this right would not, for a certain period of time, be granted to persons who have committed the gravest violations of traffic rules, inter alia, who have repeatedly driven vehicles under the influence of alcohol or drugs or who have systematically grossly violated traffic rules.

... under the Constitution, inter alia, the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law, the law may establish sanctions of various types (administrative, criminal), inter alia, sanctions of prohibition, for the violations of law committed, inter alia, by road users under the influence of alcohol or drugs, as well as for gross and/or systematic violations of traffic rules; such sanctions of prohibition, inter alia, include the deprivation of the right to drive vehicles for a certain period of time.

It should be emphasised that, when establishing both the conditions for granting the right to drive vehicles and the sanctions of prohibiting the exercise of this right, the legislature must respect the imperatives of the consistency and coherence of the legal system, which arise from the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law, the requirements of reasonableness, justice, and proportionality, as well as the principle of non bis in idem, enshrined in Paragraph 5 of Article 31 of the Constitution.

3.2. CRIMINAL PROCEEDINGS

The administration of justice in criminal cases (Paragraph 1 of Article 109 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 8 May 2000

Paragraph 1 of Article 109 of the Constitution prescribes: "In the Republic of Lithuania, justice shall be administered only by courts."

The Constitutional Court notes that this provision in criminal procedure law means that a person may not be held guilty of having committed a crime, nor may he/she be subject to a criminal punishment otherwise than by a court judgment and under the law. Performing this function, a court must, during a trial, investigate the circumstances of a case comprehensively, thoroughly, and objectively and decide the case on its merits. It is only a court that may declare a person guilty and impose a punishment on him/her (Paragraph 1 of Article 31 of the Constitution).

Requirements for the laws governing criminal proceedings

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 19 September 2000

Criminal procedure laws must provide for such a procedure of criminal proceedings that would create the preconditions for the speedy and thorough detection of crimes and persons that committed them, for imprisoning guilty persons and, by applying penal laws properly, punishing them justly. An innocent person may not be held criminally liable and convicted.

In establishing the procedure for holding persons criminally liable and for imposing penalties for committed crimes, laws must also provide for the protection of the rights of a person charged with having committed a crime. In its 11 May 1999 ruling, the Constitutional Court noted that, "when guaranteeing the protection of the rights of individuals, it is necessary to pay regard to the fundamental principles of a state under the rule of law; such principles require that jurisdictional and other law-applying institutions be impartial and independent, that they seek to establish the objective truth, and that they adopt their decisions only on the grounds of law. This is possible only if the proceedings are public, the parties to the proceedings have equal rights, and the legal disputes, in particular those regarding the rights of a person, are decided by ensuring that a particular person has the right and possibility of defending those rights. In a state under the rule of law, the right of individuals to defend their rights is unquestionable". Thus, a person may not be declared guilty of having committed a crime, nor any criminal punishment may be imposed on a person without proper court proceedings enabling the accused to be aware of everything with which he/she is charged and on what grounds the accusations against him/her are founded, as well as allowing him/her to prepare and present evidence for his/her defence. This must be ensured by means of criminal procedure norms, which must be in conformity with the constitutional principles of lawfulness, the equality before the law and the court, the impartiality of courts and judges, and those of the public and fair consideration of cases. The participants of trials – the accuser, the accused, counsel for the defence, the victim and his/her representative, the civil plaintiff and the civil respondent and their representatives – must be guaranteed, by means of laws, the equal rights to present evidence, to take part in the investigation into evidence, and to submit pleas. Cases must be considered on the basis of the principle of adversarial argument.

Granting anonymity to witnesses and victims

The Constitution consolidates the protection of human rights, i.e. human life (Article 19), the inviolability of the human person (Article 21), the inviolability of property (Article 23), etc. Thus, a witness or a victim who gives his/her testimony must be properly protected by measures established in laws from any unlawful influence.

At the same time, it is in the interest of society and the state that the case of any indicted person is investigated in a fair manner. The Constitution guarantees that a person charged with committing a crime will have the right to a public and fair hearing of his/her case (Paragraph 2 of Article 31). Such a person must have the right to defend himself/herself from the charge. If the personal identity data of a witness or a victim are made secret, the implementation of the right of the accused to defence becomes more complex. This means that the norms of criminal procedure laying down the procedure for granting anonymity to witnesses and victims and that for the presentation of their testimony must balance the aforementioned rights.

The Constitutional Court notes that the anonymity of witnesses and victims is permissible only as an exceptional measure in cases where it is necessary to ensure their security and where the procedure for questioning anonymous witnesses and victims in a court hearing and the consideration and use of their evidence neither limit nor deny the constitutional right of an indicted person to defence or a fair investigation of a case.

Requirements for the legal regulation governing criminal proceedings; the constitutional general model of criminal proceedings and exceptions to this model

The obligation of the state, which stems from the Constitution, to ensure the security of each person and all society against criminal attempts implies not only the right and duty of the legislature to define criminal acts and establish criminal responsibility for them by means of laws, but also its right and duty to regulate the relationships connected with the detection and investigation of criminal acts and with the consideration of criminal cases, i.e. its right and duty to regulate criminal procedure relationships. Criminal procedure relationships must be regulated by means of a law in such a way that the legal preconditions would be created in order to speedily detect and thoroughly investigate criminal acts, to punish justly the persons who committed criminal acts (or, on the basis of the law, to decide the issue of their criminal responsibility otherwise), as well as that the legal preconditions would be created in order to ensure that no one who is innocent is punished. It is necessary to seek to ensure the protection of the rights of persons who suffered from criminal acts and to avoid any unreasonable restriction of the rights of persons who committed criminal acts. The legal regulation of criminal proceedings should not create any preconditions for delaying investigations into criminal acts and considering criminal cases, nor should it create any preconditions for participants of criminal proceedings for abusing their procedural or other rights. Otherwise, the constitutional obligations of the state to ensure by means of legal measures the security of each person and all society and the implementation of the legal order based on the constitutional values would become more difficult.

When regulating, by means of a law, criminal procedure relationships, the legislature has rather broad discretion. For instance, the legislature may establish, by means of a law, different types of criminal proceedings, as well as the particularities of criminal proceedings in the investigation of certain criminal acts and/or in the consideration of the criminal cases of individual categories, inter alia, different rules of pretrial investigation of certain criminal acts, the particularities of the legal status of the participants of criminal proceedings, etc.

However, when implementing the said discretion, the legislature must pay regard to the norms and principles of the Constitution, inter alia, the provisions of the Constitution ... that consolidate the equality of the rights of persons, the right to apply to a court, the right to a fair and impartial court, the independence of judges and courts when they administer justice, the duty of a judge to suspend the consideration of a case when he/she applies to the Constitutional Court, as well as the constitutional status of prosecutors.

For instance, as held by the Constitutional Court, the legal regulation of criminal proceedings must be based on the constitutional principles of lawfulness, the equality before the law and the court, the presumption of innocence, public and fair hearings of cases, the impartiality and independence of courts and judges, the separation of the functions of a court and other state institutions (officials) that participate in criminal proceedings, the guarantee of the right to defence, as well as on other principles (rulings of 5 February 1999, 8 May 2000, and 19 September 2000).

When the relationships of criminal procedure are regulated, it is also necessary to pay regard to the fact that the Constitution provides for the institutions of pretrial investigation, the consideration of criminal cases in a court, and upholding charges on behalf of the state in criminal cases. These constitutional institutions imply the following general constitutional model of criminal proceedings: a pretrial investigation and the consideration of a criminal case in a court are different stages in criminal proceedings; during a pretrial investigation, the necessary information is collected and assessed in order to decide whether the pretrial investigation must be continued and whether, after it has been completed, the respective criminal case must be referred to a court; in addition, the said information is collected and assessed in order to consider a case referred to a court and to resolve it in a fair manner; charges on behalf of the state are upheld in the course of considering a case in a court.

As such, the constitutional consolidation of the said general model of criminal proceedings does not eliminate the possibility of regulating criminal procedure relationships in a way that, in certain cases (especially when account is taken of the nature, dangerousness (gravity), scale, other characteristics of criminal acts, and other important circumstances), a pretrial investigation is not conducted and/or charges on behalf the state are not upheld in a court. Thus, the Constitution also does not prevent the legislative consolidation of such types of criminal proceedings that differ more or less from the general constitutional model of criminal proceedings. However, such types of criminal procedure should be treated as exceptions to the general constitutional model of criminal proceedings; their establishment must be constitutionally justifiable.

The right of access to a court in criminal proceedings (i.e. the right of persons to defend their rights in a court if they believe that their rights are violated because of a criminal act) (Paragraph 1 of Article 30 of the Constitution)

... the obligation of the state, which arises from the Constitution, to protect each person and all society against criminal attempts and the right of a person to the due process of law imply the right of each person to defend his/her rights in a court if he/she believes that his/her rights are violated because of a criminal act, as well as the duty of the state to ensure an effective mechanism of implementing this right of a person. The legislature has rather broad discretion in this sphere: the legislature can provide for the grounds according to which an investigation into a criminal act is launched, for the subjects (institutions) that launch an investigation into a criminal act, etc. ... the legislature, while regulating the relationships of criminal procedure and taking account of the nature, dangerousness (gravity), scale, other characteristics of criminal acts, as well as other significant circumstances, may consolidate such a legal regulation where an application (petition, statement, complaint, etc.) from a victim (or his/her representative) concerning a criminal act serves as sufficient grounds for commencing an investigation into such a criminal act. However, by establishing such a legal regulation, the legislature must not create any legal preconditions for denying the state obligation, which arises from the Constitution, inter alia, from the principle of a state under the rule of law, to protect each person and all society against criminal attempts, or any legal preconditions for artificially or unreasonably burdening the implementation of the right of a person to defend his/her rights in a court.

... the constitutional right of a person to apply to a court does not mean that the legislature cannot establish in procedural laws, inter alia, in the laws that regulate criminal procedure relationships, a certain procedure for applying to a court and certain formal requirements that must be complied with by applications filed with courts. It also needs to be noted that the constitutional right of a person to apply to a court also does not preclude the legislature from establishing formal requirements applicable to the application of a person subsequent to which an investigation into a criminal act or the consideration of a criminal case in a court can be commenced. As such, the establishment of such formal requirements does not mean that the constitutional right of a person to apply to a court has been artificially restricted or that the implementation of this right has been burdened unreasonably. However, when regulating the procedure for applying to a court and while establishing certain requirements that must be met by an application filed with a court, inter alia, the requirements applied to an application to a court subsequent to which an investigation into a criminal act or the consideration of a criminal case in a court is commenced, the legislature may not establish any such a legal regulation whereby the implementation of a certain constitutional right or legitimate interest of a person, inter alia, the right of a person to judicial protection, would be burdened unreasonably or its implementation would become impossible altogether. Otherwise, the Constitution would be violated, inter alia, the right of a person to judicial protection, as consolidated in Paragraph 1 of Article 30 of the Constitution, the right of a person and society, as stems from the principle of a state under the rule of law, to safety from criminal attempts, and the right of a person to the due process of law, would be infringed.

... under the Constitution, the legislature must regulate, by means of laws, criminal procedure relationships in such a way that the subjects of criminal procedure relationships who believe that their rights have been violated would have the right to defend their rights in a court regardless of their legal status in criminal proceedings. Otherwise, the preconditions would be created for violating the constitutional right of a person to judicial protection, thus, also Paragraph 1 of Article 30 of the Constitution.

In this context, it should also be noted that the legislature, when regulating criminal procedure relationships, may also establish such a legal regulation that would not allow any person to abuse the constitutional right to apply to a court where there are no grounds for such an application.

The powers of a court in criminal proceedings (Paragraph 1 of Article 109 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 16 January 2006

Under the Constitution, inter alia, Article 109 thereof, and under the principles of a state under the rule of law and justice, in the course of criminal proceedings, a court has the duty to make use of all possibilities in order to establish the objective truth in a criminal case and to adopt a just decision in respect of a person who is accused of committing a criminal act. Such a duty also applies to a court of first instance. The Constitutional Court has held that, in criminal procedure law, the provision of Paragraph 1 of Article 109 of the Constitution, whereby justice is administered only by courts, means that, inter alia, during a trial, a court of first instance, when carrying out this function, must thoroughly, fully, and objectively investigate all circumstances of a criminal case and decide the case on its merits (ruling of 5 February 1999).

... the necessity to protect the rights and legitimate interests of a person, also the fact that a court is a state institution that, when administering justice, helps the state to ensure the security of a person and all society from criminal attempts, determine certain powers of a court in criminal proceedings. In criminal proceedings, a court must be an impartial arbiter, who objectively assesses the data (evidence) in a criminal case regarding the circumstances of committing a criminal act and who adopts a fair decision concerning the guilt of a person accused of having committed the said criminal act; at the same time, in order to establish the objective truth, a court must take an active part in criminal proceedings – a court must define the limits of the consideration of a criminal case, must perform certain procedural actions, must ensure that persons participating in court proceedings do not abuse their rights or powers, and must resolve other issues related to the consideration of a criminal case in a court. While considering a criminal case, a court must act in such a way that the objective truth is established in a criminal case and the question of the guilt of a person accused of having committed a criminal act is fairly resolved. A court must also be equally just to all persons who participate in criminal proceedings.

Thus, the norms and principles consolidated in the Constitution, inter alia, the right of persons to a public and fair hearing of their case by an independent court, as consolidated in Paragraph 2 of Article 31 of the Constitution, as well as the principles of a state under the rule of law and justice, imply the model of a court as an institution administering justice where a court may not be understood as a “passive” observer of court proceedings and where the administration of justice may not depend solely on the material submitted to a court. Seeking to investigate all circumstances of a case objectively and comprehensively and to establish the truth in a case, a court has the powers either to perform procedural actions by itself or to assign certain institutions (officials), inter alia, the prosecutors, that they perform such actions.

The necessity, which arises from the Constitution, to follow the principles and norms of criminal procedure law in the course of investigating criminal cases

The constitutional right to a fair trial and to the due court process, when interpreted in the context of other provisions of the Constitution, means that, inter alia, during court proceedings, when a criminal case is investigated, the principles and norms of criminal proceedings must be followed (ruling of 10 June 2003).

The necessity, which arises from the Constitution, to follow the principles and norms of criminal procedure law in the course of investigating criminal cases does not mean that it is allowed to disregard other legal norms and principles, which do not belong to the criminal procedure, but which can be significant during the consideration of a certain criminal case. It should especially be emphasised that the duty to pay regard to the principles and norms of criminal procedure law during the consideration of a criminal case may not be interpreted as permitting raising the principles and norms of criminal procedure law or those of criminal proceedings above the principles and norms of the Constitution, or as permitting interpreting the principles and norms of criminal procedure law or those of criminal procedure in such a manner that the meaning of the provisions of the Constitution would be denied, distorted, or ignored, or as permitting opposing the principles and norms of criminal procedure law or those of criminal law, on the one hand, and the general principles of law, on the other hand. In the course of considering criminal cases, regard must be paid to the principles of justice, honesty, reasonableness, proportionality, lawfulness and other general principles of law, as for example res iudicata, nemo iudex in propria causa, audiatur et altera pars, ubi ius ibi remedium, onus probandi, impossibilium nulla obligatio est, etc. Regard must also be paid to the canons of the interpretation of law.

The powers of a court in criminal proceedings to assign the conduct of a pretrial investigation or the performance of separate procedural actions

It has been mentioned that a pretrial investigation and the consideration of a criminal case in a court are different stages in criminal proceedings; that, as such, the constitutional consolidation of the said general model of criminal proceedings does not eliminate the possibility of regulating criminal procedure relationships in a way that, in certain cases (especially when account is taken of the nature, dangerousness (gravity), scale, other characteristics of criminal acts, and other important circumstances), a pretrial investigation is not conducted; that the Constitution also does not prevent the legislative consolidation of such types of criminal proceedings that differ more or less from the general constitutional model of criminal proceedings; however, the establishment of any exceptions to this model must be constitutionally justifiable.

However, it is not permitted to oppose the constitutional general model of criminal procedure, under which a pretrial investigation and the consideration of a criminal case in a court are different stages of criminal proceedings, and such types of criminal proceedings where a pretrial investigation is not conducted. ... it needs to be noted that such legal situations are possible where, during the consideration of a criminal case in which no pretrial investigation was conducted, the issue of the necessity to conduct a pretrial investigation or to perform certain procedural actions arises.

The obligation of a court, which arises from the Constitution, to establish the objective truth and to solve a case justly implies that, if a court considers that, without a pretrial investigation or certain procedural actions where the conduct of such investigation or the performance of such actions in a court is impossible, it will not be able to examine a criminal case justly or to adopt a just decision (for example, because the information held by the court is insufficient, contradictory, etc.), the court must have the powers to decide that a pretrial investigation must be conducted or separate procedural actions must be performed in the respective case and certain subjects must be given instructions as appropriate; such court instructions must be compulsory to all persons (officials, institutions) to whom they are addressed.

A court decision to assign the conduct of a pretrial investigation and a court decision to assign the performance of separate procedural actions give rise to different legal effects.

In the case where a court decides to assign the conduct of a pretrial investigation, under the Constitution, the respective criminal case must be referred to the prosecutor – the official specified in Article 118 of the Constitution – with the exception of whom, under the Constitution, no one else can organise and direct a pretrial investigation. When organising and/or controlling a pretrial investigation upon the instruction of a court, the prosecutor must ensure that the instruction is carried out properly and on time and he/she acts as an amicus curiae. When a court adopts the decision to assign the conduct of a pretrial investigation, the consideration of the criminal case in a court is suspended until the pretrial investigation is over and, if there is the respective decision, until an indictment with the case material is referred to the court.

In the course of interpreting how instructions must be given in cases where a court decides to assign the performance of separate procedural actions (performance of which in a court is impossible), it needs to be noted that, in such a case, the legislature, under the Constitution, has broad discretion: it may establish, inter alia, a procedure according to which instructions to perform separate procedural actions are given and the respective institutions (officials) to which such court instructions are given. It needs to be noted that a court may also assign the establishments (officials) of pretrial investigation to perform separate procedural actions; this may not be interpreted as meaning that thereby a court directs a pretrial investigation. A law may also establish such a legal regulation under which a court has the powers to impose the obligation on prosecutors to exercise control over how such court instructions are performed. In cases where a court decides to assign certain officials or institutions to perform separate procedural actions, but not a whole pretrial investigation, the respective criminal case remains in that court.

When regulating the criminal procedure relationships connected with the court powers to give the said instructions, the legislature must pay regard to the Constitution, inter alia, the principles of a state under the rule of law, justice, and the separation of powers.

The Constitution, inter alia, the principles of a state under the rule of law, justice, and the separation of powers, which are consolidated therein, imply that a court, when giving the said instructions, must act in such a manner that would create no grounds to believe that the court is partial. In this context, it should be underlined that a court, when giving instructions to conduct a pretrial investigation or to perform separate procedural actions (performance of which in a court is impossible), may not indicate how such an instruction must be carried out, or what result is expected, etc.

Under the Constitution, the legislature must establish such a legal regulation under which it would be possible to ensure that the said instructions of a court (judge) are executed on time and properly.

The powers of a prosecutor to institute criminal proceedings concerning such acts for which persons are held liable only when there is an application filed by a victim (Paragraph 2 of Article 118 (wording of 20 March 2003) of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 15 June 2006

... the provision of Paragraph 2 of Article 118 of the Constitution, under which, in cases established under the law, prosecutors defend the rights and legitimate interests of the person, society, and the state, gives rise to the duty of the legislature to establish such a legal regulation that a prosecutor could and would have to defend the rights and legitimate interests of persons, society, and the state in reality: in all cases when the rights or legitimate interests of persons, society, or the state are violated, or when attempts are made to violate them, the effective defence and protection of such rights and legitimate interests, inter alia, against criminal attempts, must be ensured (ruling of 16 January 2006).

... the legislature has the discretion to stipulate that for certain criminal acts a person is held liable only in the case where there is an application (request, statement, complaint, etc.) of a victim (or his/her representative) concerning a criminal act, and that, in such cases, a pretrial investigation is not carried out and a prosecutor does not uphold charges on behalf of the state in a court (ruling of 16 January 2006); however, also in such cases, a prosecutor (who, under the Constitution, must, in cases provided for by means of laws, defend the rights and legitimate interests of persons, society, and the state) must, if it is provided for under the law, institute criminal proceedings even if there is no application (request, statement, complaint, etc.) of a victim (or his/her representative) concerning the respective criminal act; the said duty of a prosecutor to institute criminal proceedings is linked with the public importance of the respective act and/or to the fact that this act violated the rights of a person who, due to important reasons, cannot defend his/her rights and legitimate interests. The legislature may also establish, by means of a law, such a legal regulation that, for certain criminal acts, a person is held liable only in cases where there is an application (request, statement, complaint, etc.) of a victim (or his/her representative) concerning a criminal act, but a pretrial investigation is carried out in such a case, and the prosecutor upholds charges on behalf of the state in a court; in such a situation, the legislature may also establish the cases where a prosecutor must institute criminal proceedings, even though there is no application (request, statement, complaint, etc.) of a victim (or his/her representative); such a duty of a prosecutor is also linked with the public importance of the respective criminal act and/or to the fact that this act violated the rights of a person who, due to important reasons, cannot defend his/her rights and legitimate interests.

Summing up, it must be noted that, in all cases where criminal responsibility arises on the grounds of an application (request, statement, complaint, etc.) of a victim (or his/her representative) concerning a criminal act, the institution of a pretrial investigation and/or the emergence of criminal responsibility are linked with the fact how the respective criminal act or damage inflicted by it is assessed by a person whose rights and legitimate interests were violated; it is obvious that there is some subjectivity in such assessment. While the duty of a prosecutor to institute criminal proceedings concerning the said criminal acts (i.e. such acts for which a person is held liable only in cases where there is an application (request, statement, complaint, etc.) of a victim (or his/her representative)), the institution of a pretrial investigation and/or the emergence of criminal responsibility are related to the fact that the respective criminal act is of public importance or that this act violated the rights and legitimate interests of a person who, due to important reasons, cannot defend his/her rights and legitimate interests; even though in some of such cases, the decisions of a prosecutor, based on the assessment of all important circumstances, may depend on various factors, under the Constitution, the prosecutor has no discretion in this field. In this context, it should be emphasised that, as held by the Constitutional Court, the powers of prosecutors as state officials may not be defined in legal acts as their subjective right, which they can implement at their own discretion, i.e. such a right that they may use or may decide not to use; such powers are also duties that prosecutors not only may, but also must carry out if there are conditions for such duties established in laws (ruling of 16 January 2006).

... it needs to be emphasised that, under Paragraph 2 of Article 118 of the Constitution, prosecutors defend the rights and legitimate interests of persons, society, and the state namely in cases established by law; it has been mentioned that this provision gives rise to the duty of the legislature to establish such a legal regulation that a prosecutor could and would have to defend the rights and legitimate interests of persons, society, and the state in reality. ... the said provision implies such a legal regulation whereby the cases where a prosecutor has the powers to institute criminal proceedings must clearly be defined in the law.

The principle of the equality of persons in criminal procedure law and in criminal law

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 8 June 2009

... when criminal procedure relationships are regulated, regard must be paid to the constitutional principle of the equality of the rights of persons; the constitutional principle of the equality of the rights of persons must be followed in passing laws and in their implementation, as well as in the administration of justice; under the Constitution, the legal regulation must be such that participants in criminal proceedings who have the same procedural status (victims, persons suspected of committing criminal acts, the accused, witnesses, counsel for the defence, etc.) would be treated equally (ruling of 16 January 2006).

In this context, it also needs to be noted that the constitutional principle of the equality of rights must also be respected in cases where a law regulates the questions linked with the subjects of criminal responsibility. At the same time, it also needs to be noted that certain objective differences of subjects of criminal responsibility may also determine a differentiated legal regulation of their criminal responsibility. However, when establishing a differentiated legal regulation, regard must be paid to the norms and principles of the Constitution.

The right of access to a court in criminal proceedings (Paragraph 1 of Article 30 of the Constitution)

Under the Constitution, inter alia, Paragraph 1 of Article 30 thereof, in regulating criminal procedure relationships, the constitutional right of a person to apply to a court may not be violated in any respect; the legislature must, by means of law, regulate criminal procedure relationships in such a way that the subjects of criminal procedure relationships who believe that their rights are violated would have the right to defend their rights in a court regardless of their legal status in criminal proceedings; the legislature, when regulating criminal procedure relations, may also establish such a legal regulation that would not allow any person to abuse the constitutional right to apply to a court where there are no grounds for such an application (ruling of 16 January 2006).

... the legislature may establish various models for consideration of the complaints of persons participating at the stage of a pretrial investigation, inter alia, the ones who have suffered from a criminal act, or complaints regarding the actions or decisions of a prosecutor; however, the established legal regulation may not deny the constitutional right of such persons to apply to a court, inter alia, regarding the violation of their rights during a pretrial investigation. Under Paragraph 1 of Article 30 of the Constitution, a law must provide for the right of persons participating at the stage of a pretrial investigation, inter alia, the ones who have suffered from a criminal act, to file a complaint against the procedural actions and decisions of a prosecutor, inter alia, the refusal to institute a pretrial investigation in cases where such a refusal violates their rights.

It also needs to be noted that, under Paragraph 1 of Article 30 of the Constitution, when regulating the possibility for persons participating at the stage of pretrial investigation, inter alia, the ones who have suffered from a criminal act, to file a complaint against the actions and decisions relating to a pretrial investigation in criminal proceedings, the legislature may establish such a procedure under which it would be possible to file, with a higher court, a complaint against a court decision regarding the ruling of a prosecutor to refuse to institute a pretrial investigation. In doing so, the legislature must pay regard to the norms and principles of the Constitution.

A legal regulation governing procedural coercive measures applicable in criminal proceedings

... under the Constitution, implementing the duty of the state to ensure that every person and all society are protected from criminal attempts and taking account of its own obligation to regulate relationships in criminal proceedings, the legislature must, by means of a law, provide for such procedural coercive measures applicable in criminal proceedings that would enable the speedy disclosure and thorough investigation of criminal acts and would prevent new criminal acts. The law must establish such a procedure for applying the said measures that would ensure the protection of the rights of a person against whom such measures are applied, inter alia, that would create the preconditions for that person to defend his/her rights in a court in cases where his/her rights have been violated as a result of the application of these measures.

... when a procedure governing the application of procedural coercive measures in criminal proceedings is established in a law, regard must also be paid to the constitutional principle of proportionality: these measures must be applied only where they are aimed at the speedy disclosure and thorough investigation of criminal acts, or at preventing new criminal acts; such measures must be necessary to reach the aforesaid objectives and must not restrict the rights or freedoms of a person against whom the said measures are applied clearly more than necessary in order to reach the said objectives.

... the Constitution, inter alia, the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law, gives rise to the right of a person to the due and fair process of law in criminal proceedings; the said right implies, among other things, an active role of the subjects authorised to adopt decisions on procedural coercive measures applicable in criminal proceedings, inter alia, an active role of a court as an institution administering justice, in ensuring the protection of the rights of a person against whom the said measures are applied in criminal proceedings.

4. THE STATE AND ITS INSTITUTIONS

4.1. THE CONCEPT AND MISSION OF THE STATE

The concept and mission of the state

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 13 December 2004

The state is the organisation of all society (rulings of 25 November 2002, 4 March 2003, 30 September 2003, 3 December 2003, and 30 December 2003). The state, whose power covers all its territory, is the political organisation of all society; the mission of the state is to ensure human rights and freedoms and to guarantee the public interest (ruling of 30 December 2003). The imperative of social harmony is consolidated in the Constitution (rulings of 14 January 2002, 3 December 2003, and 5 March 2004). The state, when carrying out its functions, must act in the interests of all society (ruling of 4 March 2003). In order to guarantee the public interest of the entire national community – the civil Nation, the state must ensure that public administration is carried out and that public services are provided.

The performance of state functions

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 13 December 2004

The state performs its functions through the system of particular establishments, which comprise, first of all, state institutions; the state may also perform its functions to a certain extent through other (non-state) institutions, which are assigned (entrusted) according to laws with performing particular state functions, or which participate in performing state functions in particular forms and manner defined in laws. When stipulating, by means of a law, that particular functions to a certain extent may be performed not through the state, but other institutions, it is necessary to pay regard to the principles and norms of the Constitution.

The mission of the state to guarantee the public interest

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 21 September 2006

The Constitution consolidates the state as the common good of all society (rulings of 25 May 2004 and 19 August 2006). The mission of the state as a political organisation of all society is to ensure human rights and freedoms and to guarantee the public interest (rulings of 30 December 2003, 13 December 2004, 29 December 2004, and 16 January 2006). Each public interest may only be based on the fundamental social values that are consolidated, protected, and defended by the Constitution; the consolidation and guarantee, as well as the defence and protection, of such an interest are constitutionally reasoned. It has been held in the jurisprudence of the Constitutional Court that the implementation of the public interest, as an interest of society, which is recognised by the state and is protected by law, is one of the most important conditions of the existence and evolution of society itself (rulings of 6 May 1997 and 13 May 2005). On the other hand, the public interest, as a common interest of the state, all society or part of society, must be balanced with autonomous interests of individuals, because not only the public interest, but also the rights of persons are constitutional values (rulings of 6 May 1997 and 13 December 2004). These values – the protection and defence of the rights and legitimate interests of persons, and the public interest – which are consolidated in the Constitution, may not be opposed. A just balance must be ensured in this sphere.

At the same time, it needs to be noted that not any legitimate interest of a person or a group of persons should be regarded as a public interest, but only such that reflects and expresses the fundamental values consolidated, protected, and defended by the Constitution; these are, inter alia, the openness and harmony of society, the rights and freedoms of a person, the rule of law, etc. It is such an interest of society or part thereof that must be ensured and served by the state when it performs its functions, inter alia, such an interest must be ensured and served through courts, which decide cases under their competence.

Thus, every time when the question arises whether a certain interest should be considered a public one, it must be possible to reason that, without satisfying a certain interest of a person or a group of persons, certain values consolidated, protected, and defended by the Constitution would be violated. In situations where a decision on whether a certain interest has to be considered public and defended and protected as a public interest must be adopted by a court that considers a case, and it is necessary to reason such a decision in the respective court act. Otherwise, there would arise a reasonable doubt that what is protected and defended by a court as a public interest actually is not a public, but a private interest of a certain person.

It should be emphasised that the public interest is dynamic and subject to change (ruling of 8 July 2005). On the other hand, it is a very varied one. In fact, it is impossible to say a priori in which areas of life, concerning which legal disputes may arise or wherein the need may arise to apply law, threats for the public interest may occur or the need may arise to ensure the public interest by means of interference by public power institutions or officials.

The raison d'être of the state

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 24 September 2009

The Constitutional Court has held on more than one occasion that the state is the organisation of all society (rulings of 25 November 2002, 4 March 2003, 30 September 2003, 3 December 2003, and 30 December 2003). In its acts, the Constitutional Court has also held that: having adopted by referendum the Constitution, the highest-ranking legal act, the Lithuanian Nation formed the standardised basis for the common life of its own, as the national community – the civil Nation, and consolidated the state as the common good of all society; the Constitution is based on universal, unquestionable values, inter alia, respect for law and the rule of law, a limitation on the scope of powers, the duty of state institutions to serve the people and their responsibility for society, justice, striving for an open, just, and harmonious society and a state under the rule of law, as well as the recognition of and respect for human rights and freedoms (rulings of 25 May 2004 and 19 August 2006). In the Constitutional Court's ruling of 19 August 2006, it was also held that one of the most important obligations of a democratic state based on law and justice is to respect, defend, and protect the values, as well as human rights and freedoms, upon which the Constitution itself adopted by the Nation is based and whose actual consolidation, defence and protection is the raison d'être of the state itself; otherwise, it would not be possible to regard the state as the common good of all society.

4.2. STATE INSTITUTIONS

State institutions and their system

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 13 December 2004

The system of state institutions comprises very diverse state institutions. The diversity of state institutions, their legal status and powers are determined by a variety of functions performed by the state, the particularities of managing the general affairs of society, the organisational and financial capacity of the state, the content and expediency of the policy implemented during a concrete period of life of society and the development of the state, international obligations of the state, as well as other factors. The Seimas, which has the constitutional powers to establish and liquidate state institutions, as well as to establish their legal status and powers, is bound by the Constitution.

It is worth emphasising that the notion “state institutions” is employed in the Constitution (Article 8, Paragraph 1 of Article 29, Paragraph 1 of Article 61, Item 5 of Article 67, and Paragraph 1 of Article 104 of the Constitution). The Constitution also mentions “institutions of control” (Paragraph 3 of Article 73 of the Constitution), a “special institution of judges, as provided for by law”, which advises the President of the Republic on the appointment, promotion, and transfer of judges or their release from duties (Paragraph 5 of Article 112 of the Constitution), “institutions of state power and governance” (Paragraph 1 of Article 114 of the Constitution), and “self-government institutions” (Paragraph 3 of Article 119 of the Constitution). In the Constitution, the notion “institution” also has a broader meaning: it also denotes the name of non-governmental institutions in regard to which particular restrictions, similar to those expressis verbis established in regard to the state and/or its institutions (Paragraph 2 of Article 44 and Paragraph 4 of Article 89 of the Constitution), are established in the Constitution.

When systematically interpreting the aforementioned formulations of the Constitution, it is obvious that the notion “state institutions” is of a general type and it comprises various state institutions through which the state performs its functions. It has been mentioned that state institutions comprise a system. This system of state institutions is consolidated in legal acts of diverse legal force. Some state institutions are expressis verbis specified in the Constitution. Other state institutions, according to the Constitution, must be established by means of a law. The need to establish any other state institutions originates from the necessity to implement state governance, to administer national affairs, and to ensure the performance of various state functions – state institutions must be organised in order to perform such functions, although their establishment is not explicitly provided for in the Constitution.

Various state institutions are expressis verbis specified in the Constitution: the Seimas; the President of the Republic; the Government; the Constitutional Court; the Supreme Court, the Court of Appeal, regional and district courts; Seimas Ombudsmen; the National Audit Office; the Bank of Lithuania; the State Defence Council; the Commander of the Armed Forces; the Office of the Prosecutor General; the Central Electoral Commission. Some state institutions are consolidated in the Constitution without specifying their exact names: ministries; security service; a special institution of judges, as provided for by law, which advises the President of the Republic on the appointment, promotion, and transfer of judges or their release from duties; territorial prosecutor’s offices; the representatives of the Government, who supervise whether municipalities observe the Constitution and laws and whether they execute government decisions. The institutions that may be founded by means of laws adopted by the Seimas are also provided for in the Constitution: institutions of control; establishments of the Government; specialised courts established for the consideration of administrative, labour, family, and cases of other categories.

The institutions executing state power (Paragraph 1 of Article 5 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court’s ruling of 13 December 2004

Some state institutions are treated in the Constitution as state institutions that execute state power. They are specified in Paragraph 1 of Article 5 of the Constitution, which states that, in Lithuania, state power is executed by the Seimas, the President of the Republic and the Government, and the judiciary. The relations between the Seimas (executing legislative power), the President of the Republic and the Government (institutions of executive power), and the judiciary (executing judicial power) are based on the constitutional principle of the separation of powers.

The Seimas, the representation of the Nation, executes legislative power and is the only legislative institution in Lithuania. The Constitution directly provides that the Seimas has the powers to establish certain state institutions by law. According to Item 5 of Article 67 of the Constitution, the Seimas establishes state institutions provided for by law, and appoints and releases their heads. When interpreting the legal regulation established in Article 67 of the Constitution, the Constitutional Court has held that the said item means, inter alia, that the Seimas has the powers to provide in a law for the state institutions the heads of which are appointed and released by the Seimas itself, and that the Seimas has the powers to appoint and release the heads of such institutions (ruling of 24 January 2003).

The foundations of the system of the institutions of executive power, as well as the powers of the supreme institutions of executive power, are established in the Constitution. The constitutional order of the State of Lithuania is based on the model of dual executive power: the executive power in Lithuania is exercised by the President of the Republic – the Head of State and by the Government.

The President of the Republic is part of executive power (rulings of 10 January 1998, 21 December 1999, and 30 December 2003). Article 77 of the Constitution provides that the President of the Republic is the Head of State (Paragraph 1); he/she represents the State of Lithuania and performs everything with which he/she is charged by the Constitution and laws (Paragraph 2). The President of the Republic, implementing the powers vested in him/her, issues acts-decrees (Article 85 of the Constitution). It should be emphasised that, under Item 2 of Article 94 of the Constitution, the Government executes, inter alia, the decrees of the President of the Republic.

The Government is a collegial institution of executive power (ruling of 10 January 1998). Article 91 of the Constitution provides that the Government of the Republic of Lithuania consists of the Prime Minister and ministers; under Paragraph 1 of Article 98 of the Constitution, ministers, inter alia, head their respective ministry. According to Item 3 of Article 94 of the Constitution, the Government coordinates the activities of the ministries and other establishments of the Government. The Constitution specifies only one position of a minister – the Minister of National Defence (Paragraph 1 of Article 140 of the Constitution); therefore, according to the Constitution, the Ministry of National Defence may not be absent in Lithuania. When interpreting the legal regulation established in Item 3 of Article 94 of the Constitution, in its ruling of 23 November 1999, the Constitutional Court held that the Constitution does not reveal what establishments are considered “establishments of the Government”; moreover, the Constitution does not specify what legal status of the aforementioned government establishments is. It is the legislature exercising the discretion in this area (limited by the Constitution) that must establish this. On the other hand, certain government institutions are specified in the Constitution; for example, the institution of the representative of the Government, which has the power to supervise whether municipalities observe the Constitution and laws, and whether they execute the decisions of the Government, is consolidated in Paragraphs 2 and 3 of Article 123 of the Constitution. In this context, it should also be mentioned that Paragraph 1 of Article 123 of the Constitution provides that, at higher-level administrative units, governance is organised by the Government according to the procedure established by law; thus, the legislature has the duty not only to establish higher-level administrative units, but also to provide for the government institutions through which the Government would organise governance at higher-level administrative units.

It should be mentioned that the powers of the President of the Republic and those of the Government, as two branches of dual executive power, are autonomous and independent of each other. On the other hand, the Constitution expressis verbis specifies such powers of the President of the Republic and those of the Government that should be jointly implemented by the President of the Republic and the Government. For instance, Article 85 of the Constitution, inter alia, prescribes: “To be valid, the decrees issued by the President of the Republic for the purposes specified in Items 3, 15, 17, and 21 of Article 84 of the Constitution must be signed by the Prime Minister or an appropriate Minister.” According to Item 1 of Article 84 of the Constitution, the President of the Republic, inter alia, together with the Government, conducts foreign policy. It should also be noted that, while paying regard to the Constitution, a law may also provide for such a legal regulation that certain state institutions would be established under the President of the Republic, the Head of State.

Judicial power is executed by courts. In the Republic of Lithuania, the implementation of justice is within the competence of judicial power.

Paragraph 1 of Article 102 of the Constitution stipulates that the Constitutional Court decides whether the laws and other acts of the Seimas are in conflict with the Constitution and whether the acts of the President of the Republic and the Government are in conflict with the Constitution and laws. The Constitutional Court ensures the supremacy of the Constitution in the legal system and administers constitutional justice.

Paragraph 1 of Article 111 of the Constitution states that the courts of the Republic of Lithuania are the Supreme Court of Lithuania, the Court of Appeal of Lithuania, regional courts, and district courts. These courts constitute the system of courts of general jurisdiction.

Paragraph 2 of Article 111 of the Constitution provides that, for the consideration of administrative, labour, family, and cases of other categories, specialised courts may be established.

In its rulings, the Constitutional Court has on more than one occasion emphasised the independence of judicial power from legislative power and executive power; it has also stressed the fact that judicial power is a fully fledged branch of state power.

State institutions not categorised as belonging to legislative power, executive power, or judicial power

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 13 December 2004

Other state institutions that do not belong to the legislative, executive, or judicial branches, under Paragraph 1 of Article 5 of the Constitution, are also specified in the Constitution.

For instance, under the Constitution, such institutions and/or officials are the Seimas Ombudsmen (Paragraph 1 of Article 73), the Office of the Prosecutor General and territorial prosecutor's offices (Article 118), the National Audit Office (Chapter XII), the Bank of Lithuania (Articles 125 and 126), the Security Service (Item 14 of Article 84), the Commander of the Armed Forces (Item 14 of Article 84 and Paragraphs 1 and 3 of Article 140), and the Central Electoral Commission (Item 13 of Article 67).

Item 5 of Article 67 of the Constitution provides that the Seimas establishes state institutions provided for by law and appoints their heads; Paragraph 1 of Article 94 provides that the Government manages national affairs; Paragraph 1 of Article 123 provides that, at higher-level administrative units, governance is organised by the Government according to the procedure established by law.

Therefore, the Seimas, as well as, according to laws, the Government, has the powers to establish such state institutions that are not expressis verbis specified in the Constitution where the need for establishing which arises from the necessity to implement state governance, to manage national affairs, and to ensure the performance of various state functions.

The system of institutions performing state functions

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 13 December 2004

The functions of the state as the organisation of all society, where the state has to act in the interests of all society in a way that ensures social harmony, are interrelated; they comprise a single system and may not be opposed. Therefore, state institutions through which the said functions are performed may not be opposed, either.

It is also worth noting that it is not allowed to create opposition between state institutions and such other (non-state) institutions that, according to laws and paying regard to the Constitution, are assigned to perform (entrusted with performing) particular state functions or participate in the performance of state functions in certain forms and manner defined in laws, i.e. they carry out public administration and/or provide public services. Since they are institutions that carry out public administration and/or provide public services and, thus, guarantee the public interest, they comprise a single system. ... both state and municipal institutions – the two systems of public power that are established in the Constitution and, as mentioned before, each of them performs characteristic functions, but still are related to each other – belong to this system. According to the Constitution, it is necessary to establish such a legal regulation that would ensure systemic correlation and interaction among institutions carrying out public administration and/or providing public services and, thus, guaranteeing the public interest, where the said interaction would include, inter alia, the rational proportion of their competence, efficiency, professional skills, the transfer of knowledge, skills, and experience of persons employed in the said institutions, as well as the continuity of the said activity when performing state functions and guaranteeing the public interest.

The differentiation of institutions performing state functions (civil and military institutions)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 13 December 2004

Interconnections among state institutions, as well as interaction between state institutions and municipal institutions, do not deny their specific characteristics. The content of each state function and circumstances of performing such functions lead to the situation that state institutions performing these functions differ in terms of their status and character of their activity.

Some functions of the state are fulfilled, primarily or mainly, through civil state (and municipal) institutions, whereas others are performed through military and/or paramilitary state institutions. In its ruling of 24 December 2002, the Constitutional Court held that, under the Constitution, civil service is regarded as separate from military service, paramilitary service, or security service. The Constitution consolidates a differentiated concept of civil state institutions and military state institutions. The said concept creates the legal preconditions for establishing, by means of legal acts, a differentiated regulation of relationships connected with the activities of civil state institutions and military and paramilitary state institutions, as well as for establishing such a legal status of persons working in civil, military, or paramilitary state institutions that is distinguished by certain particularities.

The constitutional requirement that state power in Lithuania must be organised in a democratic manner and that a democratic political regime must be in place in the country, the constitutional imperative of an open, just, and harmonious civil society, the constitutional principle of responsible governance, and other provisions of the Constitution mean that military and paramilitary state institutions may not have priority over civil state institutions, that decisions made by military and paramilitary institutions and their officials must be based on decisions adopted by civil state institutions, and that military state institutions must be accountable to civil state institutions and must be controlled by civil state institutions. Democratic civil control over military and paramilitary state institutions (including the armed forces) is a necessary precondition for civil democratic governance, thus, also that for a state under the rule of law.

Persons working at institutions that perform state functions (state officials who perform their functions in implementing state power and state servants)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 13 December 2004

State and municipal institutions are in charge of public administration and/or provide public services through persons who are employed in such institutions and adopt the respective decisions. ... the Constitution consolidates a different status of persons employed in the institutions through which state functions are performed.

Some persons – members of the Seimas, the President of the Republic, members of the Government, and judges – perform their functions when executing state power; they perform these functions independently; for this purpose, respective powers, which may be exercised only by the said persons and nobody else, are established for them in the Constitution and laws. Members of municipal councils perform their functions when implementing the self-government right of territorial communities – under the powers established for them by law, members of municipal councils implement the functions of self-government independently. The fact that other persons employed in the institutions through which state functions are performed render assistance to the said persons, provide them with support in another way, or provide them with services needed in their activity, does not mean that these other persons perform any functions when executing state power.

... the institutions executing state power are listed in Paragraph 1 of Article 5 of the Constitution – they are the Seimas, the President of the Republic and the Government, and the judiciary. The Constitutional Court has held in its rulings that, where state officials perform their functions while observing the Constitution and law and acting in the interests of the Nation and the State of Lithuania, they must be protected against any pressure and unjustified interference with their activities, and, where they conscientiously perform their duties, they must not be subject to any threats directed against their person, rights, or freedoms (rulings of 25 May 2004 and 1 July 2004). In order that they might be able to perform the functions prescribed for them in the Constitution in the course of implementing state power, the Constitution provides for a special legal status for the President of the Republic, the members of the Seimas, the members of the Government, and judges, which, inter alia, includes the limitations on work, remuneration, and political activities, as well as a special procedure for removal from office or for the revocation of a mandate and/or immunities, i.e. the inviolability of the person and the special procedure for applying criminal and/or administrative responsibility (ruling of 24 December 2002). Under the Constitution, no other persons employed in the institutions through which state functions are performed enjoy the aforementioned immunities. On the other hand, a special – constitutional – responsibility is established in the Constitution for the majority of the said state officials. The state officials who perform their functions in executing state power also differ in this regard from all other persons employed at the institutions through which state functions are performed.

The other persons employed at the institutions through which state functions are performed constitute the body of state servants. State service is a professional activity of these persons; the said activity is related to guaranteeing the public interest.

The principle of responsible governance

The Constitutional Court's conclusion of 10 November 2012

The principle of responsible governance, as consolidated in the Constitution, implies that all state institutions and officials ... are obliged to follow the Constitution and law while performing their functions and must properly implement the powers granted to them by the Constitution and laws by acting in the interests of the Nation and the State of Lithuania (conclusion of 26 October 2012).

4.3. STATE SERVICE

State servants

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 13 December 2004

State and municipal institutions are in charge of public administration and/or provide public services through persons who are employed in such institutions and adopt the respective decisions. ... the Constitution consolidates a different status of persons employed in the institutions through which state functions are performed.

The other persons employed at the institutions through which state functions are performed constitute the body of state servants. State service is a professional activity of these persons; the said activity is related to guaranteeing the public interest. In terms of content, the notion “state service”, which is employed in the Constitution, is identical to the notion “public service”. The Constitution consolidates such a concept of state service that is inseparably linked with the mission of the state as the organisation of all society to ensure human rights and freedoms and to guarantee the public interest. Professional state servants adopt decisions when carrying out public administration and/or providing public services (or participate in drafting and executing these decisions, coordinating and/or controlling the implementation thereof, etc.); however, they (unlike the members of the Seimas, the President of the Republic, the members of the Government, or judges) do not perform any functions when implementing state power and, under the Constitution, they may not have such powers. Thus, the notion “state service” employed in the Constitution does not include the office of a member of the Seimas, the President of the Republic, the Prime Minister or a minister, or that of a judge.

In this context, it should be held that the notion “state service” does not include members of municipal councils, i.e. local authority institutions, either.

The professional activity of state servants must be remunerated from the state (municipal) budget.

In this context, it is worth mentioning that the Constitution does not provide any preconditions for treating in legal acts all persons who are employed at state or municipal institutions and whose activity is remunerated from the state (municipal) budget as state servants only on the basis of the fact that they are employed at the aforementioned institutions or that their activity is remunerated from the state (municipal) budget. Only such persons may be considered state servants who are employed at state or municipal institutions and who adopt decisions when carrying out public administration and/or providing public services (or participate in drafting and executing such decisions, coordinating and/or controlling the execution thereof, etc.).

It should also be noted that, under the Constitution, such activity where persons participate in performing state (or municipal) functions when not being employed at state or municipal institutions may not be considered state service, either.

Laws and other legal acts must establish such a legal status of state servants that would be in line with the constitutional concept of state service as a special system of professional activity (remunerated from state (municipal) budget) when adopting decisions in the area of public administration and/or providing public services (or participation in drafting and executing such decisions, coordinating and/or controlling the execution thereof, etc.). The said concept implies, inter alia, the internal mobility of state service as a system, the transfer of knowledge, skills, and experience of persons employed in the said institutions, as well as the continuity of the said activity when performing state functions and guaranteeing the public interest.

The constitutional concept of state service

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 13 December 2004

The legislature has broad discretion in choosing and consolidating in laws a certain model of organising state service. However, it should be stressed that, when regulating the relationships of state service, the legislature is bound by the constitutional concept of state service and must pay regard to the norms and principles of the Constitution. According to their competence, other law-making subjects must also have regard to the constitutional concept of state service when regulating the relationships of state service.

The Constitution mentions state service expressis verbis exclusively in Paragraph 1 of Article 33 of the Constitution, which provides that citizens have the right to participate in the governance of their state both directly and through their democratically elected representatives, as well as the right to enter on equal terms the state service of the Republic of Lithuania, and in Article 141 of the Constitution, which provides that persons performing actual military service or alternative service, as well as the officers of the national defence system, the police, and the interior, non-commissioned officers, re-enlistees, and other paid officials of paramilitary and security services who are not retired to the reserve, may not be members of the Seimas or members of municipal councils, and may not hold any elective or appointive office in civil state service, or participate in the activities of political parties or organisations.

State service is a professional activity of state servants; the said activity is related to guaranteeing the public interest. The fact that the mission of state service is to guarantee, when state and municipal institutions are in charge of public administration and provide public services, the public interest rather than private interests of the employees engaged in this activity, determines a special procedure of forming the body of state servants, the specifics of their legal status, and their special responsibility to the public for performing the functions commissioned to them.

The legal relationships of state service are legal relationships between a state servant and the state, which acts as the employer of the said person. Still, despite similarities, the legal relationships of state service are not identical to such employment relationships that arise between an employee who is not a state servant and his/her employer (irrespective of whether such relationships arise in state institutions, municipal institutions, or other enterprises, establishments, and organisations). Their legal statuses are different.

Requirements for state service

The constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law, the constitutional imperatives of justice and social harmony, the striving for civil society, the constitutional principle of responsible governance, as well as the principles consolidated in the Constitution, such as the principles that the State of Lithuania is an independent democratic republic, that the State of Lithuania is created by the Nation, that the sovereignty belongs to the Nation, that the scope of powers is limited by the Constitution, and that state institutions serve the people, the recognition of the innate nature of human rights and freedoms, as well as other constitutional imperatives, imply various constitutional requirements for state service as a system, which comprises the professional activity of persons employed at state or municipal institutions when adopting decisions in the course of carrying out public administration and/or providing public services (or participating in drafting and executing such decisions, coordinating and/or controlling the execution thereof, etc.) and thus guaranteeing the public interest in the entire state.

Requirements for state service: the uniformity of the system of state service

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 13 December 2004

Since the constitutional concept of state service as a system, where such a system comprises the professional activity of persons employed at state or municipal institutions when adopting decisions in carrying out public administration and/or providing public services (or participating in drafting and executing such decisions, coordinating and/or controlling the execution thereof, etc.) and, thus, ensuring the public interest in the entire state, implies the necessity to establish such a legal regulation that would ensure systemic correlations and interaction among all aforementioned institutions, where such interaction includes, inter alia, the transfer of knowledge, skills, and experience of persons employed in the said institutions, as well as the continuity of the said activity when performing state functions and ensuring the public interest; therefore, under the Constitution, the system of state service, which is consolidated in laws and other legal acts, must be of a uniform type. Thus, one of the elements of the constitutional concept of state service and, at the same time, one of the requirements that must be observed when organising state service and regulating the relationships of state service is the uniformity of the system of state service. Taking account of the variety of state functions, which are implemented through particular institutions, the uniformity of the system of state service does not deny the possibility of regulating certain relationships of state service in a differentiated manner.

The chosen model of the system of state service, as well as the foundations of its organisation and functioning, must be established by means of a law.

It is worth noting that “municipal service” is not separately mentioned in the Constitution. The constitutional concept of state service comprises relationships not only at state institutions, but also at municipal institutions; in this ruling of the Constitutional Court, it has been held that the notion “state service”, which is employed in the Constitution, is identical to the notion “public service”. The uniform system of state service is a necessary precondition for the effective interaction between state governance and local self-government, as the two systems of public power, and a necessary precondition for not leading to a clash of, but for ensuring the compatibility of, the public interest of the entire national community – the civil Nation and the public interest of territorial communities and municipalities.

It is also worth noting that only the uniform system of state service ensures its internal mobility and the possibility of the expedient arrangement of human and other resources necessary for performing certain state functions or solving other issues, which occur in the state.

The uniformity of the system of state service, comprising service at both state and municipal institutions, is an important condition of the uninterrupted and continued functioning of the system of state service. The Constitutional Court has held that, under the Constitution, there may not be any such legal situations where a certain institution exercising state power fails to function (ruling of 1 July 2004). The same can also be said about other state and municipal institutions through which state functions are performed. Thus, all state and municipal institutions must act without interruptions. This means that the functioning of state service as a system must also be continuous in order to carry out public administration constantly and effectively and to provide public services in the entire state by guaranteeing the public interest.

Requirements for state service: the possibility of a differentiated regulation

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 13 December 2004

... the uniformity of the system of state service does not deny the possibility of regulating certain relationships of state service in a differentiated manner. Such differentiation is possible in view of the fact that, under the Constitution, it is necessary to ensure an effective performance of state functions and to guarantee the public interest. A differentiated legal regulation of the relationships of state service is based on the particularities of state (municipal) institutions and the functions performed by them, the place of the said institutions in the system of all institutions through which state functions are performed, the powers established for them, the professional skills necessary for certain state servants, as well as on other important factors.

For instance ... a differentiated concept of state civil institutions, as well as of state military and paramilitary institutions, is consolidated in the Constitution, and ... this fact creates the legal preconditions for establishing, by means of legal acts, a differentiated regulation of the relationships connected with the activities of civil state institutions and military and paramilitary state institutions, as well as for establishing such a legal status of persons working in civil and military and paramilitary state institutions that is distinguished by certain particularities.

State service relationships may also be regulated in a differentiated manner in view of the fact whether such service is service at state or municipal institutions, and whether particular state institutions, under the Constitution, are categorised as belonging to the legislative, executive, or judicial branches or to none of them. Various criteria may serve as the grounds for a differentiated regulation of state service relationships: state functions performed through a particular state (municipal) institution, the competence of an institution, the scope of activity, the size of an institution, the territory covered by the activity thereof, etc.

The grounds for differentiating a legal regulation of state service relationships may also be the fact that state service as a system is organised on the basis of, inter alia, the principles of hierarchy and accountability. The establishment of a hierarchy or other classification, grouping into categories, etc. of positions of state servants must be unified and based on the same criteria; it is not allowed that individual state institutions or individual branches of state power establish each for itself a separate system of categories (classification) of positions of state servants where such a system is not based on criteria that are established by law and are common to entire state service. When establishing such a uniform system, it is essential to pay regard to the principle of the separation of powers, which implies, inter alia, that all the branches of state power – legislative, executive, and judicial – are equal in their state status. Concrete positions of state servants may be assigned to a certain category (type) only according to this uniform system; however, this must be done when paying regard to the particularities of each institution and each position, particular functions performed and responsibility taken by state servants, as well as to other factors.

Still, it should be stressed that, under the Constitution, it is not permitted to create such a legal regulation according to which state service at certain state (municipal) institutions (a certain level of the system of state service) would be eliminated from the general system of state service, or such a legal regulation that would consolidate a privileged status of state servants of certain institutions, or vice versa, their discrimination in regard to state servants of analogous institutions. For instance, in its ruling of 2 July 2002, the Constitutional Court held that “the relationships of the organisation of the national defence system and military service have their particularities” and that “taking account of these particularities, it is permitted to establish, by means of a law, various ways of resolving disputes over violations of rights and freedoms, including a prelitigation procedure for settling such disputes”; however, “the particularities of the relationships of the organisation of the national defence system and military service may not deny the constitutional right of persons to apply to a court to defend their rights and freedoms”.

Requirements for state service: loyalty to the State of Lithuania and its constitutional order

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 13 December 2004

Under the Constitution, state service is service to the State of Lithuania and the civil Nation; therefore, state service should be loyal to the State of Lithuania and its constitutional order. It must be organised in such a way that only the people who are loyal to the State of Lithuania and its constitutional order adopt decisions when carrying out public administration and providing public service (or participate in drafting and executing these decisions, coordinating and/or controlling the execution thereof, etc.) at state or municipal institutions. The Constitution does not tolerate such situations where a certain level of the system of state service, a certain state or municipal institution, or individual state servants acts contrary to the interests of the State of Lithuania or violates the constitutional order of the State of Lithuania.

It should be noted that the constitutional imperative of the loyalty of state service to the State of Lithuania also gives rise to special requirements. State servants not only must not violate the Constitution and laws themselves, but also bear the duty to take all necessary positive actions when protecting the constitutional order of the State of Lithuania. In this context, it should be noted that Paragraph 2 of Article 3 of the Constitution provides that the Nation and each citizen have the right to resist anyone who encroaches on the independence, territorial integrity, and constitutional order of the State of Lithuania by force; Article 8 of the Constitution prescribes that the seizure of state power or state institutions by force is considered anti-constitutional actions, which are unlawful and invalid; Paragraph 1 of Article 139 of the Constitution stipulates that the defence of the State of Lithuania against a foreign armed attack is the right and duty of each citizen of the Republic of Lithuania. In its ruling of 23 November 1999, the Constitutional Court held the following: “The constitutional order of the Republic of Lithuania is based on the priority of the rights and freedoms of individuals and citizens as the ultimate value, as well as on the principles establishing the sovereignty of the Nation, the independence and territorial integrity of the state, democracy, the republic as the form of government, the separation of powers, their independence and balance, local self-government, etc. The protection of the constitutional order means that it is not permitted that the social, economic, and political relationships established in the Constitution, which constitute the foundations of the life of individuals, society, and the state, be encroached upon.” In the said Constitutional Court’s ruling, it was also held that “the Constitution does not establish the function of protecting the constitutional order for a single institution of state power. This is a constitutional obligation of all the institutions of state power (Seimas, the President of the Republic, the Government, the judiciary) and other state establishments and organisations. This obligation derives not only from particular laws, but also from the principle of a state under the rule of law, which is established in the Constitution, and the requirement that the Constitution must be followed, enforced, not violated, and protected. Of course, every state institution protects the constitutional order only by means of the forms of the activity characteristic of it and only on the grounds of the powers granted to it by the Constitution and laws.”

Requirements for state service: to obey the Constitution and law

State service must act only by obeying the Constitution and law. Every state or municipal institution through which state functions are performed, as well as every state servant, must pay regard to the requirements of lawfulness. State servants must not abuse the powers established for them and must not violate requirements of legal acts. In its ruling of 30 June 2000, the Constitutional Court held that state institutions and officials are obligated to protect and defend human rights and freedoms; it is very important that, while fulfilling the functions entrusted to them, state institutions and officials themselves not violate human rights and freedoms. Under the Constitution, the legislature has the duty to regulate state service relations, and the system of state service should function in such a manner that not only responsibility would be established for violations committed while in state service, but also persons who committed violations while in state service would actually be held liable.

The Constitution guarantees the right for every citizen to appeal against decisions adopted by state institutions or their officials (Paragraph 2 of Article 33 of the Constitution). Complaints of citizens about the abuse of authority or bureaucratic intransigence by state and municipal officials (with the exception of judges) are examined by the Seimas Ombudsmen; they have the right to submit a proposal before a court for dismissing the guilty officials from office (Paragraph 1 of Article 73 of the Constitution). The observance of the Constitution and laws and the execution of the decisions of the Government by municipalities are supervised by the representatives appointed by the Government (Paragraph 2 of Article 123 of the Constitution). Paragraph 1 of Article 134 of the Constitution provides that the National Audit Office supervises the lawfulness of the possession and use of state-owned property and the execution of the state budget.

It is worth mentioning in this context that Paragraph 2 of Article 30 of the Constitution provides that compensation for material and moral damage inflicted on a person is established by law. When interpreting the legal regulation laid down in Paragraph 2 of Article 30 of the Constitution, the Constitutional Court held that this paragraph “provides for the duty of the legislature to pass a law or laws providing for compensation for damage for a person who sustained material or moral damage”, that “laws must provide for the actual defence of violated human rights and freedoms”, that “such defence must be combined with the protection of other values enshrined in the Constitution”, and that “the Constitution guarantees the right of an individual to compensation for material or moral damage, including the recovery of damage under judicial procedure” (ruling of 30 June 2000). In the Constitutional Court’s ruling of 20 January 1997, it is held that “the necessity to compensate for material and moral damage inflicted on a person is a constitutional principle”, which “must be considered in the law-making activity”, and that Paragraph 2 of Article 30 of the Constitution “clearly indicates the form of a legal act whereby compensation for material and moral damage must be regulated” – this must be done by means of a law.

On the other hand, state servants must not experience unreasonable interference in their activity, and they must be protected from any unlawful pressure or unlawful requirements (including unlawful pressure by and unlawful requirements of state or municipal politicians). State servants may not be commissioned unlawful assignments or instructions, and state servants may not carry out such assignments or instructions and may not in any other way be forced to obey them.

Requirements for state service: to have regard to the principles of the separation of powers and the limitation on the scope of powers

The state service system must be organised and must function strictly according to the constitutional principles of the separation of powers and the limitation on the scope of powers.

When paying regard to the constitutional principle of the separation of powers, respective powers must be assigned to every institution (as a certain level of the system of state service) of the branches (legislative, executive, judicial) of state power. Laws must consolidate such a model of organising state service where every institution has a clearly defined competence, and disputes (if any) between them (or between state servants) related to competence are settled on the basis of law and in accordance with a legal procedure.

The constitutional principle of the separation of powers is also inseparable from the provision of Paragraph 2 of Article 5 of the Constitution, whereby the scope of powers is limited by the Constitution, which is binding not only on the institutions of state power specified in Paragraph 1 of Article 5 of the Constitution, but also on other institutions that enjoy authoritative empowerments, but are not categorised as belonging to the legislative, the executive, or the judicial branch, including the state servants employed at these institutions, too. In this context, it should be noted that, as already held by the Constitutional Court, if such a legal regulation were established where not only the powers of the institution of state power that is pointed out in Paragraph 1 of Article 5 of the Constitution, but also the powers of some other state institution are expanded unreasonably from the constitutional standpoint, it would have to be held that the provision of Paragraph 2 of Article 5 of the Constitution, whereby the scope of powers is limited by the Constitution, is also violated (rulings of 24 December 2002 and 13 May 2004).

Requirements for state service: guaranteeing the public interest

The Constitutional Court’s ruling of 13 December 2004

... the mission of state service is to ensure the public interest. Thus, in state service, the public interest must prevail over private interests. In state service, conflicts between public and private interests must be avoided and no conditions for the emergence of such conflicts should be created. The possibilities provided by state service must not be used for private benefit. When ensuring the public interest, it is essential to avoid unreasonable and unlawful impact by the interest groups, and, what is even more important, pressure on state servants, who adopt decisions when carrying out public administration and providing public services (or participate in drafting and executing these decisions, coordinating and/or controlling the implementation thereof, etc.). In its ruling of 25 May 2004, the Constitutional Court held the following: “In order that the citizens – the national community – could reasonably trust state officials so that it would be possible to ascertain that all state institutions and all state officials follow the Constitution and law and obey them, and that those who do not obey the Constitution and law would not hold office for which the confidence of the citizens – the national community – is needed, it is necessary to ensure public democratic control over the activity of state officials and their accountability to society comprising, inter alia, the possibility of removing from office those state officials who violate the Constitution and law, who bring their personal interests or the interests of a certain group above the public interests, or who bring discredit on state authority by their actions.” In its ruling of 1 July 2004, the Constitutional Court held the following: “According to the Constitution, the legislature has the duty to establish, by means of legal acts, such a legal regulation that would ensure that state officials, who perform their functions in implementing state power, and all persons who make decisions important to society and the state are able to properly exercise their powers, that clashes between public and private interests are avoided, that no legal conditions are created for state officials, who perform their functions in implementing state power, and for all persons who make decisions important to society and the state for acting in the private interests or interests of a group instead of the interests of the Nation and the State of Lithuania and for using their status for the benefit of their own, their close relatives, or other persons in order to make it possible to effectively control how state officials, who perform their functions in implementing state power, and all persons who make decisions important to society and the state follow the said requirements, and in order that the said legal regulation would make it possible to hold liable under the Constitution and law the aforementioned state officials or other persons if they do not follow these requirements.”

Under the Constitution, when protecting state service from unreasonable and unlawful impact by interest groups (thus, also political forces), certain levels of the system of state service must be depoliticised. According to Article 141 of the Constitution, persons performing actual military service or alternative service, as well as the officers of the national defence system, the police, and the interior, non-commissioned officers, re-enlistees, and other paid officials of paramilitary and security services who are not retired to the reserve may not take part in the activities of political parties and organisations.

It follows from the Constitution that state service as a system of professional activity must be impartial and neutral in regard to participants of the political process, the system of state service must be organised and must function in order to ensure the continuity of guaranteeing the public interest after changes in political power take place. Under the Constitution, the possibilities provided by state service may not be used for political activity; the legislature has the duty to ensure this by means of a law. State servants must not give any priorities for any persons due to their political, moral, religious, or other attitudes, beliefs or activity, or their other status. Otherwise, the constitutional principle of the equality of the rights of all persons, which prohibits any discrimination of persons or provision of privileges to them, would be deviated from.

Requirements for state service: openness and accessibility

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 13 December 2004

The constitutional provision that state institutions serve the people, the constitutional imperative of an open society, and the constitutional concept of state service imply that state service should be open and accessible to the people whose affairs it manages. ... the mission of the state as the organisation of all society, thus, also the mission of state service, is to ensure human rights and freedoms and to guarantee the public interest.

The work of both the state service system and state institutions must be organised in such a manner that the people who address state servants would not experience any arbitrariness, the abuse of authority, or bureaucratic intransigence, and that their requests would be examined and decided without delay. The requirement of the accessibility of state service to people must also be related to the harmony of state service as a system (thus, the said requirement must also be related to the necessity to ensure the unity of the state service system). It is not allowed that the work of state and municipal institutions be organised in such a manner that a person who applies to a state or municipal institution or a state servant with any issue would be forced to re-apply with the same issue due to the fact that the examination of the issue, despite the fact that this application was reasonable and was in conformity with all requirements established in legal acts (including the procedural requirements), was not initiated after the first application.

In this context, it is worth noting that Paragraph 1 of Article 73 of the Constitution provides that complaints of citizens about the abuse of authority or bureaucratic intransigence by state and municipal officials (with the exception of judges) are examined by the Seimas Ombudsmen, who have the right to submit a proposal before a court for dismissing the guilty officials from office. Paragraph 1 of Article 30 the Constitution provides that a person whose constitutional rights or freedoms are violated has the right to apply to a court.

The constitutional imperative of the openness of state service and its accessibility to people must also be linked with the provision of Article 14 of the Constitution, where the status of the Lithuanian language as the state language is consolidated. In its ruling of 21 October 1999, the Constitutional Court held that the state language, inter alia, integrates the civil Nation, ensures the smooth functioning of state and municipal institutions, and is an important guarantee of the equality of the rights of citizens, as it enables all citizens to associate with state and municipal institutions under the same conditions, as well as to implement their rights and legitimate interests. It was also held in the aforementioned ruling of the Constitutional Court that the constitutional establishment of the status of the state language also means that the legislature must establish by means of a law how the use of this language is ensured in public life and, in addition, it must provide for the means of the protection of the state language. According to the Constitution, the Lithuanian language must be used in all state and municipal institutions and in all establishments, enterprises, and organisations that are on the territory of Lithuania; laws and other legal acts must be published in the state language; clerical work, accounting, accountabilities, and financial papers must be in Lithuanian; state and local government institutions, establishments, enterprises, and organisations correspond with each other in the state language. The nationality of an individual (including relationships with the officials or state servants of a state or municipal institution) may not serve as the basis for him/her to demand that the rules arising from the status of the state language be not applied as far as he/she is concerned; otherwise, the constitutional principle of the equality of all persons before the law, courts, state institutions, and officials would be violated. The status of the Lithuanian language as the state language implies the necessity to organise the state service system and ensure that it functions in such a manner that only the persons who have a thorough knowledge of the state language be appointed to state service (certain position); a thorough knowledge of the state language is a necessary precondition in order to ensure that these persons, while acting as state servants, will be able to fulfil their duties, that the persons who in writing or orally address state servants will face no difficulties in communicating with them, and that normal communication between various state and municipal institutions will be ensured, that they will face no other difficulties when fulfilling their official duties or tasks related to state service.

Requirements for state service: publicity

The constitutional provision that state institutions serve the people, the constitutional imperative of an open society, the constitutional concept of state service, and the openness of state service also imply the requirement for publicity of state service as a system. State service is service to the State of Lithuania and the Lithuanian Nation; therefore, society must receive information about the work of state institutions. The reasoning of decisions adopted by state and municipal institutions, as well as by state servants, must be clear and transparent, and the information about the reasoning of these decisions must be available.

The requirement of the publicity of state service is also linked with the right of citizens, consolidated in the Constitution, to criticise the work of state institutions or their officials and to appeal against their decisions, as well as with the prohibition against persecution for criticism (Paragraph 2 of Article 33 of the Constitution); the said requirement is also linked with the prohibition against the censorship of mass information (Paragraph 1 of Article 44 of the Constitution) and the prohibition (imposed, inter alia, on the state) against monopolising mass media (Paragraph 2 of Article 44 of the Constitution). The Constitutional Court has noted that, in a democratic state under the rule of law, the public performance of duties by state officials and servants is one of the essential principles of the protection against their arbitrariness or abuse (ruling of 8 May 2000).

In this context, it is worth mentioning that, under Paragraph 2 of Article 25 of the Constitution, no one must be hindered, inter alia, from seeking or receiving information, and, according to Paragraph 3 of this article, the freedom to receive information may not be limited otherwise than by means of a law when this is necessary to protect human health, honour or dignity, private life, or morals, or to defend the constitutional order. Paragraph 5 of Article 25 of the Constitution prescribes that citizens have the right to receive, according to the procedure established by law, any information held about them by the state.

On the other hand, it should be noted that the requirement of the publicity of state service may not be interpreted as meaning that, at the request of various persons, information must be provided in a compulsory manner even in cases where the rights of a person or other constitutional values would be violated due to such disclosure of information. The requirement of the publicity of state service should also be linked with the requirement that state servants must be loyal to the State of Lithuania and with the requirement of the legitimacy of the activity of state service: making public, in an illegal manner, certain information that constitutes a secret protected under the Constitution and laws, or the illegal disclosure of such information in any other way, must lead to responsibility provided for by law.

Requirements for state service: qualification

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 13 December 2004

The necessity to carry out public administration and provide public services continuously and effectively by ensuring the public interest, the concept of state service as a professional activity, and the requirement of the efficiency of state service result in the requirement for qualification. State service must be qualified, it must be able to fulfil tasks commissioned to it. This fact implies quite high (higher than the requirements for other employees) requirements of qualification and professional skills for state servants, especially for officials (first of all, for those who make single-person decisions), as well as the necessity to ensure that these persons, when in service, would have the possibility of the continuing improvement of their professional competence.

The material and financial ensuring of the functioning of the state service system

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 13 December 2004

The efficiency of the functioning of the state service system also depends on material and financial stability. State service is supported from the state (municipal) budget. ... the professional activity of state servants must also be remunerated from the state (municipal) budget. For this reason, the funding from the budget should be envisaged for all state tasks; otherwise, state service would become ineffective and this would reduce the trust of society and citizens in state service, would degrade or even ruin its authority and, finally, would diminish the trust of people in the state itself and its law.

The allocation of funds for state service, its material supply and the use of allocated funds should be linked with the requirements of legitimacy and publicity raised for state service, with the necessity to ensure the prevalence of the public interest over private interests and to avoid any conflict between public and private interests. The funds and other resources must be used transparently. An effective and independent system of control is necessary for this purpose, and it must, inter alia, be independent from the institutions or their officials whose activity or decisions are under control. It has already been mentioned that, according to Paragraph 1 of Article 134 of the Constitution, the National Audit Office supervises the lawfulness of the possession and use of state-owned property and the execution of the state budget.

The right to enter state service (Paragraph 1 of Article 33 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 13 December 2004

These and other constitutional requirements for state service as a system imply, in turn, certain constitutionally reasonable requirements for persons who seek to implement their constitutional right to enter state service on equal terms or who have already implemented this constitutional right, i.e. for those who have already become state servants.

The aforesaid right of citizens is consolidated in Paragraph 1 of Article 33 of the Constitution, which prescribes: "Citizens shall have the right to participate in the governance of their State both directly and through their democratically elected representatives, as well as the right to enter on equal terms the State Service of the Republic of Lithuania."

The constitutional requirements for persons who seek to implement or who have already implemented their right to enter state service on equal terms are, first of all, requirements for persons who enter state service, and, secondly, requirements for state servants. The constitutionally reasonable and necessary guarantees for persons who enter state service and guarantees for state servants are correspondingly linked with the said two groups of requirements.

... the legal regulation laid down in Paragraph 1 of Article 33 of the Constitution and the constitutional concept of state service should be disclosed not only by evaluating their links with the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law, but also with other provisions of the Constitution that must, in turn, be interpreted on the basis of the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law.

Entering state service of the Republic of Lithuania on equal terms is a constitutional right of citizens. State service relationships comprise relationships linked with the implementation of the right of citizens to enter on equal terms the state service of the Republic of Lithuania, as well as relationships that arise when a citizen enters state service and performs his/her duties at state service; some other relationships that arise when a person leaves state service (for example, relationships linked with certain restrictions on the professional activity of former state servants, with pensions granted and paid to former state servants, etc.) are also closely linked with state service relationships. Thus, the implementation of the right of a citizen to enter on equal terms the state service of the Republic of Lithuania is linked with the implementation of other human rights Insofar as state service relationships are linked with human rights and freedoms, they must be regulated by means of laws. In this context, it is worth mentioning that "material legal norms take priority over procedural legal norms", because "as a rule, the latter are of an official character, i.e. they are aimed at implementing material legal norms" (ruling of 12 November 1996). The procedural relationships of state service (as well as those related to it) may be regulated by means of substatutory acts; however, this must be done in such a manner that the said substatutory acts would not compete with the legal regulation established by means of a law.

The right to enter state service does not include the right to seek to be elected as a member of the Seimas, the President of the Republic, a municipal council member, or to be appointed the Prime Minister or a minister, or to become a judge

It was held in this ruling of the Constitutional Court that professional state servants adopt decisions when carrying out public administration and/or providing public services (or participate in drafting and executing these decisions, in coordinating and/or controlling the implementation thereof, etc.); however, they (unlike the members of the Seimas, the President of the Republic, the members of the Government, or judges) do not perform any functions when implementing state power. The Constitutional Court has also held in this ruling that the notion “state service”, which is used in the Constitution, does not include the office of a member of the Seimas, the President of the Republic, the Prime Minister or a minister, a judge, or a member of a municipal council.

It should also be noted that the fact that someone becomes a member of the Seimas, the President of the Republic, the Prime Minister, or a minister is a result of the political process – an election to the Seimas, an election to the office of the President of the Republic, or the formation of the Government respectively. The grounds and procedure for appointing the justices of the Constitutional Court are established in Article 103 of the Constitution, while those for appointing judges of other courts are laid down in Article 112 of the Constitution; in this context, it is worth noting that the appointment of the justices of the Constitutional Court and judges of other courts depends on the political will of particular officials of state power (President of the Republic or the President of the Republic together with the members of the Seimas). Therefore, although the work of a judge is a professional activity as in the case of state service, there are no grounds for stating that the same requirement of “equal terms” (consolidated in Paragraph 1 of Article 33 of the Constitution) should be applied to becoming a member of the Seimas, the President of the Republic, the Prime Minister or a minister, or a judge as it is applied to entering state service.

Under the Constitution, becoming a member of a municipal council is also a result of a political activity. Paragraph 2 of Article 119 of the Constitution provides that the members of municipal councils are elected for a four-year term, as provided for by law, from among the citizens of the Republic of Lithuania and other permanent residents of particular administrative units by the citizens of the Republic of Lithuania and other permanent residents of these administrative units on the basis of universal, equal, and direct suffrage by secret ballot.

Thus, the right of a citizen to enter on equal terms the state service of the Republic of Lithuania, as consolidated in Paragraph 1 of Article 33 of the Constitution, does not comprise his/her constitutional right to seek to become elected (if he/she meets the conditions established in the Constitution and laws) a member of the Seimas, the President of the Republic, the Prime Minister or a minister, or a member of the municipal council, nor does it comprise the right to become (if he/she meets the conditions established in the Constitution and laws) a justice of the Constitutional Court or a judge of any other court – the said rights are implied by other provisions of the Constitution. The said rights and the right of a citizen to enter on equal terms the state service of the Republic of Lithuania are different subjective rights.

The right to enter state service as a variation of the right to freely choose an occupation; the general and special conditions for entering state service (Paragraph 1 of Article 33 and Paragraph 1 of Article 48 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court’s ruling of 13 December 2004

State service is a professional activity carried out by the employees of state or municipal institutions, i.e. it is a work activity. Thus, the right to enter on equal terms the state service of the Republic of Lithuania, as consolidated in Paragraph 1 of Article 33 of the Constitution, is related to the right of everyone to freely choose an occupation or business, which is established in Paragraph 1 of Article 48 of the Constitution. In this respect, the relations between the provision “Citizens shall have the right ... to enter on equal terms the State Service of the Republic of Lithuania” of Paragraph 1 of Article 33 of the Constitution and the provision “Everyone may freely choose a job or business” of Paragraph 1 of Article 48 thereof may be regarded as relations between lex specialis and lex generalis.

It should be noted that the right of each person to freely choose an occupation in Paragraph 1 of Article 48 of the Constitution is formulated broader, i.e. as the right of each person to “freely choose a job or business”. The Constitutional Court has held that the provision of Paragraph 1 of Article 48 of the Constitution, whereby everyone may freely choose an occupation or business, is a norm of general nature based on the universally recognised concept of human freedom (ruling of 4 March 1999), which means the possibility of choosing the type of occupation at one’s own discretion, i.e. by deciding freely on this subject (ruling of 10 July 1996) and that the freedom to freely choose an occupation or business, which is consolidated in Paragraph 1 of Article 48 of the Constitution, is one of the necessary conditions for satisfying human vital needs and ensuring the appropriate place of an individual in society (rulings of 4 March 1999 and 4 July 2003).

Thus, under the Constitution, a person who seeks to implement his/her constitutional right to work has the right to decide freely whether to choose an occupation in the private sector or a private business, or to seek to be employed in state service. The provision “Everyone may freely choose a job or business” of Paragraph 1 of Article 48 of the Constitution implies the duty of the state and the legislature to create the legal conditions for the implementation of this right (rulings of 4 March 1999 and 4 July 2003).

The constitutional right of a citizen to enter the state service of the Republic of Lithuania on equal terms, as a variation of the constitutional right of everyone to freely choose an occupation, especially when taking into consideration the provision “on equal terms” of Paragraph 1 of Article 33 of the Constitution, should be linked with the constitutional principle of the equality of the rights of persons (equality of persons before the law, the court, and other state institutions and officials).

In this context, it needs to be emphasised that citizens who seek to become employed in state service must not be discriminated, nor must they be granted privileges on the grounds expressis verbis specified in Paragraph 2 of Article 29 of the Constitution or on any other constitutionally unjustified grounds.

It is also worth noting that the constitutional imperative of equal terms when entering state service implies the competition between those who enter it, as well as an objective, impartial assessment and selection of those who enter state service. The legislature has a certain degree of discretion to establish the particularities of appointment to state service in regard to persons whose term of office at state service is linked with the term of office of the President of the Republic, members of the Seimas, members of the Government, and members of municipal councils. According to the Constitution, a person who believes that the principle of the equality of rights, thus, including his/her constitutional right to enter on equal terms the state service of the Republic of Lithuania, was violated when he/she attempted to enter state service has the right to seek to defend his/her violated right in a court.

The Constitutional Court has held that, when creating the legal preconditions for implementing the right to freely choose an occupation or business, the legislature is empowered to establish, by taking account of the nature of an occupation, the conditions of implementing the right to freely choose an occupation; in doing this, the legislature must observe the Constitution (ruling of 4 July 2003). ...

The constitutional mission of state service and special tasks assigned to state service determine the fact that certain general requirements – the general terms for entering state service – may and must be set for a citizen who enters state service, and that a person who fails to meet them will not be able to become a state servant. It should be stressed that the said requirements must be clear and common to all those who seek to hold a certain position in state service, and they must be known in advance to everyone who enters state service. Such requirements must be established by means of a law.

The following general requirements – the general conditions of entering state service – should be mentioned: loyalty to the State of Lithuania and its constitutional order, knowledge of the Constitution and the foundations of the legal system (including the catalogue of human rights and freedoms), a thorough knowledge of the state language, the absence of a conflict between the position sought and private interests (or the elimination of such a conflict before a person starts holding the position), etc. Moreover, general requirements linked with the personal characteristics of a person entering state service, his/her reputation, education, etc. may be established. The constitutionally reasonable general conditions preventing a person from entering state service may also be provided for.

The requirements of professionalism and qualification, which are raised before state service as a system, also imply particular requirements for persons who enter state service. ... state service relationships may and must be regulated in a differentiated manner, while taking account of the particularities of state (municipal) institutions and the functions fulfilled by them, the role of these institutions in the system of all institutions through which state functions are implemented, their competence, the professional skills necessary to particular state servants, and other important factors. Therefore, special requirements – special terms for those who seek to join state service – for persons striving for a particular position in state service or in a concrete state or municipal institution may be established in legal acts. These special terms for entering state service may be differentiated according to the content of particular positions in state service. When establishing the said terms, regard must be paid to the Constitution. These terms should also be clear and common to everyone who seeks to be appointed to a certain position in state service, and must be known in advance to those who enter state service.

Mention should be made of the following requirements – special conditions for entering state service – as professional competence, experience, the knowledge of languages, expert knowledge and skills, etc., as well as the requirements linked with the reputation of a person who enters state service, his/her personal characteristics, etc. When appointing a person to a certain position, a great variety of special conditions may be provided for; for example, ones linked with the health of a person, his/her physical abilities, ties with other persons, etc. It should be emphasised that all established special requirements for entering state service must be constitutionally justified. Otherwise, the constitutional right of a citizen to enter on equal terms the state service of the Republic of Lithuania and the constitutional right of a person to freely choose an occupation would also be violated.

The relation between the right to enter state service and citizenship

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 13 December 2004

The notion “citizen”, which is used in Paragraph 1 of Article 33 of the Constitution, means that the right to enter state service is linked with the relation between a person and the State of Lithuania, i.e. citizenship. By the same, account should also be taken of the fact that foreigners and persons with no citizenship who legally stay in the Republic of Lithuania have the same rights and freedoms as citizens of the Republic of Lithuania if the Constitution, laws, and international treaties of the Republic of Lithuania do not provide otherwise (conclusion of 24 January 1995). Certain provisions of the Constitution that consolidate the rights of citizens of the Republic of Lithuania, as well as the provision “Citizens shall have ... the right to enter on equal terms the State Service of the Republic of Lithuania” of Paragraph 1 of Article 33 of the Constitution, may be interpreted expansively, i.e. in a manner that the notion “citizen” would include not only citizens of the Republic of Lithuania, but also citizens of foreign states and stateless persons. Still, this does not mean that citizens of foreign states and stateless persons may, as a matter of course, in all cases, and only on the basis of the Constitution, implement these rights, including the right to enter on equal terms the state service of the Republic of Lithuania, since the legislature has the powers, while fulfilling the international obligations of the Republic of Lithuania and acting on the basis of particular international treaties, to establish the conditions and procedure for implementing such rights. In this context, it should be noted that, under Paragraph 2 of Article 48 of the Constitution, the work of foreigners in the Republic of Lithuania is regulated by law. Since the constitutional right of a citizen to enter the state service of the Republic of Lithuania on equal terms is a variation of the constitutional right of everyone to freely choose an occupation; thus, a law may provide for such conditions and procedure, arising from the international obligations of the Republic of Lithuania and international treaties, for entering the state service of the Republic of Lithuania for citizens of foreign states and stateless persons that, in turn, must not be in conflict with the Constitution.

In this context, it needs to be noted that particular international obligations of the Republic of Lithuania stem from its membership in the European Union, which is constitutionally confirmed by the Constitutional Act of the Republic of Lithuania on Membership of the Republic of Lithuania in the European Union, a constituent part of the Constitution.

The right to make a career in state service

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 13 December 2004

The constitutional right of citizens to enter on equal terms the state service of the Republic of Lithuania also implies the right of persons appointed to state service to remain state servants until the moment when the state service relationships are terminated on the grounds established in a law, as well as the right to make a career in state service when paying regard to the conditions provided for in a law, to attempts made by a state servant himself/herself to make a career, and to objective possibilities. A state servant must not face unnatural and unreasonable obstacles for making his/her career in state service.

The status of a state servant

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 13 December 2004

Having entered state service and having started holding certain office in state service (in a state or municipal institution), a citizen gains the status of a state servant. From this moment, in this state or municipal institution, he/she adopts decisions when carrying out public administration and/or providing public services (or participates in drafting and executing such decisions, in coordinating and/or controlling the implementation thereof, etc.) and, in this way, guarantees the public interest.

State servants are a special social group, the specifics of which are determined by the mission of state service and its social significance. Therefore, the legal status of state servants, as well as the implementation of the rights and freedoms enjoyed by them under the Constitution and laws, must bear important characteristics.

Requirements for state servants; limitations on activity not related to state service

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 13 December 2004

Since constitutional requirements for state service as a system imply certain constitutionally reasonable requirements for persons who seek to implement their constitutional right to enter on equal terms the state service of the Republic of Lithuania, the aforementioned requirements for state service as a system also imply requirements for state servants.

Under the Constitution, a state servant must properly fulfil his/her duties when observing the Constitution and law. He/she must be loyal to the State of Lithuania and its constitutional order, must observe the Constitution and laws, must respect, protect, and defend human rights and freedoms, must be impartial and neutral in regard to participants of the political process, must be just, must avoid a conflict between public and private interests, must not succumb to illegal pressure or illegal requirements, must not act in an arbitrary manner and must not abuse service, must improve his/her professional competence, must follow the requirements of professional ethics, must protect his/her reputation as a state servant and the authority of the institution in which he/she is employed, etc. Decisions adopted by a state servant must be transparent and their reasoning must be clear. The possibilities provided by state service must not be used for personal benefit or political activity; a state servant may not use his/her status for his/her private benefit or the private benefit of his/her close relatives or other persons. The legal regulation of state service relationships must be such that would make it possible to make sure that the aforementioned requirements are not violated. Public and democratic control over the activity of state servants and decisions adopted by them is an important condition of the trust of society in the state and its law.

The responsibility of a state servant for violations of law committed while in state service must be established by means of a law.

The legislature has the right to establish certain requirements that would limit the following activity of state servants, which is not related to state service: another occupation (business) or political and public activity that could result in a conflict between public and private interests of state servants and create the preconditions for using the possibilities provided by state service not for guaranteeing the public interest, but for private interests, where the said occupation (business) or political and public activity would hinder state servants from performing their official duties, or would be harmful to the authority of state service or a particular state or municipal institution and would bring discredit on them.

In its rulings, the Constitutional Court has held on more than one occasion that, according to the Constitution, it is permitted to impose limitations on human rights and freedoms if the following conditions are observed: the limitations are established by means of a law; the limitations are necessary in a democratic society in order to protect the rights and freedoms of other persons and the values consolidated in the Constitution, as well as constitutionally important objectives; the limitations do not deny the nature or essence of the rights or freedoms; and the constitutional principle of proportionality is observed. In its ruling of 6 May 1997, having stated that “in state service relationships, the public interest is overriding”, the Constitutional Court held that “consideration should be given to the fact that, from a social point of view, both the public interest and the rights of persons ... are constitutional values”.

When imposing, by means of a law, limitations on the possibility of state servants to have another occupation, consideration should be given to the fact that, under the Constitution, these limitations should be such that would help avoid any conflict between public and private interests in state service, that these limitations would ensure that state service and the possibilities offered by it are used in the public interest and are never used in pursuit of self-interest, that state servants are not obstructed in the exercise of their duties, that the authority of state service or the authority of the respective state or municipal institutions is not undermined, and that no discredit is brought upon state service or upon the said institutions.

... the constitutional concept of state service, the constitutional mission of state service, the fact that, by its very characteristics, the activity of state service is a professional activity, imply that, while paying regard, inter alia, to the constitutional principle of proportionality, a law should impose such limitations on another occupation of state servants where the said limitations would prevent state servants from working in such enterprises, establishments, or organisations in which they have the powers of management, or in which they control or supervise the activity of, or adopt any other decisions related to, such enterprises, establishments, or organisations (or participate in drafting and carrying out those decisions, in coordinating and/or controlling the execution thereof, etc.).

... a regulation governing the right of state servants to have another occupation and receive other remuneration would be in compliance with the Constitution where such a regulation would make it possible to decide in each particular case whether to permit a state servant to have another occupation, by assessing in a mandatory manner whether such permission would result in preconditions for creating a conflict between public and private interests in state service, for using state service in pursuit of self-interest, for engaging in an activity bringing discredit upon state service, for interfering with the proper performance of the duties of a person holding office in state service, whether a state servant would work in the enterprises, establishments, or organisations in which he/she has the powers of management, or controls and supervises their activities, or adopts any other decisions related to such enterprises, establishments, or organisations, as well as whether there are any other circumstances due to which state servants may not have another occupation and receive other remuneration. The legislature must also provide for the subjects that would decide whether to permit or not to permit a state servant to have another occupation and receive other remuneration, as well as for the responsibility of such subjects for unlawful decisions adopted by them.

Under the Constitution, the legislature, when establishing the prohibitions precluding state servants from participating in the activity incompatible with state service, also has the right to establish, by means of a law, measures to ensure that these prohibitions would be observed, as well as, inter alia, responsibility for participation in activities incompatible with state service. One of the sanctions established by means of a law for participation in activities incompatible with state service may be dismissal from office.

In addition, it must be stressed that a state servant has the right to choose freely whether to work in state service and follow the imposed limitations on work and other activity, or to refuse another occupation or activity.

Social rights of state servants

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 13 December 2004

The right of citizens to enter on equal terms the state service of the Republic of Lithuania, which is consolidated in Paragraph 1 of Article 33 of the Constitution, and the right of everyone to freely choose an occupation, which is stipulated in Paragraph 1 of Article 48 of the Constitution, give rise to the connection of the constitutional right of citizens to enter on equal terms the state service of the Republic of Lithuania with the other rights consolidated in Paragraph 1 of Article 48 of the Constitution, which are closely related to the constitutional right of each individual to work: the right to have proper, safe, and healthy conditions at work, as well as to receive fair pay for work and social security in the event of unemployment. These rights must be guaranteed for a state servant not to a lesser extent than for other employees; however, due to the type of state service as a specific work activity, their implementation may have certain particularities. The same could be said about other social and economic rights consolidated in the Constitution: the right of every working person to rest and leisure, as well as to annual paid leave, which is laid down in Paragraph 1 of Article 49 of the Constitution, the right to establish trade unions, which is provided for in Article 50 of the Constitution, the right to receive old-age and disability pensions, as well as social assistance in the event of unemployment, sickness, widowhood, the loss of the breadwinner, and in other cases provided for by law, which is consolidated in Article 52 of the Constitution, etc. On the other hand, certain social and economic rights of state servants at particular types of service may be restricted by means of a law due to the specificity of these types of service or the duties of state servants; for example, the right of employees to strike when defending their economic and social interests, which is consolidated in Paragraph 1 of Article 51 of the Constitution, may be restricted on the basis of Paragraph 2 of this article, which provides that limitations on this right and the conditions and procedure for its implementation must be established by law.

The Constitution guarantees that state servants, like other persons, will have the right to defend their violated rights in a court.

Requirements for former state servants

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 13 December 2004

Since ... some other relationships that arise when a person leaves his/her position in state service are closely linked with state service relationships, the constitutional requirements for state service as a system may result in the fact that (for example, in order to avoid the conflicts of public and private interests, to ensure trust in state service, and to protect other constitutional values) certain requirements for former state servants will also be established. For example, certain limitations may be imposed to prevent state servants from engaging in a certain working activity etc. When imposing such limitations, it is essential in all cases to pay regard to the norms and principles of the Constitution, and such limitations must be proportionate to the sought legitimate objective, which is necessary in a democratic society and is socially important.

The transparency of state service

It is universally recognised that transparency, as the principle of the activity of the institutions of public power and officials, implies the imparting of information, communication, openness, and publicity (inasmuch as this does not harm other values protected by law), accountability to the respective community and responsibility for decisions adopted by the officials who adopt the said decisions, as well as the fact that adopted decisions must be well-founded and clear and that, if there is a need, it would be possible to rationally reason these decisions; other persons must have the possibility of disputing these decisions in accordance with an established procedure. Transparency must be linked with participatory democracy, freedom of information, and the possibility for the citizens and other persons to criticise the activity of state institutions. The transparency of state service is a necessary precondition against the consolidation of corruption and protectionism, against the discrimination of some persons and granting privileges to others, and against the abuse of authority; thus, the transparency of state service is also a necessary precondition for people for trusting the institutions of public power and the state in general.

... the requirement for the transparency of state service is not mentioned in the Constitution expressis verbis, but this certainly does not mean that the transparency of state service is not regarded as an imperative that stems from the Constitution. Quite to the contrary, the transparency of state service is a constitutional principle. The imperative of the transparency of state service stems from various provisions (norms and principles) of the Constitution, inter alia, from the provisions of Article 5 thereof, whereby the scope of powers is limited by the Constitution (Paragraph 2) and state institutions serve the people (Paragraph 3), from the provisions of Article 25 thereof, which enshrine freedom of expression and freedom of seeking, receiving, and imparting information and ideas, as well as the right of citizens to receive, according to the procedure established by law, any information held about them by state institutions (Paragraph 5), and from the provisions of Article 33 thereof, which state that citizens have the right to participate in the governance of their state both directly and through their democratically elected representatives, as well as the right to enter on equal terms the state service of the Republic of Lithuania (Paragraph 1), that citizens are guaranteed the right to criticise the work of state institutions or their officials and to appeal against their decisions and that persecution for criticism is prohibited (Paragraph 2), that citizens are guaranteed the right of petition, and that the procedure for the implementation of this right is established by law (Paragraph 3).

The principle of the transparency of state service ... should be interpreted while taking into consideration other provisions of the Constitution, inter alia, the striving for civil society, which is proclaimed in the Preamble to the Constitution, the constitutional imperatives of civic consciousness, open society, and social harmony, the constitutional principles of a state under the rule of law, the equality of the rights of persons, justice, democracy, responsible governance, as well as the constitutional concept of state service, which implies, among other things, the publicity and openness of state service as a system.

The selection of applicants for state service; recording the examination of applicants for a position in state service

Because of the fact that the right of citizens to enter state service on equal terms stems from the Constitution, a law must establish the grounds (principles) for testing the knowledge and capabilities of applicants for the position of a state servant where the said knowledge and capabilities are necessary in order to perform the duties of a state servant. ... the knowledge and capabilities of a person, which are necessary in order to perform the duties of a state servant, may be tested by examining him/her.

It should be emphasised that the functioning and efficiency of all state service very much depends on the selection of persons for state service. When a person is selected for the position of a state servant by means of competition while examining him/her, such a procedure may not be regarded as a formal matter only. The examination – regardless of whether it is a written or a verbal examination or whether it is both a written and verbal examination – must have its purpose and must be oriented to the testing and assessment of the knowledge and capabilities that are necessary for every state servant, as well as of the specific knowledge and capabilities that are necessary in order to implement the functions that are established in the position description of a state servant for which a person is aspiring. The winner of the competition to a certain position of a state servant – the person who will perform specific functions defined in the position description of a state servant – is established according to the examination results of the applicants who participated; therefore, the questions (tasks) of the examination – regardless of whether it is a written or a verbal examination or whether it is both a written and verbal examination – must first of all be related to those positions in state service for which applications have been filed (for which the competition is held).

... the Constitutional Court has held in its acts more than once that a person who thinks that his/her rights or freedoms are violated has an absolute right to an independent and impartial court – an arbiter that would settle a dispute; under the Constitution, the legislature has the duty to establish such a legal regulation whereby all disputes regarding any violation of the rights or freedoms of persons could be settled in a court; the rights of a person must be defended not formally, but in reality and effectively against unlawful actions of private persons, as well as against those of state institutions or its officials. ...

Thus, in order that persons could implement, not formally, but in reality and in an effective manner, their right to defend in a court their violated constitutional right to enter on equal terms the state service of the Republic of Lithuania, the reasoning of decisions by which they are not appointed to the position of a state servant must be clear and the information regarding the reasoning of these decisions must be accessible to a court. Otherwise, a court would not be able to decide the respective case.

The Constitutional Court has held that a prelitigation procedure for settling disputes may also be established (rulings of 2 July 2002, 4 March 2003, 17 August 2004, 29 December 2004, 7 February 2005, and 16 January 2006 and the decision of 8 August 2006).

Thus, the information about the decisions regarding the non-appointment of a person to a position in state service must also be accessible to institutions that decide disputes in accordance with a prelitigation procedure.

Consequently, if a law prescribes that the knowledge and capabilities of a person that are necessary for carrying out the duties of a state servant are tested by examining him/her, the course of the examination (inter alia, the questions of the members of the examination commission and the answers of the applicants) must be recorded and must be accessible both to institutions that decide the respective disputes and to courts.

It also needs to be emphasised that various ways of recording the course of such an examination may be chosen. ... it needs to be noted that, in protecting the data regarding the course of examinations and in disclosing them according to the procedure established by law, regard must be paid to the right of a person to privacy, which is enshrined in Article 22 of the Constitution.

It also needs to be emphasised that a court that decides a case regarding the non-appointment of a person to a position in state service acts not as a certain “commission for the consideration of examination complaints”, but as a jurisdictional institution, which decides whether the procedure of examination (competition) and the constitutional right of a person to enter the state service of the Republic of Lithuania on equal terms were violated.

The right to enter state service (Paragraph 1 of Article 33 of the Constitution)

Under Paragraph 1 of Article 33 of the Constitution, citizens, inter alia, have the right to enter on equal terms the state service of the Republic of Lithuania.

The constitutional right to enter on equal terms state service should be linked, inter alia, to the right of each individual to freely choose an occupation, which is consolidated in Article 48 of the Constitution. In its rulings of 13 December 2004 and 13 August 2007, the Constitutional Court noted, inter alia, that the constitutional right of citizens to enter the state service of the Republic of Lithuania on equal terms is a variation of the constitutional right of every person to choose an occupation.

It needs to be noted that the provision of Paragraph 1 of Article 33 of the Constitution, which consolidates the right of citizens to enter on equal terms the state service of the Republic of Lithuania, should not be interpreted only linguistically and should not be understood only as the right to enter state service, i.e. only as one related to the appointment of a person to state service. As the Constitutional Court has noted more than once, state service relationships comprise not only the relationships linked to the implementation of the right of citizens to enter on equal terms the state service of the Republic of Lithuania, but also the relationships that arise after they enter state service and when they perform their duties in state service (rulings of 13 December 2004 and 13 August 2007).

In its ruling of, inter alia, 13 August 2007, the Constitutional Court held that, when creating the legal preconditions for implementing the right to freely choose an occupation or business (thus, also to enter state service), the legislature is empowered to establish, by taking account of the nature of an occupation, the conditions of implementing the right to freely choose an occupation.

The Constitutional Court has also held that the right of citizens to enter on equal terms the state service of the Republic of Lithuania is not absolute: the state cannot and does not assume the obligation to employ every person in state service. State service must be qualified, and persons employed in state service must be able to fulfil tasks commissioned to this service. Those who wish to become state servants or officials must also have required education, professional experience, and certain personal characteristics; in addition, the higher the position or the more important the area of activities, the higher the requirements that are raised before persons holding such positions (rulings of 4 March 1999, 13 August 2007, and 22 January 2008).

Requirements for state service: loyalty to the State of Lithuania and its constitutional order

Under the Constitution, state service is service to the State of Lithuania and the civil Nation; therefore, state service should be loyal to the State of Lithuania and its constitutional order; one of the general conditions of entering state service is loyalty to the State of Lithuania and its constitutional order (rulings of 13 December 2004 and 13 August 2007). Only such persons who are loyal to the state and whose loyalty to the state and reliability do not raise any doubts may work in state institutions (rulings of 11 November 1998, 4 March 1999, and 13 August 2007).

Vetting the reliability of both applicants for positions in state service and state servants; assessing the reliability and loyalty to the State of Lithuania of persons who are seeking to hold or are holding a position in state service where such a position is connected with the use or protection of classified information (on the protection of classified information, also see 2. The constitutional status of persons, 2.2. Civil (individual) rights and freedoms, 2.2.7. The freedom to express convictions and freedom of information, 2.2.7.1. The protection of the freedom to express convictions and freedom of information, the ruling of 7 July 2011)

The legislature not only may, but also must establish such a legal regulation that would permit vetting the reliability – loyalty to the State of Lithuania, reputation, etc. – of those persons who seek to hold a position in state service. The reliability of applicants for the positions in state service must be vetted yet before they start holding office. When state servants are in office, their reliability may be also verified if reasonable doubts arise. If there is the reasonably stated non-reliability of a person who seeks a certain position in state service, such a person may not be accepted to the position (ruling of 13 August 2007).

In its ruling of 13 December 2004, the Constitutional Court held that ... one of the special conditions for entering state service [may be] the requirements related to the reputation of a person who enters state service, his/her personal characteristics, etc. When appointing a person to a certain position, a great variety of special conditions may be provided for; for example, ones linked with the health of a person, his/her physical abilities, ties with other persons, etc. The special conditions for entering state service may be differentiated according to the content of certain positions in state service. All established special requirements for entering state service must be constitutionally justified.

... under the Constitution, a special condition established for persons seeking to hold or holding a position in state service where such a position is connected with the use or protection of classified information is an especial and not in the least questionable reliability of these persons and their loyalty to the State of Lithuania. The reliability of a person who seeks to hold or holds a position in state service that is connected with the use or protection of classified information, as well as the loyalty of that person to the State of Lithuania, must be assessed by taking account of all significant circumstances characterising that person, inter alia, his/her activity, committed violations of law, his/her professional and personal qualities, reputation, and ties with other persons. Therefore, the legislature has broad discretion while regulating the relationships connected with the protection of state secrets and official secrets, inter alia, when establishing the criteria for the reliability of persons who seek to hold or hold a position in state service where such a position is connected with the use or protection of classified information and for the loyalty of these persons to the State of Lithuania, as well as the procedures for screening such persons. In the course of implementing the said discretion, the legislature must pay regard to the norms and principles of the Constitution, inter alia, the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law.

In this context, it also needs to be mentioned that, in its ruling of 13 August 2007, the Constitutional Court noted, inter alia, that the legal regulation of the relationships related to the verification of the reliability of a person (both the reliability of a person who seeks to hold a position in state service and the reliability of a person who already holds such a position) must be such that minor, coincidental, or similar facts and circumstances would not become the basis for the non-reliability of a person seeking to hold or holding a position in a state or municipal institution, and that the non-reliability of such a person would not be stated by referring to presumptions alone.

... it is not permitted to establish any such a legal regulation that would allow a state institution authorised by law to state, on the basis of minor circumstances alone, the unreliability (or the disloyalty to the State of Lithuania) of a person seeking to hold or holding a position in state service where such a position is connected with the use or protection of classified information. However, this does not mean that the legislature may not provide for such measures of the protection of classified information that would enable to prevent, in advance, threats to the security of classified information, and, at the same time, threats to state interests.

... the fact that a person is not held guilty of committing a criminal act until the guilt of the person in committing the said act is proven in accordance with the procedure established by law and recognised by an effective court judgment does not yet mean that a person seeking to hold or holding a position in state service where such a position is connected with the use of classified information and protection thereof necessarily deserves the trust of the state and that a state institution authorised by law may not have certain doubts as to the reliability of that person or his/her loyalty to the State of Lithuania, which would be raised not as a result of the established guilt of the person in committing a criminal act, but by certain factual circumstances, the activity of the person, his/her personal characteristics, reputation, ties, or other significant circumstances, inter alia, ones relating to a possibly committed criminal act.

Thus, the circumstances that raise doubts as to the reliability of a person seeking to hold or holding a position in state service where such a position is related to the use of classified information or protection thereof, or regarding the loyalty of such a person to the State of Lithuania, can be also connected with a criminal act possibly committed by that person. In assessing the said circumstances, a state institution authorised by law does not administer justice, nor does it judge concerning the guilt of the person in committing a criminal act.

... the circumstances that a person is held criminally liable for an intentional criminal act or is subject to a pretrial or operational investigation in relation to the said act may imply the vulnerability of the person and, at the same time, raise doubts as to his/her reliability and loyalty to the State of Lithuania.

Although the legislature has broad discretion in regulating the relationships connected with the protection of state secrets and official secrets, it may not establish any such a legal regulation that would create the preconditions for a state institution authorised by law to state, on the basis of minor circumstances, the existence of the grounds for the unreliability of a person holding a position in state service where such a position is connected with the use of classified information and protection thereof, as well as the existence of the grounds for the disloyalty of such a person to the State of Lithuania, as a result of which the person would lose his/her position in state service.

... the provision “Citizens shall have ... the right to enter on equal terms the state service of the Republic of Lithuania” of Paragraph 1 of Article 33 of the Constitution and the aforementioned constitutional imperatives stemming from the principle of a state under the rule of law give rise to the duty of the legislature to establish such a legal regulation that would lay down an alternative measure for revoking the authorisation to handle or familiarise oneself with classified information or a security clearance and for the subsequent dismissal of a person from a certain position in state service, where the said measure would create the preconditions for a sufficient individualisation of the limitations on the rights and freedoms of a person and for assessing as much as possible the individual situation of each person. Such a measure, inter alia, is suspension from office applied in cases where a person is held criminally liable for an intentional criminal act or is subject to a pretrial or operational investigation in relation to the said act; the said suspension creates the preconditions for the additional verification of the reliability of a person and his/her loyalty to the State of Lithuania in order to determine whether his/her continued employment would pose a threat to the security of classified information.

The work pay of state servants

See 2. The constitutional status of persons, 2.4. Economic, social, and cultural rights, 2.4.1. Economic rights, 2.4.1.2. The right to work, 2.4.1.2.4. The right to receive fair pay for work, the ruling (no KT29-N15/2016) of 27 October 2016.

Equal competition between persons entering state service (Paragraph 1 of Article 33 of the Constitution)

... Paragraph 1 of Article 33 of the Constitution, which guarantees citizens the right to enter on equal terms the state service of the Republic of Lithuania, gives rise to one of the requirements for the legal regulation of state service, i.e. there must be equal competition between persons entering state service, which implies that persons entering state service must be assessed on the basis of their knowledge and skills necessary to perform the respective functions of a state servant and that regard must be paid to the imperatives, which stem from Article 29 of the Constitution, in relation to the equality of the rights of persons and non-discrimination and non-granting of privileges on the grounds expressis verbis specified in the Constitution or any other constitutionally unjustifiable grounds.

The duty of the state to prevent the abuse of power and corruption in state service

... the Constitution, inter alia, the provision of Paragraph 3 of Article 5 thereof that state institutions serve the people, Paragraph 1 of Article 33 thereof, the constitutional concept of state service, and the constitutional principles of transparency and publicity of state service give rise to the duty of the state to take all possible measures, inter alia, in order that corruption and the abuse of power in state service be prevented.

In this context, it should be noted that corruption as a social phenomenon has negative material and moral effect on the political and economic system of the state; it damages, inter alia, the reputation of state servants and officials, undermines the authority of institutions in which they work and the authority of all of state service, encourages disrespect for laws, creates the preconditions for violating human rights, and undermines the trust of the public in the state, its institutions, democratic government of the state, and law; thus, corruption destroys the constitutional foundations of a democratic state under the rule of law. In addition, the entrenched existence of corruption encourages such conduct of persons working in state and municipal institutions that does not comply with the powers conferred on them or the standards of conduct that are laid down in legal acts and encourages such conduct that is intended to benefit these persons themselves or others to the detriment of the interests of the state as a whole or the interests of separate persons.

The application of legal responsibility to state servants (officials) for the committed violations of law, inter alia, misconduct in office, in order to prevent the abuse of power and corruption in state service

... public and democratic control over the activity of state servants and decisions adopted by them is an important condition for the trust of society in the state and its law; the responsibility of a state servant for the violations of law committed while in state service must be established by law (ruling of 13 December 2004). Under the Constitution, the legislature has the duty to regulate state service relationships, and the system of state service should function in such a manner that not only responsibility would be established for violations committed while in state service, but also persons who have committed violations while in state service would actually be held liable (ruling of 13 August 2007).

The Constitutional Court held in its rulings of 25 May 2004 and 13 December 2004 that, in order that citizens could reasonably trust state officials and that it would be possible to ascertain that all state institutions and all state officials follow the Constitution and law and obey them, and that those who do not obey the Constitution and law would not hold the office for which the trust of citizens is needed, it is necessary to ensure public democratic control over the activity of state officials and their accountability to society, including, inter alia, the possibility of removing from office those state officials who violate the Constitution and law, who bring their personal interests or the interests of a certain group above the public interests, or who bring discredit on state authority by their actions.

... a person who has exercised his/her right, established in Paragraph 1 of Article 33 of the Constitution, to enter state service must be loyal to the state and work in such a way that his/her loyalty to the state and his/her reliability would not give rise to any doubts, that citizens could reasonably trust in state servants (officials), that state service would be qualified and capable of performing the tasks assigned to it, inter alia, in preventing the abuse of power and corruption in state service.

At the same time, it needs to be noted that, in order to ensure the proper functioning of state service, its transparency and publicity, under the Constitution, inter alia, Paragraph 1 of Article 33 thereof, and the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law, the prevention of the manifestations of corruption or acts of a corrupt nature in state service is one of the constitutionally important objectives of the state.

Thus, if a state servant (official) possibly commits criminal acts or other acts that are contrary to law, inter alia, misconduct in office, he/she, under the Constitution, inter alia, Article 22 and Paragraph 1 of Article 33 thereof, and the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law, may be subject to state coercive measures, which have a certain effect on his/her conduct while simultaneously limiting the exercise, inter alia, of his/her right to the protection of private life or the right to enter state service, in order to reach the constitutionally important objectives, inter alia, to ensure the transparency and publicity of state service.

Thus, under the Constitution, inter alia, Paragraph 1 of Article 33 thereof, and the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law, it is not allowed to establish such a legal regulation under which a state servant (official) who fails to comply with the constitutionally justifiable requirements laid down in the Constitution and other legal acts with respect to state service as a system and persons working in it could escape legal responsibility; the law must lay down the respective legal measures, i.e. the responsibility of the state servant (official) for the violations committed by him/her, including misconduct in office; one of the sanctions established by law for misconduct in office may be the dismissal of the state servant (official) from office. Otherwise, without the establishment of the possibility of applying the respective legal responsibility to such a state servant (official), a situation that would not be tolerated under the Constitution would be created, i.e. the preconditions would be created for working in state service for such persons who do not comply with the requirements arising from the Constitution, i.e. such requirements as the proper performance of their duties in compliance with the Constitution and law, loyalty to the State of Lithuania and its constitutional order, the adoption of transparent and reasoned decisions, the avoidance of conflicts between public and private interests, and the non-abuse of office.

... under the Constitution, inter alia, Paragraph 1 of Article 33 thereof, as well as the constitutional concept of state service and the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law, in order to achieve the constitutionally important objectives – ensuring the proper functioning of state service as well as its transparency and publicity, preventing, inter alia, the abuse of power and corruption in state service, detecting criminal and other unlawful acts, inter alia, misconduct in office, including that of a corrupt nature, that are possibly being committed or have been committed by a state servant (official) and are incompatible with the said requirements, arising from the Constitution, for state service as a system and for state servants (officials), and creating the preconditions for properly applying, to the persons who commit violations in state service, legal responsibility as a public form of control over servants (officials) of a democratic state and their accountability to society – information secretly collected by other authorised state institutions for criminal justice or other lawful purposes about persons may also be used in the cases and according to the procedure established by law; the use of such information can not only have a certain effect on the conduct of the state servant (official), but it can also interfere, inter alia, with his/her private life.

The right of state servants (officials) to apply to a court for the defence of their rights violated as a result of the application of official liability

... the right of a state servant (official), which arises from the Constitution, inter alia, Paragraph 1 of Article 30 thereof, and the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law, to apply to a court regarding the defence of his/her rights violated as a result of the application of official liability must be real, i.e. the person in question must have the real possibilities of effectively defending, under judicial procedure, his/her violated rights against, in his/her opinion, the unlawful actions of state (municipal) institutions and/or against the abuse of the powers granted to them in the course of the application of state coercive measures, inter alia, in secretly collecting information (data) about the person and in using this information for the purposes of the investigation of misconduct in office; such a person has the right to defend his/her violated rights and legitimate interests effectively, irrespective of whether or not they are directly enshrined in the Constitution.

It should also be noted that the right of a state servant (official), which arises from the Constitution, inter alia, Paragraph 1 of Article 30 thereof, and the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law, to apply to a court regarding the defence of his/her rights violated as a result of the application of official liability also implies his/her right to the due court process and a fair court decision. During the consideration of a dispute before a court, it is necessary to ensure the right of the state servant (official) to have full access to all the material, data, or information used in the investigation of the misconduct in office, inter alia, the information that has been secretly collected about him/her in the course of applying state coercive measures and, in accordance with the procedure and under the conditions established by law, has been declassified and transferred for use for the purposes of the investigation of misconduct in office; in addition, it is necessary to ensure the right of the state servant (official) to have access to the evidence used in the case; moreover, the state servant (official) has the right to provide explanations, to challenge the lawfulness or authenticity of the evidence or other material used in the investigation of the misconduct in office, to challenge the necessity and proportionality of such use, as well as to challenge all the factual and legal circumstances relating to the imposition of an official penalty. In the court proceedings, the state servant (official) must have the right to defend himself/herself effectively, inter alia, to have his/her representative, and the state servant (official) must be given sufficient time and possibilities for properly preparing for defence.

A court (judge), while performing the duty to administer justice, arising from Paragraph 1 of Article 109 of the Constitution, must also assess whether the use of the above-mentioned declassified information in investigating misconduct in office, for which the person may be dismissed, inter alia, from the position in state service, has violated the constitutional rights of the state servant (official), inter alia, the right to the protection of the inviolability of private life and correspondence, which is ensured by Article 22 of the Constitution, and the right to enter state service on equal terms, which is consolidated in Paragraph 1 of Article 33 thereof.

At the same time, it needs to be mentioned that, under the Constitution, inter alia, Paragraph 1 of Article 30 and Article 109 thereof, and the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law, a court must, in each concrete case, provide clear and sufficient legal arguments and reasons for its decision.

... under Article 109 of the Constitution, it is not allowed to establish any such limitations that would deny the powers of a judge and a court to administer justice properly, inter alia, would hinder the adoption of a fair and reasoned decision in a case. Thus, when settling a dispute regarding the imposition of an official penalty, a court (judge) must, in each case, fully assess all the material, data, or information used in investigating misconduct in office. The court (judge) must, in each case, decide whether information that has been collected about a person secretly in the manner established in laws and has been declassified in accordance with the procedure laid down in legal acts and transferred, inter alia, for use for the purposes of investigating the misconduct in office committed by the said person can be considered evidence in the concrete case, whether such information complies with the requirements for the lawfulness and credibility of evidence, and whether such use is necessary in a democratic society and is in line with the principle of proportionality; at the same time, the state servant (official) must be afforded effective protection against the possible arbitrariness of the authorities and the real possibility of defending himself/herself regarding his/her possibly violated rights and freedoms, inter alia, his/her right to the inviolability of private life and correspondence, which is protected by Article 22 of the Constitution, and his/her right to enter state service on equal terms, which is consolidated in Paragraph 1 of Article 33 thereof, when challenging, inter alia, the lawfulness, necessity, and proportionality of the use of declassified information as evidence in the investigation of his/her misconduct in office, which includes the duty of the court (judge) to assess whether, in this concrete case, the pursued legitimate objectives could be achieved by other less restrictive measures.

... under the Constitution, inter alia, the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law, among others, the imperatives of justice and proportionality, which arise from this principle, the constitutional right of a state servant (official) to apply to a court does not deny the duty of the state, arising from the Constitution, to properly investigate instances of misconduct in office and to apply official liability to those state servants (officials) who perform the actions, inter alia, commit misconduct in office, including of a corrupt nature, that are incompatible with the requirements stemming from the Constitution for state service as a system and for persons working in state service.

Thus, under the Constitution, inter alia, Paragraph 1 of Article 30 and Article 109 thereof, and the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law, in administering justice and adjudicating on a dispute regarding an imposed official penalty, inter alia, dismissal from state service, a court (judge) must, in each situation, consider cases in a fair and objective manner and adopt reasoned and well-founded decisions, i.e. fully assess the balance of interests involved in the proceedings: on the one hand, the court (judge) must assess the legitimate aim of the state to properly apply official liability to state servants (officials) who have violated the constitutional requirements raised for state service and state servants and, on the other hand, assess the lawfulness of the investigation into misconduct in office, inter alia, whether the pursued legitimate objectives could be reached in the particular case by other less restrictive measures and whether the constitutional rights or freedoms of the person were violated during such a procedure, inter alia, his/her right to the protection of private life or his/her right to enter state service, among others, by using, in the manner prescribed by law and for the purposes of investigating the misconduct in office committed by him/her, information secretly collected about the person by other authorised state authorities and declassified in the manner established in legal acts where the said information concerns an act with the characteristics of a corruption criminal act. In this context, it needs to be noted that ... under the Constitution, the court (judge) is not and cannot be merely a passive observer of the proceedings; the court (judge) must, in each case, take all possible measures to establish the truth in the case and reach a fair and objective decision, while ensuring the implementation of the law expressed in the Constitution, laws, and other legal acts and guaranteeing the supremacy of law and the protection of human rights and freedoms.

At the same time, it also needs to be noted that, under the Constitution, a state servant (official) must be afforded effective protection against the possible arbitrariness of the authorities in investigating his/her misconduct in office and the real possibility of making use of the judicial protection of his/her constitutional rights and freedoms possibly violated during such an investigation, inter alia, his/her right to the protection of private life and correspondence, which is guaranteed by Article 22 of the Constitution, and the right to enter state service on equal terms, which is enshrined in Paragraph 1 of Article 33 of the Constitution, when challenging, inter alia, the lawfulness, necessity, and proportionality of the use of declassified criminal intelligence information ... as evidence in the course of investigating the misconduct in office of a corrupt nature committed by him/her.

The requirement to ensure the due process of law in the course of the procedure for investigating misconduct in office committed by state servants (officials)

... the Constitution, inter alia, Paragraph 1 of Article 33 thereof, the constitutional concept of state service, the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law, and the constitutional imperatives of justice and reasonableness give rise to the requirement for the legislature that the procedure for imposing official penalties, inter alia, the procedure for investigating the misconduct in office committed by a state servant (official), be also regulated in a manner that ensures the due process. The guarantees of the due process of law during the procedure for investigating misconduct in office also include the ensuring of the constitutional rights of a public servant (official), inter alia, the right to the protection of the inviolability of private life and correspondence, which is guaranteed by Article 22 of the Constitution, and the right to enter state service on equal terms, which is consolidated in Paragraph 1 of Article 33 thereof; the said guarantees also create the preconditions for preventing the unlawful actions of state (municipal) institutions and/or the abuse of the powers granted to them when they apply state coercive measures, inter alia, official liability, including in cases where information secretly collected, in the cases and in accordance with the procedure established in laws, by other authorised state institutions is used in investigating misconduct in office of a corrupt nature, for which the most severe official penalty – the dismissal of the state servant (official) from office – may be applied.

A state servant (official) has the right to be informed of the beginning of an investigation into misconduct in office; he/she has the right, at the beginning of an investigation into misconduct in office and during all this procedure, to have full access to any material, data, or information used in the investigation, inter alia, the information that has been secretly collected about him/her in the course of applying state coercive measures and, in accordance with the procedure established in laws, has been declassified and transferred for use for the purposes of the investigation of misconduct in office; he/she also has the right to have full access to evidence used in this investigation; in addition, he/she has the right to be heard and to present his/her explanations during this procedure when the respective decisions are taken regarding him/her; the state servant (official) has the right to challenge the material or evidence used in the case concerning his/her misconduct in office, to question the lawfulness of such use, to demand that the evidence that he/she considers inadmissible be not used, and to challenge all the factual and legal circumstances relating to the imposition of an official penalty. During the procedure for investigating misconduct in office, it is necessary to ensure the right of the state servant (official) to effective defence, inter alia, the right to have his/her representative.

... as mentioned before, under the Constitution, the due process of the investigation of misconduct in office is when, already during this process, a state servant (official) has the real possibilities of defending himself/herself against the raised suspicions that he/she has committed misconduct in office; he/she has the right, inter alia, to have his/her representative, to be informed of the opening of the investigation of misconduct in office, including the right to have access to the available information on the allegedly committed misconduct in office, as well as the right to submit his/her written explanation regarding the said misconduct in office, to participate in the on-the-spot verification of the factual data relating to the misconduct in office, and, upon the completion of the investigation of the misconduct in office, to have access to the reasoned conclusion on the investigation results and any other material used in the course of the investigation of the misconduct, including the right to have access to all declassified criminal intelligence information, used in the investigation, about an act with the characteristics of a corruption criminal act ...

... under the Constitution, inter alia, Paragraph 1 of Article 33 thereof, and the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law, the legislature should take appropriate measures to consolidate in a law the essential guarantees of the protection of human rights and freedoms in the process of investigating misconduct in office.

The powers of state institutions in investigating the violations of law possibly committed by state servants (officials) to use declassified information collected secretly by other state institutions about the said state servants (officials)

In its ruling of 15 March 2017, interpreting the requirements arising, inter alia, from Article 31 of the Constitution and from the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law, and interpreting the right of a person to defence and to the due process of law, the Constitutional Court also noted that, if investigations and hearings of criminal cases in which persons are suspected and accused of having committed a certain crime do not establish (prove) any characteristics of the body of this crime, but detect the characteristics of other criminal acts or of other violations of law, the state institutions and officials are not released from the duty to investigate them and, if there are grounds, to bring the persons to the respective legal responsibility.

Thus ... under the Constitution, inter alia, Paragraph 1 of Article 33 thereof, the constitutional concept of state service, and the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law, among other things, the imperatives of lawfulness, necessity in a democratic society, and proportionality, which arise from the said principle, if the application by the state of the respective coercive measures, established by law, to a state servant (official) or another person, in particular measures designated for the investigation of criminal acts, does not establish the characteristics (as they have not been proved) of the body of a crime, but detects the characteristics of other possibly committed acts that are contrary to law, inter alia, misconduct in office, including that of a corrupt nature, which are incompatible with the requirements stemming from the Constitution for state servants (officials) (as, for instance, the proper performance of their duties in compliance with the Constitution and law, the avoidance of conflicts between public and private interests, the non-abuse of office, and the adoption of transparent and reasoned decisions), or identifies state servants (officials) who have possibly committed them, state institutions and officials have the duty to properly investigate such violations of law and, if there are grounds, to bring the said state servants (officials) to respective legal responsibility, inter alia, by using, in the cases and according to the procedure established by law, information collected secretly about them by other authorised state institutions, which discloses the above-mentioned violations of law, inter alia, misconduct in office, possibly committed by them.

Such use of this information for investigating misconduct in office is based on the constitutionally important objectives of the protection of the public interest; it aims to protect the interests of the state, state service, and of all society, to prevent, inter alia, corruption in state service, to strengthen the credibility and responsibility of state service and every state servant (official), and to guarantee that only such persons hold the positions of state servants (inter alia, statutory positions) who meet the high requirements established by law, are loyal to the State of Lithuania, and are of good repute.

Otherwise, without the establishment of the possibility of applying official liability to a state servant (official), inter alia, by using information collected about him/her by other authorised state institutions in the cases and according to the procedure established by law, a situation that would not be tolerated under the Constitution would be created – it would not be ensured that persons who have committed misconduct in office would actually be brought to official liability, i.e. the preconditions would be created for working in state service for such persons who do not comply with the requirements arising from the Constitution, such as the proper performance of their duties in compliance with the Constitution and law, loyalty to the State of Lithuania and its constitutional order, the adoption of transparent and reasoned decisions, the avoidance of conflicts between public and private interests, and the non-abuse of office.

The presumption of innocence in investigating misconduct in office possibly committed by state servants (officials)

The presumption of innocence is ensured in Paragraph 1 of Article 31 of the Constitution. The Constitutional Court, when interpreting the presumption of innocence, has held that it is a fundamental principle of the administration of justice in criminal proceedings and one of the most important guarantees of human rights and freedoms (inter alia, the rulings of 12 April 2001 and 24 February 2017). However, the provision of Paragraph 1 of Article 31 of the Constitution ... must be assessed in the context of other provisions of the Constitution; therefore, it has a broader content and must not be linked only to criminal legal relationships (rulings of 29 December 2004 and 24 February 2017). The presumption of innocence is inseparably linked to respect for and the protection of other constitutional human rights and freedoms, as well as acquired rights (ruling of 7 July 2011).

... the presumption of innocence must also be ensured when information collected secretly, in accordance with the procedure established in laws, by other authorised state institutions is transferred for use and/or is used for the purposes of investigating misconduct in office; in this context, it should be mentioned that, in itself, the fact of transferring the said information cannot serve as a basis, in the absence of a proper and thorough investigation of the possibly committed misconduct in office, for considering that the state servant (official) has committed misconduct in office. Such transferred information either may serve as a basis for launching an investigation into a particular instance of misconduct in office or may be used for investigating such misconduct, i.e. in order to establish (prove) the fact of misconduct in office and the circumstances in which it was committed.

... under the Constitution, in cases and under the conditions established by law, the possibility of using, for the purposes of the investigation of misconduct in office, the said declassified information collected by other authorised state institutions may not in itself be assessed as a violation of the principle of the presumption of innocence.

4.4. THE RESPONSIBILITY OF THE AUTHORITIES TO SOCIETY.

THE CONSTITUTIONAL RESPONSIBILITY OF THE HIGHEST-RANKING STATE OFFICIALS

Impeachment (Article 74 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 11 May 1999

In the Lithuanian legal system, impeachment is a constitutional institution. Article 74 of the Constitution prescribes: "The President of the Republic, the President and justices of the Constitutional Court, the President and justices of the Supreme Court, the President and judges of the Court of Appeal, as well as any Members of the Seimas, who grossly violate the Constitution or breach their oath, or are found to have committed a crime, may be removed from office or have the mandate of a Member of the Seimas revoked by a 3/5 majority vote of all the Members of the Seimas. This shall be performed according to the procedure for impeachment proceedings, which shall be established by the Statute of the Seimas."

Some other articles of the Constitution are also important to the impeachment institution: Item 5 of Article 63, Paragraph 2 of Article 86, Item 5 of Article 88, Paragraph 1 of Article 89, Article 105, Item 5 of Article 108, and Article 116. The norms of these articles serve as the constitutional grounds for the impeachment institution.

The following elements of impeachment are established in Article 74 of the Constitution: (1) impeachment as a parliamentary procedure may be applied only to the President of the Republic, the President and justices of the Constitutional Court, the President and justices of the Supreme Court, the President and judges of the Court of Appeal, as well as members of the Seimas; (2) impeachment proceedings may be instituted only for gross violations of the Constitution, a breach of the oath, or when the aforementioned persons are found to have committed a crime; (3) the objective of impeachment proceedings is to decide the question of the constitutional responsibility of the said persons; (4) impeachment is carried out by the Seimas; (5) to remove a person from office or to revoke his/her mandate of a member of the Seimas, a 3/5 majority vote of all the members of the Seimas is necessary.

Under Article 74 of the Constitution, the establishment of the procedure for impeachment proceedings is also within the competence of the Seimas: ...

The provision “according to the procedure for impeachment proceedings, which shall be established by the Statute of the Seimas” presumes the discretion of the Seimas in this sphere. Several grounds for impeachment are established in Article 74 of the Constitution; therefore, the Statute of the Seimas may establish such a procedure for impeachment that would take account of the differences in the constitutional grounds for impeachment. The conformity of the procedure for impeachment with the Constitution depends on whether the Seimas, establishing the particularities of impeachment proceedings, diverges from the constitutional concept of the said procedure.

... the Constitution does not obligate the Seimas to design every particular procedure for impeachment under a single model: other procedures for impeachment may also be established in the Statute of the Seimas; such procedures may apply in specific cases, including those when the actual circumstances of a case are already established by a court.

It needs to be noted that the possibility of regulating the particularities of impeachment proceedings is also determined by the provision of Paragraph 2 of Article 62 of the Constitution, by which members of the Seimas may not be held criminally liable without the consent of the Seimas. The Constitution provides for analogous guarantees for the President of the Constitutional Court and its justices, the President of the Supreme Court and its justices, and the President of the Court of Appeal and its judges.

Impeachment as a parliamentary procedure is only applied to the persons listed in Article 74 of the Constitution. ...

Under Article 74 of the Constitution, one of the grounds for impeachment is “found to have committed a crime”. The phrase “found to have committed a crime” of Article 74 of the Constitution presumes that it transpires that a crime was committed and that the official who committed it was identified. ...

... In a state under the rule of law, every branch of power (legislative, executive, or judicial) fulfils the functions vested in it and carries out its competence. Paragraph 1 of Article 109 of the Constitution provides that, in Lithuania, justice is administered only by courts, whereas, under Article 74 of the Constitution, the Seimas is commissioned to carry out impeachment. When voting on impeachment takes place at the Seimas, the question of the constitutional responsibility, but not that of the criminal responsibility of a person is decided. The removal of a person from office or the revocation of his/her mandate of a member of the Seimas through impeachment proceedings because of the suspicion that he/she has committed a crime is not binding on a court. In its turn, the independence of legislative power and judicial power established in the Constitution determines the fact that a judgment handed down by a court is not binding on the Seimas that adopts a decision on the constitutional responsibility of a person. Otherwise, the constitutional principle of the separation of powers would be violated.

... Giving its consent to hold a person criminally liable, the Seimas also decides that the actual circumstances of the case will be investigated by the judicial institutions – the interrogation and a court – but not by any special investigation commission formed by the Seimas. This means that, if a court recognises that the said person is guilty of committing a crime, it will not be necessary later to submit a separate motion to institute impeachment because of the commission of a crime. It needs to be noted that a formal statement of charges as an independent action, when this is done by members of the Seimas themselves, is not, in this case, a necessary element of impeachment proceedings; however, this would be in line with the constitutional practice of many states.

The constitutional concept of impeachment implies that the objective of impeachment proceedings is the decision of the question of the constitutional responsibility of the persons listed in Article 74 of the Constitution. It is the Seimas that decides on the constitutional sanction no matter whether it conducts the full impeachment proceedings or entrusts the interrogation and a court with the establishment of the actual circumstances of a case. Even in cases where a court has passed a convicting judgment, the constitutional sanction, i.e. the removal of a person from office or the revocation of his/her mandate of a member of the Seimas, is not applied of its own accord. A person is removed from office or his/her mandate of a member of the Seimas is revoked when the qualified majority, i.e. 3/5 of all the members of the Seimas, vote for this.

The responsibility of the authorities to society; impeachment (Article 74 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's conclusion of 31 March 2004

In a democratic state under the rule of law, all state institutions and all officials must follow the Constitution and law. The responsibility of the authorities to society is inseparable from the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law; the said responsibility is constitutionally consolidated by stipulating that state institutions serve the people, that the scope of powers is limited by the Constitution, that state officials who violate the Constitution and laws, who raise personal or group interests above the interests of society, or bring discredit on state power by their actions may be removed from office under the procedure established in laws.

Impeachment is a special procedure provided for in the Constitution, when the issue of the constitutional responsibility of the high state officials indicated in Article 74 of the Constitution is decided, i.e. their removal from office for the following actions provided for in the Constitution: a gross violation of the Constitution, a breach of the oath, or the commission of a crime.

Under the Constitution, the President of the Republic is among those state officials who may be removed from office through impeachment proceedings.

It needs to be noted that the possibility consolidated in the Constitution to remove the President of the Republic from office through impeachment proceedings is a form of public and democratic control over the activities of the President of the Republic, a manner of the constitutional responsibility of the President of the Republic before the Nation, and one of the means of the self-defence of democratic civil society against the abuse of authority by the President of the Republic. Under Article 74 of the Constitution, it is permitted to institute impeachment proceedings against the President of the Republic only for a gross violation of the Constitution, a breach of the oath, or if he/she is found to have committed a crime; only the Seimas may remove the President of the Republic from office, when this is done in accordance with the procedure established in the Statute of the Seimas; the President of the Republic is removed from office only when not less than 3/5 of all the members of the Seimas vote for this.

The powers of the Seimas and of the Constitutional Court in impeachment proceedings (Item 4 of Paragraph 3 of Article 105 and Paragraph 3 of Article 107 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's conclusion of 31 March 2004

Under Item 4 of Paragraph 3 of Article 105 of the Constitution, the Constitutional Court presents a conclusion on whether the concrete actions of members of the Seimas and state officials against whom an impeachment case has been instituted are in conflict with the Constitution. ... under Article 74 of the Constitution, the President of the Republic is among those state officials who may be removed from office through impeachment proceedings.

Paragraph 3 of Article 107 of the Constitution stipulates that, on the basis of the conclusions of the Constitutional Court, the Seimas takes a final decision on the issues specified in Paragraph 3 of Article 105 of the Constitution.

While disclosing the content of the legal regulation established in Item 4 of Paragraph 3 of Article 105 and Paragraph 3 of Article 107 of the Constitution, consideration must be given to the provisions of Article 74 of the Constitution, the provisions of Paragraph 2 of Article 5 of the Constitution, and the constitutional principles of the separation of powers and of a state under the rule of law.

... the Constitution is an integral act ... all provisions of the Constitution are interrelated and constitute a harmonious whole and ... it is not permitted to interpret any norm of the Constitution by disregarding other provisions of the Constitution. In interpreting the Constitution, the linguistic method of interpretation alone may not be applied: it is necessary to make use of the systemic, logical, teleological, and other methods of interpreting law.

It has ... been mentioned that, under Item 4 of Paragraph 3 of Article 105 of the Constitution, the Constitutional Court presents a conclusion on whether the concrete actions of the President of the Republic against whom an impeachment case has been instituted are in conflict with the Constitution; Paragraph 3 of Article 107 of the Constitution stipulates that, on the basis of the conclusions of the Constitutional Court, the Seimas takes a final decision on the issues specified in Paragraph 3 of Article 105 of the Constitution.

Interpreting the said provisions of the Constitution only linguistically and in isolation from other provisions of the Constitution that consolidate the institution of impeachment and the powers of both the Seimas and the Constitutional Court in impeachment proceedings, it might appear that it is possible to assert that, purportedly, the Constitution provides for the legal regulation whereby the Constitutional Court presents a conclusion on whether the concrete actions of the President of the Republic against whom an impeachment case has been instituted are in conflict with the Constitution, while the Seimas takes a final decision whether the actions of the President of the Republic are in conflict with the Constitution.

However, such an interpretation of the aforesaid provisions of the Constitution would be constitutionally groundless.

It needs to be noted that the principle of the separation of powers, which is consolidated in the Constitution, means, inter alia, that, if the Constitution directly establishes the powers of a concrete state institution, no state institution may take over such powers from another state institution, or transfer or waive them; such powers may not be changed or limited by means of a law.

Under Item 4 of Paragraph 3 of Article 105 of the Constitution, the Constitutional Court presents a conclusion on whether the concrete actions of the President of the Republic against whom an impeachment case has been instituted are in conflict with the Constitution. Paragraph 2 of Article 107 of the Constitution provides that the decisions of the Constitutional Court on the issues assigned to its competence by the Constitution are final and not subject to appeal. The presentation of the conclusion specified in Item 4 of Paragraph 3 of Article 105 of the Constitution is one of such issues that, under the Constitution, fall only within the competence of the Constitutional Court. Thus, under the Constitution, a conclusion on whether the concrete actions of the President of the Republic against whom an impeachment case has been instituted are in conflict with the Constitution is final and not subject to appeal.

It has been mentioned that, under Paragraph 3 of Article 107 of the Constitution, on the basis of the conclusions of the Constitutional Court, the Seimas takes a final decision on the issues specified in Paragraph 3 of Article 105 of the Constitution. Assessing the interrelation of the provisions of Item 4 of Paragraph 3 of Article 105 and Paragraph 3 of Article 107 of the Constitution, it is impossible to disregard the provisions of Article 74 of the Constitution, according to which the Seimas may, by a 3/5 majority vote of all the members of the Seimas, remove the President of the Republic from office for a gross violation of the Constitution, a breach of the oath, or if he/she is found to have committed a crime.

The provision of Paragraph 3 of Article 107 of the Constitution that, on the basis of the conclusions of the Constitutional Court, the Seimas takes a final decision on the issues set forth in Paragraph 3 of Article 105 of the Constitution, means that, in cases where impeachment proceedings are instituted against the President of the Republic for a gross violation of the Constitution, the Seimas has the duty to apply to the Constitutional Court and to request a conclusion on whether the actions of the President of the Republic are in conflict with the Constitution. ...

The provision of Paragraph 2 of Article 107 of the Constitution, whereby the decisions of the Constitutional Court on the issues assigned to its competence by the Constitution are final and not subject to appeal, also means that, when deciding whether or not to remove the President of the Republic from office, the Seimas may not reject, question, or change the Constitutional Court's conclusion that the concrete actions of the President of the Republic are (or are not) in conflict with the Constitution. No such powers are assigned to the Seimas by the Constitution. The Constitutional Court's conclusion that the concrete actions of the President of the Republic are in conflict (or are not in conflict) with the Constitution is binding on the Seimas insofar as the Constitution does not empower it to decide whether the conclusion of the Constitutional Court is well founded and legal – it is only the Constitutional Court that may establish the legal fact that the actions of the President of the Republic are (or are not) in conflict with the Constitution.

Under Article 74 of the Constitution, it is only the Seimas that can remove the President of the Republic from office for a gross violation of the Constitution.

Thus, the Constitution provides for the different functions of the Seimas and of the Constitutional Court in impeachment proceedings, and establishes particular powers necessary to implement these functions: the Constitutional Court decides whether the concrete actions of the President of the Republic are in conflict with the Constitution and presents a conclusion to the Seimas (Item 4 of Paragraph 3 of Article 105 of the Constitution), while the Seimas, if the President of the Republic grossly violated the Constitution, decides whether to remove the President of the Republic from office (Article 74 of the Constitution). Thus, the provision of Paragraph 3 of Article 107 of the Constitution, whereby the Seimas takes a final decision on the issues set forth in Paragraph 3 of Article 105 of the Constitution, in conjunction with the provision of Article 74 of the Constitution, according to which only the Seimas decides the issue of the removal of the President of the Republic from office through impeachment proceedings, and in conjunction with the provision of Paragraph 2 of Article 107 of the Constitution, under which the conclusion of the Constitutional Court is final and not subject of appeal, means that, under Paragraph 3 of Article 107 of the Constitution, the Seimas has the powers to decide whether to remove the President of the Republic from office, but does not have the powers to decide whether the concrete actions of the President of the Republic are in conflict with the Constitution.

It should be noted that the constitutional provision whereby only the Constitutional Court has the powers to decide (through its conclusions on the matter) whether the concrete actions of the President of the Republic are in conflict with the Constitution consolidates the guarantee for the President of the Republic that he/she will not be held constitutionally liable unreasonably. Thus, if the Constitutional Court reaches the conclusion that the actions of the President of the Republic are not in conflict with the Constitution, the Seimas may not remove the President of the Republic from office for a gross violation of the Constitution.

A gross violation of the Constitution as grounds for impeachment (Article 74 of the Constitution)

... under the Constitution, the Constitutional Court presents a conclusion on whether concrete actions of the President of the Republic are in conflict with the Constitution. The statement that the actions of the President of the Republic are in conflict with the Constitution also means that the President of the Republic violated the Constitution. However, not every violation of the Constitution is in itself a gross violation of the Constitution.

It needs to be emphasised that, when deciding whether the actions of the President of the Republic have grossly violated the Constitution, it is necessary to assess, in each case, the content of the concrete actions of the President of the Republic, as well as the circumstances of their performance.

In its ruling of 30 December 2003, the Constitutional Court held that the Constitution is grossly violated in all cases when the President of the Republic breaches the oath.

The Constitution would be violated grossly by the actions of the President of the Republic in cases where the President of the Republic would hold office in bad faith, would act not in the interests of the Nation and the state but in his/her personal interests, those of individual persons or their groups, would act for other purposes and in other interests that are incompatible with the Constitution, laws, and public interests, or would knowingly fail to perform the duties established for the President of the Republic in the Constitution and laws.

... under the Constitution, only the Constitutional Court has the powers to decide whether the concrete actions of the President of the Republic are in conflict with the Constitution, thus, whether the President of the Republic violated the Constitution; the Constitution does not provide for such powers for the Seimas. The Seimas, having no powers to adopt a decision whether the President of the Republic violated the Constitution, does not have the constitutional powers to decide whether the President of the Republic grossly violated the Constitution. The establishment of a violation of the Constitution is a matter of a legal, but not political, assessment; therefore, the legal issues – the fact of a violation of the Constitution, thus, also that of a gross violation of the Constitution, can only be established by the institution of judicial power – the Constitutional Court. The interpretation that the Seimas may establish the fact of a gross violation of the Constitution would constitutionally be groundless, since this would mean that the legal issue whether the President of the Republic violated the Constitution, whether the Constitution has been violated grossly, could be decided not by the institution of judicial power – the Constitutional Court, which, as all other courts, is formed on a professional basis, but by the Seimas, an institution of state power that, by its nature and essence, is an institution of a political character, whose decisions reflect the political will of the majority of the members of the Seimas, whose decisions are based on political agreements, various political compromises, etc. It is evident that the Seimas, an institution of a political character, may not decide whether the President of the Republic violated the Constitution, whether the violation of the Constitution is a gross one, i.e. it may not decide an issue of law. Otherwise, the statement of the fact of a violation of the Constitution and that of a gross violation of the Constitution could be based on political arguments, while the constitutional responsibility of the President of the Republic might arise from the statement that the Constitution has grossly been violated where such a statement would be based on political arguments. The Constitution contains such a legal regulation whereby only the Constitutional Court has the powers to decide whether the President of the Republic violated the Constitution, and whether the violation of the Constitution is a gross one. The Seimas, any other state institution, or any state official are not granted such powers under the Constitution.

It needs to be noted that the constitutional regulation under which only the Constitutional Court has the powers to decide whether the President of the Republic grossly violated the Constitution is the constitutional guarantee for the President of the Republic that constitutional responsibility – removal from office for a gross violation of the Constitution – will not be applied against him/her unreasonably.

... under Article 74 of the Constitution, it is only the Seimas that decides whether to remove the President of the Republic from office for a gross violation of the Constitution, a breach of the oath, or when he/she is found to have committed a crime. If the grounds for impeachment are a gross violation of the Constitution, the Seimas may decide the issue of the removal of the President of the Republic from office only after receiving the conclusion of the Constitutional Court that the President of the Republic grossly violated the Constitution. This is the constitutional guarantee for the President of the Republic that constitutional responsibility will not be applied against him/her unreasonably.

It needs to be noted that, under the Constitution, during impeachment proceedings at the Seimas, neither the fact whether actions of the President of the Republic are in conflict with the Constitution nor the fact whether the President of the Republic grossly violated the Constitution is decided. Under the Constitution, this is decided exclusively by the Constitutional Court. During impeachment proceedings at the Seimas, only the question of the constitutional responsibility of the President of the Republic is decided, i.e. only the question whether to remove the President of the Republic from office for a gross violation of the Constitution. The removal of the President of the Republic from office is a constitutional sanction for a gross violation of the Constitution. It has been mentioned that, under Article 74 of the Constitution, it is only the Seimas that may adopt a decision on the application of the constitutional sanction, i.e. on the removal of the President of the Republic from office.

Impeachment proceedings in the Seimas (Article 74 of the Constitution)

Under Article 74 of the Constitution, the procedure for impeachment proceedings is established by the Statute of the Seimas. Article 76 of the Constitution provides that the Statute of the Seimas has the force of a law.

It needs to be noted that the Seimas has discretion in implementing the procedure for impeachment proceedings; however, it is bound by the constitutional concept of impeachment (ruling of 11 May 1999). Therefore, the procedure of impeachment proceedings established in the Statute of the Seimas must be such that fair legal proceedings would be ensured in order to properly investigate the circumstances of an impeachment case and adopt a just decision on the constitutional responsibility of a person. The norms regulating impeachment must not only create the possibility of removing a person from office, but also to ensure the rights of impeached persons.

... Under Paragraph 2 of Article 107 of the Constitution, a conclusion of the Constitutional Court is final and not subject to appeal; therefore, it is evident that the part of impeachment proceedings ... i.e. interrogation, as well as the legal norms ... regulating interrogation, may be applied only when the grounds for impeachment are not a gross violation of the Constitution or a breach of the oath, but when the grounds for impeachment are “found to have committed a crime”, and provided that there is no effective convicting court judgment in regard of an impeached person. Taking account of the fact that, under Paragraph 1 of Article 86 of the Constitution, the President of the Republic, while in office, may be neither detained nor held criminally liable, the conclusion should be drawn that interrogation as part of impeachment proceedings is possible only when the President of the Republic is held constitutionally liable on the basis established in Article 74 of the Constitution, i.e. when he/she is found to have committed a crime, also, when, on the same basis, i.e. when they are found to have committed a crime, the other subjects specified in Article 74 of the Constitution are held constitutionally liable provided that there are no effective convicting court judgments in their regard. ...

In its ruling of 11 May 1999, the Constitutional Court held that the constitutional concept of impeachment implies fair judicial proceedings in which priority is given to the protection of the rights of individuals. When guaranteeing the protection of the rights of individuals, it is necessary to pay regard to the fundamental principles of a state under the rule of law; such principles require that jurisdictional and other law-applying institutions be impartial and independent, that they seek to establish the objective truth, and that they adopt their decisions only on the grounds of law. This is possible only if the proceedings are public, the parties to the proceedings have equal rights, and the legal disputes, in particular those regarding the rights of a person, are decided by ensuring that a particular person has the right and possibility of defending those rights. In a state under the rule of law, the right of individuals to defend their rights is unquestionable. Since the Seimas, deciding the question of removing a person from office or that of revoking his/her mandate, acts as a jurisdictional institution, impeachment proceedings are subject to the same requirements. In the same ruling, the Constitutional Court noted that, when the question of constitutional or any other responsibility is decided, the aforesaid principles of a state under the rule of law are implemented through the procedural rights of a person against whom this sanction is applied and through the guarantees of such rights. The recognition of the rights of an individual is a necessary element of the rule of law. In the course of impeachment in the Seimas, it is necessary to ensure the right of a person whose constitutional responsibility is decided to take part in the proceedings and to defend himself/herself. Before adopting its decision, the Seimas must also hear the other party (audi alteram partem).

In view of the fact that, in the course of impeachment proceedings in the Seimas, the fact whether the concrete actions of the President of the Republic are in conflict with the Constitution or the fact whether the President of the Republic violated the Constitution grossly is not decided (under the Constitution, this can be decided only by the Constitutional Court) – in other words, only the fact whether to remove the President of the Republic from office for a gross violation of the Constitution is decided during impeachment proceedings in the Seimas; therefore, the conclusion should be drawn that, in the course of impeachment proceedings in the Seimas, only the evidence that confirms or denies the necessity to remove the President of the Republic from office for a gross violation of the Constitution is investigated; however, the evidence that confirms or denies the fact that the President of the Republic performed the actions by which he/she grossly violated the Constitution is not investigated during impeachment proceedings in the Seimas. ...

The Constitutional Court notes that the right of the President of the Republic, the issue of whose constitutional responsibility is decided in accordance with impeachment proceedings in the Seimas, to participate in the proceedings, to give explanations, and to defend himself/herself must not be restricted. This right must be ensured.

The powers of the Constitutional Court to investigate and assess evidence in impeachment proceedings

The Constitutional Court's conclusion of 31 March 2004

Under the Constitution, it is only the Constitutional Court that has the powers to decide whether the concrete actions of the President of the Republic against whom an impeachment case has been instituted are in conflict with the Constitution, and whether the President of the Republic has grossly violated the Constitution. Thus, the constitutional duty is established for the Constitutional Court to investigate whether the President of the Republic performed the concrete actions pointed out in the charge brought against him/her, to assess whether these actions are in conflict with the Constitution and whether the Constitution was grossly violated. When investigating whether the concrete actions of the President of the Republic are in conflict with the Constitution and whether the Constitution was grossly violated, the Constitutional Court investigates and assesses the evidence provided to the Constitutional Court along with the inquiry, as well as all other evidence received in the course of the investigation of the case at the Constitutional Court, where the said evidence confirms or denies the fact that the President of the Republic performed the concrete actions specified in the inquiry, or confirms or denies the fact that these actions are in conflict with the Constitution or the fact that the Constitution was grossly violated.

The state institutions participating in impeachment proceedings (Article 74 and Item 4 of Paragraph 3 of Article 105 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 15 April 2004

... impeachment is a special parliamentary procedure provided for in the Constitution when the issue of the constitutional responsibility of the President of the Republic, the President and justices of the Constitutional Court, the President and justices of the Supreme Court, the President and judges of the Court of Appeal, or of members of the Seimas is decided. Article 74 of the Constitution provides that only the Seimas may remove these persons from office or revoke the mandate of a member of the Seimas.

It needs to be noted that, under the Constitution, in order that constitutional responsibility would be applied reasonably, in cases where impeachment proceedings against the President of the Republic, the President and justices of the Constitutional Court, the President and justices of the Supreme Court, the President and judges of the Court of Appeal, or members of the Seimas are instituted because of a gross violation of the Constitution or a breach of the oath, the Seimas must apply to the Constitutional Court, requesting a conclusion whether concrete actions of a member of the Seimas or those of a state official against whom an impeachment case has been instituted are in conflict with the Constitution. The Seimas may decide the issue of removing this person from office or that of the revocation of the mandate of a member of the Seimas only after it receives the conclusion of the Constitutional Court that the concrete actions of a member of the Seimas or those of a state official against whom an impeachment case has been instituted are in conflict with the Constitution (Item 4 of Paragraph 3 of Article 105 of the Constitution).

Thus, under the Constitution, only two institutions of state power have the powers in impeachment proceedings, i.e. the Seimas and the Constitutional Court. According to the Constitution, the Constitutional Court decides (presents a conclusion) whether the concrete actions of a member of the Seimas or those of a state official against whom an impeachment case has been instituted are in conflict with the Constitution and whether the Constitution has been violated grossly by these actions, whereas the Seimas decides, under the procedure for impeachment proceedings, whether to remove such a person from office (to revoke the mandate of a member of the Seimas).

... under Article 74 of the Constitution, one of the grounds for impeachment is “found to have committed a crime”. It should be noted that it is permitted to stipulate in the Statute of the Seimas, while paying regard to the concept of impeachment consolidated in the Constitution, that, in cases where the fact of the commission of a crime is clear, the Seimas, when it conducts impeachment, may state such a fact without an investigation carried out by legal institutions. In its 11 May 1999 ruling, the Constitutional Court stated that “the removal of a person from office or the revocation of his/her mandate of a member of the Seimas through impeachment proceedings because of the suspicion that he/she has committed a crime is not binding on a court”. It also needs to be noted that, in cases where the fact of the commission of a crime is not clear, the Seimas, under the Constitution, may not conduct impeachment on the grounds of the fact of the commission of a crime as long as a convicting court judgment has not been adopted and gone into effect.

Thus, the Constitution consolidates such a concept of impeachment where the Seimas conducts impeachment, while the Constitutional Court presents a conclusion on whether the concrete actions of a member of the Seimas or those of a state official against whom an impeachment case has been instituted are in conflict with the Constitution. No other institutions are granted powers by the Constitution to participate in the conduct of impeachment.

The initiation of impeachment (Article 74 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 15 April 2004

It has been mentioned that, under the Constitution, the Seimas conducts impeachment, while the Constitutional Court presents a conclusion on whether concrete actions of a state official or a member of the Seimas against whom an impeachment case has been instituted are in conflict with the Constitution. No other institutions are granted powers by the Constitution to participate in the conduct of impeachment.

The first stage of impeachment proceedings is the initiation of impeachment. Article 74 of the Constitution provides that the procedure for impeachment proceedings is established by the Statute of the Seimas. Under Article 76 of the Constitution, the structure and procedure of activities of the Seimas are established by the Statute of the Seimas. ... according to the Constitution, impeachment proceedings take place in the Seimas and no state institution is permitted to interfere with the constitutional powers of the Seimas to conduct impeachment if this is not provided for in the Constitution. This implies that impeachment may be initiated only in the Seimas, that, it should be emphasised, the initiative of impeachment may come only from members of the Seimas. It needs to be noted that, when account is taken of the importance of the constitutional institute of impeachment as a means of self-defence of the civil Nation, where the said means is applied by the Seimas, also of the fact that impeachment may be applied against high state officials, only a sufficiently large group of members of the Seimas may have the right to initiate impeachment proceedings. On the other hand, if a too large number of members of such a group of members of the Seimas were established, the democratic nature of the impeachment institution would be denied.

It needs to be noted that, if, when laying down the initiation of impeachment, the Statute of the Seimas stipulated that impeachment may be initiated not in the Seimas, that the initiative of impeachment may rise not from members of the Seimas, that other state institutions may propose that impeachment be instituted, then the constitutional concept of impeachment would be disregarded and the constitutional prerogative of the Seimas to conduct impeachment would be interfered with.

In this context, it should be noted that the legal regulation of the initiation of impeachment in the Statute of the Seimas may, according to the Constitution, have particularities in cases where a convicting court judgment is adopted and is effective in regard of a certain person. In its ruling of 11 May 1999, the Constitutional Court held that such a regulation of impeachment procedure where this is done by members of the Seimas themselves is not the only form possible for initiating impeachment proceedings. Giving its consent to hold a person criminally liable, the Seimas also decides that the actual circumstances of the case will be investigated by the judicial institutions – the interrogation and a court – but not by any special investigation commission formed by the Seimas. This means that, if a court recognises that the said person is guilty of committing a crime, it will not be necessary later to submit a separate motion to institute impeachment because of the commission of a crime. A formal statement of charges as an independent action, when this is done by members of the Seimas themselves, is not, in this case, a necessary element of impeachment proceedings.

It needs to be emphasised that, after the Seimas receives an effective convicting court judgment, such a court judgment and decisions of other courts adopted in the course of the consideration of a criminal case are not deliberated at the time of the impeachment proceedings conducted in the Seimas, nor are their lawfulness or reasonableness discussed. In such a case, the Seimas decides only the issue of removing a certain state official from office (revoking the mandate of a member of the Seimas).

The responsibility of state officials to society; impeachment (Article 74 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 25 May 2004

Where state officials perform their functions while observing the Constitution and law and acting in the interests of the Nation and the State of Lithuania, they must be protected against any pressure and unjustified interference with their activities, and, where they conscientiously perform their duties, they must not be subject to any threats directed against their person, rights, or freedoms. State officials must have the confidence of the citizens – the national community. However, in order that the citizens – the national community – could reasonably trust state officials so that it would be possible to ascertain that all state institutions and all state officials follow the Constitution and law and obey them, and that those who do not obey the Constitution and law would not hold the office for which the confidence of the citizens – the national community – is needed, it is necessary to ensure public democratic control over the activity of the state officials and their accountability to society comprising, inter alia, the possibility of removing from office those state officials who violate the Constitution and law, who bring their personal interests or the interests of a certain group above the public interests, or who bring discredit on state authority by their actions. One of the forms of such public democratic control is the constitutional institution of impeachment: certain top officials of state power – the President of the Republic, the President and justices of the Constitutional Court, the President and justices of the Supreme Court, the President and judges of the Court of Appeal – for a gross violation of the Constitution, a breach of the oath, or when they are found to have committed a crime, may be removed from office or the mandate of a member of the Seimas may be revoked according to the procedure for impeachment proceedings. The application of the institution of impeachment – a special parliamentary procedure and the constitutional sanction of removal from office, which is consolidated in the Constitution, in respect of the President of the Republic, the President and justices of the Constitutional Court, the President and justices of the Supreme Court, and the President and judges of the Court of Appeal – is one of the measures of the self-protection of the national community, the civil Nation, a way of its own defence from the aforesaid high officials of state power if they ignore the Constitution and law where they are prohibited from holding certain office, as they do not fulfil their obligation unconditionally to follow the Constitution and law and to follow the interests of the Nation and the State of Lithuania, and who bring discredit on state authority by their actions.

... impeachment is a special parliamentary procedure, when the high state officials indicated in Article 74 of the Constitution are removed from office: under Article 74 of the Constitution, the President of the Republic, the President and justices of the Constitutional Court, the President and justices of the Supreme Court, the President and judges of the Court of Appeal may be removed from office or the mandate of a member of the Seimas may be revoked in accordance with the procedure for impeachment proceedings. It needs to be stressed that impeachment is possible only if there are the grounds indicated in Article 74 of the Constitution: a gross violation of the Constitution, a breach of the oath, or when the specified persons are found to have committed a crime.

In its ruling of 15 April 2004, the Constitutional Court held that, under the Constitution, two institutions of state power have the powers in impeachment proceedings, i.e. the Seimas and the Constitutional Court. Each of these state institutions are assigned, under the Constitution, the powers that are in line with their functions in impeachment proceedings: an impeachment case may be instituted only on a motion (initiative) of members of the Seimas; a conclusion on whether the concrete actions of a person against whom an impeachment case has been instituted are in conflict with the Constitution is presented by the Constitutional Court; if the Constitutional Court draws the conclusion that a person against whom an impeachment case has been instituted has grossly violated the Constitution, the Seimas may remove such a person from office or may revoke his/her mandate of a member of the Seimas by not less than 3/5 majority vote of all the members of the Seimas.

Under the Constitution, only the Constitutional Court has the powers to decide whether the persons specified in Article 74 of the Constitution, against whom an impeachment procedure has been initiated, have grossly violated the Constitution (in view of the fact that a gross violation of the Constitution constitutes also a breach of the oath, it has the powers to decide whether such persons breached the oath). The conclusion of the Constitutional Court that a person has grossly violated the Constitution (and, thus, has also breached the oath) is final. No other state institution, no other state official, and no other subject may change or revoke such a conclusion of the Constitutional Court. Under the Constitution, such a conclusion may not be changed or revoked by referendum, by election, or in any other way.

Article 2 of the Constitution provides that sovereignty belongs to the Nation. Article 4 of the Constitution stipulates that the Nation executes its supreme sovereign power either directly or through its democratically elected representatives. According to Paragraph 1 of Article 55 of the Constitution, members of the Seimas are representatives of the Nation. Thus, under the Constitution, only the Seimas is the representation of the Nation, through which the Nation executes its supreme sovereign power. It should be stressed that, according to the Constitution, there must not be and there is no confrontation between the supreme sovereign power executed by the Nation directly and the supreme sovereign power executed by the Nation through its democratically elected representatives – members of the Seimas. Thus, under the Constitution, there must not be and there is no confrontation between the Nation and its representation – the Seimas: the Seimas implements those powers that have been assigned to it by the Nation in the Constitution adopted by the Nation.

According to the Constitution, if there are the grounds provided for in Article 74 of the Constitution, only the Seimas has the powers to decide whether to remove a person from office or to revoke his/her mandate of a member of the Seimas according to the procedure for impeachment proceedings – these issues may not be decided by referendum or election, and these issues may not be decided by any other state institution, state official, or other subject.

The Seimas, as the representation of the Nation, through which the Nation executes its supreme sovereign power, acts according to the powers pursuant to the Constitution vested in the Seimas by the Nation. Consequently, a decision of the Seimas as the representation of the Nation to remove from office a state official indicated in Article 74 of the Constitution, or to revoke the mandate of a member of the Seimas according to the procedure for impeachment proceedings is, at the same time, the execution of the sovereign powers of the Nation through its democratically elected representatives. Since, under the Constitution, only the Seimas may decide whether to remove from office a certain state official specified in Article 74 of the Constitution, or to revoke the mandate of a member of the Seimas according to the procedure for impeachment proceedings, such a decision of the Seimas may not be changed or revoked by referendum, by election, or in any other way. Consequently, if the Seimas, while following the Constitution, removes from office a state official specified in Article 74 of the Constitution or revokes his/her mandate of a member of the Seimas through impeachment proceedings, such a decision of the Seimas is final.

The President of the Republic is among those state officials indicated in Article 74 of the Constitution who may be removed from office by the Seimas according to the procedure for impeachment proceedings. The impeachment of the President of the Republic in the Seimas is not a legal dispute between the President of the Republic, one of the institutions executing state power, and the Seimas, another institution executing state power. The impeachment of the President of the Republic is a manner of the constitutional responsibility of a person who holds the office of the President of the Republic to the Nation: the Nation through its representation, the Seimas, decides whether a person holding the office of the President of the Republic who has grossly violated the Constitution, breached the oath, or committed a crime should be removed from office.

A gross violation of the Constitution or a breach of the oath undermines the trust in the institution of the President of the Republic and, at the same time, weakens the trust in state authority as a whole and in the State of Lithuania. Impeachment, when a person who has grossly violated the Constitution or breached the oath is removed from the office of the President of the Republic, is one of the ways of the protection of the state as the common good of all society, as provided for in the Constitution.

It needs to be stressed that, under the Constitution, a person in respect of whom the Seimas, following the conclusion of the Constitutional Court that the President of the Republic has committed a gross violation of the Constitution and breached the oath, has applied the constitutional sanction – removal from office, may not escape constitutional responsibility through a new election of the President of the Republic, by a referendum, or by any other means. It should also be stressed that, under the Constitution, neither a referendum nor a new election of the President of the Republic may be and is a way of expressing the trust or mistrust of the citizens in the Seimas after it removes from office the President of the Republic through impeachment proceedings.

Under the Constitution, only the Seimas has the powers to decide whether to remove from office the President of the Republic through impeachment proceedings for a gross violation of the Constitution, a breach of the oath, or the commission of a crime. When evaluating the relationship between the constitutional powers of the Constitutional Court and the Seimas during the impeachment procedure, it needs to be noted that the conclusion of the Constitutional Court that the actions of the President of the Republic are (are not) in conflict with the Constitution is binding on the Seimas insofar as the Constitution does not empower the Seimas to decide whether the conclusion of the Constitutional Court is well founded and lawful – it is only the Constitutional Court that may establish the legal fact that the actions of the President of the Republic are (or are not) in conflict with the Constitution (conclusion of 31 March 2004). Although members of the Seimas, when deciding the issue of the removal of the President of the Republic from office for a gross violation of the Constitution, or a breach of the oath, vote freely, still, this does not mean that members of the Seimas, when deciding whether to remove the President of the Republic from office for a gross violation of the Constitution, or a breach of the oath through impeachment proceedings, are not bound by the oath of a member of the Seimas taken by them, which obligates a member of the Seimas in his/her activity to follow the Constitution, the interests of the state, and his/her conscience, and not to be bound by any mandates. The free mandate of a member of the Seimas, which is consolidated in the Constitution, may not be understood as permission for a member of the Seimas always to act at discretion, to follow his/her conscience, and to ignore the Constitution. The Constitution implies such a notion of the discretion of a member of the Seimas and the conscience of a member of the Seimas whereby no gap must exist between the discretion of a member of the Seimas and the conscience of a member of the Seimas, on the one hand, and the requirements of the Constitution, as well as the values protected and defended by the Constitution, on the other hand: according to the Constitution, the discretion of a member of the Seimas and his/her conscience must be oriented towards the Constitution and the interests of the Nation and the State of Lithuania. Therefore, an especially great responsibility is borne by the Seimas when deciding whether to remove from office the President of the Republic through impeachment proceedings for a gross violation of the Constitution and a breach of the oath: in a democratic state under the rule of law, a person who grossly violates the Constitution or breaches the oath must not escape constitutional responsibility – removal from office.

The prohibition preventing persons removed from office through impeachment proceedings from entering office that requires taking an oath

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 25 May 2004

The Constitution does not provide that, upon the lapse of a certain period of time, the President of the Republic whose actions were declared by the Constitutional Court to have grossly violated the Constitution and he/she himself was declared to have breached the oath, and was removed from office by the Seimas for a breach of the oath and a gross violation of the Constitution, could be treated as one who has not breached the oath or as one who has not grossly violated the Constitution. Under the Constitution, the President of the Republic whose actions were declared by the Constitutional Court as those that grossly violated the Constitution and who has been removed from office through impeachment proceedings by the Seimas, the representation of the Nation, will always remain a person who breached his/her oath to the Nation and grossly violated the Constitution and who was dismissed as the President of the Republic for this reason.

... the Constitution consolidates such an organisation of institutions executing state power and such a procedure for their formation where all institutions executing state power, as well as other institutions, must be formed only from such citizens who without reservations obey the Constitution adopted by the Nation and who, while in office, unconditionally follow the Constitution, law, and the interests of the Nation and the State of Lithuania. ... the elected President of the Republic, according to the Constitution, may begin to hold office only after he/she takes an oath to the Nation to be faithful to the Republic of Lithuania and the Constitution, to conscientiously perform the duties of his/her office, and to be equally just to all.

Under the Constitution, a person who was elected as the President of the Republic, who took the oath of the President of the Republic to the Nation, and subsequently breached this oath and, thus, grossly violated the Constitution, and who, on that account, was removed from office through impeachment proceedings by the Seimas, the representation of the Nation, may not take an oath to the Nation once again, as there would always exist a reasonable doubt, which would never disappear, regarding the certainty and reliability of the repeatedly taken oath; thus, the doubts would always remain as to whether this person would really perform his/her duties of the President of the Republic in the manner that he/she is obliged by the oath to the Nation and whether this person would again breach the oath to the Nation, that is, whether the oath repeatedly taken by this person to the Nation would be fictitious.

... impeachment is one of the forms of public and democratic control over state officials, one of the measures of the self-protection of the national community – the civil Nation, a way of its self-defence against the aforementioned high officials of state power who disregard the Constitution and law, where the said officials are no longer permitted to hold certain office, as they do not fulfil their obligation to unconditionally follow the Constitution, law, as well as the interests of the Nation and the State of Lithuania. It has ... been mentioned that the President of the Republic whose actions are declared by the Constitutional Court as ones that grossly violated the Constitution and who was dismissed as the President of the Republic by the Seimas, the representation of the Nation, following impeachment proceedings, will always remain a person who breached the oath taken to the Nation, who grossly violated the Constitution, and who was dismissed as the President of the Republic for this reason.

Removing from office through impeachment proceedings the President of the Republic or any other person indicated in Article 74 of the Constitution who breaches the oath and grossly violates the Constitution is not an objective in itself. The purpose of the constitutional institution of impeachment is not exclusively a one-off removal of such persons from office; it has a much broader purpose – to prevent persons who grossly violate the Constitution and breach the oath from holding such a constitutionally provided office that is linked with taking an oath specified in the Constitution. The content of the constitutional sanction (constitutional responsibility) applied upon the procedure for impeachment proceedings is composed both of the removal of a person who grossly violates the Constitution and breaches the oath from office, and also of the prohibition stemming therefrom preventing such a person from holding any office provided for in the Constitution that can be entered only after taking the oath provided for in the Constitution. The said prohibition on holding such office established in the Constitution where entering the said office requires taking an oath provided for in the Constitution is a constituent part of the constitutional sanction – removal from office, but not a repeated punishment of a person who grossly violated the Constitution and breached the oath, and not a second “punishment” imposed on the person for the same violation of the Constitution; such a prohibition also reflects the very essence, mission, and purpose of both constitutional responsibility and impeachment as a measure of the self-protection of the national community – the civil Nation; the said essence, mission, and purpose of impeachment and constitutional responsibility are to ensure that a person who grossly violated the Constitution and breached the oath, and was removed from office by the Seimas for the said reason, could never hold office that requires taking an oath specified in the Constitution.

The Constitution consolidates such a legal regulation whereby a person who was removed from the office of the President of the Republic by the Seimas following impeachment proceedings for a breach of the oath and a gross violation of the Constitution may never stand for election as the President of the Republic. A different interpretation of the provisions of the Constitution would make legally meaningless and pointless the constitutional institution of impeachment for a gross violation of the Constitution and a breach of the oath; in addition, a different interpretation of the provisions of the Constitution would be incompatible with the essence and purpose of constitutional responsibility for a breach of the oath and a gross violation of the Constitution, with the essence and purpose of the oath established in the Constitution as a constitutional value, as well as with the requirement, which arises from the overall constitutional legal regulation, that all institutions executing state power and other state institutions be formed only from such citizens who without reservations obey the Constitution adopted by the Nation and who, while in office, unconditionally follow the Constitution, law, as well as the interests of the Nation and the State of Lithuania. A different interpretation of the provisions of the Constitution would be inconsistent with both the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law and the constitutional imperative of an open, just, and harmonious civil society.

... The Constitution consolidates such a legal regulation where, under the Constitution, a person whose mandate of a member of the Seimas was revoked through impeachment proceedings for a gross violation of the Constitution and a breach of the oath, or where a person was removed from the office of the President of the Republic, the President and a justice of the Constitutional Court, the President and a justice of the Supreme Court, the President and a judge of the Court of Appeal for a gross violation of the Constitution and a breach of the oath may never stand for election as the President of the Republic, a member of the Seimas, may never hold the office of a justice of the Constitutional Court, a justice of the Supreme Court, a judge of the Court of Appeal, a judge at another court, a member of the Government, or the Auditor General, i.e. may not hold such office established in the Constitution where, according to the Constitution, entering the said office requires taking an oath provided for in the Constitution. A different interpretation of the provisions of the Constitution would make legally meaningless and pointless the constitutional institution of impeachment for a gross violation of the Constitution and a breach of the oath; in addition, a different interpretation of the provisions of the Constitution would be incompatible with the essence and purpose of constitutional responsibility for a breach of the oath and a gross violation of the Constitution, with the essence and purpose of the oath established in the Constitution as a constitutional value, as well as with the requirement, which arises from the overall constitutional legal regulation, that all institutions executing state power and other state institutions be formed only from such citizens who without reservations obey the Constitution adopted by the Nation and who, while in office, unconditionally follow the Constitution, law, as well as the interests of the Nation and the State of Lithuania. A crime as the grounds for impeachment (Paragraph 2 of Article 56 and Article 74 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 25 May 2004

One of the grounds laid down in Article 74 of the Constitution under which a certain official specified in Article 74 of the Constitution may be removed from office or his/her mandate of a member of the Seimas may be revoked is “found to have committed a crime”. When disclosing what constitutional consequences arise in respect to a person due to the fact that he/she was removed from office, or his/her mandate of a Seimas member was revoked following impeachment proceedings for the commission of a crime, account must also be taken of the provision, which is laid down in Paragraph 2 of Article 56 of the Constitution, whereby persons who have not served punishment imposed by a court judgment may not stand for election as a member of the Seimas. This constitutional provision also means that, if a person sentenced by a court for having committed a crime has served punishment imposed by a court judgment, he/she may stand for election as a member of the Seimas.

In this context, it should be mentioned that crimes provided for in the criminal law may be not only grave, but also minor ones, they may be committed not only intentionally, but also due to negligence, they may be more dangerous or less dangerous, they may cause especially severe consequences or consequences not that severe, they may be committed due to selfish or unselfish intentions, they may be related or not related to the duties performed (office held), etc. As such, the commission of a crime does not mean that a person has, at the same time, violated the Constitution, or breached the oath, or that, in his/her activity, the said person has not observed the Constitution, or failed to act in the interests of the Nation and the State of Lithuania, etc. Some crimes may also be of such a nature that they do not interrelate directly with a breach of the oath provided for in the Constitution or a gross violation of the Constitution. Therefore, the Constitution itself (Paragraph 2 of Article 56) establishes expressis verbis an exception in respect to the consequences that arise due to the fact that a person was removed from office or his/her mandate of a member of the Seimas was revoked following impeachment proceedings for the commission of a crime. It follows from the provisions of Article 74 and Paragraph 2 of Article 56 of the Constitution that a crime by which the Constitution is not grossly violated and the oath is not breached does not cause the same constitutional legal effects as a crime by which the Constitution is grossly violated or the oath is breached. Paragraph 2 of Article 56 of the Constitution, according to which a person who has served punishment imposed by a court judgment may stand for election as a member of the Seimas, by providing for an exception in respect to the consequences that arise upon the application of the sanctions set forth in Article 74 of the Constitution for a gross violation of the Constitution and a breach of the oath, means that the Constitution does not provide that a person who was removed from the office of the President of the Republic following impeachment proceedings for the commission of such a crime by which the Constitution was not grossly violated or the oath was not breached may not stand for election as a member of the Seimas; on the contrary, by making the said exception, the Constitution expressis verbis permits such a person to stand for election as a member of the Seimas.

... in a democratic state under the rule of law, a person who grossly violates the Constitution or breaches the oath must not escape constitutional responsibility – removal from office. Therefore, under the Constitution, the Seimas, which decides whether to remove, in accordance with impeachment proceedings, a person from office or to revoke his/her mandate of a member of the Seimas for the commission of a crime, bears the responsibility to ascertain whether the Constitution was grossly violated and the oath was breached as a result of committing such a crime.

In view of the fact that one of the conditions established in Paragraph 1 of Article 78 of the Constitution when a person may stand for election as the President of the Republic is that the fact that he/she “may stand for election as the President of the Republic”, it should be held that the Constitution provides that a person who was removed by the Seimas from office or whose mandate of a member of the Seimas was revoked following impeachment proceedings for the commission of a crime by which the Constitution was not grossly violated or the oath was not breached may stand for election as the President of the Republic (i.e. the Constitution gives permission for standing for such election).

The oath taken by state officials

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 25 May 2004

Under the Constitution, not only the President of the Republic who is the Head of State, but also the members of the Seimas, the members of the Government, the justices of the Constitutional Court, judges of other courts, and the Auditor General, must take an oath.

Paragraph 2 of Article 59 of the Constitution prescribes that an elected member of the Seimas acquires all rights of a representative of the Nation only after taking at the Seimas an oath to be faithful to the Republic of Lithuania; the text of the oath of a member of the Seimas is established in Article 5 of the Republic of Lithuania's Law on the Procedure for the Entry into Force of the Constitution of the Republic of Lithuania, which is a constituent part of the Constitution. Paragraph 3 of Article 59 of the Constitution stipulates that a member of the Seimas who either does not take the oath according to the procedure established by means of a law or takes a conditional oath loses the mandate of a member of the Seimas, and the Seimas adopts the respective resolution thereon. Article 93 of the Constitution provides that, before taking office, the Prime Minister and ministers take an oath at the Seimas to be faithful to the Republic of Lithuania and to observe the Constitution and laws; the same article stipulates that the text of the oath is established by the Law on the Government. Paragraph 2 of Article 104 of the Constitution states that, before entering office, the justices of the Constitutional Court take an oath at the Seimas to be faithful to the Republic of Lithuania and the Constitution. Paragraph 6 of Article 112 of the Constitution provides that a person appointed as a judge must, according to the procedure established by means of a law, take an oath to be faithful to the Republic of Lithuania and to administer justice only according to the law. Paragraph 3 of Article 133 of the Constitution provides that, before taking office, the Auditor General takes an oath and that the oath is established by means of a law.

Thus, according to the Constitution, the members of the Seimas, the members of the Government, the justices of the Constitutional Court, judges of other courts, and the Auditor General must take an oath before entering office. The aforementioned persons may not begin to hold office before they take an oath.

In view of the fact that, under the Constitution, the legal status of the said state officials differs, the texts of their oaths established in the Constitution are also not the same; however, the texts of the oaths of all indicated state officials reflect the same constitutional values from various aspects; on the other hand, the texts of the oaths stress namely the values that are linked by the Nation with the respective office and with the activity of persons holding the respective office.

It needs to be noted that, under the Constitution, the members of the Seimas, the members of the Government, and judges must swear to be faithful to the Republic of Lithuania (although, as mentioned before, due to the different legal status of the state officials indicated in the Constitution, the texts of the oaths are not the same). It also needs to be noted that the text of the oath of the Auditor General is not established in the Constitution (under Paragraph 3 of Article 133 of the Constitution, the oath of the Auditor General is established by law); however, the constitutional status of the Auditor General implies the requirement for the Auditor General to take an oath to be faithful to the Republic of Lithuania ...

Faithfulness to the State of Lithuania is inseparable from faithfulness to the Constitution; upon a breach of the oath to be faithful to the Republic of Lithuania, the Constitution is also grossly violated.

It needs to be mentioned that the oath of the members of the Seimas, the members of the Government, the justices of the Constitutional Court, judges of other courts, the Auditor General, as well as the oath of the President of the Republic, is not a mere formal or symbolic act. In view of the fact that the institution of the oath of the aforementioned state officials and the content of their oath are established in the Constitution, the oath taken by the said persons bears the constitutional meaning and gives rise to constitutional legal effects: a person may not begin to hold office before he/she takes an oath; under the Constitution, the refusal to take the oath, taking the oath with certain reservations, or changing the text of the oath, or the refusal to sign the text of the oath mean that a particular person may not take office: if a person elected as a member of the Seimas does not take the oath, the Seimas must adopt a resolution on the loss of the mandate of a member of the Seimas (Paragraph 3 of Article 59 of the Constitution); if a person appointed a justice of the Constitutional Court, a justice of the Supreme Court, a judge of the Court of Appeal, or a judge of another court does not take the oath, another person must be appointed to the said office; if a person appointed a member of the Government does not take the oath, another person must be appointed to the said office; if a person appointed the Auditor General does not take the oath, another person must be appointed the Auditor General.

The act of the oath of the aforesaid state officials is constitutionally legally significant also for the reason that, when taking the oath, the aforementioned persons publicly and solemnly accept the obligation to act in accordance with the obligations of the oath; their constitutional obligation to act only in accordance with the obligations of the oath and to breach the oath under no circumstances emerges from the moment of taking the oath. Under Article 74 of the Constitution, a breach of the oath is one of the grounds under which not only the President of the Republic, but also the President and justices of the Constitutional Court, the President and justices of the Supreme Court, as well as the President and judges of the Court of Appeal, may be removed from office, or the mandate of a member of the Seimas may be revoked following impeachment proceedings.

The responsibility of state officials to society; the principle of responsible governance

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 1 July 2004

The Constitution is supreme law, which imposes limitations on state power. The Constitution consolidates the principle of responsible governance.

The fact that, under the Constitution, the Nation executes its supreme sovereign power either directly or through its democratically elected representatives, that the scope of powers is limited by the Constitution, and that state institutions serve the people, implies that state officials, who perform their functions when implementing state power, and all persons who make decisions important to society and the state, must follow the Constitution and law and must act in the interests of the Nation and the State of Lithuania. The civil Nation, which entrusts such persons with the management of general matters and with representation of the Nation and the state who make decisions important to society and the state by virtue of the office they hold or the mandate they have acquired, must be protected from the arbitrariness of state officials, from their actions based on their personal or group interests instead of the interests of the Nation and the State of Lithuania, from using their status for the benefit of their own, their close relatives, or other persons. In its ruling of 25 May 2004, the Constitutional Court held the following: "In order that the citizens – the national community – could reasonably trust state officials so that it would be possible to ascertain that all state institutions and all state officials follow the Constitution and law and obey them, and that those who do not obey the Constitution and law would not hold the office for which the confidence of the citizens – the national community – is needed, it is necessary to ensure public democratic control over the activity of state officials and their accountability to society comprising, inter alia, the possibility of removing from office those state officials who violate the Constitution and law, who bring their personal interests or the interests of a certain group above the public interests, or who bring discredit on state authority by their actions."

According to the Constitution, the legislature has the duty to establish by means of legal acts such a legal regulation that would ensure that state officials, who perform their functions in implementing state power, and all persons who make decisions important to society and the state, are able to properly exercise their powers, that clashes between public and private interests are avoided, that no legal conditions are created for state officials, who perform their functions in implementing state power, and for all persons who make decisions important to society and the state, for acting in the private interests or interests of a certain group instead of the interests of the Nation and the State of Lithuania, and for using their status for the benefit of their own, their close relatives, or other persons in order to make it possible to effectively control how state officials, who perform their functions in implementing state power, and all persons who make decisions important to society and the state follow the said requirements, and in order to hold liable under to the Constitution and law the aforementioned state officials or other persons if they do not follow these requirements.

The requirements of fair legal proceedings applicable in impeachment proceedings

The Constitutional Court's conclusion of 3 June 2014

In its ruling of 11 May 1999, the Constitutional Court held that the constitutional concept of impeachment implies fair legal proceedings, in which the priority is given to the protection of the rights of a person; the protection of the rights of a person is guaranteed only if the proceedings are public, the parties to the proceedings have equal rights, and the legal disputes, in particular those regarding the rights of a person, are decided by ensuring that the said person has the right and possibility of defending those rights.

It should be noted that the requirement for fair legal proceedings gives rise to the duty of the legislature to establish a legal regulation that would create the preconditions for a member of the Seimas or a state official against whom impeachment is or has been instituted to defend his/her rights at all stages of impeachment proceedings. It should also be noted that the requirement for fair legal proceedings implies the duty of the state institutions that have the constitutional powers in impeachment proceedings, i.e. the Seimas and the Constitutional Court, when they implement their respective functions in impeachment proceedings, to enable a person against whom impeachment is or has been instituted to implement his/her rights in impeachment proceedings.

The obligation of persons against whom impeachment is applied to participate in the impeachment proceedings

... a member of the Seimas or a state official against whom impeachment is to be or has been instituted has the right, as well as the obligation stemming from their oath, to participate in the impeachment proceedings. A member of the Seimas or a state official, who has taken the oath to be faithful to the Republic of Lithuania and to respect and execute its Constitution and laws, must respect state power institutions. Thus, a member of the Seimas or a state official against whom impeachment is to be or has been instituted has the obligation to arrive, when requested, at the state institutions that have the constitutional powers in impeachment proceedings and to provide explanations for the actions that are a subject matter of the investigation and assessment carried out by these institutions. Failure to fulfil this obligation when a person is duly informed about the ongoing impeachment proceedings does not prevent the state institutions that have the constitutional powers in impeachment proceedings, inter alia, the Constitutional Court, to exercise their powers and adopt decisions that fall within their competence.

The powers of the Seimas and the Constitutional Court in impeachment proceedings initiated after a certain person is found to have committed a crime

The Constitutional Court's decision of 10 May 2016

... under the Constitution, the Seimas decides whether to remove, in accordance with impeachment proceedings, a person from office or to revoke his/her mandate of a member of the Seimas for the commission of a crime. By filing with the Constitutional Court an inquiry on the constitutionality of the concrete actions of a person against whom an impeachment case has been instituted, the Seimas implements its responsibility to ascertain whether the Constitution was grossly violated and the oath was breached as a result of committing such a crime.

... it should also be noted that the application of the impeachment ground "found to have committed a crime" does not imply that the Seimas has the powers to apply to the Constitutional Court with an inquiry whether the concrete actions of a member of the Seimas against whom an impeachment case has been instituted are in conflict with the Constitution in cases where such actions could not violate the Constitution in a gross manner or breach the oath of the member of the Seimas since these actions had been performed before the said oath was taken. Where the impeachment ground “found to have committed a crime” is applied, the Constitutional Court does not have the powers to assess the constitutionality of any such actions by which the Constitution could not be violated and the oath could not be breached by a member of the Seimas because the said actions had been performed before the member of the Seimas took his/her oath; otherwise, the constitutional concept of impeachment would be disregarded.

Impeachment on the grounds of being found to have committed a crime (Article 74 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court’s ruling of 24 February 2017

... the constitutional purpose of impeachment as one of the instruments of the self-protection of civil society is public democratic control over the activity of the highest state officials, which creates the preconditions for imposing constitutional responsibility on them: removing from office those officials or revoking the mandate of those members of the Seimas who bring discredit on state authority by their actions and, due to this, lose the confidence of the citizens.

... under Article 74 of the Constitution, impeachment can be applied for various crimes found to have been committed. However, this in itself does not mean that, when found to have committed a crime, persons should be removed from office (or have their mandates of a member of the Seimas revoked) in all cases for having committed any type of a crime: a decision on the application of impeachment on the indicated grounds and the ensuing removal of the person from office (revocation of his/her mandate of a member of the Seimas) on the indicated grounds may be taken exclusively by the institution vested with the respective powers in the impeachment process, i.e. by the Seimas (inter alia, in the cases provided for in the Constitution and upon receiving the relevant conclusion of the Constitutional Court) through impeachment proceedings by a 3/5 majority vote of all the members of the Seimas.

... the impeachment grounds of being “found to have committed a crime”, as specified in Article 74 of the Constitution, are not linked to the time when a crime was committed; specifically, it is only the fact of having committed a crime that must be found while a person indicated in Article 74 of the Constitution is in office.

The special status, inter alia, the powers, of officials (highest state officials) whose constitutional responsibility is decided in impeachment proceedings implies that the preconditions for discrediting state authority can be created not only in cases where the persons specified in Article 74 of the Constitution are, in the course of holding their respective office, found to have committed a crime while in office, but also where state authority is exercised while implementing certain functions by the persons specified in Article 74 of the Constitution who had committed a crime before taking up office and these circumstances transpire while they are already in office. A different interpretation of the provisions of Article 74 of the Constitution would be incompatible with the constitutional purpose of impeachment, since it would create the preconditions for holding office by those highest state officials who, once it is found that they had committed a crime before taking up office, would bring discredit on state authority and, due to this, would lose the confidence of the citizens.

Thus, as mentioned before, the constitutional purpose of impeachment, is public democratic control over the activity of the highest state officials, which creates the preconditions for imposing constitutional responsibility on them: removing from office those officials or revoking the mandate of those members of the Seimas who bring discredit on state authority by their actions and, due to this, lose the confidence of the citizens; in view of this, under Article 74 of the Constitution, impeachment may be applied for both a crime committed by a person before taking up a position specified in this article and a crime committed while holding such a position.

It should be noted that the circumstance that the actions creating the preconditions for applying impeachment on the above-mentioned grounds had been committed by a person specified in Article 74 of the Constitution before taking up office implies the specific features of the impeachment process itself.

... under the Constitution, it is exclusively the Seimas that, while implementing its constitutional powers to conduct impeachment, is allowed to adopt a decision to institute impeachment proceedings against a particular person. Therefore, impeachment proceedings against a particular person for having committed a crime are instituted only upon the decision of the Seimas after the members of the Seimas formally bring charges against this person or after the effective judgment of conviction is received from a court. At the same time, giving its consent to hold a person criminally responsible, the Seimas decides only to the extent that the circumstances important for applying impeachment for a crime having been committed will be established by judicial institutions; taking such a decision does not in itself constitute the institution of impeachment proceedings.

... the special constitutional status of the President of the Republic, inter alia, the special immunity granted to him/her, which is evident in the fact that, among other things, the President of the Republic may not be held criminally responsible while in office, determines that the circumstances important for the application of impeachment with regard to the President of the Republic for having committed a crime may be established exclusively by the Seimas.

Thus, the Seimas itself may establish the circumstances important for impeachment imposed for a crime having been committed only in cases where the fact of a crime having been committed (and the official having committed it) is obvious, as well as in cases where impeachment is conducted against the President of the Republic. In all other cases, after the Seimas gives its consent to hold a particular person indicated in Article 74 of the Constitution criminally responsible, impeachment for having committed a crime may be conducted only after the authorised judicial authorities establish the circumstances important for the application of impeachment on the constitutional grounds of being “found to have committed a crime”, i.e. after the fact of a crime having been committed and the official having committed it are established by the effective court judgment of conviction.

It should be noted in this context that the fact of a crime having been committed (and the official having committed it) can be considered obvious only where there is reliable information (submitted by the authorised institution to the Seimas) that a particular person indicated in Article 74 of the Constitution has been found in the act of committing a crime, and, in order to be able to state the circumstances important for applying impeachment on the constitutional grounds of being “found to have committed a crime”, i.e. to state the fact of a crime having been committed and the official having committed it, the participation of judicial authorities carrying out pretrial investigation and considering criminal cases is not required. In other cases, inter alia, where a crime is committed by a person indicated in Article 74 of the Constitution before taking up office, the fact of having committed a crime cannot be considered obvious; therefore, in these cases (except where impeachment is applied with regard to the President of the Republic), the circumstances important for the application of impeachment, i.e. the fact of a crime having been committed (and the official having committed it), must be established by the authorised judicial authorities after the Seimas gives its consent to hold a particular person indicated in Article 74 of the Constitution criminally responsible.

It should be noted that, even in the above-mentioned exceptional case where the fact of a crime having been committed is obvious and can be stated by the Seimas itself, the Seimas may also decide, according to the procedure provided for in the Statute of the Seimas, whether to give its consent to hold a particular person indicated in Article 74 of the Constitution (except the President of the Republic) criminally responsible. After the Seimas gives its consent to hold a particular person indicated in Article 74 of the Constitution criminally responsible, the impeachment proceedings may be continued in the Seimas against the person for having committed a crime, the fact of having committed which is obvious, while the judicial authorities may at the same time decide the question concerning the criminal responsibility of that person. A different interpretation of the provisions of the Constitution (that, purportedly, after deciding to conduct impeachment for a crime the fact of having committed which is obvious, the Seimas would not be allowed to give its consent to hold the person having committed this crime criminally responsible) would make it complicated to hold the said person criminally responsible or would even create the preconditions for the person against whom impeachment is applied for a crime the fact of having committed which is obvious to escape criminal responsibility.

... impeachment on the constitutional grounds of being “found to have committed a crime” in those cases where the Seimas gives its consent to hold a particular person criminally responsible (except where the fact of a crime having been committed (as well as the official having committed it) is obvious) is permissible after the circumstances important for the application of impeachment have been established by the effective court judgment of conviction indisputably, i.e. conclusively (in view of the competence of courts belonging to the ... instance system of courts).

The requirements of fair legal process applicable to impeachment proceedings (inter alia, the requirement of the publicity of impeachment proceedings and the requirement of creating the conditions for a person to defend his/her rights at all stages of impeachment proceedings) are not absolute

... under the Constitution, the requirements of fair legal process that apply to impeachment are not absolute. The Constitutional Court has noted that the values consolidated in the Constitution constitute a harmonious system and there is a balance among these values; in the event of a clash between the values protected by the Constitution, it is necessary to find decisions ensuring that none of these values will be denied or unreasonably limited; otherwise, the balance among the values protected by the Constitution, the constitutional imperative of a harmonious and civil society, as well as the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law, would be denied (inter alia, the rulings of 23 October 2002 and 4 March 2003).

Against this background, it should be noted that the requirement of the publicity of impeachment proceedings, which is meant to ensure the rights of a person being impeached, must also be interpreted in the context of other constitutional values.

Paragraph 1 of Article 117 of the Constitution prescribes: “In all courts, the consideration of cases shall be public. A closed court hearing may be held in order to protect the secrecy of private or family life, or where the public consideration of the case might disclose a state, professional, or commercial secret.”

The Constitutional Court has held that the provision “in all courts” of Paragraph 1 of Article 117 of the Constitution embraces the courts of all systems, the courts of all levels, and the courts of all instances (ruling of 6 December 2012). The Constitutional Court is part of the judiciary system (rulings of 6 June 2006 and 13 May 2010). Thus, Paragraph 1 of Article 117 of the Constitution also applies to court proceedings before the Constitutional Court, inter alia, in the course of considering a case on determining whether the actions of a person being impeached are in conflict with the Constitution.

In its ruling of 6 December 2012, the Constitutional Court, when interpreting Paragraph 1 of Article 117 of the Constitution, noted that the principle of the public consideration of cases in a court is not absolute; Paragraph 1 of Article 117 of the Constitution, in which the said principle is consolidated, provides both for certain exceptions to the publicity of the consideration of cases and for situations where a closed court hearing may be held; the publicity is limited for the purposes of protecting the private or public interest; the principle of the public consideration of cases in a court may also be limited by means of a law, with a view to protecting other constitutional values; in order to protect human dignity, the inviolability of private life (Article 22 of the Constitution), and other values whose protection stems from the Constitution, it is permitted to limit, by means of a law, the publicity of separate elements of the process of the consideration of cases.

It should be mentioned that, under Paragraph 4 of Article 22 of the Constitution, courts must also protect everyone from arbitrary or unlawful interference with his/her private and family life, as well as from encroachment upon his/her honour and dignity.

Thus, in the light of Paragraph 1 of Article 117 of the Constitution ... it should be noted that, for the protection of the private or public interest, inter alia, in order to protect constitutional values such as human dignity and the inviolability of private life, certain elements of proceedings before the Constitutional Court in the course of considering a case on the constitutionality of the actions of a person being impeached (inter alia, a hearing of the Constitutional Court in which evidence is examined, witnesses are questioned, and pleadings take place) may be not open to the public by a decision of the Constitutional Court.

This is also mutatis mutandis applicable when impeachment proceedings are instituted and carried out at the Seimas.

... it should also be noted that the requirement to create the conditions for a member of the Seimas or a public official against whom impeachment is being or has been instituted to defend his/her rights at all stages of the impeachment proceedings should also be interpreted in the context of other provisions of the official constitutional doctrine.

... under the Constitution, impeachment proceedings begin only after the Seimas adopts a resolution on instituting impeachment proceedings in the Seimas against a concrete person. Thus, the actions preceding the beginning of impeachment, i.e. before the Seimas adopts such a resolution (where such actions include, inter alia, the initiative of the members of the Seimas to institute impeachment and the investigation of the reasonableness of the charges brought by them in a commission set up by the Seimas or in another structural unit of the Seimas), do not constitute a stage of impeachment proceedings; therefore ... a person against whom impeachment may be instituted need not be given the same conditions for defending his/her rights as a person against whom impeachment has been instituted and is under way. It should be noted that the creation of different conditions for defending his/her rights for a person against whom impeachment may be instituted can also be based, inter alia, on the above-mentioned purpose of protecting the private or public interest, among other things, on the objective to protect constitutional values such as human dignity and the inviolability of private life.

It is also necessary to take into account the fact that the Seimas by its nature and essence is an institution of a political character, whose decisions reflect the political will of the majority of the members of the Seimas and are based on political agreements and various political compromises (conclusion of 31 March 2004 and the ruling of 27 May 2014). Therefore, the actions preceding the beginning of impeachment, i.e. before the Seimas adopts a resolution on instituting impeachment proceedings in the Seimas against a concrete person (inter alia, the initiative of members of the Seimas to institute impeachment and the investigation of the reasonableness of the charges brought by them in a commission set up by the Seimas or in another structural unit of the Seimas), which, as mentioned before, do not constitute a stage of impeachment proceedings, is a parliamentary procedure that must not be regarded as a legal process stricto sensu, since, in the course of this parliamentary procedure, the Seimas does not decide on the application of constitutional responsibility of a person, but only whether there is a basis for instituting impeachment. This parliamentary procedure must be regulated in such a way that would ensure the due process of law, which means, inter alia, that a person against whom impeachment may be instituted must have a real possibility of knowing what he/she is being accused of, submitting his/her explanations to the Seimas or to a commission set up by the Seimas or to another structural unit of the Seimas that is investigating the reasonableness of the charges brought against the said person, or, at the sitting of the Seimas in which it is decided on whether to begin impeachment, responding to the arguments on which the charges against this person are based.

... under the Constitution, impeachment proceedings as a whole should be considered fair and appropriate if, in compliance with the requirements of fair legal proceedings, a member of the Seimas the issue of whose constitutional responsibility is being decided and/or his/her representatives is/are provided with the conditions for defending their interests both at the hearing of the Constitutional Court and at the Seimas where, in accordance with the procedure established in the Statute of the Seimas, impeachment proceedings are continued following the entry into force of the conclusion of the Constitutional Court that the concrete actions of the person against whom the impeachment case has been instituted are in conflict with the Constitution.

The grounds for impeachment; constitutional responsibility on the grounds of a breach of the oath may not be applied for acts committed before taking the oath, inter alia, acts committed during the previous term of office (Article 74 of the Constitution)

The persons specified in Article 74 of the Constitution may be removed from office (or their mandate of a member of the Seimas may be revoked) through impeachment proceedings for the actions provided for in the Constitution: a gross violation of the Constitution, a breach of the oath, or for having committed a crime (rulings of 15 April 2004 and 24 February 2007).

It should be noted that these grounds for impeachment are not identical and may not be interpreted in the same manner.

As noted by the Constitutional Court in its ruling of 24 February 2017, the impeachment grounds of being “found to have committed a crime”, as specified in Article 74 of the Constitution, are not linked to the time when a crime is committed; it is only the fact of having committed a crime that must be found while a person indicated in Article 74 of the Constitution is in office; the preconditions for bringing discredit on state power can be created not only in cases where it transpires that the persons specified in Article 74 of the Constitution have committed a crime while holding their respective office, but also where state power is exercised while implementing certain functions by persons specified in Article 74 of the Constitution who committed a crime before taking up their respective office and these circumstances transpire already when they are in this office.

It should be mentioned that, where the impeachment grounds of being “found to have committed a crime” are applied, the Constitutional Court does not have the powers to assess the constitutionality of such respective actions where they cannot be deemed a gross violation of the Constitution and a breach of the oath precisely due to the fact that the said actions had been performed before the oath of a member of the Seimas was taken; otherwise, the constitutional concept of impeachment would be disregarded (ruling of 24 February 2017).

The other grounds indicated in Article 74 of the Constitution for impeachment – a gross violation of the Constitution and a breach of the oath, from the aspect of the time of committing the actions constituting these grounds, should be assessed differently compared to the grounds of being “found to have committed a crime”.

The wording of Article 74 of the Constitution, under which the Seimas may remove the persons specified in this article from office through impeachment proceedings if they “grossly violate the Constitution or breach their oath”, makes it clear that importance falls not only on the time when the actions grossly violating the Constitution or breaching the oath transpire; the time of committing these actions is also important, i.e. it is important that such actions are committed by the person not at any time, but while holding the office referred to in Article 74 of the Constitution, which may be entered only after taking an oath provided for in the Constitution, and while being bound by the oath.

It should be noted that impeachment proceedings are not an objective in itself. ... the objective of impeachment proceedings is to decide the question of the constitutional responsibility of the persons specified in Article 74 of the Constitution. The content of the constitutional sanction (constitutional responsibility) applied through impeachment proceedings for a gross violation of the Constitution and a breach of the oath comprises both the removal from office of the person who has grossly violated the Constitution and breached the oath and the prohibition stemming therefrom that prevents such a person in the future from holding any constitutionally established office that can be entered only after taking an oath provided for in the Constitution (rulings of 25 May 2004 and 5 September 2012 and the conclusion of 19 December 2017).

Thus, removal from office as a constitutional sanction applied through impeachment proceedings must be related to a gross violation of the Constitution and a breach of the binding oath committed while holding this office (rather than other office or office held previously), i.e. the purpose of this sanction is to remove a person indicated in Article 74 of the Constitution specifically from the office being held by that person – such office that he/she entered after taking the respective oath and was holding at the time when he/she breached his/her binding oath. Obviously, it is impossible to remove a person from office that he/she is no longer holding after his/her powers have expired (ceased); therefore, the constitutional responsibility of a person indicated in Article 74 of the Constitution for a gross violation of the Constitution or a breach of the oath committed at the time when he/she was holding the said office is also impossible. In addition, if the Constitution were interpreted in a way that a person referred to in Article 74 of the Constitution, purportedly, could be removed from office through impeachment proceedings for such a gross violation of the Constitution or a breach of the oath that was committed at the time when he/she was earlier holding the office provided for in Article 74 of the Constitution, constitutional responsibility could be a manifestly disproportionate measure against those persons specified in Article 74 of the Constitution who would themselves confess to having committed a gross violation of the Constitution or a breach of the oath and would resign from the earlier office referred to in Article 74 of the Constitution even before impeachment begins (or before it ends); even such persons, should they take up again the positions referred to in Article 74 of the Constitution, would always be faced with the risk that they will be impeached, and constitutional responsibility will be applied to them for the gross violation of the Constitution and the breach of the oath to which they confessed and which were committed by them while being in the office from which they resigned.

As mentioned before in the context of the interpretation of the provisions of Paragraphs 1 and 2 of Article 59 and the provisions of Article 63 of the Constitution, the taken oath binds a member of the Seimas as a representative of the Nation during all the duration of his/her term of powers, i.e. from the moment when he/she, having taken an oath to the Republic of Lithuania under the Constitution, acquires all the rights of a representative of the Nation until the moment when his/her powers as a member of the Seimas cease on any of the grounds set out in Article 63 of the Constitution, inter alia, when the newly elected Seimas convenes for the first sitting after the expiry of the term of powers (incumbency) of the member of the Seimas (Item 1 of Article 63 of the Constitution); according to the Constitution, after the cessation of the powers of a member of the Seimas, the oath of a member of the Seimas taken by him/her is no longer binding.

Thus, under the Constitution, inter alia, Article 74 thereof, it is impossible to apply constitutional responsibility to a member of the Seimas through impeachment proceedings for his/her actions that may have grossly violated the Constitution and breached his/her oath if these actions were committed during a previous term of office of the member of the Seimas (during the exercise of powers held previously). Accordingly, under the Constitution, the Constitutional Court has no powers to assess, in terms of compliance with the Constitution, such actions of a member of the Seimas that were performed during his/her previous term of office as a member of the Seimas (during the exercise of powers held previously), i.e. at the time before the member of the Seimas took his/her binding oath of a member of the Seimas.

In this context, it should be noted that, under the Constitution, it would be possible to apply impeachment to a member of the Seimas for his/her actions that were committed during his/her previous term of office as a member of the Seimas and may have grossly violated the Constitution and breached his/her oath binding at that time if such actions were also criminal, i.e. upon the impeachment grounds of being “found to have committed a crime”. In any case, the actions of a member of the Seimas that were committed during his/her previous term of office as a member of the Seimas and may have grossly violated the Constitution and breached his/her oath binding at that time could provide the grounds, according to Article 75 of the Constitution, for expressing no confidence in such a member of the Seimas and removing him/her from the office at the Seimas for which he/she was appointed or elected by the Seimas, or such actions of a member of the Seimas could also be an object for an investigation by an ad hoc investigation commission of the Seimas if they were of particular importance, i.e. of state importance (in view of the fact that, as noted by the Constitutional Court on more than one occasion, ad hoc investigation commissions of the Seimas must be formed for an investigation into not any, but only special questions, i.e. those of state importance).

... a member of the Seimas or state official against whom impeachment may be instituted is also obliged to participate in the parliamentary procedure before instituting impeachment (inter alia, in the course of investigating, in a commission set up by the Seimas or in another structural unit of the Seimas, the reasonableness of charges brought by members of the Seimas) and, when summoned, to attend the meetings of the commission set up by the Seimas or another structural unit of the Seimas that is carrying out this procedure and to provide explanations regarding the actions under investigation. Under the Constitution, the requirement for the due legal process in this parliamentary procedure implies such a process during which a member of the Seimas or state official against whom impeachment may be instituted could effectively exercise the above-mentioned rights, inter alia, be aware of what he/she is being accused of, provide his/her explanations, and respond to the arguments on which the charges against him/her are based. Therefore, this parliamentary procedure must, inter alia, be such that the commission set up by the Seimas or another structural unit of the Seimas would investigate the reasonableness of charges brought by members of the Seimas (or the structural unit of the Seimas) initiating impeachment, rather than would formulate charges that are, in principle, new and have not been brought by the entities initiating impeachment, in particular on the grounds of the explanations submitted to the said commission of the Seimas or another structural unit of the Seimas by the member of the Seimas or state official against whom impeachment may be instituted; otherwise, the preconditions would be created for deterring the member of the Seimas or state official against whom impeachment may be instituted from exercising the above-mentioned rights of the due legal process.

The prohibition for a person removed from office through impeachment procedure to stand for election as the President of the Republic

... in its decision of 20 March 2014, the Constitutional Court held that the prohibition, stemming from the Constitution, for a person to stand for election as the President of the Republic if the person has grossly violated the Constitution and breached an oath and, due to this, through impeachment procedure has been removed from the office of the President of the Republic, the President and a justice of the Constitutional Court, the President and a justice of the Supreme Court, or the President and a judge of the Court of Appeal, or his/her mandate of a member of the Seimas has been revoked, could be abandoned only after the Constitution is amended accordingly. This is also reiterated in the Constitutional Court's ruling of 22 December 2016 ...

Thus, under the Constitution, the prohibition to stand for election as the President of the Republic for a person who has grossly violated the Constitution and breached an oath and, due to this, through impeachment procedure has been removed from the office held can be abolished in the only way possible – by amending the relevant provisions of the Constitution accordingly.

Parliamentary procedure before instituting impeachment proceedings

In its conclusion of 19 December 2017, interpreting the issues relating to the beginning of impeachment proceedings in the Seimas, the Constitutional Court held that, inter alia, the actions preceding the beginning of impeachment, i.e. before the Seimas adopts a resolution on instituting impeachment proceedings in the Seimas against a concrete person (where such actions include, inter alia, the initiative of members of the Seimas to institute impeachment and the investigation of the reasonableness of the charges brought by them in a commission set up by the Seimas or in another structural unit of the Seimas), do not constitute a stage of impeachment proceedings; these actions preceding the beginning of impeachment constitute a parliamentary procedure that cannot be regarded as a legal process stricto sensu:

in the course of this parliamentary procedure, the Seimas does not decide on the application of constitutional responsibility of a person, but only whether there is a basis for instituting impeachment.

The Constitutional Court has held that, under Article 74 of the Constitution, the establishment of the procedure for impeachment proceedings is within the competence of the Seimas: it must define it in the Statute of the Seimas (rulings of 11 May 1999 and 25 January 2001).

In view of the fact that ... the actions preceding the beginning of impeachment constitute a parliamentary procedure ... the Constitution, inter alia, Article 74 thereof, requires that the Statute of the Seimas regulate, inter alia, the actions preceding the beginning of impeachment, i.e. before the Seimas adopts a resolution on instituting impeachment proceedings against a concrete person in the Seimas, among other things, that the Statute of the Seimas regulate the procedure for the formation of a commission of the Seimas for investigating the reasonableness of the charges brought against the said person.

Declaring private interests

... it should be noted that, under the Constitution, inter alia, the provision of Paragraph 3 of Article 5 thereof that state institutions serve the people, and under the constitutional principle of responsible governance, in order to ensure transparency and publicity in the management of state, municipal, and other public affairs, inter alia, in order to prevent corruption and abuse of power in the management of these affairs, the legislature may impose the duty to declare private interests on various persons, inter alia, state and municipal politicians, as well as state officials performing their functions in exercising state authority, state servants, persons applying to the respective positions, and other persons whose activities are connected with guaranteeing the public interest, inter alia, with the use of funds from the state and municipal budgets. It should be noted that, in doing so, the legislature must respect the norms and principles of the Constitution, inter alia, the requirements arising from the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law.

[...]

... after the legislature, under the Constitution, inter alia, the provision of Paragraph 3 of Article 5 thereof that state institutions serve the people, and under the constitutional principle of responsible governance, imposes the duty to declare private interests on persons, inter alia, on state and municipal politicians, as well as state officials performing their functions in exercising state authority, state servants, persons applying to the respective positions, and other persons whose activities are connected with guaranteeing the public interest, inter alia, with the use of funds from the state and municipal budgets, the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law gives rise to the duty to establish a clear procedure for declaring such interests, so that the persons are aware of what is required by law and are able to direct their behaviour in accordance with the requirements of law when declaring their private interests.

4.5. STATE AWARDS

State awards

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 12 May 2006

Citizens of the Republic of Lithuania, citizens of foreign states, or stateless persons may be conferred awards of the State of Lithuania (orders, medals, and other decorations) in recognition of their merit to the State of Lithuania (ruling of 30 December 2003). The Seimas establishes state awards of the Republic of Lithuania (Item 18 of Article 67 of the Constitution), whereas the President of the Republic confers state awards (Item 22 of Article 84 of the Constitution). Persons who performed exceptional deeds demanding extraordinary efforts or even self-sacrifice where the said deeds provided exceptional benefits to the State of Lithuania, its society, or certain spheres of life of this country, in recognition of their merit to the State of Lithuania, are honoured in the name of the state by means of state awards.

When establishing state awards (inter alia, establishing the system thereof), the Seimas has broad discretion; however, it must follow the constitutional concept of state awards; the said concept implies that state awards are granted namely in recognition of merit and that the said merit should be merit to Lithuania (for the State of Lithuania, for its society, or for certain spheres of life of this country). The grounds on the basis of which persons may be awarded must be clear; such grounds must be established by means of a law. A law must also establish the procedure for nominating a person for a state award.

The constitutional concept of state awards should also be respected when granting state awards. The President of the Republic has rather broad freedom of the discretion to decide whether or not to award a proposed person. It should be stressed that the Constitution does not oblige the President of the Republic to confer a certain state award on a certain person or persons (in recognition of their certain merit); however, when conferring state awards, the President of the Republic must pay regard, inter alia, to the requirements for fulfilling conscientiously the duties of his/her office, and for being equally just to all, as established in Article 82 of the Constitution.

On the other hand, a law may provide that, if a person does not meet certain formal criteria established by law, he/she may not be conferred a state award, or, if he was granted a state award, he/she must be deprived of this state award.

Conferring a certain state award is not the implementation of the right or a legitimate expectation of a person, even who is without doubt of merit to Lithuania, but rather such an assessment of his/her merit where the said assessment is within the discretion of and depends on the will of the President of the Republic;

... a state award is a sign of state estimation towards a person; therefore, a state award may not be related to the provision of material, financial, or other benefits of any kind (with the exception, of course, of the order, medal, etc. itself) to an awarded person. The Constitution does not imply that a person who was conferred a state award of any kind could expect, let alone demand, any additional material, financial, or other benefits, privileges, etc. only because he/she has been conferred the award.

The constitutional institution of state awards is not identical to other constitutional institutions, inter alia, those related to the provision of support, care, welfare, maintenance, financial or other benefits established in the Constitution (thus, constitutionally justifiable and not regarded as privileges) to various persons.

If a person meets the requirements set by law and there are grounds provided for by law, the material and financial support, the provision of other material, financial benefits by the state to the person may be related to the same deeds (activity) that earned a person a certain state award. However, it should be stressed that, as such, the mere fact that a person was granted a state award should not serve as the grounds for allocating him/her state material and financial support, or other material and financial benefits, etc. If such a legal regulation were established, it would have to be regarded as one deviating from Paragraph 2 Article 32 of the Constitution, according to which the rights of ownership (national and municipal included) are protected by law, and if Paragraph 2 of Article 23 of the Constitution were interpreted in conjunction with the provision of Paragraph 2 of Article 128 of the Constitution, whereby the procedure for the possession, use and disposal of state-owned property is established by law, the said legal regulation would also have to be regarded as one deviating from Paragraph 2 of Article 128 of the Constitution, as well as from the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law and the constitutional concept of state awards.

5. THE SEIMAS

5.1. THE SEIMAS AS THE REPRESENTATION OF THE NATION

The Seimas as the representation of the Nation

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 13 May 2004

Under the Constitution, the Seimas is the representation of the Nation (ruling of 30 December 2003). The Seimas is an institution of state authority executing legislative power. The constitutional nature of the Seimas, as the representation of the Nation, determines its special place in the system of institutions of the branches of state power, its functions, and its competence.

The Seimas as the representation of the Nation (Articles 2 and 4 and Paragraph 1 of Article 55 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 25 May 2004

Article 2 of the Constitution provides that sovereignty belongs to the Nation. Article 4 of the Constitution stipulates that the Nation executes its supreme sovereign power either directly or through its democratically elected representatives. According to Paragraph 1 of Article 55 of the Constitution, members of the Seimas are representatives of the Nation. Thus, under the Constitution, only the Seimas is the representation of the Nation, through which the Nation executes its supreme sovereign power. It should be stressed that, according to the Constitution, there must not be and there is no confrontation between the supreme sovereign power executed by the Nation directly and the supreme sovereign power executed by the Nation through its democratically elected representatives – members of the Seimas. Thus, under the Constitution, there must not be and there is no confrontation between the Nation and its representation – the Seimas: the Seimas implements those powers that have been assigned to it by the Nation in the Constitution adopted by the Nation.

The Seimas as the representation of the Nation and its functions

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 1 July 2004

Under the Constitution, only the Seimas is the representation of the Nation. The Seimas, as the representation of the Nation, through which the Nation executes its supreme sovereign power, acts according to the powers pursuant to the Constitution vested in the Seimas by the Nation.

The constitutional nature of the Seimas as the representation of the Nation determines its special place in the system of the institutions of the branches of state power, its functions and powers necessary to perform these functions of the Seimas. While implementing its constitutional powers, the Seimas performs the classical functions of the parliament of a democratic state under the rule of law: the Seimas passes laws (legislative function), carries out parliamentary control over executive and other state institutions (save courts) (control function), establishes state institutions, appoints and releases their heads and other state officials (founding function), approves the state budget and supervises its execution (budgetary function), etc. (ruling of 13 May 2004).

5.2. THE FUNCTIONS AND POWERS OF THE SEIMAS

5.2.1. General provisions

The powers of the Seimas are limited by the Constitution (Paragraph 2 of Article 5 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 12 July 2001

When preparing and adopting legal acts, institutions of state power must comply with the principle of a state under the rule of law, which is consolidated in the Constitution. Paragraph 2 of Article 5 of the Constitution provides that the scope of powers is limited by the Constitution. This means that the Seimas, as the legislator of laws and other legal acts, is independent inasmuch as its powers are not limited by the Constitution. The right of the Seimas to adopt, amend, supplement laws and other legal acts or declare them as null and void is indisputable; however, it may implement this by following the procedure established in the Constitution and the principles of legal compatibility. Thus, the Seimas, regulating certain relationships by means of a law, may not violate the principles and norms of the Constitution.

The Seimas is bound by its own laws

... the Seimas is bound not only by the Constitution, but also by its own laws. Under the Constitution, laws may establish a legal regulation defining the implementation of the powers of the Seimas and, thus, binding on the Seimas; however, the Seimas is not absolutely free to subject itself to any limitations by means of laws: binding itself by means of laws, the Seimas may not violate the Constitution.

The functions and powers of the Seimas

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 13 May 2004

The constitutional powers of the Seimas are consolidated in Article 67 of the Constitution. The said article provides that the Seimas: considers and adopts amendments to the Constitution (Item 1); passes laws (Item 2); adopts resolutions on referendums (Item 3); calls elections for the President of the Republic of Lithuania (Item 4); establishes state institutions provided for by law, and appoints and releases their heads (Item 5); gives or does not give its assent to the candidate proposed by the President of the Republic for the post of the Prime Minister (Item 6); considers the programme of the Government, presented by the Prime Minister, and decides whether to give its assent to it (Item 7); on the proposal of the Government, establishes and abolishes the ministries of the Republic of Lithuania (Item 8); supervises the activities of the Government and may express no confidence in the Prime Minister or a minister (Item 9); appoints the justices and Presidents of the Constitutional Court and the Supreme Court (Item 10); appoints and releases the Auditor General and the Chairperson of the Board of the Bank of Lithuania (Item 11); calls elections to municipal councils (Item 12); forms the Central Electoral Commission and alters its composition (Item 13); approves the state budget and supervises its execution (Item 14); establishes state taxes and other compulsory payments (Item 15); ratifies and denounces international treaties of the Republic of Lithuania and considers other issues of foreign policy (Item 16); establishes the administrative division of the Republic (Item 17); establishes the state awards of the Republic of Lithuania (Item 18); issues acts of amnesty (Item 19); imposes direct rule and martial law, declares states of emergency, announces mobilisation, and adopts a decision to use the armed forces (Item 20).

It needs to be noted that the list of the constitutional powers of the Seimas consolidated in Article 67 of the Constitution is not a final one. On the one hand, various powers of the Seimas are consolidated in other articles (parts thereof) of the Constitution. For instance, Article 74 of the Constitution provides that the President of the Republic, the President and justices of the Constitutional Court, the President and justices of the Supreme Court, the President and judges of the Court of Appeal, as well as any members of the Seimas who grossly violate the Constitution or breach their oath or are found to have committed a crime, may be removed from office or have the mandate of a member of the Seimas revoked by a 3/5 majority vote of all the members of the Seimas; this is done through impeachment proceedings established in the Statute of the Seimas. Article 75 of the Constitution prescribes that the officials appointed or elected by the Seimas, with the exception of the persons specified in Article 74 of the Constitution, are dismissed from office when the Seimas expresses no confidence in them by a majority vote of all the members of the Seimas. Under Article 106 of the Constitution, the Seimas has the right to apply to the Constitutional Court by its resolution and to request the Constitutional Court to investigate whether the legal acts indicated in Article 102 of the Constitution are not in conflict with the Constitution (and whether statutory acts are not in conflict with the Constitution and with laws) and to request a conclusion from the Constitutional Court on the issues indicated in Paragraph 3 of Article 105 of the Constitution. Under Item 11 of Article 84 and Paragraph 5 of Article 118 of the Constitution, the Seimas gives or does not give its assent to a candidate for the post of the Prosecutor General of the Republic of Lithuania or his/her release from duties; according to Item 14 of Article 84 of the Constitution, the Seimas gives or does not give its assent to candidates for the posts of the Chief of the Army and the Head of the Security Service. Under Article 100 of the Constitution, the Seimas may give its consent to hold the Prime Minister or a minister criminally liable, to detain him/her, or to have his/her liberty restricted otherwise. Under Paragraph 1 of Article 128 of the Constitution, the Seimas adopts decisions concerning state loans and other basic property liabilities of the state. Also, additional powers of the Seimas are established in various articles (parts thereof) of the Constitution.

On the other hand, attention should be paid to the fact that some powers of the Seimas that are established in Article 67 of the Constitution are particularised and defined in more detail in other articles (parts thereof) of the Constitution. For example, the provision of Item 9 of Article 67 of the Constitution that the Seimas, inter alia, “may express no confidence in the Prime Minister or a Minister” is particularised by the provision “Upon considering the response of the Prime Minister or the Minister to the interpellation, the Seimas may decide that the response is not satisfactory, and, by a majority vote of half of all the Members of the Seimas, may express no confidence in the Prime Minister or the Minister” of Paragraph 3 of Article 61 of the Constitution. The provision of Item 14 of Article 67 of the Constitution, whereby the Seimas, inter alia, supervises the execution of the state budget, is particularised in Item 4 of Article 94 of the Constitution, according to which the Government, inter alia, submits to the Seimas a report on the execution of the budget; thus, under the Constitution, the Seimas has the powers to approve this report. The provision of Item 20 of Article 67 of the Constitution, whereby the Seimas imposes direct rule and martial law, declares states of emergency, announces mobilisation, and adopts a decision to use the armed forces, is particularised in Paragraph 1 of Article 142 of the Constitution, under which the Seimas imposes martial law, announces mobilisation or demobilisation, or adopts the decision to use the armed forces when the need arises to defend the Homeland or to fulfil the international obligations of the State of Lithuania, as well as in Paragraph 1 of Article 144 of the Constitution, according to which, when a threat arises to the constitutional system or social peace in the state, the Seimas may declare a state of emergency throughout the territory of the State or in any part thereof, where the period of the state of emergency may not exceed six months. The powers of the Seimas established in Article 67 of the Constitution are also particularised and defined in more detail in other articles (parts thereof) of the Constitution.

It should also be noted that, under the Constitution, the powers of the Seimas may be established and are established not only in the Constitution, but also in laws. In some cases, the fact that certain powers of the Seimas consolidated in the Constitution may be specified in laws in a more concrete manner is directly indicated in the Constitution. For instance, as mentioned before, under Item 16 of Article 67 of the Constitution, the Seimas ratifies and denounces international treaties of the Republic of Lithuania and considers other issues of foreign policy; Paragraph 1 of Article 138 of the Constitution stipulates which international treaties of the Republic of Lithuania are ratified and denounced by the Seimas; while Paragraph 2 of the same article provides that laws, as well as international treaties, may also provide for other cases when the Seimas ratifies international treaties of the Republic of Lithuania. Under Item 3 of Article 67 of the Constitution, the Seimas adopts resolutions on referendums, while Paragraph 3 of Article 9 of the Constitution provides that a referendum is also called if not less than 300 000 citizens with the electoral right so request and, under Paragraph 2 of the same article, the Seimas calls a referendum in cases established by law. While implementing the right, which is directly consolidated in the Constitution, to particularise its certain constitutional powers by means of laws, the Seimas must pay regard to the norms and principles of the Constitution.

The Seimas, as the representation of the Nation, also has the right to establish, by means of a law, such its powers that are not expressis verbis indicated in the Constitution, but which, however, are designed for the implementation of the constitutional functions of the Seimas. Implementing its right, directly established in the Constitution, to particularise its certain constitutional powers by means of laws, as well as establishing, by means of laws, its powers that are not expressis verbis indicated in the Constitution, the Seimas is bound by the Constitution. The fact that the Seimas, while passing laws, is bound by the Constitution, as well as by its own laws, is an essential element of the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law (rulings of 6 December 2000, 14 January 2002, and 24 January 2003).

It is clear from the constitutional provisions in which the powers of the Seimas are established that the Seimas, while implementing its constitutional powers, performs the classical functions of the parliament of a democratic state under the rule of law: the Seimas passes laws (legislative function), carries out parliamentary control over executive and other state institutions (save courts) (control function), establishes state institutions, appoints and dismisses their heads and other state officials (founding function), approves the state budget and supervises its execution (budgetary function), etc.

The said functions of the Seimas as the representation of the Nation of a democratic state under the rule of law are constitutional values. Under the Constitution, the legislature and other lawmaking subjects may not establish any such a legal regulation that would deny the said constitutional functions of the Seimas or would restrict the possibilities of performing them, since thereby the Seimas, the representation of the Nation, would be hindered from effective functioning in the interests of the Nation and the State of Lithuania.

In order that it might properly perform its parliamentary functions and implement its constitutional powers, the Seimas, the representation of the Nation, must have exhaustive and objective information about the processes taking place in the state and society, as well as about the situation in various areas of the life of the state and society and arising problems. The availability of such information is a necessary precondition for the effective activity of the Seimas in the interests of the Nation and the State of Lithuania, as well as for the proper fulfilment of its constitutional duty.

The constitutional functions of the Seimas and the powers of the Seimas consolidated in the Constitution presuppose the powers of the Seimas in every case when it becomes necessary to decide a certain question that falls under the constitutional competence of the Seimas and to seek the exhaustive and objective information needed to adopt particular decisions. The necessity to have such information means that, if necessary, the Seimas can rely not only on publicly known information or that presented to it by state institutions and other persons, but also that it can resort to concrete actions in order to receive such exhaustive and objective information. Thus, if necessary, the Seimas may conduct research by itself in order to have exhaustive and objective information about the processes taking place in the state and society, as well as about the situation in various areas of the life of the state and society and arising problems. This activity of the Seimas, as a parliament, logically follows from the mission that it has, as well as from its constitutional functions and constitutional powers.

The right of the Seimas to receive information that is necessary to exercise its constitutional powers (also see 5.4. The structure of the Seimas, the ruling of 4 April 2006 (“Ad-hoc investigation commissions of the Seimas”))

The Constitutional Court’s ruling of 4 April 2006

Under the Constitution, the Seimas is obliged to establish such a legal regulation that would create the legal preconditions for receiving information needed to perform its constitutional powers.

In its ruling of 13 May 2004, the Constitutional Court held that, as the Seimas has the powers in every case, when it becomes necessary to decide a certain issue falling under the constitutional competence of the Seimas, to seek the exhaustive and objective information needed to adopt particular decisions, it also has the discretion to form such its structural subunits that would be assigned to conduct research in order to obtain exhaustive and objective information about the processes taking place in the state and society and about the situation in various areas of the life of the state and society. In the same ruling, the Constitutional Court also held that, as the Seimas, under the Constitution, has the discretion to establish its structure, it also has the discretion to form its structural subunits and the discretion to establish the names of its structural subunits, their competence, composition, interrelations among them, their term of activity, as well as to formulate certain tasks for them; while establishing this, the Seimas is bound by the norms and principles of the Constitution.

Under Article 76 of the Constitution, the structure and procedure of activities of the Seimas are established by the Statute of the Seimas, which has the force of a law. In this context, it should be mentioned that it is impossible to interpret only linguistically the provision that the structure and procedure of activities of the Seimas are established by the Statute of the Seimas, i.e. only as meaning that the powers of the structural subunits of the Seimas may be established only in the Statute of the Seimas; for instance, in order that it could perform its constitutional functions, the Seimas may also require to form such its structural subunits that would have the powers with regard to various state or municipal institutions, their officials, or other persons. Such powers may be related to the receipt of information from state or municipal institutions, their officials, or from other persons about the processes taking place in the state and society, as well as about the situation in various spheres of the life of the state and society and arising problems; the receipt of this information cannot be dependent on the fact whether or not particular institutions or other persons are accountable to the Seimas; where it is necessary to establish the authoritative empowerments of a structural subunit of the Seimas in regard of the institutions, their officials, or other persons that are not accountable to the Seimas (including the right to demand the information the submission whereof is regulated in laws), such powers of the structural subunit of the Seimas must be established by means of a law (ruling of 13 May 2004).

It needs to be noted that, in a democratic state under the rule of law, it is not allowed to deny the powers of the parliament – the representation of the Nation to take measures, inter alia, to form the structural subunits of the parliament for this purpose, and to commission them to conduct necessary research in order to receive information about the processes taking place in the state and society, as well as about the situation in various areas of the life of the state and society and arising problems; otherwise, the proper fulfilment of the functions of the parliament – the representation of the Nation and the adoption of necessary decisions would not be ensured. The said powers arise from the very essence of parliamentary democracy and are one of the features of parliamentarism. In the practice of the parliaments of democratic states under the rule of law, the possibility for parliaments to take measures in order to receive information about processes taking place in the state and society, as well as about the situation in various areas of the life of the state and society and arising problems is also implemented by means of such institutions as ad hoc commissions (which are assigned to conduct certain research) formed by parliaments, parliamentary hearings, deliberations, etc.

The decisions of the Seimas

The Constitutional Court's decision of 15 May 2009

The Constitution, constitutional laws, laws, as well as the Statute of the Seimas, which has the force of a law, bind the Seimas and each member of the Seimas when they pass laws and perform other functions (rulings of 4 April 2006 and 22 February 2008).

The majority principle is among the democratic principles of adopting decisions in the Seimas (rulings of 22 July 1994 and 4 April 2006). The political will of the majority of the members of the Seimas is reflected in decisions adopted by the Seimas (conclusion of 31 March 2004 and the ruling of 4 April 2006). Under the Constitution, the will of the Seimas regarding the adoption of particular decisions may not be expressed otherwise than by vote of the members of the Seimas at a sitting of the Seimas and the adoption of a particular legal act.

It also needs to be noted that, under the Constitution, every decision of the Seimas, regardless of its expression (legal form), can be impugned before the Constitutional Court with regard to the compliance of this decision (act of the Seimas) with higher-ranking legal acts, inter alia (and, first of all), with the Constitution. Under the Constitution, the subjects specified in Paragraph 1 of Article 106 of the Constitution, inter alia, not less than 1/5 of all the members of the Seimas, i.e. a group of not less than 29 members of the Seimas, can do so.

The duty of the Seimas to adopt decisions that are specified in the Constitution

The Constitutional Court's decision of 15 May 2009

The activity of a member of the Seimas, which is based on the constitutional principle of the free mandate of a member of the Seimas, and the powers of the Seimas as the representation of the Nation may not be opposed. While implementing its constitutional powers, the Seimas has the duty to adopt particular decisions, as, for instance, under the provisions of Item 4 of Article 67 and Article 80 of the Constitution, the Seimas calls a regular election of the President of the Republic, which is held on the last Sunday two months before the expiry of the term of office of the President of the Republic; according to the provisions of Paragraph 3 of Article 59 of the Constitution, the Seimas adopts a resolution regarding the loss of the mandate of a member of the Seimas who either does not take the oath according to the procedure established by law or takes a conditional oath, etc. Consequently, under the Constitution, all the members of the Seimas, as representatives of the Nation, not only acquire particular rights, but they must also perform certain duties stemming from the Constitution and the laws not in conflict with it.

The prerogatives of the Seimas to approve the state budget, to establish taxes and other compulsory payments, and to establish the list of constitutional laws

... under the Constitution, certain laws may not be adopted by referendum, as, for instance:

– under Item 14 of Article 67 of the Constitution, the Seimas approves the state budget and supervises its execution; Article 130 of the Constitution provides that the Government draws up a draft state budget and presents it to the Seimas not later than 75 days before the end of the budget year; under Paragraph 1 of Article 131 of the Constitution, the draft state budget is considered by the Seimas and is approved by law before the start of the new budget year; as held in the Constitutional Court's ruling of 15 February 2013, the budgetary function of the Seimas is its classical function, and it is one of the most important functions of the parliament of a democratic state under the rule of law;

– under Item 15 of Article 67 of the Constitution, the Seimas establishes state taxes and other compulsory payments; the Constitutional Court has held on more than one occasion that the Constitution consolidates the prerogative of the Seimas to establish taxes (rulings of 9 October 1998 and 15 March 2000, the decision of 20 September 2005, and the ruling of 16 December 2013), as well as that state taxes and other compulsory payments may be established only by the Seimas (rulings of 26 April 2001, 3 June 2002, and 17 November 2003);

– under Paragraph 3 of Article 69 of the Constitution, the Seimas establishes the list of constitutional laws by a 3/5 majority vote of the members of the Seimas; as held in the Constitutional Court's ruling of 1 December 1994, under the Constitution, the list of constitutional laws may be established only by the Seimas.

The right of the Seimas to receive information that is necessary to exercise its constitutional powers; requirements for a legal regulation governing the submission of information, inter alia, an activity report, by state institutions to the Seimas

The Constitutional Court has held that, in order that it might properly perform its parliamentary functions and implement its constitutional powers, the Seimas, the representation of the Nation, must have exhaustive and objective information about the processes taking place in the state and society, as well as about the situation in various areas of the life of the state and society and problems arising therein; the availability of such information is a necessary precondition for the effective activity of the Seimas in the interests of the Nation and the State of Lithuania, as well as for the proper fulfilment of its constitutional duty (rulings of 13 May 2004 and 4 April 2006). Under the Constitution, the Seimas is obliged to establish such a legal regulation that would create legal preconditions for receiving the information necessary to perform its constitutional powers (ruling of 4 April 2006).

The Constitution, inter alia, Item 18 of Article 84 thereof, which prescribes that the President of the Republic makes annual reports at the Seimas, inter alia, on the situation in Lithuania, Paragraph 1 of Article 101 thereof, which provides that, at the request of the Seimas, the Government or individual ministers must give an account of their activities to the Seimas, and Paragraph 2 of Article 134 thereof, under which the Auditor General submits a conclusion to the Seimas concerning the report on the annual execution of the budget, implies that the Seimas, as the representation of the Nation, is provided with different information about the life of the state and society, as well as the activity of various state institutions. The receipt of such information is linked with the striving for open society, as consolidated in the Preamble to the Constitution, also with the principle, laid down in Article 1 of the Constitution, that the State of Lithuania is a republic, as well as with the principles of parliamentary democracy established in various provisions of the Constitution.

In the context of the constitutional justice case at issue, it should be noted that the constitutional separation and interaction of state powers, as well as the function of parliamentary control and budgetary function implemented by the Seimas, imply the possibilities of the legislature to regulate the information, inter alia, the annual activity report of an institution, which is submitted to the Seimas, as the representation of the Nation, for having access to and considering the information submitted in proper ways and under a particular procedure not only by the heads of the Government and other executive authorities, but also by the heads of those institutions which, under Paragraph 1 of Article 5 of the Constitution, are not classified as either the executive or legislative powers. When doing that, the legislature is bound by the Constitution. The principle of the separation of powers, as consolidated in Article 5 (Paragraphs 1 and 2 thereof) and other articles of the Constitution, and the functions of the Seimas, as reflected in the whole of the powers conferred on the Seimas under Article 67, do not imply, inter alia, with regard to information and, thus, also activity reports, to be submitted by state institutions to the Seimas, any such a legal regulation under which, after the head of a state institution submits the relevant information in the form of a report, the procedure of accounting to the Seimas by the institution (or its head) would be considered not completed until the Seimas has approved the submitted report, i.e. under which it would be required that the Seimas not only becomes acquainted with and considers the information provided in the report, but also adopts a special resolution on approving the submitted report.

... in a democratic state under the rule of law, officials and their institutions must observe laws and follow law in their activities; while carrying out the functions that are important to society and the state, state institutions and officials must not face any threat if they fulfil their duties without violations of laws. ... where state officials perform their functions while observing the Constitution and law and acting in the interests of the Nation and the State of Lithuania, they must be protected against any pressure and unjustified interference with their activities, and, where they conscientiously perform their duties, they must not be subject to any threats directed against their person, rights, or freedoms. When interpreting Paragraphs 1 and 2 of Article 5 and Article 67 of the Constitution, inter alia, in the context of the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law, it should be noted that, if the Seimas were vested with the powers to adopt a resolution on giving or not giving its approval to annual activity reports submitted by the heads of state institutions, these heads would be not protected against possible pressure or unjustified interference with their activities, despite the fact that they would perform their functions in observance of the Constitution and law and while acting in the interests of the Nation and the State of Lithuania; such a legal regulation would be incompatible with the Constitution, inter alia, Paragraphs 1 and 2 of Article 5 and Article 67 thereof; and the establishment of such a legal regulation would unreasonably expand the constitutional powers of the Seimas.

... it is impossible to interpret Article 76 of the Constitution only linguistically, i.e. as meaning that it is enough that only the Statute of the Seimas consolidates the powers of the Seimas or its structural subunits (inter alia, committees) that are significant to its work to receive, regularly or upon request, the information from the state institutions (with the exception of courts), inter alia, the state officials appointed by the Seimas or the President of the Republic or their headed institutions, concerning their activity, inter alia, in the form of a report, as well as establishes (explicitly or partially implicitly) the obligations for these officials or the institutions headed by them to provide the information, inter alia, in the form of a report, to the Seimas on a regular basis or upon request. Such powers and obligations of the Seimas, inter alia, related to the form of reports, their submission and receipt, are applicable to the officials who, according to their functions or the functions fulfilled by the institutions they head and thus having the guarantees of independence, must be independent, should be established not only in the Statute of the Seimas, but also by the law consolidating the legal situation of the respective state institution.

At the same time, it needs to be noted that, as mentioned before, in a democratic state under the rule of law, officials and their institutions must observe laws and follow law in their activities; in the area of the legal regulation of the activities of state institutions and officials, the principles of a state under the rule of law are implemented, among other things, by combining trust in state officials with public control over their activities and with their responsibility to the public; the legal system must provide for the possibility of removing from office those state officials who violate laws, who raise personal or group interests above the interests of society, or who discredit state authority by their actions. Thus, it needs to be emphasised that, while considering the annual activity report of an institution at the Seimas, or when it transpires from the information submitted in the annual activity report of an institution during its consideration at the Seimas that the head of the state institution, who submitted the said report, may have violated laws and may have raised personal or group interests above the interests of society, the separation of powers in Lithuania (from the aspect of separation and coordination of the powers of the Seimas and the President of the Republic to appoint and dismiss heads (officials) of state institutions, as, inter alia, reflected in Article 67 of the Constitution), as consolidated in the Constitution, inter alia, Paragraphs 1 and 2 of Article 5 thereof, does not prevent the legislature from establishing also such a legal regulation for dismissing of the heads (officials) of state institutions, who are appointed by the Seimas (as well as by the President of the Republic upon assent of the Seimas), under which the Seimas could in corpore: (1) consider and adopt a resolution on no confidence in such a head of a state institution, as provided for in Article 75 of the Constitution (and in the relevant provisions of the Statute of the Seimas); (2) by means of an act (statement, declaration, resolution, etc.), provided for in the Statute of the Seimas, on expressing the will of the representation of the Nation concerning the issues significant to the state, to publicly address the President of the Republic and propose that the head of a state institution who was appointed by the President of the Republic upon assent of the Seimas be dismissed from his/her office by applying the appropriate grounds of dismissal provided for by law (these grounds may not include the application to the President by the Seimas, as this application is not binding on the President of the Republic). However, the sole refusal by the Seimas to approve an annual activity report submitted to the Seimas (or a legitimate refusal by the head of a state institution to submit information requested by the Seimas) may not serve as a ground for the Seimas to consider and adopt a resolution on expressing no confidence in the head of the state institution where the head of a state institution concerned was appointed by the Seimas (or to submit the proposal to the President of the Republic that the head of a state institution be dismissed from office where the head concerned was appointed by the President upon the assent of the Seimas).

5.2.2. Legislation

The powers of the Seimas to pass laws and other legal acts

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 28 September 2011

... under the Constitution, the Seimas passes constitutional laws, laws, resolutions on the implementation of laws, and other legal acts (Articles 67, 69, and 70 and Item 2 of Article 94 of the Constitution). The Constitutional Court has held that passing laws is one of the most important functions of the Seimas as the representation of the Nation, as well as its constitutional competence (ruling of 19 June 2002).

The Constitutional Court has ... held that, under the Constitution, the Seimas, as the representation of the Nation and the institution of legislative power, may pass laws and other legal acts regulating most varied social relationships (ruling of 4 April 2006).

... the Seimas, as the institution of legislative power, has broad discretion in forming the state policy in various areas of social life ... as well as in respectively regulating, by legal acts, social relationships in these areas. While implementing its powers to form the state policy in certain areas of public and state life ... the Seimas is obliged to pay regard to the norms and principles of the Constitution.

5.2.3. The budgetary function

See 11. The state budget and finances, 11.1. The state budget. The property liabilities of the state. Taxes.

5.2.4. Parliamentary control

Also see 7. The Government.

The right of a member of the Seimas to submit inquiries as a form of parliamentary control (Paragraph 1 of Article 61 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 30 June 1994

... the provision of Paragraph 1 of Article 61 of the Constitution [establishes] the right of the members of the Seimas to submit inquiries as a form of parliamentary control. Among the "state institutions formed or elected by the Seimas" that are mentioned in the said article, an exception is applied only to courts, because their independence is guaranteed under Articles 109 and 114 of the Constitution.

The powers of the Seimas to exercise parliamentary control over the National Audit Office

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 6 December 1995

... the National Audit Office, a state institution exercising economic financial control, [supervises] the lawfulness of the possession and use of state-owned property and the execution of the state budget. It is accountable directly to the Seimas, which exercises parliamentary control over this institution.

Granting the Government the powers to act and exercising control over its activities (for more on this matter, see 7. The Government, 7.2. The formation of the Government. The return of powers. Resignation)

The Seimas, by giving its assent to a programme of the Government, confers the powers on the Government to act; the constitutional norms regulating the activity of the Government, as well as those consolidating the principle of the responsibility of the Government to the Seimas, are thus implemented: it has been established in the constitutional structure of the branches of power that only the Government having the confidence of the Seimas may exercise its powers. The legal form of conferring such powers is voting in the Seimas for giving the assent to a programme of the Government.

... by expressing its confidence in the programme of the Government, the Seimas takes the obligation to supervise as to how the Government will be acting in implementing its own programme. A programme of the Government is the basis of the political and legal responsibility of the Government to the Seimas because the Government is jointly and severally responsible to the Seimas for its general activities. The Seimas that has conferred the powers on the Government to act may express no confidence in the Government or the Prime Minister. The consequence of the expression of no confidence is the resignation of the Government.

Conferring the powers on the Government to act and exercising control over its activities are an important sphere of the competence of the Seimas. Article 67 of the Constitution provides for the following prerogatives of the Seimas: the Seimas gives or does not give its assent to the candidate proposed by the President of the Republic for the post of the Prime Minister; considers the programme of the Government, presented by the Prime Minister, and decides whether to give its assent to it; supervises the activities of the Government and may express no confidence in the Prime Minister or a minister, etc. Under Paragraph 1 of Article 96 of the Constitution, the Government is jointly and severally responsible to the Seimas for the general activities of the Government. ...

... by giving its assent to the programme of the Government, the Seimas expresses its confidence in the Government in principle for the period until the powers of the Seimas expire. Naturally, this does not mean that, if the Government resigns, the same programme will be approved again.

Granting the Government the powers to act (Paragraph 5 of Article 92 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 20 April 1999

The personal composition of the Government is formed by the Prime Minister and by the President of the Republic. However, the mere approval of the composition of the Government is not enough so that the Government could begin to act. The Government must have the confidence of the Seimas. Therefore, Paragraph 5 of Article 92 of the Constitution provides that "a new Government shall receive the powers to act after the Seimas gives assent to its programme by a majority vote of the Members of the Seimas participating in the sitting". The assent to the programme of the Government means that the Government is empowered to implement the provisions of its programme.

... the Government is a collegial institution that is jointly and severally responsible to the Seimas for its general activities. Therefore, under the Constitution, the beginning of the powers of the Government is linked with the assent given by the Seimas to its programme but not with the personal composition of the Government. Considering whether to give its assent to a programme of the Government, the Seimas does not discuss the issues of the personal composition of the Government, since the appointment of ministers is the prerogative of the Prime Minister and the President of the Republic. Voting for giving its assent to a programme of the Government, the Seimas expresses its consent in order that the Government would manage national affairs in the manner as provided for by such a programme. As long as the Seimas does not give its assent to a programme of the Government, the Government has no powers to act.

... the fact that the Seimas gives its assent to the programme of the Government by which the Government receives its powers to act consolidates the principle of expressing confidence in the Government by the Seimas in corpore.

The powers of the Seimas to supervise the activity of the Government (Item 9 of Article 67 and Article 101 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 20 April 1999

The Seimas not only empowers the Government to act, but also, conforming to Item 9 of Article 67 of the Constitution, supervises the activities of the Government. For instance, under Paragraph 1 of Article 101 of the Constitution, at the request of the Seimas, the Government or individual ministers must give an account of their activities to the Seimas. The Seimas, by a majority vote of all the members of the Seimas and by secret ballot, may express no confidence in the Government (Item 2 of Paragraph 3 of Article 101 of the Constitution). The Constitution also provides for other ways as to how the Seimas might carry out the supervision of the Government.

The composition of the Government may change due to various reasons. Under Paragraph 2 of Article 101 of the Constitution, when more than half of the ministers are replaced, the Government must once again receive its powers from the Seimas; otherwise, the Government must resign. The institution of receiving powers once again is one of the forms of the supervision of the Government by the parliament. By applying such a form, the Seimas can verify whether the programme of the Government that was approved by the Seimas is still carried out after more than half of the ministers are replaced. The procedure for receiving powers once again is regulated by the Statute of the Seimas.

Such a constitutional regulation of the powers of state institutions and their interrelations in the course of forming the Government and granting it powers once again reflects the principle of the separation and balance of state powers, as established in the Constitution.

... the fact that the Seimas gives its assent to the programme of the Government by which the Government receives its powers to act consolidates the principle of expressing confidence in the Government by the Seimas in corpore. Changing the area of governance entrusted to a minister is important from the aspect of his/her responsibility. From the standpoint of the interrelations between the Government in corpore and the Seimas, it is not the replacement of individual ministers in the Government (in cases where a member of the Government is appointed to head another ministry etc.) that is important, but rather the fact whether due to such changes more than half of the new ministers are replaced in the Government. In such a case, the Seimas has a constitutional ground for verifying whether the Government continues to carry out the programme that was approved by the Seimas.

Expressing no confidence in an official appointed or elected by the Seimas as one of the ways of parliamentary control (Article 75 of the Constitution)

Article 75 of the Constitution prescribes: "The officials appointed or elected by the Seimas, with the exception of the persons specified in Article 74 of the Constitution, shall be dismissed from office when the Seimas expresses no confidence in them by a majority vote of all the Members of the Seimas."

The said article of the Constitution consolidates the right of the Seimas to dismiss from office those officials who have been appointed or elected by the Seimas, with the exception of the persons specified in Article 74 of the Constitution. This is done by following a special parliamentary procedure entailing the submission of a motion of no confidence. No confidence is expressed by a majority vote of all the members of the Seimas.

The institution of the expression of no confidence is not only one of the means of parliamentary control exercised by the Seimas, but also an important guarantee of the activity of the officials appointed or elected by the Seimas, since such officials, provided there are no grounds due to which they may not hold their office on the whole, may be dismissed from office prior to the expiry of the term of their powers in cases where more than half of all the members of the Seimas vote in favour of no confidence. Expressing no confidence is a ground for dismissing an official appointed or elected by the Seimas from office; expressing no confidence must be linked to the assessment of the activity of the official concerned; therefore, the regulation of the procedure for the parliamentary expression of no confidence must be such that would ensure the due process of law that, inter alia, means that officials against whom no confidence is expressed should have a real opportunity to present to the Seimas their explanations and to counter, at the sitting of the Seimas, all arguments on which the motion of no confidence is based.

Parliamentary democracy; interaction among the branches of state power; parliamentary control

The Constitutional Court's decision of 21 November 2006

The Constitution consolidates parliamentary democracy. However, parliamentary democracy is not "the convent rule", it is not a system where the parliament directly organises the work of other state or municipal institutions or may, at any time, interfere with the activities of any state or municipal institutions (their officials) that implement public power. Nor is parliamentary democracy a system where the parliament, at the slightest pretext, may exert control over any decisions of such institutions (their officials), initiate the application of sanctions against certain persons, let alone adopt decisions by itself for the state or municipal institutions (their officials) that have particular competence, i.e. adopt such decisions that can be adopted only by the state institutions (their officials) that have particular competence, for example, courts, prosecutors, the National Audit Office, the institutions of pretrial investigation, or the subjects of the operational activity provided for in laws.

The model of parliamentary democracy consolidated in the Constitution is rational and moderate. Such a model is not based exclusively on the control exercised by the parliament or on interinstitutional checks and balances; in parliamentary democracy, interfunctional partnership, which is based, inter alia, on trust, plays a role of no less importance. It has been held in the acts of the Constitutional Court that, when the general functions and tasks of the state are performed, there exists interfunctional partnership among state institutions, as well as reciprocal control and balance (rulings of 10 January 1998, 21 April 1998, and 9 May 2006). The Constitutional Court has also held that “interaction among the branches of state power may not be treated as their conflict or competition; thus, also the checks and balances that the judicial branch (institutions thereof) and other branches of state power (institutions thereof) have towards each other may not be treated as the mechanisms of the opposition of the branches of power” (ruling of 9 May 2006).

A different interpretation of the provisions of the Constitution that consolidate the control function performed by the Seimas (inter alia, the provisions substantiating the possibility of forming ad hoc investigation commissions of the Seimas) would unavoidably deny the constitutional principles of responsible governance, of the separation of powers, of a state under the rule of law, and of democracy, as well as the striving for an open, harmonious, and just civil society, as proclaimed in the Preamble to the Constitution; such a different interpretation would create the preconditions for instability in the governance of the state and in the management of public affairs, as well as the preconditions for violating the rights and freedoms, as well as the legitimate interests and legitimate expectations of a person, and for violating other values consolidated, defended, and protected by the Constitution.

The powers of the Seimas to exercise parliamentary control

... under the Constitution, the Seimas exercises parliamentary control over the Government (ruling of 24 December 2002).

Thus, the power of the Seimas, consolidated in Item 14 of Article 67 of the Constitution, to supervise the execution of the state budget means not only that the Seimas, under Item 4 of Article 94 of the Constitution, approves a report on the execution of the budget, but also that the Seimas supervises the execution of the state budget by means of the forms of parliamentary control over the Government that are established by the Constitution.

In this context, it should be noted that the National Audit Office is an institution exercising economic and financial control, which supervises the lawfulness of the possession and use of state-owned property and the execution of the state budget; it is accountable directly to the Seimas, which exercises parliamentary control over this institution (ruling of 6 December 1995). Thus, the power of the Seimas, consolidated in Item 14 of Article 67 of the Constitution, to supervise the execution of the state budget also means that the Seimas supervises the execution of the state budget by means of the forms of parliamentary control over the State Audit Office that are established by the Constitution.

It should also be noted that, in exercising its power under Item 14 of Article 67 of the Constitution to supervise the execution of the state budget, the Seimas, while having regard to the Constitution, inter alia, the principles of responsible governance and a state under the rule of law, which are consolidated in the Constitution, may also exercise parliamentary control over the institutions that have been founded by means of laws, are accountable to the Seimas, and are independent managers of state budget appropriations.

5.2.5. The establishment of institutions and the appointment of officials

The powers of the Seimas to form the Central Electoral Commission and to change its composition, as well as the right of control arising from such powers (Item 13 of Article 67 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 30 June 1994

The Central Electoral Commission is an institution formed by the Seimas (Item 13 of Article 67 of the Constitution); therefore, the Seimas has a certain right to exercise control over this institution insofar as this is in line with the provisions pertaining to the limitation of the powers of state institutions. It is primarily based on the provision of Paragraph 1 of Article 61 of the Constitution, which establishes the right of the members of the Seimas to submit inquiries as a form of parliamentary control. Among the "state institutions formed or elected by the Seimas" that are mentioned in the said article, an exception is applied only to courts, because their independence is guaranteed in Articles 109 and 114 of the Constitution. Such independence of the Central Electoral Commission is not envisaged in the Constitution.

Secondly, the Seimas has certain possibilities of exercising control over the Central Electoral Commission; such possibilities are expressed in the right vested in the Seimas to change the composition of the said commission, as consolidated in Item 13 of Article 67 of the Constitution. It should be noted that the prerogative of the Seimas to change the composition of the Central Electoral Commission is not defined by any criteria in the Constitution; however, the said commission is limited by particular provisions of [the law], which has been adopted by the Seimas itself.

Finally, Article 107 of the Constitution establishes the right of the Seimas to adopt itself a final decision only in cases where election laws are violated. Such a decision of the Seimas must be based on the respective conclusion of the Constitutional Court. In case of doubt as to whether there were the violations of election laws during the elections of the President of the Republic or the elections of the members of the Seimas, under Paragraph 5 of Article 106 of the Constitution, the right to request the Constitutional Court to give a conclusion is vested in the Seimas, and, as regards an election to the Seimas, the President of the Republic of Lithuania also has such a right.

The powers of the Seimas to establish and dissolve ministries (Item 8 of Article 67 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 3 June 1999

In establishing the functions and powers of the institutions of legislative power and those of executive power in the Constitution, interaction between such functions and powers is also provided for. Such a norm is consolidated in Item 8 of Article 67 of the Constitution: the Seimas "shall, upon the proposal of the Government, establish and abolish the ministries of the Republic of Lithuania". ...

Item 8 of Article 67 of the Constitution consolidates the right of the Seimas to establish and abolish ministries. The implementation of such powers of the Seimas is bound by the concrete powers of the Government that are consolidated in the Constitution: if the Government does not present a particular proposal, the Seimas may not adopt a decision whether to establish or abolish a ministry. Thus, this norm of the Constitution ensures the balance of power between the legislative and executive branches.

The powers of the Seimas to appoint and release the heads of the state institutions that are provided for by law (Item 5 of Article 67 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 24 January 2003

Under Item 5 of Article 67 of the Constitution, the Seimas establishes state institutions provided for by law, and appoints and releases their heads.

When interpreting Item 5 of Article 67 of the Constitution in the context of the case at issue, it should be noted that this item means, inter alia, that the Seimas has the powers to provide in a law for the state institutions the heads of which are appointed and released by the Seimas itself, and that the Seimas has the powers to appoint and release the heads of such institutions. Under Item 5 of Article 67 of the Constitution, the Seimas may release from duties the heads of the state institutions that are provided for in laws only on the grounds for release from duties, as established in the Constitution and/or laws, and by following the procedure for release from duties, as established in the Constitution and/or laws. When releasing from duties those heads of the state institutions that are provided for in laws, whom it appointed itself, the Seimas must act on such a basis and follow such a procedure established in laws where the said basis and procedure are not in conflict with the Constitution. Otherwise, Item 5 of Article 67 of the Constitution would be violated.

Under the Constitution, a legal act releasing from duties the head of a state institution provided for by law, where the said head was appointed by the Seimas, is always an individual legal act; therefore, the form of such a legal act is not that of a law; such an act is a different act of the Seimas, i.e. a substatutory legal act. Under Paragraph 2 of Article 70 of the Constitution, such legal acts of the Seimas are signed by the Speaker of the Seimas. The said acts come into force on the day following their publication, unless the acts themselves establish another procedure for their entry into force. Under the Constitution, it is not permitted to release from duties, by law, the head of a state institution provided for by law where the said head was appointed by the Seimas, as this could lead to such a legal situation where the Seimas, which has the constitutional powers to dismiss the head of a state institution provided for by law where the said head was appointed by the Seimas, would not be able to implement such powers alone: as any other law, a law releasing from duties the head of a state institution provided for by law where the said head was appointed by the Seimas must be submitted to the President of the Republic for signing and promulgation; the President of the Republic is entitled not to sign such a law and may, on reasonable grounds, refer it back to the Seimas for reconsideration; a law reconsidered by the Seimas would be deemed adopted only if the amendments and supplements submitted by the President of the Republic are adopted, or if more than half of all the members of the Seimas vote for the law.

If the head of a state institution provided for by law where the said head was appointed by the Seimas is released from duties by law, the powers of the Seimas that are established in Item 5 of Article 67 of the Constitution to release from duties the heads of state institutions provided for by law where the said heads were appointed by the Seimas would be limited; therefore, the constitutional principle of the separation of powers would be violated simultaneously.

The powers of the Seimas in appointing and releasing judges (Item 10 of Article 67 and Paragraphs 2 and 3 of Article 112 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's decision of 15 May 2009

The Constitution establishes such a procedure of the appointment and release of judges and presidents of courts of general jurisdiction and specialised courts of various levels under which the said judges and presidents of courts are appointed and released by the institutions of other branches of state power – executive power and legislative power; thus, they are appointed and released, correspondingly, by the President of the Republic and the Seimas, i.e. the institutions that are formed on a political basis.

... legislative power also participates in the course of appointing and releasing justices and the President of the Supreme Court and judges and the President of the Court of Appeal. The constitutional powers of the Seimas to appoint and release judges are consolidated in the provisions of Paragraphs 2 and 3 of Article 112 of the Constitution and in Item 10 of Article 67 thereof; the said Item 10 provides, inter alia, that the Seimas appoints justices and the President of the Supreme Court. Thus, the Seimas participates in appointing and releasing not all judges, but only the judges and presidents of the two highest-level courts of general jurisdiction. It also needs to be noted that the Seimas implements these powers together with the President of the Republic.

In order to appoint or release a justice or the President of the Supreme Court, the President of the Republic must propose that the Seimas appoint or release such a person, while the decision on the appointment of the said person as a justice or the President of the Supreme Court or his/her release from duties is adopted by the Seimas. The Seimas, after it receives the proposal from the President of the Republic, may appoint a certain person as a justice or the President of the Supreme Court, and (inter alia, if certain circumstances come to light that are important for such appointment or release) it can also decide not to appoint this person as a justice or the President of the Supreme Court, or it can decide not to release a certain justice or the President of the Supreme Court from duties if, under the Constitution, the release of the justice in question is not mandatory.

On receiving a proposal from the President of the Republic that a justice or the President of the Supreme Court be released from duties, the Seimas must ascertain whether the said fact of an objective character really exists, i.e. whether the term of powers of a justice or the President of the Supreme Court, as established by law, has expired, and, provided it is recognised that the term of powers has expired, the Seimas must adopt an individual act of the application of law regarding the release of the said justice or the President of the Supreme Court from duties. Thus, in the case where it is established that there is the objective fact that the term of powers of the said justice or the President of the Supreme Court has expired, the release of such a person from duties is mandatory. The same is mutatis mutandis applied to the chairpersons of the divisions of the Supreme Court.

5.2.6. Other powers

The powers of the Seimas to establish state awards (Item 18 of Article 67 of the Constitution)

(for more on state awards, see 4. The state and its institutions, 4.5. State awards)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 7 September 2010

The grounds of the constitutional institution of state awards are consolidated, inter alia, in Item 18 of Article 67 ... of the Constitution.

Item 18 of Article 67 of the Constitution provides that the Seimas establishes the state awards of the Republic of Lithuania.

When interpreting the power of the Seimas to establish state awards, which is consolidated in Item 18 of Article 67 of the Constitution, in conjunction with the power of the Seimas to pass laws, which is consolidated in Item 2 of Article 67 of the Constitution, it should be held that, under the Constitution, the Seimas may establish state awards by means of passing a law, i.e. by establishing in such a law, inter alia, the system and types of state awards, the insignia of awards, and the grounds for conferring them.

The content of the constitutional institution of state awards was revealed, to a certain extent, in the Constitutional Court's ruling of 12 May 2006. Inter alia, the following was held in the said ruling of the Constitutional Court:

[...]

– when establishing state awards (inter alia, establishing the system thereof), the Seimas has broad discretion; however, it must follow the constitutional concept of state awards; the said concept implies that state awards are granted specifically in recognition of merit and that the said merit should be merit to Lithuania (to the State of Lithuania, its society, or certain spheres of the life of this country). The grounds on the basis of which persons may be awarded must be clear; such grounds must be established by means of a law. ...

... the Constitution, inter alia, gives rise to the duty of the legislature to establish such grounds for conferring state awards, according to which, inter alia, it would be clear which persons may not be conferred state awards at all.

... in the course of establishing the grounds for conferring state awards it is not permitted to establish any final list of persons entitled to receive awards or any final list of merit entitling persons to receive awards.

The powers of the Seimas related to the use of the armed forces (Item 20 of Article 67 and Article 142 of the Constitution) (for more on national defence, see 13. Foreign policy and national defence, 13.2. National defence)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 15 March 2011

Item 20 of Article 67 of the Constitution, wherein the list of the constitutional powers of the Seimas is consolidated, provides that “The Seimas ... shall impose ... martial law, declare states of emergency, announce mobilisation, and adopt a decision to use the armed forces”.

The powers of the Seimas established in Item 20 of Article 67 of the Constitution, which are related to the use of the armed forces, are particularised in Paragraph 1 of Article 142 of the Constitution, wherein it is prescribed that “The Seimas shall impose martial law, announce mobilisation or demobilisation, or adopt the decision to use the armed forces when the need arises to defend the Homeland or to fulfil the international obligations of the State of Lithuania”.

... under the legal regulation established in Paragraph 2 of Article 142 of the Constitution, in the event of an armed attack that threatens the sovereignty of the state or its territorial integrity, a decision immediately adopted by the President of the Republic on the defence against the armed aggression, on the imposition of martial law throughout the state or in its separate part, on the announcement of mobilisation, acquires legal force from the moment of its adoption; however, the President of the Republic must submit this decision for approval at the next sitting of the Seimas (in the period between sessions of the Seimas, an extraordinary session of the Seimas must be convened immediately for this purpose), whereas the Seimas has the right to approve or overrule the decision of the President of the Republic.

... under the Constitution, inter alia, Article 140 thereof, in the course of deliberating and deciding national defence issues, various state institutions and officials take part: inter alia, the State Defence Council, which considers and coordinates the main issues of state defence (and which consists of the President of the Republic, the Prime Minister, the Speaker of the Seimas, the Minister of National Defence, and the Commander of the Armed Forces) and the Government, the Minister of National Defence, and the Commander of the Armed Forces, who are responsible before the Seimas for managing and commanding the armed forces of the state; however, decisions on the main issues of national defence are taken by two state institutions: the Seimas and the President of the Republic. The Seimas is empowered to adopt final decisions on the imposition of martial law, on the announcement of mobilisation and demobilisation, on the adoption of the decision to use the armed forces when the need arises to defend the Homeland or to fulfil the international obligations of the State of Lithuania, whereas the President of the Republic, in the event of an armed attack threatening the sovereignty of the state or its territorial integrity, has the powers to immediately adopt such decisions (concerning defence against the armed aggression, the imposition of martial law throughout the state or in its separate part, and the announcement of mobilisation) that are submitted for approval at the next sitting of the Seimas.

It should be noted that the Seimas, while implementing its constitutional power, which is consolidated in Paragraph 2 of Article 142 of the Constitution, to approve or overrule a decision of the President of the Republic concerning defence against armed aggression, the imposition of martial law, as well as the announcement of mobilisation in the event of an armed attack threatening the sovereignty of the state or its territorial integrity, is bound by the values consolidated in the Constitution and constitutionally important objectives, inter alia, by the independence of the state and the fulfilment of international obligations.

... it needs to be noted that the provisions of the Constitution, whereby the general constitutional foundations of national defence and international cooperation (foreign policy) are consolidated, are related, inter alia, to the fact that, under Paragraph 1 of Article 138 of the Constitution, the Seimas ratifies the international treaties of the Republic of Lithuania on political cooperation with foreign states, mutual assistance treaties, as well as treaties of a defensive nature related to the defence of the state (Item 2), on the renunciation of the use of force or threatening by force; as well as peace treaties (Item 3), on the presence and status of the armed forces of the Republic of Lithuania on the territories of foreign states (Item 4), and on the participation of the Republic of Lithuania in universal international organisations and regional international organisations (Item 5). The power of the Seimas, which is consolidated in Paragraph 1 of Article 142 of the Constitution, to adopt the decision to use the armed forces when the need arises to defend the Homeland or to fulfil the international obligations of the State of Lithuania also includes such a decision to use the armed forces when it is necessary to fulfil the international obligations of the Republic of Lithuania under international treaties of the Republic of Lithuania.

The powers of the Seimas to adopt a final decision on the results of an election to the Seimas (Paragraph 3 of Article 107 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 27 May 2014

Paragraph 3 of Article 107 of the Constitution stipulates that, on the basis of the conclusions of the Constitutional Court, the Seimas takes a final decision on the issues specified in Paragraph 3 of Article 105 of the Constitution. Under Item 1 of Paragraph 3 of Article 105 of the Constitution, the Constitutional Court presents a conclusion on whether there were the violations of the election law during the elections of the members of the Seimas. As held by the Constitutional Court in its decision of 29 November 2012, the Seimas, after receiving the conclusion of the Constitutional Court that the election law was violated during the election of the members of the Seimas, is obliged to adopt a final decision.

The powers of the Seimas, established in Paragraph 3 of Article 107 of the Constitution, to take a final decision on the results of an election to the Seimas should be interpreted in conjunction with, inter alia, the provisions of Item 13 of Article 67 and Paragraph 5 of Article 106 of the Constitution.

Under Item 13 of Article 67 of the Constitution, the Seimas forms the Central Electoral Commission and alters its composition. The Constitutional Court has held that, according to the aforesaid provision, in Lithuania, the universal institution for the organisation of elections – the Central Electoral Commission – must be formed (decision of 11 July 1994 and the conclusion of 26 October 2012). It should be noted that the constitutional mission of the Central Electoral Commission to organise elections also implies the powers of this commission to determine and announce the results of elections to the Seimas.

Paragraph 5 of Article 106 of the Constitution provides that the Seimas and the President may request from the Constitutional Court conclusions on whether the election law was violated, inter alia, during the elections of the members of the Seimas (Item 1 of Paragraph 3 of Article 105 of the Constitution). It should be noted that a doubt as to whether the election law was violated, inter alia, when the Central Electoral Commission was implementing its powers consolidated in the Constitution and laws in relation to the establishment of the final results of the elections to the Seimas, may constitute the grounds for requesting the aforesaid conclusion from the Constitutional Court; under Item 1 of Paragraph 3 of Article 105 of the Constitution, the Constitutional Court must verify whether such a doubt is justified.

It should be emphasised that, once the Constitutional Court presents the conclusion that the election law was not violated during the election of the members of the Seimas, there are no grounds to doubt the results established by the Central Electoral Commission for the election to the Seimas and no grounds for the Seimas to take a final decision provided for in Paragraph 3 of Article 107 of the Constitution. Thus, under Paragraph 3 of Article 107 of the Constitution, the Seimas has the powers to take a final decision on the results of an election to the Seimas only in cases where, subsequent to an inquiry of the Seimas or the President, the Constitutional Court gives the conclusion that the election law was violated during the election of the members of the Seimas.

It should be noted that, under Paragraph 3 of Article 107 of the Constitution, the Seimas takes a final decision on the results of elections to the Seimas only on the basis of the conclusions of the Constitutional Court. It should also be noted that, under Item 1 of Paragraph 3 of Article 105 of the Constitution, it is only the institution of judicial power – the Constitutional Court – that may establish whether the election law was violated during elections to the Seimas; the establishment of violations of the election law is an object of judicial rather than political assessment.

Thus, the provision of Paragraph 3 of Article 107 of the Constitution, under which, based on the conclusions of the Constitutional Court, the Seimas conclusively decides on the issues specified in Paragraph 3 of Article 105 of the Constitution, must not be interpreted in such a manner that the Seimas is allowed to decide anew the same issue regarding which the Constitutional Court has given its conclusion; under the Constitution, the Seimas has no powers to decide on whether the conclusions of the Constitutional Court on violations of the election law are well-founded and lawful. This, inter alia, means that the Seimas, which, in its nature and essence, is a political institution, whose decisions reflect the political will of the majority of the members of the Seimas and are based on political arrangements and compromises, is not allowed to decide the issue of law as to whether the election law was violated, inter alia, to disregard the conclusion of the Constitutional Court that the election law was violated during the elections to the Seimas.

When implementing its powers, established in Paragraph 3 of Article 107 of the Constitution, to take a final decision on the results of elections to the Seimas, the Seimas is obliged to pay regard to the constitutional principles of a state under the rule of law and responsible governance.

The Constitutional Court has held on more than one occasion that, in a constitutional democracy, representative political institutions may not be formed in such a way that would raise doubts as to their legitimacy and legality, inter alia, that would raise doubts as to whether the principles of a democratic state under the rule of law were not violated in the course of the election of persons to representative political institutions; democratic elections are an important form of citizens' participation in the governance of the state, as well as a necessary element of the formation of state political representative institutions; elections may not be regarded as democratic or their results as legitimate and legal if elections are held by undermining the principles of democratic elections established in the Constitution and violating democratic electoral procedures (inter alia, the conclusion of 5 November 2004, the ruling of 1 October 2008, and the conclusion of 10 November 2012).

The principle of responsible governance, which is consolidated in the Constitution, implies that all state institutions and officials are obliged to follow the Constitution and law while performing their functions and to properly implement the powers granted to them by the Constitution and laws by acting in the interests of the Nation and the State of Lithuania (conclusions of 26 October 2012 and 10 November 2012).

When the Seimas is making a final decision on the final election results, an essential significance derives from the fact that certain gross violations of the principles of democratic, free, and fair elections were committed during the election, and that those violations might have distorted the genuine will of the voters. It should be noted that violations of the said electoral principles can be committed not necessarily by candidates for the members of the Seimas themselves – these violations can be committed also by other persons seeking the election of certain candidates to the Seimas.

In its conclusion of 10 November 2012, the Constitutional Court, in interpreting the requirements stemming from the constitutional principles of a state under the rule of law, responsible governance, and those of democratic, free, and fair elections to the Seimas, inter alia, emphasised that candidates whose election was sought by committing gross violations of the principles of democratic, free, and fair elections may not receive a mandate of a member of the Seimas; otherwise, the confidence of the Nation in its representation and the state itself would be undermined.

Thus, while implementing its powers, provided for in Paragraph 3 of Article 107 of the Constitution, to take a final decision on the results of elections to the Seimas and having regard to the constitutional principles of a state under the rule of law and responsible governance, the Seimas, inter alia, is not allowed to create any preconditions for awarding a mandate of a member of the Seimas for candidates whose election was sought by committing certain gross violations of the principles of democratic, free, and fair elections.

Under Paragraph 3 of Article 107 of the Constitution, on the basis of the Constitutional Court's conclusion that the election law was violated during the election of the members of the Seimas, the Seimas takes a final decision on the results of the election to the Seimas. It should be noted that the Seimas has the powers to conclusively decide on the results of elections to the Seimas, insofar as these results are related to the violations of the election law established in the respective conclusion of the Constitutional Court.

It should be mentioned that the Constitutional Court has held on more than one occasion that legal certainty, legal security, and the protection of legitimate expectations are inseparable elements of the principle of a state under the rule of law. In the context of the constitutional justice case at issue, it should be emphasised that the constitutional principles of legal certainty, legal security, and the protection of legitimate expectations imply, inter alia, the requirement that the stability of the system of state power, inter alia, the stability of the Seimas, as a representative political institution, must be ensured. In view of this fact, it should be noted that the final results of elections to the Seimas that are established by the Seimas under Paragraph 3 of Article 107 of the Constitution may not be altered unless there is a constitutional ground for doing so.

For instance, such a constitutional ground is implied by Item 6 of Article 63 of the Constitution, under which the powers of a member of the Seimas cease when the election is declared invalid or the law on election is grossly violated.

In its conclusion of 10 November 2012, the Constitutional Court pointed out that:

- under the Constitution, the gross violations of the principles of democratic, free, and fair elections, inter alia, the honesty and transparency of the election process, committed during elections to the Seimas may also be established later, after the elected members of the Seimas have acquired their powers, i.e. after the elected Seimas convenes for its first sitting;

- Item 6 of Article 63 of the Constitution implies the powers of the Seimas to revoke the powers of a member of the Seimas if gross violations of the principles of democratic, free, and fair elections, which give rise to reasonable doubts regarding the lawfulness of the election of that member of the Seimas, are established after that member of the Seimas has acquired his/her powers; under Item 6 of Article 63 of the Constitution, the powers of a member of the Seimas may be revoked both when the election is declared and when it is not declared invalid (for example, it is possible to establish the election results reflecting the genuine will of the voters);

- under Item 1 of Paragraph 3 of Article 105, Paragraph 5 of Article 106, and Paragraph 3 of Article 107 of the Constitution, the Seimas may adopt a decision on revoking the powers of a member of the Seimas under Item 6 of Article 63 of the Constitution only on the grounds of the Constitutional Court's conclusion that the election law was violated during the election to the Seimas, while the Constitutional Court may present the said conclusion only following an inquiry by the Seimas or the President.

It has been mentioned that, if gross violations of the principles of democratic, free, and fair elections were committed with the aim of electing certain candidates, these candidates may not be awarded a mandate of a member of the Seimas, since, otherwise, the confidence of the Nation in its representation and the state itself could be undermined; thus, the Seimas may not create any preconditions for awarding such candidates a mandate of a member of the Seimas.

In view of this fact, it should be noted that, in the cases where, after the establishment of the final results of an election to the Seimas, the gross violations of the principles of democratic, free, and fair elections are discovered revealing that those violations were committed with the aim of electing certain candidates who have not acquired the powers of a member of the Seimas and appear on the lists of candidates as potential candidates to take up the available vacant seats of the members of the Seimas once such vacancies occur, as well as where the Constitutional Court, having received an inquiry of the Seimas or the President, gives the conclusion that the election law was violated during the election to the Seimas, the Seimas, under the Constitution (Item 6 of Article 63 thereof, interpreted in conjunction with Item 1 of Paragraph 3 of Article 105, Paragraph 5 of Article 106, and Paragraph 3 of Article 107 of the Constitution), on the grounds of the said conclusion of the Constitutional Court, is allowed to alter the final results of the election to the Seimas in the multi-member electoral constituency, inter alia, by removing from the list of candidates those candidates whose election was sought by committing the gross violations of the aforementioned electoral principles.

In summary, it should be noted that, under Paragraph 3 of Article 107 of the Constitution, the final results established by the Seimas for an election to the Seimas may be altered upon the emergence of a constitutional ground only in the same manner in which they have been established, i.e. only on the basis of another conclusion of the Constitutional Court.

5.3. THE CONSTITUTIONAL STATUS OF A MEMBER OF THE SEIMAS

The free mandate of a member of the Seimas (Paragraph 4 of Article 59 of the Constitution); the equality of the members of the parliament

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 26 November 1993

Paragraph 4 of Article 59 of the Constitution provides that, while in office, the members of the Seimas follow the Constitution of the Republic of Lithuania, the interests of the state, as well as their own consciences, and may not be restricted by any mandates. Thus, the Constitution consolidates the free mandate of a member of the Seimas and does not recognise any imperative mandate. The essence of the free mandate lies in the freedom of a representative of the Nation to implement the rights and duties vested in him/her without restricting this freedom by the mandates of the electorate or by the political requirements of the parties or organisations that nominated him/her, and without recognising the right to recall a member of the Seimas.

Each member of the parliament represents the entire Nation; all the members of the parliament are the representation of the Nation. When differentiating the rights of the members of the Seimas in such a way that unequal possibilities for their participation in the activities of the Seimas are created, the essential principle of a representative institution – the equality of the members of the parliament – is violated; therefore, it becomes impossible to represent the entire Nation at the Seimas and to express the interests of the Nation.

The principles of the equality of the members of the parliament and a free mandate must also be followed in forming the internal structures of the parliament. ...

In determining the internal structure of the parliament, the universal principles of its formation must be chosen where such principles would ensure the equal and real opportunities for all the members of the parliament to participate in the formed structural units. Otherwise, not all the members of the parliament would have the opportunity of exercising the additional rights established for the said structural units, which would mean the violation of the principle of the equality of all the members of the parliament. ... political groups in the parliament are formed only by the members of the parliament in accordance with the procedure for their formation that is prescribed by the parliament (most frequently, they are formed on the basis of views and political goals), but not by political parties, political organisations, or their coalitions. Though political groups are in close relation with political parties, this does not mean that a political group is a political party in the Seimas or that each party that has its representatives in the Seimas is a political group at the same time. This conclusion is derived from the principle of a free mandate, which is consolidated in the Constitution.

The rights and duties of the members of the Seimas may not be linked with election laws. Firstly, these are different matters governed by a legal regulation (in the first case, elections and, in the second one, the activities of the parliament). Secondly, the matter of the regulation calls forth different criteria on the basis of which the rights and duties of the participants of legal relationships are determined.

... A decision of the parliament whereby the rights of the members of the parliament to participate in the parliamentary process are differentiated violates the rights of a member of the parliament as a representative of the Nation.

The equality of the members of the Seimas in forming political groups on the basis of views and political goals is an important element of the implementation of the principle of a free mandate. Since a political group (i.e. the members of the parliament who are registered with it) has more possibilities of participating in the activities of the parliament than a member of the Seimas who does not belong to any political group, it must be ensured that all the members of the Seimas have the possibility of freely choosing and forming political groups. Seeking to ensure the working capacity and effectiveness of the Seimas, it is important to establish the minimum number of the members of a political group.

It would be possible to guarantee the rights and possibilities of those members of the Seimas who do not register themselves as political groups, where the said rights and possibilities are equal with those of other members of the Seimas and allow the implementation of the rights of a representative of the Nation, by recognising that they are members of a mixed political group and that such a political group has equal rights with other political groups.

The remuneration of a member of the Seimas (Articles 60 and 99 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 9 November 1999

The members of the Seimas are representatives of the Nation; the Nation executes its supreme sovereign power through the members of the Seimas (Paragraph 1 of Article 55 and Article 4 of the Constitution). The members of the Seimas are capable of performing the functions of the representatives of the Nation properly only when they have the rights and duties directly consolidated and guaranteed in the Constitution and are free and independent. One of the main guarantees of the free and independent activity of a member of the Seimas is the fact that, under Paragraph 3 of Article 60 of the Constitution, the work of the members of the Seimas, as well as all expenses relating to their parliamentary activities, is remunerated from the state budget. The same article also provides that a member of the Seimas may not receive any other remuneration, with the exception of remuneration for creative activities. These constitutional provisions imply that the remuneration of a member of the Seimas must be of a sufficient amount and it must be paid regularly; the same constitutional provisions imply that, during the term of office of the Seimas, it is not allowed to establish, by means of a law, the remuneration of a member of the Seimas that is smaller from the one existing at the beginning of the term of office of the Seimas. Such a constitutional regulation of the remuneration of a member of the Seimas is established in order that the members of the Seimas would properly perform their obligations as representatives of the Nation.

It should be noted that the grounds for establishing the remuneration of member of the Seimas are laid down not only in Paragraph 3, but also in other paragraphs of Article 60 of the Constitution.

Article 60 of the Constitution prescribes:

“The duties of the Members of the Seimas, with the exception of their duties at the Seimas, shall be incompatible with any other duties at state institutions or organisations, or with work in business, commercial, or other private establishments or enterprises. During their term of office, the Members of the Seimas shall be exempt from the duty to perform national defence service.

A Member of the Seimas may be appointed only either as the Prime Minister or a Minister.

The work of the Members of the Seimas, as well as all expenses relating to their parliamentary activities, shall be remunerated from the State Budget. A Member of the Seimas may not receive any other remuneration, with the exception of remuneration for creative activities.

The duties, rights, and guarantees of the activities of a Member of the Seimas shall be established by law.”

Thus, Paragraph 1 of Article 60 prescribes that the members of the Seimas are prohibited from holding any other office in state institutions or organisations, as well as from working in business, commercial, or other private establishments or enterprises. Paragraph 2 of the said article provides for an exception to the limitations established in Paragraph 1 thereof: a member of the Seimas may be appointed only either as the Prime Minister or a minister. The norm set out in Paragraph 2 of Article 60 of the Constitution is a special norm with respect to the general norm formulated in Paragraph 1 of this article.

The constitutional right of a member of the Seimas to hold the office of the Prime Minister or that of a minister implies the right to receive remuneration for holding such office. This is also confirmed by Article 99 of the Constitution, wherein it is established that the Prime Minister and ministers receive remuneration established for their respective governmental duties. Paragraph 4 of Article 60 of the Constitution provides that the guarantees of the activities of a member of the Seimas and, consequently, also his/her remuneration, are established by law.

If the relation among Paragraphs 1, 2 and the other paragraphs of Article 60 of the Constitution, as well as the relation of the same article with Article 99 of the Constitution, is assessed in a systemic manner, the conclusion should be drawn that it is possible to establish different remuneration for the work performed in the capacity of a member of the Seimas for such a member of the Seimas who is appointed either as the Prime Minister or a minister.

Under the Constitution, the Seimas has the discretion to establish, by means of a law, such remuneration for the work performed in the capacity of a member of the Seimas for such a member of the Seimas who is appointed either as the Prime Minister or a minister, where the said remuneration is different from that paid to other members of the Seimas; however, when exercising such discretion, the Seimas is bound by the constitutional principles of a state under the rule of law. Consequently, in this case, the remuneration of a member of the Seimas must also be of a sufficient amount in order that such a member of the Seimas performs his/her duty as a representative of the Nation.

It has already been noted in this ruling that one of the main guarantees of the activity of a member of the Seimas is the fact that, under Paragraph 3 of Article 60 of the Constitution, the work of the members of the Seimas, as well as all expenses relating to their parliamentary activities, is remunerated from the state budget. This is one of the guarantees of the independence and the equality of the rights of the members of the Seimas. The Constitution does not contain any legal norms under which the same remuneration must be established for all the members of the Seimas regardless of the fact that a member of the Seimas may hold certain office in the Seimas or in the Government. Under Paragraphs 1, 2, and 4 of Article 60 of the Constitution, the Seimas has the discretion to establish, by means of a law, such remuneration for the work performed in the capacity of a member of the Seimas for such members of the Seimas who are appointed either as the Prime Minister or a minister, where the said remuneration is different from that paid to the other members of the Seimas. Different remuneration may also be established for those members of the Seimas who hold in the Seimas office that is provided for in the Statute of the Seimas.

The constitutional status of a member of the Seimas (Paragraph 1 of Article 55 and Paragraph 4 of Article 59 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 30 May 2003

Under Paragraph 1 of Article 55 of the Constitution, the Seimas consists of representatives of the Nation – the members of the Seimas. The constitutional status of a member of the Seimas, a representative of the Nation, means that a member of the Seimas is not a representative of any territorial community, a community or group of the citizens, a political party or some other organisation: he/she represents the whole Nation. The status of a member of the Seimas, a representative of the Nation, arises out of the provisions of the Constitution, whereby the State of Lithuania is an independent democratic republic (Article 1); the Nation executes its supreme sovereign power either directly or through its democratically elected representatives (Article 4), etc. A free mandate is an essential element of the status of a member of the Seimas as a representative of the Nation.

In its rulings of 26 November 1993 and 25 January 2001, when interpreting Paragraph 4 of Article 59 of the Constitution, according to which, while in office, the members of the Seimas follow the Constitution of the Republic of Lithuania, the interests of the state, as well as their own consciences, and may not be restricted by any mandates, the Constitutional Court stated that the Constitution consolidates the free mandate of a member of the Seimas and does not recognise an imperative mandate.

The essence of the free mandate lies in the freedom of a representative of the Nation to implement the rights and duties vested in him/her without restricting this freedom by the mandates of the electorate or by the political requirements of the parties or organisations that nominated him/her. A free mandate also means that voters have no right to recall a member of the Seimas. An early recall of a member of the Seimas would constitute one of the elements of an imperative mandate. The Constitution prohibits an imperative mandate. Democratic states do not recognise the imperative mandate of a member of the parliament; thus, they do not recognise the possibility of an early recall of a member of the parliament from his/her office, either.

It should also be noted that the Constitution consolidates the immunity of a member of the Seimas in order that members of the Seimas, as representatives of the Nation, would perform their duties without any hindrance. Article 62 of the Constitution provides that the person of a member of the Seimas is inviolable; a member of the Seimas may not be held criminally liable or be detained, or have his/her liberty restricted otherwise, without the consent of the Seimas (Paragraphs 1 and 2 of Article 62).

Under the Constitution, the duties of the members of the Seimas, with the exception of their duties at the Seimas, are incompatible with any other duties at state institutions or organisations, or with work in business, commercial, or other private establishments or enterprises (Paragraph 1 of Article 60 of the Constitution). A member of the Seimas may be appointed only either as the Prime Minister or a minister (Paragraph 2 of Article 60 of the Constitution). A member of the Seimas may not receive any other remuneration (save that of the member of the Seimas), with the exception of remuneration for creative activities (Paragraph 3 of Article 60 of the Constitution).

Thus, the Constitution consolidates the principle of the prohibition on a dual mandate: a member of the Seimas, as a representative of the Nation, may not simultaneously be a representative of a territorial community – a member of a municipal council.

The constitutional status of a member of the Seimas

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 1 July 2004

The Seimas consists of the members of the Seimas – representatives of the Nation. Each member of the Seimas represents the entire Nation. When fulfilling his/her constitutional obligation to represent the Nation, a member of the Seimas participates in performing all constitutional functions of the Seimas and exercises all powers of a member of the Seimas.

The continuity of the activity of the Seimas also implies the continuity of the activity of a member of the Seimas as a representative of the Nation. Under the Constitution, legal acts should establish such a structure and work procedure of the Seimas and such a legal status of a member of the Seimas that would provide for an opportunity for each member of the Seimas to fulfil his/her constitutional obligation to be constantly involved in the work of the Seimas, the representation of the Nation, and to exercise on a continuous basis his/her constitutional powers, as a representative of the Nation.

It needs to be emphasised that the Constitution treats a member of the Seimas as a professional politician, i.e. as such a representative of the Nation whose work at the Seimas is his/her professional activity.

The Constitution consolidates the free mandate of a member of the Seimas and the constitutional obligation of a member of the Seimas to represent the Nation. The powers of a member of the Seimas must be interpreted by taking into account the overall constitutional legal regulation. On the one hand, the constitutional legal status of a member of the Seimas and the separate elements of such status (rights and duties of a member of the Seimas, the guarantees of both his/her work at the Seimas and his/her other parliamentary activities, limitations applied in respect to a member of the Seimas, etc.) should be interpreted not in isolation from one another, but as a whole and as a system, since each element of the constitutional legal status of a member of the Seimas may be constitutionally correctly understood only if linked with other elements of the constitutional legal status of a member of the Seimas and assessed as part of a single whole – the constitutional legal status of a member of the Seimas. On the other hand, the constitutional legal status of a member of the Seimas and its separate elements should also be interpreted in the context of other constitutional institutions, inter alia, in the context of the individual rights and freedoms, as consolidated in the Constitution – the right of ownership, the inviolability of property, and protection of the rights of ownership (Article 23 of the Constitution), the right to freely choose an occupation or business (Paragraph 1 of Article 48 of the Constitution), freedom of economic activity and initiative (Paragraph 1 of Article 46 of the Constitution), the right of citizens to freely form societies, political parties, and associations (Article 35 of the Constitution), the right of employees to establish trade unions aimed at protecting their professional, economic, and social rights and interests (Article 50 of the Constitution), etc. ... the provisions of the Constitution that consolidate the constitutional legal status of a member of the Seimas may not be interpreted in such a way that the aforementioned and other constitutional rights and freedoms of a person would be violated. Still, equally important is the fact that the provisions of the Constitution that consolidate the said and other individual rights and freedoms may not be interpreted in such a way that would deny or distort the content of the constitutional legal status of a member of the Seimas as a representative of the Nation, i.e. the said provisions may not be interpreted in order to create the preconditions for a member of the Seimas to have a conflict of public and private interests, or in order to create the preconditions for a member of the Seimas not to perform or to perform improperly his/her constitutional duty to represent the entire Nation and to act in the interests of the Nation and the State of Lithuania, or in order to create the preconditions for a member of the Seimas to use the free mandate of a member of the Seimas not in the interests of the Nation and the State of Lithuania, but for his/her private benefit, or for the benefit of his/her close relatives or other persons, or in their personal or group interests, or in the interests of the political parties or political organisations, the public or other organisations, other persons, or the territorial communities that nominated or supported the said person as a candidate for the office of a member of the Seimas, or in the interests of the voters of the constituency in which the said member of the Seimas was elected. Therefore, neither the provisions of the Constitution that consolidate the constitutional legal status of a member of the Seimas nor its provisions in which the rights and freedoms of persons are consolidated may be interpreted only literally, by applying only the linguistic (verbal) method and ignoring other constitutional provisions and their links with, inter alia, the provisions of the Constitution that consolidate the constitutional status of a member of the Seimas and/or the rights and freedoms of persons, while ignoring the interrelation in the content of these constitutional provisions, a balance among the constitutional values, and the essence of the constitutional legal regulation as a single whole.

The oath of a member of the Seimas and the acquisition of the rights of a representative of the Nation (Article 59 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 1 July 2004

Paragraph 2 of Article 55 of the Constitution provides that the Seimas is deemed elected when not less than 3/5 of the members of the Seimas are elected. According to the Constitution, the Seimas consists of 141 members. Thus, the Seimas is deemed elected when at least 85 members of the Seimas are elected. Article 65 of the Constitution prescribes that the President of the Republic convenes the first sitting of the newly elected Seimas, which must be held within 15 days of the election of the Seimas; if the President of the Republic fails to convene the Seimas, the members of the Seimas assemble by themselves on the day following the expiry of the 15-day period. Paragraph 2 of Article 66 of the Constitution provides that the first sitting of the Seimas after its election is opened by the eldest member of the Seimas; it should be held that this is the only provision of the Constitution that expressis verbis consolidates the power of one – the eldest – elected member of the Seimas exercised at the Seimas; such a member of the Seimas has this power prior to acquiring all powers of a representative of the Nation.

It needs to be emphasised that, according to the Constitution, as such, the election of a member of the Seimas does not mean that an elected member of the Seimas acquires all rights of a representative of the Nation. Under the Constitution, the acquisition of all rights of a representative of the Nation is linked with the oath of a member of the Seimas; such an oath must be taken by an elected member of the Seimas at a sitting of the Seimas. Paragraph 2 of Article 59 of the Constitution prescribes that a member of the Seimas acquires all rights of a representative of the Nation only after taking an oath at the Seimas to be faithful to the Republic of Lithuania. This constitutional provision also means that a member of the Seimas does not have all rights of a representative of the Nation until he/she takes an oath – such an elected member of the Seimas is not a representative of the Nation yet; he/she does not have the powers of a member of the Seimas and may not exercise them yet.

If interpreted in the context of the principle of the continuity of the activity of the Seimas, as consolidated in the Constitution, the constitutional provisions according to which the term of office of the members of the Seimas is counted from the day when the newly elected Seimas convenes for the first sitting and those whereby the term of office of the previously elected members of the Seimas expires from the beginning of the sitting imply that the newly elected Seimas as the fully fledged representation of the Nation must begin functioning namely from the beginning of this sitting. Since a member of the Seimas, under the Constitution, acquires all rights of a representative of the Nation only after taking an oath in the Seimas to be faithful to the Republic of Lithuania, elected members of the Seimas, under the Constitution, must take an oath at the first sitting of a newly elected Seimas. According to the Constitution, the legislature must establish such a procedure of taking an oath of a member of the Seimas that all the members of the Seimas take an oath namely at the first sitting of a newly elected Seimas. An exception could be made for those elected members of the Seimas who are not able to arrive at the first sitting of a newly elected Seimas only for duly justified exceptional reasons (for example, for the reason of illness); under the Constitution, such an elected member of the Seimas must take an oath at the next sitting of the Seimas after the said duly justified exceptional reason because of which an elected member of the Seimas was not able to take the oath at the first sitting of a newly elected sitting of the Seimas no longer exists.

Paragraph 3 of Article 59 of the Constitution provides that a member of the Seimas who either does not take the oath according to the procedure established by law or takes a conditional oath loses the mandate of a member of the Seimas; the Seimas adopts a corresponding resolution thereon. It needs to be emphasised that the Constitution does not tolerate such a situation where elected members of the Seimas fail to meet at the first sitting of a newly elected Seimas or where they meet at the sitting but fail to take an oath. Such conduct of an elected member of the Seimas where he/she fails to arrive at the first sitting of a newly elected Seimas in the absence of a duly justified exceptional reason or arrives at the sitting but fails to take an oath should be evaluated as the refusal of such an elected member of the Seimas to take an oath and should result in the legal consequences provided for in Paragraph 3 of Article 59 of the Constitution – the loss of the mandate of a member of the Seimas. The conduct where the elected member of the Seimas fails to take an oath at the next sitting of the Seimas after the said duly justified exceptional reason because of which an elected member of the Seimas was not able to take the oath at the first sitting of a newly elected sitting of the Seimas no longer exists should be evaluated in the same way and it should give rise to the same legal consequences. The Seimas must adopt a corresponding resolution thereon.

The oath of a member of the Seimas is not a mere formal or symbolic act (ruling of 25 May 2004). Such an oath is not just the solemn utterance of the words of the oath and the signing of the act of the oath. In its ruling of 25 May 2004, the Constitutional Court held that the act of the oath of a member of the Seimas is constitutionally legally significant: when taking an oath, an elected member of the Seimas publicly and solemnly assumes the obligation to act in the way that the oath taken obliges and to breach the oath under no circumstances; from the moment of taking an oath, the constitutional duty of the member of the Seimas arises to act only in the way that the oath taken obliges and to breach the oath under no circumstances.

The text of the oath of a member of the Seimas is established in Article 5 of the Republic of Lithuania's Law on the Procedure for the Entry into Force of the Constitution of the Republic of Lithuania, which is a constituent part of the Constitution. A member of the Seimas assumes the obligation to be faithful to the Republic of Lithuania; to respect and uphold its Constitution and laws and to protect the integrity of its lands; and to strengthen, to the best of his/her ability, the independence of Lithuania, and to conscientiously serve the Homeland, democracy, and the welfare of the people of Lithuania. Paragraph 4 of Article 59 of the Constitution provides that, while in office, the members of the Seimas follow the Constitution of the Republic of Lithuania, the interests of the state, as well as their own consciences, and may not be restricted by any mandates. Thus, the oath of a member of the Seimas obligates him/her in all activities to follow the Constitution, the interests of the state, as well as his/her own conscience, and not to be restricted by any mandates. The oath of a member of the Seimas gives rise to the duty a member of the Seimas to respect and execute the Constitution and laws, as well as to conscientiously perform the duties of a representative of the Nation in the manner as the Constitution obliges him/her to act. In its ruling of 25 May 2004, the Constitutional Court held that the Constitution implies such a notion of the discretion of a member of the Seimas and the conscience of a member of the Seimas whereby no gap must exist between the discretion of a member of the Seimas and the conscience of a member of the Seimas, on the one hand, and the requirements of the Constitution, as well as the values protected and defended under the Constitution, on the other hand; according to the Constitution, the discretion of a member of the Seimas and his/her conscience must be oriented towards the Constitution and the interests of the Nation and the State of Lithuania.

The free mandate of a member of the Seimas (Paragraph 4 of Article 59 of the Constitution); the equality of the rights of the members of the Seimas

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 1 July 2004

Paragraph 4 of Article 59 of the Constitution consolidates one of the major elements of the constitutional legal status of a member of the Seimas – the free mandate of a member of the Seimas as a representative of the Nation. The Constitution consolidates the free mandate of a member of the Seimas and prohibits an imperative mandate.

The essence of the free mandate lies in the right of a representative of the Nation to implement the rights and duties established for him/her without restricting this freedom by the mandates of the electorate or by the political requirements of the parties or organisations that nominated him/her. The free mandate of a member of the Seimas also means that voters have no right to recall a member of the Seimas. An early recall of a member of the Seimas would constitute one of the elements of an imperative mandate. Democratic states do not recognise the imperative mandate of a member of the parliament; thus, they do not recognise the possibility of an early recall of a member of the parliament from his/her office, either (rulings of 26 November 1993, 9 November 1999, 25 January 2001, and 30 May 2003).

The free mandate of a member of the Seimas, which is consolidated in the Constitution, reveals the essence of the constitutional legal status of a member of the Seimas as a representative of the Nation and is inseparably linked with the equality of the members of the Seimas. Under the Constitution, each member of the Seimas represents the entire Nation. All the members of the Seimas are equal and they must have the same opportunities to participate in the work of the Seimas. If the rights of the members of the Seimas were differentiated in such a way that unequal possibilities for their participation in the activities of the Seimas are created, the essential principle of this representative institution – the equality of the members of the parliament – would be violated; therefore, it would become impossible for the members of the Seimas to represent the entire Nation at the Seimas and to express the interests of the entire Nation. The principles of the free mandate of a member of the Seimas and the equality of the members of the Seimas must also be followed when establishing the internal structure of the Seimas. The free mandate of a member of the Seimas, which is consolidated in the Constitution, is one of the guarantees for the autonomy of the activities carried out by the members of the Seimas and for their equality (rulings of 26 November 1993, 9 November 1999, and 25 January 2001).

It should also be emphasised that the free mandate of a member of the Seimas, which is consolidated in the Constitution, may not be understood as permission for a member of the Seimas always to act at discretion, to follow his/her conscience, and to ignore the Constitution (ruling of 25 May 2004). ... the Constitution implies such a notion of the discretion of a member of the Seimas and the conscience of a member of the Seimas whereby no gap must exist between the discretion of a member of the Seimas and the conscience of a member of the Seimas, on the one hand, and the requirements of the Constitution, as well as the values protected and defended under the Constitution, on the other hand. The free mandate of a member of the Seimas is not a privilege of a representative of the Nation but one of the legal measures ensuring that the Nation will be properly represented in its democratically elected representation, the Seimas, and that the representation of the Nation, the Seimas, will act only in the interests of the Nation and the State of Lithuania. For this reason, the free mandate of a member of the Seimas may not be used in the interests other than those of the Nation and the State of Lithuania. The free mandate of a member of the Seimas may not be used for the private benefit of a member of the Seimas, his/her close relatives or other persons, or in their personal or group interests, or in the interests of the political parties or political organisations, the public or other organisations, other persons, or the territorial communities that nominated or supported the said person as a candidate for the office of a member of the Seimas, or in the interests of the voters of the constituency in which the said member of the Seimas was elected, i.e. it may not be used to serve particular interests. Under the Constitution, a member of the Seimas is not a representative of political parties or political organisations, public or other organisations, interest groups, territorial communities, or the voters of the constituency in which he/she was elected, but a member of the Seimas represents the entire Nation.

The constitutional consolidation of the free mandate of a member of the Seimas, as well as the essence of the Seimas as the representation of the Nation, implies the constitutional duty of the Seimas to lay down in legal acts such a legal regulation that would create no preconditions for using the free mandate of a member of the Seimas in the interests other than the interests of the Nation and the State of Lithuania, i.e. for the private benefit of a member of the Seimas, his/her close relatives or other persons, or in their personal or group interests, or in the interests of the political parties or political organisations, the public or other organisations, other persons, or the territorial communities that nominated or supported the said person as a candidate for the office of a member of the Seimas, or in the interests of the voters of the constituency in which the said member of the Seimas was elected. The legislature must establish such a legal regulation that would ensure that a member of the Seimas works only for the Nation and the State of Lithuania, and avoids the conflict between the interests of the Nation and the State of Lithuania on the one hand and, on the other hand, the private interests of a member of the Seimas, his/her close relatives or other persons (personal or group interests), the interests of the political parties or political organisations, the public or other organisations, other persons or the territorial communities that nominated or supported the said person as a candidate for the office of a member of the Seimas, or the interests of the voters of the constituency in which the said member of the Seimas was elected. At the same time, the activity of a member of the Seimas should be legally regulated in such a manner that it would be possible to exercise effective control over whether such a conflict exists and whether a member of the Seimas uses his/her free mandate in the interests other than the interests of the Nation and the State of Lithuania. If a member of the Seimas disregards the aforementioned requirements of the Constitution, he/she must be held liable pursuant to the Constitution and laws.

The rights of a member of the Seimas

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 1 July 2004

The most important rights of a member of the Seimas as a representative of the Nation are expressis verbis or implicitly consolidated in the Constitution itself. Some constitutional rights are exercised by a member of the Seimas as a single person. For instance, a member of the Seimas has the right of legislative initiative at the Seimas (Paragraph 1 of Article 68 of the Constitution); a member of the Seimas also has the right to submit an inquiry to the Prime Minister, the ministers, and the heads of other state institutions formed or elected by the Seimas; the said persons must respond orally or in writing during the session of the Seimas according to the procedure established by the Seimas (Paragraph 1 of Article 61 of the Constitution). A member of the Seimas also has the constitutional right to aspire to hold a specific office at the Seimas; this right comprises the right to hold at the Seimas such office that is directly specified in the Constitution, i.e. the office of the Speaker or that of the Deputy Speaker of the Seimas, as well as other duties at the Seimas where such duties are provided for in the Statute of the Seimas, which, under the Constitution, establishes the structure and procedure of activities of the Seimas and has the force of a law (Article 76 of the Constitution). A member of the Seimas, together with other members of the Seimas, exercises other rights laid down in the Constitution. For instance, a group of not less than 1/4 of all the members of the Seimas has the right to submit a motion to alter or supplement the Constitution of the Republic of Lithuania to the Seimas (Paragraph 1 of Article 147 of the Constitution); a group of not less than 1/5 of the members of the Seimas may interpellate the Prime Minister or a minister (Paragraph 2 of Article 61 of the Constitution), or apply to the Constitutional Court (Paragraph 1 of Article 106 of the Constitution); a group of members of the Seimas may initiate impeachment proceedings against the President of the Republic, the President and justices of the Constitutional Court, the President and justices of the Supreme Court, the President and judges of the Court of Appeal, as well as the members of the Seimas (Article 74 of the Constitution, the ruling of 15 April 2004). The members of the Seimas have the right on equal basis to participate when the Seimas, as the representation of the Nation, exercises its powers of the representation of the Nation established in Article 67 of the Constitution, in other articles of the Constitution, and in laws. The free mandate of a member of the Seimas consolidated in the Constitution constitutes a compulsory condition for carrying out the constitutional duty of a member of the Seimas to represent the entire Nation.

According to Paragraph 4 of Article 60 of the Constitution, the rights of a member of the Seimas are established by law. Thus, the Constitution provides for two levels in the legal regulation of the rights of a member of the Seimas: the rights established in the Constitution itself and the rights established in laws by the legislature. The aforementioned provision of Paragraph 4 of Article 60 of the Constitution implies the duty of the Seimas to lay down the rights of a member of the Seimas in laws in order to ensure the possibility of the members of the Seimas for performing, in a fully fledged manner, their constitutional obligation as the one of the representatives of the Nation. In establishing this, the legislature must pay regard to the norms and principles of the Constitution; for instance, the legislature may not establish any such rights of a member of the Seimas that would unreasonably grant privileges to members of the Seimas, since the requirement of, inter alia, Paragraph 2 of Article 29 of the Constitution, whereby no one may be granted any privileges on the grounds of social status, would be ignored.

In this context, it should also be noted that ... under Article 76 of the Constitution, the structure and procedure of activities of the Seimas are established by the Statute of the Seimas. It is obvious that the legal regulation of the structure and procedure of activities of the Seimas is linked with the establishment of the rights of a member of the Seimas; therefore, the aforementioned provisions of Paragraph 4 of Article 60 of the Constitution and Article 76 of the Constitution may not be opposed. For instance, in its ruling of 13 May 2004, the Constitutional Court held that the aforementioned provision of Article 76 of the Constitution may not be interpreted only linguistically. It was also held in the same ruling of the Constitutional Court that, in order that it could properly perform its constitutional functions, the Seimas may also need to form such structural subunits that would have powers with respect to various state and municipal institutions, their officials, and other persons, and that, if it is necessary to establish the powers of authority of a structural subunit of the Seimas with respect to institutions, their officials, or other persons that are not accountable to the Seimas, such powers of the said structural subunit of the Seimas must be established by means of a law. In the same way, where the rights of a member of the Seimas comprise certain powers of a member of the Seimas with respect to institutions, their officials, or other persons that are not accountable to the Seimas, then, under the Constitution, such powers should be established by means of a law. However, insofar as the rights of a member of the Seimas are linked only with his/her activity at the Seimas, i.e. with the structure and procedure of activities of the Seimas itself, such rights may be established in the Statute of the Seimas.

The duties of the members of the Seimas

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 1 July 2004

In order that a member of the Seimas would be able to continuously perform his/her duties, as a representative of the Nation, the Constitution itself establishes not only certain rights, but also the duties of a member of the Seimas. Some duties of a member of the Seimas are formulated in the Constitution expressis verbis. Other duties of a member of the Seimas are not expressis verbis formulated in the Constitution, but they are consolidated implicitly – they are derived from the constitutional legal status of a member of the Seimas as a representative of the Nation. Still, some other duties of a member of the Seimas are consolidated not in the Constitution, but in lower-ranking legal acts: laws and the Statute of the Seimas.

The Constitution expressis verbis consolidates only some duties of a member of the Seimas. For instance, a member of the Seimas must follow the taken oath of a member of the Seimas, which obligates him/her to be faithful to the Republic of Lithuania, to respect and uphold its Constitution and laws and to protect the integrity of its lands, to strengthen, to the best of his/her ability, the independence of Lithuania, and to conscientiously serve the Homeland, democracy, and the welfare of the people of Lithuania (Paragraph 2 of Article 59 of the Constitution, Article 5 of the Republic of Lithuania's Law on the Procedure for the Entry into Force of the Constitution of the Republic of Lithuania). Paragraph 4 of Article 59 of the Constitution provides for the duty of a member of the Seimas, while in office, to follow the Constitution of the Republic of Lithuania, the interests of the state, as well as his/her own conscience, and not to be restricted by any mandates.

Other constitutional duties of a member of the Seimas are formulated in the Constitution as certain limitations applied to a member of the Seimas – the incompatibility of the duties of a member of the Seimas with other duties or another occupation, except the cases established in the Constitution, and the prohibition precluding a member of the Seimas from receiving other remuneration, save the exceptions established in the Constitution (Article 60 of the Constitution); these limitations for the members of the Seimas are established in the Constitution in order to ensure the free mandate of a member of the Seimas as a representative of the Nation, the continuity of his/her work at the Seimas, as well as that of other parliamentary activity in which he/she is engaged.

Those members of the Seimas who hold at the Seimas such office that is directly specified in the Constitution, i.e. that of the Speaker or the Deputy Speaker of the Seimas, in addition to their duties of a member of the Seimas as representatives of the Nation, also have other duties and respective rights expressis verbis specified in the Constitution. For instance, the Speaker of the Seimas has the duty (as well as the right) to sign an adopted law on an alteration of the Constitution if the President of the Republic does not sign it during the specified time (Paragraph 2 of Article 149 of the Constitution), to sign laws adopted by the Seimas if they are not signed or referred back by the President of the Republic to the Seimas for reconsideration within the period indicated in the Constitution (Paragraphs 2 and 4 of Article 72 of the Constitution), to sign other acts adopted by the Seimas and the Statute of the Seimas (Paragraph 2 of Article 70 of the Constitution), to temporarily hold the office of the President of the Republic in cases under the Constitution (Paragraph 1 of Article 89 of the Constitution), or to temporarily substitute for the President of the Republic (Paragraph 2 of Article 89 of the Constitution), to be a member of the State Defence Council (Paragraph 1 of Article 140 of the Constitution), to convene extraordinary sessions of the Seimas on the proposal of not less than one-third of all the members of the Seimas (Paragraph 2 of Article 64 of the Constitution), to submit three candidates for justices of the Constitutional Court (Paragraph 1 of Article 103 of the Constitution). The Speaker of the Seimas and the Deputy Speaker of the Seimas also has the duty (as well as the right) to preside over sittings of the Seimas (Paragraph 1 of Article 66 of the Constitution).

It should be noted that certain constitutional duties of a member of the Seimas are not expressis verbis formulated in the Constitution; however, they are inseparably linked with the activities of a member of the Seimas at the Seimas and with other parliamentary activity. For example, the constitutional mission of the Seimas as the representation of the Nation, as well as the constitutional legal status of a member of the Seimas as a representative of the Nation, implies the constitutional obligation of a member of the Seimas to represent the Nation; thus, it also implies the duty of a member of the Seimas to participate in sittings of the Seimas and in the activity of those Seimas structural subunits of which he/she is a member.

According to Paragraph 4 of Article 60 of the Constitution, the duties of a member of the Seimas are established by law. Thus, the Constitution provides for two levels of the legal regulation of the duties of a member of the Seimas: the duties established in the Constitution itself and the duties established in laws by the legislature. The aforementioned provision of Paragraph 4 of Article 60 of the Constitution implies the duty of the Seimas to lay down, in laws, such duties of a member of the Seimas in order to ensure that the members of the Seimas, as the representatives of the Nation, will perform their constitutional obligation in a fully fledged manner. When establishing the aforementioned provisions, the legislature is bound by the Constitution.

... under Article 76 of the Constitution, the structure and procedure of activities of the Seimas are established by the Statute of the Seimas. The legal regulation of the structure and procedure of activities of the Seimas is also related to the establishment of the duties of a member of the Seimas. Under the Constitution, the duties of a member of the Seimas that are not linked with the work of a member of the Seimas at the Seimas, i.e. those not linked with the structure and procedure of activities of the Seimas, must be established by means of a law. However, insofar as the duties of a member of the Seimas are linked only with his/her activity at the Seimas, i.e. with the structure and procedure of activities of the Seimas itself, such duties may be established in the Statute of the Seimas.

The guarantees of the parliamentary activities of a member of the Seimas

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 1 July 2004

One of the elements of the constitutional legal status of a member of the Seimas is the guarantees of both the work of a member of the Seimas at the Seimas and other parliamentary activity. When evaluating the entirety of the guarantees of both the work of a member of the Seimas at the Seimas and other parliamentary activity, as consolidated in the Constitution, it should be held that, in this regard, the constitutional legal status of a member of the Seimas, a representative of the Nation, is different in essence from the constitutional legal status of other citizens and other state officials.

The system of the guarantees of both the work of a member of the Seimas at the Seimas and other parliamentary activity comprises, inter alia, the immunities of a member of the Seimas. Article 62 of the Constitution provides that the person of a member of the Seimas is inviolable (Paragraph 1); a member of the Seimas may not be held criminally liable or be detained, or have his/her liberty restricted otherwise, without the consent of the Seimas (Paragraph 2).

Paragraph 3 of Article 60 of the Constitution provides that the members of the Seimas may not be persecuted for their votes or speeches at the Seimas: they may be held liable according to the general procedure only for personal insult or defamation.

The Constitution also provides for a special procedure of revoking the mandate of a member of the Seimas: under Article 74 of the Constitution, the Seimas may, by a 3/5 majority vote of all the members of the Seimas, revoke the mandate of a member of the Seimas who has grossly violated the Constitution, breached the oath, or committed a crime.

Paragraph 1 of Article 60 of the Constitution provides, inter alia, that, during their term of office, the members of the Seimas are exempt from the duty to perform national defence service.

According to Paragraph 3 of Article 60 of the Constitution, the work of a member of the Seimas is remunerated from the state budget. In its ruling of 9 November 1999, when interpreting this constitutional provision, the Constitutional Court held that the remuneration of a member of the Seimas must be of a sufficient amount and it must be paid regularly; the same constitutional provisions imply that, during the term of office of the Seimas, it is not allowed to establish, by means of a law, the remuneration of a member of the Seimas that is smaller from the one existing at the beginning of the term of office of the Seimas. Such a constitutional regulation of the remuneration of a member of the Seimas is established in order that the members of the Seimas would properly perform their obligations as representatives of the Nation.

The Constitution also consolidates such a guarantee of parliamentary activities of the members of the Seimas that ensures that expenses relating to their parliamentary activities are remunerated from the state budget (Paragraph 3 of Article 60 of the Constitution).

According to Paragraph 4 of Article 60 of the Constitution, the guarantees of the activities of a member of the Seimas are established by law. Thus, the Constitution provides for two levels of the legal regulation of the system of the guarantees of both the work of a member of the Seimas at the Seimas and other parliamentary activities: the guarantees established in the Constitution itself and the guarantees established in laws by the legislature. It should be noted that the aforementioned provision of Paragraph 4 of Article 60 of the Constitution implies the duty of the Seimas to lay down, in laws, the system of the guarantees of both the work of a member of the Seimas at the Seimas and other parliamentary activities in order to ensure the possibility of the members of the Seimas, as the representatives of the Nation, for performing their constitutional obligation in a fully fledged manner. In establishing this, the legislature must pay regard to the norms and principles of the Constitution; the legislature, inter alia, may not establish any such guarantees that would unreasonably grant privileges to members of the Seimas, since the requirement of, inter alia, Paragraph 2 of Article 29 of the Constitution, whereby no one may be granted any privileges on the grounds of social status, would be ignored.

... under Article 76 of the Constitution, the structure and procedure of activities of the Seimas are established by the Statute of the Seimas. The legal regulation of the structure and procedure of activities of the Seimas is also linked with the establishment of the guarantees of both the work of a member of the Seimas at the Seimas and other parliamentary activities. If the guarantees of the parliamentary activity of a member of the Seimas are related to the duties, arising therefrom, towards the institutions, their officials, and other persons that are not accountable to the Seimas, such guarantees, according to the Constitution, must be established by means of a law. However, insofar as the guarantees of both the work of a member of the Seimas at the Seimas and other parliamentary activities are linked only with his/her activity at the Seimas, i.e. with the structure and procedure of activities of the Seimas itself, such guarantees may be established in the Statute of the Seimas.

... Paragraph 1 of Article 49 of the Constitution, which provides that every working person has the right to rest and leisure as well as to annual paid leave, and Paragraph 4 of Article 60 of the Constitution, which provides that the duties, rights and guarantees of the activities of a member of the Seimas are established by law, give rise to the duty of the legislature to establish, by means of a law, the duration and other conditions of the annual paid leave of the members of the Seimas. It should also be noted that the establishment of the leave of a member of the Seimas by means of a law would also ensure that no preconditions are created for the constitutionally unfounded treatment of the period between the sessions of the Seimas as a period equivalent to the leave of the members of the Seimas or any other type of their rest.

The social guarantees of the persons who are former members of the Seimas are also an element of the constitutional legal status of a member of the Seimas, the essence of which is disclosed by the free mandate of a member of the Seimas as a representative of the Nation. The constitutional norms and principles must also be followed when establishing such guarantees by means of a law.

The limitations applicable to a member of the Seimas (Paragraphs 1, 2, and 3 of Article 60 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 1 July 2004

It has been held in this ruling of the Constitutional Court that certain constitutional duties of a member of the Seimas are formulated in the Constitution as certain limitations applied to a member of the Seimas – the incompatibility of the duties of a member of the Seimas with other duties or another occupation, except the cases established in the Constitution, and the prohibition precluding a member of the Seimas from receiving other remuneration, save the exceptions established in the Constitution; such limitations are meant to ensure the free mandate of a member of the Seimas as a representative of the Nation, the continuity of his/her work at the Seimas and his/her other parliamentary activities. When evaluating the entirety of the limitations consolidated in the Constitution and applicable to a member of the Seimas, it should be held that, in this respect, the constitutional legal status of a member of the Seimas as a representative of the Nation is different in essence from the constitutional legal status of other citizens and determines the particularities of the implementation by a member of the Seimas of certain rights of a person, which are consolidated in the Constitution, since a member of the Seimas has such rights as an individual and a citizen.

... under Article 60 of the Constitution, the duties of the members of the Seimas, with the exception of their duties at the Seimas, are incompatible with any other duties at state institutions or organisations, or with work in business, commercial, or other private establishments or enterprises (Paragraph 1); a member of the Seimas may be appointed only either as the Prime Minister or a minister (Paragraph 2); a member of the Seimas may not receive any other remuneration, with the exception of remuneration for creative activities (Paragraph 3).

... the Constitution is an integral act ... all its provisions are interrelated and constitute a harmonious system ... no provision of the Constitution may be interpreted only literally ... no provision of the Constitution may be interpreted in such a way that the content of another constitutional provision would be distorted or denied, since thereby the essence of the whole constitutional regulation would be distorted and the balance of the values consolidated in the Constitution would be disturbed. Therefore, the provision of Paragraph 1 of Article 60 of the Constitution, whereby the duties of the members of the Seimas are incompatible with any other duties at state institutions or organisations, or with work in business, commercial, or other private establishments or enterprises, should be interpreted when taking account of the provision of this paragraph that a member of the Seimas may hold office at the Seimas, the provision of Paragraph 2 of this article that a member of the Seimas may be appointed only either as the Prime Minister or a minister, and the overall integral constitutional legal regulation, thus, when taking account of all constitutional provisions consolidating the constitutional status of a member of the Seimas (rights and duties of a member of the Seimas, the guarantees of his/her work at the Seimas and his/her other parliamentary activities, limitations applicable to a member of the Seimas, etc.), the constitutional provisions consolidating the rights of a person, as well as the purposes of the constitutional regulation, which comprise, inter alia, the purposes on which the functions of the legal regulation established in Paragraph 1 of Article 60 of the Constitution are based, the mission of this regulation with regard to the overall integral constitutional legal regulation, the provision of Paragraph 1 of Article 60 of the Constitution, according to which a member of the Seimas may hold office at the Seimas, the provision of Paragraph 2 of this article, whereby a member of the Seimas may be appointed only either as the Prime Minister or a minister, and also the overall integral constitutional legal regulation in general; account should also be taken of the purposes of the constitutional regulation when interpreting the provision of Paragraph 3 of Article 60 of the Constitution, according to which a member of the Seimas may not receive any other remuneration, with the exception of remuneration for creative activities.

The purpose of the legal regulation established in Paragraph 1 of Article 60 of the Constitution is to ensure the free mandate of a member of the Seimas as a representative of the Nation, the continuity of his/her work at the Seimas and his/her other parliamentary activities, to guarantee that a member of the Seimas acts in the interests of the Nation and the State of Lithuania, but not in his/her personal or group interests, or in the interests of the political parties or political organisation, the public or other organisations, other persons, or the territorial communities that nominated or supported the said person as a candidate for the office of a member of the Seimas, or in the interests of the voters of the constituency in which the said member of the Seimas was elected, that a member of the Seimas will not use his/her status and a free mandate for his/her private benefit, or for the benefit of his/her close relatives or other persons, that each member of the Seimas will have the opportunity to perform his/her constitutional duty to continuously participate at the work of the Seimas, the representation of the Nation, to continuously exercise as a representative of the Nation his/her constitutional powers. This purpose would never be reached or the preconditions precluding the accomplishment of this purpose would be created if a member of the Seimas also had the possibility of holding other duties or another occupation, with the exception of the office expressis verbis specified in the Constitution or the duties allowed under the Constitution; this purpose would never be reached or the preconditions precluding the accomplishment of this purpose would also be created if a member of the Seimas received remuneration other than that specified in the Constitution.

The Constitution provides for the legal regulation, according to which the incompatibility of the duties of a member of the Seimas with any other duties or work (save the exceptions provided for in the Constitution), where the said incompatibility includes the incompatibility of the duties of a member of the Seimas with engaging in business, commerce, or other profit-making private activity, and the prohibition precluding a member of the Seimas from receiving any other remuneration (save the exceptions provided for in the Constitution) are applied in respect of a member of the Seimas from the moment when he/she acquires all rights of a representative of the Nation, i.e. when he/she takes an oath. The Constitution does not provide that, after taking an oath, a member of the Seimas may, for a certain period of time, hold another office, perform other work (save the exceptions provided for in the Constitution), engage in business, commerce, or other profit-making private activity, and receive other remuneration (save the exceptions provided for in the Constitution). A different interpretation of the Constitution, whereby, purportedly, a member of the Seimas, having taken an oath, for a certain period of time, may still hold another office or perform other work that is incompatible with the duties of a member of the Seimas (save the exceptions provided for in the Constitution), engage in business, commerce, or other profit-making private activity, would be unfounded, as the prohibitions established in the Constitution applicable to a member of the Seimas and specified in this ruling of the Constitutional Court would be disregarded; this would be in violation of the Constitution.

The incompatibility of the duties of a member of the Seimas with other duties or work (save the exceptions provided for in the Constitution), as well as the prohibition precluding a member of the Seimas from receiving other remuneration (save the exceptions provided for in the Constitution), as established in the Constitution, gives rise to the duty of the legislature to establish, by means of a law, such a legal regulation that would make it possible to verify whether the limitations imposed in Article 60 of the Constitution on a member of the Seimas are followed. Such control must be effective, public, and continuous instead of a one-off type.

According to Item 7 of Article 63 of the Constitution, the powers of a member of the Seimas cease when he/she does not give up employment that is incompatible with the duties of a member of the Seimas.

The incompatibility of the duties of a member of the Seimas with other duties or work (Paragraphs 1 and 2 of Article 60 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 1 July 2004

One of the limitations imposed on a member of the Seimas by Article 60 of the Constitution is the incompatibility of the duties of a member of the Seimas with other duties and work, save the exceptions expressis verbis established or implicitly envisaged in the Constitution.

The expression "The duties of the Members of the Seimas, with the exception of their duties at the Seimas" is used in Paragraph 1 of Article 60 of the Constitution. Under the Constitution, a member of the Seimas may also hold other duties in the Seimas.

The Constitution directly specifies the office at the Seimas that a member of the Seimas is allowed to hold: such office is the office of the Speaker of the Seimas or that of the Deputy Speaker.

... under Article 76 of the Constitution, the structure and procedure of activities of the Seimas are established by the Statute of the Seimas. Thus, the Statute of the Seimas may establish at the Seimas other duties that may be taken by certain members of the Seimas – the duties in the governing body of the Seimas, the duties of the heads of structural subunits of the Seimas, or other duties at the Seimas that may be held only by a member of the Seimas; the Statute of the Seimas may also provide for the possibility for a member of the Seimas to take certain duties in interparliamentary and other international institutions, which may only be taken by a member of the Seimas – the expression “their duties in the Seimas” of Article 60 of the Constitution also comprises these types of duties.

Thus, the expression “their duties in the Seimas” of Article 60 of the Constitution comprises: (1) the duties of the Speaker of the Seimas and those of the Deputy Speaker of the Seimas; (2) such duties of a member of the Seimas at the Seimas that are taken by a member of the Seimas pursuant to the Statute of the Seimas in the governing body of the Seimas or when heading a structural subunit of the Seimas, as well as other duties that may be taken at the Seimas only by a member of the Seimas; (3) such duties of a member of the Seimas in interparliamentary and other international institutions that may be taken only by a member of the Seimas.

Under the Constitution, the member of the Seimas who is the Speaker of the Seimas is ex officio a member of the State Defence Council (Article 140 of the Constitution); in the event that the President of the Republic dies, resigns, or is removed from office according to the procedure for impeachment proceedings, or the Seimas decides that the state of health of the President of the Republic does not allow him/her to hold office, the office of the President of the Republic is temporarily held by the Speaker of the Seimas (Paragraph 1 of Article 89 of the Constitution); the Speaker of the Seimas substitutes for the President of the Republic when the President of the Republic is temporarily abroad or falls ill and, for this reason, is temporarily unable to hold office (Paragraph 2 of Article 89 of the Constitution).

... according to Paragraph 2 of Article 60 of the Constitution, a member of the Seimas may be appointed only either as the Prime Minister or a minister. Thus, according to the Constitution, a member of the Seimas may simultaneously hold the office of the Prime Minister or a minister.

In its rulings, the Constitutional Court has held on more than one occasion that the Constitution consolidates the principle of the separation of powers. The constitutional principle of the separation of powers means, inter alia, that persons performing their functions in implementing the power of a certain branch of state power may not at the same time perform the functions implementing another branch of state power, i.e. persons performing the functions implementing legislative power, or executive power, or judicial power may not simultaneously perform the functions implementing both executive power and judicial power, or both legislative power and judicial power, or both legislative power and executive power, save the exceptions provided for in the Constitution. It needs to be noted that the provision of Paragraph 2 of Article 60 of the Constitution, whereby a member of the Seimas may be appointed only either as the Prime Minister or a minister, is an exception established in the Constitution where the same person may simultaneously perform the functions of both the legislative branch (as a member of the Seimas) and the executive branch (as a member of the Government – the Prime Minister or a minister).

It should be noted that the incompatibility of the duties of a member of the Seimas with other duties or work is also expressis verbis consolidated from various aspects in other articles of the Constitution. For instance, under the Constitution, the duties of a member of the Seimas are incompatible with the office of the President of the Republic (Paragraph 1 of Article 83 of the Constitution), with actual military service or alternative service, as well as with the duties of an officer, a non-commissioned officer or re-enlistee in the national defence system, the police and the interior, or with the duties of another paid official of paramilitary and security services (Article 141 of the Constitution), with the office of a judge, as well as a justice of the Constitutional Court (Paragraph 1 of Article 113 and Paragraph 3 of Article 104 of the Constitution), and with the office of a member of a municipal council (rulings of 24 December 2002, 30 May 2003).

To sum up, it should be held that the principle of the incompatibility of the duties of a member of the Seimas with other duties or work means that the duties of a member of the Seimas are incompatible with any other activity (taking a position, performing work, holding a position, fulfilling other functions, performing other tasks, holding the so-called honorary position) in a state establishment, enterprise, organisation of Lithuania, or in a municipal establishment, enterprise, organisation, or in an international establishment, enterprise, organisation, or in a private establishment, enterprise, organisation, or representing such an establishment, enterprise, organisation, with the exception of the duties expressis verbis or implicitly laid down in the Constitution: (1) the duties of a member of the Seimas that are specified in Paragraph 1 of Article 60 of the Constitution and comprise the office of the Speaker of the Seimas and the Deputy Speaker of the Seimas, such duties of a member of the Seimas in the Seimas that are taken by a member of the Seimas pursuant to the Statute of the Seimas in the governing body of the Seimas or when heading a structural subunit of the Seimas, other duties that may be taken in the Seimas only by a member of the Seimas, or the duties of a member of the Seimas in interparliamentary and other international institutions in cases where such duties may be taken only by a member of the Seimas; (2) the office of the Prime Minister or a minister, as specified in Paragraph 2 of Article 60 of the Constitution; (3) the duties in the associations that are specified in the Constitution where such duties are linked with his/her membership in the respective association.

The constitutional concept of the duties and work that are incompatible with the duties of a member of the Seimas (Paragraph 1 of Article 60 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 1 July 2004

... the notions “duties” and “work” used in Paragraph 1 of Article 60 of the Constitution are constitutional notions, they have the constitutional content and may not be interpreted only on the basis of the definition of similar concepts in laws and other legal acts (for example, in legal acts regulating employment or public service relations). In this regard, the duties and work specified in Paragraph 1 of Article 60 of the Constitution may not be linked with employment or similar contracts or agreements.

The notion “duties” used in the phrase “duties at state institutions or organisations” in Paragraph 1 of Article 60 of the Constitution and the notion “work” used in the phrase “work in business, commercial, or other private establishments or enterprises” in this paragraph should be interpreted by taking into consideration the purpose of the constitutional legal regulation established in this article, as well as all other constitutional provisions consolidating the constitutional status of a member of the Seimas. It should be noted that carrying out “duties” implies that the person who carries out the duties of certain office must perform certain work, fulfil certain other functions, perform certain other tasks, etc.; performing “work” implies that a person must take certain office, fulfil certain other functions, perform certain other tasks, etc. The notion “duties” used in the phrase “duties at state institutions or organisations” in Paragraph 1 of Article 60 of the Constitution and the notion “work” used in the phrase “work in business, commercial, or other private establishments or enterprises” in this paragraph mean activity; therefore, in the context of the overall constitutional integral regulation, these notions may not be confronted and they may not be interpreted literally, by ignoring their correlations.

The notion “duties” used in the phrase “duties at state institutions or organisations” in Paragraph 1 of Article 60 of the Constitution comprises any activity in a state or municipal establishment, enterprise, or organisation of Lithuania, in a foreign or international establishment, enterprise, or organisation, or when representing such an establishment, enterprise, or organisation, if this activity is linked with taking a position, performing work, holding a position, fulfilling other functions, performing other tasks, holding the so-called honorary position, etc. (including participation in collegial management, control, and other bodies), irrespective of whether this activity is permanent, temporary, or one-off (episodic), whether this activity is remunerated in any payment or other form, whether this activity is referred to in legal acts as duties or otherwise, whether this activity is carried out in a leading position, whether a person is elected or appointed in order to carry out such activity, whether this activity is formalised on the basis of a legal contract or another legal act, or is performed without any legal contract or legal act, save the exceptions that are established expressis verbis or implicitly provided for in the Constitution and are specified in this ruling of the Constitutional Court. The notion “work” used in the phrase “work in business, commercial, or other private establishments or enterprises” in Paragraph 1 of Article 60 of the Constitution in its turn comprises any activity in a Lithuanian private establishment, enterprise, or organisation or in a foreign or international private establishment, enterprise, or organisation, or when representing such an establishment, enterprise, or organisation, if this activity is linked with performing work, taking a position, holding a position, fulfilling other functions, performing other tasks, holding the so-called honorary position, etc.

(including participation in collegial management, control, and other bodies), irrespective of whether this activity is permanent, temporary, one-off (episodic), whether this activity is remunerated in any payment or other form, whether this activity is referred to in legal acts as work or otherwise, whether there are any other persons engaged in any activity in this establishment, enterprise, or organisation, whether this activity is carried out in a leading position, whether a person is elected or appointed in order to carry out such activity, whether this activity is formalised on the basis of a legal contract or another legal act, or is performed without any legal contract or legal act; the notion “work” used in the phrase “work in business, commercial, or other private establishments or enterprises” of Paragraph 1 of Article 60 of the Constitution also comprises any other private profit-making activity, as well as any profit-making activity engaged in without establishing an enterprise, establishment, or organisation.

The prohibition precluding a member of the Seimas from engaging in business, commerce, or other profit-making activity (Articles 23, 46, and 48 and Paragraph 1 of Article 60 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court’s ruling of 1 July 2004

... the constitutional legal status of a member of the Seimas as a representative of the Nation is different in essence from the constitutional legal status of other citizens and determines the particularities of the implementation by a member of the Seimas of certain rights of a person, which are consolidated in the Constitution, since a member of the Seimas has such rights as an individual and a citizen.

The legal regulation laid down in Paragraph 1 of Article 60 of the Constitution should be interpreted in view of the provisions of Articles 46 and 48 of the Constitution.

Paragraph 1 of Article 46 of the Constitution stipulates that the economy of Lithuania is based on the right of private ownership, freedom of individual economic activity, and economic initiative. Paragraph 1 of Article 48 of the Constitution, inter alia, prescribes that everyone may freely choose an occupation or business.

The constitutional legal status of a member of the Seimas as a representative of the Nation, comprising, inter alia, the limitations established in Paragraph 1 of Article 60 of the Constitution, determines the particularities of the implementation of everyone’s rights consolidated in Article 46 and 48 of the Constitution where such rights are exercised by a member of the Seimas as by any other person in the same manner. It needs to be noted that the provisions of Paragraph 1 of Article 60 of the Constitution, in view of the purpose of the legal regulation established in this paragraph, mean also that such a member of the Seimas who is a founder, owner, co-owner, or shareholder of a private enterprise, establishment, or organisation may not take a position, perform work, hold a position, fulfil other functions, perform other tasks, hold the so-called honorary position, etc. (including participation in collegial management, control, and other bodies) in the said establishment, enterprise, or organisation, or represent it. This is incompatible with the constitutional legal status of a member of the Seimas: having acquired all rights of the representative of the Nation, the member of the Seimas decides that he/she will be a representative of the Nation and will not be engaged in business, commerce, or other profit-making private activity.

... under the Constitution, a member of the Seimas, as a representative of the Nation, must properly fulfil his/her constitutional obligation to represent the entire Nation, must act only in the interests of the Nation and the State of Lithuania ... the activity of a member of the Seimas, a representative of the Nation, is continuous. A member of the Seimas must use his/her mandate of a representative of the Nation only in the interests of the Nation and the State of Lithuania but not for his/her private benefit, or for the benefit of his/her close relatives or other persons. The incompatibility of the duties of a member of the Seimas (such incompatibility is consolidated in Paragraph 1 of Article 60 of the Constitution) with work in business, commercial, or other private establishments or enterprises, as well as with work in establishments or enterprises a founder, owner, co-owner, or shareholder of which a member of the Seimas is, gives rise to the prohibition on engaging, in any form, in business, commerce, or other profit-making private activity. When deciding whether a certain activity of a member of the Seimas is engagement in business, commerce, etc., in each case account should be taken of the content of the activity and all other circumstances.

The legal regulation laid down in Paragraph 1 of Article 60 of the Constitution should also be interpreted with regard to the provisions of Article 23 of the Constitution.

The legal regulation established in Paragraph 1 of Article 60 of the Constitution may not be interpreted as denying the essence of the right of ownership that is consolidated in Article 23 of the Constitution. Members of the Seimas also have this right. Thus, the provisions of Paragraph 1 of Article 60 of the Constitution that consolidate the incompatibility of the duties of a member of the Seimas with, inter alia, engaging in business, commerce, or other profit-making private activity may not be interpreted as meaning the prohibition precluding a member of the Seimas from using his/her property, receiving income from such property, possessing property owned by him/her, etc., as well as concluding related contracts. However, under the Constitution, such activity of a member of the Seimas where he/she uses his/her property, receives income from such property, possesses property owned by him/her, etc., as well as concludes related contracts, may not take the form of business, commerce, or other profit-making private activity, as this would violate the prohibition consolidated in Paragraph 1 of Article 60 of the Constitution precluding a member of the Seimas from engaging, in any form, in business, commerce, or other profit-making private activity.

It should be noted that the activity of a member of the Seimas where he/she uses his/her property, receives income from such property, possesses property owned by him/her, etc., as well as concludes the related contracts, may have certain specific features in each area. The legislature, while paying regard to the Constitution, has the duty to establish, by means of a law, such a regulation that would make it possible to decide in each case what activity of a member of the Seimas constitutes only the use of his/her property, receiving income from such property, possessing property owned by him/her, and concluding related contracts, i.e. the activity that is allowed for a member of the Seimas under the Constitution, and what activity constitutes business, commerce, or other profit-making private activity, i.e. the activity that is not allowed for a member of the Seimas under the Constitution.

It should be noted that, in order to ensure that the prohibition (established in Paragraph 1 of Article 60 of the Constitution) precluding a member of the Seimas from engaging in business, commerce, or other profit-making private activity, the Constitution gives rise to the duty of the legislature to establish a legal regulation that would make it possible to verify in each case whether using the property of a member of the Seimas, receiving income from such property, possessing property owned by him/her, and concluding related contracts constitutes business, commerce, or other profit-making private activity. Such control must be effective, public, and continuous instead of a one-off type.

When laying down, by means of a law, the specified constitutionally necessary legal regulation, the legislature must also establish the ways of providing for the legal conditions for preventing the emergence of incompatibility of the duties of a member of the Seimas with engaging in business, commerce, or other profit-making private activity. Such a legal regulation would also create the preconditions for avoiding the use of the mandate of a member of the Seimas for the private benefit of certain persons, i.e. to serve particular interests, rather than in the interests of the Nation and the State of Lithuania, and for avoiding a conflict between the private interests of a member of the Seimas and the interests of the Nation and the State of Lithuania, i.e. public interests; this would strengthen the trust of the Nation in members of the Seimas as representatives of the Nation and in the Seimas as the representation of the Nation. Such control is an important condition of implementing the provision of Item 7 of Article 63 of the Constitution, under which the powers of a member of the Seimas cease when he/she takes up or does not give up employment that is incompatible with the duties of a member of the Seimas.

Attention should be drawn to the fact that various methods of ensuring the incompatibility of the duties of a member of the parliament and engagement in business, as well as control over such incompatibility, is established in foreign democratic states under the rule of law as, for instance, the property of a member of the parliament is held in trust or such property must be transferred to other persons, such property is possessed anonymously, control is exercised over agreements concluded between the enterprises a founder, owner, co-owner, or a shareholder of which a member of the parliament is on the one hand, and the establishments, enterprises, and organisations of the public sector on the other hand, etc.

The right of a member of the Seimas to be a member of and take a position in an association (Article 35 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 1 July 2004

The principle of the incompatibility of the duties of a member of the Seimas with other duties and work, as established in the Constitution, as well as the prohibition precluding a member of the Seimas from receiving any other remuneration save the exceptions provided for in the Constitution, should be interpreted in the context of the constitutional rights and freedoms of persons, inter alia, the right of citizens to freely form societies, political parties, and associations (Article 35 of the Constitution), and the right of employees to establish trade unions (Article 50 of the Constitution).

... under the Constitution, the legislature may not establish any such a legal regulation that would limit the right of a member of the Seimas to be a member of an association specified in the Constitution and to take a position in such an association, as, in respect of the said person, this would violate the constitutional value – the right to associate or freedom of association.

The prohibition precluding a member of the Seimas from receiving other remuneration (Paragraph 3 of Article 60 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 1 July 2004

Another limitation imposed on a member of the Seimas by Article 60 of the Constitution is the prohibition precluding a member of the Seimas from receiving other remuneration, save the exceptions expressis verbis established or implicitly provided for in the Constitution

It needs to be stressed that the notion “remuneration” used in Paragraph 3 of Article 60 of the Constitution is a constitutional notion: it bears the constitutional content and may not be interpreted only following the definition of analogous notions in laws and other legal acts (for example, legal acts regulating employment or public service relations). In this regard, the remuneration specified in Paragraph 3 of Article 60 of the Constitution may not be linked only with remuneration paid under employment or similar contracts or agreements; the content of the notion “remuneration” used in Paragraph 3 of Article 60 of the Constitution is much broader: this notion comprises monetary payments of various types and the provision of other material benefit to a member of the Seimas.

... the Constitution treats a member of the Seimas as a professional politician, i.e. as such a representative of the Nation whose work at the Seimas is his/her professional activity. ... under Paragraph 3 of Article 60 of the Constitution, the work of the members of the Seimas, as well as all expenses relating to their parliamentary activities, is remunerated from the state budget.

Under Paragraph 3 of Article 60 of the Constitution, a member of the Seimas has the right to receive the remuneration of a member of the Seimas. ... in order that a member of the Seimas would be able to properly fulfil his/her duty as the one of a representative of the Nation, the remuneration of a member of the Seimas must be of a sufficient amount and it must be paid regularly; during the term of office of the Seimas, it is not allowed to establish, by means of a law, the remuneration of a member of the Seimas that is smaller from the one existing at the beginning of the term of office of the Seimas.

... under Paragraph 3 of Article 60 of the Constitution, expenses relating to the parliamentary activities of a member of the Seimas are remunerated from the state budget. In this context, it needs to be noted that such funds may be used only for the purpose specified in the Constitution, i.e. the parliamentary activity of a member of the Seimas. The legislature must establish the legal regulation that should make it possible to verify each time whether these funds are used for their intended purpose.

... a member of the Seimas may also take other duties in the Seimas, including the office of the Speaker of the Seimas and the Deputy Speaker of the Seimas, such duties of a member of the Seimas in the Seimas that are taken by a member of the Seimas pursuant to the Statute of the Seimas in the governing body of the Seimas or when heading a structural subunit of the Seimas, as well as such duties of a member of the Seimas in interparliamentary and other international institutions in cases where such duties may be taken only by a member of the Seimas.

It should be held that the constitutional right of a member of the Seimas to take such duties in the Seimas implies the right to receive additional remuneration established by law for taking such duties.

... according to the Constitution, a member of the Seimas may simultaneously hold the office of the Prime Minister or a minister. In its ruling of 9 November 1999, the Constitutional Court held that the constitutional right of a member of the Seimas to hold the office of the Prime Minister or that of a minister implies the right to receive remuneration for holding such office; this is confirmed by Article 99 of the Constitution, whereby the Prime Minister and ministers receive remuneration established for their respective governmental duties. It was also held in the Constitutional Court's ruling of 9 November 1999 that for such a member of the Seimas who is appointed either as the Prime Minister or a minister different remuneration from that of other members of the Seimas may be established for his/her activities as a member of the Seimas. However, under the Constitution, the Seimas, while having the discretion to establish, by means of a law, different remuneration for such a member of the Seimas who is appointed either as the Prime Minister or a minister from that of other members of the Seimas is bound by the constitutional requirement that in this case the amount of the remuneration of such a member of the Seimas must also be sufficient in order that the said member of the Seimas would be able to properly perform his/her duty as the one of a representative of the Nation.

... a member of the Seimas may take a position in associations specified in the Constitution where such a position is linked with his/her membership in the respective association. It should be noted that the constitutional prohibition precluding a member of the Seimas from receiving other remuneration, save the exceptions provided for in the Constitution itself, means that, under the Constitution, a member of the Seimas may not receive any remuneration for holding a position or other activity in societies, political parties or associations, or other unions.

As mentioned before, the content of the notion "remuneration" used in Paragraph 3 of Article 60 of the Constitution is broad: it comprises monetary payments of various types or the provision of other material benefit to a member of the Seimas. Therefore, under the Constitution, such a member of the Seimas who takes a certain position in an association has no right to receive from such an association remuneration for holding such a position or any other monetary payment, as well as any other material benefit.

In conclusion, it should be held that the constitutional prohibition precluding a member of the Seimas from receiving any remuneration other than that of a member of the Seimas means that a member of the Seimas may not receive any other remuneration, with the exception of the remuneration expressis verbis specified or implicitly provided for in the Constitution: (1) remuneration for the duties of a member of the Seimas that are specified in Paragraph 1 of Article 60 of the Constitution and comprise the office of the Speaker of the Seimas and the Deputy Speaker of the Seimas, such duties of a member of the Seimas in the Seimas that are taken by a member of the Seimas pursuant to the Statute of the Seimas in the governing body of the Seimas or when heading a structural subunit of the Seimas, other duties that may be taken in the Seimas only by a member of the Seimas, or the duties of a member of the Seimas in interparliamentary and other international institutions in cases where such duties may be taken only by a member of the Seimas; (2) remuneration for holding the office of the Prime Minister or a minister; (3) remuneration for creative activities where a member of the Seimas carries them out not in the capacity of a subject of employment, state service, or similar relationships.

The right of a member of the Seimas to receive remuneration for creative activities; the constitutional concept of creative activities (Paragraph 3 of Article 60 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 1 July 2004

... according to Article 60 of the Constitution, a member of the Seimas is not prohibited from receiving remuneration for creative activities.

When interpreting the constitutional notion of creative activities, it needs to be noted that Paragraph 1 of Article 42 of the Constitution provides that culture, science and research, and teaching are free; Paragraph 3 of this article provides that the law protects and defends the spiritual and material interests of an author that are related to scientific, technical, cultural, and artistic work. According to the Constitution, creative activities are activities in the area of science, technology, culture or art, aimed at creating a certain result, i.e. qualitatively new, original, and specific material or spiritual values of science, technology, culture, or art, which have never existed before. Creative activities may be continuous, professional, and one-off(episodic).

The notion of creative activities, which is consolidated in the Constitution, is integral and its content does not depend, inter alia, on persons who are engaged in them. In this regard, there is no difference between the creative activities of a member of the Seimas and the creative activities of any other individual.

... the constitutional legal status of a member of the Seimas, a representative of the Nation, determines the particularities of the implementation by a member of the Seimas of certain rights of a person, which are consolidated in the Constitution, since a member of the Seimas has such rights as an individual and a citizen.

It has ... been held in this ruling that, according to the Constitution, the duties of a member of the Seimas are incompatible with any other activity (taking a position, performing work, holding a position, fulfilling other functions, performing other tasks, holding the so-called honorary position) in a state establishment, enterprise, organisation of Lithuania, or in a municipal establishment, enterprise, organisation, or in an international establishment, enterprise, organisation, or in a private establishment, enterprise, organisation, or representing such an establishment, enterprise, organisation, with the exception of the duties of a member of the Seimas that are specified in Paragraph 1 of Article 60 of the Constitution, the office of the Prime Minister or a minister, as specified in Paragraph 2 of Article 60 of the Constitution, and a position in the societies, political parties or associations, other unions, where such a position is linked with his/her membership in the respective association.

When interpreting the provisions of Article 42 and Article 60 of the Constitution in a systemic manner, it should be held that the creative activities of a member of the Seimas are separated from employment, state service, or similar relationships and from holding a position in any establishment, enterprise, or organisation.

Thus, one of the specific features of freedom of the creative activities of a member of the Seimas is that a member of the Seimas exercises this freedom not in the capacity of a subject of employment, state service, or similar relationships.

Remuneration may be paid to an author for his/her creative activities. It is generally recognised that remuneration for creative activities is regulated by the norms of copyright law.

... the concept of creative activities is used not only in Paragraph 3 of Article 60, but also in other articles (parts thereof) of the Constitution. For instance, Paragraph 1 of Article 83 of the Constitution provides that the President of the Republic, inter alia, may not receive any remuneration other than the remuneration established for the President of the Republic and remuneration for creative activities; Article 99 of the Constitution provides that the Prime Minister and ministers, inter alia, may not receive any remuneration other than that established for their respective governmental duties and payment for creative activities; Paragraph 1 of Article 113 of the Constitution provides that judges, inter alia, may not receive any remuneration other than the remuneration established for judges and payment for educational or creative activities.

It is clear from the phrase “payment for educational or creative activities” in Paragraph 1 of Article 113 of the Constitution that the constitutional concepts of educational and creative activities are not identical and that each of them has its own independent content. These concepts may not be identified with one another, they are not synonyms, and none of them covers the other. Educational activities in the Constitution are separated from creative activities: educational activities are linked with education, teaching and training at educational and teaching establishments (including higher schools), whereas creative activities, as already mentioned before, are activities aimed at creating a piece of science, technology, culture, or art.

The continuity of the activities of a member of the Seimas

The Constitutional Court’s decision of 10 February 2005

It was held in [the Constitutional Court’s ruling of 1 July 2004] that the continuity of the activity of the Seimas implies the continuity of the activity of a member of the Seimas, as a representative of the Nation. Participation in the work of the Seimas is a constitutional duty and at the same time a right of a member of the Seimas; this means, inter alia, that it is not allowed to establish any such a legal regulation that, on the one hand, would allow a member of the Seimas not to participate in the work of the Seimas without duly justified exceptional reasons, and, on the other hand, would not allow or would worsen in other ways the possibilities for him/her to participate in the work of the Seimas. The constitutional duty of a member of the Seimas to participate in the work of the Seimas includes, inter alia, his/her duty to participate in the work of the structural subunits of the Seimas of which he/she is a member and to exercise other powers of a member of the Seimas, which are established in the Constitution, laws, and the Statute of the Seimas.

Undoubtedly, situations may occur where, due to especially important personal and other justified reasons, for a certain period of time, a member of the Seimas cannot participate in the sittings of the Seimas, the committees of the Seimas, or other structural subunits of which he/she is a member, and/or for a certain period of time he/she cannot perform other duties of a member of the Seimas. This implies the necessity to establish a procedure according to which, in the aforesaid cases, such a member of the Seimas should apply to the institution indicated in the law (in the Statute of the Seimas) for permission not to participate for the said period of time in the sittings of the Seimas, the committees of the Seimas, or other structural subunits of which he/she is a member, and not to perform for the said period of time other duties of a member of the Seimas; if the reasons specified by a member of the Seimas are especially important and justified, the aforementioned permission is granted; if such permission is not granted, the absence of a member of the Seimas from the sittings of the Seimas, the committees of the Seimas, other structural subunits of which he/she is a member, or failure to perform other duties of a member of the Seimas would be unjustified.

Situations may also arise where a member of the Seimas cannot notify the institution specified by means of a law (by the Statute of the Seimas) before a particular sitting begins that he/she will not attend that sitting. The legislature is also obliged to establish the procedure enabling the institution specified by means of a law (by the Statute of the Seimas) to decide whether the reasons of failure by the said members of the Seimas to attend a particular sitting were especially important and justified.

If a member of the Seimas has not participated in the sitting of the Seimas, of a committee, or of another structural subunit of the Seimas of which he/she is a member – regardless of whether or not he/she notified in advance about his/her absence following the established procedure, or whether or not he/she received permission from the respective institution indicated in the law (in the Statute of the Seimas) – the said time, according to the Constitution, is considered neither the time when the said member of the Seimas performed the work of a member of the Seimas indicated in Paragraph 3 of Article 60 of the Constitution, remunerable from the state budget, nor the time when the same member of the Seimas made use of the right established in Paragraph 1 of Article 49 of the Constitution to annual paid leave.

It should be noted that the exercise of the powers of a member of the Seimas is not limited to his/her participation in the sittings of the Seimas, its committees, or its other structural subunits. In this context it should be mentioned that the exercise of the powers of a member of the Seimas and, thus, the work of a member of the Seimas referred to in Paragraph 3 of Article 60 of the Constitution, also constitute the activity of a member of the Seimas when he/she carries out assignments and other tasks of the Seimas, its committees, or its other structural subunits, where, in the cases established by law, he/she represents groups of members of the Seimas, etc. The work of a member of the Seimas and his/her activity in the Seimas include performing the duties specified in Paragraph 1 Article 60 of the Constitution (office of the Speaker or the Deputy Speaker of the Seimas; such duties of a member of the Seimas at the Seimas that are taken by a member of the Seimas pursuant to the Statute of the Seimas in the governing body of the Seimas or when heading a structural subunit of the Seimas, as well as other duties that may be taken at the Seimas only by a member of the Seimas; such duties of a member of the Seimas in interparliamentary and other international institutions where the said duties may be taken only by a member of the Seimas ...).

Such an activity of a member of the Seimas is the work of a member of the Seimas specified in Paragraph 3 of Article 60 of the Constitution; such work is remunerated from the state budget.

It should also be mentioned that, according to Paragraph 2 of Article 60 of the Constitution, a member of the Seimas can be appointed either as the Prime Minister or a minister. This implies the possibility of regulating their employment relationships at the Seimas in a differentiated manner; the legislature has a certain degree of discretion in this sphere.

The annual paid leave of the members of the Seimas

The Constitutional Court's decision of 10 February 2005

When interpreting the provision that the activity of the Seimas is continuous ... in conjunction with the provision that the legislature has the constitutional duty to establish, by means of a law, the duration and other conditions of annual paid leave of a member of the Seimas, it should be held that the continuity of the activity of the Seimas as the representation of the Nation and the institution of legislative power and the continuity of the activity of a member of the Seimas as a representative of the Nation and a professional politician in no way implies that a member of the Seimas should not or cannot exercise the constitutional right that he/she has as any other working person to rest and leisure as well as to annual paid leave. Namely because the Constitution treats a member of the Seimas as a professional politician and due to the fact that, according to the Constitution, the work of a member of the Seimas is a permanent occupation for which a member of the Seimas receives remuneration and the proper performance of which must be ensured both by certain social guarantees and by the special guarantees of parliamentary work, which are established in the Constitution and laws, the constitutional right of a member of the Seimas to rest and leisure, as well as to annual paid leave, cannot be denied, nor can the exercise of this right be restricted without sufficient grounds.

It should be especially emphasised that, according to the Constitution, during a rest period, at leisure time, or during annual paid leave a member of the Seimas does not lose his/her status of a representative of the Nation: a member of the Seimas retains his/her status of a representative of the Nation while at work during the sessions of the Seimas, those of the committees of the Seimas or of other structural subunits when such sittings take place not during the session of the Seimas, as well as during a rest period, at leisure time or during annual paid leave; the Seimas, even when the representatives of the Nation are on leave, does not cease to be the representation of the Nation and the institution of legislative power.

The provision [of the Constitutional Court's ruling of 1 July 2004], whereby the legislature has the duty to establish, by means of a law, the duration and other conditions of the annual paid leave of a member of the Seimas, means, inter alia, that the leave of the members of the Seimas must be established not by means of any type of legal acts passed by the Seimas, but precisely by means of a law, also that such a law should determine the duration of the annual paid leave of a member of the Seimas, the amount of remuneration for leave, and other essential conditions of leave.

The aforementioned provision does not mean that a law should determine a fixed time that would be the same each year for the annual paid leave of the members of the Seimas (concrete dates of its beginning and end). The Seimas, taking into consideration its agenda, considered issues, and other circumstances, can establish the time for the annual paid leave of the members of the Seimas each year separately by means of a substatory act – a resolution of the Seimas; this resolution must be adopted on the basis of the law establishing, inter alia, the duration of the annual paid leave of the members of the Seimas.

Establishing, by means of a law, the duration of the annual paid leave of the members of the Seimas, as well as determining the beginning and end of the annual paid leave of the members of the Seimas each year (by means of a resolution of the Seimas), regard should be paid to the constitutional imperative that the participation in the work of the Seimas is a constitutional duty and, at the same time, a right of a member of the Seimas, also to the fact that the constitutional duty of a member of the Seimas to participate in the work of the Seimas includes, inter alia, his/her duty to participate in the work of the structural subunits of the Seimas of which he/she is a member and to exercise other powers of a member of the Seimas, which are established in the Constitution, laws, and the Statute of the Seimas. The sittings of the Seimas take place during regular and extraordinary sessions. Thus, when a session of the Seimas takes place, a member of the Seimas cannot be on annual paid leave, save the exceptions described below concerning the time of the annual paid leave of the Speaker of the Seimas and the Deputy Speaker (Deputy Speakers) of the Seimas.

When establishing, by means of a law, the duration of the annual paid leave of the members of the Seimas, as well as its beginning and end (by means of a resolution of the Seimas), it is necessary to take into account that, as mentioned before, the sittings of the committees of the Seimas and other structural subunits in which members of the Seimas must participate are convened not only during the sessions of the Seimas, but also at the time when there are no sessions of the Seimas, as well as that, between the sessions of the Seimas the Seimas, its committees and other structural subunits, individual members of the Seimas and their groups also carry out other activities established in the Constitution, the Statute of the Seimas, and laws. Thus, a member of the Seimas cannot be on annual paid leave at the time when sittings of the committees of the Seimas and other structural subunits (in which the members of the Seimas must participate) take place, and when the activities of the Seimas, its committees, and other structural subunits established in the Constitution, the Statute of the Seimas, and laws are carried out, even though the session of the Seimas does not take place, save the exceptions described below concerning the annual paid leave of the Speaker of the Seimas and the Deputy Speaker (Deputy Speakers) of the Seimas.

The constitutional imperatives of the continuity of the activity of the Seimas and the continuity of the activity of a member of the Seimas and the necessity to ensure the right of a member of the Seimas to annual paid leave established in Paragraph 1 of Article 49 of the Constitution, when these constitutional requirements are interpreted in the context of one another, imply that the legislature, while regulating the relationships linked with the annual paid leave of a member of the Seimas, can and must determine the time when the sittings of the Seimas, as well as the sittings of the committees of the Seimas and other structural subunits, do not take place and when no other activity of the Seimas, the committees of the Seimas, or other structural subdivisions established in the Constitution, the Statute of the Seimas, and laws is carried out. The annual paid leave of the members of the Seimas can be established at that particular time by means of a resolution of the Seimas. According to the Constitution, the annual paid leave of a member of the Seimas cannot be established at any other time, save the further described exceptions established in the Constitution concerning the time of the annual paid leave of the Speaker of the Seimas and the Deputy Speaker (Deputy Speakers) of the Seimas.

The nature, constitutional mission of the Seimas as the representation of the Nation and the institution of legislative power, the particularities of the functioning and organisation of the work of the Seimas and the legal constitutional status of a member of the Seimas as a representative of the Nation and a professional politician determine the fact that all the members of the Seimas must take annual paid leave at the same time.

At the same time, it should be noted that, as mentioned before, certain exceptions are established in the Constitution concerning the time of the annual paid leave of the Speaker of the Seimas and the Deputy Speaker (Deputy Speakers) of the Seimas. The time of the annual paid leave of the state officials mentioned in the Constitution – the Speaker of the Seimas and the Deputy Speaker (Deputy Speakers) of the Seimas – must be established by taking into consideration the fact that these officials must be able, if necessary, to immediately perform their duties under the Constitution, laws, and the Statute of the Seimas. The possibility of establishing a differentiated legal regulation of the time for the annual paid leave of the Speaker of the Seimas and the Deputy Speaker (Deputy Speakers) of the Seimas (compared with the legal regulation of the time for the annual paid leave of other members of the Seimas) is the only exception to the regulation of the aforementioned relationships established in the Constitution. Nevertheless, while establishing a different time for the annual paid leave for the Speaker of the Seimas and the Deputy Speaker (Deputy Speakers) of the Seimas, it is necessary to ensure that these officials would be able to perform their duties in such a way that would not interrupt the work of the Seimas, inter alia, the fact that the Speaker of the Seimas would be able to perform the duties (laid down in Paragraph 2 of Article 70 of the Constitution) of promulgating legal acts (Statute of the Seimas or other substatutory acts of the Seimas).

The Seimas has discretion to establish the duration of the annual paid leave of a member of the Seimas. At the same time, it should be stressed that, when establishing this duration, the Seimas is bound by the constitutional imperative of an open, just and harmonious civil society and the constitutional principle of the equality of the rights of all persons, which does not allow granting privileges to any group of people or discriminating them, inter alia, on the basis of their social status. Therefore, the annual paid leave of a member of the Seimas cannot be shorter than the minimal duration of leave established in laws; however, such leave may not be unreasonably long; all differences (compared with the duration of the holidays of other working people) in the annual paid leave of a member of the Seimas, no matter what such differences are, must be constitutionally justifiable.

... the Constitution establishes the possibility of convening extraordinary sessions of the Seimas ... if necessary, the Seimas can decide to prolong a regular session. If a decision is made to prolong a regular session or an extraordinary session is convened, the members of the Seimas must convene to it even though they are on annual paid leave at that time. In such cases, the Seimas, ensuring the right of a member of the Seimas to annual paid leave (this right is provided for in Paragraph 1 of the Article 49 of the Constitution), can and should determine a different time when the sittings of the Seimas, as well as the sittings of the committees of the Seimas and other structural subunits, do not take place, the activity of the Seimas, its committees, and other structural subunits established in the Constitution, the Statute of the Seimas and laws is not carried out, in order that the members of the Seimas could exercise their constitutional right to annual paid leave instead of the time that was used by the members of the Seimas for a prolonged regular session of the Seimas or for an extraordinary session of the Seimas.

It should be noted that, according to the Constitution, such a legal situation where, after the leave of the members of the Seimas is over, the committees and other structural subunits of the Seimas do not function and the time remaining until the beginning of the next session of the Seimas is treated as that equal to the leave of the members of the Seimas or to their other leisure time is impermissible.

In summary, it should be held that, after establishing the duration and other conditions of the annual paid leave of a member of the Seimas, the right of a member of the Seimas to annual paid leave, as consolidated in Paragraph 1 of the Article 49 of the Constitution, would be ensured. On the other hand, as it was held in [the Constitutional Court's ruling of 1 July 2004], the consolidation of the leave of the members of the Seimas, by means of a law, would also ensure that no preconditions would be created for the constitutionally unfounded treatment of the period between the sessions of the Seimas as a period equivalent to the leave of the members of the Seimas or to any other type of their rest.

In the light of the foregoing arguments, it should be held that the notion "continuity of the activity of the Seimas" used in [the Constitutional Court's ruling of 1 July 2004] does not mean that the continuity of the work of the Seimas would be violated if the paid annual leave provided for in Paragraph 1 of the Article 49 of the Constitution was granted to all the members of the Seimas during the period between the sessions of the Seimas, save the exceptions, which arise out of the Constitution, concerning the time for the annual paid leave of the Speaker of the Seimas and the Deputy Speaker (Deputy Speakers) of the Seimas.

The prohibition precluding a member of the Seimas from engaging in business, commerce, or other profit-making activity (Paragraphs 1 and 3 of Article 60 of the Constitution): the right of a member of the Seimas to possess and manage property owned by him/her, to conclude the related contracts, and to engage in farming

The Constitutional Court's decision of 10 February 2005

The prohibition, established in Paragraph 1 of Article 60 of the Constitution, precluding a member of the Seimas from taking any other office in state establishments or organisations and from having another occupation in business, commerce and other private establishments or enterprises, as well as the prohibition, established in Paragraph 3 of the same article, precluding a member of the Seimas from receiving any other remuneration except for the remuneration of a member of the Seimas and remuneration for creative activities ... does not mean that a member of the Seimas cannot use, manage, etc. property owned by him/her, as well as conclude related contracts. However, the activity of a member of the Seimas where he/she uses his property, receives income from such property, possesses property owned by him/her, etc., as well as concludes related contracts, according to the Constitution, may not take the form of business, commerce, or other profit-making private activity ...

At the same time, it should be noted that the management of property owned by persons and other related activities can bear particularities that are determined by various factors – the nature of this property, the circumstances of its acquisition, the fact whether other persons have any rights to such property, etc. It is these various factors that may determine whether the use, management, etc. of property owned by a person, receiving income from such activity, as well as concluding related contracts, in some cases take the form of a business, commerce, or other profit-making activity, and in other cases they do not. Within the context of the issue under consideration, it should also be noted that the activity that is described as farming is usually linked with the use, management, etc. of land, forests, water bodies as well as objects of living nature as objects of property; therefore, this activity has specific particularities.

... while evaluating if a certain activity of a member of the Seimas, related to using, managing, etc. property owned by a member of the Seimas, receiving income from it, as well as concluding related contracts, is compatible or incompatible with the constitutional legal status of a member of the Seimas, from the viewpoint of the Constitution it is not only important how a particular activity is defined in laws or other legal acts, but, first of all, it is important whether the activity actually performed by a member of the Seimas is an occupation prohibited for a member of the Seimas under the Constitution, and whether such activity takes the form of business, commerce, or other activity, which is prohibited by the Constitution.

Taking into consideration the fact that the activity defined as farming can be distinguished by certain particularities, the fact alone that profit is received from such activity does not mean that this activity takes the form of business, commerce, or other activity, which is prohibited by the Constitution. According to the Constitution, the legislature has the duty to establish such a legal regulation that would make it possible, in each case when doubts arise whether a certain activity described as farming (regardless of how it is defined in laws or other legal acts) undertaken by a member of the Seimas has taken the form of business, commerce, or other activity prohibited for a member of the Seimas under the Constitution, to ascertain all factual circumstances, evaluate the said activity, and determine whether the aforementioned activity is compatible with the legal constitutional status of a member of the Seimas.

In the light of the foregoing arguments, it should be held that the statement “the notion ‘work’ used in the phrase ‘work in business, commercial, or other private establishments or enterprises’ of Paragraph 1 of Article 60 of the Constitution also comprises any other private profit-making activity, as well as any profit-making activity engaged in without establishing an enterprise, establishment, or organisation” ... of [the Constitutional Court’s ruling of 1 July 2004] does not mean that any activity that can be described as farming is incompatible as such with the constitutional legal status of a member of the Seimas (if such activity has not taken the form of business, commerce, or any other activity prohibited for a member of the Seimas under the Constitution).

The prohibition precluding a member of the Seimas from engaging in business, commerce, or other profit-making activity (Paragraph 1 of Article 60 of the Constitution): the right of a member of the Seimas to be a founder, owner, co-owner, or shareholder of a private enterprise, establishment, or organisation

... none of the statements [of the Constitutional Court's ruling of 1 July 2004, the interpretation of which is requested] indicates that a member of the Seimas is prohibited from being a founder, owner, co-owner, or shareholder of any private enterprise, establishment, or organisation, that such a member of the Seimas, according to the Constitution, cannot have the rights of a founder, owner, co-owner, or shareholder of a private enterprise, establishment, or organisation, that he/she cannot exercise these rights by himself/herself, except for the prohibition imposed on a member of the Seimas and formulated in one of these statements: "such a member of the Seimas who is a founder, owner, co-owner, or shareholder of a private enterprise, establishment, or organisation may not take a position, perform work, hold a position, fulfil other functions, perform other tasks, hold the so-called honorary position, etc. (including participation in collegial management, control, and other bodies) in the said establishment, enterprise, or organisation, or represent it" ...

On the other hand, the aforementioned statements do not deny the duty, deriving from the Constitution, of the legislature to establish effective control over the incompatibility of the duties of a member of the Seimas with other duties or work, as well as the prohibition on receiving other remuneration, save the exceptions established in the Constitution. The Seimas has a certain degree of discretion in establishing such control; the incompatibility of the duties of a member of the Seimas with other duties and work, as well as receiving no other remuneration, save the exceptions established in the Constitution, can be ensured by the Seimas, inter alia, by establishing also such a legal regulation by which other persons would be entrusted with the management of the property of a member of the Seimas (after establishing the legal guarantees of the protection and preservation of such property), and by which the transactions of the enterprises of which a member of the Seimas is a founder, owner, co-owner, or shareholder with the establishments, enterprises, organisations, etc. of the public sector would be under control.

In the light of the foregoing arguments, it should be held that the statements ... [of the Constitutional Court's ruling of 1 July 2004] do not mean that a member of the Seimas is prohibited from being a founder, owner, co-owner, or shareholder of any enterprise, establishment, or organisation, that such a member of the Seimas, according to the Constitution, cannot have the rights of a founder, owner, co-owner, or shareholder of a private enterprise, establishment, or organisation, that he/she cannot exercise the rights himself/herself, except for the fact that such a member of the Seimas who is a founder, owner, co-owner, or shareholder of a private enterprise, establishment, or organisation may not take a position, perform work, hold a position, fulfil other functions, perform other tasks, hold the so-called honorary position, etc. (including participation in collegial management, control, and other bodies) in that enterprise, establishment, or organisation or represent it.

The right of a member of the Seimas to take a position in the political party of which he/she is a member (Paragraphs 1 and 3 of Article 60 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's decision of 10 February 2005

... political parties belong to such a type of associations, the aim and purpose of the establishment and activity of which are inseparable from seeking political power, thus, as well as from participating in elections to the representative institution, the Seimas.

The Constitution does not forbid a member of the Seimas from holding various positions (inter alia, leading ones) in a political party of which he/she is a member and representing it.

... Paragraph 1 of Article 60 of the Constitution establishes the prohibition precluding a member of the Seimas from taking any other office in state establishments or organisations, also from having another occupation in business, commercial and other private establishments and enterprises, and Paragraph 3 of the same article establishes the prohibition precluding a member of the Seimas from receiving any other remuneration except for the remuneration of a member of the Seimas and remuneration for creative activities.

In this context, it should be noted that, according to the Constitution, a member of the Seimas holding a certain position (inter alia, a leading one) in a political party of which he/she is a member cannot be linked with the political party and its structural subdivisions by employment relationships regardless of whether this activity is registered by any legal contract or other legal act, or performed without any legal contract or legal act, and whether this activity is remunerated in any payment or other form or not.

It should also be noted that, under the Constitution, the constitutional prohibition precluding a member of the Seimas from receiving any other remuneration except the remuneration of a member of the Seimas and remuneration for creative activities means that a member of the Seimas who holds a certain position (inter alia, a leading one) in the political party of which he/she is a member cannot receive any remuneration for such activity.

In this context, it should be held that ... the content of the notion “remuneration” used in Paragraph 3 of Article 60 of the Constitution is a constitutional notion, it bears constitutional content and it should not be associated exclusively with remuneration paid by employment etc. contracts or agreements; the content of the notion “remuneration” in Paragraph 3 of Article 60 is much broader: this notion comprises monetary payments of various types and the provision of other material benefit to a member of the Seimas.

In the light of the foregoing arguments, it should be held that the statements [“The constitutional right to freely form unions is linked with the possibility of holding various positions in such unions; the said possibility is a derivative from the constitutional right to freely form unions. The procedure of holding such positions in associations is established not by the state, but in acts regulating the internal order (articles of association, statutes, etc.) of an association itself (which, according to the Constitution, is autonomous with regard to public authority ...)” and “Under the Constitution, no legal regulation artificially or unreasonably restricting freedom of forming associations and their activity may be established, as the establishment of such a legal regulation would violate the constitutional value – the right to associate (freedom of association). Therefore, under the Constitution, the legislature may not establish any such a legal regulation that would limit the right of a member of the Seimas to be a member of the association specified in the Constitution and to take a position in such an association as, in respect of the said person, this would violate the constitutional value – the right to associate or freedom of association”] of [the Constitutional Court’s ruling of 1 July 2004], as such, do not mean that a member of the Seimas cannot hold a position (inter alia, a leading one) in the political party of which he/she is a member and represent such a party.

The right of a member of the Seimas to take office in the trade union or other association of which he/she is a member (Paragraphs 1 and 3 of Article 60 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court’s decision of 10 February 2005

... it should be noted that freedom of associations as well as freedom of establishment and activity of trade unions, as consolidated in the Constitution, imply that all such associations can, while following laws, independently regulate their organisational structure, various positions (inter alia, leading ones), also the procedure of filling such positions.

The Constitution does not forbid a member of the Seimas from holding various positions (inter alia, leading ones) in a trade union or another association of which he/she is a member and which he/she represents.

It should also be stressed that the prohibition established in Paragraph 1 of Article 60 of the Constitution precluding a member of the Seimas from holding any other position in state establishments or organisations, as well as working in business, commercial or other private establishments or enterprises and the prohibition established in Paragraph 3 of the same article precluding a member of the Seimas from receiving any other remuneration, with the exception of the remuneration as a member of the Seimas and remuneration for creative activities imply that a member of the Seimas who holds a certain position (inter alia, a leading one) in a trade union or another association of which he/she is a member, according to the Constitution, may not have an employment relationship with such a trade union, another association, or its structural subdivisions regardless of whether this activity is registered by any legal contract or other legal act, or performed without any legal contract or legal act, regardless of whether or not this activity is remunerated in any payment or other form; in addition, under the Constitution, a member of the Seimas who holds a certain position (inter alia, a leading one) in the trade union or another association of which he/she is a member cannot receive any remuneration for such activity.

When interpreting whether a member of the Seimas can represent a trade union or another association of which he/she is a member, it should also be noted that the representation of a trade union or another association by a member of the Seimas bears certain particularities determined by the constitutional legal status of a member of the Seimas as a representative of the Nation; such a legal status differs substantially from the legal status of other citizens or state officials. According to the Constitution, a member of the Seimas cannot represent a trade union or another association in legal relationships with state and municipal establishments, enterprises, or organisations (their officials), as well as with other (non-state or municipal) establishments, enterprises, or organisations (their officials), where laws assign (entrust) such establishments, enterprises, or organisations with the implementation of certain state functions, or where such establishments, enterprises, or organisations, in certain ways and forms established in laws, participate in the implementation of state functions, since the aforementioned establishments, enterprises, or organisations (their officials) are (might be) directly or indirectly dependent on decisions made by the Seimas (including decisions on the allocation of budget appropriations), on parliamentary control exercised by the Seimas, on the possibility for the Seimas to appoint and release the heads of institutions, as well as other state officials, or on the possibility for the Seimas to exert influence on their appointment, etc. Such representation where a certain trade union or another association is represented by a member of the Seimas in legal relationships with state and municipal establishments, enterprises, or organisations (their officials), as well as with other (non-state or municipal) establishments, enterprises, or organisations (their officials), where laws assign (entrust) such establishments, enterprises, or organisations with the implementation of certain state functions, or where such establishments, enterprises, or organisations, in certain ways and forms established in laws, participate in the implementation of state functions, may create the preconditions for such a legal situation where a trade union or another association represented by a member of the Seimas would gain an additional advantage over another subject of these relationships solely due to the fact that such a trade union or another association is represented by a member of the Seimas.

In the light of the foregoing arguments, it should be held that the statements [“The constitutional right to freely form unions is linked with the possibility of holding various positions in such unions; the said possibility is a derivative from the constitutional right to freely form unions. The procedure of holding such positions in associations is established not by the state, but in acts regulating the internal order (articles of association, statutes, etc.) of an association itself (which, according to the Constitution, is autonomous in respect of public authority ...)” and “Under the Constitution, no legal regulation artificially or unreasonably restricting freedom of forming associations and their activity may be established, as the establishment of such a legal regulation would violate the constitutional value – the right to associate (freedom of association). Therefore, under the Constitution, the legislature may not establish any such a legal regulation that would limit the right of a member of the Seimas to be a member of the association specified in the Constitution and to take a position in such an association as, in respect of the said person, this would violate the constitutional value – the right to associate or freedom of association”] of [the Constitutional Court’s ruling of 1 July 2004], as such, do not mean that a member of the Seimas cannot hold a position (inter alia, a leading one) in the trade union or other association of which he/she is a member and represent such a trade union or another association.

The incompatibility of the duties of a member of the Seimas with other duties or work (Paragraph 1 of Article 60 of the Constitution): the prohibition on having an employment relationship with any enterprise, organisation, public organisation, trade union, political party, association, or other union

... the Constitution prohibits such legal situations where a member of the Seimas has an employment relationship with a certain state or municipal enterprise, establishment, or organisation, or in a private enterprise, establishment, or organisation, or with a certain public organisation, trade union, political party, association, or other union (regardless of its title), with the exception of the work (duties) expressis verbis indicated or implicitly provided for in the Constitution.

This constitutional prohibition also means that a person elected as a member of the Seimas must terminate his/her employment relationship with all state or municipal enterprises, establishments, organisations, or with private enterprises, establishments, organisations, or with public organisations, trade unions, political parties, associations, or other unions (regardless of their titles) before the first sitting of the newly elected Seimas during which he/she takes an oath. It was held in [the Constitutional Court's ruling of 1 July 2004] that such "interpretation of the Constitution, whereby, purportedly, a member of the Seimas, having taken an oath, for a certain period of time, may still hold another office or perform other work that is incompatible with the duties of a member of the Seimas (save the exceptions provided for in the Constitution) ... would be unfounded, as the prohibitions established in the Constitution applicable to a member of the Seimas ... would be disregarded; this would be in violation of the Constitution"

Thus, if a member of the Seimas, having taken an oath, did not terminate his/her employment relationship with a certain state or municipal enterprise, establishment, organisation, or with a private enterprise, establishment, organisation, or with a public organisation, trade union, political party, association, or another union (regardless of its title) for some time, this would constitute failure to pay regard to the constitutional prohibitions for a member of the Seimas, i.e. this would mean a violation of the Constitution. The Constitution would also be violated in cases where a member of the Seimas, having taken an oath, did not terminate his/her employment relationship with a certain state or municipal enterprise, establishment, or organisation, or with a private enterprise, establishment, or organisation, or with a public organisation, trade union, political party, association, or another union (regardless of its title), but by the decision of such a state or municipal enterprise, establishment, or organisation, or a private enterprise, establishment, or organisation, or a public organisation, trade union, political party, association, or another union (regardless of its title), or their institution or official, such a member of the Seimas would be granted leave or in any other way he/she would be allowed, on a temporary basis (as long as he/she holds the office of a member of the Seimas), not to perform the respective work, or the exercise of his/her powers (duties) would be suspended, etc. In this context, it should be noted that the fact that a person takes leave, the exercise of his/her powers (duties) is suspended, etc., does not terminate his/her employment relationship with a particular state or municipal enterprise, establishment, or organisation, or a private enterprise, establishment, or organisation, or a public organisation, trade union, political party, association, or another union (regardless of its title), but, on the contrary, confirms that this person has (continues to have) an employment relationship with a particular state or municipal enterprise, establishment, or organisation, a private enterprise, establishment, or organisation, or a public organisation, trade union, political party, association, or another union (regardless of its title).

According to Item 7 of Article 63 of the Constitution, the powers of a member of the Seimas cease when he/she does not give up employment that is incompatible with the duties of a member of the Seimas. If it becomes clear that such a legal situation occurred where a member of the Seimas, having taken an oath, has not resigned from such employment that is incompatible with the duties of a member of the Seimas, under the Constitution, a duty arises for the Seimas to terminate the powers of such a member of the Seimas; the Seimas must adopt a corresponding resolution thereon.

In the light of the foregoing arguments, it should be held that the statements of ... [the Constitutional Court's ruling of 1 July 2004] on the incompatibility of the duties of a member of the Seimas with other duties and work mean that the Constitution does not allow such a legal situation where a member of the Seimas is a person who has not terminated his/her employment relationship with a certain state or municipal enterprise, establishment, or organisation, or with a private enterprise, establishment, organisation, or with a certain public organisation, trade union, political party, association, or another union (regardless of its title), but takes leave or in any other way is allowed, on a temporary basis (as long as he/she holds the office of a member of the Seimas), not to perform particular work, not to carry out particular activities, or the exercise of his/her powers (duties) is suspended otherwise in such an enterprise, establishment, or organisation, or in such a public organisation, trade union, political party, association, or another union (regardless of its title).

The prohibition precluding a member of the Seimas from receiving other remuneration (Paragraph 3 of Article 60 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's decision of 10 February 2005

... under the Constitution, the constitutional prohibition precluding a member of the Seimas from receiving any other remuneration except the remuneration of a member of the Seimas and remuneration for creative activities means that a member of the Seimas who holds a certain position (inter alia, a leading one) in the political party of which he/she is a member cannot receive any remuneration for such activity.

In this context, it should be held that ... the content of the notion "remuneration" used in Paragraph 3 of Article 60 of the Constitution is a constitutional notion, it bears constitutional content and it should not be associated exclusively with remuneration paid by employment etc. contracts or agreements; the content of the notion "remuneration" in Paragraph 3 of Article 60 is much broader: this notion comprises monetary payments of various types and the provision of other material benefit to a member of the Seimas.

The individuality of the mandate of a member of the Seimas

The Constitutional Court's conclusion of 27 October 2010

... under the Constitution, the mandate of a member of the Seimas is individual, i.e. it is conferred only on a person who, under the procedure established in the Constitution and laws, is elected as a member of the Seimas. Under the Constitution, a member of the Seimas has the right and duty to implement the mandate conferred on him/her by the electorate only by himself/herself in person. The constitutional status of a member of the Seimas, which integrates the duties, rights, the guarantees of the activity, and the responsibility of a member of the Seimas, implies that a member of the Seimas is obliged to implement the rights and duties of a member of the Seimas, a representative of the Nation, which arise from the Constitution and laws not in conflict with the Constitution, only by himself in person, and that he/she may not, in any form, transfer to another person, inter alia, a member of the Seimas, the performance of his/her, as a member of the Seimas, rights and constitutional duties. The individuality of the mandate of a member of the Seimas also implies that no person, inter alia, a member of the Seimas, may take over the rights and duties of another member of the Seimas, a representative of the Nation, inter alia, the right to vote.

The principle of the free mandate of a member of the Seimas, which is consolidated in the Constitution, inter alia, the requirement for the individuality of the mandate of a member of the Seimas, gives rise to the right of a member of the Seimas to vote at his/her own discretion in the course of the adoption of any decision of the Seimas; the said right may be realised only by the expression of the will of a member of the Seimas in person in the course of voting at a sitting of the Seimas. In cases where the requirement for voting by a member of the Seimas in person at a sitting of the Seimas is not observed, inter alia, where, in the course of voting, a certain member of the Seimas votes instead of another member of the Seimas and thereby expresses the will of not that member of the Seimas instead of whom a vote is cast, but his/her own, no regard is paid to the requirements for the procedure of the adoption of laws, which stem from the Constitution, inter alia, Article 69 thereof, the results of the voting are distorted, as well as the preconditions are created for the violation of the principle of the free mandate of a member of the Seimas, which is consolidated in the Constitution. It also needs to be noted that such cases where a certain member of the Seimas votes instead of another member of the Seimas and thereby expresses the will of that member of the Seimas also do not conform to the requirement for the individuality of the mandate of a member of the Seimas and should be treated as disregard of the requirements for the procedure of the adoption of laws, which stem from the Constitution, inter alia, Article 69 thereof.

Under the Constitution, the legislature has the duty to establish, by means of legal acts, such a legal regulation that would ensure that the members of the Seimas who take part in the implementation of the functions of the Seimas, as the representation of the Nation, would properly perform their powers, that no legal preconditions would be created for the members of the Seimas to act not in the interests of the Nation and the State of Lithuania, but in their personal interests, by raising these personal interests above the public interests, that no legal preconditions would be created for the members of the Seimas to act in bad faith and abuse their powers, that would make it possible to exercise effective control over how members of the Seimas observe these requirements, and that the members of the Seimas, in cases where they disregard the aforementioned requirements, would be held liable in accordance with the Constitution and laws.

The constitutional concept of the duties and work that are incompatible with the duties of a member of the Seimas (Paragraph 1 of Article 60 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's decision of 23 February 2011

While interpreting whether the phrase “the notion ‘work’ used in the expression ‘work in business, commercial, or other private establishments or enterprises’ of Paragraph 1 of Article 60 of the Constitution” ... of the Constitutional Court’s ruling of 1 July 2004 ... also comprises any private activity of a member of the Seimas that is carried out in business, commercial and other private establishments or enterprises under a legal contract or any other type of contract, though, in the time free from sittings of the Seimas and without receiving, for that activity, any remuneration or any other types of monetary payments, it needs to be noted that ... under the official constitutional doctrine formulated in the Constitutional Court’s ruling of 1 July 2004, the notion “work” used in the expression “work in business, commercial, or other private establishments or enterprises” of Paragraph 1 of Article 60 of the Constitution comprises any activity in a Lithuanian, foreign, or international private establishment, enterprise, or organisation, or the representation of such an establishment, enterprise, or organisation if the said activity is linked with performing work, taking a position, holding a position, fulfilling other functions, performing other tasks, holding the so-called honorary position, etc. (including participation in collegial management, control, and other bodies), irrespective of whether:

- this activity is permanent, temporary, or one-off (episodic);
- this activity is remunerated in any payment or other form, or is not remunerated;
- this activity is referred to in legal acts as work or otherwise;
- there are any other persons engaged in a certain activity in this establishment, enterprise, or organisation;
- this activity means that it is carried out by a person holding a leading position;
- a person is elected or appointed in order to carry out such activity;
- the activity is registered under a certain legal contract or another legal act, or is performed without any legal contract or legal act.

It also needs to be noted that, as it was emphasised in the Constitutional Court’s decision of 10 February 2005, under the Constitution, during a rest period, at leisure time, or during annual paid leave a member of the Seimas does not lose his/her status of a representative of the Nation.

Thus, it should be held that Paragraph 1 of Article 60 of the Constitution contains the prohibition precluding a member of the Seimas from working in business, commercial, or other private establishments or enterprises not only during his/her work at the Seimas or his/her other parliamentary activities, but also during the time free from work at the Seimas (during a rest period, at leisure time, or during annual paid leave).

At the same time, it needs to be emphasised that ... the purpose of the legal regulation established in Paragraph 1 of Article 60 of the Constitution is to ensure the free mandate of a member of the Seimas as a representative of the Nation, the continuity of his/her work at the Seimas and his/her other parliamentary activities, to guarantee that a member of the Seimas acts in the interests of the Nation and the State of Lithuania, but not in his/her personal or group interests, or in the interests of the political parties or political organisation, the public or other organisations, other persons, or the territorial communities that nominated or supported the said person as a candidate for the office of a member of the Seimas, or in the interests of the voters of the constituency in which the said member of the Seimas was elected, that a member of the Seimas will not use his/her status and a free mandate for his/her private benefit, or for the benefit of his/her close relatives or other persons, that each member of the Seimas will have the opportunity to perform his/her constitutional duty to continuously participate at the work of the Seimas, the representation of the Nation, to continuously exercise as a representative of the Nation his/her constitutional powers; this purpose would never be reached or the preconditions precluding the accomplishment of this purpose would be created if a member of the Seimas also had the possibility of holding another office or another occupation, with the exception of the office expressis verbis specified in the Constitution or the duties allowed under the Constitution.

In view of the foregoing arguments, the conclusion should be drawn that the phrase “the notion ‘work’ used in the expression ‘work in business, commercial, or other private establishments or enterprises’ of Paragraph 1 of Article 60 of the Constitution” ... of the Constitutional Court’s ruling of 1 July 2004 comprises any activity in a Lithuanian, foreign, or international private establishment, enterprise, or organisation, or the representation of such an establishment, enterprise, or organisation if the said activity is linked with performing work, taking a position, holding a position, fulfilling other functions, performing other tasks, holding the so-called honorary position, etc. (including participation in collegial management, control, and other bodies), irrespective of whether this activity is permanent, temporary, or one-off (episodic), whether this activity is remunerated in any payment or other form, or is not remunerated, whether this activity is referred to in legal acts as work or otherwise, whether there are any other persons engaged in a certain activity in this establishment, enterprise, or organisation, whether this activity means that it is carried out by a person holding a leading position, whether a person is elected or appointed in order to carry out such activity, whether the activity is registered under a certain legal contract or another legal act, or is performed without any legal contract or legal act, irrespective of the fact whether this activity is carried out during the work of a member of the Seimas at the Seimas or his/her other parliamentary activities, or during a rest period, at leisure time, or during annual paid leave.

The right of a member of the Seimas to receive remuneration for creative activities (Paragraph 3 of Article 60 of the Constitution)

... the expression “one of specific features of freedom of the creative activities of a member of the Seimas is that a member of the Seimas exercises this freedom not in the capacity of a subject of employment, state service, or similar relations” ... of the Constitutional Court’s ruling of 1 July 2004, when interpreted in the context of the constitutional legal status of a member of the Seimas, the constitutional concept of creative activities as well as remunerating for such activities, means that, under the Constitution, a member of the Seimas may receive remuneration for creative activities, i.e. for such activities that result in qualitatively new, original and specific material or spiritual values of science, technology, culture, or art (piece of creation), which have never existed before. In addition, the creative activities of a member of the Seimas are incompatible with any activity (taking a position, performing work, holding a position, fulfilling other functions, etc.) in a Lithuanian state or municipal, foreign, or international establishment, enterprise, or organisation, or in a private establishment, enterprise, or organisation; thus, a member of the Seimas, while engaging in creative activities, may not violate the constitutional imperatives of limitations imposed on work activities of a member of the Seimas, which arise from the Constitution, inter alia, Paragraph 1 of Article 60 thereof.

Constitutional freedom of the creative activities of a member of the Seimas may be exercised, inter alia, by concluding a contract; however, it needs to be noted that no employment relationship, state service relationship, or similar relationship may arise on the basis of such a contract. It also needs to be noted that, when deciding on the type of relationships that have emerged between the contracting parties under a specific contract, not only the title of a contract, but also the content thereof must be assessed. Consequently, in each case it is necessary to individually assess whether such a contract is used to regulate the relationships corresponding to the constitutional concept of creative activities.

Thus, it needs to be held that a member of the Seimas may receive remuneration for creative activities, i.e. for such activities that result in qualitatively new, original and specific material or spiritual values of science, technology, culture, or art (piece of creation), which have never existed before; however, as mentioned before, the creative activities of a member of the Seimas are incompatible with any activity (taking a position, performing work, holding a position, fulfilling other functions, etc.) in a Lithuanian state or municipal, foreign, or international establishment, enterprise, or organisation, or in a private establishment, enterprise, or organisation; thus, a member of the Seimas, while engaging in creative activities, may not violate the constitutional imperatives of limitations imposed on work activities of a member of the Seimas, which arise from the Constitution, inter alia, Paragraph 1 of Article 60 thereof.

At the same time, it needs to be noted that, as mentioned before, a member of the Seimas, while exercising his/her freedom of creative activities, must pay regard to the constitutional status of a member of the Seimas as a representative of the Nation, and the legal and ethical imperatives arising therefrom, inter alia, he/she must avoid a conflict between public and private interests.

In view of the foregoing arguments, the conclusion should be drawn that the expression “one of specific features of freedom of the creative activities of a member of the Seimas is that a member of the Seimas exercises this freedom not in the capacity of a subject of employment, state service, or similar relationships” ... of the Constitutional Court’s ruling of 1 July 2004 means, inter alia, that a member of the Seimas may receive remuneration for creative activities, i.e. for such activities that result in qualitatively new, original and specific material or spiritual values of science, technology, culture, or art (piece of creation), which have never existed before; constitutional freedom of the creative activities of a member of the Seimas may be exercised, inter alia, by concluding a contract; however, no employment relationship, state service relationship, or similar relationship may arise on the basis of such a contract. Consequently, a member of the Seimas, while engaging in creative activities, may not violate the constitutional imperatives of limitations imposed on work activities of a member of the Seimas, which arise from the Constitution, inter alia, Paragraph 1 of Article 60 thereof.

... a lecture, as a rule, is a form of educational activities. Lectures are aimed at imparting knowledge on the subject taught as well as at elucidating topical questions relating to that subject. Nevertheless, situations are possible where a lecture, due to its notable originality and qualitative novelty, has no analogues anywhere and may be treated as a piece of creation, the form of expression whereof, inter alia, can be written or verbal one.

Under the Constitution, a member of the Seimas may receive remuneration for creative activities, i.e. for such activities in the area of science, technology, culture, or art that are aimed at creating a particular piece of creation, i.e. qualitatively new, original and specific material or spiritual values of science, technology, culture, or art, which have never existed before. It needs to be noted that, as mentioned before, one of the specific features of freedom of the creative activities of a member of the Seimas is that a member of the Seimas exercises this freedom not as a subject of employment, state service, or similar relationships.

Thus, it needs to be held that a member of the Seimas may receive remuneration for a lecture corresponding to the concept of a piece of creation in cases where, in the course of the exercise of his/her freedom of creative activities, a member of the Seimas has created a piece of creation while not being in the position of a subject of employment, state service, or similar relationships.

It has been mentioned that constitutional freedom of the creative activities of a member of the Seimas may be exercised, inter alia, by concluding a contract; however, no employment relationship, state service relationship, or similar relationship may arise on the basis of such a contract. It needs to be noted that a contract may also be concluded in connection with the creative activities of a member of the Seimas that are aimed at creating a lecture; however, no employment relationship, state service relationship, or similar relationship may arise on the basis of such a contract. It also needs to be noted that, when deciding on the type of relationships that have emerged between the contracting parties under a specific contract, not only the title of a contract, but also the content thereof must be assessed. Consequently, in each case it is necessary to individually assess whether such a contract is used to regulate the relationships corresponding to the constitutional concept of creative activities.

In view of the foregoing arguments, the conclusion should be drawn that the statements “It is clear from the phrase ‘payment for educational or creative activities’ in Paragraph 1 of Article 113 of the Constitution that the constitutional concepts of educational and creative activities are not identical and that each of them has its own independent content. These concepts may not be identified with one another, they are not synonyms, and none of them covers the other. Educational activities in the Constitution are separated from creative activities: educational activities are linked with education, teaching, and training at educational and teaching establishments (including higher schools), whereas creative activities ... are activities aimed at creating a piece of science, technology, culture, or art” ... of the Constitutional Court’s ruling of 1 July 2004 mean, inter alia, that a member of the Seimas may receive remuneration for a lecture corresponding to the concept of a piece of creation, which has been created while exercising constitutional freedom of creative activities of a member of the Seimas; as regards a lecture corresponding to the concept of a piece of creation, the form of expression whereof, inter alia, can be written or verbal one, it is possible to conclude a contract; however, no employment relationship, state service relationship, or similar relationship may arise on the basis of such a contract.

The cessation of the powers of a member of the Seimas when he/she takes up or does not give up employment that is incompatible with the duties of a member of the Seimas (Item 7 of Article 63 of the Constitution)

... Item 7 of Article 63 of the Constitution provides for an independent ground for the loss of the mandate by a member of the Seimas – where a member of the Seimas takes up or does not give up employment that is incompatible with the duties of a member of the Seimas; this implies the necessity to carry out an investigation into the activities of such a member of the Seimas in order to verify the respective circumstances and to establish the fact that the said member of the Seimas has taken up or has not given up the employment incompatible with the duties of a member of the Seimas. Therefore, the legislature must establish such a procedure that would ensure the due process of law, would make it possible to properly investigate and establish whether a certain member of the Seimas has taken (or has not taken) up or has given (or has not given) up the employment incompatible with the duties of a member of the Seimas, and would make it possible to take a fair decision as regards the mandate of the said member of the Seimas.

In view of the foregoing arguments, the conclusion should be drawn that the phrase “According to Item 7 of Article 63 of the Constitution, the powers of a member of the Seimas cease when he/she does not give up employment that is incompatible with the duties of a member of the Seimas” of ... the Constitutional Court’s ruling of 1 July 2004, when interpreted in conjunction with the phrase “The incompatibility of the duties of a member of the Seimas with other duties or work (save the exceptions provided for in the Constitution), as well as the prohibition precluding a member of the Seimas from receiving other remuneration (save the exceptions provided for in the Constitution), as established in the Constitution, gives rise to the duty of the legislature to establish, by means of a law, such a legal regulation that would make it possible to verify whether the limitations imposed in Article 60 of the Constitution on a member of the Seimas are followed” ... of the same ruling, means, inter alia, that the legislature must establish such a procedure that would ensure the due process of law, would make it possible to properly investigate and establish whether a certain member of the Seimas has taken (or has not taken) up or has given (or has not given) up the employment incompatible with the duties of a member of the Seimas, and would make it possible to take a fair decision as regards the mandate of the said member of the Seimas.

The equality of the rights of the members of the Seimas

The Constitutional Court's conclusion of 10 November 2012

... the constitutional status of all members of the Seimas is the same, regardless of whether they were elected while applying a single (either proportional or majoritarian) system of elections or different systems of elections (when the legislature chooses the so-called mixed system of parliamentary elections). As it was held in the Constitutional Court's rulings of 25 January 2001 and 1 July 2004, under the Constitution, each member of the Seimas represents the entire Nation, all the members of the Seimas are equal and they must have the same opportunities to participate in the work of the Seimas.

The cessation of the powers of a member of the Seimas when the election is declared invalid or the law on election is grossly violated (Item 6 of Article 63 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's conclusion of 10 November 2012

... under the Constitution, the gross violations of the principles of democratic, free, and fair elections, inter alia, the honesty and transparency of the election process, committed during elections to the Seimas may also be established later, after the elected members of the Seimas have acquired their powers, i.e. after the elected Seimas convenes for its first sitting.

Item 6 of Article 63 of the Constitution prescribes that the powers of a member of the Seimas cease when the election is declared invalid, or the law on election is grossly violated. This constitutional provision implies the powers of the Seimas to discontinue the powers of a member of the Seimas if gross violations of [the principles of] democratic, free and fair elections, which give rise to reasonable doubts regarding the lawfulness of the election of that member of the Seimas, are established after the said member of the Seimas has acquired his/her powers. Under Item 6 of Article 63 of the Constitution, the powers of a member of the Seimas may be terminated both when the election is declared invalid (for example, in a single-member constituency when gross violations (raising reasonable doubts as to the lawfulness of the election of a certain member of the Seimas where it is impossible to establish the election results reflecting the genuine will of the electorate) of the law on election are established, and when the election is not declared invalid (for example, where gross violations of the law on election are established, which raise reasonable doubts as to the lawfulness of the election of certain members of the Seimas in the multi-member constituency or a multi-member constituency, but where it is possible to establish the election results reflecting the genuine will of the electorate).

In this context, it needs to be noted that Item 1 of Paragraph 3 of Article 105 of the Constitution establishes the powers of the Constitutional Court, inter alia, to present a conclusion whether there were the violations of election laws during the elections of the members of the Seimas; under Paragraph 5 of Article 106 of the Constitution, the Seimas and the President of the Republic may request that the Constitutional Court present a conclusion in cases concerning an election to the Seimas; Paragraph 3 of Article 107 of the Constitution provides, inter alia, that, on the basis of the conclusions of the Constitutional Court, the Seimas takes a final decision on the issues specified in Paragraph 3 of Article 105 of the Constitution. In view of this fact, the conclusion should be drawn that the Seimas may adopt a decision on revoking the powers of a member of the Seimas under Item 6 of Article 63 of the Constitution only on the grounds of the Constitutional Court's conclusion that the election law was grossly violated during the election to the Seimas, while the Constitutional Court may present the said conclusion only following an inquiry by the Seimas or the President of the Republic.

The procedure for abolishing the personal immunity of a member of the Seimas (Paragraphs 1 and 2 of Article 62 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 27 April 2016

Paragraphs 1 and 2 of Article 62 of the Constitution prescribe:

“The person of a Member of the Seimas shall be inviolable.

The Members of the Seimas may not be held criminally liable or be detained, or have their liberty restricted otherwise, without the consent of the Seimas.”

The Constitutional Court has held that the system of the guarantees of both the work of a member of the Seimas at the Seimas and other parliamentary activity comprises, inter alia, the immunities of a member of the Seimas (ruling of 1 July 2004). The provisions of Paragraphs 1 and 2 of Article 62 of the Constitution consolidate the additional guarantees of the personal immunity of a member of the Seimas, which are necessary and compulsory for the proper performance of the duties of a member of the Seimas, as a representative of the Nation; the immunity of the members of the Seimas, who implement the duties assigned to them under the Constitution and laws, must ensure that the Seimas will be able, without any hindrance, to perform the functions provided for under the Constitution (ruling of 8 May 2000); the right of a member of the Seimas to his/her liberty and his/her personal immunity during the established term of office may be limited only upon the consent of the Seimas (ruling of 25 January 2001).

... the procedure under which the Seimas may give its consent that is provided for in Paragraph 2 of Article 62 of the Constitution (without such consent a member of the Seimas may not be held criminally liable or be detained, or have his/her liberty restricted otherwise) may be laid down in the Statute of the Seimas. In establishing such a procedure, the Seimas must pay regard to the norms and principles of the Constitution. The procedure (which is established in the Statute of the Seimas) under which the Seimas gives its consent to holding a member of the Seimas criminally liable or to his/her detention, or to restricting his/her liberty otherwise, is binding on the Seimas: while deciding on whether to give such consent, the Seimas must follow the procedure laid down in the Statute of the Seimas. If the Seimas, when implementing its powers to give or not to give such consent, inter alia, by adopting a concrete legal act by which the will of the Seimas is expressed, committed a substantial violation of the procedure established in the Statute of the Seimas, not only Paragraph 1 of Article 69 of the Constitution and the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law, but also Paragraph 2 of Article 62 of the Constitution, which provides that the members of the Seimas may not be held criminally liable or be detained, or have their liberty restricted otherwise, without the consent of the Seimas, would be ignored.

... in view of the fact that the Seimas by its nature and essence is an institution of a political character, whose decisions reflect the political will of the majority of the members of the Seimas and are based on political agreements and various political compromises (conclusion of 31 March 2004 and the ruling of 27 May 2014), it should be noted that abolishing the personal immunity of a member of the Seimas is a parliamentary procedure, which may not be deemed legal proceedings sensu stricto, since, during the said parliamentary procedure, neither the issue of the guilt of a member of the Seimas nor the imposition of a criminal punishment on a member of the Seimas is decided. At the same time, it should be noted that the decision of the Seimas to abolish the personal immunity of a member of the Seimas with a view to holding him/her criminally liable, detaining him/her, or restricting his/her liberty otherwise gives rise to certain legal consequences for such a member of the Seimas and, in certain cases, determines a change in his/her legal status: the member of the Seimas may be held criminally liable or be detained, or may have his/her liberty restricted otherwise following the adoption of the decision to abolish his/her personal immunity.

The additional guarantees of the personal immunity of a member of the Seimas, which are consolidated in the provisions of Paragraphs 1 and 2 of Article 62 of the Constitution and are necessary for the proper performance of his/her duties, are established in order that he/she is protected from persecution on political or other grounds due to his/her activity as a member of the Seimas; this immunity is not granted in order to create the preconditions for a member of the Seimas who is suspected to have committed a crime to escape criminal responsibility. The Seimas, when establishing and following the procedure for abolishing the personal immunity of a member of the Seimas, is also bound by the fact that, by means of crimes, inter alia, those of committing which a member of the Seimas is suspected, “The rights and freedoms of people, as well as the most significant good protected by law” may be grossly violated (ruling of 13 December 1993), as well as by the fact that the striving for an open, just, and harmonious civil society and a state under the rule of law, as consolidated in the Preamble to the Constitution, and the general imperative (expressed in Article 28 of the Constitution) of observing the Constitution and laws means, inter alia, that crimes must be prevented, all committed crimes must be solved, and culprits must be brought to justice. Thus, a legal regulation governing the procedure for abolishing the personal immunity of a member of the Seimas must be such that, in the event that there are grounds for holding a member of the Seimas criminally liable, there would be no preconditions for the member of the Seimas to escape criminal responsibility, since, otherwise, the administration of justice would be precluded. Under the Constitution, inter alia, Paragraph 2 of Article 1 of Article 62 thereof, and the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law, the Seimas must establish such a legal regulation governing the procedure for abolishing the personal immunity of a member of the Seimas that would meet the requirements of the due process of law, as, for instance: issues concerning the rights and/or the guarantees of activity of a member of the Seimas must be decided while ensuring his/her right and possibility of defending such rights and guarantees; a member of the Seimas, when the issue of abolishing his/her immunity is decided, must be ensured the right to be heard at least once directly or through a person authorised by him/her. In view of the fact that the consent of the Seimas to holding a member of the Seimas criminally liable, to detaining him/her, or to restricting his/her liberty otherwise opens up the possibility of continuing criminal proceedings, the Seimas, when regulating the procedure for giving such consent, may link the procedure for considering the question of abolishing the immunity of a member of the Seimas with the principles of criminal proceedings (with the requirements determined by such principles).

Requirements for a legal regulation governing the payment of remuneration for the work of a member of the Seimas (inter alia, in cases where a member of the Seimas fails to attend the sittings of both the Seimas and its structural subunits)

The Constitutional Court’s ruling (no KT26-N13/2016) of 5 October 2016

... under Paragraph 3 of Article 60 of the Constitution, the work of the members of the Seimas, as well as expenses relating to their parliamentary activities, is remunerated from the state budget. Thus, under Paragraph 4 of Article 60 of the Constitution, the Seimas, while regulating, by means of a law, one of the guarantees of the parliamentary activity of a member of the Seimas – the payment of remuneration for the work of a member of the Seimas – must also pay regard to the imperatives, which arise from the Constitution, concerning the use of the funds of the state budget.

... the concept of the procedure for the proper possession, use, and disposal of state-owned property, inter alia, the funds of the state budget, which is implied by of the Constitution, inter alia, by Paragraph 2 of Article 128 thereof, and the constitutional principle of responsible governance give rise to the imperative of ensuring, by means of a law, the reasonable use of the funds of the state budget allocated for the remuneration of the members of the Seimas.

Thus, the Constitution, inter alia, Paragraph 3 of Article 60 thereof, and the constitutional principle of responsible governance give rise to the duty of the legislature to comply with the following requirements ... in the course of regulating the payment of remuneration for the work of the members of the Seimas:

- the work of the members of the Seimas, as provided for in Paragraph 3 of Article 60 of the Constitution, is remunerated from the state budget; the main form of this work is participation in the sittings of the Seimas, as well as the sittings of the committees or other structural subunits of the Seimas to which the members of the Seimas are appointed according to the procedure prescribed in the Statute of the Seimas;
- the episodic fulfilment of the constitutional powers (such as drafting laws and other legal acts of the Seimas, meeting with voters, or performing parliamentary activities in other ways) of a member of the Seimas (or continuous fulfilment of such powers only in part) where such a member of the Seimas, without an important and justifiable reason, denies the constitutional duty of a member of the Seimas to attend the sittings of the committees or other structural subunits of the Seimas to which he/she is appointed according to the procedure prescribed in the Statute of the Seimas, where such sittings, as mentioned before, is the main form of the work of a member of the Seimas, i.e. when such a member of the Seimas is regularly absent from such sittings without an important and justifiable reason, may not be regarded as proper implementation by the member of the Seimas of his/her constitutional duty to represent the Nation, i.e. the duty for the implementation of which the members of the Seimas are remunerated under Paragraph 3 of Article 60 of the Constitution.

In the context of the constitutional justice case at issue, it should also be noted that the legislature, when implementing the duty, which stems from the Constitution, inter alia, Paragraph 4 of Article 60 thereof, to regulate, by means of a law, one of the guarantees of the parliamentary activity of a member of the Seimas – the payment of remuneration for the work of a member of the Seimas, inter alia, when establishing the amount of such remuneration and the procedure of the payment thereof, must take into consideration the aforementioned constitutional imperatives, which imply the constitutional duty of a member of the Seimas, inter alia, to attend the sittings of the Seimas, as well as the sittings of the committees or other structural subunits of the Seimas to which such a member of the Seimas is appointed according to the procedure prescribed in the Statute of the Seimas; the legislature must establish the financial consequences for continuous failure to carry out the said constitutional duty without an important and justifiable reason. The legislature has the discretion to establish various amounts of the reduction of the remuneration of a member of the Seimas (fixed amounts by which the remuneration of the members of the Seimas is reduced), the subject (all the Seimas or its structural subunit) that applies such amounts in accordance with a certain procedure in a specific situation, and various grounds for reducing the remuneration of a member of the Seimas, inter alia, in cases where a member of the Seimas without an important and justifiable reason continuously fails to attend the sittings of the Seimas, as well as the sittings of the committees or other structural subunits of the Seimas to which such a member of the Seimas is appointed according to the procedure prescribed in the Statute of the Seimas.

In this context, it should be noted that, when regulating the payment of remuneration for the work of a member of the Seimas in cases where such a member of the Seimas without an important and justifiable reason continuously fails to attend the sittings of the Seimas, as well as the sittings of the committees or other structural subunits of the Seimas to which he/she is appointed according to the procedure prescribed in the Statute of the Seimas, the legislature must also pay attention to the fact that, as it was held in the Constitutional Court's ruling of 25 January 2001, the recognition of parliamentary opposition is a necessary element of pluralistic democracy; the parliament must take into account the principle of the protection of the minority (ruling of 26 November 1993 and 25 January 2001). Therefore, the open non-attendance of the sittings of the Seimas by the members of the Seimas, as well as the sittings of the committees or other structural subunits of the Seimas to which they are appointed according to the procedure prescribed in the Statute of the Seimas, where such non-attendance is based on views and political objectives of the parliamentary opposition, i.e. where such non-attendance constitutes obstruction as a type of political protest and a method of parliamentary activity in an attempt to prevent the adoption of a decision that is not acceptable to the minority, under the Constitution, in certain situations, may be regarded as a rather important reason for not attending such sittings unless such non-attendance is regular.

It should also be noted that the payment of remuneration from the funds of the state budget to such a member of the Seimas who denies the constitutional duty of a member of the Seimas to attend the sittings of the Seimas, or the sittings of the committees or other structural subunits of the Seimas to which he/she is appointed according to the procedure prescribed in the Statute of the Seimas, where such sittings, as mentioned before, is the main form of the work of a member of the Seimas, i.e. when such a member of the Seimas is regularly absent from such sittings without an important and justifiable reason, should be considered a constitutionally unjustified privilege.

The duty of a member of the Seimas to respect the constitutional rights and freedoms of other persons (on harassment as discriminatory conduct degrading human dignity, see 2. The constitutional status of persons, 2.1. General provisions, 2.1.2. The principle of the equality (of the rights) of persons, the conclusion of 19 December 2017)

... the requirements, arising from the oath of a member of the Seimas and from the constitutional status of a member of the Seimas, to respect and observe the Constitution and laws, to perform the duties of a representative of the Nation in good faith, to act in the interests of the Nation and the State of Lithuania, and to refrain from conduct degrading the reputation and authority of the Seimas – the representation of the Nation also determine the duty to respect the human rights consolidated and protected by the Constitution and not to use the constitutional status of a member of the Seimas as a representative of the Nation in order to violate the constitutional rights and freedoms of other persons.

The constitutional nature of the Seimas as the state authority institution, through which the Nation exercises its supreme sovereign power, and the particularities of the constitutional status of a member of the Seimas as a representative of the Nation (this status ... is different from the legal status of all other citizens) determine the fact that the actions of a member of the Seimas that violate the constitutional rights or freedoms of other persons, especially if they are carried out using the constitutional status of a member of the Seimas, regardless of whether such conduct of the member of the Seimas is related to his/her parliamentary activities, can grossly violate the Constitution and breach the oath of a member of the Seimas, as well as degrade the reputation and authority of the Seimas – the representation of the Nation.

... due to the nature of harassment, which is discriminatory and degrading human dignity, as well as due to the consequences of harassment, such conduct of a member of the Seimas that may be considered to be harassment inevitably undermines the reputation and authority of the Seimas – the representation of the Nation and discredits state authority irrespective of whether the said conduct of a member of the Seimas is related to his/her parliamentary activities or the use of his/her constitutional status. The conduct of a member of the Seimas that is discriminatory and degrading human dignity and can be regarded as harassment based on gender, inter alia, as sexual harassment, should be considered a gross violation of the Constitution, inter alia, the provisions of Paragraphs 1, 2, and 3 of Article 21, Paragraphs 1 and 4 of Article 22, and Article 29 thereof, as well as a breach of the oath of a member of the Seimas.

The period of the validity of the oath of a member of the Seimas (Paragraphs 1 and 2 of Article 59 and Article 63 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's conclusion of 22 December 2017

Interpreting the provisions of Paragraphs 1 and 2 of Article 59 and the provisions of Article 63 of the Constitution ... it needs to be noted that the beginning of the exercise of the powers of a member of the Seimas as a representative of the Nation is linked to taking the oath of a member of the Seimas, which is specified in the Constitution: a member of the Seimas acquires all the rights of a representative of the Nation only after he/she has taken the oath; the taken oath binds a member of the Seimas as a representative of the Nation during all the duration of his/her term of powers, i.e. from the moment when he/she, having taken the oath to the Republic of Lithuania under the Constitution in the Seimas, acquires all the rights of a representative of the Nation until the moment when his/her powers as a member of the Seimas cease on any of the grounds set out in Article 63 of the Constitution, inter alia, when, after the expiry of the term of powers (incumbency) of the member of the Seimas, the newly elected Seimas convenes for the first sitting (Item 1 of Article 63 of the Constitution). Therefore, under the Constitution, after the cessation of the powers of a member of the Seimas, the oath of the member of the Seimas taken by him/her is no longer binding.

The free mandate of a member of the Seimas (Paragraph 4 of Article 59 of the Constitution)

... interpreting the constitutional principle of the free mandate of a member of the Seimas in the context of the concept of a pluralistic democracy, which is consolidated in the Constitution, it needs to be noted that, under the Constitution, a member of the Seimas may have and freely express convictions that are different from those of the majority of members of the Seimas; inter alia, a member of the Seimas is not obliged to adopt the same concept of state interests that is held by the majority of members of the Seimas. Therefore, under the Constitution, a member of the Seimas, as a representative of the Nation, may communicate with various people, inter alia, with people whose views and convictions differ from those held by the majority of members of the Seimas or the majority of members of society. However, in view of the constitutional concept of the free mandate of a member of the Seimas, when communicating with other people, a member of the Seimas, as a representative of the Nation, must follow the interests of the Nation and the State of Lithuania, which are oriented towards the Constitution and the values protected under the Constitution, rather than his/her own interests or the interests of his/her close persons, political parties, organisations, or interest groups, or other personal, private, or group interests, inter alia, the interests of another state or persons related to that state that are contrary to the interests of the Republic of Lithuania.

The duty of a member of the Seimas to protect state secrets (other classified information) that become known to a member of the Seimas in the course of performing the duties of a representative of the Nation

... the constitutionally established oath of a member of the Seimas, as consolidated in Article 5 of the Law on the Procedure for the Entry into Force of the Constitution of the Republic of Lithuania, and the constitutional status of a member of the Seimas, as consolidated, inter alia, in Paragraphs 2 and 4 of Article 59 of the Constitution, give rise to the duties of a member of the Seimas, inter alia, to be loyal to the Republic of Lithuania, respect and observe the Constitution and laws, conscientiously perform the duties of a representative of the Nation, and act in the interests of the Nation and the State of Lithuania.

These constitutional duties of a member of the Seimas imply, inter alia, the duty to protect state secrets that become known to a member of the Seimas in the course of performing his/her duties of a representative of the Nation. ...

Under the Constitution, the state has the duty to guarantee not only the protection of the secrecy of information constituting a state secret, but also the protection of the secrecy of certain other information, in particular that there would be no arbitrary and unlawful attempts to find out or impart such information whose disclosure could inflict damage on the rights and freedoms, as well as legitimate interests, of a person and on other values consolidated, defended, and protected by the Constitution (rulings of 15 May 2007 and 7 July 2011 and the decision of 3 July 2013).

In this context, it should be noted that certain requirements are raised for a person who is granted the right to access information constituting a state secret; such requirements are related to the reliability of a person and his/her loyalty to the State of Lithuania, which should be linked with the trust of the state in that person (rulings of 15 May 2007 and 7 July 2011 and the decision of 3 July 2013); when state institutions decide whether a person has the right to work with or access information that constitutes a state secret (or other classified information), it is necessary to pay regard to the imperative that, in order that a person would have such a right, the state must have unconditional trust in him/her (rulings of 15 May 2007 and 7 July 2011).

Thus ... under the Constitution, the condition of undoubted reliability and loyalty to the State of Lithuania is imposed on those members of the Seimas to whom a state secret can become known in the course of carrying out their duties (such information not to be disclosed and not to be imparted whose disclosure could cause harm to the state, as the common good of the entire society, and the political organisation of the entire society, i.e. could violate the most important relationships regulated, defended, and protected under the Constitution).

As the Constitutional Court has noted on more than one occasion, the distrust by the state of a certain person can be determined by the activities of that person, inter alia, by the committed violations of law, as well as by the personal qualities of that person, his/her relationships, and other important circumstances; authorisation to access state secrets may be granted only to such persons whose activities, personal qualities, relationships, etc. cannot give grounds for concerns that, once a state secret becomes known to them, a threat will be posed to, or even damage will be inflicted on, the sovereignty of the state, its territorial integrity, constitutional order, or defence power, or other especially important state interests or the foundations of the life of society and the state, or there will be violations of the most important relationships that are regulated, defended, and protected by the Constitution and whose protection and defence must specifically be facilitated by the fact that certain information is classified in accordance with laws (rulings of 15 May 2007 and 7 July 2011).

Thus ... the reliability and loyalty to the State of Lithuania of the members of the Seimas to whom a state secret can become known when they are carrying out their duties must be assessed in the light of all important circumstances that characterise the person of a member of the Seimas, inter alia, his/her activities, professional and personal qualities, reputation, relationships with other persons, as well as the violations of law committed by him/her. It should be noted that one of the most important qualities of a person to whom a state secret can become known in the course of carrying out duties is his/her integrity, which should be assessed, inter alia, by providing the state institutions that make a decision on whether the person has the right to work with or access information constituting a state secret (or other classified information) with all information about his/her relationships with other persons with whom communication can affect the protection of state interests, inter alia, the protection of state secrets.

... the constitutional duty of a member of the Seimas to protect state secrets, as well as ... requirement, which stems from the oath and constitutional status of a member of the Seimas, that a member of the Seimas must act in good faith, determines the duty of a member of the Seimas to provide, in a fair manner, the state institutions that make a decision on whether the person has the right to work with or access information constituting a state secret (or other classified information) with all the required information, inter alia, information about his/her relationships with other persons with whom communication can affect the protection of state interests, inter alia, the protection of state secrets. Failure to fulfil this duty can give grounds for doubting the integrity of the member of the Seimas (inter alia, in his/her fulfilment of other duties of a representative of the Nation), his/her acting in the interests of the Nation and the State of Lithuania, his/her respect for the Constitution and laws, and thus his/her loyalty to the Republic of Lithuania; the unfair provision of information to the state institutions that make a decision regarding the right to work with or access information constituting a state secret (or other classified information) can also lead to a situation in which a person who is not reliable and loyal to the State of Lithuania will be able to access a state secret and, thereby, pose a threat to the protection of state secrets and, thus, also to the values consolidated and protected by the Constitution.

5.4. THE STRUCTURE OF THE SEIMAS

The structure of the Seimas; political groups in the Seimas

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 26 November 1993

The principles of the equality of the members of the parliament and a free mandate must also be followed in forming the internal structures of parliament. As a rule, structures of two types are formed in parliaments: committees (or commissions) and political groups (or groups of members of the parliament). The former structures are formed on the basis of the specialisation principle of parliamentary activities; this principle ensures the due professional preparation of issues and parliamentary hearing on these issues. The structures of the second group help to realise political orientations and goals of the members of the parliament (not necessarily on the basis of their party membership) as well as to ensure the organised relation of political groups with political parties and organisations represented in parliament.

In determining the internal structure of parliament, the universal principles of its formation must be chosen where such principles would ensure the equal and real opportunities for all the members of the parliament to participate in the formed structural units. Otherwise, not all the members of the parliament would have the opportunity of exercising the additional rights established for the said structural units, which would mean the violation of the principle of the equality of all the members of parliament. Political groups are subunits of the structure of the Seimas; therefore, the establishment of the procedure of their formation, their rights and duties are the prerogative of parliament, determined by its self-dependence within the limits of the Constitution. Though political groups are mostly formed on the basis of party membership, their most essential mission is to ensure the working capacity of the parliament as well as its normal functioning. ... political groups in parliament are formed only by the members of the parliament in accordance with the procedure for their formation that is prescribed by parliament (most frequently, they are formed on the basis of views and political goals), but not by political parties, political organisations, or their coalitions. Though political groups are in close relation with political parties, this does not mean that a political group is a political party in the Seimas or that each party that has its representatives in the Seimas is a political group at the same time. This conclusion is derived from the principle of a free mandate, which is consolidated in the Constitution.

In determining the procedure of the formation of political groups, the total number of the members of the parliament, the nature of the rights and duties of political groups, as consolidated in the Statute, the necessity to guarantee equal possibilities for all to express views and political goals, the principle of the defence of the minority, minimal requirements for the protection of parliamentary opposition, should be taken into consideration. Furthermore, in cases of forming the governing body of parliament, when committees are set up and their heads are appointed, funds are distributed, and other parliamentary functions are realised, the cases where minor political groups find themselves in a better position than major ones, should be prevented. However, when applying the said criteria, the principle of a free mandate of a parliament member may not be violated. A decision of the parliament whereby the rights of the members of the parliament to participate in the parliamentary process are differentiated violates the rights of a member of the parliament as a representative of the Nation.

The equality of the members of the Seimas in forming political groups on the basis of views and political goals is an important element of the implementation of the principle of a free mandate. Since a political group (i.e. the members of the parliament who are registered with it) has more opportunities to participate in the activities of the parliament than a member of the Seimas who does not belong to any political group, it must be ensured that all the members of the Seimas have the opportunity freely to choose and form political groups. Seeking to ensure the working capacity and effectiveness of the Seimas, it is important to establish the minimum number of the members of a political group.

It would be possible to guarantee the rights and possibilities of those members of the Seimas who do not register themselves as political groups, where the said rights and possibilities are equal with those of other members of the Seimas and allow the implementation of the rights of a representative of the Nation, by recognising that they are members of a mixed political group and that such a political group has equal rights with other political groups.

Parliamentary opposition

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 25 January 2001

The recognition of parliamentary opposition is a necessary element of pluralistic democracy. The Statute of the Seimas must establish guarantees for opposition activities.

The discretion of the Seimas to establish its own structure; ad hoc investigation commissions of the Seimas

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 13 May 2004

The Seimas consists of representatives of the Nation – 141 members of the Seimas (Paragraph 1 of Article 55 of the Constitution). Legal acts must establish the structure of the Seimas and the procedure of its work in order that the Seimas, the representation of the Nation, would be able to perform its constitutional functions.

Article 76 of the Constitution provides that the structure and procedure of activities of the Seimas are established by the Statute of the Seimas and that the Statute of the Seimas has the force of a law. Under Paragraph 2 of Article 70 of the Constitution, the Statute of the Seimas is signed by the Speaker of the Seimas.

Thus, as the Seimas, under the Constitution, has the discretion to establish its own structure, it also has the discretion to form its structural subunits and the discretion to establish the names of its structural subunits, their competence, composition, interrelations among them, their term of activity, as well as to formulate certain tasks for them. While establishing all this, the Seimas is bound by the norms and principles of the Constitution.

... the Seimas has the constitutional powers to form structural subunits whose term of activities is not defined in advance, i.e. its permanent structural subunits, as well as such structural subunits that are assigned only to solve a certain issue (or certain issues) and cease their activity after they solve the said issue (or issues), i.e. provisional (ad hoc) structural subunits.

... as the Seimas has the powers in every case, when it becomes necessary to decide a certain issue falling under the constitutional competence of the Seimas, to seek the exhaustive and objective information needed to adopt particular decisions, it also has discretion to form such its structural subunits that would be assigned to conduct research in order to obtain exhaustive and objective information about the processes taking place in the state and society and about the situation in various areas of the life of the state and society.

The fact that, under the Constitution, the structure of the Seimas and the procedure for its work are established by the Statute of the Seimas, as well as that the Statute of the Seimas is signed by the Speaker of the Seimas, inter alia, means that the Seimas, while paying regard to the Constitution, has the right to decide, by itself, the questions of the formation of its structural subunits and those of their competence and organisation of their work, and that no other state institution may interfere with these constitutional powers of the Seimas.

At the same time, it needs to be noted that it is impossible to interpret the provision “The structure and procedure of activities of the Seimas shall be established by the Statute of the Seimas” of Article 76 of the Constitution only linguistically, i.e. as meaning that the powers of the structural subunits of the Seimas may be established only in the Statute of the Seimas. For instance, in order that it could properly perform its constitutional functions, the Seimas may also require to form such its structural subunits that would have the powers in respect of various state or municipal institutions, their officials, or other persons. In the context of the case at issue, it needs to be noted that such powers may also be related to the receipt of information from state or municipal institutions, their officials and other persons about the processes taking place in the state and society, about the situation in various spheres of life of the state and society and arising problems. It needs to be emphasised that the receipt of this information may not be dependent on the fact whether or not particular institutions or other persons are accountable to the Seimas: in order to receive exhaustive and objective information necessary to adopt the respective decisions, the Seimas, as the representation of the Nation, must have an opportunity to receive information not only from institutions, other persons that are accountable to it, but also from persons that are not accountable to it. Where it is necessary to establish the authoritative empowerments of a structural subunit of the Seimas in regard of the institutions, their officials, or other persons that are not accountable to the Seimas (including the right to demand the information the submission whereof is regulated in laws), such powers of the structural subunit of the Seimas must be established by means of a law. In establishing such powers, the norms and principles of the Constitution must be complied with.

It should also be noted that certain questions linked with the formation of the structural subunits of the Seimas, the establishment of their competence, the formation of their composition, or the formulation of tasks to them may be decided by means of substatory legal acts of the Seimas. Such substatory legal acts of the Seimas may not be in conflict with laws, as well as with the Statute of the Seimas. If a substatory act of the Seimas sets the powers of a structural subunit of the Seimas in regard of state or municipal institutions, their officials, and other persons, the provisions of such a substatory act of the Seimas must be based on the provisions of laws.

It needs to be emphasised that, under the Constitution, the Seimas, having formed a certain structural subunit, having established its powers, having set certain tasks to it, also has the right, in accordance with the procedure established in legal acts, to assess the activities of such its structural subunit and the results of the said activities, irrespective of the fact whether such a structural subunit is permanent or provisional (ad hoc). The Seimas has the discretion to decide on the form of assessing the activities of its structural subunit and the results of such activities. For instance, the Seimas may decide whether or not to give its assent to the activities of its structural subunit or the results of the said activities, or whether to give its assent to such activities only in part (with reservations); the Seimas may state whether a structural subunit formed by it has performed the tasks set to it, or whether it failed to perform them, or whether it performed them only in part, etc.

Thus, under the Constitution, the Seimas has the right to assess both the activity of an ad hoc investigation commission formed by it and a conclusion made by this commission The Seimas may express its opinion and point of view in various forms as regards a conclusion of an ad hoc investigation commission of the Seimas. For example, the Seimas may decide whether to give its assent or not to give its assent to a conclusion of an ad hoc investigation commission of the Seimas, or to give its assent to such a conclusion in part (with reservations); the Seimas may state that an ad hoc investigation commission formed by it has performed the tasks that have been formulated to it, or that it has not performed them, or that it performed them in part; the Seimas may also state that an ad hoc investigation commission has finished its activity, or may decide to prolong the activities of such a commission, etc. It needs to be noted that a conclusion of an ad hoc investigation commission of the Seimas is not binding on the Seimas.

It is clear that the Seimas is not an institution of pretrial investigation, or the prosecution service, or a court. Therefore, it needs to be noted that the formulation of the opinion and point of view of the Seimas regarding a conclusion of an ad hoc investigation commission of the Seimas formed by it in a resolution of the Seimas may not be interpreted, under the Constitution, as the legal qualification of the actions that the said ad hoc commission has investigated, or the legal qualification of the decisions adopted by it on the issues that it was assigned to investigate, or the legal qualification of other circumstances that were elucidated by it. The Seimas, after it decides to give or not to give its assent to a conclusion of an ad hoc investigation commission of the Seimas, or to give its assent to such a conclusion in part (with reservations), does not adopt such a decision on the compliance of the said actions, decisions, and circumstances with legal acts that is binding on other state institutions (including the institutions of pretrial investigation, the prosecution service, courts), but it merely formulates its point of view as to a conclusion of the said ad hoc investigation commission. The resolution of the Seimas in which the opinion and point of view of the Seimas are formulated as to a conclusion of the Seimas ad hoc investigation commission that was formed by it is not binding on the institutions of pretrial investigation, the prosecution service, and courts.

The discretion of the Seimas to establish its own structure; the authoritative empowerments of a structural subunit of the Seimas with regard to the institutions, their officials, or other persons that are not accountable to the Seimas must be established by means of a law

In its ruling of 13 May 2004, the Constitutional Court held that, as the Seimas has the powers in every case, when it becomes necessary to decide a certain issue falling under the constitutional competence of the Seimas, to seek the exhaustive and objective information needed to adopt particular decisions, it also has the discretion to form such its structural subunits that would be assigned to conduct research in order to obtain exhaustive and objective information about the processes taking place in the state and society and about the situation in various areas of the life of the state and society. In the same ruling, the Constitutional Court also held that, as the Seimas, under the Constitution, has the discretion to establish its structure, it also has the discretion to form its structural subunits and the discretion to establish the names of its structural subunits, their competence, composition, interrelations among them, their term of activity, as well as to formulate certain tasks for them; while establishing this, the Seimas is bound by the norms and principles of the Constitution.

Under Article 76 of the Constitution, the structure and procedure of activities of the Seimas are established by the Statute of the Seimas, which has the force of a law. In this context, it should be mentioned that it is impossible to interpret only linguistically the provision that the structure and procedure of activities of the Seimas are established by the Statute of the Seimas, i.e. only as meaning that the powers of the structural subunits of the Seimas may be established only in the Statute of the Seimas; for instance, in order that it could perform its constitutional functions, the Seimas may also require to form such its structural subunits that would have the powers with regard to various state or municipal institutions, their officials, or other persons. Such powers may be related to the receipt of information from state or municipal institutions, their officials, or from other persons about the processes taking place in the state and society, as well as about the situation in various spheres of the life of the state and society and arising problems; the receipt of this information cannot be dependent on the fact whether or not particular institutions or other persons are accountable to the Seimas; where it is necessary to establish the authoritative empowerments of a structural subunit of the Seimas in regard of the institutions, their officials, or other persons that are not accountable to the Seimas (including the right to demand the information the submission whereof is regulated in laws), such powers of the structural subunit of the Seimas must be established by means of a law (ruling of 13 May 2004).

Ad hoc (provisional) investigation commissions of the Seimas (also see 5.2. The functions and powers of the Seimas, 5.2.1. General provisions, the ruling of 4 April 2006 (“The right of the Seimas to receive information that is necessary to exercise its constitutional powers”))

The Constitutional Court’s ruling of 4 April 2006

... in a democratic state under the rule of law, it is not allowed to deny the powers of the parliament – the representation of the Nation – to take measures, inter alia, to form the structural subunits of the parliament for this purpose, and to commission them to conduct necessary research in order to receive information about the processes taking place in the state and society, as well as about the situation in various areas of the life of the state and society and arising problems; otherwise, the proper fulfilment of the functions of the parliament – the representation of the Nation – and the adoption of necessary decisions would not be ensured. The said powers arise from the very essence of parliamentary democracy and are one of the features of parliamentarism. In the practice of the parliaments of democratic states under the rule of law, the possibility for parliaments to take measures in order to receive information about processes taking place in the state and society, as well as about the situation in various areas of the life of the state and society and arising problems is also implemented by means of such institutions as ad hoc commissions (which are assigned to conduct certain research) formed by parliaments, parliamentary hearings, deliberations, etc.

The institution of ad hoc commissions formed by the Seimas, inter alia, ad hoc investigation commissions, is also characteristic of the parliamentarism tradition of the State of Lithuania.

Under the Constitution, it is not permitted to establish any exhaustive (final) list of questions for the investigation of which the Seimas may form ad hoc investigation commissions: since the Seimas, as the representation of the Nation and the institution of legislation (performing ... not only the legislative but also various other functions), may pass laws and other legal acts regulating most varied social relationships, it can virtually form ad hoc investigation commissions designated for an investigation into most varied processes that take place in the state and society.

The principle of responsible governance is consolidated in the Constitution (rulings of 1 July 2004, 13 December 2004, and 2 June 2005). The Constitution does not imply any such activities of the Seimas where the Seimas collects all information necessary for legislation and other functions of the Seimas by itself, by not relying on the information submitted to it by other state institutions, and where the formation of ad hoc or similar commissions and investigation performed by them prevail in the activities of the Seimas. Quite to the contrary, the Constitution implies the institution of ad hoc investigation commissions of the Seimas and the legal regulation of the formation of such commissions and of their activities where the said ad hoc investigation commissions are formed not in order to investigate any types of questions, but only special questions, i.e. those of state importance. The powers of ad hoc investigation commissions of the Seimas should be related to the constitutional mission and functions of the Seimas.

The Constitution does not imply the possibility of forming any such ad hoc investigation commissions of the Seimas that would be assigned to carry out an investigation into such matters that institutions of public power, under the Constitution, may not investigate at all, as, for example, the circumstances of the private or family life of an individual if such an investigation unreasonably interferes with the private life of an individual, which is defended and protected under the Constitution, if the inviolability of private life is violated, etc.

The constitutional principle of the separation of powers and other provisions of the Constitution make it possible to draw the conclusion that the Seimas has no powers to form any such ad hoc investigation commissions that would be assigned to carry out an investigation into the matters in the course of the investigation of which the powers of other institutions that exercise public power, as well as the powers of other state and municipal institutions provided for in the Constitution and/or laws, would be interfered with. For example, an ad hoc investigation commission of the Seimas cannot take over the constitutional powers of courts or otherwise interfere with the implementation of the constitutional competence of courts, nor may it violate the independence of judges and courts in the administration of justice, let alone administer justice by itself; an ad hoc investigation commission of the Seimas may not take over the constitutional powers of prosecutors or otherwise interfere with the implementation of the constitutional competence of prosecutors, nor may it violate the independence of a prosecutor when he/she organises and directs a pretrial investigation and upholds charges on behalf of the state in criminal cases (ruling of 13 May 2004).

However, the fact that ad hoc investigation commissions of the Seimas may not be assigned to carry out an investigation into the matters in the course of investigation of which the powers of other institutions that exercise public power, as well as the powers of other state and municipal institutions provided for in the Constitution and/or laws, would be interfered with does not mean that ad hoc investigation commissions of the Seimas cannot have any powers with regard to state or municipal institutions, their officials, and other persons at all. Such powers may be established by means of a law and by paying regard to the Constitution.

The formation of ad hoc (provisional) investigation commissions of the Seimas

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 4 April 2006

... the nature of ad hoc investigation commissions of the Seimas as structural subunits of the Seimas implies that an initiative of forming such a commission may arise only in the Seimas, i.e. only members of the Seimas may express it. Thus, under the Constitution, it is not allowed to establish any such a legal regulation whereby the formation of an ad hoc investigation commission of the Seimas is initiated not by the members of the Seimas, but by other subjects.

The Seimas, when regulating, by means of legal acts, the formation of ad hoc investigation commissions of the Seimas, may establish the ways and organisational forms for the members of the Seimas by using which they can express an initiative to form an ad hoc investigation commission of the Seimas; the Seimas may establish, inter alia, that such an initiative can be expressed by certain Seimas structural subunits (e.g. political groups, committees) and/or a group of a certain number of the members of the Seimas. ... it should be noted that, in view of the fact that ad hoc investigation commissions of the Seimas can be formed for an investigation into not any, but only special questions, i.e. those of state importance, the said group of members of the Seimas should be sufficiently large; on the other hand, the establishment of a too large number of the members of the Seimas constituting such a group would groundlessly restrict the possibilities for the members of the Seimas to initiate the formation of ad hoc investigation commissions of the Seimas in order that the Seimas could receive information about processes taking place in the state and society, as well as about the situation in various spheres of life of the state and society and arising problems, where such information is necessary so that the Seimas – the representation of the Nation would effectively act in the interests of the Nation and the State of Lithuania.

Taking account of the fact that the Constitution implies the protection of the parliamentary minority and the minimum requirements of the protection of the Seimas opposition (rulings of 26 November 1993 and 25 January 2001), as well as the fact that the recognition of the parliamentary opposition is a necessary element of pluralist democracy (ruling of 25 January 2001), it is also possible to establish such a legal regulation whereby the Seimas opposition might initiate the formation of ad hoc investigation commissions.

As such, the statement about the initiative to form an ad hoc investigation commission of the Seimas, regardless of who expressed it, does not imply the formation of such a commission. It needs to be emphasised that an ad hoc investigation commission of the Seimas is a subject formed by the entire Seimas, but not by its part, not by a structural subunit of the Seimas or by a group of members of the Seimas; the powers of an ad hoc investigation commission of the Seimas may stem only from an act of the Seimas as the representation of the Nation, i.e. from the expression of the will of the Seimas, but not from the expression of the will or intention of a certain subunit of the Seimas or of a group of members of the Seimas. Due to this, it is only the Seimas that can decide on whether or not to form an ad hoc investigation commission on a certain issue, it is only the Seimas that can establish its composition, tasks, etc. – no one else can express such will for the Seimas, i.e. neither any structural subunit of the Seimas nor any group of members of the Seimas.

The majority principle is among the democratic principles of adopting decisions (ruling of 22 July 1994). The political will of the majority of the members of the Seimas is reflected in decisions adopted by the Seimas (conclusion of 31 March 2004). It needs to be emphasised that, under the Constitution, the will of the Seimas regarding the formation of an ad hoc investigation commission of the Seimas cannot be expressed otherwise than by vote of the members of the Seimas at a sitting of the Seimas and the adoption of the respective substatutory legal act. The Constitutional Court has held that the substatutory acts of the Seimas whereby questions related to the formation of the structural subunits of the Seimas (thus, including ad hoc investigation commissions of the Seimas), their competence, and composition may not be in conflict with laws, as well as with the Statute of the Seimas, and that, if a substatutory act of the Seimas sets the powers of a structural subunit of the Seimas (thus, including an ad hoc investigation commission of the Seimas) with regard to state or municipal institutions, their officials, and other persons, the provisions of such a substatutory act of the Seimas must be based on the provisions of laws (ruling of 13 May 2004).

In each particular case, before deciding on the formation of an ad hoc investigation commission, the Seimas must deliberate and assess whether or not such an ad hoc investigation commission of the Seimas can be formed according to the Constitution and laws. The Seimas must deliberate and assess, inter alia, the following: whether the issue due to which the formation of an ad hoc investigation commission of the Seimas is proposed is really of state importance; whether it is proposed that the said ad hoc investigation commission of the Seimas be assigned to carry out an investigation into such matters that the institutions of public power may not investigate at all under the Constitution; whether it is proposed that this ad hoc investigation commission of the Seimas be assigned to carry out an investigation into the matters in the course of investigation of which the powers of other institutions that exercise public power, as well as the powers of other state and municipal institutions provided for in the Constitution and/or laws, would be interfered with.

Before deciding on the formation of an ad hoc investigation commission, the Seimas may also assess (inter alia, also from the aspect of expediency) whether there are any circumstances that would justify the non-forming of such a commission, as, for instance: whether a certain question has already been investigated or whether it is under investigation by an ad hoc investigation commission of the Seimas or by another institution, whether particular work may be performed by a structural subunit of the Seimas, which is already established and is acting, etc.

It needs to be emphasised that the Seimas, when forming an ad hoc investigation commission of the Seimas, must pay regard to the imperative of the protection of the Seimas minority and the minimum requirements of the protection of the Seimas opposition. The said imperative and requirements stem from the Constitution and imply, inter alia, that an ad hoc investigation commission of the Seimas may not be formed only from the representatives of the political majority of the Seimas, without including representatives from the minority (opposition) if they so request. It should also be emphasised that in the course of forming an ad hoc investigation commission of the Seimas regard must be paid to the will and interest of the initiators of forming the commission in order to investigate precisely the question formulated by them and it must be ensured that the initiators are properly represented in the ad hoc investigation commission of the Seimas.

It needs to be noted that in the course of forming ad hoc investigation commissions of the Seimas regard must be paid to the principle of the free mandate of a member of the Seimas, which is consolidated in the Constitution, inter alia, in Paragraph 4 of Article 59 thereof. The said principle is one of the guarantees of the independence of the activities of the members of the Seimas and their equal rights. The principle of the free mandate of a member of the Seimas, which is consolidated in the Constitution, gives rise to the right of a member of the Seimas to vote at his/her discretion in the course of adopting any decision of the Seimas, i.e. to vote on each issue according to his/her conscience.

The principle of the free mandate of a member of the Seimas implies that a member of the Seimas, when he/she, together with other members of the Seimas, initiates the formation of an ad hoc investigation commission of the Seimas, participates in the adoption of a resolution of the Seimas on the formation of an ad hoc investigation commission of the Seimas, participates in the activities of such an ad hoc investigation commission of the Seimas, and participates in the adoption of a resolution of the Seimas on the activities of the said ad hoc investigation commission and assessment of the results of its activities, must follow only the Constitution, the interests of the state, as well as his/her own conscience (Paragraph 4 of Article 59 of the Constitution) – such freedom of a member of the Seimas may not be restricted by the mandate of the electorate, or by any political or other demands of the political parties or organisations that nominated him/her, or by the will of other members of the Seimas. It should be mentioned that the members of the Seimas may not be persecuted for their votes or speeches at the Seimas (however, they may be held liable for personal insult or defamation) (Paragraph 3 of Article 62 of the Constitution).

... in cases where the question for an investigation into which the formation of an ad hoc investigation commission of the Seimas is proposed is really of state importance and there are not any circumstances due to which such a commission may not be formed under the Constitution and laws, and if there are no other circumstances that would justify the non-forming of such a commission, the free mandate of the members of the Seimas must be used in such a way that would make it possible for the Seimas to act effectively in the interests of the Nation and the State of Lithuania and to perform properly its constitutional obligation.

... the principle of responsible governance is consolidated in the Constitution. The Seimas should not use its constitutional powers to form ad hoc investigation commissions in such a way whereby the Seimas would itself collect all information necessary for legislation and performance of its other functions and whereby the formation of ad hoc investigation or similar commissions and investigation conducted by them would prevail in the activities of the Seimas; as mentioned above in this ruling of the Constitutional Court, the Constitution does not imply any such activity of the Seimas. Otherwise, the preconditions might be created where certain circumstances would hinder the work of the parliament, would hinder the Seimas, the representation of the Nation, to act rationally and effectively in the interests of the Nation and the State of Lithuania.

It needs to be noted that, under the Constitution, each decision of the Seimas on forming an ad hoc investigation commission (decision on forming such a commission, a decision on non-forming such a commission, etc.), regardless of its expression (legal form), can be impugned before the Constitutional Court with regard to the compliance of this decision (act of the Seimas) with higher-ranking legal acts, inter alia (and, first of all), with the Constitution. Under the Constitution, the subjects specified in Paragraph 1 of Article 106 of the Constitution, inter alia, not less than 1/5 of all the members of the Seimas, i.e. a group of not less than 29 members of the Seimas, can do so.

The legal force of a conclusion given by an ad hoc (provisional) investigation commission of the Seimas

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 4 April 2006

... a conclusion of an ad hoc investigation commission of the Seimas is not binding on the Seimas. Under the Constitution, the Seimas, having formed an ad hoc investigation commission and having set certain tasks to it, also has the power to assess, according to the procedure established in legal acts, the activities of such an ad hoc investigation commission and the results of such activities. The Seimas has discretion to decide on the form of assessing the activities of its ad hoc investigation commission and the results of such activities. For instance, the Seimas may decide whether or not to give its assent to the activities of its ad hoc investigation commission or the results of the said activities, or whether to give its assent to such activities only in part (with reservations); the Seimas may state whether an ad hoc investigation commission formed by it has performed the tasks set to it, or whether it failed to perform them, or whether it performed them only in part, etc. (ruling of 13 May 2004).

The Seimas, after it decides to give its assent to a conclusion of an ad hoc investigation commission formed by it, does not adopt such a decision on the compliance of the investigated actions, decisions, and circumstances with legal acts that is binding on other state institutions (including institutions of pretrial investigation, the prosecution service, courts), but it merely formulates its point of view as to a conclusion of the said ad hoc investigation commission. As such, a conclusion (its individual statements) of an ad hoc investigation commission of the Seimas does not directly give rise to any legal effects for the persons indicated in it. Only decisions of other institutions and their officials, where such decisions may be adopted in view of a conclusion of an ad hoc investigation commission of the Seimas, may give rise to such legal effects (ruling of 13 May 2004).

The powers of ad hoc (provisional) investigation commissions of the Seimas

The Constitutional Court's decision of 21 November 2006

... the provisions of the Constitution imply broad powers of ad hoc investigation commissions of the Seimas; however, they also consolidate the limits on the investigation activity of ad hoc investigation commissions of the Seimas; the said limits may not be expanded by means of laws or other legal acts.

The Constitution demands, in an imperative manner, the establishment of such a legal regulation – first of all, legislative regulation – that, on the one hand, would ensure the activity of ad hoc investigation commissions of the Seimas that are assigned by the Seimas, the representation of the Nation, to conduct an investigation in order to collect information about certain processes taking place in the state and society, about the situation in various spheres of the life of the state and society and arising problems, and would, thus, also ensure the performance of the control function by the Seimas (parliamentary control) and, consequently, would ensure that there are no spheres in the life of the state in which the Seimas, the representation of the Nation, is prevented from exercising, by paying regard to the Constitution, parliamentary control (provided there is a special matter (of state importance)), and, on the other hand, would ensure that no harm would be inflicted on any values consolidated, defended, and protected by the Constitution if ad hoc investigation commissions of the Seimas are formed for an investigation into such matters that, under the Constitution, cannot be investigated by institutions of public power at all (for instance, the circumstances of the private or family life of an individual if such an investigation unreasonably, from the constitutional point of view, interferes with the private life of an individual, which is defended and protected under the Constitution, if the inviolability of private life is violated, etc.), or any such matters in the course of the investigation of which the powers of other state and municipal institutions (their officials) (inter alia, the powers of courts and prosecutors), which are provided for in the Constitution, would be interfered with. The legal regulation established in laws and other legal acts must be such that would ensure a rational balance between these two imperatives, which arise from the Constitution, and would ensure that none of the said imperatives would be ignored or sacrificed for another.

... as it was held in the Constitutional Court's ruling of 4 April 2006, under the Constitution, it is not permitted to establish any exhaustive (final) list of questions for the investigation of which the Seimas may form ad hoc investigation commissions; the Seimas, as the representation of the Nation, can virtually form ad hoc investigation commissions designated for an investigation into most varied processes that take place in the state and society.

At the same time, it needs to be noted that ad hoc investigation commissions of the Seimas can be formed for an investigation into not any, but only special questions, i.e. those of state importance (rulings of 13 May 2004 and 4 April 2006).

Thus, in general, provided there is a special matter (of state importance), the Constitution does not prohibit the Seimas from forming also such ad hoc investigation commissions that would be assigned to carry out an investigation into the activity of state or municipal institutions, i.e. into how the particular state or municipal institutions perform their functions defined in the Constitution and laws, and into how they implement the powers established in the Constitution and laws. In order to carry out such a task set by the Seimas, an ad hoc investigation commission of the Seimas also must have the possibility of receiving, under the procedure established in laws, information that is related to the organisation of work in the respective state or municipal institutions, irrespective of whether the decision on certain questions regarding, inter alia, the establishment of the structure of institutions, the establishment and liquidation of structural subunits, the appointment of employees to work, their release from office, their transfer to another position, their removal from duties, and other issues related to the career, legal status, etc. of the employees of institutions, falls, according to laws, within the competence of the heads of such institutions or whether other persons also take part in the adoption of such decisions. However, it needs to be emphasised that ad hoc investigation commissions of the Seimas may not be formed for the elucidation of only such specific questions as those mentioned above: an investigation into such questions may not be an objective in itself. The receipt of factual information about such matters may only serve as a means to elucidate special questions (of state importance).

Thus, both from the point of view of lawfulness and/or expediency, ad hoc investigation commissions of the Seimas may not be assigned to carry out an investigation and assessment of or exercise control over the decisions of the heads of state and municipal institutions as regards the professional career of persons who work in the respective institutions, since only the state and municipal institutions (their officials) that have the necessary powers may conduct such an investigation, assessment, and control and may adopt the respective decisions.

Ad hoc investigation commissions of the Seimas may be assigned to carry out an investigation and assessment of the decisions of the heads of state and municipal institutions, inter alia, as regards the structure of the respective institutions; however, such investigation and assessment must be conducted insofar as it is necessary in order to elucidate whether these decisions are such that the respective state or municipal institutions can properly perform their functions defined in the Constitution and laws and that they can implement the powers established for them in the Constitution and laws.

In this context, it needs to be noted that, as it was held in this decision of the Constitutional Court, under the Constitution, the control function carried out by the Seimas does not imply that the Seimas directly organises the work of other state or municipal institutions or may, at any time, interfere with the activity of any state or municipal institutions (their officials) that implement public power. The control function carried out by the Seimas also does not imply that the Seimas has the opportunity to adopt such decisions that can be adopted only by the state institutions (their officials) that have the respective competence.

No subunit of the Seimas, including ad hoc investigation commissions of the Seimas, may have any such powers.

It also needs to be noted that, as it was held in the Constitutional Court's ruling of 13 May 2004, "in order that it could properly perform its constitutional functions, the Seimas may also require to form such its structural subunits that would have the powers with regard to various state or municipal institutions, their officials, or other persons"; "such powers may also be related to the receipt of information from state or municipal institutions, their officials, or from other persons about the processes taking place in the state and society, about the situation in various spheres of the life of the state and society and arising problems"; "the receipt of this information may not be dependent on the fact whether or not particular institutions or other persons are accountable to the Seimas: in order to receive exhaustive and objective information necessary to adopt the respective decisions, the Seimas, as the representation of the Nation, must have the possibility of receiving information not only from institutions and other persons that are accountable to it, but also from persons that are not accountable to it"; "where it is necessary to establish the authoritative empowerments of a structural subunit of the Seimas in respect of the institutions, their officials, or other persons that are not accountable to the Seimas (including the right to demand the information the submission whereof is regulated in laws), such powers of the structural subunit of the Seimas must be established by means of a law"; "in establishing such powers, the norms and principles of the Constitution must be complied with".

It was also held in the Constitutional Court's ruling of 4 April 2006 that "the fact that ad hoc investigation commissions of the Seimas may not be assigned to carry out an investigation into the matters in the course of investigation of which the powers of other institutions that exercise public power, as well as the powers of other state and municipal institutions provided for in the Constitution and/or laws, would be interfered with does not mean that ad hoc investigation commissions of the Seimas cannot have any powers in respect of state or municipal institutions, their officials, and other persons at all"; "such powers may be established by means of a law and by paying regard to the Constitution".

The phrases "such powers of the structural subunit of the Seimas must be established by means of a law" and "such powers may be established by means of a law and by paying regard to the Constitution" used herein also mean that laws must expressis verbis, clearly and unambiguously, establish what authoritative empowerments an ad hoc commission of the Seimas has in respect of the institutions, their officials, or other persons who are not accountable to the Seimas. In establishing such powers, regard must be paid to the norms and principles of the Constitution, inter alia, to the official doctrinal provisions formulated in the Constitutional Court's acts in which the relevant provisions of the Constitution are interpreted.

It needs to be noted that the work of ad hoc investigation commissions of the Seimas must be regulated in order to receive the necessary information and to arrange the interrogation of the persons summoned to the sittings of ad hoc investigation commissions of the Seimas so that a preconceived opinion would not be formed by questions or comments presented by the members of that commission, that human dignity would not be degraded, that the right of a person to private life would not be violated, that only such questions or comments that are connected with the matter under investigation would be presented, and that questions would not be imaginary or provocative. In addition, if ad hoc investigation commissions of the Seimas receive such information the non-disclosure of which is defended and protected under the Constitution, it must be ensured that the said information is not made public or disclosed to the persons who, under the Constitution and laws, have no right to receive such information, since such disclosure would inflict damage on the values consolidated, defended, and protected under the Constitution.

In the light of the foregoing arguments ... it should be held that ... the provision "The constitutional principle of the separation of powers and other provisions of the Constitution make it possible to draw the conclusion that the Seimas has no powers to form any such ad hoc investigation commissions that would be assigned to carry out an investigation into the matters in the course of the investigation of which the powers of other institutions that exercise public power, as well as the powers of other state and municipal institutions provided for in the Constitution and/or laws, would be interfered with” ... of the Constitutional Court’s ruling of 4 April 2006 ... when it is interpreted in the context of the official constitutional doctrinal provisions of the Constitutional Court’s ruling of 4 April 2006 and of the Constitutional Court’s ruling of 13 May 2004, also means that:

- under the Constitution, the Seimas has the powers, provided there is a special matter (of state importance), also to form such ad hoc investigation commissions that would be assigned to carry out an investigation into the activity of state or municipal institutions, i.e. into how particular state or municipal institutions perform their functions defined in the Constitution and laws and into how they implement the powers established in the Constitution and laws; in order to carry out such a task set by the Seimas, an ad hoc investigation commission of the Seimas also must have the possibility of receiving, under the procedure established in laws, the information that is related to the organisation of work in particular state or municipal institutions, irrespective of whether the decision on certain questions regarding, inter alia, the establishment of the structure of institutions, the establishment and liquidation of structural subunits, the appointment of employees to work, their release from office, their transfer to another position, their removal from duties, and other issues related to the career, legal status, etc. of the employees of institutions, falls, according to laws, within the competence of the heads of such institutions or whether other persons also take part in the adoption of such decisions; however, ad hoc investigation commissions of the Seimas cannot be formed for the elucidation of only such specific questions as those mentioned above: the receipt of factual information about such matters may only serve as a means to elucidate special questions (of state importance);

- both from the point of view of lawfulness and/or expediency, ad hoc investigation commissions of the Seimas may not be assigned to carry out an investigation and assessment of or to exercise control over the decisions of the heads of state and municipal institutions as regards the professional career of persons who work in the respective institutions, since only the state and municipal institutions (their officials) that have the necessary powers may conduct such an investigation, assessment, and control and may adopt the respective decisions;

- ad hoc investigation commissions of the Seimas may be assigned to carry out an investigation and assessment of the decisions of the heads of state and municipal institutions, inter alia, as regards the structure of the respective institutions; however, such an investigation and assessment must be conducted insofar as it is necessary in order to elucidate whether these decisions are such that the respective state or municipal institutions can properly perform their functions defined in the Constitution and laws and that they can implement the powers established for them in the Constitution and laws;

- if ad hoc investigation commissions of the Seimas receive such information the non-disclosure of which is defended and protected under the Constitution, it must be ensured that the said information is not made public or disclosed to the persons who, under the Constitution and laws, have no right to receive such information, since such disclosure would inflict damage on the values consolidated, defended, and protected under the Constitution;

- it is not permitted that the legal regulation governing the activities of ad hoc investigation commissions of the Seimas would create the preconditions where an ad hoc investigation commission of the Seimas or the Seimas itself directly organises the work of other state or municipal institutions or interferes with the activity of state or municipal institutions (their officials), or adopts such decisions that can be adopted only by the state institutions (their officials) that have the respective competence.

The relationships of ad hoc (provisional) investigation commissions of the Seimas with prosecutors and the state institutions that conduct pretrial investigation and/or are the subjects of operational activities; the submission of information the non-disclosure of which is defended and protected under the Constitution to ad hoc (provisional) investigation commissions of the Seimas

... the official constitutional doctrinal provisions ... of the Constitutional Court's ruling of 13 May 2004 regarding the relationships of ad hoc investigation commissions of the Seimas with the Prosecution Service of the Republic of Lithuania (with prosecutors) ... are also mutatis mutandis applicable to the legal regulation of relationships between ad hoc investigation commissions of the Seimas and other state institutions (their officials) that, according to laws, conduct pretrial investigation and/or are the subjects of operational activities.

The Constitution requires that the legislature pass a law laying down the legal regulation ensuring that the information the non-disclosure (complete or partial) of which is protected and defended under the Constitution, inter alia, such information that constitutes a secret protected and defended under the Constitution, would be submitted to an ad hoc investigation commission of the Seimas (which is formed not in order to investigate the matters that an ad hoc investigation commission of the Seimas may not investigate, or the matters in the course of the investigation of which the powers of other institutions that exercise public power, as well as the powers of other state and municipal institutions provided for in the Constitution and/or laws, would be interfered with), provided such information may be submitted to such a commission on the whole, only by following, in the strictest manner, the procedure established in laws and by guaranteeing most strictly that this information will not be disclosed to any person who, under the Constitution and laws, does not have the right to receive such information, since such disclosure of the said information would inflict damage on the values consolidated, defended, and protected under the Constitution.

It is clear that submitting any information to the Seimas, which is a political institution (which is composed of persons belonging to various political forces) is always connected with the risk that this information might spread wider than it should under the Constitution and laws.

The legislative consolidation of the legal regulation that effectively guarantees the non-disclosure of the secrets defended and protected under the Constitution and the relevant organisational and technical means are the necessary conditions for submitting information to ad hoc investigation commissions of the Seimas (provided such information may be submitted to an ad hoc investigation commission of the Seimas on the whole).

It should also be noted that, as held in the Constitutional Court's ruling of 13 May 2004, [the law] "does not provide for any criteria on the basis of which the Office of the Prosecutor General, the National Audit Office, the State Security Department or a pretrial investigation institution might object to submitting the necessary information to an ad hoc investigation commission of the Seimas, or on the basis of which certain limitations could be applied to the use of this information in the work of the said commission".

However, it needs to be specially emphasised that the said legal regulation may not be amended or specified in such a way that would create the preconditions for raising one constitutional value – the control function of the Seimas, which is consolidated in the Constitution, and its constitutional powers to take up by itself an investigation activity on the issue of state importance in order to collect exhaustive and objective information about the processes taking place in the state and society, about the situation in various spheres of the life of the state and society and arising problems – above other constitutional values and for creating opposition between the said constitutional value and other constitutional values, inter alia, the independence of prosecutors when they organise and direct pretrial investigation (as mentioned before, particular constitutional doctrinal provisions are also applicable mutatis mutandis to the legal regulation of the relationships between ad hoc investigation commissions of the Seimas and other state institutions (their officials) that, according to laws, conduct pretrial investigation and/or are the subjects of operational activities). The said legal regulation may not be amended or modified in a manner that, in the course of establishing the criteria by following which particular state institutions might disagree that an ad hoc investigation commission of the Seimas receives the information required by it, or the criteria under which some other limitations would be applied as regards the use of this information in the work of an ad hoc investigation commission of the Seimas, the constitutionally reasonable powers of such state institutions not to provide someone with certain information or to apply some other limitations would essentially be denied. If these powers of particular institutions to disagree that certain information is submitted or to apply some other limitations were limited or denied altogether, various values consolidated, defended, and protected under the Constitution may be jeopardised.

When such disagreement is expressed, it must be substantiated by the relevant reasoning.

In connection with the de lege ferenda standpoint, it also needs to be noted that no matter what legislative regulation there is, such a legislative regulation must, by paying regard to the Constitution, be only such that would not deny the powers, established by means of a law, of subjects not to disclose the information the disclosure of which might inflict harm on the values consolidated, defended, and protected under the Constitution.

On the other hand, a law must also establish a legal regulation that would make it possible to guarantee that the powers, established by means of a law, of the subjects not to disclose the information the disclosure of which might inflict harm on the values consolidated, defended, and protected under the Constitution would not be used to justify the decisions not to disclose also such information the non-disclosure (complete or partial) of which is not defended and protected under the Constitution and where such information, under the procedure established by means of a law, must be disclosed to certain subjects, inter alia, to ad hoc investigation commissions of the Seimas, which are formed for an investigation into special questions (of state importance).

An ad hoc investigation commission of the Seimas may receive the material of pretrial, operational, or other investigation (provided such information may be submitted to such a commission on the whole), provided this information is indeed necessary in order that the Seimas could perform its constitutional functions, only by following in the strictest manner the procedure established in laws and by guaranteeing most strictly that this information will not be disclosed to any person who, under the Constitution and laws, does not have the right to receive such information, since such disclosure of the said information would inflict damage on the values consolidated, defended, and protected under the Constitution. It has been held in this decision of the Constitutional Court that the legislative consolidation of the legal regulation that effectively guarantees the non-disclosure of the secrets defended and protected under the Constitution and the respective organisational and technical means are the necessary conditions for submitting information to ad hoc investigation commissions of the Seimas (provided such information may be submitted to an ad hoc investigation commission of the Seimas on the whole).

It needs to be emphasised that, as a rule, the information at the disposal of the Office of the Prosecutor General, the National Audit Office, the State Security Department or a pretrial investigation establishment ... where the said information is the material of pretrial, operational, or other investigation, cannot serve as the grounds for conclusions made by an ad hoc investigation commission of the Seimas until the said pretrial, operational, or other investigation is over and the conclusions of such investigation are formalised by procedural documents; this statement is not an absolute one; however, whatever its exceptions, which arise from the Constitution that contains the obligations to defend and protect the rights and legitimate interests of a person, society and the state, as well as other constitutional values, regardless of whether the legislature has carried out its duty and properly reflected these exceptions in laws, in all cases regard must be paid to the powers of a particular state institution, inter alia, the powers of a pretrial investigation institution or/and a subject of operational activities to disagree, by giving reasons, that an ad hoc investigation commission of the Seimas receives the said information that is necessary to it, or to demand that certain limitations be applied for the use of such information in the work of an ad hoc investigation commission of the Seimas.

In this context, it needs to be mentioned that, as it was held in the Constitutional Court's ruling of 13 May 2004, "it is clear that the organisational and technical questions of such access must be coordinated with the state institutions at whose disposal the criminal case or other material and documents are".

In the light of the foregoing arguments ... it should be held that ... the provision “The constitutional principle of the separation of powers and other provisions of the Constitution make it possible to draw the conclusion that the Seimas has no powers to form any such ad hoc investigation commissions that would be assigned to carry out an investigation into the matters in the course of the investigation of which the powers of other institutions that exercise public power, as well as the powers of other state and municipal institutions provided for in the Constitution and/or laws, would be interfered with” ... of the Constitutional Court’s ruling of 4 April 2006 ... when it is interpreted in the context of the official constitutional doctrinal provisions of the Constitutional Court’s ruling of 4 April 2006 and the Constitutional Court’s ruling of 13 May 2004, also means that the Seimas has the powers, provided there is a special matter (of state importance), to assign an ad hoc investigation commission of the Seimas to carry out an investigation also into such matters the investigation of which will also require the material of the investigation (as well as pretrial and operational investigation) conducted by the respective institutions; however, the said information cannot be such that, under the Constitution, may not be revealed to an ad hoc investigation commission of the Seimas on the whole; in addition, it is not allowed to deny the powers of the subjects established by law not to disclose the information the disclosure of which could inflict damage on the values consolidated, defended, and protected under the Constitution, as well as on an unfinished pretrial and operational investigation.

The approval by the Seimas of a conclusion of an ad hoc investigation commission of the Seimas

... the decision of the Seimas, expressed by means of a resolution, to approve the proposals (statements) formulated in a conclusion of an ad hoc investigation commission of the Seimas implies that the Seimas will follow them, inter alia, when adopting the respective legal acts.

... it should be noted that the constitutional nature and functions of the Seimas, as the representation of the Nation, through which the Nation executes its supreme sovereign power, and the constitutional principle of responsible governance imply the duty of the Seimas to properly implement the powers granted to it by the Constitution and laws, to implement its functions in observance of the Constitution and law, and to act in the interests of the Nation and the State of Lithuania. Therefore, the Seimas may not approve a conclusion of any possible content made by an ad hoc investigation commission of the Seimas, inter alia, any such proposals formulated therein that would be incompatible with the Constitution, inter alia, with requirements stemming from the constitutional principles of a state under the rule of law and the separation of powers (as, for instance, in cases where there are proposals that a certain institution of state power, which executes public power, should take over the constitutional powers of another institution of state power or that such powers should be groundlessly interfered with).

The conclusions adopted by an ad hoc investigation commission of the Seimas must be formulated in such a way that would make it possible to adopt lawful decisions, which would comply with the Constitution and the constitutional imperatives arising therefrom. The duty stems for the Seimas from the Constitution, before it decides whether to approve or not to approve a conclusion of an ad hoc investigation commission of the Seimas, or to approve it in part (with reservations), to assess whether the decisions proposed in the said conclusion are compliant with the Constitution, as well as whether the proposals (formulated in the said conclusion of the commission including those whereby certain legal acts are proposed to be adopted or not to be adopted) violate, inter alia, the requirements stemming from the constitutional principles of responsible governance, a state under the rule of law, and the separation of powers.

The formation and powers of ad hoc investigation commissions of the Seimas

... under the Constitution, inter alia, Article 76 thereof, in order to implement its constitutional powers to collect the necessary exhaustive and objective information, the Seimas may set up ad hoc structural units – ad hoc investigation commissions and assign them to carry out the respective investigation; having regard to the constitutional principles of responsible governance, the separation of powers, a state under the rule of law, and democracy, as well as the striving for an open, harmonious, and just civil society, which is declared in the Preamble to the Constitution, ad hoc investigation commissions of the Seimas, under the Constitution, may be set up for examining not any type of issues, but only special issues, i.e. issues of state importance. The Constitution, therefore, requires that the Seimas, when setting up an ad hoc investigation commission of the Seimas, must determine only such issues of state importance to be assigned to this commission for investigation and only such limits of this investigation so that, when carried out by the commission, this investigation does not harm any of the values consolidated, protected, and defended by the Constitution, and that the powers, laid down in the Constitution and/or laws, of other state and municipal institutions are not taken over or there is not any other form of interference with the exercise of their competence laid down in the Constitution and/or laws, inter alia, so that no such decisions are prepared that may be adopted under the Constitution and/or laws only by the state or municipal institutions (or their officials) with the respective competence.

The parliamentary minority

The Constitutional Court has noted that the Constitution implies the defence of the parliamentary minority and the minimum requirements for the protection of the opposition of the Seimas (rulings of 26 November 1993, 25 January 2001, and 4 April 2006); the Statute of the Seimas must lay down guarantees for the functioning of the opposition (ruling of 25 January 2001).

... under the Constitution, Lithuania is a pluralistic parliamentary democracy, whose conditio sine qua non is the parliamentary minority, inter alia, the parliamentary opposition. It should be emphasised that the mission of the parliamentary minority, inter alia, that of the parliamentary opposition, is to reflect the diversity of political views in the parliament, thus guaranteeing political pluralism in the parliament of a democratic state under the rule of law and creating the preconditions for such a parliament to fulfil its functions; the mission of the parliamentary opposition is, inter alia, to propose a political programme alternative to the parliamentary majority and put forward the political decisions based on this programme, as well as to monitor the political activities of the parliamentary majority, inter alia, to criticise it.

At the same time, it should be noted that each member of the Seimas represents the whole of the People; when fulfilling his/her constitutional obligation to represent the People, a member of the Seimas participates in performing all constitutional functions of the Seimas and exercises all powers of a member of the Seimas (ruling of 1 July 2004 and the conclusion of 19 December 2017). It should also be noted that the free mandate of a member of the Seimas must be used in such a way that the Seimas could act effectively in the interests of the People and the State of Lithuania, and that it could properly fulfil its constitutional obligation (conclusions of 27 October 2010, 19 December 2017, and 22 December 2017); in performing their functions and implementing state authority, the members of the Seimas must act in the interests of the People and the State of Lithuania, not in their personal or group interests, and they must not make use of their status in order to gain personal advantage for themselves, persons close to them, or other persons (conclusions of 27 October 2010, 3 June 2014, and 19 December 2017).

It should also be noted that participation in the work of the Seimas is a constitutional duty and at the same time a right of a member of the Seimas (decision of 10 February 2005). In view of this, it should also be noted that the members of the Seimas, inter alia, those belonging to the parliamentary minority (inter alia, those of the parliamentary opposition), must exercise their rights and all the powers of a member of the Seimas responsibly, contributing to the effective implementation by the Seimas of the functions of the parliament of a democratic state under the rule of law.

The guarantees of the parliamentary minority in the formation of the structural units of the Seimas

... the principles of the organisation and operation of the authorities of the State of Lithuania and the concept of a pluralistic parliamentary democracy, which are implied by the Constitution, inter alia, the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law, require, in accordance with Article 76 of the Constitution, the establishment of such a structure and procedure of activities of the Seimas that would ensure the effective protection of the rights of the parliamentary minority, inter alia, those of the parliamentary opposition, and guarantees for its activities. This means, inter alia, that the principle of proportional representation must be ensured in the formation of the structural units of the Seimas (inter alia, committees and commissions of the Seimas) and that the composition of such structural units of the Seimas, inter alia, changes in the said composition, must not depend solely on the discretion of the parliamentary majority.

It should be noted that, as stated by the Constitutional Court, the Seimas, when it sets up ad hoc investigation commissions, must also respect the imperative for the protection of the rights of the minority of the Seimas and the minimum requirements for the protection of the opposition of the Seimas, which stem from the Constitution; these requirements imply, inter alia, that ad hoc investigation commissions of the Seimas cannot be composed solely of representatives of the political majority of the Seimas, without involving representatives of the minority (opposition) of the Seimas if they so wish (ruling of 4 April 2006). ... under the Constitution, inter alia, Article 76 thereof, and the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law, the composition of an ad hoc investigation commission of the Seimas, inter alia, of a commission of the Seimas set up before the beginning of impeachment proceedings in order to investigate the reasonableness of charges brought against a specific person, cannot be changed solely at the discretion of the parliamentary majority in the absence of clear and constitutionally justifiable reasons. Such reasons could include, inter alia, the situation where a member of an ad hoc investigation commission of the Seimas, inter alia, of a commission of the Seimas set up before the beginning of impeachment proceedings in order to investigate the reasonableness of charges brought against a specific person, in the exercise of his/her functions, uses the free mandate of a member of the Seimas not in the interests of the People and the State of Lithuania, but uses that mandate, inter alia, in his/her own personal or group interests.

... the Constitutional Court has mentioned that one of the methods of the parliamentary activities of the opposition could consist of demonstrative, based on the views and political objectives of the opposition, non-participation by members of the Seimas in meetings of the Seimas, meetings of the committees of the Seimas, or meetings of other structural units to which they are appointed as members in accordance with the procedure laid down in the Statute of the Seimas, i.e. obstruction as a type of political protest and a method of parliamentary activity in an attempt to prevent the adoption of a decision that is not acceptable to the minority may, under the Constitution, in certain situations, be regarded as a rather important reason for not attending the said sittings unless such non-attendance is regular (ruling (no KT26-N13/2016) of 5 October 2016). ... one of the methods of parliamentary activity may include the refusal of the members of the Seimas belonging to the parliamentary minority, inter alia, the parliamentary opposition, to take part in the work of ad hoc structural units of the Seimas (inter alia, in the work of ad hoc investigation commissions of the Seimas), thus expressing political protest that, in their view, the decisions of the parliamentary majority unjustifiably restrict the rights and guarantees of the functioning of the parliamentary minority, inter alia, those of the parliamentary opposition. It should also be noted that the above-mentioned methods of parliamentary activity do not, in themselves, constitute an obstacle to the exercise by the Seimas of its functions as the parliament of a democratic state under the rule of law.

The establishment of the limits of an investigation carried out by an ad hoc investigation commission of the Seimas

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 12 June 2020

... the Constitution, inter alia, Articles 67 and 76 thereof, consolidates the powers of the Seimas, while paying regard, inter alia, to the constitutional principles of responsible governance and a state under the rule of law, to establish its structural units, inter alia, to form ad hoc investigation commissions of the Seimas and formulate their tasks.

... the powers of an ad hoc investigation commission of the Seimas may derive only from an act of the Seimas as the representation of the People, i.e. from the expression of the will of the Seimas, but not from the expression of the will or intention of a certain structural unit of the Seimas or a group of members of the Seimas; due to this, it is only the Seimas that may decide on whether or not to set up an ad hoc investigation commission on a certain issue, and it is only the Seimas that may establish the composition, tasks, etc. of this commission, as no one else may express such will for the Seimas; thus, neither any structural unit of the Seimas nor any group of members of the Seimas may express such will (ruling of 4 April 2006).

... under the Constitution, inter alia, Articles 67 and 76 thereof, as well as the constitutional principles of responsible governance and a state under the rule of law, the Seimas may set up an ad hoc investigation commission to investigate only a sufficiently defined issue of state importance, i.e. it is necessary to establish such tasks of an ad hoc investigation commission of the Seimas that are necessary for the investigation of the said issue and make clear the limits of the investigative activity of this commission, inter alia, what information (from which area) and on what processes (from which area) taking place in the state and society, as well as on what issues (from which area), are to be collected for the Seimas.

Thus, under the Constitution, inter alia, Articles 67 and 76 thereof, as well as the constitutional principles of responsible governance and a state under the rule of law, the Seimas must not establish such tasks necessary to investigate an issue of state importance by an ad hoc investigation commission of the Seimas that would not make clear the limits of the investigative activity of this commission and/or that would be impossible to carry out; nor may an issue of state importance assigned to an ad hoc investigation commission and/or the tasks of the commission necessary to investigate this issue be formulated in such a way as to create the preconditions for the commission at its discretion to choose which investigation tasks it is to carry out and to what extent and, thereby, to determine the limits of its investigation. Otherwise, an ad hoc investigation commission of the Seimas would take over the constitutional powers of the Seimas to define an issue of state importance assigned to such a commission and to establish the tasks necessary for the investigation of this issue.

5.5. THE PROCEDURE OF ACTIVITIES OF THE SEIMAS

5.5.1. General provisions

The structure and procedure of activities of the Seimas are established by the Statute of the Seimas (Article 76 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 30 March 2000

Article 76 of the Constitution provides that "The structure and procedure of activities of the Seimas shall be established by the Statute of the Seimas. The Statute of the Seimas shall have the force of a law".

A blanket norm is set down in this article of the Constitution, which permits the Seimas to establish, by itself, its structure, the procedure of its activities, procedures for the presentation of draft laws and other draft legal acts, their deliberation and adoption, as well as the competence of other structural subunits of the Seimas and their interrelations, and to regulate other issues of the functioning of the Seimas. Under Article 76 of the Constitution, this must be established in the Statute of the Seimas, which has the force of a law.

The procedure of activities of the Seimas includes the legislative procedure (Article 76 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 18 October 2000

... under Article 76 of the Constitution, the structure and procedure of activities of the Seimas are established by the Statute of the Seimas, which has the force of a law. The establishment of the procedure of activities of the Seimas includes the regulation of the legislative procedure.

The chairperson of sittings of the Seimas (Paragraph 1 of Article 66 of the Constitution)

... under Paragraph 1 of Article 66 of the Constitution, sittings of the Seimas are presided over by the Speaker of the Seimas, or his/her Deputy. The duty of the chairperson of sittings of the Seimas is to preside over sittings of the Seimas and to ensure that the procedure of activities of the Seimas would be adhered to. He/she may not, while making use of the rights of the chairperson of sittings of the Seimas, exert influence on the members of the Seimas regarding decisions which must be adopted, or restrict the rights of the members of the Seimas, or control the content of their statements. Otherwise, the essence of the Seimas as a representative institution and the constitutional principle of the free mandate of a member of the Seimas, which ensures the equality of the members of the Seimas and their opportunity to freely express their will, would be denied.

The continuity of the activities of the Seimas; the sessions of the Seimas; the duty of a member of the Seimas to participate in the work of the Seimas

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 1 July 2004

The Constitution establishes such a framework of state power where each institution of state power performs its functions continuously. Under the Constitution, there may not be any such legal situations where a certain institution exercising state power fails to function.

In its ruling of 24 February 1994, the Constitutional Court held that the Seimas must always ensure that its powers established in the Constitution are performed continuously and that in any situation the representation of the Nation should be able to constructively, effectively and continuously implement the supreme sovereign power of the Nation.

The continuity of the activity of the Seimas, as the continuously acting representation of the Nation, is ensured, inter alia, by the provisions of Article 59 of the Constitution, which provide that the term of powers of the members of the Seimas begins to be counted from the day on which the newly elected Seimas convenes for the first sitting and that the term of powers of the previously elected members of the Seimas expires at the beginning of this sitting.

The Seimas consists of the members of the Seimas – representatives of the Nation. Each member of the Seimas represents the entire Nation. When fulfilling his/her constitutional obligation to represent the Nation, a member of the Seimas participates in performing all constitutional functions of the Seimas and exercises all powers of a member of the Seimas.

The continuity of the activity of the Seimas also implies the continuity of the activity of a member of the Seimas as a representative of the Nation. Under the Constitution, legal acts should establish such a structure and work procedure of the Seimas and such a legal status of a member of the Seimas that would provide for an opportunity for each member of the Seimas to fulfil his/her constitutional obligation to be constantly involved in the work of the Seimas, the representation of the Nation, and to exercise on a continuous basis his/her constitutional powers, as a representative of the Nation.

It needs to be emphasised that the Constitution treats a member of the Seimas as a professional politician, i.e. as such a representative of the Nation whose work at the Seimas is his/her professional activity.

As already mentioned before, the activity of the Seimas as the representation of the Nation and of the members of the Seimas as representatives of the Nation is continuous. Paragraph 1 of Article 64 of the Constitution provides that every year, the Seimas convenes for two regular sessions – in spring and autumn; the spring session commences on the 10th of March and ends on the 30th of June, and the autumn session commences on the 10th of September and ends on the 23rd of December. The Seimas may decide to prolong a session. Paragraph 2 of Article 64 of the Constitution provides for extraordinary sessions: extraordinary sessions are convened by the Speaker of the Seimas on the proposal of not less than one-third of all the members of the Seimas, or by the President of the Republic in cases provided for in the Constitution.

According to the parliamentary tradition of democratic states, a parliamentary session comprises sittings of the parliament and sittings of parliamentary committees and other structural subunits held in the periods between the sittings of the parliament. A form of sessions of the Seimas is sittings of the Seimas and sittings of structural subunits of the Seimas held in the periods between the sittings of the parliament. It has been held in this ruling of the Constitutional Court that participation at the sittings of the Seimas is a constitutional duty of a member of the Seimas. According to the Constitution, the Seimas has the duty to establish such a legal regulation and act in such a way that ensures the performance of the constitutional duty of the members of the Seimas – the duty to participate at the sittings of the Seimas. This means that the Seimas, inter alia, has to establish such a legal regulation that would provide that the non-participation by a member of the Seimas at the sittings of the Seimas is possible only for duly justified exceptional reasons. It should be stressed that the behaviour of a member of the Seimas when he/she does not participate at the sittings of the Seimas without a duly justified exceptional reason should be evaluated as failure to perform the constitutional duty of a member of the Seimas, a representative of the Nation; under the Constitution, such non-participation at the sittings of the Seimas cannot but result in the respective legal consequences (legal responsibility) in respect of the member of the Seimas who does not participate at the sittings of the Seimas without a duly justified exceptional reason. The constitutional mission of the Seimas as the representation of the Nation, the constitutional duty of a member of the Seimas to represent the Nation, and the constitutional legal status of a member of the Seimas also imply that it is necessary to establish such a legal regulation that would facilitate the ensuring of effective control over the participation of the members of the Seimas at the sittings of the Seimas, as well as constant and systematic provision of information to the public (electorate) about the participation of the members of the Seimas at the sittings of the Seimas and their public votes on issues discussed by the Seimas.

On the other hand, sessions of the Seimas are not a single form of the activity of the Seimas, and participation at sessions of the Seimas is not a single form of the work of a member of the Seimas at the Seimas or his/her parliamentary activity. As already mentioned before, according to the Constitution, the activity of a member of the Seimas as a representative of the Nation is continuous; each member of the Seimas should have the possibility of exercising his/her constitutional duty to continuously participate at the work of the Seimas, the representation of the Nation, and to incessantly perform his/her constitutional powers as a representative of the Nation. Therefore, according to the Constitution, members of the Seimas also perform their duties as representatives of the Nation beyond sessions of the Seimas. The constitutional principle of the continuity of the activity of the Seimas as the representation of the Nation implies that the period between the sessions of the Seimas is not the leave of the members of the Seimas or any other type of their rest. ... Paragraph 1 of Article 49 of the Constitution, which provides that every working person has the right to rest and leisure, as well as to annual paid leave, and Paragraph 4 of Article 60 of the Constitution, which provides that the duties, rights and guarantees of the activities of a member of the Seimas are established by law, give rise to the duty of the legislature to establish, by means of a law, the duration and other conditions of the annual paid leave of the members of the Seimas. It should also be noted that the establishment of the leave of a member of the Seimas by means of a law would also ensure that no preconditions are created for the constitutionally unfounded treatment of the period between the sessions of the Seimas as a period equivalent to the leave of the members of the Seimas or any other type of their rest.

5.5.2. The legislation process

The right of legislative initiative (Article 68 of the Constitution); the consideration of draft laws
The Constitutional Court's ruling of 25 January 2001

Article 68 of the Constitution provides that the right of legislative initiative at the Seimas belongs to the members of the Seimas, the President of the Republic, and the Government. The citizens of the Republic of Lithuania also have the right of legislative initiative. Fifty thousand citizens of the Republic of Lithuania who have the electoral right may submit a draft law to the Seimas, and the Seimas must consider it.

The implementation of the right of legislative initiative is the first phase of the legislation process. ... Article 68 of the Constitution provides for the subjects who may exercise the right of legislative initiative: members of the Seimas, the President of the Republic, the Government, and 50 000 citizens of the Republic of Lithuania who have the electoral right. In its ruling of 8 November 1993, the Constitutional Court held that the essence and purpose of the right of legislative initiative is to initiate the legislation process. In practice, this right is implemented by submitting a concrete draft law to the parliament. After the subject that is specified in the Constitution submits a draft law, the legislative institution – the Seimas – is under the duty to begin its consideration.

... in its ruling of 8 November 1993, when analysing the particularities of the phase of the consideration of a draft law, the Constitutional Court noted: “In this phase, remarks, proposals, amendments, and supplements on the draft law submitted by the members of the Seimas are the relevant elements of the phase of consideration; however, they cannot be interpreted as legislative initiative because it has already been implemented. In practice, proposals, amendments, and supplements are submitted until the moment when the law is passed. The procedure for their submission and consideration is regulated by regulatory norms governing the consideration of draft laws. A characteristic feature of this procedure is that it differs in substance from the implementation of the right of legislative initiative. As regards its purpose, the right of legislative initiative is also different from the submission of amendments and supplements to the draft under consideration; after all, they are different parts of the phases of the legislation process.”

The competence of the Seimas to establish the procedure for the adoption, signing, publication, and entry into force of laws and other legal acts passed by the Seimas (Item 2 of Article 67 and Article 76 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 19 June 2002

Item 2 of Article 67 of the Constitution provides that the Seimas passes laws. Passing laws is one of the most important functions of the Seimas as the representation of the Nation, as well as its constitutional competence. The Seimas, while passing laws (Item 2 of Article 67 of the Constitution) and establishing the structure and procedure of activities of the Seimas in the Statute of the Seimas (Article 76 of the Constitution) has the constitutional competence to particularise and detail the procedure (established in the Constitution) of the signing, publication, and entry into force of laws and other legal acts passed by referendum or by the Seimas. In doing so, the Seimas may not violate the provisions of the Constitution.

The signing, official publication, and entry into force of laws

It is impossible to interpret the procedure (established in the Constitution) of the signing and official publication of laws by dissociating the provisions of Article 71 of the Constitution ... from other constitutional provisions, since the norms regulating the signing, official publication, and entry into force of laws, establishing the constitutional powers of the President of the Republic and the Speaker of the Seimas to sign and promulgate laws, as well as the related constitutional powers of the Deputy Speaker of the Seimas, are laid down in various articles of the Constitution.

The procedure for the signing, official publication, and entry into force of laws and other legal acts passed by the Seimas is consolidated not only in Article 71 of the Constitution ... but also in Article 70, Item 24 of Article 84, and Article 149 of the Constitution.

Articles 70 and 71, Item 24 of Article 84, and Article 149 of the Constitution consolidate the procedure for the signing, official publication, and entry into force of laws and other legal acts passed by the Seimas. The observance of such a procedure is an important precondition for ensuring the supremacy of the Constitution.

Paragraph 2 of Article 7 of the Constitution prescribes: “Only laws that are published shall be valid.” The signing and official publication of laws, i.e. the promulgation of laws, is the final stage of the legislation process. The signing and official publication of laws is a necessary condition for their entry into force.

Under the Constitution, a law that has not been signed by the official specified in the Constitution may not be officially published and come into force. Also, a law that has been signed by an official who does not have the required constitutional powers may not be officially published and come into force.

The powers of the President of the Republic, the Speaker of the Seimas, and the Deputy Speaker of the Seimas that are related to the signing and official publication of laws (Articles 70 and 71, Item 24 of Article 84, Article 88, Paragraph 1 of Article 89, and Paragraphs 1 and 2 of Article 149 of the Constitution)

In the course of a systemic interpretation of the provisions of Articles 70 and 71, Item 24 of Article 84, as well as Paragraphs 1 and 2 of Article 149 of the Constitution, it becomes clear that the signing and official publication of the laws adopted by the Seimas, as well as laws adopted by referendum, are always linked with the President of the Republic.

Under the Constitution, the signing and official promulgation (within the time limits pointed out in Article 71) of laws adopted by the Seimas as well as laws adopted by referendum is within the competence of the President of the Republic. Exercising the constitutional powers to sign and officially promulgate laws, the President of the Republic takes part in the legislation process (ruling of 19 January 1994).

The President of the Republic also has the right not to sign a law adopted by the Seimas and, within ten days of receiving such a law, on reasonable grounds, to refer it back to the Seimas for reconsideration (Paragraph 1 of Article 71 of the Constitution), i.e. he/she has the right of a delaying veto. The Constitution does not provide that the President of the Republic has the right of a delaying veto in connection with laws passed by referendum or in connection with laws amending the Constitution. Under the Constitution, the President of the Republic has such a right only with regard to laws adopted by the Seimas, with the exception of laws amending the Constitution. While implementing the right of a delaying veto, the President of the Republic may also submit proposals how a law adopted by the Seimas, but not yet signed by the President of the Republic, should be amended or supplemented. Under Paragraph 1 of Article 72 of the Constitution, the Seimas may consider anew and adopt a law referred back by the President of the Republic. The law reconsidered by the Seimas is deemed adopted if the amendments and supplements submitted by the President of the Republic are adopted, or if more than 1/2 of all the members of the Seimas vote for the law or, in cases where such a law is a constitutional law, if not less than 3/5 of all the members of the Seimas vote in favour thereof (Paragraph 2 of Article 72 of the Constitution); the President of the Republic must sign such laws within three days and promulgate them immediately (Paragraph 3 of Article 72 of the Constitution). Such a relation between the powers of the President of the Republic and of the Seimas is an important aspect of the separation of powers consolidated in the Constitution.

Under Article 85 of the Constitution, the President of the Republic, implementing the powers vested in him/her, issues acts-decrees. Under Paragraph 1 of Article 71 of the Constitution, when referring a law passed by the Seimas, within ten days of receiving such a law, back to the Seimas for reconsideration, the President of the Republic must indicate in his/her decree the relevant reasons why the law was referred back to the Seimas. Meanwhile, to propose draft amendments and supplements to a law referred back to the Seimas for reconsideration is not a constitutional duty of the President of the Republic, but his/her constitutional right.

The provisions of Paragraph 1 of Article 71, Item 24 of Article 84, and Paragraph 2 of Article 71 of the Constitution are interrelated. Under the Constitution, the President of the Republic has the right, within ten days of receiving a law passed by the Seimas, to perform one legal action from among those pointed out in the above provisions: either to sign and officially promulgate the law passed by the Seimas (right of promulgation), or to refer it back to the Seimas together with the relevant reasons for reconsideration (right of a delaying veto). To perform one of such legal actions is a constitutional duty of the President of the Republic.

The phrase “the law adopted by the Seimas is neither referred back nor signed by the President of the Republic within the specified period” used in Paragraph 2 of Article 71 of the Constitution is not to be interpreted as meaning that the President of the Republic has the right not to sign and, thus, not to promulgate officially the law passed by the Seimas without referring, on reasonable grounds, the said law back to the Seimas. This phrase means such a factual situation where the President of the Republic, even though he/she has the constitutional duty within ten days of receiving a law passed by the Seimas to sign and officially promulgate it or, on reasonable grounds, to refer such a law back to the Seimas for reconsideration, still, due to some reasons, neither promulgates the law passed by the Seimas nor makes use of the right of a delaying veto. Paragraph 2 of Article 71 of the Constitution provides that in such a case the law is signed and officially promulgated by the Speaker of the Seimas.

Thus, the constitutional powers of the Speaker of the Seimas to sign and officially promulgate laws are linked with strict conditions established in the Constitution: the Speaker of the Seimas signs and officially promulgates laws only if the President of the Republic does not sign and officially promulgate them (Paragraphs 2 and 4 of Article 71 and Paragraph 2 of Article 149 of the Constitution). Besides, the Speaker of the Seimas acquires the constitutional powers to sign and officially promulgate laws adopted by the Seimas only in situations where the President of the Republic not only does not promulgate such laws, but also does not use his/her right of a delaying veto (except laws amending the Constitution). Thus, the powers of the Speaker of the Seimas to sign and officially promulgate laws are conditioned by respective actions of the President of the Republic.

Under the Constitution, the situations where the President of the Republic neither promulgates laws passed by the Seimas nor makes use of his/her right of a delaying veto should be interpreted depending on whether the powers of the President of the Republic have ceased, or have not ceased, and whether the President of the Republic holds his/her office or is temporarily unable to hold his/her office.

When establishing which official has the constitutional powers to sign and officially promulgate a law passed by the Seimas where such a law was neither signed nor officially promulgated by the President of the Republic and was not referred, on reasonable grounds, back to the Seimas for reconsideration due to the fact that the powers of the President of the Republic have ceased, it is necessary to take account of the provisions of Article 88 of the Constitution.

If the powers of the President of the Republic cease on the grounds provided for in Items 1 and 2 of Article 88 of the Constitution, a newly elected President of the Republic takes over the powers of the President of the Republic. The newly elected President of the Republic has all the powers that are provided for the President of the Republic in the Constitution and laws, thus, including the powers to sign and officially promulgate such laws, within ten days of receiving them, that were passed by the Seimas at the time when the previous President of the Republic was in office.

If the powers of the President of the Republic cease on the grounds established in Items 3, 4, 5 and 6 of Article 88 of the Constitution, such a legal situation arises where a new President of the Republic is not elected yet. Paragraph 1 of Article 89 of the Constitution provides that in the event that the President of the Republic dies, resigns, or is removed from office according to the procedure for impeachment proceedings, or the Seimas decides that the state of health of the President of the Republic does not allow him/her to hold office, the office of the President of the Republic is temporarily held by the Speaker of the Seimas. In such a case, the Speaker of the Seimas loses his/her powers at the Seimas, and his/her office is temporarily held, on commissioning by the Seimas, by his/her Deputy.

... the Speaker of the Seimas, if he/she temporarily holds the office of the President of the Republic under Paragraph 1 of Article 89 of the Constitution, performs everything with which the President of the Republic is charged by the Constitution and laws. Consequently, the Speaker of the Seimas has the powers to sign and officially promulgate laws passed by the Seimas within ten days of receiving them or, on reasonable grounds, to refer them back to the Seimas for reconsideration.

It needs to be noted that the Speaker of the Seimas, if he/she temporarily holds the office of the President of the Republic, exercises the constitutional powers of the President of the Republic, but not those of the Speaker of the Seimas, because the Speaker of the Seimas loses temporarily his/her powers in such a situation. Meanwhile, the Deputy Speaker of the Seimas who temporarily holds the office of the Speaker of the Seimas on commissioning by the Seimas also takes over the powers of the Speaker of the Seimas established in Paragraph 2 of Article 71 of the Constitution to sign and officially promulgate laws in cases where the Speaker of the Seimas who temporarily holds the office of the President of the Republic, due to some reasons, neither signs and officially promulgates such laws nor, on reasonable grounds, refers them back to the Seimas for reconsideration.

Attention should be paid to the fact that the phrase “upon commissioning by the Seimas” used in Paragraph 1 of Article 89 of the Constitution means not a general legal regulation, but an individual one meant for such situations where a certain legal act passed by the Seimas commissions a particular Deputy Speaker of the Seimas to temporarily hold the office of the Speaker of the Seimas only for the period until the Speaker of the Seimas resumes his/her duties again.

In the situations provided for in Paragraph 1 of Article 89 of the Constitution, the Speaker of the Seimas holds the office of the President of the Republic until a new President of the Republic is elected and enters office. ... After the newly elected President of the Republic takes office, the Speaker of the Seimas stops holding temporarily the office of the President of the Republic and resumes the duties of the Speaker of the Seimas, and the Deputy Speaker of the Seimas who held the office of the Speaker of the Seimas on commissioning by the Seimas stops holding temporarily the office of the Speaker of the Seimas and resumes the duties of the Deputy Speaker of the Seimas. At this point, it is the newly elected President of the Republic who has the right of the official promulgation of laws passed by the Seimas and that of a delaying veto.

Also, such legal situations are possible where, even though one of the situations provided for in Paragraph 1 of Article 89 of the Constitution is present, but the respective legal fact is not established in accordance with the proper legal procedure (thus, it has not led to the respective legal effects). In such cases, the Speaker of the Seimas, under the Constitution, may not temporarily hold the office of the President of the Republic yet; thus, he/she still does not have the temporary powers of the President of the Republic to sign and officially promulgate laws passed by the Seimas within ten days of receiving them or, on reasonable grounds, to refer them back to the Seimas for reconsideration. ...

The Constitution regulates in another manner such legal situations where the President of the Republic, within ten days of receiving laws passed by the Seimas, neither signs and officially promulgates them nor, on reasonable grounds, refers them back to the Seimas for reconsideration not due to the reasons that the powers of the President of the Republic have ceased, but because he/she is temporarily unable to hold office.

The Constitution regulates in still another manner such legal situations where the President of the Republic, due to some reasons, neither signs and officially promulgates laws passed by the Seimas within ten days of receiving them nor, on reasonable grounds, refers them back to the Seimas for reconsideration even though his/her powers have not ceased and he/she holds his/her office.

... under Paragraph 2 of Article 71 of the Constitution, if a law adopted by the Seimas is neither referred, on reasonable grounds, back to the Seimas for reconsideration nor signed by the President of the Republic within the specified period (i.e. within ten days of receiving the said law, as established in Paragraph 1 of the same article), such a law comes into force after it is signed and officially promulgated by the Speaker of the Seimas. ... under Paragraph 4 of Article 71 of the Constitution, if a law adopted by referendum is not signed and promulgated by the President of the Republic within the specified period (i.e. within five days of receiving the said law, as established in Paragraph 3 of the same article), such a law comes into force after it is signed and officially promulgated by the Speaker of the Seimas.

The aforesaid powers are the independent powers of the Speaker of the Seimas to promulgate laws adopted by the Seimas. On the other hand, the powers of the Speaker of the Seimas to sign and officially promulgate laws passed by the Seimas are linked with such a legal situation where the President of the Republic, within ten days of receiving laws passed by the Seimas, neither signs and officially promulgates them nor, on reasonable grounds, refers them back to the Seimas for reconsideration, even though his/her powers have not ceased and he/she holds his/her office. Therefore ... the powers of the Speaker of the Seimas are conditioned by respective actions of the President of the Republic. When the President of the Republic neither signs and officially promulgates a law passed by the Seimas within ten days of receiving it nor, on reasonable grounds, refers it back to the Seimas for reconsideration, the Speaker of the Seimas is empowered to promulgate such a law under Paragraph 2 of Article 71 of the Constitution.

At the same time, it needs to be noted that, under Paragraphs 2 and 4 of Article 71 of the Constitution, the Speaker of the Seimas has the powers to promulgate laws adopted by the Seimas in cases where the said laws have not been signed and officially promulgated by the President of the Republic, but he/she may not, on reasonable grounds, refer them back to the Seimas for reconsideration. Therefore, the legal content of the powers of the Speaker of the Seimas to promulgate laws adopted by the Seimas is essentially different from that of the powers of the President of the Republic to promulgate them: the President of the Republic has the right to sign laws passed by the Seimas and to officially promulgate them, while the Speaker of the Seimas has both the right and duty to do so.

In this context, it needs to be emphasised that the Speaker of the Seimas implements the said powers only after the 10- and 5-day periods expire, as indicated in Article 71 of the Constitution.

The powers of the Speaker of the Seimas to sign and officially promulgate a law passed by the Seimas is only a right and duty of the Speaker of the Seimas, i.e. his/her constitutional prerogative, which is realised in the event that during the established time (i.e. within ten days of receiving a law) the President of the Republic neither signs such a law passed by the Seimas nor, on reasonable grounds, refers it back to the Seimas for reconsideration, while the Speaker of the Seimas neither temporarily holds the office of the President of the Republic nor temporarily substitutes for the President of the Republic. The said powers of the Speaker of the Seimas are directly established in the Constitution for the Speaker of the Seimas.

In its rulings, the Constitutional Court has held on more than one occasion that the direct establishment of powers in the Constitution means that a certain state institution may not take over such powers from another state institution, nor may the latter state institution transfer or waive the said powers. Consequently, if the Constitution directly establishes powers for a certain state official, he/she may not take over, transfer or waive such powers except in the cases provided for in the Constitution itself. Thus, the powers of the Speaker of the Seimas established in the Constitution to sign and officially promulgate laws passed by the Seimas in the event that within ten days of receiving such laws the President of the Republic neither signs nor, on reasonable grounds, refers them back to the Seimas for reconsideration may not be transferred or passed over to the Deputy Speaker of the Seimas or any other person if the Speaker of the Seimas has not temporarily lost his/her powers at the Seimas under Paragraph 1 of Article 89 of the Constitution.

In the event that the Speaker of the Seimas temporarily holds the office of the President of the Republic under Paragraph 1 of Article 89 of the Constitution, the Deputy Speaker of the Seimas temporarily holds the office of the Speaker of the Seimas. In such cases, the Deputy Speaker of the Seimas implements not the constitutional powers of the Deputy Speaker of the Seimas, but those of the Speaker of the Seimas whose office he/she temporarily holds on commissioning by the Seimas. ... Under Paragraphs 2 and 4 of Article 71 of the Constitution, at that time, the Deputy Speaker of the Seimas who temporarily holds the office of the Speaker of the Seimas also has the powers to sign and officially promulgate laws if they are not signed and officially promulgated within the established time by the Speaker of the Seimas who temporarily holds the office of the President of the Republic and, due to this reason, has temporarily lost his/her powers at the Seimas.

In cases where the Speaker of the Seimas temporarily acts for the President of the Republic when the President is temporarily abroad or falls ill and, for this reason, is temporarily unable to hold office under Paragraph 2 of Article 89 of the Constitution, the Speaker of the Seimas does not lose his/her powers in the Seimas. Therefore, under the Constitution, the Deputy Speaker of the Seimas may not exercise the constitutional powers of the Speaker of the Seimas in such cases.

... in addition, the Seimas may not establish any such a legal regulation whereby the Deputy Speaker of the Seimas (either the First Deputy Speaker or any other) is assigned to sign and officially promulgate laws passed by the Seimas if the Seimas has not passed such a legal act (and where this legal act has not come into force in accordance with the established procedure) that would specify the concrete Deputy Speaker of the Seimas who is assigned to temporarily hold the office of the Speaker of the Seimas due to the fact that, on the basis of one of the grounds specified in Paragraph 1 of Article 89 of the Constitution, the Speaker of the Seimas holds the office of the President of the Republic and has temporarily lost his/her powers at the Seimas.

... under the Constitution, when the Speaker of the Seimas is temporarily absent, his/her constitutional powers, thus, including the powers granted to him/her under Paragraph 2 of Article 71 of the Constitution to sign and officially promulgate laws passed by the Seimas where the President of the Republic, within the specified time, neither signs such laws nor, on reasonable grounds, refers them back to the Seimas for reconsideration may not be taken over either by the First Deputy Speaker of the Seimas or any other Deputy Speaker of the Seimas.

The powers of the President of the Republic to veto a law on the grounds of procedural infringements committed by the Seimas in the course of passing such a law (Paragraph 1 of Article 71 of the Constitution) (for more on the veto right of the President of the Republic, see 6. The President of the Republic, 6.2. The powers of the President of the Republic)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 22 February 2008

While interpreting the provision “Within ten days of receiving a law adopted by the Seimas, the President of the Republic ... shall, upon reasonable grounds, refer it back to the Seimas for reconsideration” of Paragraph 1 of Article 71 of the Constitution, it needs to be noted that the President of the Republic may, in the respective decree, specify various grounds – not only legal, but also economic, political, moral, and expediency grounds, also those that are related to the international obligations of the State of Lithuania, etc. ... these grounds do not necessarily have to be linked with the content of the relevant law; they may, in the opinion of the President of the Republic, be also linked with the committed infringements during the procedure of adopting the said law, inter alia, with the fact that, while adopting that law, the Seimas did not follow the stages of the legislation process or the rules of legislation that are enshrined in the Constitution and/or the Statute of the Seimas. In such cases, the President of the Republic, while making use of the right of a delaying veto, which is granted to him/her by the Constitution, does not allow such a law to take effect where, in his/her opinion, the said law may be in conflict with the procedure, laid down in the Constitution, for adopting it.

The powers of the Seimas that are related to the adoption of a law vetoed by the President of the Republic (Paragraph 2 of Article 72 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 22 February 2008

... if the Seimas does not agree with the reasons of the President of the Republic on the basis of which a certain law adopted by the Seimas is referred back to it for reconsideration after the President of the Republic uses his/her constitutional right of a delaying veto, the Seimas, under Paragraph 2 of Article 72 of the Constitution, may override such a veto of the President of the Republic. Under the Constitution, the veto exercised the President of the Republic is relative as regards laws adopted by the Seimas; such a veto is not absolute.

... under Paragraph 2 of Article 72 of the Constitution, if a decree of the President of the Republic, whereby a law adopted by the Seimas is, on reasonable grounds, referred back to the Seimas for reconsideration, contains remarks and supplements made by the President of the Republic, the Seimas, after it reconsiders the said law, may pass and make it a law if more than 1/2 of all the members of the Seimas vote for the law (in cases where such a law is a constitutional law – if not less than 3/5 of all the members of the Seimas vote in favour thereof). However, the Seimas, after it reconsiders such a law, may also pass this law by a smaller majority vote by adopting amendments and supplements submitted by the President of the Republic. On the other hand, the Constitution (as well as the provisions of Article 72) does not prohibit a situation where the Seimas, after it reconsiders a law vetoed by the President of the Republic, neither adopts it by the said absolute (qualified) majority of votes of all the members of the Seimas nor adopts it with amendments and supplements submitted by the President of the Republic, but decides to deem it a non-adopted law (for example, if, when reconsidering it, it turned out that the said law has such deficiencies due to which it must be further improved or may not be adopted in general).

Under the Constitution, the Seimas also has the same possibility in cases where a decree of the President of the Republic, whereby a law adopted by the Seimas is, on reasonable grounds, referred back to the Seimas for reconsideration, does not include any proposals on how such a law should be amended or supplemented. In addition, as mentioned before, in such cases the Seimas, according to Paragraph 2 of Article 72 of the Constitution, may override the veto of the President of the Republic.

The legislation process; assessing a draft law

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 29 September 2010

Paragraph 1 of Article 69 of the Constitution stipulates that “Laws shall be adopted at the Seimas according to the procedure established by law”.

In its rulings of, inter alia, 8 November 1993, 29 May 1997, 18 October 2000, 28 June 2001, 14 January 2002, 19 January 2005, and 22 February 2008, the Constitutional Court revealed the notion of the legislation process and held that: under the Constitution, the legislation process is the whole complex of juridically significant acts necessary for the adoption of a law and performed in a certain rigid sequence of logic and time; such a sequence is, in principle, also entrenched in the Constitution: the realisation of the right of legislative initiative is consolidated in Article 68, the adoption of laws is enshrined in Article 69, and the promulgation of laws and their entry into force is established in Articles 70–72; only with the completion of one stage another one starts in consecutive order; the legislation procedure can be regulated in the Statute of the Seimas, as well as in ... laws; it is not allowed to ignore any stage of the legislation process or any rule of the adoption of laws, where the said stages and rules are enshrined in the Constitution, the Statute of the Seimas, or ... laws.

... if the Statute of the Seimas or laws prescribe that a certain stage (stages) of the legislation process must include the verification of a draft law, then it is necessary, inter alia, to carry out the evaluation of the effectiveness of the regulation of relationships that is sought by the respective law, as well as an assessment whether such a law would give rise to any negative consequences. It would be constitutionally unjustified if there were failure to carry out such verification at a certain stage of the legislation process (inter alia, in the course of the realisation of the right of legislative initiative or the adoption of laws) or if such verification were carried out not at the due stage (stages) of the legislation process. ... it also needs to be noted that the evaluation of the effectiveness of the regulation of relationships that is sought by the relevant law must be carried out in a comprehensive, objective, and impartial manner and, if necessary, persons possessing expert knowledge must be invited.

In this context, it needs to be noted that, the Constitution, namely the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law, gives rise to the duty of the legislature to establish, in the Statute of the Seimas and/or laws, such a legal regulation of the legislation process whereby the obligation would be consolidated for the subjects who have the right of legislative initiative and/or for the Seimas, while preparing and/or adopting at the Seimas the legal acts regulating the relationships that can have influence on, inter alia, the criminogenic situation and emergence of negative economic consequences, to carry out a proper assessment of a draft law, inter alia, as regards the negative consequences that might be caused by the legal regulation laid down by an adopted law. It also needs to be noted that, in its ruling of 19 January 2005, the Constitutional Court held that the compliance of laws and other legal acts with the Constitution is ensured not only by the constitutional control carried out by the Constitutional Court over legal acts adopted by the Seimas, but also by the internal preventive control exercised by the Seimas in the manner established in the Statute of the Seimas, where such control prevents the adoption of laws and other legal acts that could possibly contradict the Constitution or other higher-ranking laws.

The Constitutional Court has held on more than one occasion that the fact that the Seimas, while passing laws, is bound by the Constitution, as well as by its own laws, is an essential element of the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law.

The procedure for adopting laws (Paragraph 1 of Article 69 and Article 76 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 15 February 2013

The fundamental rules for adopting laws are consolidated in Article 69 of the Constitution. Paragraph 1 of Article 69 of the Constitution prescribes: "Laws shall be adopted at the Seimas according to the procedure established by law." The legislation process is the whole complex of juridically significant actions necessary for the adoption of a law and is performed in a rigid sequence of logic and time (inter alia, the rulings of 8 November 1993 and 28 September 2011).

When establishing the procedure for adopting laws, the Seimas must pay regard to the norms and principles of the Constitution (ruling of 19 January 2005). Paragraph 1 of Article 69 of the Constitution and the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law, inter alia, give rise to the requirement according to which laws and other legal acts must be adopted according to the procedure that is established in advance and is in compliance with the Constitution, on the condition that this procedure must not be altered after the process of the adoption of those laws has started. It is allowed to deviate from this requirement only when it is necessary in order to secure the protection of other, more important constitutional values.

Paragraph 1 of Article 69 of the Constitution is related to Article 76 thereof establishing that the structure and procedure of activities of the Seimas is established by the Statute of the Seimas, which has the force of a law.

The establishment of the procedure of activities of the Seimas also includes the regulation of the legislation procedure (rulings of 18 October 2000, 14 January 2002, and 19 January 2005). When interpreting the provision of Paragraph 1 of Article 69 of the Constitution together with the provision of Article 76 of the Constitution, the Constitutional Court has stated that both these provisions mean that the legislation procedure may be regulated in the Statute of the Seimas and also in other laws (rulings of 28 June 2001, 14 January 2002, and 19 January 2005).

When the Seimas and each member of the Seimas pass laws and other legal acts, they are bound by the Constitution, constitutional laws, laws, as well as the Statute of the Seimas, which has the force of a law (ruling of 22 February 2008). The duty of the Seimas to follow the rules of passing laws (such rules are defined in the Statute of the Seimas) is a constitutional duty of the Seimas (inter alia, the rulings of 8 November 1993, 14 January 2002, and 22 February 2008).

It is not allowed to ignore any stage of the legislation process or any rule of the adoption of laws where the said stages and rules are enshrined in the Constitution, the Statute of the Seimas, or other laws (rulings of 29 September 2010 and 28 September 2011); the necessity to pass laws consistently following the stages and rules of the legislation process stems from the Constitution (ruling of 22 February 2008).

The constitutional duty of the Seimas to follow the aforementioned stages and rules also means that if, under the Statute of the Seimas, it is necessary to receive a conclusion from one of the structural subdivisions of the Seimas (inter alia, a committee or commission of the Seimas), it would be constitutionally unjustified that the said conclusion is not submitted because of the fact that this structural subdivision does not fulfil such a duty, is late to fulfil it, etc. (ruling of 22 February 2008).

The jurisprudence of the Constitutional Court follows the legal position that any essential violations of the legislation procedure established in laws and the Statute of the Seimas imply that the provision of Paragraph 1 of Article 69 of the Constitution, according to which laws are adopted at the Seimas according to the procedure established by law, is also violated (rulings of 28 June 2001, 19 January 2005, and 22 February 2008).

The entry into force of laws; the duty of the legislature to provide for a proper vacatio legis (Paragraph 1 of Article 70 of the Constitution) (for more on a vacatio legis in the sphere of finance law, see 11. The state budget and finances, 11.1. The state budget. The property liabilities of the state. Taxes, the ruling of 15 February 2013)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 15 February 2013

Paragraph 1 of Article 70 of the Constitution prescribes that laws adopted by the Seimas come into force after they are signed and officially promulgated by the President of the Republic, unless the laws themselves establish a later date for their entry into force.

It needs to be noted that this constitutional provision may not be interpreted as meaning that the legislature is granted an absolutely free discretion to decide whether to postpone the date of the entry into force of a law (beginning of the application of a law).

... the purpose of the principles of legal certainty, legal security, and the protection of legitimate expectations, which arise from the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law, is securing the trust of a person in the state and in law; these principles imply the duty of the state to secure the certainty and stability of a legal regulation; persons have the right to reasonably expect that their rights acquired under effective legal acts will be retained for the established period of time and will be implemented in reality. While taking account of the aforementioned, the changes in the legal regulation must be made in such a manner that the persons whose legal status is affected by those changes would have a real opportunity to adapt to a new legal situation. Therefore, in order to create the conditions for persons not only to familiarise themselves with a new legal regulation prior to the beginning of its validity, but also to adequately prepare for the expected changes, it might be necessary to establish a later date of the entry into force of the law (beginning of the application thereof).

Thus, when Paragraph 1 of Article 70 of the Constitution is interpreted in the context of the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law, it needs to be held that, in some situations, the legislature must provide for a sufficient vacatio legis, i.e. a time period from the official publication of the law until its entry into force (beginning of its application), within which the interested persons might be able to prepare themselves to implement the requirements arising from that law.

The jurisprudence of the Constitutional Court has pointed to this duty of the legislature on more than one occasion, by relating this duty to the adoption of laws on restructuring the system of social guarantees or individual guarantees (inter alia, the rulings of 4 July 2003, 22 October 2007, 22 November 2007, and 6 February 2012); however, the constitutional requirement to provide for a proper vacatio legis must also be complied with in adopting other laws that establish duties or limitations with respect to persons. The time period that should be established for each concrete situation must be assessed in view of a number of circumstances: the purpose of the law in the legal system and the nature of the social relationships regulated by that law, the circle of subjects to whom it is applied and their possibilities of preparing for the entry into force of the new legal regulation, as well as other important circumstances, inter alia, those due to which the law must come into force as soon as possible. An important public interest or the concern to protect other values consolidated in the Constitution, outweighing the interest of a person to have more time to adapt to the legal regulation establishing new duties or limitations, may determine the speedy entry into force of the law on the day when it is officially published without any term of a vacatio legis. Still, it needs to be emphasised that the speedy entry into force of laws establishing duties or limitations with respect to persons should be an exception, based and justified on the grounds of special objective circumstances, rather than a rule.

In this context, it should also be noted that, in the course of making substantial amendments to an effective legal regulation, where the said amendments create consequences unfavourable to the legal situation of persons, it may be necessary to provide not only for a sufficient vacatio legis, but also for a certain transitional legal regulation. The legal situation of persons, to whom the new legal regulation is applicable, should be regulated by means of transitional provisions in order that those persons would be given enough time to finish the actions started by them on the basis of the previous legal regulation, because the said persons started those actions expecting that the said previous legal regulation would be stable, and in order that such persons might implement their rights acquired under the previous legal regulation.

The constitutional duty of the Seimas to comply with the procedure for adopting legal acts (Paragraph 1 of Article 69 of the Constitution); the right of initiative to adopt laws and other legal acts of the Seimas (Article 68 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 29 June 2018

Paragraph 1 of Article 69 of the Constitution prescribes: "Laws shall be adopted at the Seimas according to the procedure established by law."

In its ruling of 27 April 2016, the Constitutional Court noted that the provisions of Paragraph 1 of Article 69 of the Constitution, under which laws must be adopted at the Seimas according to the procedure established by law, may not be interpreted only in a linguistic or literal manner as meaning that only laws must be adopted in accordance with the procedure established in legal acts; Paragraph 1 of Article 69 of the Constitution should be interpreted within the context of the overall constitutional legal regulation, by taking into account, inter alia, the mission and functions of the Seimas as the legislature, among other things, the fact that the Seimas adopts not only laws, but also other acts of the Seimas; a substantial violation of the procedure laid down in laws or the Statute of the Seimas regarding the adoption of any legal acts of the Seimas (inter alia, substatutory legal acts of the Seimas) concurrently means a violation of Paragraph 1 of Article 69 of the Constitution.

It should be noted that the procedure for adopting legal acts of the Seimas other than laws may have certain particularities; however, when establishing it, the legislature is bound by the requirements stemming from the Constitution, inter alia, the requirements for the initiative to adopt these legal acts of the Seimas.

As held by the Constitutional Court more than once, the right of legislative initiative is exercised by submitting a draft law to the Seimas; when a subject with the right of legislative initiative at the Seimas submits a draft law, the legislature, i.e. the Seimas, is under the duty to begin deliberations on it (inter alia, the rulings of 8 November 1993, 19 January 2005, and 19 November 2015).

The Constitutional Court has noted that, under the Constitution, the will of the Seimas regarding the adoption of decisions may not be expressed otherwise than by vote of members of the Seimas at a sitting of the Seimas and by the adoption of the respective legal act (decision of 15 May 2009 and the conclusions of 27 October 2010 and 3 June 2014).

Consequently, under the Constitution, when the Seimas adopts legal acts other than laws, the exercise of the constitutional powers of the Seimas and those laid down in laws may also be initiated only by submitting the respective draft legal act to the Seimas, and the Seimas is obliged to begin deliberations on it.

Under Article 68 of the Constitution, the right of legislative initiative belongs to the members of the Seimas, the President of the Republic, the Government, as well as 50 000 citizens who have the electoral right. The provisions of Article 68 of the Constitution, as well as the provision of Paragraph 1 of Article 69 thereof, may not be interpreted only in a linguistic or literal manner as meaning that the specified subjects may initiate at the Seimas the adoption of only those legal acts that have the force and form of a law. These constitutional provisions mean that only the subjects specified in Article 68 of the Constitution have the right of initiative to adopt laws and other legal acts of the Seimas, except in the individual cases indicated in the Constitution itself, where the draft legal acts of the Seimas other than draft laws may be submitted to the Seimas on a particular matter by the subjects other than those indicated in Article 68 of the Constitution (as, for instance, under Paragraph 1 of Article 103 of the Constitution, the President of the Supreme Court has the right to nominate candidates for the position of a justice of the Constitutional Court by initiating the adoption of the respective decisions of the Seimas).

The legislation process and its stages; the duty of the Seimas to ensure the publicity and transparency of the legislation process by means of the legal regulation of this process, as well as to create the preconditions for ensuring the quality of laws and other acts of the Seimas (Paragraphs 2 and 3 of Article 5, Paragraph 1 of Article 69, and Article 76 of the Constitution)

... the fundamental rules for adopting laws are consolidated in Article 69 of the Constitution; Paragraph 1 of Article 69 of the Constitution prescribes: "Laws shall be adopted at the Seimas according to the procedure established by law" (inter alia, the rulings of 8 November 1993, 28 September 2011, and 15 February 2013).

Paragraph 1 of Article 69 of the Constitution is related to Article 76 of the Constitution, establishing that the structure and procedure of activities of the Seimas are established by the Statute of the Seimas, which has the force of a law (ruling of 15 February 2013). The establishment of the procedure of activities of the Seimas also includes the regulation of the legislation procedure (inter alia, the rulings of 18 October 2000, 19 January 2005, and 15 February 2013). When interpreting Paragraph 1 of Article 69 of the Constitution in conjunction with Article 76 of the Constitution, the Constitutional Court has stated that the procedure for adopting laws may be regulated in the Statute of the Seimas and also in other laws (inter alia, the rulings of 28 June 2001, 19 January 2005, and 15 February 2013).

When establishing the procedure for adopting laws, the Seimas must pay regard to the norms and principles of the Constitution (rulings of 19 January 2005, 15 February 2013, and 19 November 2015).

... under the Constitution, inter alia, Paragraphs 2 and 3 of Article 5 thereof, and the constitutional principles of a state under the rule of law and responsible governance, while implementing its powers to regulate the legislative procedure, which are consolidated in Paragraph 1 of Article 69 and Article 76 of the Constitution, the Seimas must, in the Statute of the Seimas and laws, establish such a legal regulation governing the legislation process that ensures, inter alia, the publicity and transparency of this process and creates the preconditions for ensuring the quality of laws and other acts of the Seimas.

The legislation process is the whole complex of juridically significant acts that are necessary for the adoption of a law and are carried out in a certain rigid sequence of logic and time; the following stages of the legislation process are universally recognised: the implementation of the right of legislative initiative, the deliberation of a draft law, the adoption of a draft law, and the promulgation of an adopted law and its entry into force; it is with the completion of one stage that another one starts in consecutive order; the consecutive sequence of stages of the legislation process is essentially consolidated in the Constitution: the implementation of the right of legislative initiative is consolidated in Article 68, the adoption of laws is enshrined in Article 69, and the promulgation of laws and their entry into force is established in Articles 70–72 (inter alia, the rulings of 8 November 1993, 22 February 2008, and 19 November 2015). They do not separately identify the stage of the deliberation of draft laws, which is the stage guaranteeing the application of the principles of democracy in the legislation process (rulings of 8 November 1993 and 19 November 2015); however, it is possible to decide on its actual existence from other constitutional norms: Article 71 provides for the right of the President of the Republic to refer a law back "to the Seimas for reconsideration" and Article 72 lays down the right of the Seimas "to consider anew and adopt" a law referred back by the President of the Republic (ruling of 8 November 1993). It should be emphasised that the stage of the deliberation of draft laws is a necessary stage of the legislation process (ruling of 8 November 1993); an important element of this stage is the submission of comments and proposals, as well as amendments or supplements, in relation to a draft law under deliberation (inter alia, the rulings of 8 November 1993, 25 January 2001, and 19 January 2005).

... the stage of the deliberation of draft laws is particularly important for the implementation of the ... requirements of publicity and transparency of the legislation process and the quality requirements for the adopted laws, which stem from the Constitution, inter alia, Paragraphs 2 and 3 of Article 5 thereof, and the constitutional principles of a state under the rule of law and responsible governance. It should be noted that the purpose of the stage of deliberation in the legislation process is to thoroughly examine and assess, at this stage, draft laws submitted to the Seimas and any information concerning them that is significant to the members of the Seimas when they decide on the adoption of the respective laws, among other things, to assess the opinions of the groups of society, the parties concerned, other state or municipal institutions, and persons with specialist knowledge. It should also be noted that, in view of the ... requirements of publicity and transparency of the legislation process and the quality requirements for the adopted laws, which stem from the Constitution, the Statute of the Seimas must establish the structural units of the Seimas (inter alia, committees and commissions of the Seimas), which would be assigned to consider and assess the received comments and proposals concerning the draft laws under deliberation, as well as it must establish the internal preventive legal measures of the Seimas enabling it to seek that the laws and other legal acts adopted by it are not in conflict with the Constitution and meet other quality requirements for the laws and other acts of the Seimas, which stem from the Constitution.

In this context, it should be noted that, by separating the implementation of the right of legislative initiative from the submission of comments, proposals, amendments, and supplements in the course of deliberating a draft law, the Constitutional Court has emphasised that they are separate parts of the stages of the legislation process; the purpose of the right of legislative initiative is to initiate the legislation process; it is implemented by submitting a draft law to the Seimas; the submission of comments, proposals, amendments, and supplements at the stage of the deliberation of a draft law should not be considered legislative initiative, as this initiative has already been implemented (inter alia, the rulings of 8 November 1993, 25 January 2001, and 19 January 2005).

In the acts of the Constitutional Court, it has also been emphasised on more than one occasion that it is not allowed to ignore any stage of the legislation process or any rule of the adoption of laws consolidated in the Constitution, laws, or the Statute of the Seimas (inter alia, the rulings of 29 September 2010, 15 February 2013, and 19 November 2015); the necessity to pass laws consequently following the stages and rules of the legislation process stems from the Constitution (rulings of 22 February 2008, 15 February 2013, and 19 November 2015).

As mentioned before, the Constitution, inter alia, Paragraphs 2 and 3 of Article 5 thereof, and the constitutional principles of a state under the rule of law and responsible governance give rise to the duty of the Seimas to establish such a legal regulation governing the legislation process that, inter alia, creates the preconditions for ensuring the quality of laws and other acts of the Seimas.

In this context, it should be noted that, as the Constitutional Court noted in its decision of 27 February 2014, the constitutional principles of a state under the rule of law and responsible governance imply that, in cases where in the legislation process it is necessary to rely on special knowledge or special (professional) competence, the Seimas should receive the necessary information from the respective state institutions and take account of it.

It should also be noted that, as the Constitutional Court stated in its ruling of 29 September 2010, the Constitution, specifically the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law, gives rise to the duty of the legislature to establish, in the Statute of the Seimas and/or laws, such a legal regulation governing the legislation process whereby the duty is consolidated for the subjects with the right of legislative initiative and/or for the Seimas, while preparing and/or adopting at the Seimas the legal acts regulating the relationships that can have influence on, inter alia, the criminogenic situation and the increase of negative economic consequences, to carry out a proper assessment of a draft law, inter alia, as regards the negative consequences that might be caused by the legal regulation laid down by an adopted law.

... under the Constitution, inter alia, Paragraphs 2 and 3 of Article 5 thereof, and the constitutional principles of a state under the rule of law and responsible governance, in order to ensure the quality of the adopted laws, inter alia, the compliance of the legal regulation established therein with higher-ranking legal acts, inter alia (and first of all), with the Constitution, its clarity and consistency, as well as the coherence and internal harmony of the whole legal system, the legislation process, especially the stage of the deliberation of draft laws, must be regulated so that the preconditions are created for properly assessing the content and consequences of the legal regulation provided for in draft laws while deliberating them. It should be noted that, in order to achieve this objective, the legal regulation governing the legislation process must create the preconditions for receiving, where necessary, inter alia, an opinion from persons with specialist knowledge and the respective state institutions, which would be substantiated by the performed comprehensive, objective, and impartial assessment of the draft law under deliberation and the possible ... consequences of the envisaged legal regulation, as well as the preconditions for making a responsible and reasoned assessment of this opinion.

As mentioned before, the Constitution, inter alia, Paragraphs 2 and 3 of Article 5 thereof, and the constitutional principles of a state under the rule of law and responsible governance give rise to the duty of the Seimas to establish such a legal regulation governing the legislation process that ensures, inter alia, the publicity and transparency of this process. In this context, Paragraphs 1 and 2 of Article 33 of the Constitution, which consolidate, inter alia, the rights of citizens to participate in the governance of their state and to criticise the work of state institutions or their officials, should also be mentioned.

... it should be noted that, under the Constitution, inter alia, Paragraphs 2 and 3 of Article 5 thereof, and the constitutional principles of a state under the rule of law and responsible governance, in order to ensure the publicity and transparency of the legislation process and the said rights of citizens consolidated in Paragraphs 1 and 2 of Article 33 of the Constitution, this process, especially the stage of the deliberation of draft laws, which, as mentioned before, is the stage guaranteeing the application of the principles of democracy in the legislation process, must be regulated so that it creates the possibility for society to participate in the deliberations of draft laws. It should be noted that, in order to reach this objective, such a legal regulation of the legislation process must be established under which the draft laws submitted to the Seimas are made public so that the groups of society and the parties concerned have enough time to access them and to express their opinion, comments, and proposals concerning these draft laws, which would be assessed in a responsible and reasoned manner.

The deliberation of draft laws under urgency procedure

Interpreting the provisions of Paragraph 1 of Article 69 and Article 76 of the Constitution, the Constitutional Court has held that, while passing laws, the Seimas may also deliberate them under the urgency procedure provided for in the Statute of the Seimas (ruling of 18 October 2000). It should be noted that the deliberation of draft laws under urgency procedure implies the shortening of the stages of the legislation process, especially the stage of deliberation; thus, it also implies the limited possibilities for ensuring the fulfilment of the requirements of the publicity and transparency of the legislation process, as well as the quality requirements for laws, which stem from the Constitution, inter alia, Paragraphs 2 and 3 of Article 5 thereof, and the constitutional principles of a state under the rule of law and responsible governance.

In the light of this ... while regulating the legislative procedure under Paragraph 1 of Article 69 and Article 76 of the Constitution, the Seimas may establish such a legal regulation governing the deliberation of draft laws under urgency procedure according to which this urgency procedure would be applied in special cases, when the political, social, economic, or other circumstances require, as a matter of urgency, to establish a new legal regulation or to amend an effective legal regulation in order to ensure important interests of society and the state or to protect other constitutional values. It should also be noted that the Constitution, inter alia, Paragraphs 2 and 3 of Article 5 thereof, and the constitutional principles of a state under the rule of law and responsible governance give rise to the requirement, while regulating the procedure for the deliberation of draft laws under urgency procedure, to create the preconditions for ensuring the internal preventive control of the Seimas over the compliance of laws with the Constitution.

The deliberation of draft laws and other draft acts of the Seimas under special urgency procedure

... implementing the powers to regulate legislative procedure, which are consolidated in Paragraph 1 of Article 69 and Article 76 of the Constitution, the Seimas may also provide for the procedure for the deliberation of draft laws and other draft acts of the Seimas under special urgency procedure in the Statute of the Seimas. It should be noted that this procedure for the deliberation of laws and other acts of the Seimas under special urgency procedure implies that the stages of the legislation process, especially the stage of deliberation, may be shortened even more than while deliberating draft laws and other draft acts of the Seimas under urgency procedure, i.e. the stage of deliberation, which, as mentioned before, is the stage guaranteeing the application of democratic principles in the legislation process, may become only formal. Therefore, the application of the special urgency procedure to the deliberation of laws and other acts of the Seimas provides particularly limited possibilities for ensuring the fulfilment of the requirements of the publicity and transparency of the legislation process and the quality requirements for laws and other acts of the Seimas, which stem from the Constitution, inter alia, Paragraphs 2 and 3 of Article 5 thereof and the constitutional principles of a state under the rule of law and responsible governance.

In view of this ... it should be noted that, while regulating the legislative procedure under Paragraph 1 of Article 69 and Article 76 of the Constitution, the Seimas may establish such a legal regulation governing the deliberation of draft laws and other draft acts of the Seimas under special urgency procedure according to which this special urgency procedure could be applied only in exceptional constitutionally justifiable cases, where it is necessary to immediately ensure the vital interests of society and the state as, for instance, while imposing or upon the imposition of martial law or a state of emergency, while announcing or upon the announcement of mobilisation, while adopting a decision to use the armed forces in the event of an armed attack, and/or where a particularly urgent need arises to fulfil international obligations, also due to a natural disaster or under other extreme circumstances, or in the event of such a threat to the security of the state and society the elimination of which requires the decisions of utmost urgency by the legislature. It should also be noted that the Constitution, inter alia, Paragraphs 2 and 3 of Article 5 thereof, and the constitutional principles of a state under the rule of law and responsible governance give rise to the requirement to create the preconditions, also while regulating the procedure for the deliberation of draft laws and other draft acts of the Seimas under special urgency procedure, for ensuring the internal preventive control of the Seimas over the compliance of laws and other acts of the Seimas with the Constitution. It should be emphasised that a different legal regulation, under which draft laws and other draft acts of the Seimas could be deliberated under special urgency procedure not in exceptional constitutionally justifiable cases or it would be allowed to adopt draft laws or other draft acts of the Seimas, after they are deliberated under special urgency procedure, without ensuring the internal preventive control of the Seimas over their compliance with the Constitution, would be incompatible with the requirements of the publicity and transparency of the legislation process and the quality requirements for laws and other acts of the Seimas, which stem from the Constitution, inter alia, Paragraphs 2 and 3 of Article 5 thereof and the constitutional principles of a state under the rule of law and responsible governance.

5.5.3. Other legal acts passed by the Seimas

Substatutory legal acts passed by the Seimas (Paragraph 2 of Article 70 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 28 September 2011

... [the] particularities of a substatutory act are also compulsory for other acts adopted by the Seimas, which are specified in Paragraph 2 of Article 70 of the Constitution; substatutory acts of the Seimas may not contradict the Constitution and laws passed by the Seimas, let alone change the norms of laws and their content (ruling of 19 January 1994).

Substatutory acts passed by the Seimas may not regulate those [social] relationships that, under the Constitution, must be regulated by means of a law (ruling of 13 December 2004). The Seimas, while resolving the issues that are a subject matter of regulation by means of laws, may not choose the form of a resolution, because a resolution is a lower-ranking legal act (ruling of 19 January 1994). Substatutory legal acts may not replace laws and may not create any general norms that would compete with the norms of laws, because the supremacy of laws over substatutory acts, which is consolidated in the Constitution, would thus be violated (rulings of 21 August 2002 and 13 December 2004).

[A resolution of the Seimas] ... is a legal act adopted by the Seimas, as the legislature authorised, under the Constitution, inter alia, Articles 67 and 70 thereof, to regulate, by means of laws and other legal acts, the most important social relationships. In the hierarchy of legal acts, a resolution of the Seimas has the force of a substatutory legal act.

The Seimas must adopt substatutory legal acts in accordance with the rules for adopting legal acts, as laid down in the Statute of the Seimas (Paragraph 1 of Article 69 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 27 April 2016

As noted in the Constitutional Court's ruling of 20 February 2013, not only laws, but also substatutory legal acts of the Seimas, must be adopted in compliance with the rules for adopting legal acts, as defined in the Statute of the Seimas.

It should be noted that the provisions of Paragraph 1 of Article 69 of the Constitution, under which laws must be adopted at the Seimas according to the procedure established by law, may not be interpreted only in a linguistic or literal manner as meaning that only laws must be adopted in accordance with the procedure established in legal acts. Paragraph 1 of Article 69 of the Constitution should be interpreted within the context of the overall constitutional legal regulation, by taking into account, inter alia, the mission and functions of the Seimas as legislative power, among other things, the fact that the Seimas adopts not only laws, but also other acts of the Seimas (Articles 67 and 105 of the Constitution). When interpreting Paragraph 1 of Article 69 of the Constitution in the context of the overall constitutional regulation, it should be held that a substantial violation of the procedure laid down in laws or the Statute of the Seimas regarding the adoption of any legal acts of the Seimas (inter alia, substatutory legal acts) concurrently leads to a violation of Paragraph 1 of Article 69 of the Constitution.

As held in the Constitutional Court's ruling of 20 February 2013, the fact that the Seimas does not comply with the Constitution and the Statute of the Seimas in the course of adopting substatutory legal acts means that the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law, which implies the hierarchy of legal acts, is also violated.

The constitutional duty of the Seimas to comply with the procedure for adopting legal acts (Paragraph 1 of Article 69 of the Constitution); the right of initiative to adopt laws and other legal acts of the Seimas (Article 68 of the Constitution)

See 5.5.2. The legislation process; the ruling of 29 June 2018.

The powers of the Seimas to establish the procedure for adopting acts of the Seimas other than laws (Paragraph 1 of Article 69 and Article 76 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 16 April 2019

As the Constitutional Court has noted, the provisions of Paragraph 1 of Article 69 of the Constitution, under which laws must be adopted at the Seimas according to the procedure established by law, may not be interpreted only in a linguistic or literal manner as meaning that only laws must be adopted in accordance with the procedure established in legal acts; Paragraph 1 of Article 69 of the Constitution should be interpreted within the context of the overall constitutional legal regulation, by taking into account, inter alia, the mission and functions of the Seimas as the legislature, among other things, the fact that the Seimas adopts not only laws, but also other acts of the Seimas (Articles 67 and 105 of the Constitution) (rulings of 27 April 2016 and 29 June 2018).

In view of this, it should be noted that, while implementing the powers, consolidated in Paragraph 1 of Article 69 and Article 76 of the Constitution, to regulate the legislative procedure, the Seimas must also provide for the legislative procedure of the acts of the Seimas other than laws. As these acts of the Seimas, as a rule, do not establish a new legal regulation or amend an effective legal regulation, it should also be noted that the legislative procedure of the acts of the Seimas other than laws may be simpler, inter alia, the same as the procedure for the deliberation of draft laws as a matter of urgency. However, it should be emphasised that, in any case, when regulating the legislative procedure of the acts of the Seimas other than laws, it is necessary to respect the requirements of the publicity and transparency of the legislative procedures and the quality requirements for the acts of the Seimas, which stem from the Constitution, inter alia, Paragraphs 2 and 3 of Article 5 thereof, and the constitutional principles of a state under the rule of law and responsible governance.

The concept of a resolution of the Seimas

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 28 August 2020

The Constitutional Court has ... held that a resolution of the Seimas is a legal act adopted by the Seimas as the legislature authorised under the Constitution, inter alia, Articles 67 and 70 thereof, to regulate, by means of laws and other legal acts, the most important social relationships. In the hierarchy of legal acts, a resolution of the Seimas has the force of a substatutory legal act (ruling of 28 September 2011). It should be noted that such a concept of a resolution of the Seimas implies that, by means of a resolution, the Seimas decides on the most important state governance issues that are assigned to the competence of the Seimas under the Constitution and laws and do not require a legal regulation established by means of a law, but deciding on these issues gives rise to legal consequences, inter alia, rights and duties, for other persons.

... the Constitution expressis verbis stipulates that the Seimas adopts resolutions on: early elections to the Seimas (Paragraphs 1 and 4 of Article 58); the deprivation of the mandate of a member of the Seimas who either does not take the oath according to the procedure established by law or takes a conditional oath (Paragraph 3 of Article 59); referendums (Item 3 of Article 67); the cessation of the powers of the President of the Republic when the Seimas, taking into consideration the conclusion of the Constitutional Court, by a 3/5 majority vote of all the members of the Seimas, decides that the state of health of the President of the Republic does not allow him/her to hold office (Item 6 of Article 88); the implementation of laws (Item 2 of Article 94); an application to the Constitutional Court, requesting an investigation into the conformity of an act with the Constitution (Paragraph 5 (wording of 21 March 2019) of Article 106).

Thus, in accordance with Paragraphs 1 and 4 of Article 58, Paragraph 3 of Article 59, Item 3 of Article 67, Item 6 of Article 88, and Item 2 of Article 94 of the Constitution, the Seimas adopts resolutions of the Seimas when deciding on the most important state governance issues that are specified in these provisions of the Constitution. Taking into account such an overall constitutional regulation, inter alia, the above-mentioned constitutional concept of a resolution of the Seimas, it should be concluded that, in deciding also on other state governance issues assigned to it under the Constitution and laws in cases where the regulation of these issues does not require the adoption of laws and deciding on these issues gives rise to legal consequences for other persons, the Seimas adopts resolutions of the Seimas, although the respective provisions of the Constitution do not explicitly specify the form of the act to be adopted by the Seimas. Under the Constitution, such issues include, inter alia: the consent of the Seimas to hold criminally responsible or detain, or to otherwise restrict the liberty of members of the Seimas, the Prime Minister or ministers, or judges (Paragraph 2 of Article 62, Article 100, and Paragraph 2 of Article 114); the revocation of the mandate of a member of the Seimas through the procedure for impeachment proceedings (Item 5 of Article 63 and Article 74); the termination of the powers of a member of the Seimas after declaring the respective election invalid or if the law on elections is grossly violated, or when he/she takes up or does not give up an occupation that is incompatible with the duties of a member of the Seimas (Items 6 and 7 of Article 63); calling elections of the President of the Republic (Item 4 of Article 67); appointing and releasing the heads of state institutions provided for by law (Item 5 of Article 67); giving or not giving assent to the candidate proposed by the President of the Republic for the post of the Prime Minister, giving assent to the release of the Prime Minister from his/her duties (Item 6 of Article 67, Items 4, 5, and 8 of Article 84, and Paragraph 1 of Article 92); giving or not giving assent to the programme of the Government submitted by the Prime Minister (Item 7 of Article 67 and Paragraph 5 of Article 92); expressing no confidence in the Government, the Prime Minister, or ministers (Item 9 of Article 67 and Item 2 of Paragraph 3, as well as Paragraph 4, of Article 101); the appointment of the justices of the Constitutional Court, the justices of the Supreme Court, and the Presidents of these courts (Item 10 of Article 67, Paragraphs 1 and 2 of Article 103, and Paragraph 2 of Article 112); the appointment of the Auditor General and the Chairperson of the Board of the Bank of Lithuania and their release from duties (Item 11 of Article 67, Paragraph 2 of Article 126, and Paragraph 2 of Article 133); calling elections to municipal councils (Item 12 of Article 67); forming the Central Electoral Commission and altering its composition (Item 13 of Article 67); imposing direct rule and martial law, declaring a state of emergency, announcing mobilisation demobilisation, and adopting a decision to use the armed forces (Item 20 of Article 67, Paragraph 4 of Article 123, Paragraph 1 of Article 142, and Paragraph 1 of Article 144); removing from office the President of the Republic, the President and justices of the Constitutional Court, the President and justices of the Supreme Court, the President and judges of the Court of Appeal according to the procedure for impeachment proceedings (Article 74, Paragraph 2 of Article 86, Item 5 of Article 88, Item 5 of Article 108, and Article 116); dismissing from office officials appointed or elected by the Seimas, with the exception of the persons specified in Article 74 of the Constitution, in cases where the Seimas expresses no confidence in them (Article 75); giving assent to the candidates for the posts of judges of the Court of Appeal and the President of this court (Item 11 of Article 84 and Paragraph 3 of Article 112); giving assent to the candidate for the post of the Prosecutor General of the Republic of Lithuania (Item 11 of Article 84 and Paragraph 5 of Article 118); giving assent to appointing the Commander of the Armed Forces and the Head of the Security Service and releasing them from duties (Item 14 of Article 84); the termination of the powers of a justice of the Constitutional Court on his/her resignation or when he/she is incapable of holding office due to the state of his/her health (Items 3 and 4 of Article 108); approving or overruling the decisions of the President of the Republic on defence against armed aggression, the imposition of martial law, the announcement of mobilisation, and the declaration of a state of emergency (Paragraph 2 of Article 142 and Paragraph 2 of Article 144).

The procedure for adopting resolutions of the Seimas

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 28 August 2020

... one of the democratic principles of the adoption of decisions in the Seimas is the principle of majority (inter alia, the rulings of 22 July 1994 and 4 April 2006 and the decision of 15 May 2009). The political will of the majority of the members of the Seimas is reflected in decisions adopted by the Seimas (inter alia, the conclusion of 31 March 2004, the ruling of 4 April 2006, and the decision of 15 May 2009). Under the Constitution, the will of the Seimas regarding the adoption of particular decisions may not be expressed otherwise than by vote of members of the Seimas at a sitting of the Seimas and the adoption of the respective legal act (inter alia, the decision of 15 May 2009, the conclusion of 3 June 2014, and the ruling 29 June 2018).

As the Constitutional Court has noted, the provisions of Paragraph 1 of Article 69 of the Constitution, under which laws must be adopted at the Seimas according to the procedure established by law, must not be interpreted only in a linguistic or literal manner as meaning that only laws must be adopted in accordance with the procedure established in legal acts; Paragraph 1 of Article 69 of the Constitution should be interpreted within the context of the overall constitutional legal regulation, by taking into account, inter alia, the mission and functions of the Seimas as the legislature, among other things, the fact that the Seimas adopts not only laws, but also other legal acts of the Seimas (rulings of 27 April 2016, 29 June 2018, and 16 April 2019). ... in deciding on state governance issues assigned to it under the Constitution and laws in cases where the regulation of these issues does not require the adoption of laws and deciding on these issues gives rise to legal consequences for other persons, the Seimas adopts resolutions of the Seimas.

In view of this, it should be noted that the provisions of Paragraph 2 of Article 69 of the Constitution must not be interpreted only in a linguistic or literal manner as meaning that only laws are deemed to be adopted if a majority of the members of the Seimas participating in the sitting have voted for them. In accordance with the above-mentioned democratic principle of decision-making in the Seimas by majority, under Paragraph 2 of Article 69 of the Constitution, a majority of the members of the Seimas participating in the sitting is also necessary for the adoption of resolutions of the Seimas by means of which the Seimas decides on state governance issues assigned to it under the Constitution and laws and deciding on these issues gives rise to legal consequences for other persons, unless the Constitution explicitly specifies a different majority necessary for the adoption of the respective decision of the Seimas (for example, under Article 74 of the Constitution, the Seimas may, through impeachment proceedings, by a 3/5 majority vote of all its members, remove the President of the Republic, the President and justices of the Constitutional Court, the President and justices of the Supreme Court, the President and judges of the Court of Appeal, or revoke the mandate of a member of the Seimas; under Article 75 of the Constitution, the officials appointed or elected by the Seimas, with the exception of the persons specified in Article 74 of the Constitution, are dismissed from office when the Seimas expresses no confidence in them by a majority vote of all the members of the Seimas).

... the rule for adopting, by a majority vote of the members of the Seimas participating in the sitting of the Seimas, resolutions of the Seimas by means of which the Seimas decides on state governance issues assigned to it under the Constitution and laws in cases where deciding on these issues gives rise to legal consequences for other persons is explicitly laid down in Paragraph 5 of Article 92 of the Constitution, according to which a new Government receives the powers to act after the Seimas gives assent to its programme by a majority vote of the members of the Seimas participating in the sitting.

Resolutions of the Seimas written down in the minutes

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 28 August 2020

... under the Constitution, by means of the resolutions of the Seimas that are written down in the minutes of a sitting of the Seimas, the Seimas may not decide on any state governance issues that are assigned to the Seimas under the Constitution and laws in cases where the regulation of these issues does not require the adoption of laws and deciding on these issues gives rise to legal consequences for other persons.

6. THE PRESIDENT OF THE REPUBLIC

6.1. THE CONSTITUTIONAL STATUS OF THE PRESIDENT OF THE REPUBLIC

The immunity of the President of the Republic (Article 86 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 8 May 2000

Paragraph 1 of Article 86 of the Constitution prescribes:

“The person of the President of the Republic shall be inviolable: while in office, he may be neither detained nor held criminally or administratively liable.”

[By this provision of Paragraph 1 of Article 86 of the Constitution] the immunity of the President of the Republic ... [is] established. Immunity means additional guarantees for the protection of the inviolability of the respective person where such guarantees are necessary and indispensable for the proper performance of the duties of the said person. The immunity of the President of the Republic as the Head of State ... must ensure that the President of the Republic ... might perform the functions established in the Constitution without hindrance and that the officials of executive power could be precluded from exerting the possible adverse influence on the President of the Republic

[...]

Paragraph 1 of Article 86 of the Constitution provides that, while in office, the President of the Republic may be neither detained nor held criminally or administratively liable. Consequently, while the President of the Republic is in office, his/her immunity is very broad, i.e. his/her right of immunity may be subject to limitations only after he/she ceases to perform his/her duties. On the other hand, immunity is limited in time: immunity is applied from the moment when the President of the Republic takes office and expires when he/she loses his/her duties as the President of the Republic. It needs to be emphasised that the Constitution provides for the constitutional responsibility of the President of the Republic: if he/she is found to have committed a gross violation of the Constitution, to have breached the oath of office, or to have committed a crime, he/she may be removed from office by the Seimas through impeachment proceedings (Paragraph 2 of Article 86 of the Constitution) and then his/her right of the inviolability of his/her person may be limited on the same grounds and in accordance with the same procedure as the said right of other persons.

[...]

As mentioned before, the immunity of the President of the Republic is very broad while he/she is in office. The content of immunity is composed of the following: while in office, the President of the Republic may not be subjected to criminal prosecution as he/she may not be held criminally liable; any measures (save impeachment proceedings) that might create the conditions for initiating criminal prosecution against the President of the Republic are prohibited. Thus, the conclusion should be drawn that no forms of operational activities, including a criminal conduct simulation model, may be applied against the President of the Republic.

The constitutional status of the President of the Republic as the Head of State (Article 77 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 30 December 2003

Paragraph 1 of Article 77 of the Constitution provides that the President of the Republic is the Head of State. Interpreting Article 77 of the Constitution, in its ruling of 8 May 2000, the Constitutional Court held that “the status of the Head of State is acquired for the period established in the Constitution only by one person, i.e. the President of the Republic, who is elected by citizens of the Republic of Lithuania. The legal status of the President of the Republic as the Head of State is individual and different from that of all other citizens”. Under the Constitution, the legal status of the President of the Republic as the Head of State is different from that of the rest of state officials (the ruling of 19 June 2002).

In its ruling of 19 June 2002, the Constitutional Court also held that the individual and exceptional legal status of the President of the Republic as the Head of State is revealed in various provisions of the Constitution, which consolidate: the inviolability of the President of the Republic; the impossibility for the President of the Republic to be a member of the Seimas, to hold another office, and to receive remuneration other than remuneration established for the President of the Republic and remuneration for creative activities; the duty of a person elected as the President of the Republic to suspend his/her activities in political parties and political organisations; the requirements for candidates seeking the office of the President of the Republic; the grounds and procedure for the election of the President of the Republic; the oath of the President of the Republic; the powers of the President of the Republic, their commencement and cessation etc.

Under Paragraph 2 of Article 77 of the Constitution, the President of the Republic represents the State of Lithuania.

It should be noted that the State of Lithuania is created by the Nation; sovereignty belongs to the Nation (Article 2 of the Constitution). Article 4 of the Constitution provides that “The Nation shall execute its supreme sovereign power either directly or through its democratically elected representatives”. Under Paragraph 1 of Article 55 of the Constitution, members of the Seimas are representatives of the Nation. Thus, only the Seimas is the representation of the Nation.

As mentioned before, the President of the Republic is the Head of State and represents the State of Lithuania. Although representing the Nation and representing the State must not be opposed, however, representing the Nation and representing the State are not identical legal categories: the said categories have the legal content characterised by individual features.

The oath of the President of the Republic (Paragraph 1 of Article 82 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 30 December 2003

Paragraph 1 of Article 82 of the Constitution consolidates the provision that the elected President of the Republic takes office only after he/she takes an oath to the Nation.

In view of the fact that the representatives of the Nation, members of the Seimas, sit in the House of the Seimas, the phrase “in Vilnius, in the presence of the representatives of the Nation – the Members of the Seimas” of Paragraph 1 of Article 82 of the Constitution implies that the elected President of the Republic must take an oath specifically in the House of the Seimas, which, under the Constitution, must be only in Vilnius, the capital of the Republic of Lithuania.

Paragraph 1 of Article 82 of the Constitution establishes the content of the oath of the elected President of the Republic to the Nation: the elected President of the Republic must take an oath to be faithful to the Republic of Lithuania and the Constitution, to conscientiously fulfil the duties of his/her office, and to be equally just to all.

It needs to be emphasised that the oath of the elected President of the Republic reflects the main values enshrined in the Constitution – the Nation links such values with the office of the President of the Republic.

It needs to be noted that the oath of the elected President of the Republic is different from the oath taken by a member of the Seimas, by the Prime Minister and ministers, by a justice of the Constitutional Court, or by a judge of another court. The elected President of the Republic is the only person indicated in the Constitution who takes an oath to the special entity to whom sovereignty belongs: the elected President of the Republic takes an oath to the Nation. The oath of the elected President of the Republic has the characteristic difference, according to which, the oath of the elected President of the Republic to the Nation reflects the most important and universal constitutional values: while in office, the President of the Republic cannot deviate from the said values; these constitutional values are inseparable from one another; the content of these values is very voluminous, comprising numerous other constitutional obligations, which are of no less importance.

The oath of the elected President of the Republic is not a mere formal or symbolic act. In view of the fact that the institute of the oath of the President of the Republic and the content of such an oath are established in the Constitution, the oath of the President of the Republic has a constitutional significance and gives rise to constitutional legal effects.

The provisions of Paragraph 1 of Article 82 of the Constitution that, on the day following the expiry of the term of office of the President of the Republic, the elected President of the Republic takes office after he/she takes an oath to the Nation mean that, as long as the elected President of the Republic has not taken an oath to the Nation, he/she cannot take office. The elected President of the Republic takes office precisely at the moment after he/she takes an oath to the Nation.

The action of the oath of the elected President of the Republic is also legally significant due to the fact that, from the moment that the elected President of the Republic takes an oath, the powers of the former President of the Republic cease.

It needs to be noted that, under the Constitution, any refusal of the elected President of the Republic to take an oath to the Nation in the Seimas at the time prescribed by the Constitution, or taking an oath with reservations or changing the text of the oath, as well as any refusal of the elected President of the Republic to sign the text of the oath, means that the elected President of the Republic may not take office and that a new election of the President of the Republic must be called.

The action of the oath of the President of the Republic is also legally significant due to the fact that, from the moment of taking an oath, the duty arises for the President of the Republic to act only in such a way as he/she is obliged by the oath taken to the Nation. A breach of the oath constitutes one of the grounds on which the President of the Republic may be removed from office through impeachment proceedings (Article 74 of the Constitution). It needs to be noted that a breach of the oath is also a gross violation of the Constitution, while a gross violation of the Constitution is also a breach of the oath.

The duty of the President of the Republic to be equally just to all (Paragraph 1 of Article 82 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 30 December 2003

... under Article 82 of the Constitution, the elected President of the Republic must take an oath to be faithful to the Republic of Lithuania and the Constitution, to conscientiously fulfil the duties of his/her office, and to be equally just to all.

The requirement consolidated in Paragraph 1 of Article 82 of the Constitution, according to which the President of the Republic must be equally just to all, should be interpreted by taking into consideration the provision of Paragraph 1 of Article 29 of the Constitution, whereby all persons are equal before the law, courts, and other state institutions and officials.

The requirement that the President of the Republic must be equally just to all, which is established in Paragraph 1 of Article 82 of the Constitution, in conjunction with the provision of Paragraph 2 of Article 77 of the Constitution, whereby the President of the Republic performs everything with which he/she is charged by the Constitution and laws, means that the President of the Republic, while implementing the powers established for him/her in the Constitution and laws, must follow only the Constitution and laws and must not violate them, that the President of the Republic must act only in the interests of the Nation and the State of Lithuania, that the President of the Republic, while implementing the powers established for him/her in the Constitution and laws, cannot act by pursuing such aims and interests that are inconsistent with the Constitution and laws or with public interests. The constitutional requirement that the President of the Republic must be equally just to all obligates him/her to act in such a manner that would prevent a conflict between the interests of the President of the Republic as a private person on the one hand, and, on the other hand, his/her constitutional duty that he/she as the Head of State must represent the State of Lithuania and act only in the interests of the Nation and the State of Lithuania.

The provision of Paragraph 1 of Article 82 of the Constitution, according to which the President of the Republic must be equally just to all, in conjunction with the provision of Article 29 of the Constitution, whereby all persons are equal before state institutions and officials, means not only that the President of the Republic has the duty to treat equally all persons for whom the respective legal provision is meant, but also that the President of the Republic has the duty to apply this legal norm equally and justly to all persons. The provision of Paragraph 1 of Article 29 of the Constitution, according to which all persons are equal before state institutions and officials, and the provision of Paragraph 1 of Article 82, whereby the President of the Republic must be equally just to all, cannot be interpreted as meaning that, purportedly, according to these provisions, the President of the Republic would be equally just to all in situations where a certain legal norm is applied to all persons equally unjustly. Such an interpretation of the said provisions of Paragraph 1 of Article 29 and Paragraph 1 of Article 82 of the Constitution would not be in line with the constitutional principles of a state under the rule of law and justice on which the Constitution itself and the entire legal system of Lithuania are based.

... as such, the mere fact that a decree of the President of the Republic is declared in conflict with the Constitution or a law does not mean that the President of the Republic has grossly violated the Constitution, or breached the oath, or committed a crime. Deciding whether the President of the Republic, having issued a decree that is in conflict with the Constitution or a law, has grossly violated the Constitution, or breached the oath, or committed a crime, it is necessary to assess not only the content of the decree of the President of the Republic, but also whether, in the course of issuing the decree of the President of the Republic, the requirements established in the Constitution and the relevant laws were fulfilled and whether the established procedure was followed; in addition, it is also necessary to assess other factual circumstances surrounding the issuance of such a decree.

It needs to be noted that a violation of Paragraph 1 of Article 29 of the Constitution is in all cases a violation of the principle of the formal equality of persons. Meanwhile, the provision of Paragraph 1 of Article 82 of the Constitution, whereby the President of the Republic must be equally just to all, consolidates not only the duty of the President of the Republic not to violate the principle of the formal equality of persons, but also his/her duty not to act in the manner that, in the course of the implementation of the powers established for him/her in the Constitution and laws, the President of the Republic would knowingly treat not equally justly persons (their groups) with respect to whom he/she adopts decisions. Thus, the provision of Paragraph 1 of Article 82 of the Constitution, whereby the President of the Republic must be equally just to all, would not necessarily be violated in all cases when Paragraph 1 of Article 29 of the Constitution (the principle of the formal equality of persons) is violated, but only when the President of the Republic, while implementing the powers established for him/her in the Constitution and laws, knowingly acts in such a way that persons (their groups) with respect to whom the President of the Republic adopts decisions would not be treated equally justly.

Thus, as such, the mere fact that a decree of the President of the Republic is ruled to be in conflict with Paragraph 1 of Article 29 of the Constitution does not mean that, by issuing such a decree, the President of the Republic violated the provision of Paragraph 1 of Article 82 of the Constitution, according to which the President of the Republic must be equally just to all. While deciding whether, by issuing a decree that is in conflict with Paragraph 1 of Article 29 of the Constitution, the President of the Republic at the same time violated the provision of Paragraph 1 of Article 82 of the Constitution, whereby the President of the Republic must be equally just to all, it is necessary to assess not only the content of such a decree of the President of the Republic, but also the factual circumstances surrounding the issuance of such a decree.

The phrase "all persons shall be equal" of Paragraph 1 of Article 29 of the Constitution means that the principle of the equality before the law, the court, and other state institutions and officials must be applied not only to citizens of the Republic of Lithuania, but also to citizens of foreign states and stateless persons.

... the provision of Paragraph 1 of Article 82 of the Constitution, whereby the President of the Republic must be equally just to all, means that the President of the Republic must be equally just not only to citizens of the Republic of Lithuania who comprise the national community – the civil Nation, but also to all other persons, i.e. to citizens of foreign states and stateless persons with respect to whom the President of the Republic adopts decisions.

... if a law provides that citizenship of the Republic of Lithuania may be granted by way of exception to a citizen of a foreign state or a stateless person in recognition of merit to the Republic of Lithuania, this means that this requirement must be applied to all citizens of foreign states or stateless persons who request citizenship of the Republic of Lithuania granted by way of exception. If citizenship of the Republic of Lithuania were granted by way of exception to a citizen of a foreign state or a stateless person with no merit to the Republic of Lithuania, the principle of the equality of persons that includes the equality of persons before state institutions or officials, as consolidated in Paragraph 1 of Article 29 of the Constitution, as well as the provision of Paragraph 1 of Article 82 of the Constitution, whereby the President of the Republic must be equally just to all, would be disregarded.

If a law established the grounds under which citizenship of the Republic of Lithuania is not granted, the principle of the equality of all persons, as well as the constitutional imperative that the President of the Republic must be equally just to all, would require verification in all cases before the issuance of a decree of the President of the Republic on granting citizenship of the Republic of Lithuania (as well as on granting citizenship of the Republic of Lithuania by way of exception to citizens of foreign states or stateless persons in recognition of their merit to the Republic of Lithuania) whether there are any grounds, established in the law, that preclude granting citizenship of the Republic of Lithuania. Otherwise, the principle of the equality of persons, which is consolidated in Article 29 of the Constitution, as well as the provision of Paragraph 1 of Article 82 of the Constitution, whereby the President of the Republic must be equally just to all, would be disregarded.

The requirements established in Article 29 and Paragraph 1 of Article 82 of the Constitution would also be disregarded if the President of the Republic, when implementing the powers established for him/her in the Constitution and laws to grant citizenship of the Republic of Lithuania, would apply equally unjustly a legal norm addressed to all relevant persons (either to separate groups of persons or to individual persons).

It needs to be noted that the duty of the President of the Republic to be equally just to all, arising out of the Constitution, when he/she implements the powers, established for him/her in the Constitution and laws, to decide on citizenship issues has certain particularities. These particularities are determined by the fact that, under [the law], the President of the Republic has the right, but not the duty, to grant citizenship by way of exception to citizens of foreign states or stateless persons in recognition of their merit to the Republic of Lithuania: citizenship of the Republic of Lithuania may not necessarily be granted by way of exception even to a citizen of a foreign state or a stateless person with merit to the Republic of Lithuania. This is decided at the discretion of the President of the Republic. However, the circumstance that only the President of the Republic has the right to decide whether a citizen of a foreign state or a stateless person can be granted citizenship of the Republic of Lithuania by way of exception cannot be interpreted as meaning that the President of the Republic, when deciding whether to grant citizenship of the Republic of Lithuania to a citizen of a foreign state or a stateless person in recognition of merit to the Republic of Lithuania, may disregard the requirements established in the Constitution and [the law] and may clearly be partial and non-objective. Nor can the circumstance that, under [the law], the issues of granting citizenship of the Republic of Lithuania are decided by the President of the Republic at his/her discretion, be interpreted as meaning that, prior to issuing a decree on granting citizenship of the Republic of Lithuania by way of exception, the President of the Republic may apply the equal legal procedures established in the law to all persons in an unequal manner, or as meaning that, prior to issuing a decree on granting citizenship of the Republic of Lithuania, the President of the Republic does not have the duty to receive, from the institutions (their officials) preparing citizenship documents, the confirmation that all requirements established in [the law] have been fulfilled (that all procedures established in [the law] have been accomplished) and that there are not any legal obstacles to issuing the respective decree of the President of the Republic.

Any unequal application of the equal legal procedures established to all persons in the law not only places in an unequal situation the citizens of foreign states or stateless persons that seek to be granted citizenship of the Republic of Lithuania by way of exception, but also means that all persons are not equal before the state institutions or their officials that, in an unequal manner, apply the equal legal procedures established to all persons in the law. If the President of the Republic, in an unequal manner, applies the equal legal procedures established to all persons in the law, he/she derogates from the constitutional requirement to be equally just to all.

The Constitutional Court's conclusion of 31 March 2004

Under Article 77 of the Constitution, the President of the Republic is the Head of State; the President of the Republic represents the State of Lithuania and performs everything with which he/she is charged by the Constitution and laws. Interpreting Article 77 of the Constitution, in its rulings of 8 May 2000 and 19 June 2002, the Constitutional Court held that only one person acquires the status of the Head of State for the period defined in the Constitution, i.e. the President of the Republic who is elected by citizens of the Republic of Lithuania, and that the legal status of the President of the Republic as the Head of State is an individual one and different from that of the rest of state officials and that of the rest of citizens.

The exceptional legal status of the President of the Republic as the Head of State is revealed by various provisions of the Constitution, which establish the inviolability of the person of the President of the Republic, the prohibition on holding the President of the Republic criminally and administratively liable, the oath of the President of the Republic, his/her powers, the beginning and expiry of these powers, etc.

Under Paragraph 2 of Article 78 of the Constitution, the President of the Republic is elected for a five-year term. The powers of the President of the Republic may expire before the established time only on the grounds laid down in the Constitution. One of such grounds is when the Seimas removes the President of the Republic from office through impeachment proceedings (Item 5 of Article 88 of the Constitution).

It needs to be noted that the President of the Republic, while taking office, takes an oath to the Nation to be faithful to the Republic of Lithuania and the Constitution, to conscientiously fulfil the duties of his/her office, and to be equally just to all (Paragraph 1 of Article 82 of the Constitution). The oath of the elected President of the Republic reflects the main values enshrined in the Constitution – the Nation links such values with the office of the President of the Republic; these values are inseparable from one another; the President of the Republic, while in office, cannot deviate from the universal constitutional values of utmost importance to the Nation, which are consolidated in the oath of the President of the Republic. In its ruling of 30 December 2003, the Constitutional Court held that, from the moment of taking the oath, the duty arises for the President of the Republic to act only in such a way as he/she is obliged by the oath taken to the Nation, as well as that a breach of the oath constitutes one of the grounds established in the Constitution on the basis of which the President of the Republic may be removed from office through impeachment proceedings. In the said ruling, the Constitutional Court also held that a breach of the oath of the President of the Republic is also a gross violation of the Constitution, while a gross violation of the Constitution is also a breach of the oath.

Under Paragraph 2 of Article 77 of the Constitution, the President of the Republic represents the State of Lithuania and performs everything with which he/she is charged by the Constitution and laws. The provision of Paragraph 2 of Article 77 of the Constitution, whereby the President of the Republic performs everything with which he/she is charged by the Constitution and laws, when account is taken of the content of the oath of the President of the Republic laid down in Paragraph 1 of Article 82 of the Constitution, means that the President of the Republic, when implementing the powers established for him/her in the Constitution and laws, must follow only the Constitution and laws and must not violate them, that the President of the Republic must act only in the interests of the Nation and the state, that the President of the Republic may not act by pursuing such aims and interests that are inconsistent with the Constitution and laws, with the interests of the Nation and the state, or with public interests, that the President of the Republic may not promote personal or group interests over those of society and the state, and that he/she may not act in the manner that would discredit state authority.

It needs to be noted that the possibility consolidated in the Constitution to remove the President of the Republic from office through impeachment proceedings is a form of public democratic control over the activities of the President of the Republic, a manner of the constitutional responsibility of the President of the Republic before the Nation, and one of the means of the self-defence of democratic civil society against the abuse of authority by the President of the Republic. Under Article 74 of the Constitution, it is permitted to institute impeachment proceedings against the President of the Republic only for a gross violation of the Constitution, a breach of the oath, or if he/she is found to have committed a crime; only the Seimas may remove the President of the Republic from office and this is done in accordance with the procedure established in the Statute of the Seimas; the President of the Republic is removed from office only if not less than 3/5 of all the members of the Seimas vote for this.

The right to criticise state institutions or officials is a right of every citizen of the Republic of Lithuania, including state officials or politicians. It is clear that the President of the Republic also has this constitutional right.

It should be noted that, as such, criticism publicly expressed by the President of the Republic with regard to state institutions or officials or a negative assessment of their decisions should not be regarded as bringing discredit on the authority of the respective state institutions or officials. While assessing whether criticism publicly expressed by the President of the Republic with regard to state institutions or officials or a negative assessment of their decisions brings discredit on such institutions or officials, account should be taken of both the content of this criticism (negative assessment) and all circumstances under which such criticism (negative assessment) was made public.

At the same time, it needs to be emphasised that the President of the Republic is the Head of State; the President of the Republic represents the State of Lithuania. The President of the Republic is one of the institutions of state power. All activities of the President of the Republic must be based on respect for the state and for its all institutions of power. The constitutional status of the President of the Republic implies that, by expressing his/her public criticism against other state institutions or their officials, the President of the Republic has the duty to avoid both opposition between the branches of power and any unreasonable disparagement or unfounded denial of decisions taken by other branches of power. The exceptional constitutional status of the President of the Republic and his/her role in the state obliges him/her to choose proper and correct forms of expressing criticism. If these requirements were disregarded, the trust of the Nation in the institution of the President of the Republic itself would be degraded and the authority of this institution would be diminished.

The constitutional status of the President of the Republic as the Head of State (Article 77 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 25 May 2004

Under Article 77 of the Constitution, the President of the Republic is the Head of State; he/she represents the State of Lithuania and performs everything with which he/she is charged by the Constitution and laws.

Interpreting Article 77 of the Constitution, in its ruling of 8 May 2000, the Constitutional Court held the following: "The status of the Head of State is acquired for the period established in the Constitution only by one person, i.e. the President of the Republic, who is elected by citizens of the Republic of Lithuania. The legal status of the President of the Republic as the Head of State is individual and different from that of all other citizens."

Under the Constitution, the legal status of the President of the Republic as the Head of State is an exceptional one and it differs from the legal status of all other state officials. The individual and exceptional constitutional legal status of the President of the Republic as the Head of State is revealed in various provisions of the Constitution, which consolidate: the inviolability of the person of the President of the Republic; the impossibility for the President of the Republic to be a member of the Seimas, to hold another office, and to receive remuneration other than remuneration established for the President of the Republic and remuneration for creative activities; the duty for the person elected as the President of the Republic to suspend his/her activities in political parties and political organisations until the beginning of a new election campaign for the post of the President of the Republic; the requirements for candidates seeking the office of the President of the Republic; the grounds and procedure for the election of the President of the Republic; the oath of the President of the Republic; the powers of the President of the Republic, their commencement and cessation, etc. (ruling of 19 June 2002).

The Constitution lays down considerable powers for the President of the Republic as the Head of State. Part of the constitutional powers of the President of the Republic, the Head of State, is linked with the possibility of forming other institutions that exercise state power and/or exerting influence on their activities, decisions adopted by them, and on the law-making process.

For instance, the President of the Republic has the right of legislative initiative at the Seimas (Paragraph 1 of Article 68 of the Constitution). The President of the Republic signs and officially promulgates adopted laws on the alteration of the Constitution (Paragraph 1 of Article 149 of the Constitution), laws adopted by the Seimas (Paragraph 1 of Article 70 of the Constitution), as well as laws adopted by referendum (Paragraph 3 of Article 71 of the Constitution). The President of the Republic has the right to refer, on reasonable grounds, a law adopted by the Seimas back to the Seimas for reconsideration (Paragraph 1 of Article 71 of the Constitution) and may submit amendments and supplements to a law (Paragraph 2 of Article 72 of the Constitution). Under Article 84 of the Constitution, the President of the Republic decides the basic issues of foreign policy and, together with the Government, conducts foreign policy (Item 1); signs international treaties of the Republic of Lithuania and submits them to the Seimas for ratification (Item 2); on the assent of the Seimas, appoints the Prime Minister; charges the Prime Minister with forming the Government; and approves the composition of the formed Government (Item 4); on the assent of the Seimas, releases the Prime Minister from duties (Item 5); appoints and releases ministers on submission by the Prime Minister (Item 9); proposes candidates for the posts of the justices of the Supreme Court for consideration by the Seimas and, on the appointment of all the justices of the Supreme Court, proposes the candidate from among them for the post of the President of the Supreme Court to be appointed by the Seimas; appoints the judges of the Court of Appeal and, from among them, the President of the Court of Appeal, provided that the Seimas gives its assent to the candidates proposed; appoints the judges and presidents of regional and district courts and changes their places of work; in cases provided for by law, submits that the Seimas release judges from their duties; on the assent of the Seimas, appoints and releases the Prosecutor General of the Republic of Lithuania (Item 11); proposes candidates for the posts of three justices of the Constitutional Court and, on the appointment of all the justices of the Constitutional Court, proposes the candidate from among them for the post of the President of the Constitutional Court to be appointed by the Seimas (Item 12); proposes candidates for the posts of the Auditor General and the Chairperson of the Board of the Bank of Lithuania for consideration by the Seimas; may submit that the Seimas express no confidence in them (Item 13); on the assent of the Seimas, appoints and releases the Commander of the Armed Forces and the Head of the Security Service (Item 14); confers the highest military ranks (Item 15); in the event of an armed attack threatening the sovereignty of the State or its territorial integrity, adopts decisions concerning defence against the armed aggression, the imposition of martial law, as well as mobilisation, and submits these decisions for approval at the next sitting of the Seimas (Item 16); declares a state of emergency according to the procedure and in cases established by law and presents this decision for approval at the next sitting of the Seimas (Item 17); Paragraph 4 of Article 112 of the Constitution provides that the judges of district, regional, and specialised courts are appointed, and their places of work are changed, by the President of the Republic. Under Paragraph 2 of Article 140 of the Constitution, the President of the Republic is the Commander-in-Chief of the Armed Forces of the State. The President of the Republic heads the State Defence Council (Paragraph 1 of Article 140 of the Constitution).

The Constitution also lays down other considerable powers for the President of the Republic as the Head of State: the President of the Republic may call an early election to the Seimas under the conditions established in Paragraph 2 of Article 58 of the Constitution (Paragraph 2 of Article 58 of the Constitution); the President of the Republic grants citizenship of the Republic of Lithuania according to the procedure established by law (Item 21 of Article 84 of the Constitution), confers state awards (Item 22 of Article 84 of the Constitution), grants pardons to convicted persons (Item 23 of Article 84 of the Constitution), etc.

As mentioned before, under the Constitution, the President of the Republic performs everything that he/she is charged with by the Constitution and laws. Various powers of the President of the Republic are established not only in the Constitution, but also in laws, which are adopted by the Seimas.

It is clear from the said provisions of the Constitution that the President of the Republic, the Head of State, also has such constitutional powers that enable him/her to exert significant influence on other institutions exercising state power, i.e. on the Seimas, which exercises legislative power, and on the Government, an institution of executive power; the President of the Republic, the Head of State, has also considerable powers in forming the judiciary. The functioning of the other institutions of state power not inconsiderably depends on how the President of the Republic, the Head of State, implements the powers established for him/her in the Constitution.

It needs to be noted that the Constitution gives rise to the duty of the President of the Republic, as the Head of State, while exercising the powers established for him/her in the Constitution and laws, to act in such a way that harmonic interaction among the institutions exercising state power would be maintained, that the citizens of the Republic of Lithuania, the national community, could trust in the institution of the President of the Republic, the Head of State, that the State of Lithuania would be properly represented in its relationships with other countries and international organisations, that the State of Lithuania would be able to duly fulfil its international obligations, and it would be ensured that other entities of international relationships (foreign states, international organisations, etc.) could duly fulfil their obligations to the State of Lithuania. The proper performance of the said constitutional duty of the President of the Republic, the Head of State, is an essential condition for the trust of citizens in the State of Lithuania itself, as the general good of all society, and in its institutions, as well as a condition for the trust of other entities of international relationships in the State of Lithuania.

Thus, when assessing the constitutional legal status of the President of the Republic, the Head of State, it needs to be noted that this status is not only the sum of the powers expressis verbis established for the President of the Republic in the Constitution. The President of the Republic, as the Head of State directly elected by the Nation, symbolises the State of Lithuania and the values of its society and personifies the Republic of Lithuania in international relationships.

The constitutional powers of the President of the Republic and the guarantees established for him/her in the Constitution, as well as the constitutional legal status of the President of the Republic as the Head of State, also imply his/her special responsibility for the national community – the civil Nation.

Requirements for persons eligible to stand for the election as the President of the Republic (Paragraph 2 of Article 34 and Paragraph 1 of Article 78 of the Constitution)

The constitutional status of the President of the Republic (as part of dual executive power)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 13 December 2004

The foundations of the system of the institutions of executive power, as well as the powers of the supreme institutions of executive power, are established in the Constitution. The constitutional order of the State of Lithuania is based on the model of dual executive power: executive power in Lithuania is exercised by the President of the Republic – the Head of State and by the Government.

The President of the Republic is part of executive power (rulings of 10 January 1998, 21 December 1999, and 30 December 2003). Article 77 of the Constitution provides that the President of the Republic is the Head of State (Paragraph 1); he/she represents the State of Lithuania and performs everything with which he/she is charged by the Constitution and laws (Paragraph 2). The President of the Republic, implementing the powers vested in him/her, issues acts-decrees (Article 85 of the Constitution). It should be emphasised that, under Item 2 of Article 94 of the Constitution, the Government executes, inter alia, the decrees of the President of the Republic.

It should be mentioned that the powers of the President of the Republic and those of the Government, as two branches of dual executive power, are autonomous and independent of each other. On the other hand, the Constitution expressis verbis specifies such powers of the President of the Republic and those of the Government that should be jointly implemented by the President of the Republic and the Government. For instance, Article 85 of the Constitution, inter alia, prescribes: “To be valid, the decrees issued by the President of the Republic for the purposes specified in Items 3, 15, 17, and 21 of Article 84 of the Constitution must be signed by the Prime Minister or an appropriate Minister.” According to Item 1 of Article 84 of the Constitution, the President of the Republic, inter alia, together with the Government, conducts foreign policy. It should also be noted that, while paying regard to the Constitution, the legislature may also provide, in a law, for such a legal regulation that certain state institutions would be established under the President of the Republic, the Head of State.

The social guarantees of the President of the Republic (Article 90 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court’s ruling of 3 July 2014

The individual and exceptional constitutional status of the President – the Head of State – includes, as its inseparable part, the constitutional social guarantees of the President.

Article 90 of the Constitution provides that the President has a residence, as well as that the financing of the President and of his/her residence is established by law. In interpreting these provisions of Article 90 of the Constitution, in its ruling of 19 June 2002, the Constitutional Court held that:

- the provisions of Article 90 of the Constitution should be interpreted by taking account of the fact that, under the Constitution, the legal status of the President is individual and different from the status of all other state officials; these constitutional provisions mean that the activities of the President are financed and his/her material and social guarantees are ensured by the state, that the funds necessary for this must be provided for in the state budget, as well as that the financing of the President and of his/her residence must be regulated by means of laws;

- the constitutional requirements that the financing of the President and of his/her residence must be established by law, as well as that it is not permitted to establish any such a legal regulation that would deny the individual legal status of the President, which is different from the legal status of all other state officials, and would create the legal preconditions for equating some other person with the President, also mean that it is not permitted to establish any such a legal regulation that would create the legal preconditions for equating some other person with a former President;

- the provisions of Article 90 of the Constitution imply that the pension of the President is an inseparable element of the financing of the President and a constitutional social guarantee of the Head of State; under the Constitution, the legislature has the duty to establish such an amount of this pension and such conditions for its granting and payment that would be in line with the dignity of the President as the Head of State and his/her individual and exceptional legal status;

- the provisions of Article 90 of the Constitution also mean that the legislature is prohibited from establishing any such a legal regulation under which a person not elected as the President could receive the pension of the President;

- the legislature may, without violating the Constitution, establish the financing of a former President by taking account of the constitutional grounds upon which the powers of the President have ceased, as well as of the fact whether the same person has not been re-elected or elected anew as the President.

Thus, the individual and exceptional constitutional status of the President differs from the legal status of all other citizens, inter alia, in terms of the social guarantees of the President.

It should be noted that the provisions of the official constitutional doctrine that are related to the pension of the President, as an inseparable element of the financing of the President and a constitutional social guarantee of the Head of State, are equally applicable to other state payments that are provided for by law and correspond to the essence and purpose of the pension of the President, irrespective of how they are named.

In interpreting the provision of Article 90 of the Constitution that the financing of the President and of his/her residence is established by law, it should be pointed out that this provision consolidates the guarantee of the financing of the President and of his/her residence and that the purpose of this guarantee is to ensure that the President is able to properly perform his/her duties, inter alia, to properly represent the State of Lithuania. Thus, this constitutional guarantee means that the legislature has the duty to establish, by means of a law, the financing necessary to perform the duties of the President, which includes not only the financing of the activities and residence of an incumbent President, but also proper financing, i.e. which is in line with the dignity and exceptional legal status of the President as the Head of State, ensured for a former President, inter alia, the pension of the President or another state payment corresponding to the essence and purpose of this pension. This financing also includes the funds necessary to defray the expenses of the person (spouse, another family member) who accompanies the President under the state and/or diplomatic protocol where these expenses are incurred by the said person in relation to his/her assistance to the President while the President is performing his/her duties.

... the provisions of Article 90 of the Constitution do not regulate the legal status of the spouse of the President or his/her material (social) provision after the death of the President; however, social assistance for the spouse and other family members of the President is guaranteed on the basis of other provisions of the Constitution, inter alia, on the basis of social assistance provided for under Article 52 of the Constitution in the event of widowhood.

6.2. THE POWERS OF THE PRESIDENT OF THE REPUBLIC

The powers of the President of the Republic to sign international treaties and to submit them to the Seimas for ratification (Item 2 of Article 84 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 17 October 1995

Item 2 of Article 84 of the Constitution provides that the President of the Republic “shall sign international treaties of the Republic of Lithuania and submit them to the Seimas for ratification”. These powers of the President of the Republic enable him/her to implement his/her general formal competence consolidated in Item 1 of Article 84 of the Constitution (“The President of the Republic: 1) shall decide the basic issues of foreign policy and, together with the Government, conduct foreign policy”). This also follows from the general status of the President of the Republic, which is established in Article 77 of the Constitution: he/she is the Head of State.

... this is not one combined power but, rather, two qualitatively independent powers: (1) to sign international treaties and (2) to submit international treaties signed either by the President of the Republic or by other authorised state officials to the Seimas for ratification. The crucial question here is whether only the President of the Republic has such rights, i.e. whether other state power institutions are prohibited from signing international treaties and submitting them to the Seimas for ratification.

The fact that the Prime Minister is entitled to sign international treaties can be derived from the constitutional provisions related to the powers of the Government in the sphere of foreign policy and international relationships. ...

The provision that the President of the Republic shall “submit them to the Seimas for ratification” of Item 2 of Article 84 of the Constitution should be assessed in a different manner. The other articles of the Constitution, whereby the competence of state power institutions is defined, do not contain any such a provision that the Government or any other state power subject is entitled to submit international treaties to the Seimas for ratification. According to the Constitution as an integral legal act, the said right is within the prerogative of the President of the Republic.

The powers of the President of the Republic in the sphere of forming the Government

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 10 January 1998

The relationships between the President of the Republic and the Government are regulated by the norms of the Constitution that provide that the President of the Republic, on the assent of the Seimas, appoints the Prime Minister; the President of the Republic assigns the Prime Minister to form the Government and approves the composition of the formed Government. The President of the Republic, on the assent of the Seimas, releases the Prime Minister from duties; the President of the Republic accepts the powers returned by the Government after the election of a new Seimas and assigns the Government to exercise its duties until a new Government is formed, accepts the resignation of the Government and, where necessary, assigns it to continue to exercise its duties or assigns one of the ministers to exercise the duties of the Prime Minister until a new Government is formed. The President of the Republic, on the resignation of the Government or after it returns its powers, within 15 days, proposes the candidate for the post of the Prime Minister for consideration by the Seimas, etc.

... According to the constitutional tradition of Europe, the President appoints the person as the Head of the Government who is supported by the parliamentary majority. The said constitutional practice is also followed in Lithuania.

It appears from an analysis of the powers of the Seimas and those of the President of the Republic in the sphere of forming the Government that the main task of the activities of the President of the Republic in this process is to guarantee the interaction between the institutions of power. In the course of forming the Government, the President of the Republic should be bound by his/her duty to act, first of all, in such a way that an efficient Government is formed, i.e. the one that has the confidence of the Seimas.

Therefore, referring to the principles of parliamentary democracy, which are established in the Constitution, it should be presumed that the President of the Republic cannot freely choose candidates for the posts of the Prime Minister or ministers, since, in all cases, the appointment of the said officials depends on the confidence or no confidence expressed by the Seimas on this matter. At the same time, it is impossible to ignore the fact that the President of the Republic, as part of executive power, has certain possibilities of political influence on the formation of the personal structure of the Government.

After the new President of the Republic takes an oath, the powers of the former President of the Republic cease and, at the same time, the relationship of the Government ceases with the Head of State, who participated in its formation. The Constitutional Court, based on the analysis of constitutional norms, draws the conclusion that the Government must return its powers to the newly elected President of the Republic after he/she takes an oath and takes office.

... interpreting the norms of Articles 80 and 82 and Paragraph 4 of Article 92 of the Constitution, the Constitutional Court draws the conclusion that the powers of the Government should be returned to the President of the Republic on the same day when he/she takes office. This interpretation is based on the fact that the Constitution does not provide for any other time period.

After a new Seimas is elected, the President of the Republic, on the basis of Item 6 of Article 84 of the Constitution, accepts the powers returned by the Government and charges it with exercising its duties until a new Government is formed. Within 15 days, the President of the Republic proposes the candidate for the post of a new Prime Minister for consideration by the Seimas. The formation of a new Government is, thus, begun. ...

After an election of the President of the Republic, the Government also returns its powers to the newly elected President of the Republic. However, the norms of the Constitution do not prescribe that the Government must resign in such a situation. This is due to the fact that, after a new Head of State takes office, the confidence of the Seimas in the Government remains intact. Therefore, in the case of the return of the powers after the election of a new President of the Republic, the same Government must be charged by the Head of State with continuing to exercise its functions. In the case of the resignation of the Government, the President of the Republic may charge another member of the Government with exercising the functions of the Prime Minister.

... It is clear from the analysis of the content of Articles 84, 92, and 101 of the Constitution that such a return of powers [after an election of the President of the Republic] does not imply the resignation of the Government. ... Having returned its powers, the Government remains legitimate.

The procedure for the return of powers, however, is not merely an expression of interinstitutional courtesy: it provides the President of the Republic with the possibility of verifying whether the Seimas continues to have confidence in the Government. The President of the Republic, on the basis of Article 92 and Item 8 of Article 84 of the Constitution, taking account of the tradition of parliamentary democracy, under the procedure established in Item 8 of Article 84 of the Constitution, proposes the candidate for the post of the Prime Minister of the Government that has returned its powers for consideration by the Seimas. After the Seimas approves the candidate for the post of the Prime Minister and the President of the Republic appoints the Prime Minister, and after the composition of the Government proposed by the Prime Minister is approved, the Government once again receives its powers to act, unless more than half of the ministers are replaced.

If the Seimas does not approve the candidate for the post of the Prime Minister, the Government must resign (Item 2 of Paragraph 3 of Article 101 of the Constitution). This would constitute a constitutional ground for the procedure of beginning the formation of a new Government.

The powers of the President of the Republic in forming the judiciary (Item 11 of Article 84 and Article 112 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 21 December 1999

Item 11 of Article 84 of the Constitution provides that the President of the Republic: proposes candidates for the posts of the justices of the Supreme Court for consideration by the Seimas and, upon the appointment of all the justices of the Supreme Court, proposes the candidate from among them for the post of the President of the Supreme Court to be appointed by the Seimas; appoints the judges of the Court of Appeal and, from among them, the President of the Court of Appeal, provided that the Seimas gives its assent to the candidates proposed; appoints and releases the judges and presidents of regional and district courts and changes their places of work; in cases provided for by law, submits that the Seimas release judges from their duties.

The norms of Item 11 of Article 84 of the Constitution establishing the powers of the President of the Republic in the sphere of the appointment and release of judges are linked with Paragraph 5 of Article 112 of the Constitution, wherein it is prescribed that a special institution of judges, as provided for by law, advises the President of the Republic on the appointment, promotion, and transfer of judges or their release from duties. ...

Thus, the powers of the President of the Republic in the sphere of forming the judiciary are consolidated in Item 11 of Article 84 of the Constitution. This is an important element of the constitutional status of the Head of State. Any change of or any limitation on the powers of the President of the Republic in this sphere, as well as any establishment of such a procedure for the implementation of these powers where the actions of the President of the Republic would be bound by decisions of the institutions or officials that are not provided for in the Constitution, would mean changing the constitutional competence of the President of the Republic.

... the legislature has the right to establish the subjects that must choose the candidates for the posts of judges for the President of the Republic. This function may also be established for the Minister of Justice;

however, the right of the Minister of Justice to choose the candidates for the posts of judges is not binding on the President of the Republic.

... the procedure for appointing judges as established in [the law] may not violate the independence of the judiciary. At the same time, this procedure may not violate the balance among the branches of state power (in the case at issue, the balance between the President of the Republic and the judiciary), as established in Article 5 of the Constitution.

Taking account of the procedure for the formation of courts that is established in the Constitution, as well as of the constitutional regulation of the relationships between the President of the Republic and a special institution of judges, the conclusion should be drawn that a special institution of judges, which is indicated in Paragraph 5 of Article 112 of the Constitution, must advise the President of the Republic on all questions of the appointment of judges, their professional career, as well as their release from duties. The advice given by this institution gives rise to legal effects: if this institution does not give advice, the President of the Republic may not adopt decisions on the appointment, promotion, and transfer of judges or their release from duties.

Thus, under the Constitution, such a special institution of judges not only helps the President of the Republic to form courts, but also serves as a counterbalance to the President of the Republic, who is a subject of executive power, in the sphere of forming the corps of judges. On the other hand, a special institution of judges, which is provided for in Paragraph 5 of Article 112 of the Constitution, should be interpreted as an important element of the self-governance of the judiciary, which is an independent branch of state power.

The powers of the President of the Republic related to the signing and official publication of laws

See 5. The Seimas, 5.5. The procedure of activities of the Seimas, 5.5.2. The legislation process; the ruling of 19 June 2002 (“The signing, official publication, and entry into force of laws”; “The powers of the President of the Republic, the Speaker of the Seimas, and the Deputy Speaker of the Seimas that are related to the signing and official publication of laws” (Articles 70 and 74, Item 24 of Article 84, Article 88, Paragraph 1 of Article 89, and Paragraphs 1 and 2 of Article 149 of the Constitution)).

The cessation of the powers of the President of the Republic (Article 88 of the Constitution)

... the list of the grounds for the cessation of the powers of the President of the Republic, which is established in Article 88 of the Constitution, is final and may not be interpreted in an expansive manner.

The constitutional right of the Speaker of the Seimas to temporarily carry out the duties of the President of the Republic (Items 3, 4, 5, and 6 of Article 88 and Paragraph 1 of Article 89 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court’s ruling of 19 June 2002

... the implementation of the constitutional right of the Speaker of the Seimas to temporarily carry out the duties of the President of the Republic is linked with the establishment of the particular legal fact, i.e. the establishment of one of the circumstances indicated in Paragraph 1 of Article 89 of the Constitution due to which the powers of the President of the Republic cease pursuant to Items 3, 4, 5, or 6 of Article 88 of the Constitution. In order for the legal effects to arise as pointed out in the Constitution, such a legal fact must be established by observing the proper legal procedure. The said legal fact means the following: that the act of the President of the Republic by which he/she announces his/her resignation from office has come into force (Item 3 of Article 88 of the Constitution); that the fact of the death of the President of the Republic has been established under the procedure provided for in laws (Item 4 of Article 88 of the Constitution); that the legal act of the Seimas has come into force by which the President of the Republic is removed from office by a 3/5 majority vote of all the members of the Seimas through impeachment proceedings, which are provided for in the Statute of the Seimas (Item 5 of Article 88 and Article 74 of the Constitution); or that the resolution adopted by a 3/5 majority vote of all the members of the Seimas, by taking into consideration the conclusion of the Constitutional Court according to which the state of health of the President of the Republic does not allow him/her to hold office, has come into force (Item 6 of Article 88 and Item 2 of Paragraph 3 of Article 105 of the Constitution).

Paragraph 2 of Article 77 of the Constitution provides that the President of the Republic represents the State of Lithuania and performs everything with which he/she is charged by the Constitution and laws. Thus, the Speaker of the Seimas, if he/she temporarily holds the office of the President of the Republic under Paragraph 1 of Article 89 of the Constitution, performs everything with which the President of the Republic is charged by the Constitution and laws. Consequently, the Speaker of the Seimas has the powers to sign and officially promulgate laws passed by the Seimas within ten days of receiving them or, on reasonable grounds, to refer them back to the Seimas for reconsideration.

It needs to be noted that the Speaker of the Seimas, if he/she temporarily holds the office of the President of the Republic, exercises the constitutional powers of the President of the Republic, but not those of the Speaker of the Seimas, because the Speaker of the Seimas temporarily loses his/her powers in such a situation. ...

In the situations provided for in Paragraph 1 of Article 89 of the Constitution, the Speaker of the Seimas holds the office of the President of the Republic until a new President of the Republic is elected and enters office. After the Speaker of the Seimas begins to temporarily hold the office of the President of the Republic, the Seimas must, within 10 days, call an election of the President of the Republic, which must be held within two months; if the Seimas cannot convene and call an election of the President of the Republic, the election is called by the Government (Paragraph 1 of Article 89 of the Constitution). After the newly elected President of the Republic enters office, the temporary duties of the Speaker of the Seimas to hold the office the President of the Republic end and he/she resumes the duties of the Speaker of the Seimas At this point, it is the newly elected President of the Republic who has the right of the official promulgation of laws passed by the Seimas and the right of a delaying veto.

In addition, such legal situations are possible where, even though one of the circumstances provided for in Paragraph 1 of Article 89 of the Constitution is present, but the respective legal fact is not established yet in accordance with the proper legal procedure (thus, it has not led to the respective legal effects). In such cases, the Speaker of the Seimas, under the Constitution, may not temporarily hold the office of the President of the Republic yet; thus, he/she does not have the temporary powers of the President of the Republic to sign and officially promulgate laws passed by the Seimas within 10 days of receiving them or, on reasonable grounds, to refer them back to the Seimas for reconsideration. In this respect, in view of the circumstances indicated in Paragraph 1 of Article 89 and Items 3, 4, 5 and 6 of Article 88 of the Constitution, different legal situations are possible. For instance, if the resolution of the Seimas, adopted by taking into consideration the conclusion of the Constitutional Court and by a 3/5 majority vote of all the members of the Seimas, stating that the state of health of the President of the Republic does not allow him/her to continue to hold office has not come into force (Item 6 of Article 88 and Item 2 of Paragraph 3 of Article 105 of the Constitution), or if the act of the President of the Republic by which he/she states about his/her resignation from office has not come into force (Item 3 of Article 88 of the Constitution), or if the legal act adopted by the Seimas on removing the President of the Republic from office by a 3/5 majority vote of all the members of the Seimas through impeachment proceedings, which are provided for in the Statute of the Seimas, has not come into force (Item 5 of Article 88 and Article 74 of the Constitution), the above-mentioned powers are still exercised by the President of the Republic. Until the establishment of the fact of the death of the President of the Republic under the procedure provided for in laws (Item 4 of Article 88 of the Constitution), no one may exercise the powers of the President of the Republic to sign and officially promulgate laws passed by the Seimas within 10 days of receiving them or, on reasonable grounds, to refer them back to the Seimas for reconsideration.

It needs to be emphasised that the phrase “the office shall temporarily be held by the Speaker of the Seimas”, which is used in Paragraph 1 of Article 89 of the Constitution, and the phrase “the Speaker of the Seimas shall substitute for”, which is used in Paragraph 2 of Article 89 of the Constitution, are not identical as far as their legal content is concerned. The phrase “the office shall temporarily be held by the Speaker of the Seimas” denotes such a legal situation where the powers of the President of the Republic have ceased, a new President of the Republic has not been elected, and the office of the President of the Republic is temporarily held by the Speaker of the Seimas; as long as he/she temporarily holds the office of the President of the Republic, the Speaker of the Seimas may not exercise his/her powers in the Seimas as the Speaker. Meanwhile, the phrase “the Speaker of the Seimas shall substitute for” denotes such a legal situation where the President of the Republic is temporarily abroad or has fallen ill and, for this reason, is temporarily unable to hold office and, due to this, the Speaker of the Seimas temporarily substitutes for the President of the Republic. While temporarily substituting for the President of the Republic, the Speaker of the Seimas retains his/her powers of the Speaker of the Seimas.

It needs to be emphasised that situations where the Speaker of the Seimas temporarily holds the office of the President of the Republic or temporarily substitutes for him/her are possible only on the grounds indicated in Paragraphs 1 and 2 of Article 89 of the Constitution; the Speaker of the Seimas is the only state official who may temporarily hold the office of the President of the Republic or temporarily substitute for the President of the Republic. Paragraph 4 of Article 89 of the Constitution prescribes that, with the exception of the cases specified in this article, the powers of the President of the Republic may not be executed by any other persons or institutions.

The constitutional right of the Speaker of the Seimas to temporarily substitute for the President of the Republic (Paragraph 2 of Article 89 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 19 June 2002

Paragraph 2 of Article 89 of the Constitution provides that the Speaker of the Seimas substitutes for the President of the Republic when the President of the Republic is temporarily abroad or falls ill and, for this reason, is temporarily unable to hold office.

It needs to be emphasised that the phrase “the office shall temporarily be held by the Speaker of the Seimas”, which is used in Paragraph 1 of Article 89 of the Constitution, and the phrase “the Speaker of the Seimas shall substitute for”, which is used in Paragraph 2 of Article 89 of the Constitution, are not identical as far as their legal content is concerned. The phrase “the office shall temporarily be held by the Speaker of the Seimas” denotes such a legal situation where the powers of the President of the Republic have ceased, a new President of the Republic has not been elected, and the office of the President of the Republic is temporarily held by the Speaker of the Seimas; as long as he/she temporarily holds the office of the President of the Republic, the Speaker of the Seimas may not exercise his/her powers in the Seimas as the Speaker. Meanwhile, the phrase “the Speaker of the Seimas shall substitute for” denotes such a legal situation where the President of the Republic is temporarily abroad or has fallen ill and, for this reason, is temporarily unable to hold office and, due to this, the Speaker of the Seimas temporarily substitutes for the President of the Republic. While temporarily substituting for the President of the Republic, the Speaker of the Seimas retains his/her powers of the Speaker of the Seimas.

The mere fact that the President of the Republic is temporarily abroad or falls ill may not serve as the sufficient constitutional grounds for the Speaker of the Seimas to temporarily substitute for the President of the Republic, because, despite fact that the President of the Republic is temporarily abroad or has fallen ill, he/she does not lose his/her legal status as the President of the Republic or the powers granted to him/her by the Constitution and laws. The Speaker of the Seimas temporarily substitutes for the President of the Republic only if there are both conditions provided for in Paragraph 2 of Article 89 of the Constitution:

(1) the President of the Republic is temporarily abroad or falls ill; (2) for this reason, he/she is temporarily unable to hold office. Both these legal facts must be established in accordance with the proper legal procedure. To establish such a procedure by means of a law is a constitutional duty of the Seimas. ...

It needs to be noted that the interpretation of the provision of Paragraph 2 of Article 89 of the Constitution as meaning that the fact that the President of the Republic is temporarily abroad or falls ill is the sufficient constitutional grounds for the Speaker of the Seimas to temporarily substitute for the President of the Republic would be constitutionally groundless. Such an interpretation of Paragraph 2 of Article 89 of the Constitution would create the preconditions for the situation where the Speaker of the Seimas who is temporarily substituting for the President of the Republic under Paragraph 2 of Article 89 of the Constitution could be seen as the Head of State, even though it is the President of the Republic who is the Head of State and the President of the Republic does not lose his/her legal status or the powers granted to him/her by the Constitution and laws even when he/she is temporarily abroad or falls ill. The President of the Republic is also the Head of State in cases where he/she is temporarily abroad or falls ill and, for this reason, is temporarily unable to hold office even though the Speaker of the Seimas is substituting for him/her at that time. Under the Constitution, even while temporarily substituting for the President of the Republic at the time when the President of the Republic is temporarily abroad or falls ill and, for this reason, is temporarily unable to hold office, the Speaker of the Seimas is not the Head of State, but the head of one of state institutions, i.e. the Seimas. In Lithuania, there is only one Head of State – the President of the Republic.

While temporarily substituting for the President of the Republic under Paragraph 2 of Article 89 of the Constitution, differently from the situation where he/she temporarily holds the office of the President of the Republic under Paragraph 1 of Article 89 of the Constitution, the Speaker of the Seimas may not exercise certain powers of the President of the Republic that are expressis verbis specified in the Constitution: Paragraph 3 of Article 89 of the Constitution provides that, while temporarily substituting for the President of the Republic, the Speaker of the Seimas may neither call an early election to the Seimas nor appoint or release ministers without the consent of the Seimas. Paragraph 3 of Article 89 of the Constitution also establishes a special guarantee for the Speaker of the Seimas temporarily substituting for the President of the Republic: during the said period, the Seimas may not consider the issue of no confidence in the Speaker of the Seimas.

It needs to be emphasised that situations where the Speaker of the Seimas temporarily holds the office of the President of the Republic or temporarily substitutes for him/her are possible only on the grounds indicated in Paragraphs 1 and 2 of Article 89 of the Constitution; the Speaker of the Seimas is the only state official who may temporarily hold the office of the President of the Republic or temporarily substitute for the President of the Republic. Paragraph 4 of Article 89 of the Constitution prescribes that, with the exception of the cases specified in this article, the powers of the President of the Republic may not be executed by any other persons or institutions.

The veto right of the President of the Republic (Paragraph 1 of Article 71 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 19 June 2002

The President of the Republic ... has the right not to sign a law adopted by the Seimas and, within ten days of receiving such a law, on reasonable grounds, to refer it back to the Seimas for reconsideration (Paragraph 1 of Article 71 of the Constitution), i.e. he/she has the right of a delaying veto. The Constitution does not provide that the President of the Republic has the right of a delaying veto in connection with laws passed by referendum or in connection with laws amending the Constitution. Under the Constitution, the President of the Republic has such a right only with regard to laws adopted by the Seimas, with the exception of laws amending the Constitution. While implementing the right of a delaying veto, the President of the Republic may also submit proposals how a law adopted by the Seimas, but not yet signed by the President of the Republic, should be amended or supplemented.

Under Article 85 of the Constitution, the President of the Republic, implementing the powers vested in him/her, issues acts-decrees. Under Paragraph 1 of Article 71 of the Constitution, when referring a law passed by the Seimas, within ten days of receiving such a law, back to the Seimas for reconsideration, the President of the Republic must indicate, in his/her decree, the relevant reasons why the law was referred back to the Seimas. Meanwhile, to propose draft amendments and supplements to a law referred back to the Seimas for reconsideration is not a constitutional duty of the President of the Republic, but his/her constitutional right.

The powers of the President of the Republic in the legislative process

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 22 February 2008

Under the Constitution, in addition to the Seimas, the President of the Republic also takes part in the legislative process. For instance, the President of the Republic signs and officially announces (promulgates) laws enacted by the Seimas and also has the right of a delaying (relative) veto, i.e. the powers to refer a law adopted by the Seimas back to the Seimas for reconsideration; this is an important aspect of the constitutional principle of the separation of powers and an additional guarantee for the constitutionality of laws adopted by the Seimas (rulings of 19 January 1994 and 19 June 2002). The President of the Republic has the right not to sign a law adopted by the Seimas and, within ten days of receiving such a law, on reasonable grounds, to refer it back to the Seimas for reconsideration (Paragraph 1 of Article 71 and Item 2 of Article 84 of the Constitution); the respective decree of the President of the Republic must specify the reasons why such a law was referred back to the Seimas (Paragraph 1 of Article 71 and Article 85 of the Constitution); the Seimas may consider anew and adopt a law referred back by the President of the Republic (Paragraph 1 of Article 72 of the Constitution); the law reconsidered by the Seimas is deemed adopted if the amendments and supplements submitted by the President of the Republic are adopted, or if more than 1/2 of all the members of the Seimas vote for the law or, in cases where such a law is a constitutional law, if not less than 3/5 of all the members of the Seimas vote in favour thereof (Paragraph 2 of Article 72 of the Constitution); the President of the Republic must sign such laws within three days and promulgate them immediately (Paragraph 3 of Article 72 of the Constitution).

In its ruling of 19 June 2002, when interpreting the constitutional powers of the President of the Republic in the legislative process, the Constitutional Court held that it is the constitutional duty of the President of the Republic to perform, within ten days of receiving a law passed by the Seimas, one legal action from among those specified in Paragraph 1 of Article 71, Item 24 of Article 84, and Paragraph 2 of Article 71 of the Constitution: either to sign and officially promulgate a law passed by the Seimas (right of promulgation) or, on reasonable grounds, to refer it back to the Seimas for reconsideration (right of a delaying veto). In the said ruling of the Constitutional Court, a situation is discussed in more detail where the President of the Republic, even though he/she has the constitutional duty within ten days of receiving a law passed by the Seimas to sign and officially promulgate it (right of promulgation) or, on reasonable grounds, to refer such a law back to the Seimas for reconsideration (the right of delaying veto), due to some reasons, neither signs and officially promulgates the said law passed by the Seimas nor makes use of the right of a delaying veto.

The veto right of the President of the Republic (Paragraph 1 of Article 71 of the Constitution)

(on the powers of the Seimas that are related to adopting a law vetoed by the President of the Republic, see 5. The Seimas, 5.5. The procedure of activities of the Seimas, 5.5.2. The legislation process)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 22 February 2008

When interpreting the provision “Within ten days of receiving a law adopted by the Seimas, the President of the Republic ... shall, upon reasonable grounds, refer it back to the Seimas for reconsideration” of Paragraph 1 of Article 71 of the Constitution, it needs to be noted that the President of the Republic may, in the respective decree, specify various grounds – not only legal, but also economic, political, moral, those of expediency, or those that are related to the international obligations of the State of Lithuania, etc. ... these grounds do not necessarily have to be linked with the content of the respective law;

they may, in the opinion of the President of the Republic, be also linked with the infringements committed during the procedure of adopting the said law, inter alia, with the fact that, while adopting that law, the Seimas did not follow the stages of the legislation process or the rules of legislation that are laid down in the Constitution and/or the Statute of the Seimas. In such cases, the President of the Republic, while making use of the right of a delaying veto, which is granted to him/her by the Constitution, does not allow such a law to take effect where, in his/her opinion, the said law may be in conflict with the procedure, laid down in the Constitution, for adopting it.

It needs to be emphasised that the reasons of the President of the Republic, on the basis of which a law adopted by the Seimas is referred back to it for reconsideration, must be rational, clear, and comprehensible. The President of the Republic, while referring, on reasonable grounds, a law back to the Seimas for reconsideration, must follow the imperatives of the welfare of the Nation, responsible governance, civic consciousness, social harmony, justice, the supremacy of law, as well as other values, which are consolidated, defended, and protected by the Constitution. However, the mere fact that the reasons of the President of the Republic, on the basis of which a law adopted by the Seimas is referred back to it for reconsideration, could be assessed by someone (inter alia, members of the Seimas) as unfair, may not be a pretext for questioning the constitutionality of the respective decree of the President of the Republic (or for questioning such constitutionality by initiating a constitutional justice case at the Constitutional Court).

In this context, it needs to be emphasised that, if the Seimas does not agree with the reasons of the President of the Republic on the basis of which a certain law adopted by the Seimas is referred back to it for reconsideration after the President of the Republic uses his/her constitutional right of a delaying veto, the Seimas, under Paragraph 2 of Article 72 of the Constitution, may override such a veto of the President of the Republic. Under the Constitution, the veto exercised by the President of the Republic as regards laws adopted by the Seimas is relative; such a veto is not absolute.

While making use of the right of a delaying veto, the President of the Republic may also submit proposals to the Seimas how a law adopted by the Seimas, but not yet signed by the President of the Republic, should be amended or supplemented; such amendments or supplements have to be specified in the decree of the President of the Republic whereby a law adopted by the Seimas is, on reasonable grounds, referred back to the Seimas for reconsideration. The Constitutional Court has held that to propose draft amendments and supplements to a law referred back to the Seimas for reconsideration is not a constitutional duty of the President of the Republic, but his/her constitutional right (ruling of 19 June 2002).

A different interpretation, i.e. the interpretation that, purportedly, the President of the Republic, while referring, on reasonable grounds, a law adopted by the Seimas back to the Seimas for reconsideration, must, in all cases, submit proposals to the Seimas on how this law should be amended or supplemented, would mean that the President of the Republic is forced to propose amendments and supplements even to such laws of which he/she does not approve in general and to which he/she objects not because of the fact that those laws include certain provisions with which the President of the Republic does not agree and which, in his/her opinion, should be modified, but because of the fact that, in the opinion of the President of the Republic, the said law as such is inadmissible in principle as it is inexpedient, unreasonable, harmful, etc. When the President of the Republic does not submit any amendments or supplements to a law that is referred, on reasonable grounds, back to the Seimas for reconsideration, he/she does not act ultra vires.

The powers of the President of the Republic in forming the judiciary (Item 11 of Article 84 and Article 112 of the Constitution) (on the formation of courts, see 9.1. Courts, 9.1.4. The constitutional status of judges. The appointment of judges, their professional career, and their release from duties. The judicial self-governance institutions)

The Constitutional Court's decision of 15 May 2009

The Constitution establishes such a procedure of the appointment and release of the judges and presidents of courts of general jurisdiction and specialised courts of various levels whereby the judges and presidents of the said courts are appointed and released by the institutions of other branches of state power – executive power and legislative power; thus, they are appointed and released, respectively, by the President of the Republic and the Seimas, i.e. the institutions that are formed on a political basis.

In its rulings of 21 December 1999, 9 May 2006, and 27 November 2006, the Constitutional Court held the following: the powers of the President of the Republic consolidated in Item 11 of Article 84 of the Constitution regarding the formation of the judiciary are a significant element of the constitutional status of the Head of State; changing or limiting the specified powers of the President of the Republic in this sphere, as well as the establishment of such a procedure for implementing these powers so that the President of the Republic would be bound by decisions adopted by the institutions or officials that are not provided for in the Constitution, would mean changing the constitutional competence of the President of the Republic. Also, any change in or restriction on the powers of a special institution of judges, which is provided for by law and is specified in Paragraph 5 of Article 112 of the Constitution, to advise the President of the Republic on the appointment, promotion, and transfer of judges or their release from duties would mean a change in the purpose (stemming from the Constitution itself) of a special institution of judges, which is provided for by law and is specified in Paragraph 5 of Article 112 of the Constitution (rulings of 9 May 2006 and 27 November 2006).

The President of the Republic participates (in the ways established in Paragraphs 2, 3, and 4 of Article 112 and Item 11 of Article 84 of the Constitution) in appointing and releasing the judges of courts of general jurisdiction of all levels: from the lowest level – district courts to the highest level – the Supreme Court (also in appointing and releasing the judges of all specialised courts); however, the powers of the President of the Republic with respect to the judges of different courts of general jurisdiction are different. The judges and presidents of district, regional, and specialised courts are appointed and released by the President of the Republic and, regarding this, he/she does not apply to the Seimas. Item 11 of Article 84 of the Constitution provides, inter alia, that the President of the Republic: proposes candidates for the posts of the justices of the Supreme Court for consideration by the Seimas and, on the appointment of all the justices of the Supreme Court, proposes the candidate from among them for the post of the President of the Supreme Court to be appointed by the Seimas; appoints the judges of the Court of Appeal and, from among them, the President of the Court of Appeal, provided that the Seimas gives its assent to the candidates proposed; appoints the judges and presidents of regional and district courts and changes their places of work; in cases provided for by law, submits that the Seimas release judges from their duties.

As noted in the Constitutional Court's rulings of 9 May 2006 and 21 September 2006, in order to appoint or release a judge or the President of the Court of Appeal, the President of the Republic must apply to the Seimas and, if the Seimas gives its assent, he/she may appoint a certain person as a judge or the President of the Court of Appeal or release a certain judge or the President of the Court of Appeal from duties; also, inter alia, if certain circumstances significant for such appointment or release from duties come to light, he/she might decide not to appoint that person as a judge or the President of the Court of Appeal and to propose another candidate to the Seimas, or not to release a certain judge or the President of the Court of Appeal from duties (if it is not obligatory to release that judge from duties under the Constitution).

Paragraph 5 of Article 112 of the Constitution provides that a special institution of judges, as provided for by law, advises the President of the Republic on the appointment, promotion, and transfer of judges or their release from duties.

The Constitutional Court interprets the aforesaid special institution of judges, which is provided for in the Constitution, as an important element of the self-governance of the judiciary, which is an independent branch of state power; in the regulation of the relationships linked with the appointment, promotion, and transfer of judges or their release from duties, it is not allowed to deny the competence of the indicated special institution of judges or its constitutional nature and purpose; in the area of the formation of the corps of judges, this special institution of judges is a counterbalance to the President of the Republic as a subject of executive power (rulings of 21 December 1999, 13 December 2004, and 9 May 2006). The fact that the judiciary is fully fledged, autonomous, and independent, as well as the constitutional principle of the separation of powers, makes it impossible to interpret the constitutional purpose and functions of the said special institution of judges in such a way that its role as a counterbalance to the President of the Republic in the area of the formation of the corps of judges would be denied or ignored (ruling of 9 May 2006).

... Article 115 of the Constitution also provides for such grounds for releasing a judge from duties that are linked with facts of an objective nature, but not with the free decision of such a judge, as, for instance, the expiry of the term of powers of a judge for which he/she was appointed to hold the office of a judge or that of the president of a certain court. When there is such a constitutional ground for releasing a justice or the President of the Supreme Court from duties, the President of the Republic must ascertain whether the said fact of an objective nature really exists, i.e. whether the term of powers of the justice or the President of the Supreme Court, as established by law, has expired and, if the term of powers has expired, the President of the Republic must apply to a special institution of judges, which is provided for in Paragraph 5 of Article 112 of the Constitution, in order that this institution would advise him/her on releasing such a justice or the President of the Supreme Court from duties, because the term of powers of the said justice or the President of the Supreme Court has expired. In its turn, however, the said special institution of judges must ascertain whether the said fact of an objective nature really exists (i.e. whether the term of powers of a justice or the President of the Supreme Court, as established by law, has expired), and, if such a fact exists, it must advise the President of the Republic to release the justice or the President of the Supreme Court from duties. On receiving such an advice from the aforementioned special institution of judges, the President of the Republic must submit that the Seimas release the person concerned from duties.

The powers of the President of the Republic to appoint state officials and to release them from duties (Item 10 of Article 84 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 13 May 2010

Item 10 of Article 84 of the Constitution provides that the President of the Republic shall, according to the established procedure, appoint and release state officials provided for by law.

... the powers of the President of the Republic that are consolidated in Item 10 of Article 84 of the Constitution mean that the legislature is allowed to determine which state officials are appointed and released by the President of the Republic; in addition, the said powers of the President of the Republic mean that the legislature must establish the grounds for appointing such officials and releasing them from duties. Under Item 10 of Article 84 of the Constitution, the requirements (inter alia, the requirements of an ethical and moral nature) for the state officials who are appointed by the President of the Republic must be established in laws: the reputation of state officials must be impeccable; the conduct of state officials, both related to the direct performance of their duties and related to their activities not connected with their duties, must not discredit the name of state officials and the authority of a state institution wherein they perform their duties.

It needs to be held that the President of the Republic, while implementing the powers consolidated in Item 10 of Article 84 of the Constitution to appoint state officials provided for by law, may choose (by following the requirements set out in laws for state officials who are appointed by him/her) which person should be appointed as a state official; meanwhile, on a proposal, according to the established procedure, from certain institutions or officials that a certain person be appointed as a state official, the President of the Republic may decide whether the said person is suitable for the respective office of a state official in cases where a law prescribes that the President of the Republic appoints individuals to such office. The legislature, while establishing the grounds for releasing the said state officials from duties, must pay regard to the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law, whereby, inter alia, state officials who violate the Constitution and laws, who raise personal or group interests above public interests, and discredit state power by their actions must be held legally liable in accordance with the procedure established by law. The Constitution does not tolerate any such legal and factual situations where those state officials and other persons adopting decisions important to society and the state who, in accordance with the established procedure, are declared not to have avoided a conflict between public and private interests or who are declared to have acted by seeking objectives incompatible with public interests, have raised personal or group interests above the interests of society and the state, and have discredited the name of officials by their actions, would not be held legally liable, inter alia, would not be released from duties.

Item 10 of Article 84 of the Constitution also means that the President of the Republic, while appointing and releasing the state officials that are provided for by law, must comply with the grounds laid down in laws for releasing state officials from duties and with the procedure, established in laws and/or other legal acts, for appointing state officials and releasing them from duties. The same requirements also arise from Paragraph 2 of Article 5 of the Constitution, wherein it is prescribed that the scope of powers is limited by the Constitution, from Paragraph 2 of Article 77 of the Constitution, wherein it is prescribed, inter alia, that the President of the Republic performs everything with which he/she is charged by the Constitution and laws, as well as from the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law, which implies the hierarchy of legal acts.

The powers of the President of the Republic to confer state awards (Item 22 of Article 84 of the Constitution) (for more on state awards, see 4. The state and its institutions, 4.5. State awards)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 7 September 2010

The foundations of the constitutional institution of state awards are consolidated, inter alia, in ... Item 22 of Article 84 of the Constitution.

Item 22 of Article 84 of the Constitution provides that the President of the Republic confers state awards.

When interpreting the power of the President of the Republic to confer state awards, which is consolidated in Item 22 of Article 84 of the Constitution, in conjunction with the provisions “The President of the Republic, implementing the powers vested in him, shall issue acts-decrees. To be valid, the decrees issued by the President of the Republic for the purposes specified in Items 3, 15, 17, and 21 of Article 84 of the Constitution must be signed by the Prime Minister or an appropriate Minister” of Article 85 of the Constitution, it needs to be held that, under the Constitution, the President of the Republic confers state awards (which are established by means of a law passed by the Seimas) by issuing decrees, whose power is not bound by the approval of the Prime Minister or the respective minister.

The content of the constitutional institution of state awards is revealed to a certain extent in the Constitutional Court's ruling of 12 May 2006. Inter alia, the following is held in the said ruling of the Constitutional Court:

– conferring a certain state award is not the implementation of a right or legitimate expectation of a person, even if he/she is of undoubted merit to Lithuania, but rather such an assessment of his/her merit where the said assessment is within the discretion of and depends on the will of the President of the Republic;

– the President of the Republic has rather broad freedom of the discretion to decide whether or not to award a proposed person. It should be stressed that the Constitution does not oblige the President of the Republic to confer a certain state award on a certain person or persons (in recognition of their certain merit); however, when conferring state awards, the President of the Republic must pay regard, inter alia, to the requirements for fulfilling conscientiously the duties of his/her office and for being equally just to all, as established in Article 82 of the Constitution.

... the constitutional institution of state awards is related to a certain extent with the power of the President of the Republic, which is consolidated in Item 1 of Article 84 of the Constitution, to decide the basic issues of foreign policy.

As held in the Constitutional Court's ruling of 12 May 2006, according to international customs, the diplomatic protocol, i.e. according to the established international practice, state awards can be conferred on citizens of foreign states (inter alia, on Heads of States and high-ranking officials) by paying a special tribute to their state and to them and by seeking to develop mutually beneficial relationships between Lithuania and other states.

... the legislature, when establishing the procedure for how submissions are made that persons be conferred state awards, cannot deny the power of the President of the Republic, which is consolidated in Item 22 of Article 84 of the Constitution, to confer state awards.

The legislature, in regulating the relationships connected with the procedure for conferring state awards, inter alia, when consolidating the powers of the respective subjects (inter alia, ministers) to submit (present) that certain persons be awarded state awards, or when establishing the procedure for the consideration of the issues of conferring state awards in certain institutions, may not establish any such a legal regulation that would deny the power of the President of the Republic, which stems from Item 22 of Article 84 of the Constitution, to confer state awards.

Any change of or any limitation on the powers of the President of the Republic in this sphere, as well as any establishment of such a procedure for the implementation of these powers whereby the actions of the President of the Republic would be bound by decisions of the institutions or officials that are not provided for in the Constitution, would mean changing the constitutional competence of the President of the Republic.

... the President of the Republic, when he/she confers state awards, is also bound by the constitutional principle of responsible governance.

... the President of the Republic, when implementing the power to confer state awards, which is consolidated in Item 22 of Article 84 of the Constitution, and when, due to this, issuing a decree, is bound by the requirement, arising from the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law, that, inter alia, it is allowed to confer only such state awards that are established by means of a law.

The powers of the President of the Republic in the sphere of national defence (Item 16 of Article 84 and Paragraph 2 of Article 142 of the Constitution); the powers of the President of the Republic as the Commander-in-Chief of the Armed Forces of the State (Paragraph 2 of Article 140 of the Constitution) (for more on national defence, see 13. Foreign policy and national defence, 13.2. National defence)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 15 March 2011

Article 84 of the Constitution consolidates the list of the constitutional powers of the President of the Republic; Item 16 of this article provides that “The President of the Republic ... shall, in the event of an armed attack threatening the sovereignty of the State or its territorial integrity, adopt decisions concerning defence against the armed aggression, the imposition of martial law, as well as mobilisation, and submit these decisions for approval at the next sitting of the Seimas”.

The powers of the President of the Republic consolidated in Item 16 of Article 84 of the Constitution are particularised in Paragraph 2 of Article 142 of the Constitution, wherein it is established: “In the event of an armed attack threatening the sovereignty of the State or its territorial integrity, the President of the Republic shall immediately adopt a decision on defence against the armed aggression, impose martial law throughout the State or in its separate part, or announce mobilisation, and submit these decisions for approval at the next sitting of the Seimas, or immediately convene an extraordinary session in the period between sessions of the Seimas. The Seimas shall approve or overrule the decision of the President of the Republic.”

... under the legal regulation established in Paragraph 2 of Article 142 of the Constitution, in the event of an armed attack that threatens the sovereignty of the state or its territorial integrity, a decision immediately adopted by the President of the Republic on defence against the armed aggression, on the imposition of martial law throughout the state or in its separate part, or on the announcement of mobilisation acquires legal force from the moment of its adoption; however, the President of the Republic must submit this decision for approval at the next sitting of the Seimas (in the period between sessions of the Seimas, an extraordinary session of the Seimas must immediately be convened for this purpose), whereas the Seimas has the right to approve or overrule the decision of the President of the Republic.

In this context, it needs to be noted that Paragraph 2 of Article 140 of the Constitution, wherein it is prescribed that the President of the Republic is the Commander-in-Chief of the Armed Forces of the State, gives rise to the specific constitutional powers of the President of the Republic that are related, inter alia, with those established in Paragraph 2 of Article 142 of the Constitution. Under the Constitution, inter alia, the provision of Paragraph 2 of Article 5 thereof, whereby the scope of powers is limited by the Constitution, these specific constitutional powers of the President of the Republic, as the Commander-in-Chief of the Armed Forces of the State, may not be granted to any other subject by means of a law or another legal act.

Under Paragraph 2 of Article 77 of the Constitution, the President of the Republic performs everything with which he/she is charged by the Constitution and laws.

Thus, the list of the constitutional powers of the President of the Republic, as consolidated in Article 84 of the Constitution, is not a final one.

Consequently, the legislature may also establish such powers of the President of the Republic that, though not expressis verbis specified in the Constitution, are in line with the constitutional legal status of the President of the Republic as the Commander-in-Chief of the Armed Forces of the State.

... under the Constitution, inter alia, Article 140 thereof, in the course of deliberating and deciding on national defence issues, various state institutions and officials take part, inter alia, the State Defence Council, which considers and coordinates the main issues of state defence (and which consists of the President of the Republic, the Prime Minister, the Speaker of the Seimas, the Minister of National Defence, and the Commander of the Armed Forces), as well as the Government, the Minister of National Defence, and the Commander of the Armed Forces, who are responsible to the Seimas for managing and commanding the armed forces of the state; however, decisions on the main issues of national defence are taken by two state institutions: the Seimas and the President of the Republic. The Seimas is empowered to adopt final decisions on the imposition of martial law, on the announcement of mobilisation and demobilisation, and on the adoption of the decision to use the armed forces when the need arises to defend the Homeland or to fulfil the international obligations of the State of Lithuania; whereas the President of the Republic, in the event of an armed attack threatening the sovereignty of the state or its territorial integrity, has the powers to immediately adopt such decisions (concerning defence against the armed aggression, the imposition of martial law throughout the state or in its separate part, and the announcement of mobilisation) that are submitted for approval at the next sitting of the Seimas.

[...]

... laws may not establish any such powers of the President of the Republic that would deny the constitutional powers of other state institutions ...

... when the law provides for ensuring the independence and security of the state on the international scale (level), it is necessary to pay regard, inter alia, to the rule, established in Article 142 of the Constitution, according to which two state institutions are constitutionally empowered to adopt decisions on the main issues of national defence, i.e. the Seimas adopts final decisions, whereas the President of the Republic immediately (in the event of a threat) adopts such decisions that are submitted for approval at the next sitting for the Seimas. While paying regard to this rule of the delimitation and coordination of the powers of the Seimas and the President of the Republic in the area of national defence, which is consolidated in Article 142 of the Constitution, the legislature, under Paragraph 2 of Article 140 of the Constitution, wherein it is stipulated that the President of the Republic is the Commander-in-Chief of the Armed Forces of the State, may also establish a legal regulation under which the President of the Republic would be empowered to immediately adopt a decision on defence against armed aggression not only in the event of an armed attack threatening the sovereignty of the state or its territorial integrity, as provided for in Item 16 of Article 84 and Paragraph 2 of Article 142 of the Constitution, but also in the event (as provided for in a collective defence treaty ratified by the Seimas) of an armed attack against the Republic of Lithuania and a state that is its ally in cases where such a decision must immediately be submitted for approval at the next sitting of the Seimas.

6.3. THE LEGAL ACTS OF THE PRESIDENT OF THE REPUBLIC

The legal acts of the President of the Republic and the countersigning of such acts (Article 85 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 30 December 2003

The phrase “the decrees issued by the President of the Republic” of the provision “To be valid, the decrees issued by the President of the Republic” of Article 85 of the Constitution means that a decree issued by the President of the Republic becomes a legal act only after it is signed by the President of the Republic. As long as the President of the Republic has not done so, there are no legal grounds for stating that the President of the Republic has issued a decree. As long as a document entitled as a decree of the President of the Republic has not been signed, such a document is only a draft decree of the President of the Republic, but not a decree itself. It needs to be noted that the Constitution does not provide that the draft decrees of the President of the Republic could and should be signed by the Prime Minister or a certain minister before such draft decrees are signed by the President of the Republic. If laws or other legal acts established such a legal regulation under which the draft decrees of the President of the Republic must be signed by the Prime Minister or a minister before they are signed by the President of the Republic, the legal acts establishing such a legal regulation would be in conflict with the Constitution.

Thus, under Article 85 of the Constitution, the Prime Minister or an appropriate minister signs decrees issued by the President of the Republic, i.e. legal acts entitled as the decrees of the President of the Republic that have already been signed by the President of the Republic.

The provision “To be valid, the decrees issued by the President of the Republic ... must be signed by the Prime Minister or an appropriate Minister” of Article 85 of the Constitution means that, as long as a decree of the President of the Republic of Lithuania is not signed by the Prime Minister or an appropriate minister, such a decree cannot come into force; thus, such a decree cannot give rise to any legal effects.

Consequently, the said provision of Article 85 of the Constitution establishes an additional condition under which the decrees of the President of the Republic specified in Items 3, 15, 17, and 21 of Article 84 of the Constitution can give rise to legal effects: such decrees must be signed by the Prime Minister or an appropriate minister. In the legal theory, such signing is called countersigning.

Paragraph 1 of Article 5 of the Constitution, which provides which state institutions execute state power, also indicates that “the President of the Republic and the Government” execute state power. Under the Constitution, the President of the Republic is part of executive power (ruling of 10 January 1998). Article 84 of the Constitution and other articles of the Constitution provide for various powers of the President of the Republic. Implementing such powers, the President of the Republic issues decrees. Most of the decrees issued by the President of the Republic, under the Constitution, are not signed by the Prime Minister or a minister: under the Constitution, the Prime Minister or an appropriate minister signs only the decrees specified in Items 3, 15, 17, and 21 of Article 84 of the Constitution. Such a constitutional regulation means that the powers of the President of the Republic that are specified in Items 3, 15, 17, and 21 of Article 84 of the Constitution are considered an especially important area of executive power; therefore, under the Constitution, the President of the Republic alone cannot exercise the said powers without the approval of an appropriate member of the Government. Such a constitutional regulation reflects the consolidation of the system of “checks and balances” in the implementation of executive power.

While revealing the content of the provision “To be valid, the decrees issued by the President of the Republic for the purposes specified in Items 3, 15, 17, and 21 of Article 84 of the Constitution must be signed by the Prime Minister or an appropriate Minister”, it should be noted that it is impossible to interpret the said provision in isolation from another provision established in the same article, i.e. the provision “Responsibility for such a decree shall lie with the Prime Minister or the Minister who signs it”.

In view of the fact that responsibility for the decrees issued by the President of the Republic for the purposes specified in Items 3, 15, 17, and 21 of Article 84 of the Constitution lies with the Prime Minister or the minister who signed it, the conclusion should be drawn that, under Article 85 of the Constitution, the Prime Minister or an appropriate minister has the right to decide whether or not to sign a certain decree of the President of the Republic. The Prime Minister or an appropriate minister is not obliged to sign such a decree that is issued in disregard of the Constitution or in failure to follow the procedure established in the respective laws or other established requirements; otherwise, the Prime Minister or an appropriate minister would be responsible for actions that he/she would have to perform without having any choice, i.e. irrespective of his/her will. The aforesaid legal regulation is not allowed in a democratic state under the rule of law, since it would not be in line with the principles of a state under the rule of law and justice, on which the Lithuanian Constitution and the entire Lithuanian legal system are based.

The right and duty of the Prime Minister or an appropriate minister to decide whether or not to sign the decrees issued by the President of the Republic for the purposes specified in Items 3, 15, 17, and 21 of Article 84 of the Constitution give rise to the duty of the Prime Minister or an appropriate minister, before they sign such a decree of the President of the Republic, to ascertain whether this decree of the Republic of Lithuania has been issued according to the Constitution and in line with the procedure established in the respective laws and other established requirements. It is because of the said duty of the Prime Minister or an appropriate minister that responsibility for such a decree of the President of the Republic lies, under Article 85 of the Constitution, with the Prime Minister or an appropriate minister.

Thus, the legal regulation established in Article 85 of the Constitution, according to which, to be valid, the decrees issued by the President of the Republic for the purposes specified in Items 3, 15, 17, and 21 of Article 84 of the Constitution must be signed by the Prime Minister or an appropriate minister, consolidates the right and duty of the Prime Minister and an appropriate minister to participate in the implementation of the powers of the President of the Republic that are specified in Items 3, 15, 17, and 21 of Article 84 of the Constitution, as well as the right and duty of the Prime Minister and an appropriate minister to ensure that such a decree of the President of the Republic that has been issued in disregard of the Constitution or the requirements established in laws and the established procedure would not come into force. This is a counterbalance to the decisions of the President of the Republic in cases where such decisions disregard the requirements set in the Constitution and laws and where the powers of the President of the Republic, which are established in the Constitution and laws, are abused. On the other hand, the fact that responsibility for a decree of the President of the Republic lies not with the President of the Republic himself/herself, but with the Prime Minister or an appropriate minister, is based on the provision that the President of the Republic, while in office, is not responsible for his/her decisions, save the cases directly established in the Constitution, i.e. for such decisions by which the President of the Republic grossly violates the Constitution, breaches the oath, or commits a crime. In such cases, the issue of the constitutional responsibility of the President of the Republic is decided (Article 74 of the Constitution).

It needs to be noted that the legal regulation established in Article 85 of the Constitution gives rise to the duty of [the respective minister] to ascertain, before signing a decree of the President of the Republic on granting citizenship or a decree of the President of the Republic on granting citizenship by way of exception, whether such a decree of the President of the Republic has been issued by paying regard to the Constitution and on the grounds for citizenship acquisition that are established in [the law] and in compliance with the procedure for granting citizenship, as established in [the law]. Under Article 85 of the Constitution, responsibility for such a decree of the President of the Republic lies with [the minister] who has signed it.

In view of the fact that, under Articles 86 and 74 of the Constitution, the President of the Republic who grossly violates the Constitution or breaches his/her oath, or is found to have committed a crime, may be held constitutionally liable – he/she may be removed from office through impeachment proceedings, the conclusion should be drawn that the provision “Responsibility for such a decree shall lie with the Prime Minister or the Minister who signs it” of Article 85 of the Constitution cannot be interpreted as meaning that the President of the Republic is not responsible in all cases for the decrees issued by him/her for the purposes specified in Items 3, 15, 17, and 21 of Article 84 of the Constitution where the said decrees were signed by the Prime Minister or an appropriate minister.

When Articles 85, 86, and 74 of the Constitution are interpreted in a systemic manner, the conclusion should be drawn that responsibility for a decree specified in Items 3, 15, 17, and 21 of Article 84 of the Constitution in cases where, by such a decree, Constitution is grossly violated, or the oath is breached, or a crime is committed lies not only with the Prime Minister or the minister that countersigned such a decree, but also with the President of the Republic who has issued such a decree.

At the same time, it should be noted that, as such, the mere fact that a certain decree of the President of the Republic is declared in conflict with the Constitution or a law does not mean that the President of the Republic has grossly violated the Constitution, or breached the oath, or committed a crime. Deciding whether the President of the Republic, having issued a decree that is in conflict with the Constitution or a law, has grossly violated the Constitution, or breached the oath, or committed a crime, it is necessary to assess not only the content of the decree of the President of the Republic, but also whether, in the course of issuing the decree of the President of the Republic, the requirements established in the Constitution and the relevant laws were fulfilled and whether the established procedure was followed; in addition, it is also necessary to assess other factual circumstances surrounding the issuance of such a decree.

Legal acts passed by the President of the Republic are substatutory legal acts; therefore, they, as all other substatutory legal acts, may not be in conflict with the Constitution, constitutional laws, and laws.

7. THE GOVERNMENT

7.1. THE CONSTITUTIONAL STATUS OF THE GOVERNMENT

The constitutional status of the Government

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 10 January 1998

In the Lithuanian system of the institutions of executive power, the Government, which implements state governance, plays an exceptional role. The Government is a collegial institution of general competence. The Government consists of the Prime Minister and ministers. Article 94 of the Constitution provides that the Government: manages national affairs, protects the territorial inviolability of the Republic of Lithuania, and guarantees state security and public order; executes laws, the resolutions of the Seimas on the implementation of laws, as well as the decrees of the President of the Republic; coordinates the activities of ministries and other establishments of the Government; prepares a draft state budget and submits it to the Seimas; executes the state budget and submits to the Seimas a report on the execution of the budget; prepares draft laws and presents them to the Seimas for consideration; establishes diplomatic ties and maintains relations with foreign states and international organisations; and performs other duties prescribed to the Government by the Constitution and other laws. The scope of the powers of the Government is defined by the Constitution. The Government is jointly and severally responsible to the Seimas for the general activities of the Government. Ministers, in directing the areas of governance assigned to them, are responsible to the Seimas and the President of the Republic, and are directly subordinate to the Prime Minister.

The accountability of the Government to the representation of the Nation

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 24 December 2002

Under the Constitution, the Seimas exercises parliamentary control over the Government. At the request of the Seimas, the Government or individual ministers must give an account of their activities to the Seimas (Paragraph 1 of Article 101 of the Constitution). Thus, the separation of powers in the Constitution also implies the accountability of the Government, a collegial institution of executive power, to the legislature, the representation of the Nation.

The constitutional status of the Government

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 13 December 2004

The foundations of the system of the institutions of executive power, as well as the powers of the supreme institutions of executive power, are established in the Constitution. The constitutional order of the State of Lithuania is based on the model of dual executive power: executive power in Lithuania is exercised by the President of the Republic – the Head of State and by the Government.

The Government is a collegial institution of executive power (ruling of 10 January 1998). Article 91 of the Constitution provides that the Government of the Republic of Lithuania consists of the Prime Minister and ministers; under Paragraph 1 of Article 98 of the Constitution, ministers, inter alia, head their respective ministry. According to Item 3 of Article 94 of the Constitution, the Government coordinates the activities of the ministries and other establishments of the Government. The Constitution specifies only one position of a minister – the Minister of National Defence (Paragraph 1 of Article 140 of the Constitution); therefore, according to the Constitution, the Ministry of National Defence may not be absent in Lithuania. When interpreting the legal regulation established in Item 3 of Article 94 of the Constitution, in its ruling of 23 November 1999, the Constitutional Court held that the Constitution does not reveal what establishments are considered “establishments of the Government”; moreover, the Constitution does not specify what legal status of the aforementioned government establishments is. It is the legislature exercising discretion in this area (limited by the Constitution) that must establish this. On the other hand, certain government institutions are specified in the Constitution; for example, the institution of the representative of the Government, which has the power to supervise whether municipalities observe the Constitution and laws and whether they execute the decisions of the Government, is consolidated in Paragraphs 2 and 3 of Article 123 of the Constitution. In this context, it should also be mentioned that Paragraph 1 of Article 123 of the Constitution provides that, at higher-level administrative units, governance is organised by the Government according to the procedure established by law; thus, the legislature has the duty not only to establish higher-level administrative units, but also to provide for the government institutions through which the Government would organise governance at higher-level administrative units.

It should be mentioned that the powers of the President of the Republic and those of the Government, as two sub-branches of dual executive power, are autonomous and independent of each other. On the other hand, the Constitution expressis verbis specifies such powers of the President of the Republic and those of the Government that are jointly implemented by the President of the Republic and the Government. For instance, Article 85 of the Constitution, inter alia, prescribes: “To be valid, the decrees issued by the President of the Republic for the purposes specified in Items 3, 15, 17, and 21 of Article 84 of the Constitution must be signed by the Prime Minister or an appropriate Minister.” According to Item 1 of Article 84 of the Constitution, the President of the Republic, inter alia, together with the Government, conducts foreign policy. It should also be noted that, having regard to the Constitution, a law may also provide for such a legal regulation that certain state institutions would be established under the President of the Republic, the Head of State.

The constitutional status of the Government; under the Constitution, a situation in which there is no operating Government in the state is impermissible

The Constitutional Court’s ruling of 28 August 2020

... the Constitutional Court has held that, in the Lithuanian system of the authorities of the executive branch, the Government, which carries out state governance, has a special place (inter alia, the rulings of 10 January 1998, 13 December 2004, and 8 March 2018). ... the Government is an authority of executive power ensuring the functioning of the state. The Government is a collegial authority of executive power and implements state governance (inter alia, the rulings of 13 May 2010, 2 March 2018, and 25 November 2018).

Under the Constitution, the Government exercises executive power on a continuous basis (ruling of 10 January 1998). Under Article 94 of the Constitution, the Government: manages national affairs, protects the territorial inviolability of the Republic of Lithuania, and guarantees state security and public order (Item 1); executes laws, the resolutions of the Seimas on the implementation of laws, as well as the decrees of the President of the Republic (Item 2); coordinates the activities of ministries and other establishments of the Government (Item 3); prepares a draft state budget and submits it to the Seimas; executes the state budget and submits to the Seimas a report on the execution of the budget (Item 4); prepares draft laws and presents them to the Seimas for consideration (Item 5); establishes diplomatic ties and maintains relations with foreign states and international organisations (Item 6); and discharges other duties prescribed to the Government by the Constitution and other laws (Item 7). The powers of the Government are also established in Item 3 of Article 84, Paragraph 1 of Article 89, Paragraph 1 of Article 123, Paragraph 1 of Article 128, etc. of the Constitution.

In view of the foregoing, it should be held that the Constitution does not allow a situation in which there is no operating Government, as a collegial executive authority ensuring the functioning of the state and continuously implementing state governance, i.e. a situation in which there is neither the Government authorised to act under the Constitution nor the Government assigned, under the Constitution, to perform duties at least on a temporary basis.

Granting the Government the powers to act; the legal meaning of a programme of the Government (Item 7 of Article 67 and Paragraph 5 of Article 92 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 10 January 1998

The Seimas, by giving its assent to a programme of the Government, confers the powers on the Government to act; the constitutional norms regulating the activity of the Government, as well as those consolidating the principle of the responsibility of the Government to the Seimas, are thus implemented. It is established in the constitutional structure of the branches of power that only the Government that has the confidence of the Seimas may exercise its powers. The legal form of conferring such powers is voting in the Seimas for giving its assent to a programme of the Government.

The basis of a programme of the Government is the programmes of the political parties that have won the election; however, the provisions of these programmes acquire a legal meaning only through a programme of the Government and oblige both the Government and the majority of the Seimas supporting it to act respectively. Such recognition of the legal meaning of a programme of the Government is a characteristic feature of parliamentary democracy. The said feature is consolidated in the norms of Item 7 of Article 67 and Paragraph 5 of Article 92 of the Constitution.

This is the reason why the President of the Republic must appoint the Prime Minister who is supported by the majority of the Seimas and must approve such a Government the programme of which can be approved by a majority vote of the members of the Seimas who take part in the sitting. Otherwise, the institution of executive power ensuring the functioning of the state would never be formed. Attempting to gain the confidence of the Seimas, in foreseeing the directions of its activities for a certain time period, the Government must take into consideration the possible approval or non-approval by members of the Seimas. By expressing its confidence in a programme of the Government, the Seimas takes the obligation to supervise as to how the Government will be acting in implementing its own programme. A programme of the Government is the basis of the political and legal responsibility of the Government to the Seimas, because the Government is jointly and severally responsible to the Seimas for its general activities. The Seimas that has conferred the powers on the Government to act may express no confidence in the Government or the Prime Minister. The consequence of the expression of no confidence is the resignation of the Government.

Thus, a programme of the Government should be deemed a legal document wherein the main guidelines for the activities of the state for a certain time period are set out. Such a legal document must be published in the official gazette Valstybės žinios. Furthermore, the significance of the said programme as a legal form determining the actions of the institutions that form the Government and as a legal form ensuring interaction between the Government and those institutions is of no less importance.

Under the Constitution, the Government exercises executive power on a continuous basis. The activities of the Government are based on the confidence of the Seimas that has approved the programme of the Government.

The programme of the Government is compulsory to the Government for the whole term of its powers. Requesting the powers to act, a new Government submits its programme to the Seimas for consideration. By giving its assent to the programme of the Government, the Seimas expresses its confidence in the Government in principle for the period until the powers of the Seimas expire. Naturally, this does not mean that, if the Government resigns, the same programme will be approved again.

The formation of the Government

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 10 January 1998

The Government – a collegial institution of executive power – is formed by the Seimas and the President of the Republic; however, in forming the Government, the role and tasks of the Seimas and the President of the Republic are different. The President of the Republic participates in this process as the Head of State, fulfilling the functions provided for in the Constitution; while the Seimas, to which the Government is responsible, acts as the representation of the nation.

Conferring the powers on the Government to act and exercising control over its activities are an important sphere of the competence of the Seimas. Article 67 of the Constitution provides for the following prerogatives of the Seimas: the Seimas gives or does not give its assent to the candidate proposed by the President of the Republic for the post of the Prime Minister; considers the programme of the Government, presented by the Prime Minister, and decides whether to give its assent to it; supervises the activities of the Government and may express no confidence in the Prime Minister or a minister, etc. Under Paragraph 1 of Article 96 of the Constitution, the Government is jointly and severally responsible to the Seimas for the general activities of the Government. ...

The relationships between the President of the Republic and the Government are regulated by the norms of the Constitution that provide that the President of the Republic, on the assent of the Seimas, appoints the Prime Minister; the President of the Republic assigns the Prime Minister to form the Government and approves the composition of the formed Government. The President of the Republic, on the assent of the Seimas, releases the Prime Minister from duties; the President of the Republic accepts the powers returned by the Government after the election of a new Seimas and assigns the Government to exercise its duties until a new Government is formed, accepts the resignation of the Government and, where necessary, assigns it to continue to exercise its duties, or assigns one of the ministers to exercise the duties of the Prime Minister, until a new Government is formed. The President of the Republic, on the resignation of the Government or after it returns its powers, within 15 days, proposes the candidate for the post of the Prime Minister for consideration by the Seimas, etc.

... According to the European constitutional tradition, the President appoints such a person as the head of the Government who is supported by the parliamentary majority. The said constitutional practice is also observed in Lithuania.

It appears from an analysis of the powers of the Seimas and those of the President of the Republic in the sphere of forming the Government that the main task of the activities of the President of the Republic in this process is to guarantee interaction between the institutions of power. In the course of forming the Government, the President of the Republic should be bound by his/her duty to act, first of all, in such a way that an efficient Government is formed, i.e. the one that has the confidence of the Seimas.

Therefore, based on the principles of parliamentary democracy, which are established in the Constitution, it should be presumed that the President of the Republic cannot freely choose the candidates for the posts of the Prime Minister or ministers, since, in all cases, the appointment of the said officials depends on the confidence or distrust expressed by the Seimas on this matter. At the same time, it is impossible to ignore the fact that the President of the Republic, as part of executive power, has certain political possibilities of influencing the formation of the personal structure of the Government.

The return of the powers of the Government after the election of the President of the Republic (Articles 80 and 82, as well as Paragraph 4 of Article 92, of the Constitution)

Analysing the issue of the return of the powers of the Government, the Constitutional Court notes that the norms of Paragraph 4 of Article 92 of the Constitution may not be interpreted in isolation from other norms of the Constitution. The constitutional norms that regulate different aspects of the formation of the Government, as well as interrelations among the Seimas, the President of the Republic, and the Government, are set out in several chapters and articles of the Constitution. The Constitution is an integral act; therefore, in this particular case, priority should be given to a systemic interpretation. When the content of the norm of Paragraph 4 of Article 92 of the Constitution is interpreted, the purpose of adopting the said norm should be taken into consideration.

Article 82 of the Constitution prescribes: “On the day following the expiry of the term of office of the President of the Republic, the elected President of the Republic shall take office after he, in Vilnius, in the presence of the representatives of the Nation – the Members of the Seimas, takes an oath to the Nation to be faithful to the Republic of Lithuania and the Constitution, to conscientiously fulfil the duties of his office, and to be equally just to all.”

In the countries where the President is elected in a general election, there is, as a rule, a certain time period between the announcement of the election results and the beginning of the performance of duties by the President. During the said period, the outgoing President remains in office and the Parliament, as well as the Government, which has the confidence of the Parliament and in the formation of which the Head of State participated, continues to perform its functions. Such a sufficiently long pause is understandable, because the President who is leaving his/her office needs some time to prepare for transferring the duties of the Head of State, while the new President needs some preparation for accepting such duties.

The aforementioned time period is also established in Article 80 of the Constitution of the Republic of Lithuania. During this time period, the outgoing President of the Republic continues to be the Head of State. The Head of State has all powers vested in him/her under the Constitution. He/she is the only person who can exercise them. From the announcement of the final results of the election until taking an oath, the new elected President of the Republic has no powers of the Head of State yet. The Government, in forming which the outgoing President of the Republic participated, continues to exercise its powers.

After the new President of the Republic takes an oath, the powers of the former President of the Republic cease and, at the same time, the relationship of the Government cease with the former Head of State, who participated in forming that Government. The Constitutional Court, referring to the analysis of constitutional norms, draws the conclusion that the Government must return its powers to the newly elected President of the Republic after he/she takes an oath and takes office.

... interpreting the norms of Articles 80 and 82 and Paragraph 4 of Article 92 of the Constitution, the Constitutional Court draws the conclusion that the powers of the Government should be returned to the President of the Republic on the same day when he/she takes office. This interpretation is based on the fact that the Constitution does not provide for any other time period.

The concept and grounds of the resignation of the Government (Paragraphs 2 and 3 of Article 101 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 10 January 1998

The grounds of the resignation of the Government are consolidated in Paragraph 3 of Article 101 of the Constitution. The said paragraph provides that the Government must resign in the following cases:

(1) when the Seimas twice in succession does not give its assent to the programme of the newly formed Government;

(2) when the Seimas, by a majority vote of all the members of the Seimas and by secret ballot, expresses no confidence in the Government or in the Prime Minister;

(3) when the Prime Minister resigns or dies;

(4) after the election to the Seimas, when a new Government is formed.

In addition, when more than half of the ministers are replaced, the Government that does not once again receive its powers from the Seimas must resign (Paragraph 2 of Article 101 of the Constitution).

The Constitutional Court notes that this list of the grounds for the resignation of the Government is final.

It is clear that one of the main reasons for the resignation of the Government is either the loss of or failure to gain the confidence of the Seimas. The Constitution, however, provides for various forms of expressing no confidence: first, the Seimas may express no confidence directly; second, it may express no confidence by giving, twice in succession, no assent to the programme of a newly formed Government; third, the Government must once again, i.e. anew, receive its powers from the Seimas. Finally, the other two cases presume that the Government loses the confidence of the Seimas, i.e. it loses its powers to act: first, when the Prime Minister resigns or dies and, second, after the election of the Seimas.

Thus, the resignation of the Government means the end of its activities. After the resignation of the Government, the procedure for forming a new Government begins; however, in the case provided for in Item 4 of Paragraph 3 of Article 101 of the Constitution, such a procedure begins prior to the resignation.

The differences between the legal effects of the resignation of the Government and those of the return of the powers of the Government; the receipt of powers once again after the election of the President of the Republic (Articles 84, 92, and 101 of the Constitution)

In addition to the notion “the resignation of the Government”, the notion “the return of the powers of the Government” is also used in the Constitution. ... the grounds for the resignation of the Government are exhaustively listed in Article 101 of the Constitution. The essence of the grounds for the resignation of the Government is either the loss of or failure to gain the confidence of the Seimas. The return of the powers of the Government is provided for in two cases: first, after the election of the Seimas and, second, after the election of the President of the Republic (Paragraph 4 of Article 92 of the Constitution).

Thus, the conclusion may be drawn that the expiry of the powers of one of the subjects who participates in forming the Government entails the necessity of returning the powers of the Government. The constitutional norms, however, give a different meaning to the change of the aforesaid subjects and their influence on the formation of the Government. For instance, after an election of the Seimas, the Government must not only return its powers, but also resign (Item 4 of Paragraph 3 of Article 101 of the Constitution). Thus, in this case, the return of the powers is the first step towards the compulsory resignation of the Government imperatively prescribed by the Constitution. It is evident that, after an election of the Seimas, the subject that expressed confidence in the Government and granted it the powers to act is clearly missing; therefore, the Government must resign.

After a new Seimas is elected, the President of the Republic, on the basis of Item 6 of Article 84 of the Constitution, accepts the powers returned by the Government and assigns it to exercise its duties until a new Government is formed. Within 15 days, the President of the Republic proposes the candidate for the post of a new Prime Minister for consideration by the Seimas. The formation of a new Government is, thus, begun. After a new Government is formed, the Government that has returned its powers resigns (Item 4 of Paragraph 3 of Article 101 of the Constitution).

After an election of the President of the Republic, the Government also returns its powers to the newly elected President of the Republic. However, the norms of the Constitution do not prescribe that the Government must resign in such a situation. This is due to the fact that, after a new Head of State takes office, the confidence of the Seimas in the Government remains intact. Therefore, in the case of the return of powers after the election of a new President of the Republic, the same Government must be assigned by the Head of State to continue to exercise its functions. In the case of the resignation of the Government, the President of the Republic may assign another member of the Government to exercise the functions of the Prime Minister.

Thus, the Constitutional Court emphasises that there are no grounds for treating the notions “the resignation of the Government” and “the return of the powers of the Government” as identical. They relate to different legal situations. This also determines different legal consequences.

Item 8 of Article 84 of the Constitution provides that the President of the Republic, on the resignation of the Government or after it returns its powers, within 15 days, proposes the candidate for the post of the Prime Minister for consideration by the Seimas. The Constitutional Court notes that the essence of this norm is the prerogative of the President of the Republic to submit to the Seimas the candidate for the post of a new Prime Minister for consideration in due time. The notions “resignation” and “the return of the powers” used therein should be interpreted only with respect to the aforesaid circumstances.

It should be noted that the constitutional regulation of the return of the powers of the Government after the election of the President of the Republic of Lithuania reminds us, at least partly, of the constitutional tradition of the Third French Republic, when the Government would resign after a parliamentary election, as well as after a presidential election. The resignation after a presidential election was called “resignation for the sake of courtesy” (demission de courtoise). After its “resignation for the sake of courtesy”, the Government used to be approved once again. This procedure is said to be meaningful due to the relation of the Government with the Head of State and that it reflects certain tendencies in the development of the model of government.

Although the Constitution of the Republic of Lithuania treats the return of powers in a somewhat different way, it undoubtedly expresses respect for the institution of the Head of State and recognises the importance of relationships between the President of the Republic and the Government. It is clear from an analysis of the content of Articles 84, 92, and 101 of the Constitution that such a return of powers does not imply the resignation of the Government. Otherwise, the Constitution would directly stipulate that, after the election of a new President of the Republic, the Government must return its powers and resign. Having returned its powers, the Government remains legitimate.

The procedure for the return of powers, however, is not merely an expression of interinstitutional courtesy: it provides the President of the Republic with the possibility of verifying whether the Seimas continues to have confidence in the Government. The President of the Republic, on the basis of Article 92 and Item 8 of Article 84 of the Constitution, taking account of the tradition of parliamentary democracy, under the procedure established in Item 8 of Article 84 of the Constitution, proposes the candidate for the post of the Prime Minister of the Government that has returned its powers for consideration by the Seimas. After the Seimas approves the candidate for the post of the Prime Minister and the President of the Republic appoints the Prime Minister and approves the composition of the Government proposed by the Prime Minister, the Government once again receives its powers to act, unless more than half of the ministers are replaced.

If the Seimas does not approve the candidate for the post of the Prime Minister, the Government must resign (Item 2 of Paragraph 3 of Article 101 of the Constitution). This would constitute a constitutional ground for the procedure of beginning the formation of a new Government.

The constitutional status of the Government; the receipt of the powers to act; parliamentary supervision over the activities of the Government; the receipt of powers once again after more than half of the ministers are replaced (Articles 92 and 101 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 20 April 1999

Paragraph 2 of Article 101 of the Constitution prescribes: “When more than half of the Ministers are replaced, the Government must once again receive its powers from the Seimas. Otherwise, the Government must resign.”

It is possible to reveal the content of this norm of the Constitution only by taking into account the procedure for forming and empowering the Government as consolidated in the Constitution, the legal regulation governing how the Government once again receives its powers to act, and the particularities of legal interrelationships between the Seimas and the Government.

Article 5 of the Constitution provides that, in Lithuania, state power is executed by the Seimas, the President of the Republic and the Government, and the judiciary. This provision of the Constitution constitutes the grounds for the separation and balance of the powers of the state. The Government is a collegial institution of general competence carrying out state governance. According to Article 91 of the Constitution, the Government of the Republic of Lithuania consists of the Prime Minister and ministers. The Prime Minister is appointed and released by the President of the Republic on the assent of the Seimas (Paragraph 1 of Article 92 of the Constitution). Under Paragraph 3 of Article 92 of the Constitution, the Prime Minister, within 15 days of his/her appointment, forms and presents to the Seimas the Government, approved by the President of the Republic, and submits the programme of the formed Government for consideration by the Seimas.

The personal composition of the Government is formed both by the Prime Minister and by the President of the Republic. However, the mere approval of the composition of the Government is not enough so that the Government could begin to act. The Government must have the confidence of the Seimas. Therefore, Paragraph 5 of Article 92 of the Constitution provides that “a new Government shall receive the powers to act after the Seimas gives assent to its programme by a majority vote of the Members of the Seimas participating in the sitting”. The assent to the programme of the Government means that the Government is empowered to implement the provisions of its programme.

The Seimas not only empowers the Government to act, but also, conforming to Item 9 of Article 67 of the Constitution, supervises the activities of the Government. For instance, under Paragraph 1 of Article 101 of the Constitution, at the request of the Seimas, the Government or individual ministers must give an account of their activities to the Seimas. The Seimas, by a majority vote of all the members of the Seimas and by secret ballot, may express no confidence in the Government (Item 2 of Paragraph 3 of Article 101 of the Constitution). The Constitution also provides for other ways as to how the Seimas may carry out the supervision of the Government.

The composition of the Government may change due to various reasons. Under Paragraph 2 of Article 101 of the Constitution, when more than half of the ministers are replaced, the Government must once again receive its powers from the Seimas; otherwise, the Government must resign. The institution of receiving powers once again is one of the forms of parliamentary supervision over the Government. By applying such a form, the Seimas can verify whether the programme of the Government that was approved by the Seimas is still carried out after more than half of the ministers are replaced. The procedure for receiving powers once again is regulated by the Statute of the Seimas.

Such a constitutional regulation of the powers of state institutions and their interrelations in the course of forming the Government and granting it powers once again reflects the principle of the separation and balance of state powers, as established in the Constitution.

In order to determine how the replacement of ministers under Paragraph 2 of Article 101 of the Constitution should be understood, the circumstance of essential importance is that the Government is a collegial institution that is jointly and severally responsible to the Seimas for its general activities. Therefore, under the Constitution, the beginning of the powers of the Government is linked with the assent given by the Seimas to its programme, but not with the personal composition of the Government. Considering whether to give its assent to a programme of the Government, the Seimas does not decide the issues of the personal composition of the Government, since the appointment of ministers is the prerogative of the Prime Minister and the President of the Republic. Voting for giving its assent to a programme of the Government, the Seimas expresses its consent that the Government would manage national affairs in the manner as provided for by such a programme. As long as the Seimas does not give its assent to a programme of the Government, the Government has no powers to act.

As mentioned before, the Government consists of the Prime Minister and ministers. A minister heads the respective ministry; he/she is responsible to the Seimas and the President of the Republic and is directly subordinate to the Prime Minister. Even though ministers head their respective ministry and are responsible for individual areas of governance, however, the general affairs of state governance are decided by the Government at its sittings by adopting resolutions by a majority vote of all the members of the Government (Paragraph 1 of Article 95 of the Constitution).

On the grounds of a systemic interpretation of the said provisions of the Constitution, it is possible to draw the conclusion that the fact that, by the assent of the Seimas to the programme of the Government, the Government receives its powers to act consolidates the principle of expressing confidence in the Government in corpore by the Seimas. Changing the area of governance entrusted to a minister is important from the aspect of his/her responsibility. From the standpoint of interrelationships between the Government in corpore and the Seimas, it is not the replacement of individual ministers in the Government (in cases where a member of the Government is appointed to head another ministry etc.) that is important, but rather the fact whether such changes result in more than half of new ministers in the Government. In such a case, the Seimas has a constitutional ground for verifying whether the Government continues to carry out the programme that was approved by the Seimas. Therefore, in the opinion of the Constitutional Court, the provision of Paragraph 2 of Article 101 of the Constitution relating to the replacement of ministers should be understood as meaning that a new person who is not a member of the Government is appointed instead of the head of a ministry who was released from duties or as the head of a newly established ministry.

In deciding whether more than half of the ministers were replaced in the Government, it is also very important to establish the number of ministers from which the replacement of ministers must be counted. In such a case, account should be taken of the fact that, under Paragraph 1 of Article 98 of the Constitution, ministers head their respective ministry. In view of this, the conclusion should be drawn that the number of ministers is determined by the number of ministries that is prescribed by the Law on the Government.

The principle of the responsibility of the Government to the Seimas

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 28 August 2020

... on the basis of the competence of state institutions as established by the Constitution, the model of government of the State of Lithuania should be categorised as a parliamentary republican form of government. In view of this, the Constitution establishes the principle of the responsibility of the Government to the Seimas. That principle is reflected, inter alia, in Paragraph 1 of Article 96 of the Constitution, which states that the Government is jointly and severally, i.e. in corpore, responsible to the Seimas for the general activities of the Government.

The constitutional principle of the responsibility of the Government to the Seimas is also reflected in the constitutional provisions establishing the power of the Seimas to exercise parliamentary control over the Government. The Constitution lays down various ways in which the Seimas implements the supervision of the Government, as, for instance: the Seimas, under Item 9 of Article 67 of the Constitution, supervises the activities of the Government; under Paragraph 1 of Article 101 of the Constitution, at the request of the Seimas, the Government or individual ministers must give an account of their activities to the Seimas; the Seimas, by a majority vote of all the members of the Seimas and by secret ballot, may express no confidence in the Government (Item 2 of Paragraph 3 of Article 101 of the Constitution) (ruling of 20 April 1999).

... the constitutional provisions consolidating the principle of the responsibility of the Government to the Seimas and the respective powers of the Seimas to exercise parliamentary control over the Government should be interpreted in the light of, inter alia, the parliamentary republican form of government, which is established in the Constitution, also in the light of the constitutional concept of pluralistic parliamentary democracy, which is enshrined in the Constitution and implies, inter alia, political pluralism in the parliament of a democratic state under the rule of law, as well as in the light of the requirement, arising from Paragraphs 2 and 3 of Article 5 of the Constitution and from the constitutional principles of responsible governance and a state under the rule of law, that the Seimas must properly implement the constitutional powers of supervision over the Government, inter alia, in adopting lawful and reasonable legal acts.

... The principle of the responsibility of the Government to the Seimas is reflected in the provisions of Item 7 of Article 67, Paragraph 5 of Article 92, and Paragraph 2 of Article 101 of the Constitution, which ... regulate the granting of powers (inter alia, the granting of powers once again) to the Government and which also consolidate the powers of parliamentary control over the Government carried out by the Seimas. As noted by the Constitutional Court, the constitutional regulation of the powers of state authorities and their interrelationships in forming the Government and granting it powers once again reflects the principle of the separation and balance of state powers, as established in the Constitution (ruling of 20 April 1999).

Granting the Government the powers to act (Item 7 of Article 67 and Paragraph 5 of Article 92 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 28 August 2020

Item 7 of Article 67 of the Constitution lays down the powers of the Seimas to consider the programme of the Government, presented by the Prime Minister, and to decide whether to assent to it. Closely related to this provision is Paragraph 5 of Article 92 of the Constitution, which provides that a new Government receives the powers to act after the Seimas gives assent to its programme by a majority vote of the members of the Seimas participating in the sitting.

Thus, Item 7 of Article 67 and Paragraph 5 of Article 92 of the Constitution consolidate the institution of granting powers to the Government.

... Interpreting the provisions of Item 7 of Article 67 and Paragraph 5 of Article 92 of the Constitution, the Constitutional Court has held the following:

- granting powers to the Government to act and exercising control over its activities are an important sphere of the competence of the Seimas; the Seimas, by giving assent to a programme of the Government, grants powers to the Government to act; the constitutional norms regulating the activity of the Government and consolidating the principle of the responsibility of the Government to the Seimas are, thus, implemented; it is established in the constitutional structure of the branches of power that only such a Government may exercise its powers that has the confidence of the Seimas; the legal form of granting such powers is voting in the Seimas for giving assent to a programme of the Government; under the Constitution, the activities of the Government are based on the confidence of the Seimas that has given its assent to the programme of the Government (ruling of 10 January 1998);

- the personal composition of the Government is formed both by the Prime Minister and by the President of the Republic; however, the mere approval of the composition of the Government is not enough so that the Government could begin to act; the Government must have the confidence of the Seimas; therefore, Paragraph 5 of Article 92 of the Constitution provides that “a new Government shall receive the powers to act after the Seimas gives assent to its programme by a majority vote of the Members of the Seimas participating in the sitting”; assent to the programme of the Government means that the Government is empowered to implement the provisions of its programme (ruling of 20 April 1999);

- the Government is a collegial institution that is jointly and severally responsible to the Seimas for its general activities; therefore, under the Constitution, the beginning of the powers of the Government is linked with the assent given by the Seimas to its programme, but not with the personal composition of the Government; considering whether to give its assent to a programme of the Government, the Seimas does not decide the issues of the personal composition of the Government, since the appointment of ministers is the prerogative of the Prime Minister and the President of the Republic; voting for giving its assent to a programme of the Government, the Seimas expresses its consent that the Government would manage national affairs in the manner as provided for by such a programme; as long as the Seimas does not give its assent to a programme of the Government, the Government has no powers to act; the fact that, by the assent of the Seimas to the programme of the Government, the Government receives its powers to act consolidates the principle of expressing confidence in the Government in corpore by the Seimas (ruling of 20 April 1999);

- a programme of the Government is the basis of the political and legal responsibility of the Government to the Seimas, because the Government is jointly and severally responsible to the Seimas for its general activities; this programme determines the actions of the authorities forming the Government and ensures interaction between the Government and those authorities (rulings of 10 January 1998 and 15 February 2013); a programme of the Government consolidates the programme provisions of the Government and sets out non-normative guidelines for the activities of the state for a certain time period (ruling of 6 November 2013);

- the basis of a programme of the Government is the programmes of the political forces that have won the election to the parliament; however, the provisions of those programmes acquire a legal meaning only through a programme of the Government and oblige both the Government and the majority of the Seimas supporting it to act respectively; such recognition of the legal meaning of a programme of the Government is a characteristic feature of parliamentary democracy; the said feature is consolidated in the norms of Item 7 of Article 67 and Paragraph 5 of Article 92 of the Constitution; this is the reason why the President of the Republic must appoint the Prime Minister who is supported by the majority of the Seimas and must approve such a Government whose programme can be approved by a majority vote of the members of the Seimas who take part in the sitting (ruling of 10 January 1998); – seeking to gain the confidence of the Seimas, in foreseeing the directions of its activities for a certain time period, the Government must take into consideration the possible approval or non-approval by the members of the Seimas; by expressing its confidence in a programme of the Government, the Seimas takes the obligation to supervise how the Government will act in implementing its programme (rulings of 10 January 1998 and 6 November 2013); the programme of the Government is compulsory to the Government for the whole term of its powers; by giving its assent to the programme of the Government, the Seimas expresses its confidence in the Government in principle for the period until the powers of the Seimas expire (ruling of 10 January 1998).

... the regulation governing the granting of powers to the Government, consolidated in Item 7 of Article 67 and Paragraph 5 of Article 92 of the Constitution, reflects the particularities of parliamentary pluralist democracy and expresses one of the most important features of a parliamentary republic – the confidence of the Seimas as the basis for the powers of the Government. Such confidence of the Seimas is expressed in the Government in corpore, i.e. by giving assent not to the personal composition of the Government, but to its programme, which sets out the provisions of the programme of the Government – guidelines for the activities of the state for a certain time period based on the provisions of the programme of the political forces that have won the election to the Seimas (majority of the Seimas); such assent to the programme of the Government is possible only after the Seimas duly considers it in the spirit of political pluralism and if there is support by the majority of the Seimas for the provisions of the programme of the Government. It should be stressed that, according to Item 7 of Article 67 and Paragraph 5 of Article 92 of the Constitution, powers may be granted to the Government in the sole way – once the Seimas assents to the programme of the Government.

The re-empowerment of the Government when more than half of the ministers are replaced (Paragraph 2 of Article 101 of the Constitution); differences between the re-empowerment of the Government (when more than half of the ministers are replaced) and the return of the powers of the Government (Paragraph 4 of Article 92 and Paragraph 2 of Article 101 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 28 August 2020

Paragraph 2 of Article 101 of the Constitution prescribes: “When more than half of the Ministers are replaced, the Government must once again receive its powers from the Seimas. Otherwise, the Government must resign.”

Paragraph 2 of Article 101 of the Constitution establishes the institution of the re-empowerment of the Government when more than half of the ministers are replaced. It should be noted that the institution of receiving powers once again is one of the forms of parliamentary supervision over the Government. By applying such a form, the Seimas can verify whether the programme of the Government that was assented to by the Seimas is still carried out after more than half of the ministers are replaced (ruling of 20 April 1999).

As the Constitutional Court has pointed out in interpreting Paragraph 2 of Article 101 of the Constitution, the composition of the Government may change for various reasons; under Paragraph 2 of Article 101 of the Constitution, when more than half of the ministers are replaced, the Government must once again receive its powers from the Seimas; otherwise, the Government must resign (ruling of 20 April 1999).

... under Paragraph 2 of Article 101 of the Constitution, the reason for re-empowering the Government is a substantial change in its composition – more than half of the ministers, which requires the Seimas to verify whether the Government whose composition changes substantially can implement its programme that has been assented to by the Seimas. Thus, the replacement of individual ministers, i.e. a non-substantial change in the composition of the Government until more than half of the ministers are replaced, does not, under the Constitution, constitute grounds for doubting the ability of the Government to carry out its programme that has been assented to by the Seimas in accordance with the procedure laid down in Paragraph 5 of Article 92 of the Constitution.

According to Paragraph 2 of Article 101 of the Constitution, a Government with a substantially changed composition (when more than half of the ministers are replaced) does not return its powers to the President of the Republic, but it must receive them once again as an expression of the confidence of the Seimas; if it fails to receive such powers, the Government is deemed to have lost the confidence of the Seimas and must resign. Thus, the institution, consolidated in Paragraph 2 of Article 101 of the Constitution, of the re-empowerment of the Government differs fundamentally from the institution of the return of the powers of the Government, which is consolidated in Paragraph 4 of Article 92 of the Constitution, which provides that the Government returns its powers to the President of the Republic after an election of the Seimas or after an election of the President of the Republic.

Interpreting the provision of Paragraph 4 of Article 92 of the Constitution, the Constitutional Court has noted that, according to that provision, the return of the powers of the Government is envisaged in two cases: first, after an election to the Seimas and, second, after an election of the President of the Republic (ruling of 10 January 1998). As the Constitutional Court noted in its ruling of 10 January 1998, after an election of the Seimas, the Government must not only return its powers, but also resign (Item 4 of Paragraph 3 of Article 101 of the Constitution); thus, in this case, the return of powers is the first step towards the compulsory resignation of the Government imperatively prescribed by the Constitution; it is evident that, after an election of the Seimas, the subject that expressed confidence in the Government and granted it the powers to act is clearly missing; therefore, the Government must resign. It should be noted that, in this case, the Government is not re-empowered, because this Government resigns when a new Government is formed.

The Constitutional Court also noted in its ruling of 10 January 1998 that, after an election of the President of the Republic, the Government returns its powers to the newly elected President of the Republic; however, the norms of the Constitution do not prescribe that the Government must resign in such a situation; this is due to the fact that, after a new Head of State takes office, the confidence of the Seimas in the Government remains intact; therefore, in the case of the return of powers after the election of a new President of the Republic, the same Government must be assigned by the Head of State to continue to exercise its functions. Thus, the procedure for the return of powers provides the President of the Republic with the possibility of verifying whether the Seimas continues to have confidence in the Government; the President of the Republic, on the basis of Article 92 and Item 8 of Article 84 of the Constitution, taking account of the tradition of parliamentary democracy, under the procedure established in Item 8 of Article 84 of the Constitution, proposes the candidate for the post of the Prime Minister of the Government that has returned its powers for consideration by the Seimas; after the Seimas approves the candidate for the post of the Prime Minister and the President of the Republic appoints the Prime Minister and approves the composition of the Government proposed by the Prime Minister, it is recognised that the Government once again receives its powers to act, unless more than half of the ministers are replaced (ruling of 10 January 1998).

It needs to be noted that, in this case, according to Paragraph 4 of Article 92 of the Constitution, the Government is deemed to have once again received the powers to act after the Seimas approves the candidate for the Prime Minister of the Government that has returned its powers and not to the programme of the Government, as the confidence of the Seimas in the Government, expressed previously in accordance with Paragraph 5 of Article 92 of the Constitution after the assent of the Seimas to the programme of that Government, remains, i.e. there is no constitutional basis for the Seimas to verify whether the Government can continue to implement the programme to which it has assented. Such a constitutional basis is established only in Paragraph 2 of Article 101 of the Constitution and is related not to an election of the President of the Republic, but to the said substantial change – more than half of the ministers – in the composition of the Government, which may occur not exclusively after an election of the President of the Republic.

Interpreting Paragraph 2 of Article 101 of the Constitution, the Constitutional Court noted in its ruling of 20 April 1999 that the procedure for receiving powers once again is regulated by the Statute of the Seimas. However, this does not mean that, under the Constitution, the Seimas has broad discretion to regulate, in the Statute of the Seimas, the procedure for the re-empowerment of the Government when more than half of the ministers are replaced. Paragraph 2 of Article 101 of the Constitution must not be understood literally as implying the right of the Seimas to re-empower the Government by means of a legal act of any content when more than half of the ministers are replaced.

In its acts, the Constitutional Court has held more than once that the provisions of the Constitution, which is an integral act (Paragraph 1 of Article 6 of the Constitution), are interrelated and constitute a harmonious system, that there is a balance among the values consolidated in the Constitution, and that it is not permitted to interpret any provision of the Constitution in a way that the content of any other provision of the Constitution would be distorted or denied, since the essence of the entire constitutional legal regulation would, thus, be distorted and the balance of values consolidated in the Constitution would, thus, be disturbed. Moreover, the Constitutional Court has also held that no constitutional provision can be interpreted only literally; it is not permitted to interpret any provision of the Constitution in a way that the content of any other provision of the Constitution would be distorted or denied, since the essence of the entire constitutional legal regulation would, thus, be distorted and the balance of values consolidated in the Constitution would, thus, be disturbed (inter alia, the rulings of 29 April 2008, 2 September 2009, and 6 December 2012). In this context, it should be noted that the constitutional legal regulation is established explicitly, while it may also be consolidated implicitly (ruling of 15 February 2019).

Thus, Paragraph 2 of Article 101 of the Constitution must be interpreted taking into account its semantic connections with Item 7 of Article 67 and Paragraph 5 of Article 92 of the Constitution, which ... lay down the regulation governing the granting of powers to the Government; that regulation reflects the particularities of parliamentary pluralist democracy and expresses one of the most important features of a parliamentary republic – the confidence of the Seimas as the basis for the powers of the Government. ... according to Item 7 of Article 67 and Paragraph 5 of Article 92 of the Constitution, such confidence of the Seimas is expressed in the Government in corpore, i.e. by giving assent not to the personal composition of the Government, but to its programme, which sets out the provisions of the programme of the Government – guidelines for the activities of the state for a certain time period based on the provisions of the programme of the political forces that have won the election to the Seimas (majority of the Seimas).

... according to the Constitution, the Seimas does not decide the issues of the personal composition of the Government, since the appointment of ministers is the prerogative of the Prime Minister and the President of the Republic; therefore, the only way for the Seimas to express confidence in the Government in corpore of a substantially changed composition (when more than half of the ministers are replaced) in accordance with Paragraph 2 of Article 101 of the Constitution, as is also the case of expressing confidence in a new Government in accordance with Paragraph 5 of Article 92 of the Constitution, is to assent to the programme of the Government after due consideration. Only in this way can the Seimas verify, in accordance with Paragraph 2 of Article 101 of the Constitution, whether the Government of a substantially changed composition can carry out its programme. ... the re-empowerment of the Government when more than half of the ministers are replaced provides the possibility of assessing the implementation of the programme of the Government and make necessary changes thereto, taking into account the implemented programme provisions and the evolution of the state and society. Among other things, changes in the programme of the Government may be related to the fact that more than half of the ministers are replaced following a partial change of the political forces (which are in the Seimas) forming the Government and, therefore, there could be a need to integrate into the programme of the Government the programme provisions of the new political forces that have joined the majority of the Seimas.

Consequently, under Paragraph 2 of Article 101 of the Constitution, when more than half of the ministers are replaced, the procedure of the re-empowerment of the Government must not be a mere formality: the Government must receive the powers once again when the Seimas adopts a decision to assent to the programme of the Government. A different interpretation of Paragraph 2 of Article 101 of the Constitution, according to which the Seimas may purportedly re-empower the Government without reconsidering its programme provisions and without assenting to its programme would be incompatible with the requirement, arising from Paragraphs 2 and 3 of Article 5 of the Constitution and from the constitutional principles of responsible governance and a state under the rule of law, that the Seimas must properly implement the constitutional powers of supervision over the Government, as well as incompatible with the concept of pluralistic parliamentary democracy, which is enshrined in the Constitution and which implies, inter alia, political pluralism in the parliament of a democratic state under the rule of law.

... the activities of the Government are based on the confidence of the Seimas that has approved the programme of that Government; the only way for the Seimas to express confidence in the Government in corpore of a substantially changed composition (when more than half of the ministers are replaced) in accordance with Paragraph 2 of Article 101 of the Constitution, as is also the case of expressing confidence in a new Government in accordance with Paragraph 5 of Article 92 of the Constitution, is to assent to the programme of the Government after due consideration.

When re-empowering the Government in cases where more than half of the ministers are replaced, the Seimas must adopt the resolution of the Seimas on assenting to the programme of the Government by a majority vote of the members of the Seimas participating in the sitting

... under Paragraph 2 of Article 101 of the Constitution, when more than half of the ministers are replaced, the Government must once again receive its powers from the Seimas when the Seimas adopts a decision to assent to the programme of the Government. Having regard to the overall constitutional regulation, inter alia, Paragraph 5 of Article 92 of the Constitution, as well as the requirement, stemming from the Constitution, that, in resolving state governance issues assigned to the Seimas under the Constitution and laws, where the regulation of the said issues does not require the adoption of laws and where resolving those issues gives rise to legal consequences for other persons, the Seimas must adopt resolutions of the Seimas by a majority of the members of the Seimas participating in the sitting (unless the Constitution explicitly specifies a different majority necessary for the adoption of the respective decision of the Seimas), it should be concluded that, by re-empowering the Government in accordance with Paragraph 2 of Article 101 of the Constitution when more than half of the ministers are replaced, the Seimas must adopt the resolution of the Seimas on assenting to the programme of the Government by a majority vote of the members of the Seimas participating in the sitting.

7.3. THE POWERS OF THE GOVERNMENT

On the powers of the Government in the sphere of the budget, see 11. The state budget and finances, 11.1. The state budget. The property liabilities of the state. Taxes.

The powers of the Government

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 26 February 2010

The powers of the Government as an institution of state power are established, inter alia, in Article 94 of the Constitution. Under Article 94 of the Constitution, the Government: manages national affairs, protects the territorial inviolability of the Republic of Lithuania, and guarantees state security and public order (Item 1); executes laws, the resolutions of the Seimas on the implementation of laws, as well as the decrees of the President of the Republic (Item 2); coordinates the activities of ministries and other establishments of the Government (Item 3); prepares a draft state budget and submits it to the Seimas; executes the state budget and submits to the Seimas a report on the execution of the budget (Item 4); prepares draft laws and presents them to the Seimas for consideration (Item 5); establishes diplomatic ties and maintains relations with foreign states and international organisations (Item 6); and performs other duties prescribed to the Government by the Constitution and other laws (Item 7).

The powers of the Government are also established in Item 3 of Article 84, Paragraph 1 of Article 89, Paragraph 1 of Article 123, Paragraph 1 of Article 128, etc. of the Constitution. The powers of the Government arise from the Constitution and laws. Everything that the Government performs, while implementing the powers established for it in the Constitution and laws, is deciding the affairs of state governance (rulings of 29 November 2001 and 30 May 2003).

The powers of the Government

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 13 May 2010

The Constitution consolidates only the main powers of the Government and stipulates that the Government also performs other duties prescribed to it not only by the Constitution, but also by other laws (Item 7 of Article 94 of the Constitution). Such a constitutional regulation of the powers of the Government is determined by the fact that the areas and functions of state governance are extremely varied and subject to change. The activity of the Government has not only an executive nature, but also a procedural nature. While executing laws and resolutions adopted by the Seimas, the Government itself passes normative and individual legal acts and ensures their enforcement (ruling of 23 November 1999).

7.4. THE ORGANISATIONAL FORM OF THE ACTIVITY OF THE GOVERNMENT AND LEGAL ACTS ADOPTED BY IT

Legal acts adopted by the Government are substatory legal acts

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 26 October 1995

... Legal acts adopted by the Government are substatory legal acts ... In its ruling of 19 January 1994, the Constitutional Court held the following: the norms of a law are implemented by means of a substatory legal act; however, "such an act may not replace the law itself and create new general legal rules the legal force of which would compete with the norms of the law. A substatory legal act is an act of the application of the norms of a law irrespective of whether such a substatory act has one-off (ad hoc) or permanent validity" ...

Legal acts adopted by the Government are substatory legal acts

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 18 June 1998

... in the system of the sources of legal acts that exists in this country, legal acts adopted by the Government are substatory acts. Substatory legal acts particularise and regulate the implementation of the norms of laws.

The organisational form of the activity of the Government and legal acts adopted by it (Paragraph 1 of Article 95 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 23 November 1999

Paragraph 1 of Article 95 of the Constitution provides that "The Government of the Republic of Lithuania shall decide the affairs of state governance at its sittings by adopting resolutions by a majority vote of all the members of the Government".

The aforesaid legal norm establishes the organisational form of the activity of the Government, i.e. questions are decided at the sittings of the Government; it is specified therein what kind of a majority vote is necessary in order to adopt a resolution, i.e. a resolution must be adopted by a majority vote of all the members of the Government; and the type of legal acts adopted by the Government is established therein, i.e. the affairs of state governance are decided by adopting resolutions of the Government. To summarise the content of the legal norm set out in Paragraph 1 of Article 95 of the Constitution, the conclusion should be drawn that this norm determines the manner how the Government decides the affairs of state governance.

The powers of the Government to adopt substatory acts (Items 2 and 7 of Article 94 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 15 March 2000

Article 94 of the Constitution prescribes:

“The Government of the Republic of Lithuania:

... 2) shall execute laws, the resolutions of the Seimas on the implementation of laws, as well as the decrees of the President of the Republic;

... 7) shall discharge other duties prescribed to the Government by the Constitution and other laws.”

Under Item 2 of Article 94 of the Constitution, the Government may adopt substatory acts regardless of whether or not a law instructs it to do so. Under Item 7 of Article 94 of the Constitution, the Government is obligated to adopt substatory acts in order to perform its duty imposed on it by the Constitution and other laws. ... In all cases, however, a legal act adopted by the Government may not be in conflict with any law, and, furthermore, such a legal act may not contain any new legal norms competing with those of a law. In addition, the legislature may not instruct the Government to perform certain actions where the content of such an instruction would violate the constitutional principle of the supremacy of laws.

Thus, the sole ground that a law instructs the Government to regulate additionally a certain question of the implementation of the law, or that such an instruction is missing, makes it impossible to decide whether a certain substatory act adopted by the Government is in conflict with the Constitution and laws or whether such a substatory act is in compliance with them. In every concrete case, an assessment should be made of the relation between the content of the norms of a substatory act adopted by the Government and that of the norms of the laws for the implementation of which the said substatory act was adopted.

The duty of the Government to harmonise its resolutions with the norms of laws that are adopted later (Items 2 and 7 of Article 94 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 5 April 2000

... a government resolution is a substatory legal act; therefore, such an act may not be in conflict with any law and it may not contain any legal norms competing with those of a law. In cases where a government resolution that contains norms conflicting with a law is adopted before the said law is passed, such a government resolution must be harmonised with the norms of the law that is adopted later.

... the norms of Items 2 and 7 of Article 94 of the Constitution that provide that the Government executes laws and performs other duties prescribed to it by the Constitution and other laws should be interpreted as establishing the duty of the Government to amend and supplement the acts that it previously adopted in order that they would be in compliance with subsequently adopted laws, or to repeal the acts that it previously adopted in cases where the legal norms established in such government acts are in conflict with those of laws.

The duty of the Government to adopt substatory acts that are necessary in order to implement laws (Items 2 and 7 of Article 94 of the Constitution); the Government is bound by its own resolutions

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 30 October 2001

Under the provision of Item 2 of Article 94 of the Constitution, the Government executes laws; thus, the duty of the Government to adopt substatory acts that are necessary in order to implement laws stems directly from the Constitution.

Moreover, if the legislature believes that it is necessary to adopt certain substatory acts in order to implement laws, it may impose such a duty on the Government either by means of a law or in a resolution of the Seimas concerning the implementation of laws.

Thus, the duty of the Government to adopt the substatory acts that are necessary for the implementation of laws stems from the Constitution and, in cases where there is the assignment by the legislature to do so, it also stems from laws and the resolutions of the Seimas concerning the implementation of laws.

The phrase “under the procedure established by the Government” ... means that it is the Government itself that must establish the said procedure. The Government may not instruct any other institution to establish such a procedure. In view of the fact that, under Paragraph 1 of Article 95 of the Constitution, the Government decides the affairs of state governance at its sittings by adopting resolutions by a majority vote of all the members of the Government, the aforementioned phrase means that the said procedure must be established by means of a government resolution. Such a resolution must have a normative content. ...

In its ruling of 28 June 2001, the Constitutional Court held that the Government is bound by and must observe its own resolutions. Thus, the procedure adopted by the Government is binding not only on other subjects, but also on the Government itself. As long as the procedure established by the Government is in force, it may not adopt any decisions otherwise than under the said procedure.

Implementing the assignment by the legislature to establish a certain procedure, the Government may lay down only such a legal regulation that is in compliance with laws. The procedure established by the Government may not contain any legal norms that would provide for a legal regulation that would be different from that established in laws. The same procedure may not contain any norms competing with the norms of laws, either.

The powers of the Government to establish when its resolutions come into force and lose their validity (Paragraph 1 of Article 95 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court’s ruling of 29 October 2003

Under Paragraph 1 of Article 95 of the Constitution, the Government of the Republic of Lithuania decides the affairs of state governance at its sittings by adopting resolutions by a majority vote of all the members of the Government.

Under the Constitution, the Government has the powers to adopt resolutions; consequently, the Government also has the powers to establish when a resolution adopted by it comes into force. According to the Constitution, the Government also has the powers to establish when its resolutions lose their validity. The Government can establish this by adopting a resolution. Thus, according to the Constitution, only the Government itself has the right to decide when government resolutions come into force and lose their validity. In establishing when resolutions adopted by it come into force or lose their validity, the Government must respect the Constitution and laws.

The Constitutional Court has held in its rulings more than once that, if the Constitution directly establishes particular powers of a certain state institution, no state institution can take over such powers from another institution, or transfer or waive them, while the other institution cannot accept such powers; such powers may not be changed or limited by law.

Under the Constitution, the Government may not establish, by its resolutions, any such a legal regulation that the time of the entry into force or the loss of the validity of a resolution would depend on the entry into force of a lower-ranking legal act that is passed by another subject.

Signing resolutions of the Government and their authenticity (Paragraph 2 of Article 95 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court’s ruling of 29 October 2003

... under Paragraph 2 of Article 95 of the Constitution, the resolutions of the Government are signed by the Prime Minister and the minister of the respective area.

Thus, Paragraph 2 of Article 95 of the Constitution prescribes what state officials have the powers to sign the resolutions of the Government. The provision of Paragraph 2 of Article 95 of the Constitution also means that the Prime Minister and the minister of the respective area must sign the resolutions of the Government if they have been adopted according to the established procedure, and that persons who are not specified in Paragraph 2 of Article 95 of the Constitution, i.e. who are not the Prime Minister and the minister of the respective area, or are only the Prime Minister or only the minister of the respective area, are prohibited from signing the resolutions of the Government.

According to the Constitution, after the entry into force of the Constitution, only those resolutions of the Government that are signed by the Prime Minister and the minister of the respective area are authentic.

[...]

Signing a government resolution is a one-off act. Its signing testifies that such a resolution of the Government has been adopted and that namely the signed text of the government resolution is authentic.

[...]

The requirement of Paragraph 2 of Article 95 of the Constitution stipulating that the resolutions of the Government are signed by the Prime Minister and the minister of the respective area must be applied to government resolutions that were adopted after the entry into force of the Constitution. This requirement may not be applied retroactively to the government acts that were adopted and signed before the entry into force of the Constitution.

The Government is bound by its own resolutions

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 8 July 2005

The Government is bound by its own resolutions (ruling of 28 June 2001). As long as a government resolution is not amended or repealed, the Government must follow the requirements laid down in such a resolution.

The duty of the Government to observe laws that are in force (Item 2 of Article 94 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 23 May 2007

Under the Constitution, the Government, as an institution of executive power, has broad discretion to form and pursue the economic policy of the state and to regulate economic activity accordingly. Under Paragraph 1 of Article 95 of the Constitution, the Government decides the affairs of state governance at its sittings by adopting resolutions by a majority vote of all the members of the Government; the Government is jointly and severally responsible to the Seimas for the general activities of the Government (Paragraph 1 of Article 96 of the Constitution). According to its competence defined in the Constitution and laws, in formulating and pursuing the economic policy of the state and regulating economic activity in the respective manner, inter alia, by adopting resolutions, the Government must not act ultra vires; the Government must observe the Constitution and laws. Should the Government fail to observe laws, the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law, implying the hierarchy of legal acts, and Item 2 of Article 94 of the Constitution, under which the Government executes, inter alia, laws, would be denied.

... the Government ... does not have discretion to decide not to apply the provisions of a certain law regulating the respective relationships, unless the non-application of a certain provision of such a law is expressis verbis provided for in laws.

Legal acts adopted by the Government and their official publication (Article 95 of the Constitution, Paragraph 4 of the Constitutional Act on Membership of the Republic of Lithuania in the European Union)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 27 June 2007

Under Article 95 of the Constitution, the Government decides the affairs of state governance at its sittings by adopting resolutions by a majority vote of all the members of the Government (Paragraph 1); the resolutions of the Government are signed by the Prime Minister and the minister of the respective area (Paragraph 2).

In this context, it should be mentioned that the Constitution does not expressis verbis establish any time frame within which adopted government resolutions must be signed and officially published. The time frame during which a resolution adopted by the Government must be signed and officially published must be laid down in a law.

When interpreting Article 95 of the Constitution (also in the context of other provisions of the Constitution), the Constitutional Court held that, under the Constitution, the Government, while deciding the affairs of state governance, must always adopt resolutions; such resolutions must be published regardless of whether the legal acts adopted by the Government are normative or individual, and regardless of the subjects or the circles of subjects for which the said legal acts are intended (rulings of 29 November 2001 and 30 May 2003). The procedure for the publication of government resolutions and their entry into force is established by means of a law (ruling of 29 November 2001).

In this context, it needs to be emphasised that the provisions of the official constitutional doctrine that the Government, while deciding the affairs of state governance, must always adopt resolutions and such resolutions must be published regardless of whether the legal acts adopted by the Government are normative or individual, and regardless of the subjects or the circles of subjects for which the said legal acts are intended, have been formulated in the jurisprudence of the Constitutional Court, inter alia, in the constitutional justice cases where the Constitutional Court investigated the constitutionality of the legal acts (paragraphs thereof) that were passed prior to 14 August 2004 when the Republic of Lithuania's Constitutional Act on Membership of the Republic of Lithuania in the European Union, which was adopted on 13 July 2004, came into force; the said constitutional act approved in a constitutional manner the membership of the Republic of Lithuania in the European Union (rulings of 13 December 2004 and 14 March 2006) and is, according to Article 150 of the Constitution, a constituent part of the Constitution.

After the entry into force of the Constitutional Act on Membership of the Republic of Lithuania in the European Union, the formerly formulated official constitutional doctrine of government acts is developed in the jurisprudence of the Constitutional Court while taking account of the fact that Paragraph 4 of this Constitutional Act prescribes that the Government considers the proposals to adopt the acts of European Union law following the procedure established by legal acts and that, as regards these proposals, the Government may adopt decisions or resolutions for the adoption of which the provisions of Article 95 of the Constitution are not applicable.

Thus, the provisions of the official constitutional doctrine that the Government, while deciding the affairs of state governance, must always adopt resolutions and that such resolutions must be officially published regardless of whether the legal acts adopted by the Government are normative or individual, and regardless of the subjects or the circles of subjects for which the said legal acts are intended are not applicable to the government resolutions and decisions that are adopted pursuant to Paragraph 4 of the Constitutional Act on Membership of the Republic of Lithuania in the European Union.

The acts of the Government are statutory legal acts

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 8 October 2009

... the Constitutional Court ... has held that, if the legal regulation laid down in government resolutions competed with the legal regulation established in laws or were not based on laws, there would be not only a violation of both the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law and Item 2 of Article 94 of the Constitution, but also a violation of Paragraph 2 of Article 5 of the Constitution, which provides that the scope of powers is limited by the Constitution; in addition, this could lead to a violation of the constitutional principle of the separation of powers (rulings of 31 May 2006, 13 August 2007, and 29 April 2009).

The powers of the Government to adopt substatory acts (Items 2 and 7 of Article 94 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 29 September 2015

Under Item 2 of Article 94 of the Constitution, the Government executes laws, the resolutions of the Seimas on the implementation of laws, as well as the decrees of the President of the Republic; under Item 7 of this article, the Government implements other duties prescribed to it by the Constitution and other laws.

While interpreting these constitutional provisions, the Constitutional Court has held on more than one occasion that legal acts adopted by the Government are substatory acts; they are the acts of application of law; they elaborate the legal norms and make them more concrete, as well as regulate their implementation; it is important that the Government would adopt substatory legal acts without exceeding its powers and that these substatory legal acts would not be in conflict with the Constitution and laws.

The Constitutional Court has noted that, under Item 2 of Article 94 of the Constitution, the Government may adopt substatory acts regardless of whether or not a law instructs it to do so; meanwhile, under Item 7 of this article, it must adopt substatory acts in order to fulfil duties assigned to it by the Constitution and laws (ruling of 15 March 2000). In the acts of the Constitutional Court, it is also emphasised that the legislature may not assign the Government to perform certain actions in such a way that, by its content, would violate the constitutional principle of the supremacy of laws (ruling of 15 March 2000) and that only such powers of the Government to issue legal acts may be regarded to be in compliance with the Constitution that stem from the Constitution, laws, or resolutions of the Seimas concerning the implementation of such laws that are not in conflict with the Constitution, as well as from such decrees of the President of the Republic that are not in conflict with the Constitution (ruling of 5 March 2004). Thus, the sole ground that a law instructs the Government to regulate additionally a certain question of the implementation of the law, or that such an instruction is missing, makes it impossible to decide whether a certain substatory act adopted by the Government is in conflict with the Constitution and laws, or whether such a substatory act is in compliance with them; in every concrete case, an assessment should be made of the relation between the content of the norms of a substatory act adopted by the Government and that of the norms of the laws for the implementation of which the said substatory act was adopted (ruling of 15 March 2000).

The duty of the Government to observe valid laws, inter alia, the procedure for adopting legal acts that is established in laws (Item 2 of Article 94 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 8 July 2016

When interpreting Item 2 of Article 94 of the Constitution, the Constitutional Court has held on more than one occasion that, under the Constitution, the Government must observe valid laws when passing its legal acts (inter alia, the rulings of 18 December 2001, 13 August 2007, and 16 June 2015), inter alia, it must observe such laws that establish the procedure for adopting legal acts. The Government must follow the procedure for the drafting, assessment, coordination, and consideration of its own resolutions, as well as for voting on them, which is established by laws (ruling of 13 August 2007). It should be noted that the duty of the Government to observe the procedure for adopting legal acts that is established in laws not only may, but also must be treated as a constitutional duty.

... in the course of adopting legal acts, none of the stages or rules of the procedure for adopting legal acts that is established in laws may be ignored; the necessity to adopt legal acts consistently with the procedure for adopting legal acts that is established in laws stems from the Constitution. Under the Constitution, the stages and rules of the procedure for adopting legal acts of the Government, as established in laws and other legal acts, must be observed while preparing any draft legal act of the Government, irrespective of whether this legal act is aimed to amend (modify) a legal regulation, to establish a new one, or to annul an effective one.

The duty of the Government to comply with the publicity and transparency requirements of law-making procedures when adopting legal acts

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 8 July 2016

... the constitutional principle of responsible governance, which is to be interpreted in conjunction with the imperative obliging state institutions to serve the people, as consolidated in Paragraph 3 of Article 5 of the Constitution, implies the publicity and transparency requirements of law-making procedures; such requirements must be followed, inter alia, by institutions that exercise state power. ...

... also such constitutionally justifiable cases are possible where a law may also provide for a non-public process of passing legal acts where such legal acts are adopted by the Government, as, for instance, in order to protect information constituting a state secret, to avoid a threat to the constitutional order, defensive power, or other important interests.

... in view of the constitutional status of the Government as an executive state institution, as well as of the fact that, under Article 95 of the Constitution, the Government decides the affairs of state governance at its sittings by adopting resolutions, only a law may provide for the constitutionally justified exceptional cases related to the adoption of government decisions, inter alia, during a state of emergency or martial law or in the event of a natural disaster, when the agenda of a sitting of the Government can be supplemented with new draft legal acts that have not been agreed, according to the ordinary procedure, with the ministries, as well as other government establishments and state institutions concerned, by specifying the relevant reasons. However, once such a procedure for the initiation of the legal acts (submission of draft legal acts) of the Government is established by means of a law, no preconditions should be created for the formation of such a practice of supplementing the agenda of a sitting of the Government with additional issues that, by way of derogation from the said constitutionally justified exceptions, would deny the constitutional requirements of publicity and transparency of law-making procedures.

Legal acts adopted by the Government (Article 1 of the Constitution and Article 4 of the Constitutional Act on Membership of the Republic of Lithuania in the European Union)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 2 March 2018

Paragraph 1 of Article 95 of the Constitution provides that the Government decides on state governance issues at its sittings by adopting resolutions by a majority vote of all the members of the Government. ...

Interpreting Paragraph 1 of Article 95 of the Constitution, the Constitutional Court has held that the Government, while deciding on state governance issues, must always adopt resolutions; these resolutions must be officially published regardless of whether the legal acts adopted by the Government are normative or individual, and regardless of the subjects or the circles of subjects for which these legal acts are intended (rulings of 29 November 2001, 30 May 2003, and 27 June 2007); state governance issues assigned to the competence of the Government under the Constitution and laws may not be decided by the adoption of another type of an act by the Government (inter alia, the rulings of 29 November 2001, 30 May 2003, and 13 May 2010).

The only exception provided for by the Constitution when the Government is allowed to disregard these requirements is set out in Article 4 of the Constitutional Act on Membership of the Republic of Lithuania in the European Union, which is a constituent part of the Constitution:

“The Government shall consider the proposals to adopt the acts of European Union law following the procedure established by legal acts. As regards these proposals, the Government may adopt decisions or resolutions for the adoption of which the provisions of Article 95 of the Constitution are not applicable.”

Thus, as noted by the Constitutional Court, the provisions of the official constitutional doctrine that the Government, while deciding on state governance issues, must always adopt resolutions and that the legal acts of the Government must be officially published regardless of whether the legal acts adopted by the Government are normative or individual, and regardless of the subjects or the circles of subjects for which these legal acts are intended are not applicable to the decisions and resolutions of the Government that are adopted in accordance with Article 4 of the Constitutional Act on Membership of the Republic of Lithuania in the European Union (rulings of 27 June 2007 and 13 May 2010).

In this context, it should be noted that, in accordance with Article 4 of the Constitutional Act on Membership of the Republic of Lithuania in the European Union, when the procedure for considering the proposals to adopt the acts of European Union law is established in legal acts, certain other requirements that are laid down in Article 95 for the adoption of the acts of the Government by which the Government decides on state governance issues may also be not applied.

This means, therefore, that it may be allowed to decide regarding the proposals to adopt the acts of European Union law not in the sittings of the Government, but in a different organisational form of the activities of the Government (among others, in the meetings of the Government); the decisions and resolutions of the Government on these proposals may also be exempted from the requirement, consolidated for the resolutions of the Government in Paragraph 2 of Article 95 of the Constitution, that the resolutions of the Government are signed by the Prime Minister and the minister of the respective area.

It should be noted that the wording “the provisions of Article 95 of the Constitution are not applicable” of Article 4 of the Constitutional Act on Membership of the Republic of Lithuania in the European Union may not be made absolute and interpreted as allowing for the adoption of the above-mentioned decisions and resolutions of the Government not by a majority vote of all the members of the Government.

In the Lithuanian system of executive authority institutions, the Government, which implements state governance, has a special place (rulings of 10 January 1998, 13 December 2004, and 13 May 2010); ... under the Constitution, the Government is a collegial executive authority institution, which implements state governance.

It should be mentioned that, inter alia, interpreting the provision consolidated in Article 1 of the Constitution that the State of Lithuania is an independent democratic state, the Constitutional Court has pointed out that one of the democratic principles of decision making is the principle of the majority (rulings of 22 July 1994, 4 April 2006, and 29 March 2012).

It should also be mentioned that, as it is clear from the travaux préparatoires of the Constitutional Act on Membership of the Republic of Lithuania in the European Union, Article 4 of this Act was not aimed at imposing a requirement different from the requirement of a majority vote of all the members of the Government, laid down in Paragraph 1 of Article 95 of the Constitution, for the adoption of the decisions and resolutions of the Government, but it was aimed at ensuring, compared to the adoption of the resolutions of the Government, the faster adoption of the decisions and resolutions of the Government on approving the position of the Republic of Lithuania on the proposals to adopt the acts of European Union law.

Thus, it should be noted that, under the Constitution, when deciding on state governance issues, the Government may adopt resolutions (Paragraph 1 of Article 95 of the Constitution), as well as decisions or resolutions (Article 4 of the Constitutional Act on Membership of the Republic of Lithuania in the European Union). It should also be noted that, in view of the constitutional nature of the Government as a collegial executive authority institution, as well as the requirement, stemming from the constitutionally consolidated principle of democratic decision making, that collegial state institutions must adopt decisions by a majority vote, under the Constitution, inter alia, Paragraph 1 of Article 95 thereof, all acts of the Government that the Government adopts in deciding on state governance issues (inter alia, in approving, in accordance with Article 4 of the Constitutional Act on Membership of the Republic of Lithuania in the European Union, the position of the Republic of Lithuania on the proposals to adopt the acts of European Union law) must be adopted by a majority vote of all the members of the Government. If Article 4 of the Constitutional Act on Membership of the Republic of Lithuania in the European Union were interpreted differently, i.e. that, purportedly, under this article, a majority vote of all the members of the Government is not required to adopt the decisions and resolutions of the Government, the position of the Republic of Lithuania on the proposals to adopt the acts of European Union law, once approved by the said acts of the Government, could not be considered to be the position of the Government and, at the same time, could not be considered to be the position of the Republic of Lithuania.

To sum up, it should be noted that, under the Constitution, an act adopted by the Government in deciding state governance issues not by a majority vote of all the members of the Government cannot be considered an expression of the will of the Government as a collegial executive authority institution.

Resolutions of the Government on the recognition of economic, social, cultural, or other projects as important to the state

... under the Constitution, while deciding on state governance issues, the Government must always adopt resolutions; these resolutions must be officially published regardless of whether the legal acts adopted by the Government are normative or individual, and regardless of the subjects or the circles of subjects for which these legal acts are intended (inter alia, the rulings of 30 May 2003, 27 June 2007, and 2 March 2018).

The resolutions of the Government, as well as other legal acts, may differ according to the form, contents, structure, or scope and may have various constituent parts (appendices) (ruling of 27 June 2007). The Constitutional Court held in its ruling of 9 February 2010 that all parts of a normative legal act (including appendices) constitute a whole, are inseparably interconnected, and have equal legal force; a legal act and its appendices may not be separated, because, if the content specifically set out in appendices is changed, the content of the entire normative legal act also changes; an entire legal act with all its constituent parts must be published.

... in its rulings of 26 February 2010 and 2 April 2013, the Constitutional Court, interpreting in conjunction with Paragraph 2 of Article 7 of the Constitution, the requirements, stemming from the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law, for the publication of government acts on approving state property privatisation agreements (drafts on amending them), noted the following:

- no cases may be tolerated where government resolutions perfunctorily approbate privatisation agreements the content of which is not known to the public, and do not indicate anything specific;
- the constitutional requirement that law must be public means not only that a government resolution on approving draft privatisation agreements, including their appendices, for the most important Lithuanian economic objects must be officially published, but also that such a government resolution must not only formally approve the draft agreement, including appendices, but it also must, inter alia, state that the provisions of the draft agreement, which is approved by this resolution, are in compliance with the privatisation conditions provided for in the programme for the privatisation of the object, as well as it must contain the principal provisions of the agreement, such as the aim and object of the agreement and the essential obligations of the state.

These provisions of the official constitutional doctrine are mutatis mutandis applicable to government resolutions on the recognition of economic, social, cultural, or other projects as important to the state.

... Paragraph 2 of Article 7 of the Constitution, the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law, and the principle of the transparency of the activities of public authority institutions and officials, which stems from Paragraphs 2 and 3 of Article 5 of the Constitution and the constitutional principle of responsible governance, imply the requirement for the Government, when recognising economic, social, cultural, or other projects to be important to the state, not only to express, in a government resolution, a formal decision to recognise a certain project to be important to the state, but also to establish, in this resolution (or its constituent parts) or another officially published legal act, the essential conditions for the implementation of the project that is important to the state, such as the aim, object, implementation deadlines, the sources of funding, the essential obligations of the developer (developers) of the project, etc.

... after certain projects are recognised to be important to the state in accordance with the procedure established by legal acts, Paragraphs 2 and 3 of Article 46 of the Constitution and the constitutional principle of responsible governance give rise to the duty of the Government to exercise effective control over the implementation of these projects, inter alia, in accordance with the procedure and grounds established by legal acts, to recognise as no longer valid government resolutions on giving certain projects the status of a project important to the state in cases where these projects no longer meet the criteria for declaring them to be important to the state.

The duty of the Government to ensure the effective execution of laws (Items 2 and 7 of Article 94 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 27 April 2018

... Items 2 and 7 of Article 94 of the Constitution, which consolidate the powers of the Government as an executive authority institution, as well as the constitutional principles of a state under the rule of law and responsible governance, give rise to the duty of the Government to ensure the effective execution of laws, inter alia, in cases where there is no specific authorisation for it established by means of a law. This duty of the Government includes, inter alia, the duty of the Government to adopt statutory acts necessary for ensuring the continuity of the activities of establishments financed from the state budget and the proper performance of the functions assigned to them. When adopting these legal acts, the Government ... under the Constitution, must observe the effective laws and, when executing certain laws, must not violate others.

7.5. THE MEMBERS OF THE GOVERNMENT. MINISTRIES

The powers of the Prime Minister to sign international treaties (Item 1 of Article 84, Item 6 of Article 94, and Paragraph 1 of Article 97 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 17 October 1995

The fact that the Prime Minister is entitled to sign international treaties can be derived from the constitutional provisions related to the powers of the Government in the sphere of foreign policy and international relations. Item 1 of Article 84 of the Constitution provides that the President of the Republic “shall decide the basic issues of foreign policy and, together with the Government, conduct foreign policy”. The second provision of this item means that not only the President of the Republic, but also the Government has the concrete powers to conclude international treaties, as without such powers it is impossible to conduct foreign policy. Item 6 of Article 94 of the Constitution provides that the Government “shall establish diplomatic ties and maintain relations with foreign states and international organisations”. Such ties and relations are also established and consolidated by international treaties. The right of the Prime Minister to sign treaties is also substantiated by the provision of Paragraph 1 of Article 97 of the Constitution, according to which “The Prime Minister shall represent the Government of the Republic of Lithuania”.

Ministries, their establishment, and dissolution (Item 8 of Article 67 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 3 June 1999

In establishing the functions and powers of the institutions of legislative power and those of executive power in the Constitution, interaction between such functions and powers is also provided for. Such a norm is consolidated in Item 8 of Article 67 of the Constitution: the Seimas shall “upon the proposal of the Government, establish and abolish the ministries of the Republic of Lithuania”. ...

Ministries are state governance institutions that have special competence. They are established or dissolved with a view to organising governance in various spheres. A ministry fulfils the functions of state governance in the sphere established for it by means of laws and other legal acts; in the said sphere, a ministry conducts state policy. Fulfilling their functions, ministries inevitably participate not only in governance, but also in other legal relationships of varied nature (property relationships, employment relationships, etc.). Ministries are legal persons.

Item 8 of Article 67 of the Constitution consolidates the right of the Seimas to establish and dissolve ministries. The implementation of such powers of the Seimas is bound by the concrete powers of the Government that are consolidated in the Constitution: if the Government does not present a particular proposal, the Seimas may not adopt a decision whether to establish or dissolve a ministry. Thus, this norm of the Constitution ensures the balance of power between the legislative and executive branches.

The competence of ministers to head their respective ministry (Paragraph 1 of Article 98 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 23 November 1999

Paragraph 1 of Article 98 of the Constitution provides that “Ministers shall head their respective ministry, shall decide on issues belonging to the competence of their ministry, and shall also discharge other functions provided for by law”.

It should be noted that the following elements constitute the content of the provision “Ministers shall head their respective ministry” of Paragraph 1 of Article 98 of the Constitution: under procedure established by law or by means of other legal acts, a minister is entitled to choose the employees of his/her ministry and to appoint and dismiss them; a minister is entitled to organise the work of the employees of his/her ministry in order that the functions established for the ministry by law and by means of other legal acts would be performed; a minister is entitled to give instructions to all employees of his/her ministry who must carry them out; a minister is entitled to apply disciplinary measures to all employees of his/her ministry who fail to perform their duties or fail to carry out the instructions of the minister, or who fail to carry them out properly; a minister is entitled to give incentives to all employees of his/her ministry.

[...]

It needs to be noted that the competence of a minister to head his/her ministry established in Paragraph 1 of Article 98 of the Constitution implies his/her personal responsibility for the activities of the ministry. Under Paragraph 2 of Article 96 of the Constitution, ministers, in directing the areas of governance entrusted to them, are responsible to the Seimas and the President of the Republic, and are directly subordinate to the Prime Minister. Paragraph 1 of Article 101 of the Constitution provides that ministers must give an account of their activities to the Seimas. ...

[...]

... A minister, who is empowered to head his/her ministry under Paragraph 1 of Article 98 of the Constitution, is also responsible for the activity of all the ministry headed by him/her and for the execution of laws, government resolutions, and other legal acts. Thus, a minister is also responsible for the economic and financial activity of his/her ministry regardless of the character of such activity ...

The direct subordination of a minister to the Prime Minister (Paragraph 2 of Article 96 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 23 November 1999

Under Paragraph 2 of Article 96 of the Constitution, ministers are directly subordinate to the Prime Minister. This means that legally a minister is not subordinate to any other subjects and that, under the Constitution, only the Prime Minister and, in the cases provided for in the Constitution, the President of the Republic may give instructions to a minister. The Constitution does not grant any other subject ... the right to give instructions to a minister.

The constitutional status of the Government and its members (Paragraph 2 of Article 60, Articles 99 and 100 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 30 May 2003

Under the Constitution, the Government, which is composed of the Prime Minister and ministers, is a collegial institution of executive power.

The Prime Minister and ministers may not hold any other elective or appointive office, may not work in any business, commercial, or other private establishments or enterprises, nor may they receive any remuneration other than that established for their respective governmental duties and payment for creative activities (Article 99 of the Constitution). According to Paragraph 2 of Article 60 of the Constitution, the Prime Minister and ministers may be members of the Seimas at the same time.

It should also be noted that the Constitution establishes the immunity of the Prime Minister and ministers in order that the Government would perform, without hindrance, the duties assigned to it under the Constitution and laws. Article 100 of the Constitution provides that the Prime Minister and ministers may not be held criminally liable or be detained, or have their liberty restricted otherwise, without the prior consent of the Seimas or, in the period between the sessions of the Seimas, without the prior consent of the President of the Republic.

The competence of ministers to head the respective ministry (Paragraph 1 of Article 98 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 8 March 2018

Paragraph 1 of Article 98 of the Constitution prescribes: “Ministers shall head their respective ministry, shall decide on issues belonging to the competence of their ministry, and shall also discharge other functions provided for by law.”

In this context, it should be noted that ministries are state governance institutions that have special competence; they are established or dissolved with a view to organising governance in various spheres; a ministry fulfils the functions of state governance in the area assigned to it by means of laws and other legal acts; in the said area, the ministry implements state policy; fulfilling their functions, ministries inevitably participate not only in governance legal relationships, but also in other legal relationships of varied nature (property relationships, employment relationships, etc.) (ruling of 3 June 1999).

It should also be noted that, besides the performance of state functions assigned to them, the authorities implementing state power also perform other activities, inter alia, related to the performance of internal administration functions (ruling of 13 May 2010). ... it should be noted that, in the activity of a ministry, which carries out the functions of state governance in the area assigned to it and implements state policy in this area, there are, inter alia, also activities related to the performance of internal administration functions.

In its ruling of 23 November 1999, among other things, interpreting the provisions of Paragraph 1 of Article 98 of the Constitution, the Constitutional Court noted that the content of the provision “Ministers shall head their respective ministry” is composed of the following elements: under the procedure established by means of laws or other legal acts, a minister has the right to choose the staff members of the ministry and to recruit and dismiss them; a minister has the right to organise the work of the staff of the ministry in order that the functions established for the ministry by means of laws and other legal acts would be performed; a minister has the right to give instructions to all the staff of the ministry, who must carry them out; a minister has the right to apply disciplinary measures to the staff of the ministry if they fail to fulfil their duties or the instructions of the minister, or fail to fulfil them properly; a minister has the right to give incentives to all the staff of the ministry.

... the competence of a minister to head the respective ministry, which is consolidated in Paragraph 1 of Article 98 of the Constitution, includes, inter alia, certain internal administration powers with respect to the ministry and the establishments assigned to the area entrusted to the ministry (establishments under the ministry), including the right, under the procedure established by means of laws and other legal acts, to choose the staff of the ministry and the heads of the establishments assigned to the area entrusted to the ministry, to recruit and dismiss them, as well as the right to apply disciplinary measures to them or give them incentives.

... it should be mentioned that, under the Constitution, it is not allowed to establish such a legal regulation that would in general prevent a minister from exercising the powers arising from the provision “Ministers shall head their respective ministry” of Paragraph 1 of Article 98 of the Constitution, inter alia, the powers related to the internal administration of the ministry and the establishments assigned to the area entrusted to the ministry; in addition, such a legal regulation may not limit the possibilities of a minister, who exercises the constitutional powers conferred on him/her, to effectively control how the ministry that he/she is heading and for which he/she is responsible performs the functions assigned to this ministry, as well as how it carries out other activities (inter alia, internal administration) that are related to the functions assigned to this ministry.

In this context, it should be mentioned that Paragraph 1 of Article 98 of the Constitution does not specify the procedure under which a minister implements the competence provided for in the Constitution; this procedure is established in laws, government resolutions, or other legal acts (ruling of 23 November 1999).

The responsibility of ministers for their respective activities in the exercise of their powers to head the respective ministry (Paragraphs 2 and 3 of Article 5, Paragraph 2 of Article 30, Paragraph 2 of Article 96, Paragraph 1 of Article 98, Article 100, and Paragraph 2 of Article 128 of the Constitution)

... when interpreting Paragraph 2 of Article 5 of the Constitution, which prescribes that the scope of power is limited by the Constitution, in conjunction with Paragraph 3 of the same article, which stipulates that state institutions serve the people, the Constitutional Court has noted that the Constitution is supreme law limiting state power and it consolidates the principle of responsible governance (inter alia, the rulings of 1 July 2004, 19 November 2015, and 2 March 2018); this principle implies that all state institutions and officials are obliged to follow the Constitution and law while performing their functions and must properly implement the powers granted to them by the Constitution and laws by acting in the interests of the Nation and the State of Lithuania (inter alia, the conclusion of 26 October 2012 and the rulings of 11 July 2014 and 22 December 2016).

In its ruling of 22 January 2008, revealing the content of one of the principles of the activity of public authority institutions and officials – the principle of transparency, arising from the Constitution, inter alia, Paragraphs 2 and 3 of Article 5 thereof, the Constitutional Court emphasised that it implies, among other things, accountability to the respective community and the responsibility of decision-making officials for their decisions; transparency is a necessary precondition, inter alia, for preventing the abuse of power; therefore, it is a necessary precondition for people to have trust in public authority institutions and the state in general; transparency as a principle of the activity of public authority institutions and officials implies, among other things, that adopted decisions must be well-grounded and clear so that, if the need arises, it would be possible to provide rational reasons for them; other persons must have the possibility of disputing these decisions in accordance with the established procedure.

... it should be noted that, under the Constitution, inter alia, Paragraphs 2 and 3 of Article 5 thereof, as well as under the constitutional principle of responsible governance, ministers, when exercising the internal administration powers conferred on them by the Constitution and laws with respect to the ministry and the establishments assigned to the area entrusted to the ministry, must properly implement these powers conferred on them by the Constitution and laws, inter alia, they must adopt lawful and justified decisions when implementing these powers.

The responsibility of the authorities to society is inseparable from the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law; this responsibility is constitutionally consolidated by having stipulated that state institutions serve the people and that the scope of power is limited by the Constitution (inter alia, the conclusion of 31 March 2004 and the rulings of 13 May 2015 and 19 November 2015).

Paragraph 2 of Article 96 of the Constitution provides that ministers, in directing the areas of governance assigned to them, are responsible to the Seimas and the President of the Republic, and are directly subordinate to the Prime Minister. Under Paragraph 1 of Article 101 of the Constitution, ministers must give an account of their activities to the Seimas.

In its ruling of 24 December 2002, the Constitutional Court held that, under the Constitution, the Seimas exercises parliamentary control over the Government; the separation of powers in the Constitution also implies the accountability of the Government, a collegial executive authority institution, to the legislative power – the representation of the Nation.

It should be noted in this context that the Constitution provides for the immunity of the Prime Minister and ministers in order that the Government could perform without hindrance the duties assigned to it under the Constitution and laws. Article 100 of the Constitution provides that the Prime Minister and ministers may not be held criminally liable or be detained, or have their liberty restricted otherwise, without the prior consent of the Seimas or, in the period between the sessions of the Seimas, without the prior consent of the President of the Republic (ruling of 30 May 2003).

... it should be noted that the Constitution consolidates the political responsibility of ministers to the Seimas, the President of the Republic, and the Prime Minister for directing the areas of governance assigned to them, and that Article 100 of the Constitution provides for the immunity of ministers in cases where criminal responsibility or the restriction of liberty is applied.

It should be noted that the Constitution does not contain other provisions that would establish the exclusive status of ministers compared to other subjects to whom legal responsibility is applied on the basis of the general grounds provided for by law. Consequently, in view of the overall legal regulation consolidated in the Constitution, there are no grounds for stating that, under the Constitution, other rules of legal responsibility are applicable to ministers (except for the immunity, provided for in Article 100 of the Constitution, in cases where criminal responsibility or the restriction of liberty is applied) if compared to other persons.

A different interpretation of the provisions of the Constitution, inter alia, of those of Paragraph 2 of Article 96 and Article 100 thereof, that, purportedly, under the Constitution, also other immunity from legal responsibility (except for the immunity provided for in Article 100 of the Constitution) is applicable to ministers would be inconsistent with the constitutionally consolidated responsibility of the authorities to society, with the provisions of Paragraphs 2 and 3 of Article 5 of the Constitution, as well as with the constitutional principles of responsible governance and a state under the rule of law, and would imply a privilege, which is prohibited under Paragraph 2 of Article 29 of the Constitution.

In its ruling of 23 November 1999, interpreting, among other things, the provision “Ministers shall head their respective ministry” of Paragraph 1 of Article 98 of the Constitution, the Constitutional Court held the following:

- the competence of a minister to head the respective ministry, as established in Paragraph 1 of Article 98 of the Constitution, implies the personal responsibility of the minister for the activities of the ministry;

- a minister, who is empowered to head the respective ministry under Paragraph 1 of Article 98 of the Constitution, is also responsible for the activity of all the ministry headed by him/her and for the execution of laws, government resolutions, and other legal acts; thus, a minister is also responsible for the economic and financial activity of the respective ministry regardless of the nature of this activity.

... in the activity of a ministry, which carries out the functions of state governance in the area assigned to it and implements state policy in this area, there are, inter alia, activities related to the performance of internal administration functions. ... under the Constitution, a minister, among other things, has the powers, under the procedure established by means of laws and other legal acts, to choose the heads of the establishments assigned to the area entrusted to his/her ministry and to recruit and dismiss them.

... it should be noted that the personal responsibility of a minister, implied by the provision “Ministers shall head their respective ministry” of Paragraph 1 of Article 98 of the Constitution, means the personal responsibility of a minister for all his/her activities, inter alia, for the proper exercise of the internal administration powers conferred on him/her with respect to the ministry and the establishments assigned to the area entrusted to the ministry (for instance, the powers to dismiss the staff members of the ministry, as well as the heads of the establishments assigned to the area entrusted to the ministry).

... under the Constitution, inter alia, Paragraph 3 of Article 5 and Paragraph 2 of Article 30 thereof, as well as under the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law, a person who has suffered material and/or moral damage as a result of the unlawful actions committed by state authority institutions or officials must be compensated for this damage, while taking into account the reasonable and justified criteria established by law in order to determine the amount of the damage. ... this duty of the state is to be interpreted as including the obligation to compensate a person for the material and/or moral damage suffered by him/her as a result of the unlawful actions committed by a minister in the exercise of the internal administration powers with respect to the ministry and the establishments assigned to the area entrusted to the ministry.

... under the Constitution, inter alia, the constitutional principles of responsible governance and a state under the rule of law, if state officials, inter alia, ministers, when improperly exercising the powers conferred on them by the Constitution and laws, by their unlawful actions (or inaction), inflict material and/or moral damage on persons, such their actions cannot be equated with the actions (or inaction) of the state itself (or institutions thereof), and state officials, inter alia, ministers, who have inflicted damage must be liable in the prescribed manner for their actions by which they have caused the damage.

... under the Constitution, inter alia, Paragraph 3 of Article 5, Paragraph 2 of Article 30, and Paragraph 2 of Article 128 thereof, as well as under the constitutional principles of responsible governance and a state under the rule of law, in order to ensure the proper respect for the interests of all society, it is necessary to create the preconditions for the state, after it has fulfilled (through its institutions) its constitutional duty to compensate a person for the material and/or moral damage inflicted by the unlawful actions (or inaction) of state institutions and officials, inter alia, ministers, for obtaining reimbursement for the losses (in whole or in part), suffered due to this by the state, from the state officials, inter alia, ministers, who have improperly exercised the powers conferred on them by the Constitution and laws. This is the only way to ensure that the property owned by the state will serve the common welfare of the Nation. Meanwhile, without creating such preconditions, it would not be ensured, inter alia, that the state officials, inter alia, ministers, who have caused damage would be held liable for their actions according to the established procedure and, thus, that people would have trust in public authority institutions and the state in general; this would be incompatible with the Constitution, inter alia, the constitutional principles of responsible governance and the rule of law.

As mentioned before, under the Constitution, if a person has suffered material and/or moral damage as a result of the unlawful actions committed by state institutions or officials, this damage must be compensated for, taking into account the reasonable and justified criteria established by law, in order to determine the amount of this damage. ... the above-mentioned provisions of the official constitutional doctrine are also mutatis mutandis applicable to regulating, by means of a law, the duty of the state to compensate for damage caused as a result of the unlawful actions committed by a minister in the exercise of internal administration powers with respect to the ministry and the establishments assigned to the area entrusted to the ministry, as well as to regulating, by means of a law, the procedure for implementing the right of the state to recourse against the person – the minister – who has caused the damage.

8.1. THE CONSTITUTIONAL COURT AS THE INSTITUTION OF CONSTITUTIONAL JUSTICE

The constitutional status of the Constitutional Court (as the institution of constitutional justice)The Constitutional Court's ruling of 6 June 2006

The courts that, under the Constitution, implement judicial power in Lithuania must be categorised as belonging not to one, but to two or more (if this, taking account of the Constitution, is established in the respective laws) systems of courts. Under the Constitution and laws, there are three systems of courts in Lithuania at present: (1) the Constitutional Court carries out constitutional judicial control; (2) the Supreme Court of Lithuania, the Court of Appeal of Lithuania, regional courts, and district courts, which are specified in Paragraph 1 of Article 111 of the Constitution, constitute the system of courts of general jurisdiction; (3) under Paragraph 2 of Article 111 of the Constitution, for the consideration of administrative, labour, family, and cases of other categories, specialised courts may be established according to the law; one system of specialised courts, i.e. administrative ones, which is composed of the Supreme Administrative Court of Lithuania and regional administrative courts, is established and is functioning at present (rulings of 13 December 2004, 16 January 2006, 28 March 2006, and 9 May 2006).

The Constitution defines the procedure for the formation of the Constitutional Court, establishes the grounds and guarantees of the implementation (activity) of the powers of the Constitutional Court, consolidates the status of the justices of the Constitutional Court, etc.

Thus, under the Constitution, the Constitutional Court is the institution of constitutional justice, which carries out constitutional judicial control (rulings of 28 March 2006 and 9 May 2006). The Constitutional Court has held in its acts on more than one occasion that, when deciding, under its competence, on the compliance of lower-ranking legal acts (parts thereof) with higher-ranking legal acts, inter alia (and, first of all), with the Constitution, as well as when exercising its other constitutional powers, the Constitutional Court – an autonomous and independent court – administers constitutional justice, as well as guarantees constitutional lawfulness and the supremacy of the Constitution in the legal system (rulings of 12 July 2001, 29 November 2001, 13 December 2004, and 28 March 2006).

It needs to be noted that the title – the Constitutional Court – of the constitutional justice institution, which is assigned the exercise of constitutional judicial control, is expressis verbis consolidated in the Constitution itself.

It should be emphasised that, by its constitutional nature, a state power institution that is named a court in the Constitution itself must be regarded as a court, i.e. as a judicial institution.

The mere fact that there are separate Chapters “Courts” and “The Constitutional Court” in the Constitution is not and may not be the grounds for interpreting that, purportedly ... the Constitutional Court is not a court – part of the judiciary – and exists somewhere outside the boundaries of the judicial system. Such a presumption ... is essentially wrong and completely constitutionally unfounded. On the contrary, the fact that, in the Constitution, there are two separate chapters – Chapter VIII “The Constitutional Court” and Chapter IX “Courts” – does not deny the fact that the Constitutional Court, which, under the Constitution, carries out constitutional judicial control, is part of the judicial system, but it rather emphasises its particular status in the system of the judiciary, as well as in the system of all state institutions exercising state power; in this way, the particularities of the constitutional mission and competence of the Constitutional Court are emphasised.

At the same time, it needs to be noted that there are significant links between courts of general jurisdiction and specialised courts (established under Paragraph 2 of Article 111 of the Constitution) on the one hand, and, on the other hand, the Constitutional Court, the institution of constitutional justice, inter alia: every court of general jurisdiction (its judge) and every specialised court (its judge), as a petitioner, has the right to initiate constitutional justice cases at the Constitutional Court on the grounds established in the Constitution (Paragraphs 1, 2, and 3 of Article 106 and Paragraph 2 of Article 110); all courts of general jurisdiction – the Supreme Court of Lithuania, the Court of Appeal of Lithuania, regional courts, and district courts – as well as specialised courts (Supreme Administrative Court of Lithuania and regional administrative courts), are bound by the fact that, under Article 107 of the Constitution, the decisions on the issues assigned to the competence of the Constitutional Court are final and not subject to appeal; all courts of general jurisdiction and specialised courts are bound by the official constitutional doctrine, which is formed in the jurisprudence of the Constitutional Court, etc. However, as regards the organisational and administrative aspects, the said systems of courts – the Constitutional Court, which carries out constitutional judicial control, and courts of general jurisdiction and specialised courts (established under Paragraph 2 of Article 111 of the Constitution) – are separated in the Constitution.

It should be emphasised that the presumption ... that the Constitutional Court is not a court and does not implement state power is not at all in line with the concept of power and the powers of the Constitutional Court established in the Constitution. The fact that, under the Constitution, the Constitutional Court has the powers to declare legal acts of other institutions that implement state power – the Seimas, the President of the Republic, the Government – to be in conflict with higher-ranking legal acts, first of all, with the Constitution, and, thus, to annul the legal force of such unconstitutional legal acts and to remove them from the Lithuanian legal system for good, as well as the fact that only the Constitutional Court has the constitutional powers to interpret the Constitution officially – to present the concept of the provisions of the Constitution and such a concept is binding on all law-making and law-applying institutions, including the Seimas, the representation of the Nation, clearly shows that the Constitutional Court is an institution implementing state power.

The status of the Constitutional Court and the procedure for the execution of its powers must be established by the Law on the Constitutional Court (Paragraph 2 of Article 102 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 25 October 2011

... when interpreting Paragraph 2 of Article 102 of the Constitution, which prescribes that the status of the Constitutional Court and the procedure for the execution of its powers are established by the Law on the Constitutional Court, the Constitutional Court held in its ruling of 28 March 2006 that, under the Constitution, the legislature has the duty to regulate, by means of a law, all relationships in connection with the status, formation, execution of powers (activity), and guarantees of the Constitutional Court, the status of the justices of the Constitutional Court, as well as the execution of decisions adopted by the Constitutional Court; the title of this law – the Law on the Constitutional Court – is expressis verbis consolidated in the Constitution. The Constitutional Court also noted that, in itself, such a constitutional legal regulation does not mean that certain relationships connected with the aforementioned relationships may not in general be regulated also by means of other laws.

8.2. THE CONSTITUTIONAL STATUS OF THE JUSTICES OF THE CONSTITUTIONAL COURT

Appointing the justices of the Constitutional Court and the beginning of their term of office (Article 103 and Paragraph 2 of Article 104 of the Constitution); the limitations established on the work and political activities of the justices of the Constitutional Court (Paragraph 3 of Article 104 and Article 113 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 2 June 2005

The procedure for the appointment of the justices of the Constitutional Court is expressis verbis established in the Constitution.

Paragraph 3 of Article 103 of the Constitution provides that the citizens of the Republic of Lithuania with an impeccable reputation, higher education in law, and not less than a 10-year length of service in the field of law or in a branch of science and education as a lawyer may be appointed as justices of the Constitutional Court. Under Paragraph 1 of the same article, the President of the Republic, the Speaker of the Seimas, and the President of the Supreme Court present candidates for justices of the Constitutional Court; the Seimas appoints the justices of the Constitutional Court; every three years, one-third of the Constitutional Court is reconstituted.

It needs to be emphasised that, under the Constitution, when the justices of the Constitutional Court are appointed, only the following subjects, expressis verbis specified in the Constitution, have the respective powers: (1) the state official (President of the Republic, the Speaker of the Seimas, and the President of the Supreme Court) who proposes a candidate for the post of a justice of the Constitutional Court to the Seimas; (2) the Seimas, which adopts a decision concerning the appointment of a proposed candidate for the post of a justice of the Constitutional Court.

Under the Constitution, no institution and no official has the powers to deny or limit the constitutional right of the President of the Supreme Court (as well as that of other state officials – the President of the Republic and the Speaker of the Seimas (specified in Paragraph 1 of Article 103 of the Constitution) – who submit candidates for justices of the Constitutional Court) to submit to the Seimas a candidate for justices of the Constitutional Court, or the right of the Seimas to appoint a submitted candidate as a justice of the Constitutional Court or not to appoint him/her. If such powers were established by means of a law or another legal act, the preconditions would be created for impeding the reconstitution of the Constitutional Court – an institution of state power consolidated in the Constitution – under the procedure established in the Constitution.

Paragraph 3 of Article 104 of the Constitution provides that the limitations established on work and political activities for the judges of courts also apply to the justices of the Constitutional Court. Under Article 113 of the Constitution, judges may not hold any other elective or appointive office, or work in any business, commercial, or other private establishments or enterprises (Paragraph 1); nor may they receive any remuneration other than the remuneration established for judges and payment for educational or creative activities (Paragraph 1); judges may not participate in the activities of political parties or other political organisations (Paragraph 2).

The said limitations are applied to a justice of the Constitutional Court from the day when he/she takes up office. Under Paragraph 2 of Article 104 of the Constitution, before entering office, the justices of the Constitutional Court take an oath at the Seimas to be faithful to the Republic of Lithuania and the Constitution.

The Constitution establishes such a legal regulation under which an appointed justice of the Constitutional Court must remove incompatibilities with the office of a justice of the Constitutional Court (Paragraph 3 of Article 104 and Article 113 of the Constitution) until he/she takes an oath at the Seimas. If the removal of the said incompatibilities depends upon decisions of certain institutions (officials), these institutions (officials) have the duty to adopt the respective decisions until the appointed justice of the Constitutional Court takes an oath at the Seimas. Otherwise, the appointed justice of the Constitutional Court would be impeded from taking the office of a justice of the Constitutional Court; thus, the reconstitution of the Constitutional Court – an institution of state power consolidated in the Constitution, which must be carried out in accordance with the procedure established in the Constitution, would be impeded.

It needs to be stressed that the Constitution does not contain any provisions requiring that a person nominated for the post of a justice of the Constitutional Court should, prior to voting on his/her nomination for the said post at the Seimas, refuse his/her occupation or the office that he/she is holding, or remove other incompatibilities with the office of a justice of the Constitutional Court that are specified in the Constitution.

It also needs to be emphasised that an appointed justice of the Constitutional Court, as long as he/she has not taken an oath at the Seimas in accordance with the established procedure, does not hold the office of a justice of the Constitutional Court. At that time, the office of a justice of the Constitutional Court is held by the justice of the Constitutional Court whose term of office is expiring.

Thus, if a person appointed as a justice of the Constitutional Court holds the office of a judge of a certain court of the Republic of Lithuania at the time of his/her appointment, he/she must be released from his/her duties before his/her oath at the Seimas. If a person who is appointed as a justice of the Constitutional Court holds the office of a justice of the Supreme Court at the time of his/her appointment, the President of the Republic has the constitutional duty to make the submission that the Seimas release this appointed justice of the Constitutional Court from the office of a justice of the Supreme Court before he/she takes the oath of a justice of the Constitutional Court at the Seimas, while the Seimas has the constitutional duty to release the said person from his/her duties before his/her oath at the Seimas. Otherwise, the appointed justice of the Constitutional Court would be impeded from taking the office of a justice of the Constitutional Court; thus, the reconstitution of the Constitutional Court – an institution of state power consolidated in the Constitution, which must be carried out in accordance with the procedure established in the Constitution, would be impeded.

The cessation of the powers of a justice of the Constitutional Court (Article 108 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's decision of 15 May 2009

Under Article 108 of the Constitution, the powers of a justice of the Constitutional Court cease: upon the expiry of the term of powers (Item 1); upon his/her death (Item 2); upon his/her resignation (Item 3); when he/she is incapable of holding office due to the state of his/her health (Item 4); when the Seimas removes him/her from office in accordance with the procedure for impeachment proceedings (Item 5).

Under Articles 74 and 116 of the Constitution, the President and justices of the Supreme Court, the President and judges of the Court of Appeal, and, under Article 74 of the Constitution, also the President and justices of the Constitutional Court, who grossly violate the Constitution or breach their oath, or are found to have committed a crime, may be removed from office by the Seimas according to impeachment proceedings.

Under the Constitution, one of the grounds for the release of judges from their duties (cessation of the powers of judges) is the expiry of the term of the powers of a judge.

It needs to be noted that the Constitution defines the consequences of the juridical fact of the expiry of the term of the powers of a judge or a justice of the Constitutional Court by means of different phrases: “judges are released from their duties according to the procedure established by law” (Article 115), “the powers of a justice of the Constitutional Court shall cease” (Article 108).

When interpreting the phrase “judges are released from their duties according to the procedure established by law” of the Constitution, it needs to be noted that this phrase means that, after the juridical fact – the expiry of the term of the powers of a judge – takes place, the institution that is provided for in the Constitution, i.e. the President of the Republic, or both the President of the Republic and the Seimas, has the duty to verify that such a juridical fact has taken place and, upon stating the existence of this fact, to adopt, in accordance with the procedure established by law, the respective decision (i.e. an individual act of the application of law) whereby the judge or President of a court whose term of the powers has expired would be released from the office of the judge or President of that court.

When interpreting the phrase “the powers of a justice of the Constitutional Court shall cease” of the Constitution, it needs to be noted that, after the juridical fact – the expiry of the term of the powers of a justice of the Constitutional Court – takes place, no institution has the duty to state the existence of such a juridical fact and adopt the respective decision (i.e. an individual act of the application of law) whereby a justice of the Constitutional Court would be released from his/her duties.

It needs to be noted that the Constitution consolidates the final list of grounds for releasing judges from their duties (i.e. the cessation of powers) and that this list must not be expanded by means of laws or other legal acts (ruling of 22 October 2007).

The length of the term of office of the justices of the Constitutional Court (Paragraph 1 of Article 103 of the Constitution)

... the justices of the Constitutional Court also differ from other judges of courts of general and specialised competence from the aspect of the term of their office. Under Paragraph 1 of Article 103 of the Constitution, the justices of the Constitutional Court are appointed for a single nine-year term of office. Under the Constitution, the Law on Courts establishes the terms of office of judges of both courts of general competence and specialised courts. ... while regulating the relationships of the social (material) guarantees of judges after the powers of judges cease, inter alia, when differentiating these guarantees, account must be taken of the fact that the classification of courts as belonging not to one, but, rather, to several (at present – three) systems of courts stems from the Constitution; a separate system of courts is comprised of the Constitutional Court, characterised by its own particularities, inter alia, from the aspect of the term of office of the justices of the Constitutional Court.

... the legislature, while regulating the relationships of the social (material) guarantees of judges upon the expiry of their term of powers, must also take account of the fact that the justices of the Constitutional Court differ from judges of other courts as regards their constitutional status, inter alia, the term of powers. Otherwise, the constitutional concept of these social (material) guarantees, under which the social (material) guarantees of judges must be differentiated by taking account, inter alia, of the specificity of the system of courts and the particularities of the status of judges of the systems of courts, would be deviated from.

The immunity of justices of the Constitutional Court (Paragraph 4 of Article 104 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 9 March 2020

The immunity of the justices of the Constitutional Court is consolidated in Paragraph 4 of Article 104, which is in Chapter VIII “The Constitutional Court” of the Constitution; under the said article, the justices of the Constitutional Court have the same rights concerning the inviolability of their person as the members of the Seimas. In this context, it should be noted that, according to Paragraph 1 of Article 104 of the Constitution, while in office, the justices of the Constitutional Court are independent of any other state institution, person, or organisation and follow only the Constitution of the Republic of Lithuania. Thus, the immunity of the justices of the Constitutional Court, as consolidated in Paragraph 4 of Article 104 of the Constitution, is the guarantee of their independence while they are in office.

In this context, it should be noted that Paragraph 1 of Article 62 of the Constitution provides that the person of a member of the Seimas is inviolable. The Constitutional Court has held that Paragraph 1 of Article 62 of the Constitution is related to Paragraph 2 of this article, under which the members of the Seimas may not be held criminally responsible or be detained, or have their liberty restricted otherwise, without the consent of the Seimas (ruling of 8 May 2000). The Constitutional Court has also held that, although the Constitution provides for the additional guarantees of the inviolability of a member of the Seimas compared with the guarantees of the inviolability of an individual, the scope of the immunity of a member of the Seimas is, nevertheless, narrower than that of the President of the Republic, i.e. the right of a member of the Seimas to liberty and the inviolability of his/her person during his/her term of office may be limited; as mentioned before, under Paragraph 2 of Article 62 of the Constitution, this can only be done with the consent of the Seimas (ruling of 8 May 2000).

The Constitutional Court has also held that Paragraph 2 of Article 62 of the Constitution consolidates the additional guarantees of the inviolability of the person of a member of the Seimas, which are necessary for the proper performance of his/her duties (inter alia, the rulings of 8 May 2000, 25 January 2001, and 27 April 2016).

In view of this, it should be noted that, under Paragraph 4 of Article 104 of the Constitution, a justice of the Constitutional Court may not be held criminally responsible or be detained, or have his/her liberty restricted otherwise, without the consent of the Seimas.

It should also be noted that, under Paragraph 4 of Article 104 of the Constitution as interpreted in conjunction with Paragraph 1 of Article 104 of the Constitution, the immunity of the justices of the Constitutional Court, in the same way as the immunity of judges as consolidated in Paragraph 2 of Article 114 of the Constitution, is functional in nature: its purpose is to guarantee the independence of the justices of the Constitutional Court, so that the administration of constitutional justice is ensured and the supremacy of the Constitution in the legal system, as well as constitutional lawfulness, is guaranteed. Thus, there are no constitutional grounds for the scope of the immunity of the justices of the Constitutional Court, which is consolidated in Paragraph 4 of Article 104 of the Constitution, to be interpreted differently from the scope of the immunity of judges, which is consolidated in Paragraph 2 of Article 114 of the Constitution. However, differently from Paragraph 2 of Article 114 of the Constitution, Paragraph 4 of Article 104 of the Constitution does not provide for the possibility of holding a justice of the Constitutional Court criminally responsible or detaining him/her, or restricting his/her liberty otherwise, with the consent of the President of the Republic in the period between the sessions of the Seimas. It should also be noted that the requirement, under Paragraph 4 of Article 104 of the Constitution, to receive the consent of the Seimas in order that the justices of the Constitutional Court could be held criminally responsible or be detained, or have their liberty restricted otherwise, is consolidated for the purpose of enabling the maximum protection of the justices of the Constitutional Court against unfoundedly being held criminally responsible, being detained, or having their liberty restricted otherwise in cases where it would thereby be sought to influence the decisions of the justices.

8.3. THE POWERS OF THE CONSTITUTIONAL COURT

8.3.1. The powers of the Constitutional Court to exercise control over the constitutionality of legal acts

The powers of the Constitutional Court to investigate the compliance of legal acts with higher-ranking legal acts (Article 105 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 5 April 2000

... under Article 105 of the Constitution, if a petition substantiated with legal reasoning is filed by the subjects pointed out in Article 106 of the Constitution, the Constitutional Court may and must consider and adopt decisions on the conformity of any law or legal act adopted by the Seimas with the Constitution, as well as decisions on the conformity of any act adopted by the President of the Republic or by the Government with the Constitution and laws, irrespective of the fact whether such a legal act is (would be) marked "top secret", "secret", "confidential", or marked in any other way.

The powers of the Constitutional Court to declare the unconstitutionality of a law that is not impugned by a petitioner but on which an impugned substatutory act is based (Article 105 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 29 November 2001

Under Article 105 of the Constitution, the Constitutional Court considers and adopts decisions on whether legal acts are in conflict with the Constitution. Thus, the Constitutional Court implements constitutional justice. The implementation of constitutional justice implies that a legal act (part thereof) that is in conflict with the Constitution must be removed from the legal system. Therefore, after it has established that a law the compliance of which with the Constitution is not challenged by a petitioner, but upon which an impugned substatutory act is based, is in conflict with the Constitution, the Constitutional Court must state that such a law is unconstitutional. Such an obligation of the Constitutional Court stems from the Constitution; in this way, the supremacy of the Constitution is ensured.

The powers of the Constitutional Court to declare the unconstitutionality of such provisions of a law not impugned by a petitioner that regulate part of the relationships covered by an impugned law

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 14 January 2002

Having found that the provisions of a law whose compliance with the Constitution is not impugned by a petitioner, but which regulate part of the social relationships covered by an impugned law, are in conflict with the Constitution, the Constitutional Court must state that such provisions are unconstitutional.

The Constitutional Court investigates the compliance of impugned legal acts with the Constitution as an integral and harmonious system

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 30 May 2003

In cases where, following a received petition, the Constitutional Court investigates whether the impugned legal act (part thereof) is in conflict with the articles (parts thereof) of the Constitution indicated in the petition, it at the same time investigates whether the impugned legal act (part thereof) is in conflict with the Constitution – an integral and harmonious system (ruling of 24 December 2002).

In its ruling of 13 June 2000, the Constitutional Court held that ... the Constitutional Court, having found that an impugned legal act (part thereof) is in conflict with the articles (parts thereof) of the Constitution not indicated by the petitioner, has the powers to state this fact.

The recognition that legal acts are in conflict with the Constitution in terms of their form

... such failure to adhere to the form of a legal act where the Constitution requires that certain relationships be regulated by means of a law, but they are still regulated by means of a substatutory act (irrespective of whether such relationships are, from any aspect, additionally regulated in a law and the legal regulation laid down in a substatutory act competes with the legal regulation established in that law, or irrespective of the fact that no law regulates such relationships at all), may provide the sufficient grounds for declaring such a substatutory legal act unconstitutional. Under the Constitution, it is the Constitutional Court that decides whether the substatutory legal acts of the Seimas, the President of the Republic, or the Government, in terms of their form, are in conflict with the Constitution. When making such a decision, the Constitutional Court assesses in every case all circumstances of the case, inter alia, the place of the reviewed legal regulation in the entire legal system, its objective, as well as the intentions of the respective law-making subject, the development of the legal regulation of the respective relationships and its changes before the legal act at issue was passed (legislative history), etc.

It should also be stressed that, in cases where substatutory legal acts are ruled to be in conflict with the Constitution in terms of their form (due to the fact that they regulate such relationships that may be regulated only by means of a law) and may no longer be applied, it is necessary to pay regard to the requirement, arising from the Constitution, to assess whether other values protected by the Constitution would be violated, or whether the balance among the values consolidated, protected, and defended by the Constitution would be disturbed in the case of failure to protect and defend those rights of persons that were acquired during the period of the validity of the said substatutory legal acts. In these special cases, the legislature, having assessed all circumstances and having found that this is necessary, is under the constitutional obligation to establish such a legal regulation that would provide for the possibility of protecting and defending, fully or partially, the rights of persons who had obeyed law, followed the requirements of laws, and trusted in the state and its law in cases where their acquired rights had arisen from the legal acts that were subsequently ruled to be in conflict with the Constitution in terms of their form (due to the fact that they regulated such relationships that could be regulated only by means of a law); such a legal regulation established by the legislature must ensure that the principle of justice, enshrined in the Constitution, would not be derogated from.

The powers of the Constitutional Court to investigate the compliance of all laws and other acts adopted by the Seimas, the President of the Republic, or the Government with all higher-ranking legal acts (Paragraph 1 of Article 102 of the Constitution)

... Paragraph 1 of Article 102 of the Constitution may not be interpreted (by applying only the linguistic method, literally) as meaning that it provides a comprehensive and final list of legal acts whose investigation in terms of their compliance with higher-ranking legal acts, inter alia (and, first of all), with the Constitution, as well as the adoption of the respective decisions, is assigned, under the Constitution, to the jurisdiction of the Constitutional Court. Paragraph 1 of Article 102 of the Constitution should be interpreted by taking account of the whole context of the constitutional legal regulation: inter alia, by paying regard to the principle of the separation of powers; the mission and place of the Constitutional Court in the system of state institutions that exercise judicial power (and those that exercise state power in general) and are consolidated in the Constitution; the constitutionally consolidated institution of constitutional laws (which, under Constitution, have higher legal force than ordinary laws); the provisions of the Constitution under which laws (provisions thereof) or other legal acts may also be adopted by referendum (Paragraph 1 of Article 9, Paragraph 4 of Article 69, and Paragraphs 3 and 4 of Article 71 of the Constitution); the constitutional duty of the President of the Republic to perform everything with which he/she is charged by the Constitution and laws (Paragraph 2 of Article 77 of the Constitution); the constitutional duty of the Government to execute laws, the resolutions of the Seimas on the implementation of laws, as well as the decrees of the President of the Republic (Item 2 of Article 94 of the Constitution); the principle of the supremacy of the Constitution and a state under the rule of law, which, in addition to most other things, imply the hierarchy of all legal acts and the prohibition that arises from the said hierarchy on establishing in lower-ranking legal acts any such a legal regulation that would compete with a legal regulation established in higher-ranking legal acts (first of all, in the Constitution itself) or on applying any legal acts that are in conflict with higher-ranking legal acts; as well as by paying regard to the possibility of removing from the legal system such legal acts (parts thereof) that do not meet the said requirements, thus, by taking into consideration both the mission of constitutional judicial control as a constitutional institution and the contextual meaning of the constitutional provisions that consolidate it. In this way interpreting Paragraph 1 of Article 102 of the Constitution in the context of the overall constitutional legal regulation, it should be held that, under the Constitution, the Constitutional Court has the exclusive competence to investigate and decide on whether any act adopted by the Seimas, the President of the Republic, or the Government, as well as any act (part thereof) adopted by referendum, is in conflict with any higher-ranking act, inter alia (and, first of all), with the Constitution, namely: whether any constitutional law (part thereof) is in conflict with the Constitution; whether any law (part thereof) or the Statute of the Seimas (part thereof) is in conflict with the Constitution and constitutional laws; whether any substatutory legal act (part thereof) adopted by the Seimas is in conflict with the Constitution, constitutional laws, laws, and the Statute of the Seimas; whether any act (part thereof) adopted by the President of the Republic is in conflict with the Constitution, constitutional laws, and laws; and whether any act (part thereof) adopted by the Government is in conflict with the Constitution, constitutional laws, and laws.

... a different, literal interpretation of Paragraph 1 of Article 102 of the Constitution would mean that, purportedly, the Constitution tolerates its own disregard when certain legal acts (for example, constitutional laws or the Statute of the Seimas) are adopted, that, purportedly, under the Constitution, it is possible to disregard constitutional laws when laws are passed and to disregard laws and constitutional laws when certain substatutory legal acts (for example, those of the Seimas) are passed, and that, purportedly, under the Constitution, it is possible to disregard the Constitution when laws (provisions thereof) or other legal acts are adopted by referendum. Thus, lower-ranking legal acts (parts thereof) that have one-off (ad hoc) application and are passed by the Seimas, the President of the Republic, or the Government would, in general, avoid the verification of their compliance with higher-ranking legal acts, inter alia (and, first of all), with the Constitution. A literal (let alone narrowing) interpretation of Paragraph 1 of Article 102 of the Constitution would be completely unreasonable, since it would deny the principle of the supremacy of the Constitution, the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law, the hierarchy of all legal acts, which stems from the Constitution (and which implies, inter alia, the compliance of substatutory legal acts with laws), the provision of Paragraph 1 of Article 7 of the Constitution that any law or other act that contradicts the Constitution is invalid, the provision of Paragraph 2 of Article 5 of the Constitution that the scope of powers is limited by the Constitution, and the provision of Paragraph 1 of Article 6 of the Constitution that everyone may defend his/her rights by invoking the Constitution. If merely the said literal interpretation of Paragraph 1 of Article 102 of the Constitution were followed, the preconditions would also be created for violating other values (inter alia, the constitutional rights of a person) that are consolidated, defended, and protected by the Constitution. In this context, it should also be noted that, if the Constitution were interpreted only literally by applying the linguistic method, it could not be the supreme law of Lithuania, as it would be virtually identified with its textual form – the letter of the Constitution would be made absolute and the spirit of the Constitution would be ignored.

The Constitutional Court investigates a legal regulation that is consolidated in legal acts both explicitly and implicitly

The Constitutional Court's decision of 8 August 2006

Legal acts (including those whose compliance with higher-ranking legal acts is decided by the Constitutional Court according to the Constitution) are sources of law created by the respective institutions of public power or by referendum; such legal acts consolidate law – legal provisions set out in a certain textual form. Legal acts as sources of law are passed, amended (supplemented), and repealed by means of decisions adopted by the respective institutions or by general vote (referendum). Thus, legal acts (including those whose compliance with higher-ranking legal acts is decided by the Constitutional Court according to the Constitution) are always the results of certain institutional law-making decisions (actions) (in the broadest meaning of the term “institutional”, which also includes legal acts adopted by referendum). If there is no law-making decision (on a legal regulation of certain social relationships), a legal act cannot be passed, amended (supplemented), or repealed. This is what makes legal acts different from such sources of law as, for instance, legal customs, which come into being (are created) not as a result of institutional law-making decisions (actions), but on other grounds.

All legal acts are expressed in a certain textual form and have certain linguistic expression. However, as held by the Constitutional Court, it is impossible to treat law solely as a text in which certain legal provisions and rules of behaviour are set out expressis verbis; it is impossible to treat legal reality solely in its textual form – only as an aggregate of its explicit provisions (ruling of 25 May 2004). Therefore, while investigating the compliance of legal acts (parts thereof) passed by the Seimas, the President of the Republic, or the Government and those adopted by referendum with higher-ranking legal acts, inter alia (and, first of all), with the Constitution, the Constitutional Court investigates a legal regulation that is explicitly, expressis verbis, consolidated in those legal acts (parts thereof), as well as such a legal regulation that is consolidated in those legal acts (parts thereof) implicitly and is derived from explicit legal provisions in the course of interpreting law.

When investigating the compliance of legal acts (parts thereof) passed by the Seimas, the President of the Republic, or the Government and those adopted by referendum with higher-ranking legal acts, inter alia (and, first of all), with the Constitution, the Constitutional Court must establish and, if this is necessary in view of the logic of a constitutional justice case under consideration, state whether a certain legal regulation laid down in the respective lower-ranking legal act (part thereof) is consolidated explicitly or is not consolidated explicitly. It needs to be emphasised that the non-establishment of a certain explicit legal regulation (lack of a legal regulation, the absence of the respective explicit provisions) in a legal act (part thereof) under investigation in a constitutional justice case does not yet mean that the said legal act (part thereof) does not regulate the respective social relationships at all, nor that those social relationships are not regulated by any other legal acts. It also needs to be noted that the non-establishment of a certain explicit legal regulation in a reviewed legal act (part thereof) may be related to various legal situations: in some cases, the non-establishment of a certain explicit legal regulation precisely in a concrete legal act (precisely in a concrete part thereof) is determined by the fact that the respective legal provisions are explicitly or implicitly consolidated in another legal act (or in other parts of the same legal act); in other cases, the absence of explicit legal norms regulating certain social relationships in a concrete legal act (part thereof), provided they are neither explicitly nor implicitly consolidated in other legal acts (or in other parts of the same legal act), should be treated as the establishment of a certain implicit legal regulation that supplements and extends the explicit legal regulation (in some cases, it should be treated as the establishment of a legal regulation that consolidates the behaviour opposite to the established one); thus, in certain cases, it is possible to “discover” in a reviewed legal act (in particular, in part thereof) implicit provisions regulating the respective social relationships and supplementing and extending the explicit legal regulation; still, in some other cases, the said non-establishment of an explicit legal regulation in a concrete legal act (part thereof), provided that the respective legal regulation is neither explicitly nor implicitly established in other legal acts (or in other parts of the same legal act), means that, in that legal act (part thereof), there is a legal gap that may in its turn be treated either as a legislative omission, i.e. a legal gap prohibited by the Constitution (or by some other higher-ranking legal act), or as a legal gap that may not be interpreted as a legislative omission, since the Constitution (or any other higher-ranking legal act) does not require that the respective legal regulation must be introduced, nor does it require that it must be established precisely in that legal act (precisely in that part thereof).

It has been mentioned that the non-establishment of a certain explicit legal regulation precisely in a reviewed legal act (in precisely a reviewed part thereof) may be determined by the fact that the respective legal regulation is explicitly or implicitly consolidated in another legal act (or in other parts of the same legal act). Such a legal act (part thereof) may be ruled to be in conflict with a higher-ranking legal act, inter alia (and, first of all), with the Constitution because of the fact that a certain legal regulation is not consolidated in precisely that legal act (part thereof) only in cases where the said higher-ranking legal act imperatively demands that the respective legal regulation be established in precisely the said reviewed legal act (in precisely the reviewed part thereof). In this context, it needs to be mentioned that the Constitution imperatively demands that certain social relationships be regulated by means of a constitutional law or a law and, sometimes, for example, in Article 93, Paragraph 2 of Article 102, and Paragraph 4 of Article 11 thereof, it even expressis verbis indicates the title of the law.

It was also mentioned that the non-establishment of an explicit legal regulation in a reviewed legal act (part thereof), provided that the respective legal regulation is neither explicitly nor implicitly established in other legal acts (or in other parts of the same legal act), may be treated as the establishment of a certain implicit legal regulation that supplements and extends the explicit legal regulation (in some cases, it may be treated as the establishment of a legal regulation that consolidates the behaviour opposite to the established one): although such an implicit legal regulation is not expressis verbis established, it is possible to derive it consistently from explicit legal norms in the course of interpreting law. For instance, in private law, in which, as is generally known, the principle of general permission is dominant, under which “everything that is not forbidden is allowed”, the non-establishment of a certain explicit prohibition is, as a rule, treated as permission of certain behaviour (which is not explicitly prohibited); meanwhile, in public law, in which, as is generally accepted, the opposite principle of special permission (or general prohibition) is dominant, under which “everything that is not allowed is forbidden”, the absence of a certain explicit permission should, as a rule, be interpreted as a prohibition on certain behaviour (which is not explicitly permitted). If such a legal regulation established implicitly, but not explicitly, in a lower-ranking legal act consolidates certain behaviour that is different from that established in a certain higher-ranking legal act, inter alia (and, first of all), in the Constitution, this may serve as the grounds for the Constitutional Court, by its ruling, to declare (by reasonably stating the existence of the said implicit legal regulation) the said lower-ranking legal act (part thereof) to be in conflict with the said higher-ranking legal act, inter alia (and, first of all), with the Constitution, insofar as the said lower-ranking legal act (part thereof) does not explicitly establish a certain legal regulation, and to remove that implicitly established legal regulation from the legal system. In this context, it should be mentioned that, in the jurisprudence of the Constitutional Court, legal acts (parts thereof) are rather often ruled to be in conflict with the Constitution insofar as those legal acts (parts thereof) do not explicitly establish a certain legal regulation.

The absence of explicit legal provisions regulating certain social relationships in a legal act (part thereof), if the respective legal regulation is neither explicitly nor implicitly established in other legal acts (or in other parts of the same legal act), should be treated as a legal gap – a lacuna legis. Having investigated the compliance of a legal act (part thereof) adopted by the Seimas, the President of the Republic, or the Government or the compliance of a legal act (part thereof) adopted by referendum with higher-ranking legal acts, inter alia (and, first of all), with the Constitution, the Constitutional Court may also hold that there is a legal gap in the respective legal act (part thereof).

The powers of the Constitutional Court to investigate the constitutionality of legal acts, including such legal acts that establish the social (material) guarantees of judges and consolidate the powers of the Constitutional Court, proceedings at the Constitutional Court, as well as the general elements and particularities of the status of the justices of the Constitutional Court (Paragraph 1 of Article 102 of the Constitution)

... as the Constitutional Court held in its ruling of 12 July 2001, the Constitution does not provide that the Constitutional Court is permitted not to consider certain laws and other legal acts; the Constitutional Court must consider the constitutionality of all the legal acts specified in Paragraph 1 of Article 102 of the Constitution; thus, the Constitutional Court must consider the constitutionality of such legal acts whereby the social (material) guarantees of judges of the courts of the Republic of Lithuania, inter alia, the state pensions of judges, are established. Such powers of the Constitutional Court stem from the Constitution and are related to its constitutional duty to ensure the supremacy of the Constitution in the legal system. The Constitutional Court also has such powers in cases where an impugned legal regulation is designed to consolidate the powers of the Constitutional Court itself, proceedings at the Constitutional Court, and the general elements (which are also typical of judges of other courts) and particularities (inter alia, powers, guarantees) of the status of the justices of the Constitutional Court.

The powers of the Constitutional Court to investigate factual circumstances; the powers of the Constitutional Court to investigate the compliance of acts adopted by the President of the Republic with the Constitution and laws

The Constitutional Court, when considering a constitutional justice case according to the Constitution ... has the powers, if required, to investigate factual circumstances that are significant for the decision of the case (decisions of 15 December 2006 and 17 January 2007). It is also stated in the jurisprudence of the Constitutional Court that, “under the Constitution, the Constitutional Court has the powers to investigate the compliance of acts adopted by the President of the Republic with the Constitution and laws irrespective of whether these acts are of an individual or normative character, or whether they are of one-off (ad hoc) application or permanent validity”, also that, “If the Constitution or laws provide for certain requirements that must be followed (that must be fulfilled) in the course of issuing an act of the President of the Republic, the Constitutional Court, when deciding whether an act adopted by the President of the Republic is in conflict with the Constitution and laws, must also investigate whether the said requirements have been followed (fulfilled), since, if such factual circumstances were not established, it would also be impossible to investigate the compliance of the act of the President of the Republic with the Constitution”, as well as that, “under the Constitution, there may not be any such a situation where the Constitutional Court may not investigate any such acts of the President of the Republic that have been issued by him/her while implementing the powers established for the President of the Republic, as the Head of State, in the Constitution and laws” (ruling of 30 December 2003 ...).

The powers of the Constitutional Court to declare the unconstitutionality of such provisions of a law not impugned by a petitioner that regulate part of the relationships covered by an impugned law

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 2 March 2009

One of the essential elements of the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law is the principle whereby a legal act that is in conflict with a higher-ranking legal act must not be applied. The Constitutional Court has held that, while administering justice, courts must invoke only those laws and legal acts that are not in conflict with the Constitution; courts must not apply a law that is in conflict with the Constitution (rulings of 13 December 2004, 16 January 2006, and 27 June 2007). Having found that the provisions of a law whose compliance with the Constitution is not impugned by a petitioner, but which regulate part of the social relationships covered by an impugned law, are in conflict with the Constitution, the Constitutional Court must state that such provisions are unconstitutional (rulings of 29 November 2001, 14 January 2002, 19 June 2002, and 27 June 2007). The implementation of constitutional justice implies that a legal act (part thereof) that conflicts with the Constitution must be removed from the legal system (ruling of 29 November 2001).

The powers of the Constitutional Court to investigate the compliance of legal acts with higher-ranking legal acts (Paragraph 1 of Article 102 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 13 May 2010

Under Paragraph 1 of Article 102 of the Constitution, the Constitutional Court has the exclusive constitutional competence to investigate and decide on whether any act adopted by the Seimas, the President of the Republic, or the Government, or whether any act (part thereof) adopted by referendum is in conflict with any higher-ranking legal act, inter alia (and, first of all), with the Constitution (rulings of 28 March 2006 and 6 June 2006, the decision of 8 August 2006, and the ruling of 24 October 2007). It needs to be noted that the Constitutional Court investigates, precisely, whether legal acts adopted by state institutions (Seimas, the President of the Republic, or the Government) are in conflict with higher-ranking legal acts, inter alia (and, first of all), with the Constitution, but it does not investigate the non-adoption of law-making decisions by the said state institutions, i.e. the avoidance of or delay in adopting such decisions, or failure to act that is determined by other motives (decision of 8 August 2006).

Assessing the constitutionality of such substatutory acts adopted by the Seimas by which the will of the Seimas regarding a future legal regulation is expressed

... the implementation of constitutional justice determines the fact that the Constitutional Court also has the constitutional powers to investigate and decide on the constitutionality of such provisions of substatutory legal acts of the Seimas (inter alia, those of constituent parts of such acts) that express the will of the Seimas on a future legal regulation governing certain social relationships and are the basis for drafting and adopting the respective legal acts. The compliance of the content of such substatutory acts of the Seimas with the provisions of the Constitution and constitutional principles is among the important preconditions for the constitutionality of the legal regulation formed on the basis of such acts.

Thus, the constitutionality of the provisions of substatutory acts (inter alia, constituent parts thereof) of the said nature and purpose adopted by the Seimas where such provisions do not consolidate any legal regulation (legal norms) that has (have) direct influence on legal relationships may be assessed from the aspect of the compliance of their content, on the basis of which law-making processes should take place, with the Constitution.

The powers of the Constitutional Court to investigate factual circumstances

The Constitutional Court's decision of 10 November 2011

... although the Constitutional Court, when considering a constitutional justice case under the Constitution ... has the powers to investigate, if required, factual circumstances that are significant for the decision of the case (ruling of 20 December 2007 and the decisions of 15 December 2006 and 17 January 2007), in a situation where the petitioner is a court (which, when considering cases and seeking to establish the truth, must, under the Constitution and laws, be active and has broad powers and procedural instruments to establish such factual circumstances upon which the doubt over the compliance of an impugned legal act with the Constitution and/or laws is based), the Constitutional Court should investigate those factual circumstances only insofar as this is necessary to verify or specify factual circumstances established by the petitioner.

The Constitutional Court does not investigate the compliance of a substatory legal act with such provisions of a law that are themselves in conflict with the Constitution

The Constitutional Court has held that, while administering justice, a court must follow only such laws and other legal acts that are not in conflict with the Constitution; a court must not apply a law that is in conflict with the Constitution (rulings of 13 December 2004, 16 January 2006, 27 June 2007, 2 March 2009, and 7 September 2010). The Constitutional Court has also held that the presumption that a substatory legal act must be in line with an unconstitutional law would be erroneous in substance; such a presumption would deny the concept (consolidated in the Constitution) of the hierarchy of legal acts, at the top of which is the Constitution; thus, such a presumption would distort the very essence of constitutional justice (rulings of 16 January 2007, 27 June 2007, 17 December 2007, 22 June 2009, 9 February 2010, and 7 September 2010).

The powers of the Constitutional Court to hold that such provisions of the Statute of the Seimas that are not impugned by the petitioner but regulate the procedure for adopting an impugned law are in conflict with the Constitution

The Constitutional Court has held on more than one occasion that, having found that the provisions of a law whose compliance with the Constitution is not impugned by the petitioner, but which regulate part of the relationships covered by an impugned law, are in conflict with the Constitution, the Constitutional Court must state that such provisions are unconstitutional. This should be mutatis mutandis applied with regard to the provisions of the legal act – the Statute of the Seimas – that regulate the procedure of the adoption of an impugned law.

The powers of the Constitutional Court to investigate the compliance of a resolution of the Seimas to call a referendum or not to call a referendum with the Constitution (Paragraph 1 of Article 102 and Paragraph 1 of Article 105 of the Constitution)

... Under Paragraph 1 of Article 102 and Paragraph 1 of Article 105 of the Constitution, a resolution of the Seimas to call a referendum or not to call a referendum may be an object of constitutional review.

The powers of the Constitutional Court to investigate the compliance of legal acts adopted by referendum with higher-ranking legal acts (Paragraph 1 of Article 102 of the Constitution)

... in interpreting Paragraph 1 of Article 102 of the Constitution in the context of the constitutional legal regulation, the Constitutional Court has held on more than one occasion that, under the Constitution, the Constitutional Court has the exclusive competence to investigate and decide, inter alia, whether any act (part thereof) adopted by referendum is in conflict with any higher-ranking act, inter alia (and, first of all), with the Constitution (rulings of 28 March 2006, 6 June 2006, 24 October 2007, and 13 May 2010).

The powers of the Constitutional Court to state that the legal regulation impugned by the petitioner is in conflict with the Constitution from the aspect other than that indicated by the petitioner

... after the Constitutional Court establishes that an impugned legal regulation is unconstitutional from the aspect other than that indicated by the petitioner, the Constitutional Court must state that such a legal regulation is in conflict with the Constitution from the aspect not indicated by the petitioner. The implementation of constitutional justice implies that a legal act (part thereof) that conflicts with the Constitution must be removed from the legal system (inter alia, the rulings of 29 November 2001 and 11 June 2015).

The powers of the Constitutional Court to declare the unconstitutionality of provisions that are not impugned by the petitioner but are consolidated in the same legal act whose other provisions are impugned by the petitioner

The Constitutional Court has held that, if it finds that provisions whose compliance with the Constitution is not impugned by the petitioner, but which are consolidated in the same legal act whose other provisions are impugned by the petitioner in terms of their constitutionality, it must state that the said provisions that are not impugned by the petitioner are unconstitutional (rulings of 11 July 2014 and 11 June 2015). The implementation of constitutional justice implies that a legal act (part thereof) that conflicts with the Constitution must be removed from the legal system (inter alia, the rulings of 29 November 2001 and 22 September 2015).

The powers of the Constitutional Court to declare the unconstitutionality of provisions that are not impugned by the petitioner but are consolidated in the same law against whose other provisions the compliance of a substatory act is impugned

The Constitutional Court has held that, if it finds the unconstitutionality of provisions that are not impugned by the petitioner but are consolidated in the same legal act whose other provisions are impugned by the petitioner in terms of their constitutionality, it must state that the said provisions that are not impugned by the petitioner have been found to be unconstitutional (rulings of 11 July 2014, 11 June 2015, and 29 September 2015). This also applies to provisions that are not impugned by the petitioner but are laid down in the same law against whose other provisions the compliance of a substatory act is impugned. The implementation of constitutional justice implies that a legal act (part thereof) that is in conflict with the Constitution must be removed from the legal system (inter alia, the rulings of 29 November 2001, 22 September 2015, and 4 July 2017).

The powers of the Constitutional Court to declare the unconstitutionality of provisions that are not impugned by the petitioner but regulate the same relationships and amend the legal regulation impugned by the petitioner

... if the Constitutional Court finds the unconstitutionality of provisions that are not impugned by the petitioner but regulate the same relationships and amend the legal regulation impugned by the petitioner, it must state that the said provisions that are not impugned by the petitioner have been found to be unconstitutional. The Constitutional Court has held on more than one occasion that the implementation of constitutional justice implies that a legal act (part thereof) that is in conflict with the Constitution must be removed from the legal system (inter alia, the rulings of 29 November 2001, 22 September 2015, and 8 November 2019).

The powers of the Constitutional Court to declare the unconstitutionality of the provisions of a substatory legal act whose review falls within the competence of the Constitutional Court in cases where the provisions of the said substatory legal act implement the law impugned by the petitioner

... if the Constitutional Court finds the unconstitutionality of the provisions of a substatory legal act whose review falls within the competence of the Constitutional Court in cases where the said substatory legal act implements the provisions of the law impugned in the constitutional justice case at issue, it must state that the provisions of the said substatory legal act have been found to be unconstitutional; this obligation of the Constitutional Court stems from the Constitution and, in this way, the supremacy of the Constitution is ensured.

The Constitutional Court investigates the compliance of impugned legal acts with the Constitution as an integral and harmonious system

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 3 June 2020

The Constitutional Court has held on more than one occasion that, in cases where, following a received petition, it investigates whether an impugned legal act (part thereof) is in conflict with the articles (paragraphs thereof) of the Constitution indicated in the petition, it at the same time investigates whether the impugned legal act (part thereof) is in conflict with the Constitution as a single coherent system; the Constitutional Court, having found that an impugned legal act (part thereof) is in conflict with the articles (paragraphs thereof) of the Constitution that are not indicated by the petitioner, has the powers to state this fact (inter alia, the rulings of 24 December 2002, 10 October 2013, and 19 September 2019). This also mutatis mutandis applies to cases where the Constitutional Court finds that an impugned legal act (part thereof) is in conflict with the constitutional principles not specified by the petitioner.

The powers of the Constitutional Court to declare the unconstitutionality of a legal act that is not impugned by the petitioner but for the adoption of which the preconditions were created by the legal act impugned by the petitioner

As the Constitutional Court has held on more than one occasion, it exercises constitutional judicial review; the Constitutional Court is the institution of constitutional justice; while deciding, within its competence, on the compliance of lower-ranking legal acts (parts thereof) with higher-ranking legal acts, inter alia (and, first of all), with the Constitution, and exercising its other constitutional powers, the Constitutional Court – an autonomous and independent court – administers constitutional justice and guarantees constitutional lawfulness and the supremacy of the Constitution in the legal system.

It should be noted that the powers of the Constitutional Court to administer constitutional justice and to ensure constitutional lawfulness are inseparable from the imperatives of the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law (rulings of 19 June 2018 and 16 April 2019). ... it should also be noted that such constitutional powers of the Constitutional Court are inseparable from the requirement, arising from the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law, to respect the general legal principle of ex injuria jus non oritur (illegal acts cannot create law).

In this context, it should be noted that, having found the unconstitutionality of a legal act that is not impugned by the petitioner but for the adoption of which the preconditions were created by the legal act impugned by the petitioner, the Constitutional Court must state that the said legal act that is not impugned by the petitioner has been found to be unconstitutional. It should also be noted that, if the Constitutional Court did not state the unconstitutionality of a legal act that is not impugned by the petitioner but is related to the impugned legal act, this would not be in line with the constitutional mission of the Constitutional Court to administer constitutional justice and to guarantee constitutional lawfulness and the supremacy of the Constitution in the legal system.

... the implementation of constitutional justice implies that a legal act (part thereof) that is in conflict with the Constitution must be removed from the legal system. Therefore, under the Constitution, the Constitutional Court must remove from the legal system all anti-constitutional provisions whose unconstitutionality becomes apparent in the respective constitutional justice case under consideration.

The Constitutional Court has the powers to hold that a legal act impugned by the petitioner is in conflict with a higher-ranking legal act that is not indicated by the petitioner and is other than the Constitution

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 30 July 2020

The Constitutional Court has held that, having found that an impugned legal act (part thereof) is in conflict with the articles (paragraphs thereof) of the Constitution that are not indicated by the petitioner, the Constitutional Court has the powers to state this fact (inter alia, the rulings of 13 June 2000, 24 December 2002, and 30 December 2015). It should be noted that this provision is also mutatis mutandis applicable in cases where the Constitutional Court finds that an impugned legal act (part thereof) is in conflict with a higher-ranking legal act that is not indicated by the petitioner and is other than the Constitution, inter alia, that an impugned law is in conflict with a constitutional law.

Laws amending the Constitution (amendments to the Constitution) are subject to constitutional review by the Constitutional Court

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 30 July 2020

... laws amending the Constitution (amendments to the Constitution), although they have the force of the Constitution, are subject to constitutional review.

... under the Constitution, the Constitutional Court has the exclusive competence to investigate and decide whether, inter alia, any act adopted by the Seimas, as well as any act (part thereof) adopted by referendum, is in conflict, inter alia (and, first of all), with the Constitution (inter alia, the rulings of 28 March 2006, 24 October 2007, and 13 May 2010). Thus, under the Constitution, the Constitutional Court has the exclusive competence to decide whether laws amending the Constitution (amendments to the Constitution) are in line with the substantive and procedural limitations on the alteration of the Constitution, which arise from the Constitution. A different interpretation of the Constitution would render meaningless the substantive and procedural limitations on the alteration of the Constitution, which arise from the Constitution; it would, therefore, create no preconditions for defending the universal values on which the Constitution, as supreme law and as a social contract, and the state, as the common good of all society, are based; it would create no preconditions for protecting these values and the harmony of the provisions of the Constitution and, at the same time, would create no preconditions for ensuring the supremacy of the Constitution.

8.3.2. The powers of the Constitutional Court to present conclusions

The powers of the Seimas and of the Constitutional Court in impeachment proceedings (Item 4 of Paragraph 3 of Article 105 and Paragraph 3 of Article 107 of the Constitution)

See 4. The state and its institutions, 4.4. The responsibility of the authorities to society. The constitutional responsibility of the highest-ranking state officials, the conclusion of 31 March 2004.

The competence of the Constitutional Court to present a conclusion on violations of election laws (Paragraph 2 of Article 102 and Item 1 of Paragraph 3 of Article 105 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's conclusion of 5 November 2004

Item 1 of Paragraph 3 of Article 105 of the Constitution prescribes that the Constitutional Court presents a conclusion on whether there were the violations of election laws during the elections of the President of the Republic or the elections of the members of the Seimas.

Paragraph 2 of Article 102 of the Constitution states that the status of the Constitutional Court and the procedure for the execution of its powers are established by the Law on the Constitutional Court of the Republic of Lithuania.

Under ... the Law on the Constitutional Court, while investigating an inquiry on the violation of election laws during an election of the President of the Republic or the members of the Seimas, the Constitutional Court examines and assesses only the decisions adopted by the Central Electoral Commission or its refusals to examine complaints concerning the violation of election laws in cases where such decisions are adopted or other acts are carried out by the said commission after voting closes in the election of the members of the Seimas or the President of the Republic.

The conclusion of the Constitutional Court that there was a gross violation of the election law during an election of the Seimas (Item 6 of Article 63 and Item 1 of Paragraph 3 of Article 105 of the Constitution)

See 5. The Seimas, 5.3. The constitutional status of a member of the Seimas, the conclusion of 10 November 2012 (“The termination of the powers of a member of the Seimas where the election is declared invalid or the law on election is grossly violated (Item 6 of Article 63 of the Constitution)”).

A conclusion presented by the Constitutional Court whether there was a violation of the election law during an election of the Seimas (Item 1 of Paragraph 3 of Article 105 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court’s ruling of 27 May 2014

Paragraph 3 of Article 107 of the Constitution stipulates that, on the basis of the conclusions of the Constitutional Court, the Seimas takes a final decision on the issues specified in Paragraph 3 of Article 105 of the Constitution. Under Item 1 of Paragraph 3 of Article 105 of the Constitution, the Constitutional Court presents a conclusion on whether there were the violations of the election law during the elections of the members of the Seimas. As held by the Constitutional Court in its decision of 29 November 2012, the Seimas, after receiving the conclusion of the Constitutional Court that the election law was violated during the election of the members of the Seimas, is obliged to adopt a final decision.

Paragraph 5 of Article 106 of the Constitution provides that the Seimas and the President may request from the Constitutional Court conclusions on whether the election law was violated, inter alia, during the elections of the members of the Seimas (Item 1 of Paragraph 3 of Article 105 of the Constitution). It should be noted that a doubt as to whether the election law was observed, inter alia, where the Central Electoral Commission was implementing its powers consolidated in the Constitution and laws in relation to the establishment of the final results of the elections to the Seimas, may constitute grounds for requesting the aforesaid conclusion from the Constitutional Court; under Item 1 of Paragraph 3 of Article 105 of the Constitution, the Constitutional Court must verify whether such a doubt is justified.

It should be emphasised that, once the Constitutional Court presents the conclusion that the election law was not violated during the election of the members of the Seimas, there are no grounds to doubt the results established by the Central Electoral Commission for the election to the Seimas and no grounds for the Seimas to take a final decision provided for in Paragraph 3 of Article 107 of the Constitution. Thus, under Paragraph 3 of Article 107 of the Constitution, the Seimas has the powers to take a final decision on the results of an election to the Seimas only in cases where, subsequent to an inquiry of the Seimas or the President, the Constitutional Court gives the conclusion that the election law was violated during the election of the members of the Seimas.

It should be noted that, under Paragraph 3 of Article 107 of the Constitution, the Seimas takes a final decision on the results of elections to the Seimas only on the basis of the conclusions of the Constitutional Court. It should also be noted that, under Item 1 of Paragraph 3 of Article 105 of the Constitution, it is only the institution of judicial power – the Constitutional Court – that may establish whether the election law was violated during elections to the Seimas; the establishment of violations of the election law is an object of judicial rather than political assessment.

Thus, the provision of Paragraph 3 of Article 107 of the Constitution, under which, based on the conclusions of the Constitutional Court, the Seimas conclusively decides on the issues specified in Paragraph 3 of Article 105 of the Constitution, must not be interpreted in such a manner that the Seimas is allowed to decide anew the same issue regarding which the Constitutional Court has given its conclusion; under the Constitution, the Seimas has no powers to decide on whether the conclusions of the Constitutional Court on violations of the election law are well founded and lawful. This, inter alia, means that the Seimas, which, by its nature and essence, is a political institution whose decisions reflect the political will of the majority of the members of the Seimas and are based on political arrangements and compromises, is not allowed to decide the issue of law as to whether the election law was violated, inter alia, is not allowed to disregard the conclusion of the Constitutional Court that the election law was violated during the elections of the Seimas.

8.3.3. The powers of the Constitutional Court to officially interpret the Constitution; the continuity of the jurisprudence of the Constitutional Court; and the development and reinterpretation (modification) of the official constitutional doctrine

The continuity of the jurisprudence of the Constitutional Court

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 13 December 2004

One of the numerous aspects of the constitutional principle of state under the rule of law ... is that similar cases must be decided in a similar manner. Therefore, the discretion of jurisdictional institutions, when resolving disputes and applying law, is limited. In its rulings of 21 July 2001 and 30 May 2003, as well as in its decision of 13 February 2004, the Constitutional Court held that the principle of a state under the rule of law, which is enshrined in the Constitution, implies, inter alia, the continuity of jurisprudence. The Constitutional Court, while deciding analogous constitutional disputes, follows the doctrine that was formed in its previous cases and reveals the content of the Constitution.

The interpretation of the Constitution in the jurisprudence of the Constitutional Court; the continuity of the jurisprudence of the Constitutional Court

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 14 March 2006

The principle of a state under the rule of law, which is enshrined in the Constitution, implies the continuity of the jurisprudence (rulings of 12 July 2001 and 30 May 2003, the decision of 13 February 2004, and the ruling of 13 December 2004). This can also be said as regards the jurisprudence of the Constitutional Court in which the official constitutional doctrine is formulated, the constitutional principles and norms are interpreted, and interrelations among various constitutional provisions, the relation of their content, the balance of constitutional values, and the essence of the constitutional legal regulation as a single whole are revealed. In the course of investigating the compliance of legal acts with higher-ranking legal acts, the Constitutional Court develops the concept of the provisions of the Constitution as presented in its previous acts and reveals new aspects of a particular legal regulation established in the Constitution, where such aspects are necessary for the consideration of a concrete constitutional justice case (rulings of 30 May 2003, 1 July 2004, and 13 December 2004).

Reinterpreting (modifying) the official constitutional doctrine upon amendments to the Constitution

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 14 March 2006

The continuity of the constitutional jurisprudence does not mean that the constitutional doctrine may not be modified or that its provisions may not be reinterpreted.

... it is (or may be) necessary to reinterpret official provisions of the constitutional doctrine (to modify the official constitutional doctrine), inter alia, in cases where amendments are made to certain articles (parts thereof) of the Constitution. On the entry into force of a constitutional amendment that alters (or repeals) a certain provision of the Constitution on the basis of which (i.e. in the course of the interpretation of which) the previous constitutional doctrine was formulated (on the respective issue of the constitutional legal regulation), the Constitutional Court, under the Constitution, has the exceptional powers to state whether, while interpreting the Constitution, it is still possible (and to what extent) to invoke the official constitutional doctrine formulated by the Constitutional Court on the basis of the previous provisions of the Constitution, or whether it is no longer possible to invoke it (and to what extent) (rulings of 13 May 2004, 16 January 2006, and 24 January 2006).

In its acts, the Constitutional Court has held more than once that the provisions of the Constitution, which is an integral act (Paragraph 1 of Article 6 of the Constitution), are interrelated and constitute a harmonious system, that there is a balance among the values consolidated in the Constitution, and that it is not permitted to interpret any provision of the Constitution in such a way that the content of any other provision of the Constitution would be distorted or denied, since the essence of the entire constitutional legal regulation and the balance of values consolidated in the Constitution would, thus, be disturbed. Taking account of this, it should be held that the reinterpretation of official constitutional doctrinal statements (modification of the official constitutional doctrine) may also be necessary when such an amendment to the Constitution is made (certain provision of the Constitution is amended or repealed or a new provision is laid down in the Constitution) whereby the content of the entire constitutional legal regulation is modified in substance, even though the provision of the Constitution on the basis of which (i.e. while interpreting it) the previous official constitutional doctrine on a certain issue of the constitutional legal regulation was formulated is not formally changed. In such cases, it is solely the Constitutional Court that has the exceptional powers to state whether, while interpreting the Constitution, it is still possible (and to what extent) to invoke the previous official constitutional doctrine (as a whole and on every individual issue of the constitutional legal regulation) or whether it is no longer possible to invoke it (and to what extent).

On the other hand, the continuity of the constitutional jurisprudence and of the constitutional doctrine formulated therein, as well as the exceptional constitutional powers of the Constitutional Court to hold whether, in the course of interpreting the Constitution, it is still possible to invoke (and to what extent) the previous official constitutional doctrine or whether it is no longer possible to invoke it (and to what extent), implies that, each time when it is necessary to reinterpret certain official constitutional doctrinal provisions (to modify the official constitutional doctrine), the Constitutional Court must explicitly point it out and must properly (clearly and rationally) argue this in its respective act.

The powers of the Constitutional Court to officially interpret the Constitution; the force of the official constitutional doctrine

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 28 March 2006

Under the Constitution, only the Constitutional Court has the powers to interpret the Constitution officially (rulings of 30 May 2003, 29 October 2003, 13 May 2004, 1 July 2004, and 13 December 2004 and the decision of 20 September 2005). It is the Constitutional Court that formulates the official constitutional doctrine: the provisions of the Constitution – its norms and principles – are interpreted in the acts of the Constitutional Court. The official constitutional doctrine, inter alia, reveals the content of various constitutional provisions, their interrelations, the balance between constitutional values, and the essence of the constitutional legal regulation as a single whole (rulings of 1 July 2004, 13 December 2004, and 14 March 2006). The official constitutional doctrine may also expressis verbis specify what interpretation of the Constitution is not permissible.

Every ruling of the Constitutional Court is integral (it constitutes a single whole) and all its constituent parts are interrelated (decision of 12 January 2000, the ruling of 30 May 2003, the decisions of 11 February 2004 and 13 February 2004, the ruling of 19 January 2005, and the decisions of 10 February 2005 and 20 September 2005). The operative part of a ruling of the Constitutional Court is based on the arguments of the reasoning part (decisions of 12 January 2004, 11 February 2004, 13 February 2004, 10 February 2005, and 20 September 2005). When passing new laws and amending or supplementing laws or other legal acts that have already been passed, the state institutions that pass such acts are bound both by the concept of the provisions of the Constitution and by other legal arguments that are presented in the reasoning of the respective ruling of the Constitutional Court (rulings of 30 May 2003 and 19 January 2005 and the decision of 20 September 2005). It also needs to be noted that law-making institutions (officials) and law-applying institutions (officials) are bound by the concept of constitutional provisions and by arguments set out not only in the rulings of the Constitutional Court, but also in other acts of the Constitutional Court, i.e. its conclusions and decisions; thus, under the Constitution, the content of all acts of the Constitutional Court in which the Constitution is interpreted, i.e. the official constitutional doctrine is formed, is also binding on law-making institutions (officials) and law-applying institutions (officials), including courts of general jurisdiction and specialised courts (decision of 20 September 2005).

Law-making subjects elucidate (often also interpret) higher law, thus, also the Constitution; law-applying subjects, inter alia, those that apply the Constitution, cannot avoid the elucidation (often also the interpretation) of higher law. The application of the Constitution is inseparable from the elucidation and, often, interpretation of its provisions. It is elucidation and interpretation of the provisions of the Constitution that are the necessary precondition for instituting the verification of the compliance of certain legal acts (parts thereof) with the Constitution at the Constitutional Court or another court to whose jurisdiction this is assigned. In this context, it should be emphasised that, as the Constitutional Court held in its decision of 20 September 2005, all law-making subjects and all law-applying subjects, including courts, must pay regard to the official constitutional doctrine when they apply the Constitution; they may not interpret the provisions of the Constitution differently from how the Constitutional Court has interpreted the said provisions in its acts. Otherwise, the constitutional principle that only the Constitutional Court has the powers to officially interpret the Constitution would be violated, the supremacy of the Constitution would be disregarded, and the preconditions would be created for the emergence of incompatibilities in the legal system.

It should be noted that courts, which, under the Constitution and laws, have the powers to investigate, in terms of compliance with the Constitution (other higher-ranking legal acts), such legal acts (parts thereof) whose investigation in terms of their compliance with the Constitution (other higher-ranking legal acts) does not fall within the jurisdiction of the Constitutional Court and to adopt the respective decisions, must not avoid the interpretation of the Constitution in cases where they investigate the compliance of the said legal acts (parts thereof) with the Constitution. ... under ... laws, administrative courts, i.e. specialised courts, which are established under Paragraph 2 of Article 111 of the Constitution, decide on the compliance of legal acts (parts thereof) passed by other law-making subjects (thus, not those passed by the Seimas, the President of the Republic, or the Government and not those adopted by referendum), inter alia, on the compliance of legal acts passed by ministers, other lower-ranking substatutory legal acts, as well as legal acts passed by municipalities, with higher-ranking legal acts, inter alia (and, first of all), with the Constitution. In its decision of 20 September 2005, the Constitutional Court held that, while implementing their respective powers, administrative courts are bound by the official constitutional doctrine formulated in acts (rulings, conclusions, and decisions) adopted by the Constitutional Court.

The development and reinterpretation (modification) of the official constitutional doctrine

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 28 March 2006

When investigating the compliance of laws and other legal acts with the Constitution, the Constitutional Court develops the concept of the provisions of the Constitution as presented in its previous rulings and other acts and reveals new aspects of a particular legal regulation established in the Constitution, where such aspects are necessary for the consideration of a concrete constitutional justice case (rulings of 30 May 2003, 1 July 2004, 13 December 2004, and 14 March 2006).

The development of the constitutional jurisprudence and the official doctrine formulated therein (particularly at the beginning of the activity of the Constitutional Court, when no official constitutional doctrine was yet formulated on most constitutional provisions) is characterised by the fact that the official constitutional doctrine is not formulated all “at once” on any issue of the constitutional legal regulation (or on any issue of the interpretation of the respective provisions of the Constitution), but “case by case”, by supplementing the elements (fragments) of the said doctrine that were disclosed in the acts of the Constitutional Court adopted in previous constitutional justice cases with other elements revealed in the acts of the Constitutional Court adopted in new constitutional justice cases.

Thus, it should be emphasised that the formulation of the official constitutional doctrine (both as a whole and on every individual issue of the constitutional legal regulation) is not a one-off act, but a gradual and coherent process. This process is uninterrupted and is never fully completed, since the nature of the Constitution itself as the highest-ranking act and the idea of constitutionalism imply that the Constitution cannot and does not contain any gaps or internal contradictions (rulings of 25 May 2004 and 13 December 2004); while interpreting the norms and principles of the Constitution, which are consolidated explicitly or implicitly in the text of the Constitution and constitute a harmonious system, there is always the possibility, if this is necessary due to the logic of a constitutional justice case under consideration, that the Constitutional Court will formulate such provisions of the official constitutional doctrine, i.e. reveal such aspects of the constitutional legal regulation, that have not been formulated yet in the acts of the Constitutional Court adopted in previous constitutional justice cases. Whenever the Constitutional Court considers new constitutional justice cases subsequent to petitions, the official constitutional doctrine formulated in the previous acts of the Constitutional Court (on each individual issue of the constitutional legal regulation that is important for a particular case) is every time supplemented with new fragments. Thus, by formulating new official constitutional doctrinal provisions, the diversity and completeness of the legal regulation laid down in the Constitution – the supreme legal act – is revealed.

In this ruling of the Constitutional Court, it has been held that the official constitutional doctrine (both as a whole and on every individual issue of the constitutional legal regulation) is formulated gradually and coherently, by supplementing the elements (fragments) of the said doctrine revealed in previous acts adopted by the Constitutional Court with other elements revealed in new acts of the Constitutional Court.

Therefore, in general, it is not impossible that at a given time in the jurisprudence of the Constitutional Court (in particular, at the beginning of the activity of the Constitutional Court), there would also be such official constitutional doctrinal provisions (fragments or rudiments of the doctrine) that, if compared with each other but assessed separately from the entire official constitutional doctrinal context (in particular, where a more detailed and broader official constitutional doctrine is not formed on a particular issue of the constitutional legal regulation) and/or general principles of law, can be regarded as competing ones. If the text of the Constitution does not change, if it remains stable (i.e. if no respective amendments to the Constitution are made), the said real or alleged competition of these official constitutional doctrinal provisions is removed by further (inter alia, systemic) interpretation and development (in new constitutional justice cases) of the concept of the provisions of the Constitution and the official constitutional doctrinal provisions already formulated on the basis of the provisions of the Constitution.

The concept of the provisions of the Constitution and further interpretation and development of the official constitutional doctrinal provisions formulated on the basis of the said provisions of the Constitution in the acts of the Constitutional Court adopted in new constitutional justice cases may, under certain circumstances, imply not only disclosing new aspects of the constitutional legal regulation where such aspects are necessary for the investigation of the said constitutional justice cases and supplementing the concept of the provisions of the Constitution with new elements (fragments) where such concept was presented in the acts of the Constitutional Court adopted in previous constitutional justice cases, but also reinterpreting the previously formulated official constitutional doctrinal provisions when the official constitutional doctrine is modified.

It should be noted that the constitutional principle that only the Constitutional Court has the powers to interpret the Constitution officially and the related requirement that, while applying the Constitution, all law-making subjects and law-applying subjects (including courts) must pay regard to the official constitutional doctrine and must not interpret the provisions of the Constitution differently from how the Constitutional Court interpreted the said provisions in its acts imply that the said reinterpretation of the concept of the provisions of the Constitution and official constitutional doctrinal provisions when the official constitutional doctrine is modified is the exclusive competence of the Constitutional Court.

The continuity of the jurisprudence of the Constitutional Court

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 28 March 2006

It should be emphasised that where no such amendments to the Constitution are made due to which it is necessary to reinterpret certain official constitutional doctrinal provisions so that the official constitutional doctrine would be modified, it is allowed to reinterpret official doctrinal provisions only if the necessity arises from the Constitution to diverge from the existing precedent and to create a new one. In this field, the Constitutional Court is not completely free – it is bound both by the precedents that it itself has created and by the official constitutional doctrine that it itself has formulated and that substantiates such precedents.

... the principle of a state under the rule of law, which is enshrined in the Constitution, implies the continuity of jurisprudence ... the creation of new court precedents, and arguing (reasoning) the court precedents must not be volitional acts that are rationally and legally unreasoned. Since courts of general jurisdiction, inter alia, the Supreme Court of Lithuania and the Court of Appeal of Lithuania, must, within their competence, ensure the continuity of the respective jurisprudence (inter alia, ensure that the practice of courts of general jurisdiction would be modified (that such practice would be deviated from precedents that were binding on courts by then and new precedents would be created) only when this is unavoidably and objectively necessary, as well as constitutionally justifiable and reasoned, and that such modification of the practice of courts of general jurisdiction (deviation from previous precedents that were binding on courts by then and the creation of new precedents) would in all cases be properly (clearly and rationally) argued (first of all, in the decisions of courts of general jurisdiction themselves)), and since the courts of the highest instances of the systems of specialised courts established under Paragraph 2 of Article 111 of the Constitution (in the system of administrative courts – the Supreme Administrative Court) are under the same obligation, therefore, the Constitutional Court, while invoking the constitutional doctrine that it itself has formed and precedents that it itself has created, must in the same way ensure the continuity of the constitutional jurisprudence (its coherence and consistency) and the predictability of its decisions.

Thus, deviating from the precedents created by the Constitutional Court when adopting decisions in constitutional justice cases is allowed and new precedents may be created only in cases where this is unavoidably and objectively necessary and is constitutionally justifiable and reasoned. Also, the official constitutional doctrinal provisions on which the precedents of the Constitutional Court are based must not be reinterpreted in a manner that the official constitutional doctrine may be modified when this is not unavoidably and objectively necessary, as well as constitutionally justifiable and reasoned. Any change of the precedents of the Constitutional Court or modification of the official constitutional doctrine may not be determined by accidental (from the aspect of law) factors. For instance, the modification of the official constitutional doctrine may not be determined solely by a change in the composition of the Constitutional Court.

It should be emphasised that the said necessity to reinterpret certain official constitutional doctrinal provisions so that the official constitutional doctrine would be modified may be determined only by such circumstances as the necessity to increase the possibilities of implementing the innate and acquired rights of persons and their legitimate interests, the necessity to better defend and protect the values enshrined in the Constitution, the need to create better conditions in order to reach the aims of the Lithuanian Nation that are declared in the Constitution and on which the Constitution itself is based, as well as the necessity to expand the possibilities of constitutional control in this country in order to guarantee constitutional justice and to ensure that no legal act (part thereof) that is in conflict with higher-ranking legal acts would have the immunity from being removed from the legal system.

It also needs to be emphasised that it is impossible and constitutionally impermissible to reinterpret the official constitutional doctrine so that the official constitutional doctrine would be modified in such a manner that the system of values consolidated in the Constitution is changed, their compatibility is denied, the guarantees for the protection of the supremacy of the Constitution in the legal system are reduced, the concept of the Constitution as a single act and harmonious system is denied, the constitutional guarantees of the rights and freedoms of persons are reduced, and the model of the separation of powers, which is enshrined in the Constitution, is changed.

It should be particularly emphasised that every case of such reinterpretation of the official constitutional doctrine when the official constitutional doctrine is modified must be argued properly (clearly and rationally) in the respective act of the Constitutional Court.

The development and reinterpretation (modification) of the official constitutional doctrine allows ensuring the viability of the Constitution

... the further interpretation and development of the official constitutional doctrine, inter alia, the reinterpretation of the official constitutional doctrinal provisions, also such reinterpretation where the official constitutional doctrine is modified, makes it possible, in the acts of the Constitutional Court adopted in new constitutional justice cases, to reveal the deep potential of the Constitution without changing its text and, in this respect, to adjust the Constitution to the changes of social life and to the constantly changing living conditions of society and the state, as well as to ensure the viability of the Constitution as the legal foundation of the life of society and the state. The formation and development of the official constitutional doctrine is a function of constitutional justice. The acts of the Constitutional Court adopted in new constitutional justice cases where such acts further interpret and develop, inter alia, reinterpret, the official constitutional doctrinal provisions, also where reinterpretation is made in a manner modifying the official constitutional doctrine, make it possible not to make any intervention into the text of the Constitution when such intervention is not legally necessary. In this way, the said acts adopted by the Constitutional Court contribute to ensuring the stability of the text of the Constitution and the constitutional order.

The reinterpretation of the official constitutional doctrinal provisions, also such reinterpretation where the constitutional doctrine is modified, means, inter alia, that, in the future, at the Constitutional Court, constitutional justice cases will have to be considered and decisions will have to be adopted by following this reinterpreted (modified) official constitutional doctrine.

The development of the official constitutional doctrine does not constitute grounds for reviewing the final acts of the Constitutional Court adopted in previous cases

... under the Constitution, no development of the official constitutional doctrine – neither the supplementing of the conception of the provisions of the Constitution provided in the acts of the Constitutional Court adopted in previous constitutional justice cases with new elements (fragments) nor the reinterpretation of the previously formulated official constitutional doctrinal provisions where the official constitutional doctrine is modified – may constitute or constitutes grounds for reviewing the previously adopted rulings, conclusions, or decisions (or their reasoning) by which constitutional justice cases were completed.

The same can also be said about such cases where the Constitutional Court, after it receives a petition of a court of general jurisdiction or a specialised court (established under Paragraph 2 of Article 111 of the Constitution) requesting an investigation into and a decision on whether a certain act (part thereof) passed by the Seimas, the President of the Republic, or the Government or that adopted by referendum is in conflict with a higher-ranking legal act, inter alia (and, first of all), with the Constitution, does not decide, under the Constitution and the Law on the Constitutional Court, on the merits of a question by means of a properly (clearly and rationally) argued decision, i.e. the Constitutional Court refuses to consider the petition, or dismisses the instituted legal proceedings (case) where, after the respective petition was received at the Constitutional Court, the preparation of a constitutional justice case for a hearing at the Constitutional Court has begun or it has already been considered in a hearing at the Constitutional Court.

... neither any development of the official constitutional doctrine nor the application of new methods of the interpretation of law while interpreting certain provisions of the Constitution constitutes or may constitute grounds for the Constitutional Court to review its final legal acts – rulings, conclusions, and decisions, inter alia, such by means of which the Constitutional Court refuses to consider a petition of the petitioner – a court – requesting an investigation into and a decision on whether a legal act (part thereof) passed by the Seimas, the President of the Republic, or the Government or that adopted by referendum is in conflict with a higher-ranking legal act, inter alia (and, first of all), with the Constitution, or by which the instituted legal proceedings (case) are (is) dismissed where, after the respective petition was received at the Constitutional Court, the preparation of a constitutional justice case for a hearing at the Constitutional Court has begun or it has already been considered in a hearing at the Constitutional Court.

... Paragraph 1 of Article 107 of the Constitution means that every legal act (part thereof) passed by the Seimas, the President of the Republic, or the Government or that adopted by referendum where such a legal act has been declared in conflict with any higher-ranking legal act, inter alia (and, first of all), with the Constitution, is removed from the Lithuanian legal system for good and may never be applied.

... [the] provisions [of Paragraphs 1 and 2 of Article 107] of the Constitution help to ensure the stability and certainty of the legal regulation of social relationships, the continuity of the jurisprudence of the Constitutional Court (and other courts), and the predictability of their activity and adopted decisions, while the subjects of constitutional legal relationships are protected from such a review of final legal acts adopted by the Constitutional Court that would be determined not by the objective constitutional necessity, but by accidental (from the legal point of view) factors.

The development of the official constitutional doctrine does not constitute grounds for addressing the Constitutional Court repeatedly with the same petition or inquiry

... as such, no development of the official constitutional doctrine (inter alia, such reinterpretation of the official constitutional doctrinal provisions where the official constitutional doctrine is modified) constitutes grounds for the subjects specified in Article 106 of the Constitution to apply to the Constitutional Court with a new petition requesting an investigation into whether such a law (part thereof) is in conflict with the Constitution (another higher-ranking legal act) whose compliance with the Constitution (another higher-ranking legal act) has already been investigated on the merits, or with a petition that is analogous to a petition previously filed by a certain subject requesting an investigation into whether such a legal act (part thereof) is in conflict with the Constitution (another higher-ranking legal act) on which the Constitutional Court has already passed the decision to refuse to consider such a petition or passed the decision (ruling) to dismiss the instituted legal proceedings (case) (if, after the respective petition was received at the Constitutional Court, the preparation of the constitutional justice case for the hearing of the Constitutional Court began, or if the respective petition has already been considered at the hearing of the Constitutional Court), thus, where the Constitutional Court did not decide the respective question on the merits.

As such, the change (reinterpretation, modification) of the constitutional doctrine formed by the Constitutional Court previously does not constitute grounds for the subjects specified in Article 106 of the Constitution to apply to the Constitutional Court with a new inquiry whether there were the violations of election laws during the elections of the President of the Republic or the elections of the members of the Seimas, whether the state of health of the President of the Republic allows him/her to continue to hold office, whether the international treaties of the Republic of Lithuania are in conflict with the Constitution, and whether the concrete actions of the members of the Seimas and state officials against whom an impeachment case has been instituted are in conflict with the Constitution.

Interpreting the Constitution and other legal acts in the jurisprudence of the Constitutional Court

The Constitutional Court's decision of 8 May 2007

When investigating whether an impugned law (part thereof) is in conflict with the Constitution, the Constitutional Court officially interprets both the Constitution and the said law. In doing so, the Constitutional Court applies various methods of the interpretation of law: systemic, the one of general legal principles, logical, teleological, the one of the intentions of the legislature, the one of precedents, historical, comparative, etc.

As such, a judgment handed down by the European Court of Human Rights does not constitute constitutional grounds for reinterpreting (modifying) the official constitutional doctrine

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 5 September 2012

... as such, a judgment of the European Court of Human Rights may not serve as constitutional grounds for the reinterpretation (modification) of the official constitutional doctrine (provisions thereof) if such reinterpretation, in the absence of the respective amendments to the Constitution, changed the overall constitutional regulation (inter alia, the integrity of the constitutional institutions ...) in substance, also if it disturbed the system of the values consolidated in the Constitution and diminished the guarantees for the protection of the supremacy of the Constitution in the legal system.

The powers of the Constitutional Court to interpret the Constitution

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 5 September 2012

The powers of the Constitutional Court to officially interpret the Constitution and to provide, in its jurisprudence, the official concept of the provisions of the Constitution arise from the Constitution itself: in order to be able to establish and adopt a decision whether the legal acts (parts thereof) under investigation are in conflict with higher-ranking legal acts, the Constitutional Court has the constitutional powers to officially interpret both the legal acts under investigation and the said higher-ranking legal acts; a different interpretation of the powers of the Constitutional Court would deny the constitutional mission of the Constitutional Court itself (ruling of 6 June 2006 and the decision of 3 May 2010).

8.3.4. The limits of the jurisdiction of the Constitutional Court

8.3.4.1. The powers of the Constitutional Court to investigate the constitutionality of legal gaps

The powers of the Constitutional Court to investigate the constitutionality of legal gaps

The Constitutional Court's decision of 6 May 2003

If laws (parts thereof) fail to establish a certain legal regulation, the Constitutional Court has the constitutional powers to investigate the constitutionality of such laws (parts thereof) in cases where failure to lay down the said legal regulation in precisely the aforementioned laws (parts thereof) may lead to a violation of the principles and/or norms of the Constitution.

The Constitutional Court also has the constitutional powers to investigate the compliance of such substatory acts (parts thereof) passed by the Seimas, the Government, or the President of the Republic in which a certain legal regulation is not established with the Constitution and/or laws in cases where failure to lay down the said legal regulation in precisely the aforementioned substatory legal acts (parts thereof) may lead to a violation of the Constitution and/or laws.

In cases where a petitioner impugns the fact that a law or another legal act (part thereof) indicated by the petitioner does not establish a certain legal regulation, but the said legal regulation, under the Constitution (or also under laws, where a substatory legal act passed by the Seimas, the Government, or the President of the Republic is impugned), does not need to be established in the aforesaid impugned legal act (part thereof), the Constitutional Court holds that, in the case on the request of the petitioner, the matter for investigation is absent; this constitutes grounds for dismissing the case (ruling of 25 January 2001).

A legal gap (lacuna legis), inter alia, a legislative omission

See 1. The foundations of the constitutional order, 1.8. The foundations of lawmaking and of the application of law, 1.8.3. Legal gaps, the decision of 8 August 2006.

The powers of the Constitutional Court to declare a legal regulation that contains a legal omission to be in conflict with the Constitution (another higher-ranking legal act); the Constitutional Court does not have the powers to assess the inaction of law-making subjects (non-adoption of law-making decisions) (Paragraphs 1 and 2 of Article 105 and Paragraph 1 of Article 107 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's decision of 8 August 2006

The “detection” of a legislative omission par excellence in a lower-ranking legal act (part thereof), if this is necessary because of the logic of the constitutional justice case under consideration, constitutes sufficient grounds for ruling the aforesaid legal act (part thereof) to be in conflict (to the respective extent, i.e. to the extent that the legal act (part thereof) does not consolidate the legal regulation required by higher-ranking legal acts, inter alia (and, first of all), by the Constitution) with the Constitution (another higher-ranking legal act).

In the acts adopted by the Constitutional Court (inter alia, the decision of 16 April 2004 and the rulings of 29 December 2004, 19 January 2005, 16 January 2006, and 28 March 2006), various aspects of a legislative omission, as a phenomenon of legal reality, have been revealed.

In its jurisprudence (inter alia, in the ruling of 25 January 2001, the decisions of 6 May 2003, 13 May 2003, and 16 April 2004, and the ruling of 13 December 2004), the Constitutional Court follows the provision that the Constitutional Court has the constitutional powers not only to hold that there is a legal gap, inter alia, a legislative omission, in a reviewed lower-ranking legal act (part thereof), but also, by its ruling adopted in the constitutional justice case, it can rule such a legal regulation to be in conflict with higher-ranking legal acts, inter alia, with the Constitution. However, in order that the Constitutional Court could accept for consideration a petition impugning a real or alleged legal gap, inter alia, a legislative omission, let alone that the Constitutional Court would be able, by its ruling, to rule the respective legal regulation to be in conflict with higher-ranking legal acts, inter alia, with the Constitution, it is necessary to follow certain conditions, which are defined in the jurisprudence of the Constitutional Court (inter alia, in the aforementioned rulings and decisions of the Constitutional Court), namely: if laws or other lower-ranking legal acts (parts thereof) do not establish a certain legal regulation, the Constitutional Court has the constitutional powers to rule such laws or other legal acts (parts thereof) to be in conflict with the Constitution or other higher-ranking legal acts in cases where failure to lay down the said legal regulation in precisely the reviewed laws or other legal acts (in precisely the reviewed parts thereof) may lead to a violation of the principles and/or norms of the Constitution or the provisions of other higher-ranking legal acts; however, in cases where the Constitutional Court reviews a law or another legal act (part thereof), impugned by a petitioner, that does not establish a certain legal regulation that, under the Constitution (and also under laws, if a substatutory act (part thereof) passed by the Seimas, or an act (part thereof) passed by the President of the Republic or the Government is impugned), does not need to be established in precisely the impugned legal act (in precisely that part thereof), the Constitutional Court holds that the matter for investigation is absent in the case on the request of the petitioner and this constitutes grounds for dismissing the instituted legal proceedings (if the respective petition was accepted at the Constitutional Court and the preparation of a constitutional justice case for the hearing of the Constitutional Court has begun) or for dismissing the case (if the constitutional justice case has already been considered at the hearing of the Constitutional Court).

Attention should be paid to the fact that, while deciding whether the Constitutional Court has, under the Constitution, the powers to rule a legal gap in a lower-ranking legal act (or other absence of explicit legal provisions in that legal act) to be in conflict with the Constitution or another higher-ranking legal act, it is impossible to focus solely on the doctrinal provision (statement) “If laws (parts thereof) fail to establish a certain legal regulation, the Constitutional Court has the constitutional powers to investigate the constitutionality of such laws (parts thereof) in cases where failure to lay down the said legal regulation in precisely the aforementioned laws (parts thereof) may lead to a violation of the principles and/or norms of the Constitution” of the Constitutional Court’s decision of 6 May 2003. It is also necessary to take account of how the said legal gap occurred: whether it is a legislative omission created by means of a law-making action of the subject that passed the particular legal act (i.e. due to the fact that, in the course of passing this legal act, the legal relationships that must be regulated in precisely that legal act (in precisely that part thereof) were not regulated in precisely that legal act (in precisely that part thereof)), or whether this legal gap occurred due to other circumstances, for example, due to the fact that, by its ruling, the Constitutional Court recognised that the legal regulation in a certain lower-ranking legal act (part thereof) was in conflict with the Constitution or another higher-ranking legal act. In the latter case, as mentioned before, there are no grounds for stating the presence of a legislative omission; on the contrary, in such a situation, under the Constitution, the respective law-making subject (provided that the particular legal relationships must be legally regulated) is under the obligation to change the legal regulation that is no longer valid so that a newly established legal regulation would not be in conflict with a certain higher-ranking legal act, inter alia (and, first of all), with the Constitution.

A different concept of a legislative omission, as well as a different interpretation of the powers of the Constitutional Court to investigate the compliance of lower-ranking legal acts with higher-ranking legal acts, inter alia (and, first of all), with the Constitution, and to recognise, by its rulings, that the legal gaps present in those lower-ranking legal acts (parts thereof) are in conflict with higher-ranking legal acts, inter alia, with the Constitution, namely the interpretation that the Constitutional Court may or must also investigate such legal gaps that are not the consequence of an action of the law-making subject that passed a certain legal act, for example, such legal gaps where the regulation of certain legal relationships has never started in any legal acts, although there is a need for their legal regulation, as well as such legal gaps or other indeterminacies that could occur after the Constitutional Court recognises, by its ruling, that a certain legal act (part thereof) is in conflict with a higher-ranking legal act, inter alia, with the Constitution, would deny the essence of a legislative omission as the consequence of the action of the law-making subject that passed the respective legal act. In addition, the presumption that the Constitutional Court may or must investigate also such legal gaps or other indeterminacies that occur after the Constitutional Court itself recognises, by its ruling, that a certain legal act (part thereof) is in conflict with a higher-ranking legal act, inter alia, with the Constitution, would mean that the Constitutional Court, while acting within its constitutional competence, by the said ruling, creates such a legal situation (i.e. that it virtually creates a new legal regulation instead of that ruled in conflict with a higher-ranking legal act, inter alia, with the Constitution) that is incompatible with the Constitution or another higher-ranking legal act; such interpretation of the powers of the Constitutional Court to recognise, by its ruling, that legal gaps are in conflict with the Constitution would distort in substance and even deny the essence and meaning of constitutional review and constitutional justice.

The aforesaid presumption would also ignore the fact that, under Paragraphs 1 and 2 of Article 105 of the Constitution, the Constitutional Court investigates whether specifically legal acts as such adopted by state institutions (Seimas, the President of the Republic, or the Government) are in conflict with higher-ranking legal acts, inter alia (and, first of all), with the Constitution, but it does not investigate the non-adoption of law-making decisions by the said state institutions, i.e. the avoidance or delay of adopting such decisions, as well as the failure to act that is determined by other motives. It also needs to be emphasised that, as mentioned before, under Paragraph 1 of Article 107 of the Constitution, a law (part thereof) of the Republic of Lithuania or another act (part thereof) of the Seimas, an act of the President of the Republic, or an act (part thereof) of the Government may not be applied from the day of the official publication of the decision of the Constitutional Court that the act in question (part thereof) is in conflict with the Constitution; this means that every legal act (part thereof) passed by the Seimas, the President of the Republic, or the Government or that adopted by referendum where such a legal act has been declared in conflict with any higher-ranking legal act, inter alia (and, first of all), with the Constitution, is removed from the Lithuanian legal system for good and may never be applied. After all, if the constitutional powers of the Constitutional Court were interpreted as also including the (alleged) powers to investigate and adopt a decision that the fact that state institutions do not adopt law-making decisions where no legal act is passed at all is in conflict with the Constitution or another higher-ranking legal act, it would become completely unclear how, in such cases, Paragraph 1 of Article 107 of the Constitution (which is a directly applicable act (Paragraph 1 of Article 6 of the Constitution)) must be applied, since, in such cases, there is no such a legal act (part thereof) that may be impugned at the Constitutional Court by the subjects specified in the Constitution. Thus, the said presumption would also deny and distort in substance the concept of the constitutional legal effects of acts adopted by the Constitutional Court.

... after the Constitutional Court recognises by its ruling that a lower-ranking legal act (part thereof) is in conflict with a higher-ranking legal act, inter alia, with the Constitution, the respective law-making subject is under the constitutional duty to declare such a legal act (part thereof) no longer valid or, if it is impossible to do without the concrete legal regulation of the social relationships in question, to change it so that a newly established legal regulation is not in conflict with higher-ranking legal acts, inter alia (and, first of all), with the Constitution. As long as this has not been done, the respective legal gap (which, as emphasised in this decision of the Constitutional Court, is not a legislative omission) remains. In order to remove it, a certain period of time may be necessary. However, despite the fact that this time might be quite lengthy, this does not in itself mean that the Constitutional Court is granted the powers to investigate the compliance of the same legal act with higher-ranking legal acts, inter alia, with the Constitution, where such same legal act has already been investigated from the same aspect by the Constitutional Court in a constitutional justice case that was considered previously and, upon the investigation of which and the entry into force of the respective ruling of the Constitutional Court, precisely the said legal gap occurred.

Thus, the Constitutional Court, which, under the Constitution, has the exclusive powers to investigate and adopt decisions regarding any consequences of law-making decisions (actions) of the Seimas, the President of the Republic, or the Government, i.e. regarding the compliance of legal acts (parts thereof) with higher-ranking legal acts, inter alia (and, first of all), with the Constitution, does not have any powers, under Paragraphs 1 and 2 of Article 105 and Paragraph 1 of Article 107 of the Constitution, to investigate the non-adoption of law-making decisions by state institutions the compliance of legal acts adopted by which with the Constitution is investigated by the Constitutional Court, i.e. it does not have any powers to investigate the avoidance and delay of adopting such decisions or such failure to act that is determined by other motives, even though gaps or other indeterminacies occur in the legal system due to such failure to act. Thus, the subjects that are pointed out in the Constitution and may impugn the compliance of precisely legal acts (parts thereof) adopted by the Seimas, the President of the Republic, or the Government or those adopted by referendum with higher-ranking legal acts, inter alia, with the Constitution, must not impugn the avoidance and delay of adopting such law-making decisions or such failure to act that is determined by other motives, where, due to such inaction, particular legal acts have not been passed, including those that must be passed in order to lay down, by taking account of the acts adopted by the Constitutional Court, such a legal regulation that would be in compliance with the Constitution or other higher-ranking legal acts.

If the respective law-making subject has not passed a legal act (acts) (parts thereof) whereby a new (different) legal regulation would be established instead of a legal act (parts thereof) ruled by the Constitutional Court to be in conflict with a higher-ranking legal act, inter alia, with the Constitution, also, if the said subject has not passed a legal act (acts) (parts thereof) whereby a legal act (part thereof) ruled by the Constitutional Court to be in conflict with a higher-ranking legal act, inter alia, with the Constitution, is declared no longer valid, then, as held in this decision of the Constitutional Court, there is no legal act that may be impugned at the Constitutional Court by the subjects specified in the Constitution; thus, in such a case, there is no such legal act (part thereof) over which the Constitutional Court might exercise constitutional control.

... the fact that the subjects specified in the Constitution may not challenge before the Constitutional Court such failure of a law-making subject to act where, instead of a legal regulation that has been ruled by the Constitutional Court to be in conflict with a higher-ranking legal act, inter alia, with the Constitution, the said law-making subject has not passed a legal act (acts) (parts thereof) that would establish a new (different) legal regulation harmonised with the said higher-ranking legal acts, inter alia, with the Constitution, and where the Constitutional Court does not have the powers to investigate the non-adoption of such law-making decisions, does not mean that the aforementioned persons cannot defend (also in a court) their rights and freedoms that are violated because the said law-making decisions have not been adopted. The general legal principle of ubi ius, ibi remedium, the provision of Paragraph 1 of Article 6 of the Constitution, whereby the Constitution is a directly applicable act, the constitutional principle of responsible governance, the provision of Paragraph 3 of Article 5 of the Constitution, according to which state institutions serve the people, the provision of Article 18 of the Constitution, whereby human rights and freedoms are innate, as well as the constitutional right of a person who believes that his/her constitutional rights or freedoms are violated to apply to a court, imply not only that, in such cases, the rights, freedoms, legitimate interests, and legitimate expectations must and may be defended by means of interpreting the Constitution and by directly applying its provisions, but also that such protection must be guaranteed by courts.

The powers of the Constitutional Court to investigate the constitutionality of a legislative omission

The Constitutional Court's decision of 25 April 2012

... a petition that is based on a legislative omission presumed by the petitioner that filed it may be accepted and a case may be commenced following such a petition only if such arguments and reasoning are set out in the petition that substantiate the fact that, under the Constitution, the non-established legal regulation must be established in precisely that part of the legal act that is specified by the petitioner (decisions of 16 April 2004 and 16 November 2010).

8.3.4.2. The powers of the Constitutional Court to investigate the constitutionality of legal acts that are no longer in force

Dismissing legal proceedings where an impugned legal act is annulled

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 5 April 2000

Under [the Law on the Constitutional Court], the annulment of an impugned legal act constitutes grounds for adopting a decision on dismissing the instituted legal proceedings. The phrase "shall be grounds to adopt a decision to dismiss the instituted legal proceedings" must be interpreted as establishing the right of the Constitutional Court to dismiss the instituted legal proceedings while taking account of the circumstances of the case under investigation, but not as stipulating that the instituted legal proceedings must be dismissed in every case where the respective impugned legal act is annulled.

Dismissing legal proceedings where an impugned legal act is annulled; the duty of the Constitutional Court to consider a petition filed by a court regardless of whether an impugned act is in force (Paragraph 1 of Article 102 and Article 110 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 21 August 2002

Under the Constitution, only the Constitutional Court decides whether laws and other acts of the Seimas are in conflict with the Constitution and whether the acts of the President of the Republic and the Government are in conflict with the Constitution or laws (Paragraph 1 of Article 102). Paragraph 1 of Article 110 of the Constitution provides that judges may not apply any laws that are in conflict with the Constitution. Under Paragraph 2 of the same article, in cases where there are grounds to believe that a law or another legal act that should be applied in a concrete case is in conflict with the Constitution, the judge must suspend the consideration of the case and must apply to the Constitutional Court, requesting that it decide whether the law or another legal act in question is in compliance with the Constitution.

These constitutional provisions mean that, in cases where a court considering a case, after it has doubts over the compliance of a law applicable in the case with the Constitution or the compliance of another act adopted by the Seimas, the President of the Republic, or the Government with the Constitution or laws, applies to the Constitutional Court, the Constitutional Court has the duty to consider the petition of the said court regardless of whether or not the impugned law or another legal act is in force.

... the phrase “shall be grounds to adopt a decision to dismiss the instituted legal proceedings” used in ... the Law on the Constitutional Court must be interpreted as establishing the right for the Constitutional Court, while taking account of the circumstances of the case, to dismiss the instituted legal proceedings in cases where not courts, but other subjects specified in Article 106 of the Constitution have applied to the Constitutional Court; the aforementioned phrase must not be interpreted as stipulating that the instituted legal proceedings must be dismissed in every case where an impugned legal act is annulled.

The powers of the Constitutional Court to investigate the compliance of legal acts that are no longer in force with higher-ranking legal acts (Article 110 of the Constitution)

... if a petitioner – a court considering a case – applies to the Constitutional Court, requesting an investigation into and a decision on whether a legal act (part thereof) passed by the Seimas, the President of the Republic, or the Government or that adopted by referendum, where the said legal act is applicable in the case before that court, is in conflict with a higher-ranking legal act, inter alia (and, first of all), with the Constitution, and, if the Constitutional Court does not decide this question on the merits, the doubts of the said court about whether the respective law or another legal act (part thereof) is in conflict with a higher-ranking legal act, inter alia (and, first of all), with the Constitution, will not be removed and, if it applies such a law or another legal act (part thereof), the values, inter alia, the constitutional rights of a person, which are consolidated, defended, and protected by the Constitution, could be violated.

The same applies to such legal situations where an impugned law or another legal act (part thereof), which must be applied in a case before a court that has applied to the Constitutional Court with a petition, is no longer in force at the time when the respective constitutional justice case is under consideration (or at the time when its consideration is expected to take place) – it has been declared no longer valid (has been annulled or amended) or its validity has expired: if the Constitutional Court did not decide on the merits the question on the compliance of that law or another legal act (part thereof) with a higher-ranking legal act, inter alia (and, first of all), with the Constitution, the doubts faced by the court considering the said case about whether the aforesaid law or another legal act (part thereof) is in conformity with a higher-ranking legal act, inter alia (and, first of all), with the Constitution, would not be removed and, if the same law or another legal act (part thereof) that is no longer in force is applied in the course of adopting the respective court decision, the values, inter alia, the constitutional rights of a person, which are consolidated, defended, and protected by the Constitution, could be violated.

Thus, in every case where the Constitutional Court, after it receives the petition of a court of general jurisdiction or a specialised court (established under Paragraph 2 of Article 111 of the Constitution) requesting an investigation into and a decision on whether a legal act (part thereof) passed by the Seimas, the President of the Republic, or the Government or that adopted by referendum is in conflict with a higher-ranking legal act, inter alia (and, first of all), with the Constitution, refuses, under the Constitution and the Law on the Constitutional Court, to consider such a petition (thus, does not decide the respective question on the merits), a rationally argued decision must be adopted.

... in general, the Constitution does not prohibit the establishment of such a legal regulation in the Law on the Constitutional Court that, in cases where an impugned legal act (part thereof) is no longer in force – it has been declared no longer valid (has been annulled or amended) or its validity has expired, would allow the Constitutional Court, while taking account of all important circumstances, to refuse to investigate and decide, subsequent to the petition of petitioners (as mentioned before, petitioners are specified in Article 106 of the Constitution), whether a legal act (part thereof) passed by the Seimas, the President of the Republic, or the Government or that adopted by referendum is in conflict with a higher-ranking legal act, inter alia (and, first of all), with the Constitution and, in cases where, after the respective petition was received at the Constitutional Court, the preparation of the constitutional justice case has begun or the case has already been investigated at the hearing of Constitutional Court, would allow the Constitutional Court to dismiss the instituted legal proceedings (case).

However, it should be emphasised that, under the Constitution (inter alia, under Paragraph 1 of Article 110 of the Constitution, according to which judges may not apply any laws that are in conflict with the Constitution, and under Paragraph 2 of this article, according to which, in cases where there are grounds to believe that a law or another legal act that should be applied in a concrete case is in conflict with the Constitution, the judge must suspend the consideration of the case and must apply to the Constitutional Court, requesting that it decide whether the law or another legal act in question is in compliance with the Constitution), it is not allowed to establish any such a legal regulation whereby, in cases where the Constitutional Court receives a petition from precisely a court (which ... differs from other subjects specified in Article 106 of the Constitution, inter alia, because a court, if it faces doubts regarding the compliance of a legal act (part thereof) passed by the Seimas, the President of the Republic, or the Government or that adopted by referendum, where the said legal act is applicable in the case, with a higher-ranking legal act, inter alia (and, first of all), with the Constitution, not only may, but also must apply to the Constitutional Court) requesting an investigation into and a decision on whether a legal act (part thereof) passed by the Seimas, the President of the Republic, or the Government or that adopted by referendum is in conflict with a higher-ranking legal act, inter alia (and, first of all), with the Constitution and, if the Constitutional Court did not to decide this question on the merits (if it refused to consider the petition) specifically because the impugned legal act (part thereof) is no longer in force – it has been declared no longer valid (has been annulled or amended) or its validity has expired, the preconditions would be created for the court considering the respective case to apply such a law or another legal act (part thereof) whose compliance with the Constitution (another higher-ranking legal act), in the opinion of the said court, is doubtful; if the court applied such a law or another legal act (part thereof), the values, inter alia, the constitutional rights of a person, which are consolidated, defended, and protected by the Constitution, could be violated. Thus, it should be held that, under the Constitution, a court considering a case, which, under the Constitution, not only may, but also (if it has certain doubts) must apply to the Constitutional Court with a petition requesting a decision on whether the respective legal act (part thereof) passed by the Seimas, the President of the Republic, or the Government or that adopted by referendum is in conflict with a higher-ranking legal act, inter alia (and, first of all), with the Constitution, also has the constitutionally justifiable interest to receive the respective answer from the Constitutional Court and that such an answer will be given; a different interpretation of the respective provisions of the Constitution could create the preconditions for a court considering a case to apply such a law or another legal act (part thereof) whose compliance with the Constitution (with another higher-ranking legal act), in the opinion of the said court, is doubtful. Thus, the Constitution prohibits the establishment of any such a legal regulation in the Law on the Constitutional Court (or in any other law) that would allow the Constitutional Court, in cases where an impugned legal act (part thereof) passed by the Seimas, the President of the Republic, or the Government or that adopted by referendum is no longer in force – it has been declared no longer valid (has been annulled or amended) or its validity has expired, but it must be applied in the case before the court, to refuse to investigate and decide, subsequent to the petition of the said court, whether such a legal act (part thereof) passed by the Seimas, the President of the Republic, or the Government or that adopted by referendum is in conflict with the Constitution (with another higher-ranking legal act) specifically because that legal act (part thereof) is no longer in force – it has been declared no longer valid (has been annulled or amended) or its validity has expired and, in cases where the respective petition is received at the Constitutional Court and the preparation of the constitutional justice case has begun, or the case has already been investigated at the hearing of the Constitutional Court, would allow the Constitutional Court to dismiss the instituted legal proceedings (case).

... the official constitutional doctrine eventually consolidated the provision that, in cases where courts apply to the Constitutional Court after they, in the course of the administration of justice, have doubts about the compliance of lower-ranking legal acts with higher-ranking legal acts, inter alia (and, first of all), with the Constitution ... the Constitutional Court does not have the powers to dismiss the instituted legal proceedings (case) and must consider such a case; whereas in cases where other subjects specified in Article 106 of the Constitution apply to the Constitutional Court, the Constitutional Court is allowed, while taking account of the circumstances of a constitutional justice case under consideration, to dismiss or not to dismiss the instituted legal proceedings (case).

Dismissing legal proceedings where an impugned legal act is annulled

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 22 December 2011

As held by the Constitutional Court more than once, the phrase “shall be grounds ... to dismiss the instituted legal proceedings” should be interpreted as establishing the right of the Constitutional Court, in cases where not courts, but other subjects specified in Article 106 of the Constitution have applied to the Constitutional Court, to dismiss the instituted legal proceedings while taking account of the circumstances of the case (inter alia, the rulings of 19 January 2005 and 28 March 2006 and the decisions of 31 May 2006, 29 December 2006, 28 May 2007, 25 February 2008, and 14 December 2009); gradually ... in its jurisprudence, the Constitutional Court also made the interpretation that, in cases where not courts, but other subjects specified in Article 106 of the Constitution have applied to the Constitutional Court and where an impugned legal act (part thereof) is no longer in force – it has been declared no longer valid (has been annulled or amended) or its validity has expired, the Constitutional Court, while taking account of the circumstances of the case under consideration, has the powers to dismiss the instituted legal proceedings; however, the Constitutional Court is not obliged to dismiss the instituted legal proceedings in every case where an impugned legal act (part thereof) is no longer in force – it has been declared no longer valid (has been annulled or amended) or its validity has expired (ruling of 28 March 2006 and the decision of 8 August 2006).

It needs to be noted that the jurisprudence of the Constitutional Court has equated to invalid legal acts (parts thereof) such impugned legal acts (parts thereof) that, although were formally valid when the respective constitutional justice cases were under investigation, could not be applied because other legal acts (parts thereof) that were passed later and/or were higher-ranking legal acts that regulated the respective relationships differently from the impugned legal acts (parts thereof) had to be applied (ruling of 28 March 2006 and the decisions of 8 August 2006 and 13 November 2007). ... such legal acts (parts thereof) that are applied on a temporary basis and the term of the application of which and the relationships regulated by which have ended at the time of the consideration of the constitutional justice case, even though such acts (parts thereof) have not officially been declared invalid, may also be equated to invalid legal acts (parts thereof).

Thus, it needs to be noted that, in cases where not courts, but other subjects (inter alia, a group of not less than 1/5 of all the members of the Seimas) specified in Article 106 of the Constitution, apply to the Constitutional Court and where an impugned legal act (part thereof) should be equated to legal acts (parts thereof) that are no longer valid, since it is applied on a temporary basis and there is an established term of its application and the relationships regulated by it have ended, the Constitutional Court has the right to dismiss the instituted legal proceedings; however, the Constitutional Court is not obliged to do so in every situation. When deciding whether to dismiss the instituted legal proceedings, the Constitutional Court must take account of the circumstances of the case before it.

The powers of the Constitutional Court to decide on an investigation into the constitutionality of a legal act that is no longer applicable

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 29 June 2012

In its decision of 13 November 2007, the Constitutional Court held that the application of a court to the Constitutional Court with a petition requesting an investigation into the compliance of a legal act with a higher-ranking legal act, inter alia, with the Constitution, and an investigation into that compliance are not an objective in itself; the purpose of the application (as a constitutional institution) of a court to the Constitutional Court is to ensure the administration of justice. In the same decision, it was also held that, even in such situations where courts apply to the Constitutional Court after they, in the course of the administration of justice, have doubts regarding the conformity of a lower-ranking legal act with higher-ranking legal acts, inter alia (and, first of all), with the Constitution, the Constitutional Court is not obliged to consider a case where the respective legal act is not only invalid (since the compliance of invalid legal acts with higher-ranking legal acts may be investigated and is normally investigated), but is also not applicable at all (i.e. it does not apply in general and not solely in the case under consideration by the respective court that has applied to the Constitutional Court with the respective petition). In addition, this circumstance must always be assessed when a law on the state budget and on municipal budgets or any other act intended for a specific budget period is impugned.

Moreover, in the said decision, the Constitutional Court held that every law on the state budget and on municipal budgets is a law of time-limited validity and time-limited application; the financing of the administrators of allocations from the funds of the state budget and municipal budgets is completed once the given budget year ends, i.e. on the 31st of December of that year; after this date, the law on the state budget and on municipal budgets may not be applied at all, inter alia – it needs to be particularly emphasised – after the said date, the transfer of allocations of the previous budget year to any administrator of allocations is impossible in such a way that would create the impression that the said transfer was made in the previous budget year, since a new budget year has started; therefore, even if it were established that the impugned legal regulation was in conflict with the Constitution, no intervention of the law-making subjects (Seimas and the Government, respectively) into that legal regulation is possible, since the respective legal acts were intended for the regulation of the relationships that are over and, thus, they no longer exist; such an intervention would be meaningless and irrational, since this would mean that the respective law-making subjects try to regulate the past; consequently, this would mean that they attempt to change the past.

The powers of the Constitutional Court to decide on an investigation into the constitutionality of a legal act that is no longer applicable

In its ruling of 22 December 2011, the Constitutional Court noted that, in cases where not courts, but other subjects (inter alia, a group of not less than 1/5 of all the members of the Seimas) specified in Article 106 of the Constitution, apply to the Constitutional Court and where an impugned legal act (part thereof) should be equated to legal acts (parts thereof) that are no longer valid, since the impugned legal act (part thereof) is applied on a temporary basis and the relationships regulated by it have ended, even though this act (part thereof) is not recognised invalid officially, the Constitutional Court has the right to dismiss the instituted legal proceedings; however, the Constitutional Court is not obliged to do so in every situation. When deciding whether to dismiss the instituted legal proceedings, the Constitutional Court must take account of the circumstances of the case before it.

Thus, when a certain legal act is not only invalid, but also must not be applied at all, the Constitutional Court has the discretion to decide on an investigation into the constitutionality of such a legal act. When doing so, it must assess not only whether this law is intended for a certain budgetary period, but also other important circumstances, inter alia, whether such an investigation could be significant for the adoption of the budget laws of the subsequent year.

The duty of the Constitutional Court to examine the petition of a person referred to in Paragraph 4 (wording of 21 March 2019) of Article 106 of the Constitution, regardless of whether the impugned legal act is in force

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 25 November 2019

The Constitutional Court has held on more than one occasion that the wording “shall be grounds ... to dismiss the instituted legal proceedings” of Paragraph 4 (wording of 11 July 1996) of Article 69 of the Law on the Constitutional Court should be interpreted as establishing that, in cases where not courts, but other subjects specified in Article 106 of the Constitution, have applied to the Constitutional Court and the impugned legal act (part thereof) is no longer in force, i.e. it has been declared no longer valid (has been annulled or amended) or its validity has expired, the Constitutional Court, taking account of the circumstances of the case under consideration, has the right to dismiss the instituted legal proceedings (inter alia, the rulings of 28 March 2006 and 2 May 2012 and the decision of 7 October 2014), and it should not be interpreted as establishing that, in every case where the impugned legal act (part thereof) has been annulled, the instituted legal proceedings must be dismissed (inter alia, the rulings of 21 August 2002 and 28 March 2006).

The Constitutional Court has also held that the official constitutional doctrine concerning the admissibility of the petitions received at the Constitutional Court, according to which the Constitutional Court also has the powers to investigate the compliance of laws and other legal acts (parts thereof) that are no longer in force with the Constitution (other higher-ranking legal acts), has been developed “upon the differentiation of the subjects that are specified in Article 106 of the Constitution and have the powers to apply to the Constitutional Court: the official constitutional doctrine eventually consolidated the provision that, in cases where courts apply to the Constitutional Court after they, in the course of the administration of justice, have faced doubts about the compliance of lower-ranking legal acts with higher-ranking legal acts, inter alia (and, first of all), with the Constitution, under the Law on the Constitutional Court (inter alia, Paragraph 4 (wording of 11 July 1996) of Article 69 thereof), the Constitutional Court does not have the powers to dismiss the instituted legal proceedings (case) and must consider such a case; whereas in cases where other subjects specified in Article 106 of the Constitution apply to the Constitutional Court, the Constitutional Court is allowed, taking account of the circumstances of the constitutional justice case under consideration, to dismiss or not to dismiss the instituted legal proceedings (case)” (ruling of 28 March 2006).

In this context, it should be emphasised that, in the jurisprudence of the Constitutional Court, the provisions of the official constitutional doctrine consolidating the powers of the Constitutional Court to investigate the compliance of laws and other legal acts (parts thereof) that are no longer in force with the Constitution (other higher-ranking legal acts) were formulated in the rulings or decisions of the Constitutional Court adopted before 1 September 2019, when the Law Amending Articles 106 and 107 of the Constitution of the Republic of Lithuania, adopted by the Seimas on 21 March 2019, entered into force. Article 1 of this law supplemented Article 106 of the Constitution with the new Paragraph 4, establishing that every person has the right to apply to the Constitutional Court concerning the legal acts specified in Paragraphs 1 and 2 of Article 105 of the Constitution if a decision adopted on the basis of these acts has violated the constitutional rights or freedoms of the person and the person has exhausted all legal remedies; the procedure for the implementation of this right is established by the Law on the Constitutional Court. Article 2 of the Law Amending Articles 106 and 107 of the Constitution supplemented Article 107 of the Constitution with the new Paragraph 3, establishing that, in the case heard subsequent to the application by a person referred to in Paragraph 4 of Article 106 of the Constitution, the decision adopted by the Constitutional Court that a law (or part thereof) or another act (or part thereof) of the Seimas, an act of the President of the Republic, or an act (or part thereof) of the Government is in conflict with the Constitution constitutes a basis for renewing, according to the procedure established by law, the proceedings concerning the implementation of the violated constitutional rights or freedoms of that person.

Thus, as of 1 September 2019, the Law Amending Articles 106 and 107 of the Constitution consolidated the institution of individual constitutional complaints in the Constitution: in defence of his/her constitutional rights or freedoms, every person has the right to apply to the Constitutional Court requesting it to investigate whether legal acts whose review falls within the competence of the Constitutional Court are in compliance with the Constitution (another higher-ranking act) if a decision adopted on the basis of these legal acts has possibly violated the constitutional rights or freedoms of the person (Paragraph 4 (wording of 21 March 2019) of Article 106 of the Constitution); the right to apply to the Constitutional Court is implemented after the person has exhausted all legal remedies and in accordance with the other conditions established in the Law on the Constitutional Court (Paragraph 4 (wording of 21 March 2019) of Article 106 of the Constitution), inter alia, within the time limit set by this law; in the constitutional justice case heard subsequent to the application by the person referred to above, the decision of the Constitutional Court that the respective legal act (part thereof) is in conflict with the Constitution (another higher-ranking act) constitutes a basis for renewing, according to the procedure established by law, the proceedings in order to defend the constitutional rights or freedoms of the said person (Paragraph 3 (wording of 21 March 2019) of Article 107 of the Constitution).

It should be emphasised that the consolidation of the institution of individual constitutional complaints in the Constitution is not an objective in itself. It is aimed at enabling the effective protection of those constitutional rights or freedoms of a person that could be violated by decisions adopted on the basis of legal acts (parts thereof) contrary to the Constitution. In this context, it should be noted that, under Paragraph 2 of Article 6 of the Constitution, everyone may defend his/her rights by invoking the Constitution. In its ruling of 12 April 2001, the Constitutional Court held that, according to the Constitution, the possibility of defending the violated rights must be real. In view of this, the basis provided for in Paragraph 3 (wording of 21 March 2019) of Article 107 of the Constitution for renewing the respective proceedings in order to defend the constitutional rights or freedoms of a person referred to in Paragraph 4 (wording of 21 March 2019) of Article 106 of the Constitution – a decision of the Constitutional Court that a law (or part thereof) or another act (or part thereof) of the Seimas, an act of the President of the Republic, or an act (or part thereof) of the Government is in conflict with the Constitution – is necessary so that, in the exercise of the right, consolidated in Paragraph 1 of Article 30 of the Constitution, of a person whose constitutional rights or freedoms have been violated to apply to a court, a decision adopted on the basis of a legal act (part thereof) contrary to the Constitution would be reviewed with the aim of removing the violation of the constitutional rights or freedoms of the person and/or compensating the person for the damage caused as a result of this violation.

Having consolidated, by means of the provisions of Paragraph 4 (wording of 21 March 2019) of Article 106 and Paragraph 3 (wording of 21 March 2019) of Article 107 of the Constitution, the institution of individual constitutional complaints, the formerly formulated official constitutional doctrine consolidating the powers of the Constitutional Court to investigate also the compliance of laws and other legal acts (parts thereof) that are no longer in force with the Constitution (other higher-ranking legal acts) has been developed in the jurisprudence of the Constitutional Court by taking into account that also the persons referred to in Paragraph 4 (wording of 21 March 2019) of Article 106 of the Constitution may apply to the Constitutional Court concerning the legal acts specified in Paragraphs 1 and 2 of Article 105 of the Constitution.

In view of this, it should be noted that, if a person referred to in Paragraph 4 (wording of 21 March 2019) of Article 106 of the Constitution has applied to the Constitutional Court with a request to investigate the constitutionality of the legal act (part thereof) that served as a basis for adopting a decision that could violate the constitutional rights or freedoms of the person and if the Constitutional Court does not decide this question on the merits in cases where the impugned law or another legal act is no longer in force, i.e. it has been declared no longer valid (has been annulled or amended) or its validity has expired, this would prevent such a person from defending his/her violated constitutional rights or freedoms; at the same time, other values consolidated, defended, and protected by the Constitution could also be violated. The interpretation of the Constitution that, purportedly, the Constitutional Court has the right, taking into account the circumstances of the case under consideration, to dismiss the instituted proceedings (case) where a person referred to in Paragraph 4 of Article 106 of the Constitution has applied to the Constitutional Court and the impugned legal act (part thereof) is no longer in force, i.e. it has been declared no longer valid (has been annulled or amended) or its validity has expired, would be incompatible with the purpose of the institution of individual constitutional complaints to enable the effective protection of the constitutional rights or freedoms of a person that have possibly been violated by a decision adopted on the basis of legal acts (parts thereof) contrary to the Constitution.

Consequently, in cases where a person referred to in Paragraph 4 (wording of 21 March 2019) of Article 106 of the Constitution, after having exhausted all legal remedies and in accordance with the other conditions established in the Law on the Constitutional Court, applies to the Constitutional Court requesting it to investigate whether a law (part thereof) or another legal act (part thereof) is in compliance with the Constitution (another higher-ranking legal act) if a decision adopted on the basis of this law (part thereof) or another legal act (part thereof) could violate the constitutional rights or freedoms of the person, the Constitutional Court has the duty to examine the petition of this person, irrespective of whether the impugned law or another legal act is or is not in force at the time of considering the respective constitutional justice case.

Thus, the wording “shall be grounds ... to dismiss the instituted legal proceedings” of Paragraph 4 (wording of 11 July 1996) of Article 69 of the Law on the Constitutional Court should be interpreted as establishing that, in cases where not courts and not the persons referred to in Paragraph 4 (wording of 21 March 2019) of Article 106 of the Constitution, but other subjects specified in Article 106 of the Constitution, have applied to the Constitutional Court and the impugned legal act (part thereof) is no longer in force, i.e. it has been declared no longer valid (has been annulled or amended) or its validity has expired, the Constitutional Court, taking account of the circumstances of the case under consideration, has the right to dismiss the instituted legal proceedings, and it should not be interpreted as establishing that, in every case where the impugned legal act (part thereof) has been annulled, the instituted legal proceedings must be dismissed.

The duty of the Constitutional Court to examine an impugned legal act (part thereof) that is no longer in force

The Constitutional Court’s ruling of 25 November 2019

... in the exercise of its constitutional powers, under Paragraph 4 (wording of 11 July 1996) of Article 69 of the Law on the Constitutional Court, in cases where not courts and not the persons referred to in Paragraph 4 (wording of 21 March 2019) of Article 106 of the Constitution, but other subjects specified in Article 106 of the Constitution, have applied to the Constitutional Court and the impugned legal act (part thereof) is no longer in force, i.e. it has been declared no longer valid (has been annulled or amended or its validity has expired), taking into account the circumstances of the constitutional justice case under consideration and having held that, if the constitutional justice case under consideration is not solved on its merits, this could lead to the preconditions for violating the values consolidated, defended, and protected by the Constitution, inter alia, a public interest defended by the Constitution, the Constitutional Court may not dismiss the instituted proceedings (case).

8.4. THE FOUNDATIONS OF LEGAL PROCEEDINGS AT THE CONSTITUTIONAL COURT

8.4.1. The subjects that have the powers to apply to the Constitutional Court and the requirements for petitions

Application by a group of members of the Seimas to the Constitutional Court; the withdrawal of the signatures of the members of the Seimas from a petition

The Constitutional Court’s decision of 15 December 2004

Under Article 106 of the Constitution, not less than 1/5 of all the members of the Seimas have the right to apply to the Constitutional Court. ... This means that a petition must be signed by not less than 29 members of the Seimas (decision of 26 August 1993). The will of the members of the Seimas to apply to the Constitutional Court must be expressed clearly and unambiguously (decision of 24 April 2002). If a petition to the Constitutional Court is submitted by a group of less than 29 members of the Seimas, it must be held that the subject that is established in the Constitution and is allowed to file a petition ... is absent.

If the Constitutional Court granted the request of the members of the Seimas who withdrew their signatures from the petition received at the Constitutional Court ... (and requesting an investigation into the compliance of the impugned provision ... with the Constitution) to adopt the decision to refuse to consider the said ... petition of the group of members of the Seimas, then the Constitutional Court would, in principle, deny the already implemented right of the group of members of the Seimas, i.e. a subject that has the right, under the Constitution ... to apply to the Constitutional Court with a petition requesting an investigation into whether a legal act is in conflict with the Constitution. Thus, the Constitutional Court would deny the legitimate expectation of the other ... members of the Seimas who signed the aforesaid petition ... of the group of members of the Seimas that their already implemented right to apply, together with other members of the Seimas, to the Constitutional Court requesting an investigation into the compliance of a legal act with the Constitution will not be denied after their joint petition is received at the Constitutional Court and the procedural actions, indicated in the Law on the Constitutional Court and the Rules of the Constitutional Court, are commenced.

The duty of administrative courts that assess the compliance of legal acts with higher-ranking legal acts to verify whether such higher-ranking legal acts themselves are in conformity with legal acts of even a higher level

... at present, such a legal regulation is established [by means of] laws whereby a decision on the compliance of legal acts passed by other law-making subjects (thus, not those passed by the Seimas, the President of the Republic, or the Government and not those adopted by referendum) with higher-ranking legal acts, inter alia (and, first of all), with the Constitution, is assigned to the jurisdiction of administrative courts. ...

... an investigation into whether legal acts (parts thereof) passed by other law-making subjects (thus, not those passed by the Seimas, the President of the Republic, or the Government and not those adopted by referendum) are in conflict with higher-ranking legal acts, inter alia (and, first of all), with the Constitution, and the adoption of the respective decisions imply the necessity for an administrative court that decides a case to ascertain whether those higher-ranking legal acts (parts thereof) themselves are in conformity with legal acts of an even higher level, inter alia (and, first of all), with the Constitution, and, if there are doubts, to take measures provided for in the Constitution and laws in order to remove the said doubts, certainly, without interfering with the powers assigned to the Constitutional Court. If this were not done, there would be the risk to adopt such a decision that would not be a just one, i.e. to apply a certain legal act (part thereof) based on such a higher-ranking legal act that would be declared in conflict with a legal act of an even higher level, or even with the Constitution itself, if a proper investigation were carried out, or not to apply a certain legal act (part thereof) declared in conflict with a higher-ranking legal act by the administrative court, even though that higher-ranking legal act would have to be declared in conflict with a legal act of an even higher level, or even with the Constitution itself, if a proper investigation were carried out. If this happened, the preconditions would be created for violating the values (inter alia, the constitutional rights of a person) that are consolidated, protected, and defended by the Constitution.

In this respect, an investigation, assigned [by means of laws] to the jurisdiction of administrative courts, into the compliance of legal acts (parts thereof) passed by other law-making subjects (thus, not those passed by the Seimas, the President of the Republic, or the Government or not those adopted by referendum) with higher-ranking legal acts, except the Constitution itself, implies the initiation of the respective constitutional justice case at the Constitutional Court and, thus, also the duty of administrative courts to apply in such cases to the Constitutional Court with the respective petition if an administrative court has doubts about the conformity of that higher-ranking legal act (part thereof) passed by the Seimas, the President of the Republic, or the Government or that adopted by referendum with a legal act of an even higher level, inter alia (and, first of all), with the Constitution.

The right of a party to a case to request the court that considers the case to apply to the Constitutional Court

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 28 March 2006

Interpreting Paragraph 2 of Article 6 and Paragraph 1 of Article 30 of the Constitution in the context of Paragraph 1 of Article 109 and Article 110 of the Constitution, as well as in the context of the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law, it needs to be noted that the right of each person to defend his/her rights on the basis of the Constitution and the right of a person whose constitutional rights or freedoms are violated to apply to a court also imply that each party of a case considered by a court, when such a party has doubts over the compliance of a law or another legal act (part thereof) with the Constitution (with another higher-ranking legal act), where such a law or another legal act (part thereof) may be applied in that case and where an investigation into the compliance of which with the Constitution (with another higher-ranking legal act) falls under the jurisdiction of the Constitutional Court (i.e. when such a party doubts the compliance of a certain act (part thereof) of the Seimas, the President of the Republic, or the Government or an act (part thereof) adopted by referendum with the Constitution (with another higher-ranking legal act)), has the right to apply to a court of general jurisdiction or a specialised court (established under Paragraph 2 of Article 111 of the Constitution) that considers the respective case, requesting such a court to suspend the consideration of the case and to apply to the Constitutional Court with the petition to investigate and to decide whether the legal act (part thereof) that was passed by the Seimas, the President of the Republic, or the Government or adopted by referendum and is applicable in the same case is in conflict with a higher-ranking legal act, inter alia (and, first of all), with the Constitution.

The duty of courts to provide arguments in cases where they decide to apply or not to apply (despite the request of a party to the case) to the Constitutional Court

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 28 March 2006

In its ruling of 16 January 2006, the Constitutional Court held the following: the constitutional imperatives that only courts administer justice, that law must be public, as well as the requirement arising out of the Constitution to consider a case in a fair manner, also imply that every final court act must be based on legal arguments (reasoning); the argumentation must be rational; the legal clarity requirement, which arises out of the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law, means, inter alia, that a final court act must not contain any concealed arguments or any non-specified circumstances that are important for adopting a fair final court act; final court acts must be clear for both persons participating in a case and other persons.

The said requirements on the argumentation of court decisions are also applicable to decisions adopted by courts of general jurisdiction or by specialised courts (established under Paragraph 2 of Article 111 of the Constitution) to apply or (even though this is requested by a party in a case considered by that court) not to apply to the Constitutional Court with a petition requesting an investigation into and a decision on whether a legal act (part thereof) passed by the Seimas, the President of the Republic, or the Government or that adopted by referendum, where the said legal act (part thereof) must be applied in the said case, is in conflict with a higher-ranking legal act (inter alia (and, first of all), with the Constitution).

The particularities of application by courts to the Constitutional Court

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 28 March 2006

... application by courts (those of general jurisdiction and specialised ones) to the Constitutional Court, compared with application to the Constitutional Court by other subjects specified in Article 106 of the Constitution, with a petition requesting an investigation into and a decision on whether a legal act (part thereof) passed by the Seimas, the President of the Republic, or the Government or that adopted by referendum is in conflict with a higher-ranking legal act, inter alia (and, first of all), with the Constitution, shows that application by courts is also special because courts, having doubted about the compliance of a legal act (part thereof) passed by the Seimas, the President of the Republic, or the Government or that adopted by referendum with a higher-ranking legal act, inter alia (and, first of all), with the Constitution, not only may, but also must apply to the Constitutional Court.

In this context, it should be noted that, under the Constitution, a court of general jurisdiction or a specialised court (established under Paragraph 2 of Article 111 of the Constitution) may apply to the Constitutional Court with a petition requesting an investigation into, and an a decision on whether not any constitutional law (part thereof) is in conflict with the Constitution, but only such a constitutional law that must be applied in the respective case under consideration by that court, also whether not any law (part thereof) (as well as the Statute of the Seimas (part thereof)) is in conflict with the Constitution and constitutional laws, but only the one that must be applied in the respective case under consideration by that court, also whether not any statutory legal act (part thereof) of the Seimas is in conflict with the Constitution, constitutional laws, laws, as well as the Statute of the Seimas, but only the one that must be applied in the respective case under consideration by that court, also whether not any act of the President of the Republic is in conflict with the Constitution, constitutional laws, and laws, but only the one that must be applied in the respective case under consideration by that court, as well as whether not any act (part thereof) of the Government is in conflict with the Constitution, constitutional laws, and laws, but only the one that must be applied in the respective case under consideration by that court.

It should be noted that the Constitution does not tolerate any such situations where a certain court that, in a case considered by it, must apply a legal act (part thereof) concerning the compliance of which with a higher-ranking legal act, inter alia (and, first of all), with the Constitution, another petitioner (for example, another court) has already applied to the Constitutional Court, neither (if it doubts the compliance of the said legal act (part thereof) with a higher-ranking legal act, inter alia (and, first of all), with the Constitution) suspends the consideration of the respective case and applies to the Constitutional Court in order that these doubts would be removed nor (if it doubts the compliance of the said legal act (part thereof) with a higher-ranking legal act, inter alia (and, first of all), with the Constitution) applies this legal act (part thereof), but when it has the information that another petitioner (for example, another court) has already applied to the Constitutional Court concerning the compliance of that legal act (part thereof) with a higher-ranking legal act, inter alia (and, first of all), with the Constitution, suspends the consideration of the case and does not decide the case on the merits before the Constitutional Court completes the consideration of the respective case following the petition of the said another petitioner.

The right of courts to apply to the Constitutional Court (locus standi) (Paragraph 2 of Article 110 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's decision of 22 May 2007

Under Paragraph 2 of Article 110 of the Constitution, in cases when there are grounds to believe that a law or another legal act that should be applied in a concrete case is in conflict with the Constitution, the judge must suspend the consideration of the case and must apply to the Constitutional Court, requesting that it decide whether the law or another legal act in question is in compliance with the Constitution.

Consequently, under the Constitution ... a court may apply to the Constitutional Court with a petition requesting an investigation into whether not any law (part thereof) or any other legal act (part thereof) is in conflict with the Constitution, but only such a law (part thereof) or another legal act (part thereof) that must be applied in the case considered by that court.

Thus, under the Constitution ... a court does not have the locus standi to apply to the Constitutional Court with a petition requesting an investigation into whether such a law (part thereof) or another legal act (part thereof) that must not be applied in the case considered by that court is in conflict with the Constitution.

In addition, if a court applies to the Constitutional Court with a petition requesting an investigation into whether such a law (part thereof) or another legal act (part thereof) that should/could not be applied in the case considered by that court is in conflict with the Constitution (thus, when the court does not have a locus standi), the Constitutional Court must decide, while taking account of the entirety of the arguments substantiating such a petition, whether the reasoning of the said petition is legal.

The duty of a court, if it has doubts, to apply to the Constitutional Court concerning the constitutionality of a legal act applicable in a case before that court (Paragraph 2 of Article 110 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 24 October 2007

The powers of courts to suspend the consideration of a case and apply to the Constitutional Court with a petition requesting an investigation into the compliance of a legal act with the Constitution are expressis verbis consolidated in the Constitution: Paragraph 2 of Article 110 of the Constitution prescribes that, in cases when there are grounds to believe that a law or another legal act that should be applied in a concrete case is in conflict with the Constitution, the judge must suspend the consideration of the case and must apply to the Constitutional Court, requesting that it decide whether the law or another legal act in question is in compliance with the Constitution.

... the following provisions of the official constitutional doctrine should be mentioned ... in which Article 110 of the Constitution is interpreted by relating it to other provisions of the Constitution, inter alia, to the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law and to the provisions of the Constitution regarding specialised (administrative) courts:

- one of the essential elements of the principle of a state under the rule of law, which is consolidated in the Constitution, is the principle that any legal act that is in conflict with a higher-ranking legal act must not be applied;

- upon establishing, in Article 110 of the Constitution, both the prohibition on applying a law that is in conflict with the Constitution and the duty of a court considering a case, in the event of doubts whether a law or another legal act applicable in the case is in conflict with the Constitution, to suspend the consideration of the case and apply to the Constitutional Court, requesting it to decide whether the law or another legal act in question is in compliance with the Constitution, attempts are made to ensure that a legal act (part thereof) that is in conflict with the Constitution would not be applied, that no anticonstitutional legal effects would appear due to the application of the said legal act (part thereof), and that no rights of a person would be violated, and that a person in whose regard a legal act inconsistent with the Constitution or the law has been applied would not, due to that, unreasonably acquire any rights or a certain legal status that does not belong to him/her;

- in cases where a court that considers a case faces doubts whether a law (another legal act) applicable in the case is in conflict with the Constitution, it must apply to the Constitutional Court and request it to decide whether this law (other legal act) is in compliance with the Constitution and, until the Constitutional Court decides this issue, the consideration of the case in that court must not be continued, i.e. it must be suspended ...

- a legal regulation established by the legislature must be such that would ensure access for the Constitutional Court to a suspended case that contains information about the circumstances due to which an impugned legal act must be applied in the said case; only in this way the necessary conditions can be created in order that the Constitutional Court might administer constitutional justice and decide whether a law or another legal act that must be applied in the case considered by that court is in conflict with the Constitution (or whether a substatutory legal act of the Seimas, an act of the President of the Republic, or an act of the Government is in conflict with the Constitution and/or laws);

- if a court, after it has faced doubts about the compliance of a law applicable in a case with the Constitution, did not suspend the consideration of the case and did not apply to the Constitutional Court so that those doubts could be removed and, if the legal act the compliance of which with the Constitution is doubtful were applied in the case, the court would take the risk of adopting such a decision that would not be a just one;

- under the Constitution, the Constitutional Court decides on the compliance of not all legal acts (parts thereof) with the Constitution (other higher-ranking legal acts), but only whether legal acts (part thereof) passed by the Seimas, the President of the Republic, or the Government or adopted by referendum are in conflict with a higher-ranking legal act, inter alia (and, first of all), with the Constitution;

- under the Constitution, such legal situations are impermissible where it would not be possible to verify in a court whether legal acts (parts thereof), inter alia, legal acts issued by ministers, other lower-ranking legal acts, as well as legal acts issued by municipalities, the control of which as regards their compliance with the Constitution does not fall within the jurisdiction of the Constitutional Court, are in conflict with the Constitution and laws;

- at present, such a legal regulation is established [by means of] laws whereby a decision on the compliance of legal acts passed by other law-making subjects (thus, not those passed by the Seimas, the President of the Republic, or the Government and not those adopted by referendum) with higher-ranking legal acts, inter alia (and, first of all), with the Constitution, is assigned to the jurisdiction of administrative courts; if an administrative court rules such a legal act to be in conflict with the Constitution (another higher-ranking legal act), then, under the Constitution and laws, such a decision of the said court has erga omnes impact on the whole practice of the application of the respective legal acts (parts thereof) ...

Requirements for court petitions filed with the Constitutional Court

... The requirements (inter alia, regarding the argumentation, clarity, and comprehensiveness of court decisions) for court final acts are also applicable to decisions adopted by courts of general jurisdiction or by specialised courts (established under Paragraph 2 of Article 111 of the Constitution) to apply or (even though this is requested by a party in a case considered by that court) not to apply to the Constitutional Court with a petition requesting an investigation into and a decision on whether a legal act (part thereof) passed by the Seimas, the President of the Republic, or the Government or that adopted by referendum, where the said legal act (part thereof) must be applied in the said case, is in conflict with a higher-ranking legal act, inter alia (and, first of all), with the Constitution (rulings of 28 March 2006 and 5 July 2007).

... as the Constitutional Court has held in its acts, courts that apply to the Constitutional Court with a petition requesting an investigation into whether a law or another legal act (part thereof) is in conflict with the Constitution, when providing arguments in support of their opinion, expressed in their petition, on the conflict of a law or another legal act (part thereof) with the Constitution, may not limit themselves to general reasoning or general statements, or to the statement that the law or another legal act (part thereof), in their opinion, is in conflict with the Constitution; courts must clearly indicate which impugned articles (paragraphs, items thereof) of legal acts and to what extent, in their opinion, are in conflict with the Constitution, and must substantiate their position on the non-compliance of every impugned provision of the respective legal act (part thereof) by clearly formulated legal arguments (rulings of 12 December 2005, 16 January 2006, and 17 January 2006 and the decisions of 17 January 2006, 5 July 2007, 6 September 2007, and 12 September 2007).

The right of courts to apply to the Constitutional Court (locus standi)

The Constitutional Court's decision of 13 November 2007

... a court that applies to the Constitutional Court with a petition must always have a locus standi. For instance, under the Constitution ... a court has the locus standi to apply to the Constitutional Court with a petition requesting an investigation into the constitutionality of such a law (part thereof) or another legal act (part thereof) that should (could) be applied in a case under consideration in that court, or such a law (part thereof) or another legal act (part thereof) that is not directly intended for the regulation of those relationships regarding which a decision must be adopted in the respective case, but the fact that account is taken of this law or another legal act (part thereof), in the opinion of the court, does not permit the administration of justice in the respective case (ruling of 28 March 2006 and the decisions of 22 May 2007, 27 June 2007, and 5 July 2007).

Requirements for petitions filed with the Constitutional Court

The Constitutional Court's decision of 29 October 2009

... as held by the Constitutional Court, the position of a petitioner concerning the compliance of a legal act (part thereof) with the Constitution in view of the content of norms and/or the scope of regulation must be indicated clearly and unambiguously, the petition must contain the arguments and reasoning substantiating the doubt of the petitioner that the legal act (part thereof) is in conflict with the Constitution. A petition requesting an investigation into the compliance of a legal act (part thereof) with the Constitution according to the content of norms and/or the scope of regulation must also clearly indicate the legal arguments substantiating the doubt of the petitioner as regards every concretely indicated article (part thereof) or item of an impugned legal act the compliance of which with the concretely indicated provision of the Constitution is doubtful for the petitioner (decision of 16 April 2004, the ruling of 12 December 2005, the decisions of 14 March 2006 (case no 14/03) and 29 March 2006, and the ruling of 20 December 2007).

Application by a court to the Constitutional Court with a petition requesting the interpretation of a final act adopted by the Constitutional Court

See 8.5. Acts adopted by the Constitutional Court, 8.5.4. The interpretation of acts adopted by the Constitutional Court, the decision of 22 April 2010 ("The interpretation of final acts adopted by the Constitutional Court where this is necessary so that such acts would be properly invoked in the administration of justice").

The purpose of application by a court to the Constitutional Court is to ensure that justice will be administered

The Constitutional Court's decision of 27 August 2013

... the application by a court to the Constitutional Court with a petition for an investigation into the compliance of a legal act with a higher-ranking legal act, inter alia, with the Constitution, as well as an investigation into the said compliance, is not an objective in itself; the purpose of the application (as a constitutional institution) by a court to the Constitutional Court is to ensure the administration of justice (decision of 13 November 2007 and the rulings of 2 September 2011 and 29 June 2012).

A resolution of the Seimas to apply to the Constitutional Court must be adopted in accordance with the rules for adopting legal acts, as laid down in the Statute of the Seimas

The Constitutional Court's decision of 30 December 2015

... as held in the Constitutional Court's ruling of 20 February 2013, not only laws, but also substatutory legal acts of the Seimas must be adopted in compliance with the rules for adopting legal acts, as established in the Statute of the Seimas. The same also applies to resolutions of the Seimas to apply to the Constitutional Court with a petition requesting an investigation of legal acts with the Constitution or another higher-ranking legal act.

The right of courts to apply to the Constitutional Court (locus standi) (Paragraph 2 of Article 110 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's decision of 7 July 2016

Under Paragraph 2 of Article 110 of the Constitution, in cases when there are grounds to believe that a law or another legal act that should be applied in a concrete case is in conflict with the Constitution, the judge must suspend the consideration of the case and must apply to the Constitutional Court, requesting that it decide whether the law or another legal act in question is in compliance with the Constitution.

Under the Constitution, a court may apply to the Constitutional Court with a petition requesting an investigation into whether not any law (part thereof) or any other legal act (part thereof) is in conflict with the Constitution, but only such a law (part thereof) or another legal act (part thereof) that must be applied in the case considered by that court (decision of 27 June 2007). Under the Constitution, a court does not have the locus standi to apply to the Constitutional Court with a petition requesting an investigation into whether such a law (part thereof) or another legal act (part thereof) that must not be applied in the case considered by that court is in conflict with the Constitution (inter alia, the decisions of 22 May 2007 and 27 June 2007).

In this context, it should be noted that the provision that, under the Constitution, no court has the locus standi to apply to the Constitutional Court with a petition requesting an investigation into whether such a law (part thereof) or another legal act (part thereof) that should (could) not be applied in a case considered by the said court is in conflict with the Constitution also means that a court may not apply to the Constitutional Court with a petition requesting an investigation into the constitutionality of a legal regulation in situations where this is not required for the consideration of a concrete case.

The examination of factual circumstances on which an individual substatutory legal act is based falls within the competence of the court applying to the Constitutional Court concerning the assessment of the constitutionality of that legal act

The Constitutional Court's decision of 23 January 2019

... the examination of factual circumstances and data that form the basis for individual substatutory legal acts, as well as the assessment of the reasonableness and sufficiency of data, primarily falls within the competence of courts that consider the respective cases (inter alia, the rulings of 13 August 2007 and 2 March 2018).

A person referred to in Paragraph 4 (wording of 21 March 2019) of Article 106 of the Constitution does not have the right to apply to the Constitutional Court if the person seeks to defend the constitutional rights or freedoms of another person (other persons)

The Constitutional Court's decision (no KT33-A-S22/2019) of 16 October 2019

Paragraph 4 (wording of 21 March 2019) of Article 106 of the Constitution provides that every person has the right to apply to the Constitutional Court concerning the legal acts specified in Paragraphs 1 and 2 of Article 105 of the Constitution if a decision adopted on the basis of these acts has violated the constitutional rights or freedoms of the person and the person has exhausted all legal remedies.

Thus, under Paragraph 4 of Article 106 of the Constitution, only such a person whose constitutional rights or freedoms have possibly been violated by a decision adopted on the basis of the acts specified in Paragraphs 1 and 2 of Article 105 of the Constitution has the right to apply to the Constitutional Court; under Paragraph 4 (wording of 21 March 2019) of Article 106 of the Constitution, a person does not have the right to apply to the Constitutional Court if the person seeks to defend the constitutional rights or freedoms of another person (other persons).

Having failed to exhaust all remedies provided for by law for defending constitutional rights or freedoms and being no longer able to exhaust them, a person referred to in Paragraph 4 (wording of 21 March 2019) of Article 106 of the Constitution has no right to apply to the Constitutional Court

Under Paragraph 4 (wording of 21 March 2019) of Article 106 of the Constitution, every person has the right to apply to the Constitutional Court concerning the legal acts specified in Paragraphs 1 and 2 of Article 105 of the Constitution if a decision adopted on the basis of these acts has violated the constitutional rights or freedoms of the person and the person has exhausted all legal remedies; the procedure for the implementation of this right is established by the Law on the Constitutional Court.

Paragraph 2 of Article 65 (wording of 16 July 2019) of the Law on the Constitutional Court provides that a person has the right to file a petition with the Constitutional Court for an investigation into the compliance of laws or other acts of the Seimas, the acts of the President of the Republic, or the acts of the Government with the Constitution or laws if: (1) a decision adopted on the basis of these acts has violated the constitutional rights or freedoms of the person, and (2) the person has exhausted all remedies provided for by law for defending constitutional rights or freedoms, including the right to apply to a court, and, after all possibilities established by law for filing a complaint against the decision of the court have been exhausted, the final and non-appealable decision is adopted by the court, and (3) not more than four months have passed from the day that the court decision referred to in Item 2 of this paragraph came into force.

In view of the above, under the Constitution and the Law on the Constitutional Court, a person has the right to apply to the Constitutional Court regarding the acts referred to in Paragraphs 1 and 2 of Article 105 of the Constitution only if, in accordance with the procedure laid down by law, the person has exhausted all remedies provided for by law for defending constitutional rights or freedoms, including the right to apply to a court, and, after all possibilities established by law for filing a complaint against the decision of the court have been exhausted, the final and non-appealable decision is adopted by the court.

It should be noted that, under Item 2 of Paragraph 1 (wording of 16 July 2019) of Article 70 of the Law on the Constitutional Court, where a person referred to in Paragraph 4 of Article 106 of the Constitution has not exhausted all remedies provided for by law for defending constitutional rights or freedoms, including the right to apply to a court, the President of the Constitutional Court, on his/her own initiative or upon a proposal from the justice, returns the petition to the petitioner.

It should also be noted that, where it is clear that a person referred to in Paragraph 4 of Article 106 of the Constitution is no longer able to make use of all remedies provided for by law for defending constitutional rights or freedoms, including the right to apply to a court and the right to file a complaint against the decision of a court, the decision to return the petition to the petitioner would be an objective in itself and meaningless.

Thus, under Item 2 of Paragraph 1 (wording of 16 July 2019) of Article 70 of the Law on the Constitutional Court, only where a person referred to in Paragraph 4 of Article 106 of the Constitution has not exhausted all remedies provided for by law for defending constitutional rights or freedoms, including the right to apply to a court and the right to file a complaint against the decision of a court, but may still exhaust them, the petition is returned to the petitioner.

In view of this, it should be held that, having failed to exhaust all remedies provided for by law for defending constitutional rights or freedoms and being no longer able to exhaust them, a petitioner has no right to apply under Paragraph 4 of Article 106 of the Constitution to the Constitutional Court with a petition requesting an investigation into the constitutionality of the legal acts specified in Paragraphs 1 and 2 of Article 105 of the Constitution.

A person referred to in Paragraph 4 (wording of 21 March 2019) of Article 106 of the Constitution does not have the right to apply to the Constitutional Court if the impugned legal regulation has not led to the adoption of a decision that may have violated the constitutional rights or freedoms of that person

The Constitutional Court's decision (no KT43-A-S31/2019) of 6 November 2019

Under Paragraph 4 (wording of 21 March 2019) of Article 106 of the Constitution, every person has the right to apply to the Constitutional Court concerning the legal acts specified in Paragraphs 1 and 2 of Article 105 of the Constitution if a decision adopted on the basis of these acts has violated the constitutional rights or freedoms of the person and the person has exhausted all legal remedies.

Thus, a person referred to in Paragraph 4 of Article 106 of the Constitution has the right to apply to the Constitutional Court requesting an investigation into the compliance with the Constitution and/or laws of not any acts specified in Paragraphs 1 and 2 of Article 105 of the Constitution, but only those acts specified therein a decision adopted on the basis of which has possibly violated the constitutional rights or freedoms of the person. Consequently, under the Constitution, the above-mentioned person does not have the right to apply to the Constitutional Court concerning the legal acts specified in Paragraphs 1 and 2 of Article 105 of the Constitution if [no such a decision has been adopted] on the basis of the said legal acts.

Individual constitutional complaints (Paragraph 4 (wording of 21 March 2019) of Article 106 and Paragraph 3 (wording of 21 March 2019) of Article 107 of the Constitution)

... Article 1 of the Law Amending Articles 106 and 107 of the Constitution of the Republic of Lithuania supplemented Article 106 of the Constitution with the new Paragraph 4, establishing that every person has the right to apply to the Constitutional Court concerning the acts specified in Paragraphs 1 and 2 of Article 105 of the Constitution if a decision adopted on the basis of these acts has violated the constitutional rights or freedoms of the person and the person has exhausted all legal remedies; the procedure for the implementation of this right is established by the Law on the Constitutional Court. Article 2 of the Law Amending Articles 106 and 107 of the Constitution supplemented Article 107 of the Constitution with the new Paragraph 3, establishing that, in the case heard subsequent to the application by a person referred to in Paragraph 4 of Article 106 of the Constitution, the decision adopted by the Constitutional Court that a law (or part thereof) or another act (or part thereof) of the Seimas, an act of the President of the Republic, or an act (or part thereof) of the Government is in conflict with the Constitution constitutes a basis for renewing, according to the procedure established by law, the proceedings concerning the implementation of the violated constitutional rights and freedoms of that person.

Therefore, as of 1 September 2019, the Law Amending Articles 106 and 107 of the Constitution consolidated the institution of individual constitutional complaints in the Constitution: in defence of constitutional rights or freedoms, every person has the right to apply to the Constitutional Court requesting it to investigate whether legal acts whose review falls within the competence of the Constitutional Court are in compliance with the Constitution (another higher-ranking act) if a decision adopted on the basis of these legal acts has possibly violated the constitutional rights or freedoms of the person (Paragraph 4 (wording of 21 March 2019) of Article 106 of the Constitution); the right to apply to the Constitutional Court is implemented after the person has exhausted all legal remedies and in accordance with the other conditions established in the Law on the Constitutional Court (Paragraph 4 (wording of 21 March 2019) of Article 106 of the Constitution), inter alia, within the time limit set by this law; in the constitutional justice case heard subsequent to the application by the person referred to above, the decision of the Constitutional Court that the respective legal act (part thereof) is in conflict with the Constitution (another higher-ranking legal act) constitutes a basis for renewing, according to the procedure established by law, the proceedings in order to protect the constitutional rights or freedoms of the said person (Paragraph 3 (wording of 21 March 2019) of Article 107 of the Constitution).

It should be emphasised that the consolidation of the institution of individual constitutional complaints in the Constitution is not an objective in itself. It is aimed at enabling the effective protection of those constitutional rights or freedoms of a person that could be violated by decisions adopted on the basis of legal acts (parts thereof) contrary to the Constitution. In this context, it should be noted that, under Paragraph 2 of Article 6 of the Constitution, everyone may defend his/her rights by invoking the Constitution. In its ruling of 12 April 2001, the Constitutional Court held that, according to the Constitution, the possibility of defending the violated rights must be real. In view of this, the basis provided for in Paragraph 3 (wording of 21 March 2019) of Article 107 of the Constitution for renewing the respective proceedings in order to defend the constitutional rights or freedoms of a person referred to in Paragraph 4 (wording of 21 March 2019) of Article 106 of the Constitution – a decision of the Constitutional Court that a law (or part thereof) or another act (or part thereof) of the Seimas, an act of the President of the Republic, or an act (or part thereof) of the Government is in conflict with the Constitution – is necessary so that, in the exercise of the right, consolidated in Paragraph 1 of Article 30 of the Constitution, of a person whose constitutional rights or freedoms have been violated to apply to a court, a decision adopted on the basis of a legal act (part thereof) contrary to the Constitution would be reviewed with the aim of removing the violation of the constitutional rights or freedoms of the person and/or compensating the person for the damage caused as a result of this violation.

A person referred to in Paragraph 4 (wording of 21 March 2019) of Article 106 of the Constitution has the right to apply to the Constitutional Court after having exhausted all remedies provided for by law for defending constitutional rights or freedoms

The Constitutional Court's decision (no KT63-A-S49/2019) of 11 December 2019

The Constitutional Court has noted that, under the Constitution and the Law on the Constitutional Court, a person has the right to apply to the Constitutional Court concerning the acts specified in Paragraphs 1 and 2 of Article 105 of the Constitution only if, in accordance with the procedure laid down by law, the person has exhausted all available remedies for defending constitutional rights or freedoms, including the right to apply to a court, and, after all possibilities established by law for filing a complaint against the decision of the court have been exhausted, the final and non-appealable decision is adopted by the court (decision (no KT37-A-S26/2019) of 22 October 2019).

Therefore, under the Constitution and the Law on the Constitutional Court, a person is deemed to have exhausted all remedies provided for by law for defending constitutional rights or freedoms only where not only all possibilities established by law for filing a complaint against the decision of the court have been exhausted, but also the final and non-appealable decision of the court is adopted and it has not protected the constitutional rights or freedoms of the said person.

The particularities of the right of a person referred to in Paragraph 4 (wording of 21 March 2019) of Article 106 of the Constitution to apply to the Constitutional Court (time limit for applying to the Constitutional Court)

The Constitutional Court's decision of 16 January 2020

... the right of a person referred to in Paragraph 4 (wording of 21 March 2019) of Article 106 of the Constitution to apply to the Constitutional Court must be implemented within the time limit set by the Law on the Constitutional Court; this time limit is linked to the date on which the final and non-appealable decision of the court came into force. It should be noted that a person referred to in Paragraph 4 (wording of 21 March 2019) of Article 106 of the Constitution is the only subject with the right to apply to the Constitutional Court with a petition for an investigation into the constitutionality of legal acts who is given the time limit for applying to the Constitutional Court.

... the time limit for filing a petition with the Constitutional Court by a person referred to in Paragraph 4 of Article 106 of the Constitution is not an objective in itself: it is sought thereby not to deny the stability of the legal relationships established and upheld by effective court decisions, as well as to provide time for this person to decide whether to apply to the Constitutional Court requesting it to investigate whether legal acts whose review falls within the competence of the Constitutional Court are in compliance with the Constitution (another higher-ranking act) if a decision adopted on the basis of these legal acts could violate the constitutional rights or freedoms of the person, and, having decided to apply to the Constitutional Court, to prepare and submit to the Constitutional Court a petition that meets the requirements established in the Law on the Constitutional Court.

The particularities of the right of a person referred to in Paragraph 4 (wording of 21 March 2019) of Article 106 of the Constitution to apply to the Constitutional Court (time limit for applying to the Constitutional Court)

The Constitutional Court's decision (no KT17-A-S17/2020) of 5 February 2020

The Constitutional Court has held that, among other conditions, the right of a person referred to in Paragraph 4 (wording of 21 March 2019) of Article 106 of the Constitution to apply to the Constitutional Court must be implemented within the time limit set by the Law on the Constitutional Court; this time limit is linked to the date on which the final and non-appealable decision of the court came into force (decision (no KT6-A-S6/2020) of 16 January 2020). The Constitutional Court has also held on more than one occasion that the constitutional right to apply to the Constitutional Court concerning the acts specified in Paragraphs 1 and 2 of Article 105 of the Constitution was acquired as of 1 September 2019 only by those persons with respect to whom the final and non-appealable decision of the court in the case concerning the violation of their constitutional rights or freedoms came into force on 1 May 2019 and later (inter alia, the decisions (nos KT29-A-S18/2019 and KT30-A-S19/2019) of 10 October 2019 and the decision (no KT58-A-S44/2019) of 3 December 2019).

Thus, the time limit for filing a petition with the Constitutional Court is calculated from the date on which the final and non-appealable decision of the court came into force also for those persons with respect to whom the final and non-appealable decision of the court in the case concerning the violation of their constitutional rights or freedoms came into force before 1 September 2019, but not earlier than on 1 May 2019.

The renewal of the time limit established for a person referred to in Paragraph 4 (wording of 21 March 2019) of Article 106 of the Constitution to apply to the Constitutional Court

The Constitutional Court's decision (no KT17-A-S17/2020) of 5 February 2020

... the time limit for applying to the Constitutional Court may be renewed only in exceptional cases, where it is established that, during the period of this time limit, exceptional and objective circumstances existed, which did not depend on the will of the person and prevented the person from exercising the right to apply to the Constitutional Court in a timely and proper manner. It should be noted that persons who believe that their constitutional rights or freedoms have been violated not only have the right to defend them but, having decided to exercise this right, have the duty to do so expeditiously, responsibly, carefully, and in good faith.

8.4.2. Issues that do not fall within the jurisdiction of the Constitutional Court and other grounds for refusing the consideration of petitions

The Constitutional Court does not investigate the compliance of a law with an international treaty ratified by the Seimas (Paragraph 1 of Article 105 and Paragraph 3 of Article 138 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's decision of 25 April 2002

Paragraph 3 of Article 138 of the Constitution prescribes:

“International treaties ratified by the Seimas of the Republic of Lithuania shall be a constituent part of the legal system of the Republic of Lithuania.”

Interpreting this provision of the Constitution, the Constitutional Court has held that the said provision means that treaties ratified by the Seimas acquire the force of a law (ruling of 17 October 1995).

Under Paragraph 1 of Article 105 of the Constitution, the Constitutional Court considers and adopts decisions on whether the laws of the Republic of Lithuania or other acts adopted by the Seimas are in conflict with the Constitution of the Republic of Lithuania. Thus, under the Constitution, the Constitutional Court does not consider the conformity of a law with a legal act having the force of a law.

The development of the official constitutional doctrine does not constitute grounds for addressing the Constitutional Court repeatedly with the same petition or inquiry

... as such, no development of the official constitutional doctrine (inter alia, such reinterpretation of the official constitutional doctrinal provisions where the official constitutional doctrine is modified) constitutes grounds for the subjects specified in Article 106 of the Constitution to apply to the Constitutional Court with a new petition requesting an investigation into whether such a law (part thereof) is in conflict with the Constitution (another higher-ranking legal act) whose compliance with the Constitution (another higher-ranking legal act) has already been investigated on the merits, or with such a petition that is analogous to a petition previously presented by a certain subject requesting an investigation into whether such a legal act (part thereof) is in conflict with the Constitution (another higher-ranking legal act) on which the Constitutional Court has already passed the decision to refuse to consider such a petition or the decision (ruling) to dismiss the instituted legal proceedings (case) (if the respective petition was received at the Constitutional Court and the preparation of the constitutional justice case for the hearing of the Constitutional Court began or if the respective petition has already been considered at the hearing of the Constitutional Court), thus, where the Constitutional Court did not decide the respective question on the merits.

As such, the change (reinterpretation, modification) of the constitutional doctrine formed by the Constitutional Court previously does not constitute grounds for the subjects specified in Article 106 of the Constitution to apply to the Constitutional Court with a new inquiry whether there were the violations of election laws during the elections of the President of the Republic or the elections of the members of the Seimas, whether the state of health of the President of the Republic allows him/her to continue to hold office, whether the international treaties of the Republic of Lithuania are in conflict with the Constitution, and whether the concrete actions of the members of the Seimas and state officials against whom an impeachment case has been instituted are in conflict with the Constitution.

The Constitutional Court does not have the powers to assess the inaction of law-making subjects (non-adoption of law-making decisions)

The Constitutional Court's decision of 8 August 2006

... under Paragraphs 1 and 2 of Article 105 of the Constitution, the Constitutional Court investigates whether namely legal acts as such adopted by state institutions (Seimas, the President of the Republic, or the Government) are in conflict with higher-ranking legal acts, inter alia (and, first of all), with the Constitution, but it does not investigate the non-adoption of law-making decisions by the said state institutions, i.e. the avoidance of or delay in adopting such decisions, as well as the failure to act that is determined by other motives.

The possibility of impugning, from a different aspect, a legal act whose compliance with the Constitution has already been investigated

The Constitutional Court's decision of 13 November 2006

... as it was held by the Constitutional Court in its ruling of 28 March 2006, “none of the grounds for the refusal to investigate a petition ... may be interpreted as creating the legal preconditions for a court that considers a case to apply such a law or another legal act (part thereof) the compliance of which with the Constitution (another higher-ranking legal act) is doubtful for the said court”.

Thus, the fact that there are no legal grounds for applying to the Constitutional Court from the aspect pointed out by ... [the petitioner] so that it would once again investigate the compliance of the legal regulation ... with the Constitution, since ... courts already do not have any doubts as regards the constitutionality of the said legal regulation, does not at all mean that [the constitutionality of the said legal regulation] may not be impugned before the Constitutional Court from other aspects, i.e. those aspects from which [this] legal regulation ... is not identical with that ... the compliance of which ... has been investigated at the Constitutional Court ...

The Constitutional Court does not decide issues concerning the compatibility of legal acts of the same legal force

The Constitutional Court's decision of 13 November 2006

Under the Constitution, the Constitutional Court does not decide issues concerning the compatibility of legal acts of the same legal force or concerning competing legal acts of the same legal force (decision of 29 September 1999). If laws contain obscurities, ambiguities, or gaps, the legislature is under the duty to remove them (decision of 23 September 2002).

If the Constitutional Court is requested to solve an issue concerning the compatibility of legal acts of the same legal force or concerning competing legal acts of the same legal force, such a request is not within the jurisdiction of the Constitutional Court. ...

On the other hand, this does not at all mean that, in certain cases, the incompatibility of legal acts (parts thereof) cannot imply the conflict of such legal acts (or some of them) with the Constitution, nor does this mean that, under certain circumstances, the Constitutional Court may not state the existence of such a conflict with the Constitution.

A fictitious petition is not within the jurisdiction of the Constitutional Court

The Constitutional Court's decision of 14 October 2008

In its decision of 31 January 2007, the Constitutional Court held that, in cases where a petition is substantiated not with the reasoning that is explicitly indicated by the petitioner and where such a petition is a fictitious one, in this regard the petition "should be regarded as not falling within the jurisdiction of the Constitutional Court and may not be accepted for consideration at the Constitutional Court".

The Constitutional Court does not assess the compliance of legal acts passed by ministers with the Constitution and laws

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 2 September 2009

According to Article 105 of the Constitution, the Constitutional Court considers and adopts decisions on whether the laws and other acts adopted by the Seimas are in conflict with the Constitution (Paragraph 1) and whether the acts of the President of the Republic and the acts of the Government are in conflict with the Constitution and laws (Paragraph 2).

Assessing the compliance of legal acts passed by ministers ... with the Constitution and/or laws does not fall under the competence of the Constitutional Court.

However, in its decision of 20 September 2005, the Constitutional Court held that, under the Constitution, such legal situations are impermissible where it would not be possible to verify in a court whether legal acts (parts thereof), inter alia, legal acts passed by ministers, other lower-ranking legal acts, as well as legal acts issued by municipalities, the control of which as regards their compliance with the Constitution does not fall within the jurisdiction of the Constitutional Court, are in conflict with the Constitution and laws.

In its ruling of 24 October 2007, the Constitutional Court held that, at present, such a legal regulation is established [by means of] laws whereby a decision on the compliance of legal acts passed by other law-making subjects (thus, not those passed by the Seimas, the President of the Republic, or the Government and not those adopted by referendum) with higher-ranking legal acts, inter alia (and, first of all), with the Constitution, is assigned to the jurisdiction of administrative courts; if an administrative court rules such a legal act to be in conflict with the Constitution (another higher-ranking legal act), then, under the Constitution and laws, such a decision of the said court has erga omnes impact on the whole practice of the application of the respective legal acts (parts thereof).

Thus, assessing the compliance of legal acts passed by ministers with the Constitution and/or laws is within the jurisdiction of a competent administrative court. This court is bound by the doctrinal provisions of the Constitutional Court ...

The Constitutional Court does not decide issues concerning the compatibility of legal acts of the same legal force

The Constitutional Court's decision of 16 November 2010 (petition no 1B-125/2010)

The Constitutional Court has held that, under the Constitution, the Constitutional Court does not consider whether a law is in compliance with another law (rulings of 2 April 2001 and 4 March 2003); it does not decide issues concerning the compatibility of legal acts of the same legal force or concerning competing legal acts of the same legal force (decision of 29 September 1999). If the Constitutional Court is requested to solve an issue concerning the compatibility of legal acts of the same legal force or concerning competing legal acts of the same legal force, such a request is not within the jurisdiction of the Constitutional Court (decision of 6 September 2007).

The Constitutional Court has also held that the removal of collisions is the prerogative of the legislature (ruling of 18 November 1994). If laws contain obscurities, ambiguities, or gaps, the legislature is under the duty to remove them (decisions of 23 September 2002 and 13 November 2006).

The Constitutional Court does not decide issues of the application of law

The Constitutional Court's decision of 16 November 2010 (petition no 1B-125/2010)

Under the Constitution, the Constitutional Court does not decide issues of the application of law; such issues are decided by an institution that has the powers to apply legal acts; if laws contain obscurities, ambiguities, or gaps, the legislature is under the duty to remove them (decisions of 23 September 2002, 13 November 2006, 20 November 2006, and 27 June 2007). The Constitutional Court has also held that such questions of the application of law that have not been decided by the legislature are a matter of judicial practice (ruling of 9 July 1998 and the decision of 20 November 2006); thus, such questions of the application of law that have not been decided by the legislature may be decided by courts when they consider disputes regarding the application of the respective legal acts (parts thereof) (decision of 20 November 2006). Petitions requesting the interpretation as to how the provisions of a law (or another legal act) must be applied do not fall under the jurisdiction of the Constitutional Court (decisions of 23 September 2002 and 20 November 2006).

The Constitutional Court has also held that the interpretation of the essence of a legal norm is the duty of a law-applying state institution (decision of 11 July 1994).

A petition that is an objective in itself must be regarded as not falling under the jurisdiction of the Constitutional Court

The Constitutional Court's decision of 27 August 2013

... A petition for an investigation into the compliance of a legal act with the Constitution where such a petition is an objective in itself should be regarded as not within the jurisdiction of the Constitutional Court.

The Constitutional Court does not investigate the compliance of legal acts adopted by the Government with the provisions of the programme of the Government

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 6 November 2013

... the supervision of the implementation of the programme of the Government is not within the jurisdiction of the Constitutional Court and the compliance of government acts with any programmatic provisions consolidated in the programme of the Government is not a matter of constitutional review.

The Constitutional Court does not investigate the compliance of an international treaty with a law

The Constitutional Court's decision of 4 November 2014

... under the Constitution ... the Constitutional Court presents conclusions on whether the international treaties of the Republic of Lithuania are in conflict with the Constitution. Thus, it should be held that the issue of the consideration whether an international treaty is in compliance with a law is not within the jurisdiction of the Constitutional Court.

The Constitutional Court does not assess the expediency of the adoption of legal acts

The Constitutional Court's decision (no KT24-S13/2016) of 29 August 2016

... the Constitutional Court does not exercise constitutional control over legal acts from the aspect of the expediency of their adoption ...

The Constitutional Court does not investigate the compliance of a decision entered in the minutes of a meeting of the Government with the Constitution and laws

... under Paragraph 1 of Article 102 and Item 2 of Paragraph 2 of Article 105 of the Constitution, the Constitutional Court decides whether the acts of the Government are in conflict with the Constitution or laws. Therefore, a decision that is entered in the minutes of a meeting of the Government and is not an act of the Government is not, under the Constitution, a matter for investigation by the Constitutional Court.

The Constitutional Court does not decide whether court decisions are in conflict with the Constitution and/or laws and does not have the powers to review cases decided by courts and to overturn (change) court decisions

Paragraph 4 (wording of 21 March 2019) of Article 106 of the Constitution provides that every person has the right to apply to the Constitutional Court concerning the legal acts specified in Paragraphs 1 and 2 of Article 105 of the Constitution if a decision adopted on the basis of these acts has violated the constitutional rights or freedoms of the person and the person has exhausted all legal remedies.

Thus, under the Constitution, a person has the right to apply to the Constitutional Court regarding the compliance of not all acts with the Constitution and/or laws, but only those specified in Paragraphs 1 and 2 of Article 105 of the Constitution. Paragraph 1 of Article 105 of the Constitution consolidates that the Constitutional Court considers and adopts decisions on whether the laws of the Republic of Lithuania or other acts adopted by the Seimas are in conflict with the Constitution of the Republic of Lithuania; Paragraph 2 of this article establishes that the Constitutional Court also decides whether the acts of the President of the Republic and the acts of the Government of the Republic are in conflict with the Constitution and laws.

In view of this, it should be noted that, under the Constitution, the Constitutional Court does not decide whether court decisions are in conflict with the Constitution and/or laws and it does not have the powers to review cases decided by courts and to overturn (change) court decisions. Such petitions do not fall within the jurisdiction of the Constitutional Court.

The Constitutional Court does not decide, following the petitions of persons referred to in Paragraph 4 (wording of 21 March 2019) of Article 106 of the Constitution, on the compliance of the actions of members of the Seimas, state officials, judges, or state servants with the Constitution and does not assess actions or failure to act by state and municipal institutions or establishments or judicial self-governance institutions

... the Constitutional Court does not decide, following the petitions of persons referred to in Paragraph 4 (wording of 21 March 2019) of Article 106 of the Constitution, on the compliance of the actions of members of the Seimas, state officials, judges, or state servants with the Constitution and does not assess actions or failure to act by state and municipal institutions or establishments or judicial self-governance institutions. Such petitions do not fall within the jurisdiction of the Constitutional Court.

A petition in which a matter for investigation is absent does not fall within the jurisdiction of the Constitutional Court

The Constitutional Court's decision (no KT28-A-S17/2019) of 9 October 2019

The Constitutional Court has noted on more than one occasion that the fact that a matter for investigation is absent in a petition means that the petition does not fall within the jurisdiction of the Constitutional Court (inter alia, the rulings of 20 March 2008, 20 November 2013, 16 December 2013, and 3 July 2014).

The petition of a person referred to in Paragraph 4 (wording of 21 March 2019) of Article 106 of the Constitution should be regarded as not falling within the jurisdiction of the Constitutional Court if the adopted final and non-appealable court decision with respect to this person came into force before 1 May 2019

Under Paragraph 4 (wording of 21 March 2019) of Article 106 of the Constitution, every person has the right to apply to the Constitutional Court concerning the legal acts specified in Paragraphs 1 and 2 of Article 105 of the Constitution if a decision adopted on the basis of these acts has violated the constitutional rights or freedoms of the person and the person has exhausted all legal remedies; the procedure for the implementation of this right is established by the Law on the Constitutional Court of the Republic of Lithuania.

Paragraph 2 of Article 65 (wording of 16 July 2019) of the Law on the Constitutional Court provides that a person has the right to file a petition with the Constitutional Court for an investigation into the compliance of laws or other acts of the Seimas, the acts of the President of the Republic, or the acts of the Government with the Constitution or laws if: (1) a decision adopted on the basis of these acts has violated the constitutional rights or freedoms of the person, and (2) the person has exhausted all remedies provided for by law for defending constitutional rights or freedoms, including the right to apply to a court, and, after all possibilities established by law for filing a complaint against the decision of the court have been exhausted, the final and non-appealable decision is adopted by the court, and (3) not more than four months have passed from the day that the court decision referred to in Item 2 of this paragraph came into force.

... the Law Amending Articles 106 and 107 of the Constitution, which consolidated, in Paragraph 4 of Article 106 of the Constitution, the right of every person to apply to the Constitutional Court, came into force on 1 September 2019.

It should also be noted that the universally recognised general legal principle of lex retro non agit is applicable in the field of legal regulation, i.e. the effect of legal acts is prospective and they have no retroactive effect. The Constitutional Court has noted on more than one occasion that this principle is important and necessary in ensuring: the stability and strength of law, laws, and the legal order; the rights of the subjects involved in legal relationships; and trust in legal acts adopted in the state; the said principle is an important precondition for legal certainty and it is an essential element of the rule of law and of a state under the rule of law (inter alia, the decision of 25 March 1998, the ruling of 11 January 2001, and the decision of 22 March 2018).

Consequently, under Paragraph 4 of Article 106 of the Constitution, as of 1 September 2019, persons acquired the right to apply to the Constitutional Court in accordance with the procedure laid down in the Law on the Constitutional Court, inter alia, within the time limit laid down in Item 3 of Paragraph 2 of Article 65 of this law, i.e. within four months of the date on which the final and non-appealable decision of the court came into force. Thus, the constitutional right to apply to the Constitutional Court concerning the acts specified in Paragraphs 1 and 2 of Article 105 of the Constitution was acquired as of 1 September 2019 only by those persons with respect to whom the final and non-appealable decision of the court in the case concerning the violation of their constitutional rights and freedoms came into force on 1 May 2019 and later.

In view of the above, it should be held that, under the Constitution, the petitions of persons referred to in Paragraph 4 (wording of 21 March 2019) of Article 106 of the Constitution do not fall within the jurisdiction of the Constitutional Court if the adopted final and non-appealable court decision with respect to these persons came into force before 1 May 2019.

The Constitutional Court does not have the powers to consider petitions requesting the renewal of proceedings before the courts of general competence and administrative courts

The Constitutional Court's decision (no KT45-A-S32/2019) of 12 November 2019

... under the Constitution, the Constitutional Court also does not have the powers to consider petitions requesting the renewal of proceedings before the courts of general competence and administrative courts. Petitions requesting a decision on such issues do not fall within the jurisdiction of the Constitutional Court.

The Constitutional Court does not have the powers to assess the compliance of legal acts issued by ministers and of other lower-ranking acts with the Constitution and/or laws

The Constitutional Court's decision (no KT46-A-S33/2019) of 13 November 2019

As held by the Constitutional Court on more than one occasion, under the Constitution, the Constitutional Court does not have the powers to assess the compliance of legal acts issued by ministers and other lower-ranking acts with the Constitution and/or laws (decisions of 9 November 1999 and 20 September 2005) Petitions requesting a decision on such issues do not fall within the jurisdiction of the Constitutional Court.

The Constitutional Court does not have the powers to investigate the compliance of a factual situation with the Constitution

The Constitutional Court's decision (no KT50-A-S37/2019) of 20 November 2019

As noted by the Constitutional Court, under Paragraph 1 of Article 102 and Article 105 of the Constitution, the Constitutional Court does not have the powers to investigate the compliance of a factual situation with the Constitution. The Constitutional Court administers constitutional justice by investigating whether laws and other acts of the Seimas, the acts of the President of the Republic, and the acts of the Government are in conflict with the Constitution (decision of 20 October 2017).

The Constitutional Court does not have the powers to deal with matters assigned to the competence of other institutions

The Constitutional Court's decision (no KT51-A-S38/2019) of 20 November 2019

... under the Constitution, the Constitutional Court does not have the powers to deal with matters assigned to the competence of other institutions. Petitions requesting a decision on such issues do not fall within the jurisdiction of the Constitutional Court.

The Constitutional Court does not have the powers to assess the compliance of acts adopted by institutions other than the Seimas, the President of the Republic, or the Government with the Constitution and/or laws

... under the Constitution, the assessment of the compliance of acts adopted by institutions other than the Seimas, the President of the Republic, or the Government with the Constitution and/or laws is not assigned to the competence of the Constitutional Court. ... Petitions requesting a decision on such issues do not fall within the jurisdiction of the Constitutional Court.

Petitions requesting an investigation into the compliance of certain provisions of the Constitution with other provisions of the Constitution do not fall within the jurisdiction of the Constitutional Court

The Constitutional Court's decision (no KT63-A-S58/2020) of 1 April 2020

As held by the Constitutional Court, the provisions of the Constitution form a single coherent system; no provision of the Constitution may be opposed to other provisions of the Constitution; the nature of the Constitution as the highest-ranking legal act and the idea of constitutionality imply that the Constitution may not and does not contain any gaps or internal contradictions (rulings of 25 May 2004, 13 December 2004, and 24 January 2014).

Consequently, the petitions in which petitioners raise doubts concerning the conflict of certain provisions of the Constitution with other provisions of the Constitution may not be investigated.

In view of the above, it should be held that there is no matter for investigation in this part of the petition of the petitioner. The Constitutional Court has noted more than once that the fact that a matter for investigation is absent in a petition means that the petition does not fall within the jurisdiction of the Constitutional Court (inter alia, the decision (no KT28-A-S17/2019) of 9 October 2019 and the decision (no KT55-A-S50/2020) of 25 March 2020).

Petitions requesting an investigation into the compliance of the laws and other legal acts of the Republic of Lithuania with the norms of European Union law do not fall within the jurisdiction of the Constitutional Court

The Constitutional Court's decision (no KT70-A-S65/2020) of 8 April 2020

... Article 2 of the Constitutional Act on Membership of the Republic of Lithuania in the European Union provides that the norms of European Union law are a constituent part of the legal system of the Republic of Lithuania. Where it concerns the founding Treaties of the European Union, the norms of European Union law are applied directly, while in the event of the collision of legal norms, they have supremacy over the laws and other legal acts of the Republic of Lithuania.

The Constitutional Court has held that the Constitution expressis verbis establishes the rule of collision with respect to EU law, by consolidating the priority of the application of EU legal acts in cases where the provisions of EU law arising from the founding Treaties of the European Union compete with the legal regulation established in Lithuanian national legal acts (regardless of their legal force), with the exception of the Constitution itself (inter alia, the ruling of 14 March 2006, the decision of 8 May 2007, and the ruling of 4 December 2008).

In view of the above, it should be held that collision between the laws and other legal acts of the Republic of Lithuania and the norms of EU law is an issue of the application of law.

The Constitutional Court has held on more than one occasion that, under the Constitution, it does not decide questions on the application of law (inter alia, the decisions of 20 November 2006 and 9 May 2016 and the decision (no KT61-A-S56/2020) of 1 April 2020). Petitions requesting a decision on such issues do not fall within the jurisdiction of the Constitutional Court.

In implementing the constitutional right to apply to the Constitutional Court, a person must act in good faith and must not abuse this right

The Constitutional Court's decision (no KT83-A-S78/2020) of 29 April 2020

In its ruling of 25 November 2019, the Constitutional Court noted that, as of 1 September 2019, the Law Amending Articles 106 and 107 of the Constitution consolidated the institution of individual constitutional complaints in the Constitution: in defence of constitutional rights or freedoms, every person has the right to apply to the Constitutional Court requesting it to investigate whether legal acts whose review falls within the competence of the Constitutional Court are in compliance with the Constitution (another higher-ranking act) if a decision adopted on the basis of these legal acts has possibly violated the constitutional rights or freedoms of the person; the institution of individual constitutional complaints in the Constitution is not an objective in itself; it is aimed at enabling the effective protection of those constitutional rights or freedoms of a person that could be violated by a decision adopted on the basis of legal acts (parts thereof) contrary to the Constitution.

The Constitutional Court has also held that, under the Constitution, the subjects involved in legal relationships are under the duty to act in good faith and without violating law; this is required by the general legal principle of bona fides, which is inseparable from the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law (inter alia, the rulings of 27 June 2007, 11 December 2013, and 6 February 2020); persons who believe that their constitutional rights or freedoms have been violated not only have the right to defend them but, having decided to exercise this right, have the duty to do so in good faith (decision (no KT17-A-S17/2020) of 5 February 2020 and decisions (nos KT66-A-S61/2020 and KT69-A-S64/2020) of 8 April 2020).

Consequently, the Constitution requires that every person, when implementing the constitutional right to apply to the Constitutional Court for an investigation into whether legal acts whose review falls within the competence of the Constitutional Court are in compliance with the Constitution (another higher-ranking act) if a decision adopted on the basis of these legal acts has possibly violated the constitutional rights or freedoms of the person, must act in good faith and must not abuse the constitutional right to apply to the Constitutional Court.

The abuse of procedural rights

The Constitutional Court's decision (no KT83-A-S78/2020) of 29 April 2020

... the conduct of petitioners in cases where, while being obliged to be aware of the obvious inadmissibility of their petition (petitions) and the pointlessness of the consideration of their petition (petitions) at the Constitutional Court, they apply to the Constitutional Court with such a petition (petitions) is incompatible with the exercise of their constitutional right to apply to the Constitutional Court in good faith, nor with the aims of the administration of constitutional justice; therefore, such implementation of the constitutional right to apply to the Constitutional Court not according to the intended purpose should be considered to be the abuse of procedural rights, which is prohibited under the Constitution.

Petitions containing requests for legal advice do not fall within the jurisdiction of the Constitutional Court

The Constitutional Court's decision (no KT85-A-S80/2020) of 29 April 2020

... as the Constitutional Court has held on more than one occasion, under the Law on the Constitutional Court, the Constitutional Court gives legal advice neither to the persons that participated in the case nor to any other persons (inter alia, the decisions of 6 April 2004, 27 August 2014, 13 January 2016, and 5 September 2019). Such petitions requesting legal advice do not fall within the jurisdiction of the Constitutional Court.

Persons referred to in Paragraph 4 (wording of 21 March 2019) of Article 106 of the Constitution do not have the right to apply to the Constitutional Court with petitions containing general requests

The Constitutional Court's decision (no KT116-A-S108/2020) of 2 July 2020

... under the Constitution, persons referred to in Paragraph 4 (wording of 21 March 2019) of Article 106 thereof do not have the right to apply to the Constitutional Court with petitions containing general requests to investigate the constitutionality of legal acts whose review falls within the competence of the Constitutional Court (decision (no KT19-A-S19/2020) of 5 February 2020 and the decision (no KT84-A-S79/2020) of 29 April 2020).

Petitions whereby the right to apply to the Constitutional Court is abused do not fall within the jurisdiction of the Constitutional Court

The Constitutional Court's decision (no KT132-A-S123/2020) of 23 July 2020

... a petition whereby the right of a person to apply to the Constitutional Court is abused does not fall within the jurisdiction of the Constitutional Court.

8.5. ACTS ADOPTED BY THE CONSTITUTIONAL COURT

8.5.1. The concept and types of final acts adopted by the Constitutional Court

The concept of final acts adopted by the Constitutional Court (Paragraph 2 of Article 107 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 28 March 2006

Paragraph 2 of Article 107 of the Constitution provides that the decisions of the Constitutional Court on the issues assigned to its competence by the Constitution are final and not subject to appeal.

The notion “decisions” used in Paragraph 2 of Article 107 of the Constitution (the same notion is used in Paragraph 1 of Article 105, Paragraph 2 of Article 107, and Paragraph 4 of Article 109 of the Constitution) must not be interpreted as meaning that the Constitutional Court, while deciding on the issues assigned to its competence, may adopt only a legal act called a decision (which has the form of a decision). The notion “decisions” is a general one; this notion not only describes legal acts adopted by the Constitutional Court and the types of these acts, but also means that the Constitutional Court implements the competence assigned to it by the Constitution and expresses its will, i.e. adopts a final act of the Constitutional Court.

It needs to be noted that final acts adopted by the Constitutional Court are also such its legal acts by which a constitutional justice case is considered on the merits, as well as such that are adopted without investigating on the merits the compliance of an impugned legal act (part thereof) with the Constitution (another higher-ranking legal act), but by properly (clearly and rationally) refusing by means of a reasoned decision to consider a petition or by dismissing instituted legal proceedings (if the respective petition is received at the Constitutional Court and the preparation of a constitutional justice case for a hearing at the Constitutional Court has begun) or by dismissing a case (if the respective constitutional justice case has already been considered in a hearing at the Constitutional Court).

The general notion “decisions” of Paragraph 2 of Article 107 of the Constitution is concretised in the Law on the Constitutional Court.

... the Law on the Constitutional Court, inter alia, prescribes: the Constitutional Court decides cases on their merits by issuing rulings ... the rulings of the Constitutional Court are pronounced in the name of the Republic of Lithuania ... in the cases provided for by the Law on the Constitutional Court (i.e. the cases provided for in Paragraph 3 of Article 105 of the Constitution), a final act adopted by the Constitutional Court is called a conclusion ... the Constitutional Court adopts decisions on individual questions that prevent a case from being decided on its merits Thus, after it investigates whether a certain act of the Seimas, the President of the Republic, or the Government or any act (part thereof) passed by referendum is in conflict with a higher-ranking legal act, inter alia (and, first of all), with the Constitution, the Constitutional Court adopts a ruling.

In this context, it should be noted that, under the Law on the Constitutional Court, the Constitutional Court adopts decisions regarding the interpretation of a ruling of the Constitutional Court ... and regarding the dismissal of a case (legal proceedings) ...

The specified rulings, conclusions, and decisions of the Constitutional Court are final acts of the Constitutional Court – by means of such acts, a constitutional justice case is completed. All the said rulings, conclusions, and decisions of the Constitutional Court by which a constitutional justice case is completed, i.e. all final acts of the Constitutional Court, are included in the general notion “decisions” used in Paragraph 2 of Article 107 of the Constitution, which also means that the Constitutional Court implements the competence assigned to it by the Constitution and expresses its will, i.e. adopts a final act of the Constitutional Court.

8.5.2. The legal force of acts adopted by the Constitutional Court

The legal force of acts adopted by the Constitutional Court (Paragraphs 1 and 2 of Article 107 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 30 May 2003

Paragraphs 1 and 2 of Article 107 of the Constitution prescribe:

“A law (or part thereof) of the Republic of Lithuania or another act (or part thereof) of the Seimas, an act of the President of the Republic, or an act (or part thereof) of the Government may not be applied from the day of the official publication of the decision of the Constitutional Court that the act in question (or part thereof) is in conflict with the Constitution of the Republic of Lithuania.

The decisions of the Constitutional Court on the issues assigned to its competence by the Constitution shall be final and not subject to appeal.”

Thus, under the Constitution, after the Constitutional Court recognises a law (part thereof), or another act (part thereof) of the Seimas, an act of the President of the Republic, an act (part thereof) of the Government to be in conflict with the Constitution, the institutions that issued the respective act – the Seimas, the President of the Republic, or the Government – are prohibited from repeatedly establishing any such a legal regulation that has been recognised to be in conflict with the Constitution, by adopting certain laws or other legal acts afterwards. The legal regulation established in Paragraphs 1 and 2 of Article 107 of the Constitution also means that the legal force of a decision (ruling) of the Constitutional Court may not be overcome by means of the repeated adoption of laws or other acts of the Seimas, acts of the President of the Republic, or acts of the Government.

In view of the fact that all constituent parts of a ruling of the Constitutional Court are interrelated and constitute a single whole, that a ruling of the Constitutional Court must state the arguments upon which that ruling of the Constitutional Court is based and present the concept of the provisions of the Constitution, the institutions that adopt laws and other legal acts – the Seimas, the President of the Republic, and the Government – while adopting new laws or legal acts, amending and supplementing already adopted laws or other legal acts, are bound by the concept of the provisions of the Constitution and other legal arguments that are presented in the reasoning of that ruling of the Constitutional Court.

The legal force of rulings adopted by the Constitutional Court (Paragraph 1 of Article 107 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 30 December 2003

The provision of Paragraph 1 of Article 107 of the Constitution, whereby a legal act (or part thereof) may not be applied from the day of the official publication of the decision of the Constitutional Court that the act in question (or part thereof) is in conflict with the Constitution, means that, as long as the Constitutional Court has not adopted a decision that the act in question (or part thereof) is in conflict with the Constitution, it is presumed that such a legal act (part thereof) is in compliance with the Constitution and that the legal effects that have emerged on the basis of the act in question (part thereof) are legitimate.

Thus, the general rule has been established in Paragraph 1 of Article 107 of the Constitution that the legal force of decisions adopted by the Constitutional Court is prospective. However, this rule is not absolute.

The legal force of a conclusion presented by the Constitutional Court (Item 4 of Paragraph 3 of Article 105 and Paragraphs 2 and 3 of Article 107 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's conclusion of 31 March 2004

Under Item 4 of Paragraph 3 of Article 105 of the Constitution, the Constitutional Court presents a conclusion on whether the concrete actions of the President of the Republic against whom an impeachment case has been instituted are in conflict with the Constitution. Paragraph 2 of Article 107 of the Constitution provides that the decisions of the Constitutional Court on the issues assigned to its competence by the Constitution are final and not subject to appeal. The presentation of the conclusion specified in Item 4 of Paragraph 3 of Article 105 of the Constitution is one of such issues that, under the Constitution, fall under the competence of the Constitutional Court only. Thus, under the Constitution, a conclusion on whether the concrete actions of the President of the Republic against whom an impeachment case has been instituted are in conflict with the Constitution is final and not subject to appeal.

The provision of Paragraph 3 of Article 107 of the Constitution that, on the basis of the conclusions of the Constitutional Court, the Seimas takes a final decision on the issues set forth in Paragraph 3 of Article 105 of the Constitution, means that, in cases where impeachment proceedings are instituted against the President of the Republic for a gross violation of the Constitution, the Seimas has the duty to apply to the Constitutional Court and to request a conclusion on whether the actions of the President of the Republic are in conflict with the Constitution. ...

The provision of Paragraph 2 of Article 107 of the Constitution, whereby the decisions of the Constitutional Court on the issues assigned to its competence by the Constitution are final and not subject to appeal, also means that, when deciding whether or not to remove the President of the Republic from office, the Seimas may not reject, question, or change the conclusion of the Constitutional Court that the concrete actions of the President of the Republic are (or are not) in conflict with the Constitution. No such powers are assigned to the Seimas by the Constitution. The conclusion of the Constitutional Court that the concrete actions of the President of the Republic are in conflict (or are not in conflict) with the Constitution is binding on the Seimas insofar as the Constitution does not empower it to decide whether the conclusion of the Constitutional Court is well founded and legal – it is only the Constitutional Court that may establish the legal fact that the actions of the President of the Republic are (or are not) in conflict with the Constitution.

It should be noted that the constitutional provision whereby only the Constitutional Court has the powers to decide (through its conclusions on the matter) whether the concrete actions of the President of the Republic are in conflict with the Constitution consolidates the guarantee for the President of the Republic that he/she will not be held constitutionally liable unreasonably. Thus, if the Constitutional Court reaches the conclusion that the actions of the President of the Republic are not in conflict with the Constitution, the Seimas may not remove the President of the Republic from office for a gross violation of the Constitution.

[...]

... If the grounds for impeachment are a gross violation of the Constitution, the Seimas may decide the issue of the removal of the President of the Republic from office only after receiving the conclusion of the Constitutional Court that the President of the Republic grossly violated the Constitution. This is the constitutional guarantee for the President of the Republic that constitutional responsibility will not be applied against him/her unreasonably.

The legal force of a conclusion presented by the Constitutional Court

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 25 May 2004

... the conclusion of the Constitutional Court that a person has grossly violated the Constitution (and, thus, has breached the oath) is final. No other state institution, no other state official, and no other subject may change or revoke such a conclusion of the Constitutional Court. Under the Constitution, such a conclusion may not be changed or revoked by referendum, by election, or in any other way.

The legal force of acts adopted by the Constitutional Court (Paragraph 2 of Article 107 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's decision of 20 September 2005

Paragraph 2 of Article 107 of the Constitution provides that the decisions of the Constitutional Court on the issues assigned to its competence by the Constitution are final and not subject to appeal.

The provisions of the Constitution – its norms and principles – are interpreted in the acts of the Constitutional Court. The official constitutional doctrine is created and developed in such acts. All law-making subjects and all law-applying subjects, including courts, must pay regard to the official constitutional doctrine when they apply the Constitution; they may not interpret the provisions of the Constitution differently from how the Constitutional Court interpreted the said provisions in its acts. Otherwise, the constitutional principle that only the Constitutional Court enjoys the powers to officially interpret the Constitution would be violated, the supremacy of the Constitution would be disregarded, and the preconditions would be created for the emergence of incompatibilities in the legal system.

Every ruling of the Constitutional Court constitutes a single whole, and all its constituent parts are interrelated; while adopting new laws or legal acts, amending and supplementing already adopted laws or other legal acts, state institutions that pass such acts are bound both by the concept of the provisions of the Constitution and by other legal arguments that are presented in the reasoning of the respective ruling adopted by the Constitutional Court (rulings of 30 May 2003 and 19 January 2005).

It needs to be emphasised that law-making institutions (officials) and law-applying institutions (officials) are bound by the concept of constitutional provisions and by arguments set out not only in the rulings of the Constitutional Court, but also in other acts of the Constitutional Court, i.e. its conclusions and decisions. Thus, under the Constitution, the content of all acts of the Constitutional Court in which the Constitution is interpreted, i.e. the official constitutional doctrine is formulated, is also binding on law-making institutions (officials) and law-applying institutions, including courts of general jurisdiction and specialised courts.

The erga omnes model of constitutional control

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 28 March 2006

Paragraph 1 of Article 107 of the Constitution provides that a law (or part thereof) or another act (or part thereof) of the Seimas, an act of the President of the Republic, or an act (or part thereof) of the Government may not be applied from the day of the official publication of the decision of the Constitutional Court that the act in question (or part thereof) is in conflict with the Constitution. Thus, the erga omnes model of constitutional control is consolidated in the Constitution.

The legal force of acts adopted by the Constitutional Court (Paragraphs 1 and 2 of Article 107 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 28 March 2006

... the phrase “shall be final and not subject to appeal” of Paragraph 2 of Article 107 of the Constitution, which ... prescribes that the decisions of the Constitutional Court on the issues assigned to its competence by the Constitution are final and not subject to appeal, means that rulings, conclusions, or decisions of the Constitutional Court by which a constitutional justice case is completed, i.e. final acts of the Constitutional Court, are obligatory for all state institutions, courts, all enterprises, establishments, and organisations, as well as officials and citizens, including the Constitutional Court itself: final acts of the Constitutional Court are obligatory for the Constitutional Court itself and they restrict the Constitutional Court from the aspect that it may not change them or review them if there are no constitutional grounds for doing so.

No amendments or supplements to a higher-ranking legal act (including the Constitution) made after the Constitutional Court declared, when referring to the previous provisions of the Constitution, a certain legal act (part thereof) passed by the Seimas, the President of the Republic, or the Government, or adopted by referendum to be in conflict with a certain higher-ranking legal act, inter alia (and, first of all), with the Constitution, may reinstate the legal act (part thereof) that was declared to be in conflict with a certain higher-ranking legal act, inter alia (and, first of all), with the Constitution, in the Lithuanian legal system. Under the Constitution, the Constitutional Court does not have the powers to reinstate such legal acts (parts thereof) in the Lithuanian legal system, either. ...

[...]

... the Constitution does not give any grounds for reinstating retroactively a legal act (part thereof) that has been declared in conflict with a certain higher-ranking legal regulation, inter alia (and, first of all), with one established in the Constitution, in the Lithuanian legal system, or for questioning and annulling the respective rulings, conclusions, or decisions of the Constitutional Court that were constitutionally justifiable at the moment when they were adopted. A different interpretation would result in the disregard of not only the provisions of the Constitution that consolidate the institution of constitutional justice – constitutional judicial control – inter alia, the fact that the decisions of the Constitutional Court are final and not subject to appeal, but also would lead to the denial of the stability of the Constitution, the predictability of decisions adopted by the Constitutional Court, and the legitimate expectations of various legal subjects where the said expectations are created by the aforementioned decisions.

The legal position of the Constitutional Court has the power of precedent

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 22 October 2007

... the legal position (ratio decidendi) of the Constitutional Court has the power of precedent in the respective constitutional justice cases.

The legal force of rulings adopted by the Constitutional Court; the duty of law-making subjects to modify a legal regulation declared to be in conflict with a higher-ranking legal act (Article 107 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's decision of 1 February 2008

Paragraph 1 of Article 107 of the Constitution provides that a law (or part thereof) of the Republic of Lithuania or another act (or part thereof) of the Seimas, an act of the President of the Republic, or an act (or part thereof) of the Government may not be applied from the day of the official publication of the decision of the Constitutional Court that the act in question (or part thereof) is in conflict with the Constitution (Paragraph 1); the decisions of the Constitutional Court on the issues assigned to its competence by the Constitution are final and not subject to appeal (Paragraph 2). Thus, every legal act (or part thereof) passed by the Seimas, the President of the Republic, or the Government, or adopted by referendum, which is declared in conflict with any higher-ranking legal act, inter alia (and, first of all), with the Constitution, is removed from the Lithuanian legal system for good, as it may never be applied anymore (rulings of 28 March 2006 and 6 June 2006 and the decision of 8 August 2006); thus, the respective law-making subject – the Seimas, the President of the Republic, or the Government – is under the constitutional duty to recognise such a legal act (part thereof) no longer valid or, if it is impossible to do without the respective legal regulation of the social relationships in question, to amend it so that the newly established legal regulation would not be in conflict with higher-ranking legal acts, inter alia (and, first of all), the Constitution; but even until this constitutional duty is carried out, the respective legal act (part thereof) may not be applied under any circumstances; in this respect, the legal force of such a legal act is abolished (decision of 8 August 2006).

When new laws are adopted, amended and/or already adopted laws and legal acts are supplemented (also when new legal regulation is established in order to meet the requirements of the Constitution, or when the existing legal regulation is modified in order to harmonise it with the Constitution), all law-making subjects are bound by the jurisprudence of the Constitutional Court, inter alia, by the official constitutional doctrine formed therein (in the reasoning parts of acts adopted by the Constitutional Court), i.e. by the official concept (official interpretation) of provisions (norms and principles) of the Constitution, as well as by other legal arguments set out in acts adopted the Constitutional Court (ruling of 30 May 2003, the decision of 20 September 2005, the rulings of 14 March 2006, 28 March 2006, 9 May 2006, and 6 June 2006 and the decision of 8 August 2006). Such legal acts passed by the Seimas, the President of the Republic, or the Government or those adopted by referendum that establish a new (different) legal regulation instead of the legal regulation ruled by the Constitutional Court to be in conflict with the Constitution or that declare legal acts (parts thereof) that are in conflict with the Constitution to be no longer valid may be challenged at the Constitutional Court in accordance with the established procedure (decision of 8 August 2006).

After the entry into effect of a ruling of the Constitutional Court that has declared a legal act (part thereof) to be in conflict with the Constitution, there might appear various indeterminacies in the legal system, lacunae legis – gaps in the legal regulation, or even a vacuum; in order to avoid this, the legal regulation should be modified in such a manner that gaps in the legal regulation and other indeterminacies would be removed and that the legal regulation would be clear and harmonious (rulings of 19 January 2005 and 23 August 2005 and the decision of 8 August 2006). The Constitution does not tolerate any such a situation where the respective law-making subject avoids or delays the adoption of such legal acts that, while following the official concept of the provisions of the Constitution – the official constitutional doctrine set out in rulings of the Constitutional Court, would modify, as appropriate, the legal regulation that has been ruled to be, by means of a ruling of the Constitutional Court, in conflict with higher-ranking legal acts, inter alia (and, first of all), with the Constitution; such a situation should especially not be tolerated when a lacuna legis, a legal gap, appears in the legal system after the entry into force of a ruling of the Constitutional Court that has ruled a certain legal act (part thereof) in conflict with the Constitution (or another higher-ranking legal act), i.e. when certain social relationships remain legally unregulated, even though, while paying regard to the imperatives of the consistency and inner uniformity of the legal system, which stem from the Constitution, and taking account of the content of these social relationships, the said relationships must be legally regulated (decision of 8 August 2006).

In this context, it needs to be mentioned that legal gaps (including legislative omissions) that are in lower-ranking legal acts may be filled ad hoc when courts within their competence decide cases on an individual social relationship and when they apply (and interpret) law. Therefore, in cases where, instead of the legal regulation that was declared by the Constitutional Court in conflict with a higher-ranking legal act, inter alia, with the Constitution, the respective law-making subject has not passed a legal act (acts) (parts thereof) that would establish a new (different) legal regulation harmonised with the said higher-ranking legal acts, inter alia, with the Constitution, courts have the constitutional duty to ensure the rights and freedoms of a person who applies to a court regarding the violation of his/her rights or freedoms, and they must ensure other constitutional values; thus, courts have the powers, which stem from the Constitution, to apply, inter alia, the general principles of law, as well as higher-ranking legal acts, and, first of all, the Constitution – supreme law. However, it needs to be emphasised that, when courts exercise these constitutional powers, legal gaps are not removed for good – they are only filled ad hoc; still, this permits the ensuring of the protection of the rights and freedoms of a person who applies to a court regarding the defence of his/her violated rights precisely in that individual social relationship due to which a case is considered in that court (decision of 8 August 2006 and the ruling of 7 June 2007).

The Constitutional Court is bound both by the precedents that it itself has created and by the official constitutional doctrine that substantiates such precedents

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 20 February 2008

It has been held on more than one occasion in acts adopted by the Constitutional Court that the Constitutional Court is bound by precedents that it itself has created (in previous constitutional justice cases) and by the official constitutional doctrine that it itself has formed, which substantiates these precedents; it may be possible to deviate from precedents created by the Constitutional Court while adopting decisions in constitutional justice cases and new precedents may be created only in cases where this is unavoidably and objectively necessary, constitutionally justifiable and reasoned; equally, the official constitutional doctrinal provisions on which precedents of the Constitutional Court are based may not be reinterpreted so that the official constitutional doctrine would be modified unless this is unavoidably and objectively necessary, constitutionally justifiable and reasoned (ruling of 28 March 2006, the decisions of 8 August 2006 and 21 November 2006, the rulings of 22 October 2007 and 24 October 2007, and the decisions of 13 November 2007, 6 December 2007, and 1 February 2008).

The legal meaning of factual circumstances established by the Constitutional Court

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 9 February 2010

Factual circumstances established by the Constitutional Court in previous cases are res iudicata; such factual circumstances are not established and proved once again in new cases (conclusion of 31 March 2004).

The right of the legislature to lay down such a legal regulation that would remove negative legal consequences that arose as a result of the application of a legal act declared to be in conflict with the Constitution

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 25 October 2011

In its decision of 13 May 2003, after holding that, under Paragraph 1 of Article 107 of the Constitution, the force of decisions of the Constitutional Court regarding the compliance of legal acts with the Constitution is prospective, the Constitutional Court also noted that, under the Constitution, this does not mean that the legislature may not, on the whole, regulate the relationships occurring prior to the day of the official publication of a decision of the Constitutional Court whereby a law is ruled to be in conflict with the Constitution.

In its ruling of 25 October 2011, the Constitutional Court noted that the Constitution, inter alia, the provision of Paragraph 1 of Article 107 thereof, whereby, inter alia, an act (or part thereof) of the Seimas may not be applied from the day of the official publication of the decision of the Constitutional Court that the act in question (or part thereof) is in conflict with the Constitution, does not deny the right of the Seimas to establish such a new legal regulation that would remove negative legal consequences that arise in the course of the application of a legal act (part thereof) that is later declared by the Constitutional Court, by means of its decision, to be in conflict with the Constitution, i.e. also to apply the new legal regulation to relationships that occurred prior to the day when the said decision of the Constitutional Court was officially published. The said legal regulation must pay regard to the Constitution; it may not violate the public interest and must fulfil, inter alia, the requirements of the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law: it may not create any preconditions for denying justice, legal certainty, and legal security, and it must protect any honestly acquired rights of other persons.

The legal force of rulings adopted by the Constitutional Court (Paragraphs 1 and 2 of Article 107 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's decision of 19 November 2012

In its jurisprudence, the Constitutional Court has interpreted the provisions of Article 107 of the Constitution more than once.

Paragraphs 1 and 2 of Article 107 of the Constitution prescribe:

“A law (or part thereof) of the Republic of Lithuania or another act (or part thereof) of the Seimas, an act of the President of the Republic, or an act (or part thereof) of the Government may not be applied from the day of the official publication of the decision of the Constitutional Court that the act in question (or part thereof) is in conflict with the Constitution of the Republic of Lithuania.

The decisions of the Constitutional Court on the issues assigned to its competence by the Constitution shall be final and not subject to appeal.”

The Constitutional Court has held on more than one occasion that Paragraph 1 of Article 107 of the Constitution should be interpreted as meaning that every legal act (or part thereof) passed by the Seimas, the President of the Republic, or the Government or adopted by referendum that is declared to be in conflict with any higher-ranking legal act, inter alia (and, first of all), with the Constitution, is removed from the Lithuanian legal system for good, as it may never be applied anymore (inter alia, the rulings of 28 March 2006, 6 June 2006, 25 October 2011, and 6 February 2012). The Constitutional Court has also held that, while deciding constitutional justice cases subsequent to petitions of petitioners, it has the constitutional powers to annul the legal force of legal acts (parts thereof) if they are in conflict with higher-ranking legal acts, inter alia (and, first of all), with the Constitution (ruling of 6 June 2006, the decision of 3 May 2010, and the ruling of 25 October 2011).

While interpreting Paragraph 1 of Article 107 of the Constitution, the Constitutional Court has also revealed the content (which arises from the said paragraph) of the presumption of the constitutionality of legal acts and their consequences: the provision of Paragraph 1 of Article 107 of the Constitution, whereby a legal act (or part thereof) may not be applied from the day of the official publication of the decision of the Constitutional Court that the act in question (or part thereof) is in conflict with the Constitution, means that, as long as the Constitutional Court has not adopted the decision that the act in question (or part thereof) is in conflict with the Constitution, it is presumed that such a legal act (part thereof) is in compliance with the Constitution and that legal consequences that arose on the basis of the act in question (part thereof) are legitimate (rulings of 30 December 2003, 22 December 2010, and 25 October 2011).

In its ruling of 30 December 2003, the Constitutional Court held that Paragraph 1 of Article 107 of the Constitution consolidates the general rule that the force of decisions of the Constitutional Court is prospective; however, this rule is not absolute.

Thus, there may be constitutionally justifiable exceptions to the general rule that the force of decisions of the Constitutional Court is prospective, i.e. under the Constitution, in exceptional cases, the force of decisions of the Constitutional Court may also be targeted at the consequences of the application of a legal act declared in conflict with the Constitution where such consequences had arisen before the Constitutional Court adopted the decision that this legal act (part thereof) is in conflict with the Constitution.

It needs to be noted that the exceptions to the general rule established in Paragraph 1 of Article 107 of the Constitution that the legal force of decisions of the Constitutional Court is prospective may be justified by referring to the overall constitutional legal regulation.

The Constitution is an integral act (Paragraph 1 of Article 6 of the Constitution). The Constitutional Court has held more than once that the principles and norms of the Constitution constitute a harmonious system, and that it is not allowed to interpret any provision of the Constitution in a manner that would distort or deny the content of any other constitutional provision, since thus the essence of the entire constitutional regulation would be distorted and the balance of the constitutional values would be disturbed. While invoking such a concept of the provision of Paragraph 1 of Article 6 of the Constitution, in its ruling of 30 December 2003, the Constitutional Court emphasised that, when interpreting the content of Paragraph 1 of Article 107 of the Constitution, account should be taken of other provisions of the Constitution, inter alia, of Paragraph 1 of Article 7 of the Constitution, Article 110 of the Constitution, as well as of the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law. It needs to be noted that the content of Paragraph 1 of Article 107 of the Constitution should also be interpreted in the context of the provisions of Paragraph 2 of this article, as well as those of Articles 1, 5, 6, 18, and 30, and Paragraph 1 of Article 102 of the Constitution.

... while taking account of the overall constitutional legal regulation consolidating the supremacy of the Constitution, it needs to be held that the retroactive applicability of the decision of the Constitutional Court that a legal act (part thereof) is in conflict with the Constitution may be constitutionally justifiable in such exceptional cases where, without applying an exception to the general rule established in Paragraph 1 of Article 107 of the Constitution that the legal force of decisions adopted by the Constitutional Court is prospective, the principle of the supremacy of the Constitution and the related constitutional imperative of the rule of law would be denied and the requirements of administering constitutional justice would, thus, be violated.

The powers of the Constitutional Court, upon establishing that a legal act denies, in essence, the fundamental constitutional values – the independence of the State of Lithuania, democracy, and the republic, or the innate nature of human rights and freedoms, to declare anticonstitutional the consequences of the application of such a legal act (Articles 1 and 18, Paragraph 1 of Article 102, and Paragraph 2 of Article 107 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's decision of 19 November 2012

The fact that independence, democracy, and the republic, as well as the innate nature of human rights and freedoms, are fundamental constitutional values that constitute the foundation of the State of Lithuania as the common good of all society, as well as the fact that these values may not be denied, implies that legal acts (parts thereof) whereby the values of the State of Lithuania – its independence, democracy, and the republic, or the innate nature of human rights and freedoms – would be essentially denied may not be effective as from the day of their adoption and the consequences of the application of such legal acts (parts thereof) must be considered anticonstitutional. A different interpretation of Articles 1 and 18 of the Constitution would mean that not only the principle of the supremacy of the Constitution and the constitutional imperative of the rule of law would be denied, but also the preconditions would be created for losing the independence of the state, disrupting democracy, or abolishing the republic, for denying the innate nature of human rights and freedoms, i.e. for ruining the foundation of the State of Lithuania as the common good of all society, which is consolidated in the Constitution.

Taking account of that, the conclusion should be drawn that the provisions of Paragraph 1 of Article 102 and Paragraph 2 of Article 107 of the Constitution, interpreted in the context of the fundamental constitutional values consolidated in Articles 1 and 18 of the Constitution and in the context of the principle of the supremacy of the Constitution and the constitutional imperative of the rule of law, inter alia, give rise to the powers of the Constitutional Court as the institution administering constitutional justice and guaranteeing constitutional lawfulness and the supremacy of the Constitution in the legal system, upon establishing in a constitutional justice case that an impugned legal act (part thereof) is not only in conflict with the Constitution, but also denies, in essence, the fundamental constitutional values – the independence of the State of Lithuania, democracy, and the republic, or the innate nature of human rights and freedoms, to declare anticonstitutional the consequences of the application of such a legal act (part thereof).

The constitutional prohibition on overruling the legal force of a final act adopted by the Constitutional Court; the powers of the Constitutional Court to declare anticonstitutional the consequences of the application of a legal act that violates this prohibition (Paragraph 1 of Article 102 and Paragraphs 1 and 2 of Article 107 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's decision of 19 November 2012

While interpreting the constitutional legal regulation established in Paragraphs 1 and 2 of Article 107 of the Constitution, the Constitutional Court has held that, under the Constitution, after the Constitutional Court declares a law (part thereof) or another act (part thereof) of the Seimas, an act of the President of the Republic, or an act (part thereof) of the Government to be in conflict with the Constitution, the state institutions that have issued such a legal act – the Seimas, the President of the Republic, or the Government – are prohibited from repeatedly establishing the legal regulation that has been ruled to be in conflict with the Constitution, by adopting certain laws or other legal acts afterwards (ruling of 30 May 2003, the decision of 8 August 2006, and the rulings of 25 October 2011 and 5 September 2012); the legal force of a ruling of the Constitutional Court to declare a legal act or part thereof as unconstitutional may not be overruled by a repeated adoption of an analogous legal act or part thereof (inter alia, the rulings of 30 May 2003, 28 March 2006, 6 June 2006, and 5 September 2012).

Thus, the finality and non-appealability of the decisions of the Constitutional Court established in Paragraph 2 of Article 107 of the Constitution are the basis for the constitutional prohibition on overruling the legal force of a final act of the Constitutional Court. In its ruling of 5 September 2012, the Constitutional Court held that Paragraphs 1 and 2 of Article 107 of the Constitution, inter alia, give rise to the prohibition on repeatedly establishing, by means of later adopted laws or other legal acts, any such a legal regulation that is incompatible with the concept of the provisions of the Constitution set out in the acts of the Constitutional Court. While taking account of that, it needs to be noted that the constitutional prohibition on overruling the legal force of a final act of the Constitutional Court means not only the prohibition on adopting a legal act (part thereof) of the same title, legal force, subject of regulation, and scope as the one that the Constitutional Court has declared to be in conflict with the Constitution, but also the prohibition on adopting a legal act (part thereof) of a different title, legal force, subject of regulation, and scope where the content whereof would be completely or partially identical to such a legal act (part thereof) the legal regulation established in which has been, in terms of its content, declared by the Constitutional Court to be in conflict with the Constitution.

It also needs to be noted that the constitutional prohibition on overruling the legal force of a final act of the Constitutional Court is one of the means of protection consolidated in the Constitution in order to ensure the supremacy of the Constitution and the rule of law. As the Constitutional Court noted in its ruling of 5 September 2012, if the legislature, nonetheless, adopted a law whereby it disregards the said prohibition, such a law could not be a lawful ground for acquiring particular rights or a legal status; a different interpretation of Paragraphs 1 and 2 of Article 107 of the Constitution would not be in line with, inter alia, the principle of the supremacy of the Constitution, as well as the constitutional principles of the separation of powers and a state under the rule of law; in addition, this would also be incompatible with the general legal principle of ex injuria jus non oritur (illegal acts cannot create law).

Thus, the provision of Paragraph 2 of Article 107 of the Constitution implies, inter alia, that, if the prohibition on overruling the legal force of a final act of the Constitutional Court is violated, the principle of the supremacy of the Constitution, which is consolidated in Paragraph 1 of Article 7 of the Constitution, the related constitutional imperative of the rule of law, as well as other aspects of the principle of the supremacy of the Constitution, inter alia, the principle of the separation of powers, which is consolidated in Paragraph 1 of Article 5 of the Constitution, and the provision of Paragraph 2 of Article 5 thereof, whereby the scope of powers is limited by the Constitution, are simultaneously denied. While taking account of that, a legal act (part thereof) whereby an attempt is made to overrule the legal force of a final legal act of the Constitutional Court must not be considered a legal basis for acquiring legitimate expectations, certain rights, or a legal status, i.e. the consequences of the application of such a legal act (part thereof) could be regarded as anticonstitutional, inter alia, the consequences that arose before the adoption of the decision of the Constitutional Court that this legal act (part thereof) is in conflict with the Constitution. The opposite interpretation of Paragraph 2 of Article 107 of the Constitution would mean that, under the Constitution, the law-making subjects are provided with the possibility of overruling the legal force of final acts of the Constitutional Court, i.e. the possibility of not following the Constitution and laws for a certain period of time, until the Constitutional Court repeatedly declares the respective legal regulation to be in conflict with the Constitution. It needs to be emphasised that the recognition of such a possibility would be equal to the denial of the essence of the principle of the supremacy of the Constitution and the constitutional imperative of the rule of law; thus, the said recognition would be inconsistent with the requirements of administering constitutional justice.

In this context, it needs to be noted that ... under the Constitution, inter alia, Paragraph 1 of Article 102 thereof, the Constitutional Court is the institution of constitutional justice, which administers constitutional justice and guarantees constitutional lawfulness and the supremacy of the Constitution in the legal system. While taking account of that, the conclusion should be drawn that the provisions of Paragraph 1 of Article 102 and Paragraph 2 of Article 107 of the Constitution, interpreted in the context of the principle of the supremacy of the Constitution, and the constitutional imperative of the rule of law, inter alia, give rise to the powers of the Constitutional Court, upon establishing in a constitutional justice case that an impugned legal act (part thereof) is in conflict with the Constitution and having assessed all circumstances, also to hold that this act (part thereof) should be assessed as a violation of the constitutional prohibition on overruling the legal force of a final act of the Constitutional Court, and to declare unconstitutional the circumstances of the application of such a legal act (part thereof).

It needs to be noted that, while implementing such constitutional powers, the Constitutional Court is also bound by other imperatives of the principle of a state under the rule of law, inter alia, the requirements for the protection of legitimate expectations, justice, reasonableness, proportionality, impossibilium nulla obligatio est (nobody is obliged to do something that is impossible), and lex non cogit ad impossibilia (legal acts may not require impossible things). In other words, having established a violation of the constitutional prohibition on overruling the legal force of a final act of the Constitutional Court, the Constitutional Court, when deciding whether its ruling declaring a legal act (part thereof) violating this prohibition to be in conflict with the Constitution must be applied retroactively, must assess (in view of the circumstances of a constitutional justice case at issue) the possible consequences of such retroactive applicability, inter alia, the fact whether such applicability is possible at all, whether it would create such a burden upon society and the state that would be disproportionate to the objective aimed at removing completely the consequences of the unconstitutional act, and whether it would create such consequences related to the said burden that would be especially unfavourable for human rights and freedoms.

In this context, it needs to be noted that, in certain special cases, the Constitution generally does not preclude the protection and defence of also such acquired rights of a person arising from legal acts declared later to be in conflict with the Constitution (or from substatutory legal acts declared later to be in conflict with the Constitution and/or laws) where the failure to defend or protect such rights would result in greater harm sustained by a person, other persons, society, or the state than harm inflicted in the case of total non-defence or non-protection, or partial defence or protection of the said rights; when deciding whether the acquired rights gained by a person during the period of the validity of a legal act that is later declared to be in conflict with the Constitution (or to be in conflict with the Constitution and/or laws if such a legal act is substatutory) must be protected and defended or not (and if so, to what extent), it is necessary in every case to find out whether, in the case of the failure to protect and defend such acquired rights, other values protected by the Constitution would be violated and whether the balance of values consolidated, protected, and defended by the Constitution would be disturbed (rulings of 13 December 2004 and 5 July 2007 and the decision of 4 July 2008).

The prohibition precluding a court from applying a legal act declared in conflict with the Constitution (Article 110 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's decision of 19 November 2012

As the Constitutional Court noted in its ruling of 30 December 2003, Article 110 of the Constitution consolidates the prohibition on applying a law that is in conflict with the Constitution and establishes the constitutional duty of a court investigating a case, if it faces doubts about the conformity of a law or another legal act that must be applied in a concrete case with the Constitution, to suspend the consideration of the case and apply to the Constitutional Court, requesting it to decide whether the law or another legal act in question is in compliance with the Constitution; such a constitutional regulation seeks to ensure that a legal act (part thereof) that is in conflict with the Constitution would not be applied, that no unconstitutional legal consequences of the application of such a legal act (part thereof) would arise, and that the rights of a person would not be violated.

Thus, Article 110 of the Constitution establishes an exception to the general rule prescribed in Paragraph 1 of Article 107 thereof that the legal force of decisions of the Constitutional Court is prospective: a court in a case considered by it may not apply a legal act (part thereof) that was declared in conflict with the Constitution by the Constitutional Court when it was implementing the powers established in Paragraph 1 of Article 102 of the Constitution. If the prohibition, which is consolidated in Paragraph 1 of Article 110 of the Constitution, on applying a legal act (part thereof) that is in conflict with the Constitution is interpreted in a different manner, the principle of the supremacy of the Constitution, which is consolidated in Paragraph 1 of Article 7 of the Constitution, the related constitutional imperative of the rule of law, as well as other aspects of the principle of the supremacy of the Constitution, would be denied, inter alia, the principle of the direct application of the Constitution, which is consolidated in Paragraph 1 of Article 6 of the Constitution, the essence of the right of every person to defend his/her rights directly by invoking the Constitution, which is consolidated in Paragraph 2 of this article, and the essence of the right of every person to apply to a court while defending the violated constitutional rights or freedoms, which is consolidated in Paragraph 1 of Article 30 of the Constitution, would be denied.

The legal force of a decision of the Constitutional Court on accepting a petition

The Constitutional Court's decision of 13 November 2013

The decision of the Constitutional Court on accepting the ... petition neither approves nor denies the arguments on which the position of the Seimas, the petitioner, is based; in the course of adopting such decisions, the fact whether the petition is based on legal reasoning is of essential significance (decisions of 15 December 2006, 8 January 2008, 8 October 2008, and 3 April 2009).

... under Paragraph 4 of Article 106 of the Constitution, a resolution of the Seimas asking for an investigation into the conformity of an act with the Constitution suspends the validity of that act. Under Paragraph 1 of Article 107 of the Constitution, a law (or part thereof) of the Republic of Lithuania or another act (or part thereof) of the Seimas, an act of the President of the Republic, or an act (or part thereof) of the Government may not be applied from the day of the official publication of the decision of the Constitutional Court that the act in question (or part thereof) is in conflict with the Constitution. A systemic interpretation of these provisions makes it possible to hold that the decision of the Constitutional Court on accepting a petition set out in a resolution of the Seimas requesting an investigation into whether the provisions of acts of the Government comply with the Constitution suspends the validity of the respective provisions. The fact that the Constitutional Court accepts a petition of the Seimas, the petitioner, and the suspension of the validity of the respective legal act after the accepting of the petition neither quash nor change the legal effects that have occurred (decision of 8 October 2008).

A substatory legal act that is identical to a legal act declared in conflict with the Constitution where such a substatory legal act was adopted in the course of implementing the said legal act may not be applied (Paragraph 1 of Article 107 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's decision of 15 December 2015

... where a legal act (part thereof) adopted by the Seimas is declared unconstitutional by a ruling of the Constitutional Court and, therefore, must not be applied in any situations, this means that the legal force of such a legal act (part thereof) is abolished and state institutions and their officials are under the duty either to abolish such substatory legal acts (provisions thereof) that are of identical content and were adopted in the course of implementing the aforesaid legal act (part thereof) or to amend them in such a way that the content of a newly established legal regulation would not be identical to the one laid down in the unconstitutional legal act; until the moment of the fulfilment of this duty, the respective substatory legal act (part thereof) may not be applied under any circumstances. If such a substatory legal act (part thereof) were applied, the concept of the hierarchy of legal acts, which is consolidated in the Constitution, would be denied.

The presumption of the constitutionality of legal acts and of the lawfulness of the consequences of the application of such legal acts (Paragraph 1 of Article 107 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 27 April 2016

When interpreting Paragraph 1 of Article 107 of the Constitution, the Constitutional Court has disclosed the content of the presumption of the constitutionality of legal acts and of the constitutionality of the consequences of the application of such legal acts: the provision of Paragraph 1 of Article 107 of the Constitution, whereby a law (part thereof) may not be applied from the day of the official publication of the decision of the Constitutional Court that the act in question (part thereof) is in conflict with the Constitution, means that, as long as the Constitutional Court has not adopted a decision that a certain legal act (part thereof) is in conflict with the Constitution, it is presumed that such a legal act (part thereof) is in compliance with the Constitution and that the legal consequences that have appeared on the basis of the act in question are legitimate (inter alia, the rulings of 30 December 2003 and 25 October 2011 and the decision of 19 December 2012).

Consequently, under Paragraph 1 of Article 107 of the Constitution, until the moment when a decision of the Constitutional Court is officially published that a certain legal act (part thereof) is in conflict with the Constitution, it is presumed that the legal act (part thereof) in question is in compliance with the Constitution, and that the legal consequences (as, for instance, where, on the basis of a decision adopted by an institution following the said legal act (part thereof), a person acquired certain rights or a certain legal status or, on the basis of a decision adopted by an institution, a person was not granted certain rights or a certain legal status) that have appeared on the basis of the legal act in question are legitimate (ruling of 25 October 2011).

When the Constitutional Court administers constitutional justice, the stability of the legal system may not be violated and the trust of the subjects of legal relationships in legal acts adopted in the state may not be undermined

Paragraph 1 of Article 102 of the Constitution stipulates that the Constitutional Court decides whether laws and other acts of the Seimas are in conflict with the Constitution and whether the acts of the President of the Republic and the Government are in conflict with the Constitution and laws. The Constitutional Court ensures the supremacy of the Constitution in the legal system and administers constitutional justice.

As the Constitutional Court has held on more than one occasion, it exercises constitutional judicial review; the Constitutional Court is the institution of constitutional justice; while deciding, within its competence, on the compliance of lower-ranking legal acts (parts thereof) with higher-ranking legal acts, inter alia (and, first of all), with the Constitution, and exercising its other constitutional powers, the Constitutional Court – an autonomous and independent court – administers constitutional justice and guarantees constitutional lawfulness and the supremacy of the Constitution in the legal system.

In this context, it should be noted that the concept of constitutional justice, which stems from the Constitution, implies not formal and nominal constitutional justice, but such final acts of the Constitutional Court that are not unfair by their content; otherwise, if no possibility is created for the Constitutional Court to adopt, in accordance with the powers conferred on it, such a final act that would meet the criteria of justice, the supremacy of the Constitution in the legal system would not be ensured, and the administration of constitutional justice and the ensuring of constitutional lawfulness would be prevented; the powers of the Constitutional Court to administer constitutional justice and to ensure constitutional lawfulness are inseparable from the imperatives of the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law, inter alia, from the requirements of the protection of legitimate expectations, legal security, legal certainty, justice, and reasonableness (ruling of 19 June 2018).

... under Paragraph 1 of Article 107 of the Constitution, a legal act (or part thereof) may not be applied from the day of the official publication of the decision of the Constitutional Court that the act in question (or part thereof) is in conflict with the Constitution.

In this context, it should be noted that Paragraph 1 of Article 107 of the Constitution consolidates the general rule that the legal force of decisions adopted by the Constitutional Court is prospective (inter alia, the ruling of 30 December 2003 and the decisions of 19 December 2012 and 21 March 2019). It should also be noted that Paragraph 1 of Article 107 of the Constitution gives rise to the presumption of the constitutionality of legal acts and the legitimacy of the consequences of their application: as the Constitutional Court has held on more than one occasion, the provision of Paragraph 1 of Article 107 of the Constitution that a legal act (part thereof) may not be applied from the day of the official publication of the decision of the Constitutional Court that the act in question (part thereof) is in conflict with the Constitution means that, as long as the Constitutional Court has not officially published the decision that a certain legal act (part thereof) is in conflict with the Constitution, it is presumed that such a legal act (part thereof) is in compliance with the Constitution and that the legal consequences that have appeared on the basis of the act in question are legitimate (inter alia, the rulings of 30 December 2003 and 25 October 2011 and the decision of 21 March 2019).

Therefore, in the light of the above-mentioned imperatives of the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law, inter alia, the requirements of the protection of legitimate expectations, legal security, legal certainty, justice, and reasonableness, as well as in the light of the imperative of the balance of constitutional values and the above-mentioned presumption of the constitutionality and legitimacy of legal acts, it should be noted that, when the Constitutional Court administers constitutional justice and ensures constitutional lawfulness by adopting rulings in the cases before it, the stability of the legal system may not be violated and the trust of the subjects of legal relationships in legal acts adopted in the state may not be undermined.

The duty of law-making subjects to establish a legal regulation that is not in conflict with the Constitution

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 25 November 2019

... as held by the Constitutional Court, the removal of legal gaps is a matter within the competence of the respective (competent) law-making subject; it is also possible to fill legal gaps to a certain extent in the course of the application of law and, thus, also in the course of interpreting law, inter alia, by courts that administer justice and, within their competence, decide individual cases and are obliged to interpret law in order they could apply it; courts can fill legal gaps on an ad hoc basis, i.e. they may remove legal gaps with respect to an individual social relationship due to which a concrete dispute is decided in the respective case before the court. It is possible to conclusively remove legal gaps only when the law-making institutions issue the respective legal acts; the possibility of filling legal gaps ad hoc does not mean that the legislature does not have the duty, paying regard to the Constitution and within a reasonable time period, to establish the proper legal regulation of particular relationships by means of a law (inter alia, the decision of 8 August 2006 and the ruling of 7 June 2007). The constitutional duty to establish the proper legal regulation of particular relationships by means of legal acts within a reasonable time period and having regard to the Constitution is also mutatis mutandis applicable to other law-making subjects.

The suspension of the validity of a legal act impugned before the Constitutional Court

The Constitutional Court's decision (no KT98-S93/2020) of 28 May 2020

... under Paragraph 5 (wording of 21 March 2019) of Article 106 of the Constitution, a resolution of the Seimas asking for an investigation into the conformity of an act with the Constitution suspends the validity of that act. It should be noted that the suspension of the validity of a legal act, as provided for in Paragraph 5 of Article 106 of the Constitution, in those cases where the President of the Republic or the Seimas, by means of its resolution, applies to the Constitutional Court concerning the compliance of this legal act with the Constitution does not in itself deny the presumption of the constitutionality of the impugned legal act and the legitimacy of the consequences of its application, which stems from Paragraph 1 of Article 107 of the Constitution.

In this context, it should also be noted that the Constitutional Court has held on more than one occasion that the decision of the Constitutional Court to accept a petition of the Seimas, the petitioner, and the suspension of the validity of the respective legal act upon accepting the petition neither annul nor change the legal consequences that have occurred (decisions of 8 January 2008, 8 October 2008, and 13 November 2013).

8.5.3. The publication of acts adopted by the Constitutional Court

The powers of the Constitutional Court to postpone the official publication of its rulings (Paragraph 1 of Article 107 of the Constitution)The Constitutional Court's ruling of 19 January 2005

... from the day of the public pronouncement of a ruling or another decision of the Constitutional Court in the courtroom until its official publication ... a certain period of time passes. Thus, normally, after a ruling of the Constitutional Court is pronounced in the courtroom, its content is known before its official publication, although, according to the procedure set by the Constitution and laws, such a ruling of the Constitutional Court is not yet valid.

Under Paragraph 1 of Article 107 of the Constitution, a law (or part thereof) may not be applied from the day of the official publication of the decision of the Constitutional Court that the law in question (or part thereof) is in conflict with the Constitution. Thus, after the entry into effect of a ruling of the Constitutional Court that has declared a law (part thereof) to be conflicting with the Constitution, there might appear various indeterminacies in the legal system, lacunae legis – gaps in the legal regulation, or even a vacuum. Thus, it is necessary to modify the regulation laid down in laws in such a way that the gaps in the legal regulation and other uncertainties would be removed and the legal regulation would be clear and harmonised.

Under the Constitution, the Constitutional Court, having assessed, inter alia, what legal situation might arise after a ruling of the Constitutional Court becomes effective, may establish the date of the official publication of that ruling; the Constitutional Court may postpone the official publication of its ruling if this is necessary to give the legislature time to remove the lacunae legis that would occur if the respective ruling of the Constitutional Court were officially published immediately after its public pronouncement at the hearing of the Constitutional Court and if such a lacunae legis constituted the preconditions for denying, in essence, certain values defended and protected by the Constitution. The said postponement of the official publication of a ruling of the Constitutional Court (inter alia, a ruling by which a certain law (or part thereof) is ruled to be in conflict with the Constitution) is a precondition stemming from the Constitution in order to avoid certain consequences unfavourable to society and the state, as well as to human rights and freedoms, that might arise if the respective ruling of the Constitutional Court were officially published immediately after it is pronounced publicly at the hearing of the Constitutional Court and if it became effective on the day of its official publication.

It should be stressed that the legislature, while passing new laws or amending and supplementing valid ones, may not disregard the concept of the provisions of the Constitution and other legal arguments set out in a ruling of the Constitutional Court that was officially published and became effective. Otherwise, the preconditions would be created to declare such laws, provided the Constitutional Court was addressed regarding their constitutionality, to be in conflict with the Constitution. ... such preconditions could also emerge in cases where laws are adopted or valid laws are amended or supplemented while disregarding the concept of the provisions of the Constitution and other legal arguments stated in a ruling of the Constitutional Court publicly pronounced at the hearing of the Constitutional Court but not yet published officially, regardless of whether or not such a ruling of the Constitutional Court ruled a certain law (or part thereof) to be in conflict with the Constitution.

It should be held that the said statements regarding the time passing from the public pronouncement of a ruling of the Constitutional Court in the courtroom until the official publication of such a ruling may be applied mutatis mutandis to conclusions and decisions of the Constitutional Court.

The powers of the Constitutional Court to postpone the official publication of its rulings*The Constitutional Court's ruling of 1 July 2013*

... the Constitutional Court has the constitutional powers to establish a later date of the official publication (thus, also that of the entry into force) of its ruling that declares a certain legal act (part thereof) to be in conflict with higher-ranking legal acts, inter alia (and, first of all), with the Constitution, in cases where, in order to implement that ruling, it is necessary to accordingly redistribute the financial resources of the state and to adopt the related amendments to laws.

8.5.4. The interpretation of acts adopted by the Constitutional Court

The powers of the Constitutional Court to interpret its final acts

The Constitutional Court's decision of 14 March 2006

While deciding, within its competence, on the compliance of lower-ranking legal acts (parts thereof) with higher-ranking legal acts, inter alia (and, first of all), with the Constitution, and exercising its other constitutional powers, the Constitutional Court administers constitutional justice and guarantees constitutional lawfulness and the supremacy of the Constitution in the legal system. Administering constitutional justice, as well as guaranteeing constitutional lawfulness and the supremacy of the Constitution in the legal system, implies that every decision of the Constitutional Court must be argued properly (clearly and rationally) in the respective act of the Constitutional Court. In this context, it should be noted that, as held by the Constitutional Court, a ruling of the Constitutional Court is integral, its operative part is based on the arguments of the reasoning part (decisions of 12 January 2000, 11 February 2004, 13 February 2004, and 10 February 2005).

On the other hand, such situations are possible where certain provisions of a ruling or another final act of the Constitutional Court are not clear enough to the subject that must follow and execute that ruling of another act of the Constitutional Court. Such situations are also possible where, due to certain reasons, the Constitutional Court sees that certain provisions of a ruling or another final act of the Constitutional Court must be interpreted in order to ensure the proper execution of that ruling or another act of the Constitutional Court so that the said ruling or another act of the Constitutional Court would be followed.

Even though the powers of the Constitutional Court to interpret its rulings and other final acts are not expressis verbis consolidated in the Constitution, they doubtlessly arise from the Constitution – the entirety of the constitutional legal regulation (inter alia, the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law): such powers of the Constitutional Court are implied by the constitutional mission of the Constitutional Court to administer constitutional justice and to guarantee constitutional lawfulness and the supremacy of the Constitution in the legal system. This implies the necessity for the Constitutional Court, under the specified circumstances, to interpret the respective ruling or another final act of the Constitutional Court.

The purpose of the institution of the interpretation of rulings and other final acts of the Constitutional Court is to reveal the content and meaning of certain provisions of a ruling or another final act of the Constitutional Court more broadly and in more detail where this is necessary so that the proper execution of that ruling or another final act would be ensured and the said ruling or another final act of the Constitutional Court would be followed.

The powers of the Constitutional Court, which arise from the Constitution, to interpret its rulings and other final acts imply the duty of the legislature to establish in the Law on the Constitutional Court (which, under Paragraph 2 of Article 102 of the Constitution, establishes the status of the Constitutional Court and the procedure for the execution of its powers) the following: the definition of the subjects on whose initiative a ruling or another final act of the Constitutional Court may be interpreted; the procedure for applying to the Constitutional Court with a petition requesting the interpretation of a ruling or another final act of the Constitutional Court; and the form of a legal act by which the Constitutional Court performs the interpretation of its rulings. The Law on the Constitutional Court may also establish other elements regarding the implementation of the powers of the Constitutional Court to interpret its rulings.

... the Constitutional Court must interpret its ruling without changing its content. The Constitutional Court has held that, when interpreting its ruling, the Constitutional Court is bound both by the content of the operative part and reasoning part of its ruling (decisions of 12 January 2000, 11 February 2004, 13 February 2004, and 10 February 2005).

... a decision concerning the interpretation of a ruling of the Constitutional Court is adopted as a separate document. The Constitutional Court has held that a decision adopted concerning the interpretation of a ruling of the Constitutional Court is inseparable from that ruling of the Constitutional Court (decisions of 12 January 2000, 11 February 2004, 13 February 2004, and 10 February 2005).

... while interpreting its ruling, the Constitutional Court may not interpret the content of the ruling in such a way that would change the meaning of its provisions, inter alia, the notional entirety of the elements constituting the content of the ruling, and the arguments and reasons upon which that ruling of the Constitutional Court is based.

... the Constitutional Court may not interpret what it did not investigate in the constitutional justice case in which the ruling that is being interpreted was adopted.

Thus, the institution of the interpretation of a ruling (another final act) of the Constitutional Court differs in substance from the institution of the review of a ruling (another final act) of the Constitutional Court.

The interpretation of final acts of the Constitutional Court where this is necessary so that such acts would be properly followed in administering justice

The Constitutional Court's decision of 22 April 2010

In its acts, the Constitutional Court has held more than once that the purpose of the institution of the interpretation of rulings and other final acts of the Constitutional Court is to reveal the content and meaning of certain provisions of a ruling or another final act of the Constitutional Court more broadly and in more detail where this is necessary so that the proper execution of that ruling or another final act would be ensured and the said ruling or another final act of the Constitutional Court would be followed.

Thus, if a court considering a case applies to the Constitutional Court with a petition requesting the interpretation of certain provisions of a ruling or another final act of the Constitutional Court and if the Constitutional Court does not interpret such provisions of its ruling or another final act and does not reveal the content and meaning thereof more broadly and in more detail where this is necessary in order to ensure the proper execution of that ruling or another final act of the Constitutional Court so that the said ruling or another final act of the Constitutional Court would be followed, the values, inter alia, the constitutional rights of a person consolidated, defended, and protected by the Constitution could be violated, which would mean that justice would not be administered.

... the right of the Constitutional Court, which is laid down in ... the Law on the Constitutional Court, to officially interpret its ruling, inter alia, on its own initiative, means that the Constitutional Court interprets its rulings or other final acts, i.e. discloses the content and meaning of these acts more broadly and in more detail where this is necessary in order to ensure the proper execution of the respective ruling or another final act of the Constitutional Court and in order to ensure that the respective ruling or another final act of the Constitutional Court would be not formally, but properly followed and that justice consolidated, protected, and defended by the Constitution would be administered. The ex officio powers of the Constitutional Court to interpret its rulings or other final acts also mean that the Constitutional Court may interpret its rulings or other final acts where this is necessary so that acts adopted by the Constitutional Court would be followed properly while administering justice irrespective of whether the respective petition of the subjects indicated in the Law on the Constitutional Court is present.

In view of the said circumstances, it needs to be held that, having established the constitutionally justifiable interest of the petitioner – a court considering a case – to remove doubts about the proper execution of rulings or other final acts (provisions thereof) of the Constitutional Court in order that justice would be properly administered in a case considered by that court, the Constitutional Court may accept requests to interpret certain provisions of a ruling or another final act of the Constitutional Court and investigate these requests in the manner prescribed by law, as well as pronounce a decision on such interpretation.

The interpretation of final acts of the Constitutional Court

The Constitutional Court's decision of 29 November 2012

The Constitutional Court has held that, even though the powers of the Constitutional Court to interpret its rulings and other final acts are not expressis verbis consolidated in the Constitution, they doubtlessly arise from the Constitution – the entirety of the constitutional legal regulation (inter alia, the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law): such powers of the Constitutional Court are implied by the constitutional mission of the Constitutional Court itself to administer constitutional justice and to guarantee constitutional lawfulness and the supremacy of the Constitution in the legal system (decision of 14 March 2006).

In its acts, the Constitutional Court has held on more than one occasion that the purpose of the institution of the interpretation of its rulings and other final acts is to reveal the content and meaning of certain provisions of a ruling or another final act of the Constitutional Court more broadly and in more detail where this is necessary in order to ensure the proper execution of that ruling or another final act of the Constitutional Court and in order to ensure that the said ruling or another final act of the Constitutional Court would be followed (inter alia, the decisions of 22 December 2010, 23 February 2011, and 5 September 2011).

In this context, it needs to be emphasised that the purpose of the interpretation of a ruling or another final act of the Constitutional Court is to explain more comprehensively the provisions and formulations of a ruling or another final act of the Constitutional Court regarding the meaning of which there are some uncertainties, but not to explain how to implement the said ruling or another final act in a concrete situation, inter alia, in the area of the application of law.

It should be noted that the interpretation of a ruling or another final act of the Constitutional Court may be significant not only in order to ensure the proper implementation of the decision consolidated in the operative part of that act, but also to ensure the fact that, in the law-making process, proper consideration is given to the official constitutional doctrine formed by the Constitutional Court.

It should be emphasised that petitions requesting the interpretation of an implemented ruling or another final act of the Constitutional Court may not seek the assessment of the compliance of a legal act adopted for implementing the said ruling or another final act of the Constitutional Court with other higher-ranking legal acts, inter alia (and, first of all), with the Constitution; this would constitute a matter for a new constitutional justice case.

... it needs to be noted that, under Paragraph 3 of Article 107 of the Constitution, on the basis of the conclusions of the Constitutional Court, the Seimas takes a final decision. Thus, after receiving the conclusion of the Constitutional Court that the election law was violated during the election of the members of the Seimas, the Seimas is obliged to adopt a final decision.

In cases where, on the grounds of a conclusion of the Constitutional Court, a final decision of the Seimas was adopted, the Constitutional Court has the powers to assess and decide on whether or not the interpretation of that conclusion would be senseless and on refusing to interpret it. A conclusion of the Constitutional Court on the grounds of which a final decision of the Seimas was adopted may be interpreted, inter alia, for the purpose that, in the law-making process, proper consideration would be given to the official constitutional doctrine formed by the Constitutional Court.

It needs to be noted that a petition requesting the interpretation of the conclusion of the Constitutional Court that during the election of the members of the Seimas the law on elections was violated may not question the compliance of an act of the Seimas adopted on the grounds of the said conclusion with higher-ranking legal acts, inter alia (and, first of all), with the Constitution. This may be done by initiating a new constitutional justice case, where subjects provided for in the Constitution apply to the Constitutional Court with a petition.

The Constitutional Court has emphasised on more than one occasion that the consideration of a petition requesting the interpretation of a ruling or another final act of the Constitutional Court does not imply any new constitutional justice case.

In this context, it should be noted that ... the Constitutional Court must interpret its ruling without changing its content. The Constitutional Court has held on more than one occasion that ... while interpreting its ruling, the Constitutional Court may not interpret the content of the ruling in such a way that would change the meaning of its provisions, inter alia, the notional entirety of the elements constituting the content of the ruling, and the arguments and reasons upon which that ruling of the Constitutional Court is based. A ruling of the Constitutional Court is integral and all its constituent parts are interrelated; the operative (resolving) part of a ruling is based upon the arguments of the reasoning part; while interpreting its ruling, the Constitutional Court is bound by the content of both the operative part and reasoning part of its ruling. ... the Constitutional Court has also held in its acts on more than one occasion that the Constitutional Court may not interpret what it did not investigate in the constitutional justice case in which the ruling, the interpretation of which is requested, was adopted; this would imply a matter for a separate investigation.

The Constitutional Court has also held that the powers of the Constitutional Court, which arise from the Constitution and which are established in the Law on the Constitutional Court, to officially interpret its rulings may not be interpreted as meaning that they also include the duty of the Constitutional Court to interpret such arguments or reasons of the consolidation and formulation of its ruling or separate provisions thereof that are not specified in that ruling of the Constitutional Court (decision of 14 March 2006).

These provisions mutatis mutandis also apply where the Constitutional Court interprets its other final acts, inter alia, conclusions presented under Paragraph 3 of Article 105 of the Constitution.

... it also needs to be noted that, in cases where the Constitutional Court is requested to provide the interpretation of the provisions of the operative part of its ruling or another final act by ignoring their link with the provisions of the official constitutional doctrine set out in the reasoning part and with other arguments, the Constitutional Court, while taking account of the fact that the provisions of the operative part of a ruling or another final act may not be interpreted in isolation of the provisions of the official constitutional doctrine set out in the reasoning part and in isolation of other arguments, has the powers to refuse to interpret its ruling or another legal act subsequent to such a petition.

The interpretation of final acts of the Constitutional Court

The Constitutional Court's decision of 13 March 2013

In its acts, the Constitutional Court has held more than once that the purpose of the institution of the interpretation of its rulings and its other final acts is to reveal the content and meaning of certain provisions of a ruling or another final act of the Constitutional Court more broadly and in more detail where this is necessary in order to ensure the proper execution of that ruling or another final act of the Constitutional Court so that the said ruling or another final act of the Constitutional Court would be followed (inter alia, the decisions of 22 December 2010, 23 February 2011, 5 September 2011, and 29 November 2012). The interpretation of a ruling or another final act of the Constitutional Court may be significant not only in seeking to ensure the proper implementation of the decision consolidated in the operative part of the said act, but also to ensure that, in the law-making process, proper consideration is given to the official constitutional doctrine formulated by the Constitutional Court (decision of 29 November 2012).

In its decision of 29 November 2012, the Constitutional Court emphasised that the purpose of the interpretation of a ruling or another final act of the Constitutional Court is to explain more comprehensively the provisions and formulations of a ruling or another final act of the Constitutional Court regarding the meaning of which there are some uncertainties, but not to explain how to implement the said ruling or another final act in a concrete situation, inter alia, in the area of the application of law.

... the Constitutional Court has held that, in the course of the interpretation of its ruling, it is bound by the content of both the operative and reasoning parts of its ruling. It has also been held on more than one occasion that ... in interpreting its ruling, the Constitutional Court may not interpret the content of the ruling in such a way that would change the meaning of its provisions, inter alia, the notional entirety of the elements constituting the content of the ruling, and the arguments and reasons upon which that ruling of the Constitutional Court is based; it has also been held that the Constitutional Court may not interpret what it did not investigate in the constitutional justice case in which the ruling, the interpretation of which is requested, was adopted. The consideration of a petition requesting the interpretation of a ruling of the Constitutional Court or its other final act does not imply a new constitutional justice case.

Thus, while interpreting its final acts, the Constitutional Court does not review them; it may not refer to reasons other than those set out in the reasoning part of the interpreted legal act and it may not interpret its final act differently from what is decided in its operative part.

It needs to be noted that the Constitutional Court carries out constitutional judicial control; the Constitutional Court is the institution of constitutional justice; the Constitutional Court – an individual and independent court – administers constitutional justice and guarantees constitutional lawfulness and the supremacy of the Constitution in the legal system (inter alia, the rulings of 6 June 2006 and 29 June 2010 and the decision of 19 December 2012). It also needs to be noted that the Constitutional Court, while invoking the official constitutional doctrine and precedents that it itself has formed, must ensure the continuity of the constitutional jurisprudence (its coherence and consistency) and the predictability of its decisions (decision of 21 November 2006 and the rulings of 22 October 2007, 24 October 2007, and 5 September 2012).

Thus, the Constitutional Court is a legal, but not a political institution. The Constitutional Court decides the legal issues assigned to its competence by the Constitution only by invoking legal arguments, inter alia, the official constitutional doctrine and precedents that it itself formulated. While taking account of this, it needs to be noted that the interpretation of final acts of the Constitutional Court may not be determined by accidental (from the legal point of view) factors (for example, change in the composition of the Constitutional Court); the Constitutional Court may not interpret its final acts by following, inter alia, political expediency arguments, documents of political parties or other public organisations, opinions of and assessments by politicians, political science or sociological research, or results of public opinion polls. Otherwise, the preconditions may arise for doubting the impartiality of the Constitutional Court and a threat may emerge to its independence and the stability of the Constitution itself, inter alia, the official constitutional doctrine.

It should also be noted that the uniformity and continuity of the official constitutional doctrine imply the necessity to interpret each provision of a ruling or another final act of the Constitutional Court in the light of both the entire official constitutional doctrinal context and other provisions (both explicit and implicit) of the Constitution that are related to the provision (provisions) of the Constitution in the course of the interpretation of which the respective provision of the official constitutional doctrine was formulated in a certain ruling or another final act of the Constitutional Court. As the Constitutional Court has held more than once, no official constitutional doctrinal provision of a ruling or another final act of the Constitutional Court may be interpreted in isolation, by ignoring its meaning and systemic links with other official constitutional doctrinal provisions set out in that ruling or another final act of the Constitutional Court, or in other acts of the Constitutional Court, as well as with other provisions (explicit and implicit) of the Constitution (inter alia, the decisions of 28 October 2009, 6 November 2009, and 18 December 2009).

The Constitutional Court has also held more than once that, in the official interpretation ... of rulings and other final acts of the Constitutional Court, the official constitutional doctrine is not modified; the modification of the official constitutional doctrine (which, undoubtedly, must always be constitutionally justified and explicitly reasoned in the respective act of the Constitutional Court) should be related to the consideration of new constitutional justice cases and the creation of new precedents of the Constitutional Court therein, but not with the official interpretation of the provisions of rulings and other final acts of the Constitutional Court (decisions of 6 December 2007, 1 February 2008, 4 July 2008, 15 January 2009, 15 May 2009, 28 October 2009, 6 November 2009, and 18 December 2009).

The interpretation of final acts of the Constitutional Court

The Constitutional Court's decision of 8 November 2017

... when interpreting its final acts, the Constitutional Court may not amend them and/or modify the official constitutional doctrine set out in these acts on the grounds of the changed legal regulation established in laws and other legal acts where the legal regulation changed after the adoption of the said final acts.

The decision of the Constitutional Court to accept a petition is not a final act the provisions of which the Constitutional Court has the powers to interpret under the Constitution

The Constitutional Court's decision (no KT98-S93/2020) of 28 May 2020

... the decision of the Constitutional Court [to accept a petition] is not a final act of the Constitutional Court the provisions of which the Constitutional Court has the powers to officially interpret under the Constitution and the Law on the Constitutional Court. By such a decision, neither the constitutional justice case is completed (upon having considered the constitutional justice case on its merits, or having dismissed the instituted legal proceedings, or having dismissed the case) nor the consideration of the petition is refused.

An announcement by the President of the Constitutional Court is not a final act the provisions of which the Constitutional Court has the powers to interpret under the Constitution

The Constitutional Court's decision (no KT98-S93/2020) of 28 May 2020

... an announcement by the President of the Constitutional Court is not a final act of the Constitutional Court the provisions of which the Constitutional Court has the powers to officially interpret under the Constitution and the Law on the Constitutional Court.

8.5.5. The review of acts adopted by the Constitutional Court

The review of final acts adopted by the Constitutional Court; the development of the official constitutional doctrine does not constitute grounds for reviewing the final acts of the Constitutional Court adopted in previous cases

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 28 March 2006

Under Paragraph 2 of Article 107 of the Constitution, which ... prescribes that the decisions of the Constitutional Court on the issues assigned to its competence by the Constitution are final and not subject to appeal, the rulings, conclusions, and decisions of the Constitutional Court by which a constitutional justice case is completed, i.e. final acts of the Constitutional Court, may not be reviewed except in cases where the necessity to review them stems from the Constitution itself.

... the rulings, conclusions, and decisions of the Constitutional Court by which a constitutional justice case is completed, i.e. final acts of the Constitutional Court, are final and not subject to appeal, irrespective of whether the Constitutional Court adopts such acts in the respective constitutional justice case after it has investigated on the merits the compliance of a legal act (part thereof) with the Constitution (another higher-ranking legal act) or has not investigated the compliance of a legal act (part thereof) with the Constitution (another higher-ranking legal act) on the merits but, by means of a properly (clearly and rationally) reasoned decision, has refused to consider the petition, or has dismissed the instituted legal proceedings (case) (where the respective petition has been received at the Constitutional Court and the preparation of a constitutional justice case for a hearing at the Constitutional Court has begun, or if it has already been considered in a hearing at the Constitutional Court).

... the phrase "shall be final and not subject to appeal" of Paragraph 2 of Article 107 of the Constitution, which ... prescribes that the decisions of the Constitutional Court on the issues assigned to its competence by the Constitution are final and not subject to appeal, means that rulings, conclusions, or decisions of the Constitutional Court by which a constitutional justice case is completed, i.e. final acts of the Constitutional Court, are obligatory for all state institutions, courts, all enterprises, establishments and organisations, as well as officials and citizens, including the Constitutional Court itself: final acts of the Constitutional Court are obligatory for the Constitutional Court itself and they restrict the Constitutional Court from the aspect that it may not change them or review them if there are no constitutional grounds for doing so.

Thus, it needs to be emphasised that, under the Constitution, no development of the official constitutional doctrine – neither the supplementing of the conception of the provisions of the Constitution provided in the acts of the Constitutional Court adopted in previous constitutional justice cases with new elements (fragments) nor the reinterpretation of the official constitutional doctrinal provisions formulated previously where the official constitutional doctrine is modified – may constitute or constitutes grounds for reviewing the rulings, conclusions, or decisions (or their reasoning) that were adopted in previous constitutional justice cases and by which certain constitutional justice cases were completed.

The same can also be said about such cases where the Constitutional Court, after it receives a petition of a court of general jurisdiction or a specialised court (established under Paragraph 2 of Article 111 of the Constitution) requesting an investigation into and a decision on whether a certain act (part thereof) passed by the Seimas, the President of the Republic, or the Government or that adopted by referendum is in conflict with a higher-ranking legal act, inter alia (and, first of all), with the Constitution, does not decide, under the Constitution and the Law on the Constitutional Court, on the respective question on the merits by means of a properly (clearly and rationally) argued decision – it refuses to consider the petition or dismisses the instituted legal proceedings (case) where the respective petition has been received at the Constitutional Court and the preparation of a constitutional justice case for a hearing at the Constitutional Court has begun or it has already been considered in a hearing at the Constitutional Court.

... neither any development of the official constitutional doctrine nor the application of new methods of the interpretation of law while interpreting certain provisions of the Constitution constitutes or may constitute grounds for the Constitutional Court to review its final legal acts – rulings, conclusions, and decisions, inter alia, those by means of which the Constitutional Court refuses to consider a petition of the petitioner – a court – requesting an investigation into and a decision on whether a legal act (part thereof) passed by the Seimas, the President of the Republic, or the Government or that adopted by referendum is in conflict with a higher-ranking legal act, inter alia (and, first of all), with the Constitution, or by which the instituted legal proceedings (case) are (is) dismissed where the respective petition has been received at the Constitutional Court and the preparation of a constitutional justice case for a hearing at the Constitutional Court has begun or it has already been considered in a hearing at the Constitutional Court.

... Paragraph 1 of Article 107 of the Constitution means that every legal act (part thereof) passed by the Seimas, the President of the Republic, or the Government or that adopted by referendum where such a legal act is declared in conflict with any higher-ranking legal act, inter alia (and, first of all), with the Constitution, is removed from the Lithuanian legal system for good and may never be applied.

... [the] provisions [of Paragraphs 1 and 2 of Article 107] of the Constitution help to ensure the stability and certainty of the legal regulation of social relationships, the continuity of the jurisprudence of the Constitutional Court (and other courts), the predictability of their activity and adopted decisions, while the subjects of constitutional legal relationships are protected from such review of final legal acts adopted by the Constitutional Court that would be determined not by the objective constitutional necessity, but by accidental (from the legal point of view) factors.

The powers of the Constitutional Court to review its final acts where the necessity to review them stems from the Constitution itself (where new essential circumstances come to light)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 28 March 2006

Although the Constitution does not expressis verbis specify that the Constitutional Court has the powers to review its rulings, conclusions, and decisions, nor does it contain any expressis verbis specified grounds empowering the Constitutional Court to review its rulings, conclusions, and decisions, this does not mean that the said powers and grounds for the Constitutional Court are not established in the Constitution at all. The powers of the Constitutional Court to review its rulings, conclusions, and decisions arise out of the constitutional mission of the Constitutional Court to administer constitutional justice, to guarantee constitutional lawfulness and the supremacy of the Constitution in the legal system; such powers of the Constitutional Court are also implied by the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law, according to which it is required that jurisdictional institutions (thus, including the Constitutional Court) seek to establish the objective truth and that they adopt their decisions only on the grounds of law (rulings of 11 May 1999, 19 September 2000, 24 January 2003, and 13 December 2004).

The opposite interpretation would mean that the Constitutional Court may not review its rulings, conclusions, and decisions even where they were adopted when the Constitutional Court did not know about such essential circumstances that, if had been known, could determine a different content of the adopted rulings, conclusions, and decisions. It is obvious that such interpretation would be inconsistent with the constitutional mission of the Constitutional Court and the concept of the powers established for it in the Constitution, because this would imply, inter alia, the fact the Constitutional Court may not administer constitutional justice and guarantee constitutional lawfulness and the supremacy of the Constitution in the legal system.

However, it should be emphasised that the Constitutional Court may review its rulings, conclusions, and decisions only if there are constitutional grounds for doing so. The interpretation that the Constitutional Court may also review its rulings, conclusions, and decisions where the necessity to review them does not arise out of the Constitution, i.e. where no significant new circumstances come to light that were unknown at the time when the respective final act of the Constitutional Court was passed, would mean that the Constitutional Court is not bound by Paragraph 2 of Article 107 of the Constitution, under which ... final acts of the Constitutional Court are binding on the Constitutional Court itself and they restrict the Constitutional Court from the aspect that it may not change or review them if there are no constitutional grounds for doing so. Such interpretation would also not be in line with the Constitution because it would create the preconditions for denying the continuity of the constitutional jurisprudence and violating the principle of the supremacy of the Constitution, the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law, and other provisions of the Constitution.

... the Constitutional Court has the powers to review not only its rulings, but also its other final acts.

However, it should be emphasised that ... under the Constitution, the final acts of the Constitutional Court are final and not subject to appeal; therefore, they are obligatory for the Constitutional Court itself (irrespective of whether the Constitutional Court adopts such acts in the respective constitutional justice case after it has investigated on the merits the compliance of a legal act (part thereof) with the Constitution (another higher-ranking legal act) or where it has not investigated such compliance on the merits); they restrict the Constitutional Court from the aspect that it may not change or review them if there are no constitutional grounds for doing so; they may be reviewed only in cases where the necessity to review them arises out of the Constitution itself. ...

It needs to be noted that a final act of the Constitutional Court may be reviewed only upon the initiative of the Constitutional Court itself ... This provision does not mean that various legal subjects, inter alia, those that, under the Constitution ... may apply to the Constitutional Court with a petition or request on the issues assigned to the jurisdiction of the Constitutional Court, may not raise the question of the review of a final act of the Constitutional Court at the Constitutional Court; however, under the Constitution ... while deciding whether to do so, the Constitutional Court has broad discretion.

Amendments to the Constitution do not constitute grounds for reviewing acts adopted by the Constitutional Court

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 28 March 2006

No amendments or supplements to a higher-ranking legal act (including the Constitution) that are made after the Constitutional Court has declared, by referring to the previous provisions of the Constitution, a certain legal act (part thereof) passed by the Seimas, the President of the Republic, or the Government or adopted by referendum to be in conflict with a certain higher-ranking legal act, inter alia (and, first of all), with the Constitution, may reinstate the legal act (part thereof) declared to be in conflict with a certain higher-ranking legal act, inter alia (and, first of all), with the Constitution, in the Lithuanian legal system. Under the Constitution, the Constitutional Court does not have the powers to reinstate such legal acts (parts thereof) in the Lithuanian legal system, either. In the same vein, no amendments or supplements to a higher-ranking legal act (including the Constitution) that are made after the Constitutional Court has declared, by referring to the previous provisions of the Constitution, a certain legal act passed by the Seimas, the President of the Republic, or the Government or adopted by referendum to be in compliance with a certain higher-ranking legal act, inter alia (and, first of all), with the Constitution, mean that the decision on the said legal act may or must be changed with retroactive effect. On the other hand, when an amendment to the Constitution is made, the legislature and other law-making subjects must harmonise the legal acts that they have passed and that are still valid with the amended legal regulation; however, this does not imply that the examined constitutional justice cases on the compliance of a certain previous legal regulation with a certain higher-ranking legal regulation, inter alia (and, first of all), with the Constitution, must be renewed or that the decisions adopted therein must be reviewed or changed.

This is also mutatis mutandis applicable to such cases where the Constitutional Court, referring to the previous provisions of the Constitution, presents a conclusion on any of the questions specified in Paragraph 3 of Article 105 of the Constitution ...: such a conclusion remains valid even if the provisions of the Constitution on the basis of which the respective conclusion was made and presented are changed or repealed. Moreover, this is mutatis mutandis applicable to the decisions of the Constitutional Court that are adopted without investigating on the merits the compliance of an impugned legal act (part thereof) with the Constitution (another higher-ranking legal act), but by properly (clearly and rationally) refusing, by means of a reasoned decision, to consider a petition or by dismissing the instituted legal proceedings (case) (if the respective petition has been received at the Constitutional Court and the preparation of a constitutional justice case for a hearing at the Constitutional Court has begun or if it has already been considered in a hearing at the Constitutional Court).

Thus, the Constitution does not give any grounds for reinstating retroactively a legal act (part thereof) that has been declared in conflict with a certain higher-ranking legal regulation, inter alia (and, first of all), with one established in the Constitution, in the Lithuanian legal system, or for questioning and annulling particular rulings, conclusions, or decisions of the Constitutional Court that were constitutionally justifiable at the moment when they were adopted. A different interpretation would result in the disregard of not only the provisions of the Constitution that consolidate the institution of constitutional justice – constitutional judicial control – inter alia, the fact that the decisions of the Constitutional Court are final and not subject to appeal, but also would lead to the denial of the stability of the Constitution, the predictability of decisions adopted by the Constitutional Court, and the legitimate expectations of various legal subjects where the said expectations are created by the aforementioned decisions.

9. COURTS. THE PROSECUTION SERVICE

9.1. COURTS

9.1.1. The constitutional mission of the judiciary

The administration of justice as the function of courts (Paragraph 1 of Article 109 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 21 December 1999

Paragraph 1 of Article 109 of the Constitution prescribes that, in the Republic of Lithuania, justice is administered only by courts. The administration of justice is a function of courts and it determines both the place of the judiciary in the system of institutions of state power and the status of judges. No other state institution or official may carry out this function.

The judiciary

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 28 March 2006

In the Republic of Lithuania, justice is administered only by courts (Paragraph 1 of Article 109 of the Constitution).

Courts – jurisdictional institutions – exercise judicial power, which, as well as the legislative and executive branches, is a fully fledged branch of state power and one of the branches of state power consolidated in the Constitution. The administration of justice is the mission and constitutional competence of the judicial branch.

The judicial branch differs from other branches of state power, inter alia, by the fact that it is formed on a professional, but not on a political basis (rulings of 21 December 1999 and 12 July 2001 and the conclusion of 31 March 2004).

Public trust in courts as a condition for the effective activity of the judiciary

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 27 November 2006

Courts, being among state institutions implementing state power, i.e. judicial power in particular, and administering justice, must act so that the public would have trust in them. Public trust in courts is an important element of a democratic state under the rule of law and of an open, just, and harmonious civil society and an important condition for the effective activity of the judiciary. Public trust in courts is determined by various factors, inter alia, the qualification of judges, their professionalism, their ability to decide cases following not only laws, but also law, the ensuring of the due process of law, respect for persons participating in the proceedings, the rational legal argumentation (reasoning) of court final acts, the clarity of court final acts to persons participating in a case, etc. Judges must also meet very strict ethical and moral requirements: their reputation must be impeccable; the conduct of a judge – both related to the direct performance of his/her duties and not related to his/her official duties – should not raise any doubts about his/her impartiality and independence; a judge must fulfil his/her duties and behave in such a manner that his/her conduct would not discredit the name of judges.

The administration of justice as the function of courts (Paragraph 1 of Article 109 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 25 September 2012

The Constitutional Court, while interpreting Paragraph 1 of Article 109 of the Constitution, which provides that, in the Republic of Lithuania, justice is administered only by courts, has held more than once (inter alia, the rulings of 21 December 1999, 9 May 2006, 6 June 2006, 27 November 2006, 24 October 2007, and 21 January 2008) that courts, while administering justice, must ensure the implementation of the rights established in the Constitution, laws, and other legal acts, and they must guarantee the supremacy of law and protect human rights and freedoms. Paragraph 1 of Article 109 of the Constitution gives rise to the duty of courts to consider cases in a fair and objective manner and to adopt reasoned and well-founded decisions (inter alia, the rulings of 15 May 2007, 17 September 2008, and 31 January 2011). The principle of justice consolidated in the Constitution, as well as the provision that justice is administered by courts, means that not the adoption of a decision as such in a court, but, rather, the adoption of a just court decision constitutes a constitutional value; the constitutional concept of justice implies not a perfunctory and nominal justice administered by a court, not the outward appearance of justice administered by a court, but, most importantly, such court decisions (other final court acts) that are not unjust according to their content. As it has been held in acts of the Constitutional Court more than once, such justice that is administered only formally by a court is not the justice that is consolidated in and protected and defended by the Constitution (inter alia, the rulings of 21 September 2006, 21 January 2008, and 31 January 2011).

The administration of justice as the function of courts (Paragraph 1 of Article 109 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 15 November 2013

Paragraph 1 of Article 109 of the Constitution prescribes: "In the Republic of Lithuania, justice shall be administered only by courts."

The administration of justice is a function of courts and it determines both the place of the judiciary in the system of institutions of state power and the status of judges. Neither any other state institution nor any other state official may exercise this function (inter alia, the rulings of 21 December 1999, 13 May 2004, and 7 April 2011). Justice is administered by applying special procedural forms the purpose of which is to ensure the rights of a person in court proceedings, to facilitate the establishment of actual circumstances of a case, and to pass a just decision (ruling of 18 April 1996).

When interpreting Article 109 of the Constitution, the Constitutional Court has held on more than one occasion (inter alia, in the rulings of 21 December 1999, 9 May 2006, 6 June 2006, and 25 September 2012) that, in the course of administering justice, courts must ensure the implementation of law formulated in the Constitution, laws, and other legal acts, must guarantee the supremacy of law, and must protect human rights and freedoms. The constitutional concept of the administration of justice also implies that courts must decide cases only by strictly adhering to the procedural and other requirements established in laws, without overstepping the limits of their jurisdiction, and not exceeding their other powers (rulings of 16 January 2006 and 24 October 2007). Paragraph 1 of Article 109 of the Constitution gives rise to the duty of courts to decide cases in a fair and objective manner and to adopt reasoned and well-founded decisions (inter alia, the rulings of 15 May 2007, 17 September 2008, 31 January 2011, and 25 September 2012).

The administration of justice as the function of courts

The administration of justice is a function of courts, determining the place of this branch of power in the system of institutions of state power (inter alia, the rulings of 21 December 1999, 13 May 2004, and 16 January 2006). When administering justice, courts must ensure the implementation of the law that is expressed in the Constitution, laws, and other legal acts, they must guarantee the superiority of law and protect human rights and freedoms. Under the Constitution, courts are under the duty to decide cases in a fair and objective manner and to adopt reasoned and well-founded decisions (inter alia, the rulings of 15 May 2007, 21 January 2008, and 10 April 2009).

The principle of justice consolidated in the Constitution, as well as the provision that justice is administered by courts, means that not the adoption of a decision as such in a court, but rather the adoption of a just court decision constitutes a constitutional value; the constitutional concept of justice implies not a perfunctory and nominal justice administered by a court, not the outward appearance of justice administered by a court, but such court decisions that are not unjust according to their content; such justice that is administered by a court only in a perfunctory manner is not the justice that is consolidated in and protected and defended by the Constitution (inter alia, the rulings of 21 September 2006 and 25 September 2012 and the decision of 3 July 2013).

In its jurisprudence, the Constitutional Court has held on more than one occasion that it is not allowed to establish such a legal regulation that would prevent a court from adopting a just decision in a case and, thus, from administering justice where the court takes into account all important circumstances of a case, follows law, and does not violate the imperatives of justice and reasonableness stemming from the Constitution; otherwise, the powers of a court to administer justice, which stem, inter alia, from Article 109 of the Constitution, would be limited or even denied, and the constitutional concept of courts as the institution administering justice in the name of the Republic of Lithuania, as well as the constitutional principles of a state under the rule of law and justice, would be deviated from (inter alia, the rulings of 21 September 2006, 31 January 2011, and 6 December 2012).

9.1.2. The systems of courts

The systems of courts

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 28 March 2006

Courts that, under the Constitution, implement judicial power in Lithuania must be categorised as belonging not to one, but to two or more (if this, taking account of the Constitution, is established in certain laws) systems of courts.

The system of courts of general jurisdiction

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 28 March 2006

Under the Constitution, the system of courts of general jurisdiction, as a system of institutions, is comprised of courts that belong to four different levels: the first (lowest) level is comprised of district courts, the second level is comprised of regional courts, the third level is comprised of the Court of Appeal of Lithuania, and the fourth (supreme) level is comprised of the Supreme Court of Lithuania. The legislature, taking account of the Constitution, has the discretion to establish as many district and regional courts as necessary in its opinion, to determine such a number of the positions of judges in those courts that, in its opinion, is necessary in order to administer justice properly and on time, and to determine such territorial boundaries of the activity of district and regional courts that, in its opinion, are necessary in order to administer justice properly and on time.

The Constitution (inter alia, Paragraph 1 of Article 111 thereof) not only establishes a four-level system of courts of general jurisdiction (as a system of institutions), but also consolidates the foundations for the instance system of courts of general jurisdiction as a system of procedural steps in the judicial consideration of cases. The instance system of courts of general jurisdiction, which stems from the Constitution, implies that there must be, in accordance with the established procedure, possibilities of filing a complaint against any final act of a court of general jurisdiction of the first instance with a court of general jurisdiction of at least one higher instance. The Constitutional Court has held that the mission of the instance system of courts is to remove the possible mistakes made by courts of lower instances, to prevent any execution of injustice, and, thus, to protect the rights and legitimate interests of a person, society, and the state (ruling of 16 January 2006). Thus, the mission of the instance system of courts of general jurisdiction is to create the preconditions for courts of higher instances to correct any mistakes of the fact (i.e. of the establishment and assessment of legally significant facts) or of the law (i.e. of the application of law), which for some reasons could be made by a court of lower instance, and to prevent the execution of injustice in any civil case, criminal case, or a case of another category considered by courts of general jurisdiction. The said correction of mistakes made by courts of lower instance and the related prevention of injustice is a conditio sine qua non for the trust of parties in the respective cases and for public trust in general not only in the court of general jurisdiction that considers the case in question, but also in the whole system of courts of general jurisdiction.

As such, the establishment of the four-level system of courts of general jurisdiction and the consolidation of the grounds of the instance system of courts of general jurisdiction in the Constitution does not mean that the legislature is constitutionally obliged to create, by means of a law, precisely four judicial instances (as steps in judicial proceedings and not as institutional levels), i.e. that it has to establish such a legal regulation under which it would be possible to consider any case in a district court, a regional court, the Court of Appeal of Lithuania, or the Supreme Court of Lithuania. On the contrary, in most democratic states under the rule of law, such a tradition of the instance system of courts of general jurisdiction has been developed (which is not questioned) where these courts comprise a three-step instance system: in this system, the consideration of cases is assigned to the court of first instance, the court of appeal instance (where facts that are important for the decision of a case are, inter alia, investigated and assessed anew), and the court of cassation instance (where no facts that are important for the decision of a case are newly established, because this has already been done by the court of appeal instance, but the issues on the application of law are decided anew). Precisely this three-step instance system of courts of general jurisdiction is established by law in Lithuania. It should be noted that, under the Constitution, the legislature has the discretion to establish (by following, inter alia, expediency reasons) which civil cases, criminal cases, or cases of other categories must be considered in district courts as first instance courts and which of them must be considered in regional courts as first instance courts; the legislature has also a certain degree of discretion to establish (by following, inter alia, expediency reasons) whether appeal proceedings must take place only in the Court of Appeal of Lithuania or whether they may also take place in regional courts. However, under the Constitution, it is not allowed to establish any such a legal regulation or to form any such case law that would eliminate the essential difference among legal proceedings in a court of first instance, legal proceedings in a court of appeal instance, and/or legal proceedings in a court of cassation instance; nor is it allowed to establish any such a legal regulation or to form any such case law that would deny the constitutional nature of the Court of Appeal of Lithuania, as a court of appeal instance, and/or the Supreme Court of Lithuania, as a court of cassation instance.

[...]

The constitutional concept of the administration of justice and that of courts of general jurisdiction imply that a law must establish such a legal regulation that every court of general jurisdiction of certain instance would perform under the law precisely such functions that are typical of courts of general jurisdiction of that instance. In this context, it should be noted that the Constitutional Court held in its ruling of 16 January 2006 that the legislature must, by means of a law, establish such powers (jurisdiction) of all courts of general jurisdiction of all instances that would be constitutionally justifiable and that the constitutional concept of the administration of justice also implies that courts must solve cases only by strictly following procedural and other requirements, which are established in laws, and by not overstepping the limits of their jurisdiction or exceeding their other powers. Thus, according to laws, every court of general jurisdiction of certain instance must perform precisely the functions that are assigned, by means of a law, to courts of general jurisdiction of the said instance.

In this context, it should be noted that it is impossible to interpret the instance system of courts of general jurisdiction that arises out of the Constitution as hierarchal one as no court of general jurisdiction of lower instance is subordinate to any court of higher instance in the administrative or organisational aspect or in any other way: courts of general jurisdiction of first instance are subordinate neither to courts of general jurisdiction of appeal instance nor to courts of general jurisdiction of cassation instance, and the Court of Appeal of Lithuania is not subordinate to the Supreme Court of Lithuania.

The instance system of courts of general jurisdiction, which stems from the Constitution, may not be interpreted as restricting the procedural independence of courts of general jurisdiction of lower instance: even though ... under the Constitution, when adopting decisions in cases of certain categories, courts of general jurisdiction of lower instance are bound by decisions of courts of general jurisdiction of higher instance – precedents in cases of the said categories, courts of general jurisdiction of higher instance (and their judges) may not interfere in cases considered by courts of general jurisdiction of lower instance or give them any instructions, either obligatory or recommendatory, on how certain cases must be decided, etc.; from the aspect of the Constitution, such instructions (whether obligatory or recommendatory) given by certain courts (judges) would be regarded as acting ultra vires. Under the Constitution, case law is formed only when courts decide cases themselves. A different interpretation of the provisions of the Constitution consolidating the instance system of courts of general jurisdiction, as well as a legal regulation based on such different interpretation of the provisions of the Constitution, would create the preconditions for courts of general jurisdiction of higher instance (or their judges) to assume such functions that are not envisaged for them and such powers that are not established in the Constitution, would deny the independence of courts, which is consolidated in the Constitution, would violate the provision of Paragraph 2 of Article 109 of the Constitution, whereby, when administering justice, judges and courts are independent, and the provision of Paragraph 3 of this article, whereby, when considering cases, judges obey only the law. It should also be noted that the giving of obligatory or recommendatory instructions to courts of general jurisdiction of lower instance on how certain cases must be decided etc. would also restrict the possibilities of courts of general jurisdiction of higher instance to independently and impartially review, where necessary, certain cases under appeal and cassation procedure.

Paragraph 4 of Article 111 of the Constitution provides that the formation and competence of courts is established by the Law on Courts. Thus, the Constitution not only obliges the legislature to lay down, by means of a law, the establishment and competence of all the courts of the Republic of Lithuania (thus, including the status, formation, exercise of powers (activity), and guarantees of courts of general jurisdiction, the status of judges of these courts, etc.), which are specified in Paragraph 1 of Article 111 of the Constitution, but also expressis verbis consolidates the title of this law – the Law on Courts. At the same time, it needs to be noted that, in itself, such a constitutional legal regulation does not mean that certain relationships connected with the aforesaid relationships may not in general be regulated also by means of other laws. However, it should be emphasised that, when regulating the said relationships by means of a law, the legislature must pay regard to the Constitution and, inter alia, the constitutionally consolidated foundations of the instance system of courts of general jurisdiction.

Specialised courts

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 28 March 2006

Paragraph 2 of Article 111 of the Constitution provides that, for the consideration of administrative, labour, family, and cases of other categories, specialised courts may be established. It should also be mentioned that no courts with extraordinary powers may be established in the Republic of Lithuania in time of peace (Paragraph 3 of Article 111 of the Constitution).

It should be noted that, when regulating the relationships connected with the establishment and activity of specialised courts, the legislature is bound by the provisions of the Constitution that establish the grounds for the instance system of courts. In this context, it should be emphasised that, as the Constitutional Court held in its ruling of 16 January 2006, the Constitution, inter alia, Paragraphs 1 and 2 of Article 111 thereof (but not exclusively these provisions of the Constitution), consolidates the instance system of courts. The Constitution, if its provisions are interpreted in a systemic manner, implies that the instance system is established not only for courts of general jurisdiction, but also for specialised courts, which are established under Paragraph 2 of Article 111 of the Constitution.

The legislature, while paying regard to the Constitution, has broad discretion to decide (by following, inter alia, expediency reasons) on the establishment of specialised courts for consideration of particular categories of cases. The legislature also has broad discretion in establishing the system of specialised courts assigned to the consideration of each category of cases, the number of positions of judges in those courts and their relations with courts of general jurisdiction and with specialised courts assigned to the consideration of cases of other categories, inter alia, the fact whether certain specialised courts, assigned to the consideration of cases of certain categories, would constitute an autonomous system, which would be separated from the system of courts of general jurisdiction and from the system of specialised courts assigned to the consideration of cases of other categories, or whether it would somehow be linked with such systems (one of them) in organisational, procedural, or some other aspect. It should be noted that the instance system of specialised courts (established under Paragraph 2 of Article 111 of the Constitution) may have certain particularities compared with the instance system of courts of general jurisdiction.

However, under the Constitution, the legislature may not create any such system or systems (if there are more than one category of cases for the consideration of which individual specialised courts are created) of specialised courts (established under Paragraph 2 of Article 111 of the Constitution) that would replace the system of courts of general jurisdiction imperatively established in the Constitution and would take most of the functions of the system of courts of general jurisdiction.

It should be emphasised that the imperatives (which stem from the Constitution and were discussed in this ruling of the Constitutional Court) of both the activity of courts of general jurisdiction and the legal regulation governing such activity are also mutatis mutandis applicable to the activity of specialised courts (established under Paragraph 2 of Article 111 of the Constitution) and the legal regulation governing their activity. This can be said about such requirements arising out of the Constitution that are related, inter alia: to ensuring the possibility of filing a complaint with a court of at least one higher instance against a final court act in accordance with the established procedure; to developing uniform case law (based on the maxim that the same (analogous) cases must be decided in the same way) and the predictability of court decisions arising from this, thus, also to the continuity of the jurisprudence of courts; to the fact that the existing precedents are binding on courts themselves (inter alia, on courts of the supreme instance); to the modification of case law and the creation of case law precedents only when this is unavoidably and objectively necessary and by arguing it properly (clearly and rationally) in all cases; to the obligation of every court of a certain instance to perform, pursuant to laws, precisely such functions that are assigned to the courts of that instance and not to overstep the limits of their jurisdiction or exceed their other powers; to the fact that courts of lower instance are not subordinate in an organisational or another manner to any court of higher instance, as well as to procedural independence and the formation of case law when courts decide cases by themselves, etc.

It should also be emphasised that the legislature, when establishing specialised courts, must also establish a procedure under which jurisdictional competition between specialised courts and courts of general jurisdiction, as well as between specialised courts assigned for the consideration of cases of a certain category and specialised courts assigned for the consideration of cases of a different category (if there is more than one category of cases for the consideration of which individual specialised courts are established) would be decided. Moreover, the legislature must establish such a legal regulation that would not only ensure the formation of uniform case law in any individual systems of specialised courts assigned to the consideration of cases of a certain category, but would also not allow inconsistencies and irregularities to appear between specialised courts and courts of general jurisdiction, as well as between specialised courts assigned to the consideration of cases of a certain category and specialised courts assigned to the consideration of cases of a different category (if there is more than one category of cases for the consideration of which individual specialised courts are established). The inconsistency and irregularity of case law between specialised courts and courts of general jurisdiction, as well as between specialised courts assigned to the consideration of cases of a certain category and specialised courts assigned to the consideration of cases of a different category (if there is more than one category of cases for the consideration of which individual specialised courts are established), could be avoided, inter alia, by means of such a legal regulation (establishing the jurisdiction of courts) where cases of certain categories may be considered only in clearly specified courts of general jurisdiction or specialised courts and may not be considered in both courts of general jurisdiction and specialised courts, or in both specialised courts assigned to the consideration of cases of a certain category and specialised courts assigned to the consideration of cases of a different category (if there is more than one category of cases for the consideration of which individual specialised courts are established).

The systems of courts

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 9 May 2006

Courts that, under the Constitution, implement judicial power in Lithuania must be categorised as belonging not to one, but to two or more (if this, taking account of the Constitution, is established in certain laws) systems of courts. Under the Constitution and laws, there are three systems of courts in Lithuania at present: (1) the Constitutional Court carries out constitutional judicial control; (2) the Supreme Court of Lithuania, the Court of Appeal of Lithuania, regional courts, and district courts, which are specified in Paragraph 1 of Article 111 of the Constitution, constitute the system of courts of general jurisdiction; (3) under Paragraph 2 of Article 111 of the Constitution, for the consideration of administrative, labour, family, and cases of other categories, specialised courts may be established according to the law; one system of specialised courts, namely, administrative ones, which is composed of the Supreme Administrative Court of Lithuania and regional administrative courts, is established and is functioning at present (rulings of 13 December 2004, 16 January 2006, and 28 March 2006).

Links among the systems of courts

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 6 June 2006

... there are significant links between courts of general jurisdiction and specialised courts (established under Paragraph 2 of Article 111 of the Constitution) on the one hand and, on the other hand, the Constitutional Court, as the institution of constitutional justice, inter alia: every court of general jurisdiction (its judge) and every specialised court (its judge), as a petitioner, has the right to initiate constitutional justice cases at the Constitutional Court on the grounds established in the Constitution (Paragraphs 1, 2, and 3 of Article 106 and Paragraph 2 of Article 110); all courts of general jurisdiction – the Supreme Court of Lithuania, the Court of Appeal of Lithuania, regional courts, and district courts – as well as specialised courts (Supreme Administrative Court of Lithuania and regional administrative courts), are bound by the fact that, under Article 107 of the Constitution, the decisions on the issues assigned to the competence of the Constitutional Court are final and not subject to appeal; all courts of general jurisdiction and specialised courts are bound by the official constitutional doctrine, which is formed in the jurisprudence of the Constitutional Court, etc. However, as regards the organisational and administrative aspects, the said judicial systems – the Constitutional Court, when carrying out constitutional judicial control, as well as courts of general jurisdiction and specialised courts (established under Paragraph 2 of Article 111 of the Constitution) – are separated in the Constitution.

9.1.3. The independence of judges and courts and the guarantees of their independence

The independence of judges and courts

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 21 December 1999

Paragraph 2 of Article 109 of the Constitution prescribes: “When administering justice, judges and courts shall be independent.”

The independence of judges and courts is one of the essential principles of a democratic state under the rule of law. The role of the judiciary in such a state means that, when administering justice, courts must ensure the implementation of the law that is expressed in the Constitution, laws, and other legal acts; they must guarantee the superiority of law and protect human rights and freedoms.

It needs to be noted that the independence of judges and courts is not an objective in itself – it is a necessary condition of the protection of human rights and freedoms. Paragraph 1 of Article 30 of the Constitution provides that a person whose constitutional rights or freedoms are violated has the right to apply to a court. Paragraph 2 of Article 31 of the Constitution consolidates the right of a person charged with committing a crime to a public and fair hearing of his/her case by an independent and impartial court. Therefore, the fact that independence is not a privilege but one of the most important duties of judges and courts, which stems from the human right guaranteed in the Constitution to have an impartial arbiter of a dispute and which is a necessary condition for an impartial and fair consideration of a case, is the most important criterion that must be followed when assessing the independence of judges and courts (ruling of 6 December 1995).

Taking account of the striving, enshrined in the Preamble to the Constitution, for an open, just, and harmonious civil society and a state under the rule of law, Article 5 of the Constitution, as well as the norms of other articles thereof establishing the separation of powers, it is possible to distinguish two inseparable aspects of the principle of the independence of judges and courts.

This principle, first of all, means the independence of both judges and courts that administer justice. Under Article 109 of the Constitution, when considering cases, judges are independent and obey only the law. Paragraph 1 of Article 114 of the Constitution provides that interference by any institutions of state power and governance, members of the Seimas or other officials, political parties, political or public organisations, or citizens with the activities of a judge or court is prohibited and leads to responsibility provided for by law. The procedural independence of judges is a necessary condition for an impartial and fair consideration of a case.

On the other hand, judges and courts are not sufficiently independent if the independence of courts as the system of the institutions of the judiciary is not ensured. According to the principle of the separation of powers, all branches of power are autonomous, independent, and capable of counterbalancing one another. The judiciary, being independent, may not be dependent on the other branches of power also because of the fact that it is the only branch of power formed on a professional, but not a political basis. The judiciary may implement its function, which is the administration of justice, only while being autonomous and independent of the other branches of power.

The fact that the judiciary is fully fledged and independent implies its self-governance. The self-governance of the judiciary also includes the organisation of the work of courts and the activities of the professional corps of judges.

The organisational independence of courts and their self-governance are the main guarantees of the actual independence of the judiciary. The constitutional duty of other state institutions is to respect the independence of courts, which is established in the Constitution. It needs to be noted that the activities of courts are guaranteed by the Constitution, as well as by laws and other legal acts that are in conformity with the Constitution. The state is under the duty to create proper work conditions for courts. However, this does not mean that it is allowed, in the course of establishing particular powers of other state institutions as regards their relationships with the judiciary, to deny both the separation of powers established in the Constitution and the essence of the judiciary as a fully fledged branch of power, which acts independently from other branches of power.

While ensuring the independence of judges and courts, it is very important to clearly separate the activity of courts from that of the executive. The Constitution prohibits the executive from interfering with the administration of justice, from exerting any influence on courts or from assessing the work of courts regarding the consideration of cases, let alone giving instructions as to how justice must be administered. The supervision of courts and the application of disciplinary measures to judges must be organised in such a manner that the actual independence of judges would not be undermined.

Under the Constitution, the activity of courts is not and may not be considered an area of the administration by any institution of the executive. Only the powers designated to create conditions for the work of courts may be granted to institutions of the executive. Courts are not accountable for their activities in administering justice to any other state institutions or any officials. It is only an independent institutional system of courts that may guarantee the organisational independence of courts and the procedural independence of judges.

The material basis of the organisational independence of courts is their financial independence of any decisions of the executive. It needs to be noted that the financial independence of courts is ensured by such a legal regulation where finances for the system of courts and every court are allocated in the state budget that is approved by means of a law. The guarantee of the organisational independence of courts is one of essential conditions for ensuring human rights.

Judges are also obligated to be independent by their oath that they must take before entering office under Paragraph 6 of Article 112 of the Constitution. Judges take an oath to be faithful to the Republic of Lithuania, to administer justice only according to the law, to defend human rights, freedoms, and legitimate interests, to act honestly and humanely all the time, and to never let their conduct discredit the name of judges.

Under Article 115 of the Constitution, the judges of the courts of the Republic of Lithuania are released from their duties according to the procedure established by law when their conduct discredits the name of judges, and upon the entry into effect of court judgments convicting them. Articles 74 and 116 of the Constitution also provide that for a gross violation of the Constitution or a breach of the oath, or when they are found to have committed a crime, the President and justices of the Supreme Court, as well as the President and judges of the Court of Appeal, may be removed from office by the Seimas according to the procedure for impeachment proceedings. The conduct of a judge – both related to the direct performance of his/her office and not related to his/her official duties – should not raise any doubts about his/her impartiality and independence.

The qualification of judges is another guarantee that judges will administer justice in a proper manner: only persons with high legal qualification and considerable life experience may be appointed as judges. Their reputation must be impeccable.

This means that judges are subject to special professional and ethical requirements. Judges must bear great responsibility for how they administer justice, i.e. perform the obligation established for them in the Constitution.

The independence of judges and courts (Article 109 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 12 July 2001

Paragraph 1 of Article 109 of the Constitution prescribes that, in the Republic of Lithuania, justice is administered only by courts. The function of the administration of justice determines the independence of judges and courts. Paragraphs 2 and 3 of Article 109 of the Constitution provide that, when administering justice, judges and courts are independent and that, when considering cases, judges obey only the law. Thus, a judge can administer justice only while being independent of parties to the case, state institutions, officials, political and public associations, natural and legal persons.

When analysing the principle of the independence of judges and courts, it must be noted that independence is not a privilege, but one of the most important obligations of judges and courts, which stems from the right of a person, which is guaranteed in the Constitution, to an independent and impartial arbiter of a dispute. All state institutions must respect and ensure this right of a person guaranteed by the Constitution. This circumstance must be taken into account when guarantees of the independence of judges and courts are assessed.

The independence of judges is ensured by establishing the inviolability of the term of their office, the inviolability of the person of a judge, the guarantees of a social (material) nature of a judge, by consolidating the self-governance of fully fledged judicial power and its financial and technical provision (rulings of 6 December 1995, 18 April 1996, 19 December 1996, 5 February 1999, 21 December 1999, and 21 December 1999 and the decision of 12 January 2000).

The principle of the independence of judges and courts, which is enshrined in the Constitution, means that the legislature is under the duty to provide for such guarantees of the independence of judges and courts that would ensure the impartiality of courts in adopting decisions and that would not permit anyone to interfere with activities of judges or courts when they administer justice.

The specific function of courts and the principle of the independence of judges and courts, which are consolidated in the Constitution, also determine the legal status of judges. It needs to be noted that the judiciary is formed on a professional, but not on a political basis. “According to the duties performed, judges may not be deemed to be state servants. No one may demand that they follow a certain political guideline. The judicial practice (case law) is formed only by courts while applying the norms of law. Judges ensure human rights and freedoms in that they administer justice on the grounds of the Constitution and laws” (ruling of 21 December 1999).

The principle of a state under the rule of law, the separation of powers, and the independence of judges and courts are not objectives in themselves. Their meaning is disclosed by the protection of human rights, the ensuring of social harmony, and the legal solution of conflicts arising in society. Judges consider cases that involve the interests of an employee and an employer, a citizen and an official, an entity indulged in commercial activities and a consumer, a person and the state. It is especially important to guarantee impartial judicial protection against unlawful actions of state institutions and officials. This once again confirms the importance of guarantees for the independence of judges and courts.

In addition, the Constitutional Court notes that the system of the guarantees of the independence of judges and courts does not create any preconditions on the grounds of which judges could evade the proper fulfilment of their duties, investigate cases in a negligent manner, act unethically with persons taking part in a case, or violate human rights and dignity. Judges must protect the honour and prestige of their profession. Therefore, the system of self-regulation and self-governance of the judiciary must ensure that judges perform their duties properly and that every unlawful or unethical conduct of a judge be properly assessed.

The incompatibility of the office of a judge with another office or employment as a guarantee of the independence of judges (Paragraph 1 of Article 113 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 12 July 2001

Paragraph 1 of Article 113 of the Constitution consolidates the incompatibility of the office of a judge with any other elective or appointive office, as well as with employment in any business, commercial, or private establishment or enterprise. Judges may receive only the remuneration of a judge paid from the state budget. Judges may not receive any remuneration other than the remuneration established for them and payment for educational or creative activities.

The incompatibility of the post of a judge with another office or employment is determined by the special legal situation of a judge, as well as the judiciary, as a branch of state powers. The established prohibition is aimed at ensuring the independence and impartiality of judges, which are necessary conditions for the implementation of justice. At the same time, it needs to be noted that the incompatibility of the office of a judge with any other office or employment implies the duty of the state to establish such remuneration and social guarantees of judges that would be in line with the dignity of judges and their professional status.

The prohibition on interfering with the activity of judges or courts (Paragraph 1 of Article 114 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 12 July 2001

Paragraph 1 of Article 114 of the Constitution prescribes: “Interference by any institutions of state power and governance, Members of the Seimas or other officials, political parties, political or public organisations, or citizens with the activities of a judge or court shall be prohibited and shall lead to liability provided for by law.”

The prohibition against the interference with the activities of judges or courts established in Paragraph 1 of Article 114 of the Constitution is aimed at ensuring the independence and impartiality of judges. Courts are able to administer justice only when judges can consider cases impartially, by taking account of the circumstances of cases and the requirements of laws. It needs to be noted that, under the Constitution, institutions of state power and administration are not only prohibited from exerting influence on judges and courts – they are also obligated to ensure the independence of judges and courts.

The immunity of judges as a guarantee of the independence of judges (Paragraph 2 of Article 114 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 30 May 2003

The immunity of judges is one of the guarantees (consolidated in the Constitution) of the independence of judges. Paragraph 2 of Article 114 of the Constitution provides that judges may not be held criminally liable or be detained, or have their liberty restricted otherwise, without the consent of the Seimas or, in the period between the sessions of the Seimas, without the consent of the President of the Republic of Lithuania.

The interaction between the judiciary and other branches of state power

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 9 May 2006

The autonomy and independence of judicial power does not mean that it and other state powers – legislative power and executive power – may not cooperate. The Constitutional Court has held that when the general functions and tasks of the state are being accomplished, there exists interfunctional partnership, as well as reciprocal control and balance, among state institutions (rulings of 10 January 1998 and 21 April 1998).

It should be emphasised that the interaction among the branches of state power may not be treated as their conflict or competition; thus, the checks and balances that the judicial branch (institutions thereof) and other branches of state power (institutions thereof) have towards each other may not be seen as the mechanisms of the opposition of the branches of power. The model of reciprocity among state powers consolidated in the Constitution is also described by the reciprocal control and balance of the branches of state power (institutions thereof); such reciprocal control and balance does not allow a certain branch of state power to dominate in respect of another branch of state power (or in respect of other branches of state power); the said model of reciprocity is also described by cooperation among the branches of state power, of course, where such cooperation does not overstep the limits established in the Constitution, i.e. without interfering with the implementation of the powers of another branch of state power.

The inviolability of the term of powers as a guarantee of the independence of judges

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 9 May 2006

One of the guarantees of the independence of judges, which is consolidated in the Constitution, is the guarantee of the term of their powers (rulings of 6 December 1995, 21 December 1999, and 12 July 2001). Only an independent court, i.e. only such a court the judges of which are guaranteed the inviolability of the term of their powers, may be regarded as a court that administers justice as required by the Constitution. The guarantee of the inviolability of the term of powers of a judge is also important because of the fact that a judge, whatever political forces are in power, must remain independent and must not adjust to the possible change of political forces. The situations when a judge may be released from duties, as well as the grounds for his/her release from duties, are consolidated in Article 115 of the Constitution (as well as Articles 74 and 116 of the Constitution, which provide for the possibility of dismissing justices of supreme and high courts under impeachment proceedings). It needs to be emphasised that this list of the grounds for releasing judges from duties is a comprehensive (exhaustive) one – it may not be amended or supplemented by means of a law.

It should be noted that the principle of the independence of judges, which is consolidated in the Constitution, implies only such a legislative regulation of the term of powers of judges where, when appointing a judge, he/she would know his/her term of powers (until the time established by means of a law or until he/she reaches the pensionable age established by means of a law). Thus, the term of powers of a judge must not depend on any future free-discretion decisions adopted by such state power institutions that have appointed him/her as a judge.

The legal regulation governing the relationships connected with the remuneration of judges (Paragraph 1 of Article 113 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's decision of 8 August 2006

... The notion “remuneration of judges” includes all payments paid to a judge from the state budget (decision of 12 January 2000). Under the Constitution, the remuneration of judges must be established by means of a law, its amount, as well as the material and [other] social guarantees established for judges, must be such that they would be in line with the constitutional status of judges and their dignity, the remuneration of judges, the material and social guarantees established for them may be differentiated according to clear criteria that are known ex ante and are not related to the administration of justice when cases are decided (for example, according to the length of time during which a person works as a judge), and the remuneration of judges may not depend upon the results of their work. It should be noted that, as the Constitutional Court has emphasised in its rulings more than once, the Constitution prohibits the reduction of the remuneration and [other] social guarantees of judges; any attempts to reduce the remuneration of judges or their other social guarantees, or any limitation upon the financing of courts should be treated as an encroachment upon the independence of judges and courts (rulings of 6 December 1995 and 21 December 1999, the decision of 12 January 2000, and the rulings of 12 July 2001 and 28 March 2006).

The independence of judges and courts

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 27 November 2006

The independence and impartiality of judges and courts are ensured by consolidating, in the Constitution and laws, the independence of the system of courts from the legislature and the executive (institutional independence), by consolidating the procedural independence of judges, the organisational self-dependence and self-governance of courts, the status of judges, the inviolability of the person of a judge, the immunities of judges, the inviolability of the duration of the term of office of judges, the social (material) guarantees of judges, and by consolidating the prohibition against any interference with the activity of judges or courts by state institutions, members of the Seimas, other officials, political parties, political and public organisations, as well as citizens. The independence and impartiality of judges and courts are also ensured by means of other guarantees established in the Constitution and laws.

The protection of the remuneration and other social guarantees of judges (Article 109, Paragraph 4 of Article 111, and Paragraph 1 of Article 113 of the Constitution)

... as the Constitutional Court held in its ruling of 12 July 2001, a judge, who is obligated to consider conflicts arising in society as well as those between a person and the state, must be not only highly professionally qualified and of impeccable reputation, but also materially independent and feel secure as to his/her future. The imperative of the constitutional protection of the remuneration and other social (material) guarantees of judges stems from the principle of the independence of judges and courts, which is consolidated in the Constitution (inter alia, Article 109 thereof); through this principle, attempts are made to protect judges administering justice against both any influence of the legislative and executive branches and any influence of other state establishments and officials, political and public organisations, commercial and economic structures, as well as other legal and natural persons. In its ruling of 12 July 2001, the Constitutional Court also noted that the state has the duty to establish such salaries for judges that would be in conformity with the status of the judiciary and judges, with the functions performed by them, as well as with their responsibility.

The social (material) guarantees of the principle of the independence of judges that stem from the Constitution (which, actually, are also consolidated in the law of other democratic states, as well as in various international acts) mean that the state has the duty to ensure such social (material) provision for judges that would be in conformity with the status of judges while they are in office, as well as upon the expiry of their term of office, i.e. their term of powers (ruling of 21 December 1999). Under the Constitution, the material and social guarantees established for judges must be such that they would be in line with the constitutional status of judges and their dignity (decision of 8 August 2006).

Thus, it should be held that the legislature must establish such a legal regulation that would ensure the independence of judges and courts, inter alia, the social (material) guarantees of judges not only when they are in office, but also after their powers cease. In doing so, the legislature must pay regard to the norms and principles of the Constitution. When the powers of a judge cease, his/her social (material) guarantees may be varied ones, inter alia, payments paid periodically, as well as one-off payments, etc. The constitutional grounds for establishing such guarantees is the exceptional constitutional status of judges, which is determined by the function of the administration of justice; therefore, the said guarantees may only depend upon such circumstances that are linked with the constitutional status of judges, but they may not be regarded as replacing other social (material) guarantees that must be ensured for former judges on other grounds, including those that are common to all working persons. It also needs to be emphasised that the social (material) guarantees of judges after their powers cease must be real and not merely nominal.

... if the legislature establishes such a social (material) guarantee of judges after their powers cease as the pension of judges, it, having regard to the Constitution, may also establish cases where the pension of judges (which is related to the constitutional status of judges) is not granted to former judges and/or where granted state pensions of judges are no longer paid to former judges.

It needs to be emphasised in particular that all such cases must be based on the Constitution; while establishing, by means of a law, cases where the pension of judges is not granted to a former judge, it is necessary to take account, inter alia, of the constitutional grounds of the cessation of the powers of such a judge. Otherwise, the constitutional principle of the independence of judges and courts, which implies the social (material) guarantees of judges after their powers cease, would be disregarded and Article 109 of the Constitution would be violated.

Article 109 of the Constitution would equally be violated where a granted state pension of judges is no longer paid to a former judge in the absence of constitutionally justifiable grounds.

... if the legislature consolidates such a social (material) guarantee of judges after their powers cease as the pension of judges, this guarantee is defended not only under Article 109 of the Constitution, but also under Article 52 of the Constitution.

The principle of the equal legal status of judges; the differentiation of the social (material) guarantees of judges; the imperative of the reality of the social (material) guarantees of judges

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 22 October 2007

... One of the important aspects of the independence of judges as consolidated in the Constitution is that, while administering justice, all judges have an equal legal status, inter alia, from the aspect that no different guarantees of the independence of judges while administering justice (deciding cases) may be established; while administering justice, judges are not and may not be subordinate to any other judge or to the president of any court (inter alia, of the court where they work, as well as of any court of a higher level or instance); on the other hand, the principle of the equal legal status of judges does not mean that the material and social guarantees of judges may not be differentiated according to clear criteria that are known ex ante and are not related to the administration of justice when cases are decided (for example, according to the length of time during which a person works as a judge) (ruling of 9 May 2006 and the decision of 8 August 2006). The principle of the equal legal status of judges, which stems from the Constitution, may also not be interpreted as not permitting an additional payment for the judges – the heads of courts (their deputies, chairpersons of divisions, etc.) who perform additional functions for organisational work that they carry out, since supplementary work must be paid for additionally.

The equal status of judges while administering justice, which stems from the Constitution, should be interpreted by taking account of the fact that, under the Constitution, the system of courts of general jurisdiction, as a system of institutions, is comprised of courts that belong to four different levels: the first (lowest) level is comprised of district courts, the second level is comprised of regional courts, the third level is comprised of the Court of Appeal of Lithuania, and the fourth (supreme) level is comprised of the Supreme Court of Lithuania. ... Moreover, interpreting the equal status of judges when they administer justice, where the said status stems from the Constitution, account must be taken of the fact that, under the Constitution, courts are classed as belonging not to one, but to two or more (if that, while having regard to the Constitution, is established in laws) systems of courts (... there are three systems of courts at present).

The classification of courts (which arises from the Constitution) by which courts belong not to one but to several (at present – three) systems of courts, as well as the division of the system of courts of general jurisdiction and specialised courts (established under Paragraph 2 of Article 111 of the Constitution) into levels, implies that the legislature has the powers to differentiate the social (material) guarantees of judges (remuneration, as well as guarantees that are established for (applied to) judges after their powers cease). ... judicial power is formed on a professional basis. It is universally recognised (not exclusively in Lithuania) that the dominant principle of the formation of the corps of judges of courts of higher level is the principle of the professional career of judges when judges are promoted after they are released from previous duties and appointed as judges of courts of higher level (even though the said principle must not be made absolute in order not to create preconditions for the system of courts to become too closed, to become subjected to routine, etc.) (ruling of 9 May 2006). The professional career of judges is inseparably related to the institution of the promotion of judges, which is consolidated in Paragraph 4 of Article 112 of the Constitution. While deciding on the promotion of judges, inter alia, their qualification – professional preparation – is assessed (ruling of 9 May 2006). Thus, the implementation of the principle of the professional career of judges (as mentioned before, without making it absolute) is one of the conditions making it possible to ensure that persons with professional qualification as high as possible would be appointed as judges of courts of higher levels, thus, also to ensure that justice would be administered in such a way that is provided for in the Constitution, that human rights and freedoms, as well as other constitutional values, would be protected and defended properly, and that the law expressed in the Constitution, as well as in laws and other legal acts that are not in conflict with the Constitution, would be implemented. Thus, judges must also have material incentives to pursue a professional career. Consequently, the legislature not only may, but also must, differentiate the social (material) guarantees of judges according to the fact that, in establishing such guarantees, account is taken of the court system and the court level where judges work; the constitutional concept of the judiciary as the branch of state power formed on a professional basis implies, inter alia, that, if the remuneration of judges of courts of different levels, as well as guarantees that are established for (applied to) judges after their powers cease, were equalised completely, not only the fact that, under the Constitution, courts are classed as belonging not to one, but to several (at present – three) systems of courts, that the system of courts of general jurisdiction, as a system of institutions, is comprised of courts that belong to four different levels, and that the systems of specialised courts (at present – administrative courts), which are established under Paragraph 2 of Article 111 of the Constitution, may also be divided into levels, would be disregarded, but also there would be no material incentives (even if there were other incentives) for judges to pursue the professional career.

The principle of the equal legal status of judges, which stems from the Constitution, implies that judges of the same system of courts and judges of courts of the same level are equal while administering justice (deciding cases) not only according to their powers and their non-subordination to any other judge or president of any court (inter alia, of the court in which they work, as well as of the court of higher level or instance), their responsibility and immunities, the restrictions on their activities and the limitation on their remuneration provided for in Article 113 of the Constitution, but also according to the fact that they must be ensured equal workload; thus, judges of the same system of courts and judges of courts of the same level must be paid for work accordingly without discriminating any of them and without giving privileges to any of them, and the respective social (material) guarantees, which may not be discriminatory and may not be privileges, must be established for them.

It also needs to be noted that, as mentioned before, the social (material) guarantees of judges may be differentiated (while having regard to the Constitution) under criteria that are not related to the administration of justice when deciding cases, for example, according to the length of time during which a person works as a judge. However, this does not at all mean that the criterion of the length of time during which a person works as a judge may be replaced by another, essentially different criterion (for example, if laws establish a certain calendar date (naming it directly, or relating to any legal fact, such as, for example, the entry into force of a certain legal act) and if a person begins to work as a judge or his/her powers cease from that date, certain social (material) guarantees that are established for (applied to) him/her would be different from those that are established for (applied to) other judges of courts of the same system and of courts of the same level (of courts of general jurisdiction and specialised courts, which are established under Paragraph 2 of Article 111 of the Constitution)). Thus, the remuneration of judges of courts of the same system and of the same level may not be differentiated (also by applying law) according to when the remuneration of a certain amount of judges was established (inter alia, according to whether a person began to work as a judge of the respective court before establishing the remuneration of a certain amount of a judge of that court, or afterwards). Consequently, under the Constitution, it is not allowed to establish such a legal regulation (neither general nor individual) where, with regard to persons who are appointed as judges of a certain court, a different (lower or higher) remuneration would be established from that of judges who already work in the said court; if such practice of the application of law came into being, it would be impossible to substantiate it constitutionally.

The provision that ... social (material) guarantees of judges may be differentiated (having regard to the Constitution) according to the length of time during which a person works as a judge may not be interpreted as meaning that the criterion of the length of time during which a person works as a judge is the only criterion of the said differentiation. In the case of the remuneration of judges, as well as in the case of the social (material) guarantees of judges after their powers cease (and, thus, in the case of the pensions of judges), account must be taken of the fact that the Constitution gives rise to such classification of courts by which courts belong not to one, but, rather, to several (at the moment – three) systems of courts, as well as of the fact that the system of courts of general jurisdiction and the system of specialised courts (established under Paragraph 2 of Article 111 of the Constitution), as systems of institutions, are of several levels.

It has been held in this ruling of the Constitutional Court that the principle of the equal legal status of judges may not be interpreted as not permitting an additional payment for the judges – the heads of courts (their deputies, chairpersons of divisions, etc.) who perform additional functions for organisational work that they carry out. However, it needs to be emphasised that the said constitutional principle hardly implies that, in a certain court, the activity of the judges – heads of courts (their deputies, chairpersons of divisions, etc.) who perform additional functions may be limited only to such organisational work that is not related to the administration of justice, i.e. with the decision of cases, and that they may receive the remuneration of a judge only for such organisational work.

The principled provision that the remuneration of judges of courts of the same system and of the same level may not be differentiated (also by applying law) according to when the remuneration of a certain amount of judges was established (inter alia, according to whether the person began to work as a judge of the respective court before establishing the remuneration of a certain amount of a judge of that court, or afterwards) is also mutatis mutandis applicable to other social (material) guarantees of judges, inter alia, those that are established for (applied to) judges after their powers cease. The said guarantees also may not be reduced, let alone altogether denied, in cases where their system is reorganised. In addition, the imperative of the reality of the social (material) guarantees of judges stems from the Constitution. The social (material) guarantees of judges that are established for (applied to) judges after their powers cease (in particular, if such guarantees are linked with certain periodic payments, such as pensions) could become (if an economic or social situation changed) not only unreal, but also nominal, thus, fictitious in cases where exactly such guarantees are applied to judges whose powers ceased that were established at a given time and not reviewed with respect to these judges, while other judges of courts of the same system and the same level, whose powers will expire later, are granted greater respective guarantees (in view of a changing economic or social situation). In this context, it needs to be noted that the provision of the review of the social (material) guarantees is applicable not only to judges, but also to other members of society: it has been held in this ruling of the Constitutional Court that the social orientation of the State of Lithuania, which is consolidated in the Constitution, obliges the state to pay regard to social (material) guarantees and other guarantees that stem not only from Article 52 of the Constitution, but also from other provisions of the Constitution (inter alia, from Paragraph 2 of Article 30, Articles 38, 39, and 41, Paragraph 1 of Article 51 and Article 146 thereof), as well as from the imperative of reality; thus, the social orientation of the State of Lithuania includes the obligation to revise once established (and applied) guarantees of the social (material) nature (to increase their sizes) in particular if an economic or social situation changes in such a way that the said established (and applied) guarantees depreciate considerably, let alone become nominal in general (in this case, it is also necessary to have in mind the reservation (which is specified in this and other rulings of the Constitutional Court) regarding the proportional and temporary reduction of payments when this is necessary for the protection of other constitutional values).

The grounds for releasing judges from duties (cessation of powers) and the influence of such grounds on establishing and applying the social guarantees of judges after their powers cease (Articles 108 and 115 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 22 October 2007

The establishment (and application) of the social (material) guarantees of judges after their powers cease must be based on the Constitution. In this context, it needs to be noted that the Constitution establishes the grounds for releasing judges from their duties. For instance, under Article 115 of the Constitution, the judges of courts of general jurisdiction and specialised courts (established under Paragraph 2 of Article 111 of the Constitution) are released from their duties according to the procedure established by law in the following cases: of their own will (Item 1); upon the expiry of the term of powers, or upon reaching the pensionable age established by law (Item 2); due to their state of health (Item 3); upon election to another office, or upon transfer, with their consent, to another place of work (Item 4); when their conduct discredits the name of judges (Item 5); upon the entry into effect of court judgments convicting them (Item 6); under Article 108 of the Constitution, the powers of a justice of the Constitutional Court cease: upon the expiry of the term of powers (Item 1); upon his/her death (Item 2); upon his/her resignation (Item 3); when he/she is incapable of holding office due to the state of his/her health (Item 4); when the Seimas removes him/her from office in accordance with the procedure for impeachment proceedings (Item 5). Under Articles 74 and 116 of the Constitution, the President and justices of the Supreme Court, the President and judges of the Court of Appeal, and, under Article 74 of the Constitution, also the President and justices of the Constitutional Court, who grossly violate the Constitution or breach their oath, or are found to have committed a crime, may be removed from office by the Seimas according to the procedure for impeachment proceedings.

The Constitution consolidates the final list of grounds for releasing judges from their duties (i.e. the cessation of powers) and this list must not be expanded by means of laws or other legal acts (ruling of 27 November 2006).

On the other hand, it is obvious that the powers of judges may cease (expire) on various constitutional grounds.

It needs to be emphasised that the Constitution does not oblige the legislature to establish such a legal regulation where the time of the expiry of the powers of judges, which is established in the Constitution or laws, would coincide with the time when a judge reaches the pensionable age established by law: it is also allowed to establish, by means of a law, such a legal regulation whereby the term of powers of a judge may expire before he/she reaches the pensionable age established under the law, as well as such a legal regulation whereby the term of powers of a judge may expire after he/she reaches the pensionable age established under the law. While establishing the social (material) guarantees of judges after their powers cease, it is necessary to pay regard to that. In this context, it needs to be noted that two legal facts – the expiry of the term of powers of judges and the fact that a judge reaches the pensionable age established under the law – are considered in Item 2 of Article 115 of the Constitution as equal alternatives, thus, as equal grounds for the cessation of the powers of a judge; it also needs to be mentioned that Article 108 of the Constitution does not relate the cessation of the powers of a justice with any age, or with the pensionable age established by law, but only with one of the specified alternatives – with the expiry of the term of nine years, which is established in the Constitution itself (taking account of the reservation provided for in Paragraphs 2, 3 and 4 of Article 7 of the Republic of Lithuania's Law on the Procedure for the Entry into Force of the Constitution of the Republic of Lithuania, which is a constituent part of the Constitution).

Since the expiry of the term of powers and the fact that a judge reaches the pensionable age established under the law are alternative (equivalent) legal grounds for the cessation of the powers of a judge, the same (equivalent) legal consequences, inter alia, related to the social (material) guarantees of judges after their powers cease, must appear as a result of relevant legal facts.

The fact that, under the Constitution, before their powers expire or before they reach the pensionable age established by law, judges may be released from their duties due to their state of health may not serve as the grounds for not applying to them social (material) guarantees related to the status of judges after their powers cease where such guarantees are established for (and applied to) judges whose powers cease upon reaching the pensionable age established under the law or upon the expiry of their term of powers. Even though the legislature has a certain degree of discretion to establish social (material) guarantees for such judges (who are released from their duties due to the state of health before the expiry of their term of powers and reaching the pensionable age established by law) after their powers cease, it does not have the discretion to establish such a legal regulation whereby, from the aspect of the social (material) guarantees of judges after their powers cease, the status of judges who are released from their duties due to the state of their health before the expiry of their term of powers and before reaching the pensionable age established under the law and the status of the judges who were released from their duties upon reaching the pensionable age established under the law or upon the expiry of their term of powers would be opposed.

It needs to be emphasised that the said ground for the cessation of the powers of a judge is related not to the free decision of a judge himself/herself no longer to work as a judge and no longer to pursue the career of a judge, but to the fact that, because of the reason that does not depend on him/her – the state of his/her health – he/she cannot hold office and his/her powers must cease early. While establishing the social (material) guarantees of judges after their powers cease, the legislature may not disregard this circumstance.

Legal situations where judges, before the expiry of their term of powers and before reaching the pensionable age established by law, are released from their duties of their own will (they resign), as well as where judges are released from their duties when they are elected to another office or are transferred, with their consent, to another place of work, should be assessed differently. Such grounds of the cessation of the powers of judges are related to the free decision of judges no longer to work as a judge and no longer to pursue the career of a judge (at all or temporarily). Thus, the legislature has the discretion to establish whether the social (material) guarantees of judges after their powers cease are related, concerning such persons (who are released from the duties of a judge of their own will, who have resigned, as well as those who are released from duties after electing them to another office or when they are transferred, with their consent, to another place of work), only to the cessation of the powers of judges of such persons, or whether they are also linked with other legal facts.

It has been held in this ruling of the Constitutional Court that, if the legislature establishes such a social (material) guarantee of judges after their powers cease as the pension of judges, it, having regard to the Constitution, may also establish cases where the pension of judges (which is related to the constitutional status of judges) is not granted to former judges and/or where granted state pensions of judges are no longer paid to former judges. It has also been held that, while establishing such cases where the pension of judges is not granted to a former judge, it is necessary to take account, inter alia, of the constitutional grounds of the cessation of the powers of a judge.

In the Constitutional Court's ruling of 27 November 2006, it was held that "the conduct of a judge – both related to the direct performance of his/her duties and not related to his/her official duties – should not raise any doubts about his/her impartiality and independence; a judge must fulfil his/her duties and behave in such a manner that his/her conduct would not discredit the name of judges". It needs to be noted that, while establishing the social (material) guarantees of judges after their powers cease, account must be taken of the fact that the Constitution also provides for such grounds of the cessation of the powers of judges as the entry into effect of court judgments convicting them, the removal of judges from office according to the procedure for impeachment proceedings for a gross violation of the Constitution or a breach of the oath, or if they are found to have committed a crime, as well as the conduct of a judge discrediting the name of judges. Thus, a law must establish such a legal regulation that, if a judge is released from his/her duties on the said grounds, he/she loses the respective social (material) guarantees of a judge that are established for (applied to) him/her upon the expiry of his/her term of office and are related to the constitutional status as a judge and his/her dignity.

It also needs to be noted that, as the Constitutional Court held in its ruling of 27 November 2006, while establishing in the Law on Courts the procedures for releasing a judge from his/her duties (taking account of, inter alia, the grounds (particularities thereof) for the release from his/her duties), it is necessary in all cases to pay regard to the principle of the independence of judges and courts, the presumption of innocence, as well as requirements of the due process of law and other imperatives laid down in the Constitution.

Holding judges administratively responsible (judges do not have immunity from administrative responsibility except in situations where such responsibility is related to the restriction of liberty) (Paragraph 2 of Article 114 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 17 December 2007

... The immunity of a judge from administrative responsibility, as well as the immunity of a member of the Seimas and that of the Government, who are also officials fulfilling their functions in implementing state power, from administrative responsibility, is not established in the Constitution except in situations where administrative responsibility is related to the restriction of the liberty of a judge ...

On the other hand ... an unfounded attempt to hold a judge administratively responsible in certain circumstances may actually mean an interference with his/her activities in an attempt to make an impact on the decisions of such a judge, or to take revenge on such a judge for decisions made by him/her.

Thus, the Constitution gives rise to the obligation of the legislature to establish such a procedure for bringing judges to administrative responsibility that could ensure as much as possible that judges are held administratively responsible only on reasonable grounds.

At the same time, it should be noted that, in the course of ensuring the independence of judges when they administer justice, regard should be paid to the fact that, under the Constitution, judges have no immunity from administrative responsibility (except in situations where administrative responsibility is related to the restriction of liberty). A fair balance should be found for the purpose of implementing the provisions of Paragraphs 1 and 2 of Article 114 of the Constitution.

For instance, such a rule would generally comply with the Constitution (also from the de lege ferenda viewpoint) that, in order to bring a judge to administrative responsibility, consent (permission) should be obtained from a certain institution of the judiciary (particular court, a higher court of the respective system of courts) or a self-governance institution of the judiciary (special institution of judges, which is envisaged in Paragraph 5 of Article 112 of the Constitution and is provided for by law, or another self-governance institution of the judiciary).

It should be emphasised that the aim of such consent (permission) is to make sure that no preconditions are created for a judge who commits an administrative violation to escape administrative responsibility, and that no impact on the activities of a judge is made, since any such impact is prohibited by the Constitution (Paragraph 1 of Article 114 of the Constitution).

The pension of a judge as a social (material) guarantee of judges (Articles 52 and 109 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 29 June 2010

The Constitutional Court has held that, if the legislature consolidates such a social (material) guarantee of judges after their powers cease as the pension of judges, this guarantee is defended not only under Article 109 of the Constitution, but also under Article 52 thereof (ruling of 22 October 2007).

... the legislature, while regulating the relationships connected with the state pension of judges, must establish, by means of a law, the grounds and conditions for granting this pension. The legislature may establish, by means of a law, the maximum amount of the state pension of judges and consolidate various ways for determining this amount. In doing so, the legislature must not violate the norms and principles of the Constitution. In this context, it needs to be noted that the legislature, while consolidating, by means of a law, the maximum amount of such a pension and the ways for determining this amount, must pay regard, inter alia, to the fact that the state pension of judges is a social (material) guarantee of judges after their powers cease, which stems from the Constitution and is defended not only under Article 109 of the Constitution, but also under Article 52 thereof, that this social (material) guarantee must be in line with the constitutional status of judges and their dignity, and that such a constitutional social (material) guarantee of judges must be real and not merely nominal. Otherwise, the essence and purpose of the state pension of judges as a social (material) guarantee of judges after their powers cease, which stems from the Constitution, would be denied; thus, the preconditions for deviating from the requirements arising from the Constitution, inter alia, Paragraph 2 of Article 109 thereof, as well as from the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law, would be created.

The differentiation of the social (material) guarantees of judges

... the guarantees of the social (material) nature of judges, inter alia, the social guarantees after the powers of judges cease, may be differentiated according to the length of time during which a person works as a judge. ... the size of the social (material) guarantees after the powers of judges cease may also be differentiated according to the length of time during which a person works as a judge. However, a legal regulation under which the size of the social (material) guarantees of judges after their powers cease is differentiated according to the length of time during which a person works as a judge must not deviate from the constitutional concept of this social (material) guarantee of judges. In this context, it needs to be noted that such a legal regulation whereby the size of the said social (material) guarantee of judges would be the same or similar for judges who received the remuneration of equal or similar amount, but whose duration of work in courts differs considerably, or whereby the size of the said social (material) guarantee would differ considerably for judges who received the remuneration of equal or similar amount, but whose duration of work in courts differs insignificantly, would not be in conformity with the constitutional concept of the social (material) guarantee of judges after their powers cease, inter alia, with the requirements of Paragraph 2 of Article 109 of the Constitution, as well as with the imperatives of justice, proportionality, and reasonableness, which stem from the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law

... while regulating the relationships connected with the social (material) guarantees of judges after the powers of judges cease, inter alia, when differentiating these guarantees, account must be taken of the fact that the classification of courts as belonging not to one, but, rather, to several (at present – three) systems of courts stems from the Constitution; a separate system of courts is comprised of the Constitutional Court, characterised by its own particularities, inter alia, the aspect of the term of office of the justices of the Constitutional Court.

... the legislature, while regulating the relationships connected with the social (material) guarantees of judges upon the expiry of their term of powers, must also take account of the fact that the justices of the Constitutional Court differ from the judges of other courts with respect to their constitutional status, inter alia, the term of office. Otherwise, the constitutional concept of the social (material) guarantees under which the social (material) guarantees of judges must be differentiated by taking account, inter alia, of the specificity of the system of courts and the particularities of the status of judges of the systems of courts, would be deviated from.

Reducing the financing of courts and the social (material) guarantees of judges upon the emergence of a particularly difficult economic and financial situation in the state

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 29 June 2010

The Constitution ... prohibits the reduction of the remuneration and [other] social guarantees of judges; any attempts to reduce the remuneration of judges or their other social (material) guarantees, or any limitation upon the financing of courts should be treated as an encroachment upon the independence of judges and courts (rulings of 6 December 1995 and 21 December 1999, the decision of 12 January 2000, the rulings of 12 July 2001 and 28 March 2006, and the decision of 8 August 2006). As well as any other person, a judge has the right to defend his/her rights, legitimate interests, and legitimate expectations (rulings of 12 July 2001 and 22 October 2007).

On the other hand, when there is an essential change in the economic and financial situation of the state and when, due to special circumstances (economic crisis, a natural disaster, etc.), a particularly difficult economic and financial situation arises in the state, there may be not enough funds, due to objective reasons, to fulfil the functions of the state and to satisfy the public interests and, thus, also to ensure the material and financial needs of courts. Under such circumstances, the legislature may change the legal regulation governing remuneration and pensions paid to various persons and consolidate such a legal regulation governing remuneration and pensions that would be less favourable to those persons if this is necessary in order to ensure the vital interests of society and the state and to protect other constitutional values. However, in such cases the legislature must also maintain the balance between the rights and legitimate interests of persons with respect to whom the less favourable legal regulation is established and the interests of society and the state, i.e. the legislature must pay regard to the requirements of the principle of proportionality. Consequently, in the case of a particularly difficult economic and financial situation in the state, the remuneration of judges and the state pensions of judges may also be reduced. If such a legal regulation were established whereby, in the case of a particularly difficult economic and financial situation in the state, it would not be allowed to reduce exclusively the financing of courts or exclusively the remuneration and the state pensions of judges, this would mean that courts are groundlessly singled out from among other institutions that implement state power and that judges are groundlessly singled out from among other persons that participate in carrying out the powers of the respective institutions of state power. The consolidation of such an exceptional situation of courts (judges) would not be in line with the requirements of an open, fair, and harmonious civil society and the imperatives of justice. It is allowed to worsen the financial and material conditions provided for under laws for the functioning of courts and to reduce the remuneration of judges and the state pensions of judges only by means of a law and it is allowed to do so only on a temporary basis for the period of time when the economic and financial condition in the state is particularly difficult; such reduction of the remuneration and state pensions of judges must not give rise to any preconditions for the violation of the independence of courts by any other institutions of state power and their officials (rulings of 26 March 2006 and 22 October 2007).

... if such a legal regulation were established whereby the size of the said social (material) guarantees of judges would be calculated on the basis of the remuneration of judges temporarily reduced due to a particularly difficult economic and financial situation in the state, this would not be in line with the imperatives of the equality of the rights of persons and justice, which stem from the Constitution, inter alia, from the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law.

It needs to be noted that the modification of a legal regulation by means of which state pensions are reduced to a large extent due to the fact that, upon the emergence of an extreme situation (economic crisis etc.) in the state, the economic and financial situation changes in such a way that the accumulation of the funds necessary to pay state pensions is not secured is an essential amendment to the legal regulation of these pensions. Thus, the legislature, upon the emergence of an extreme situation where, inter alia, due to an economic crisis, it is impossible to accumulate the amount of the funds necessary to pay state pensions, must, while reducing state pensions to a large extent, provide for such a mechanism of compensating for losses incurred by the persons to whom such pensions were granted and paid whereby, after the said extreme situation is over, the state would undertake the obligation to such persons to compensate them, in a fair manner and within a reasonable time, for the losses incurred by them due to the reduction of state pensions (decision of 20 April 2010).

The Constitutional Court has also held that the nature and character of state pensions are different from those of state social insurance old-age pensions, as well as from the nature and character of other state social insurance pensions, and these particularities imply that, when there is a particularly difficult economic and financial situation in the state and when, due to this, it is necessary to temporarily reduce pensions in order to secure the vitally important interests of society and the state and to protect other constitutional values, the legislature may reduce these pensions to the extent that is greater than the reduction of old-age or disability pensions. The aforesaid particularities also imply that losses incurred due to the reduction of state pensions may be compensated to the extent that is smaller than compensation for losses incurred due to the reduction of old-age or disability pensions (decision of 20 April 2010).

These official constitutional doctrinal provisions are mutatis mutandis also applicable to the reduction of the state pensions of judges.

Remunerating judges for overtime work, work during days off, and on holidays

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 14 February 2011

... heads of courts (their deputies, chairpersons of divisions, etc.) must organise the work of courts, inter alia, work after working hours and work during days off and on holidays, so that the allocations set for the remuneration of judges would be used rationally.

... the Constitution and laws also give rise to such functions of judges while performing which a judge is obliged to work overtime, during days off, and on holidays: for instance, under Paragraph 3 of Article 20 of the Constitution, a person apprehended in flagrante delicto must, within 48 hours, be brought before a court for the purpose of deciding, in the presence of this person, on the validity of the apprehension ...

[...]

... under the Constitution, inter alia, Paragraph 1 of Article 48 thereof, there may not be any such a situation where a judge who fulfils such functions specified in ... laws that must be performed after working hours, during days off, and on holidays would be not remunerated or would not be remunerated for the said work in a fair manner.

Consequently, under the Constitution, inter alia, Paragraph 1 of Article 48 thereof, and the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law, such a legal regulation [must be] established under which judges who perform the functions of judges specified in ... laws would be remunerated for overtime work, work during days off, and on holidays in a fair manner.

Reducing the remuneration of judges upon the emergence of a particularly difficult economic and financial situation in the state

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 1 July 2013

... the reduction of the remuneration of judges must not be disproportionate or discriminatory; inter alia, remuneration may not be reduced exclusively for judges, or exclusively for judges of certain courts, or exclusively for judges performing certain duties; the proportions of the amounts of remuneration established at the time prior to the emergence of a particularly difficult economic and financial situation in the state for judges performing different duties (for judges of different systems of courts and/or of different levels of courts), as well as the proportions of the amounts of remuneration established for different categories of judges and other persons (inter alia, state servants, politicians, and officials) who are paid for their work from the funds of the state or municipal budget, may not be violated. Any failure to observe the said requirements should be regarded as an encroachment upon the independence of judges and courts and, thus, inter alia, also as a violation of Paragraph 2 of Article 109 of the Constitution and the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law.

The independence of judges and courts

The Constitutional Court's decision of 10 March 2014

The principle of the independence of judges and courts, which is enshrined in the Constitution, obliges the legislature to establish such guarantees of the independence of judges and courts that would ensure the impartiality of courts in adopting decisions and would not permit any interference with the activities of judges and courts in the course of administering justice (ruling of 28 March 2006). In the jurisprudence of the Constitutional Court, it has been held that the independence of judges and courts, as well as their impartiality, may be ensured by means of various measures, inter alia, by establishing, by means of laws, their procedural independence, the organisational independence and self-governance of courts, the status of judges, and the social (material) guarantees of judges (rulings of 21 December 1999, 27 November 2006, and 22 October 2007).

The assessment of the entirety of the guarantees of the independence of judges and courts makes it possible to assert that the said guarantees are closely interrelated (ruling of 6 December 1995). In general, the independence of judges and courts cannot be assessed according to any single, even very significant, feature. Therefore, it is universally recognised that, if any of the guarantees of the independence of judges and courts are violated, the administration of justice can be compromised and there would be a risk that human rights and freedoms will not be ensured and the supremacy of law will not be guaranteed (ruling of 21 December 1999).

The procedural independence of judges

The Constitutional Court's decision of 10 March 2014

The procedural independence of judges and courts, which includes, inter alia, the autonomy of courts in deciding all issues related to a case under consideration, is one of the aspects of the principle of the independence of judges and courts – only a court itself decides on how it should consider a case. The Constitutional Court has held that judges are not bound by the obligation to account for cases considered by them to any state institution or officials (ruling of 21 December 1999). The procedural independence of a judge is a necessary condition for an impartial and fair consideration of a case (ruling of 21 December 1999).

Decisions adopted by a judge may be reviewed and altered or rescinded only by a court of higher instance in accordance with the procedure provided for in procedural laws (ruling of 21 December 1999). The Constitutional Court has held that the purpose of the instance system of courts is to remove any possible errors of courts of lower instance, not to permit the administration of injustice and, thus, to protect the rights and legitimate interests of a person and society (rulings of 16 January 2006, 28 March 2006, 6 December 2012, and 15 November 2013). The purpose of the instance system of courts of general jurisdiction is to create the preconditions for courts of higher instance to correct any errors of fact (i.e. of the establishment and assessment of legally significant facts) or those of law (i.e. of the application of law), which could, for some reasons, be made by a court of lower instance, and not to permit the administration of injustice in any civil case, criminal case, or case of another category considered by courts of general jurisdiction (ruling of 28 March 2006). Justice is administered by always leaving the possibility of correcting any possible error (rulings of 9 December 1998 and 15 November 2013).

The instance system of courts of general jurisdiction, which stems from the Constitution, may not be interpreted as restricting the procedural independence of courts of general jurisdiction of lower instance: courts of general jurisdiction of higher instance (and judges thereof) may not interfere in cases considered by courts of general jurisdiction of lower instance, give them any obligatory or recommendatory instructions on how the cases in question must be decided, etc.; in respect of the Constitution, such instructions (whether obligatory or recommendatory) should be assessed as acting ultra vires by the said courts (judges) (rulings of 28 March 2006 and 9 May 2006).

It should be noted that the said provisions of the official constitutional doctrine, which reveal the purpose of the instance system of courts of general jurisdiction and the procedural independence of courts of general jurisdiction, are also mutatis mutandis applicable to specialised courts, which are established under Paragraph 2 of Article 111 of the Constitution.

The self-regulation and self-governance of the judiciary

The Constitutional Court's decision of 10 March 2014

The Constitutional Court has held on more than one occasion that the full role and independence of the judiciary imply its self-regulation and self-governance, which includes, inter alia, the organisation of the work of courts and the activities of the professional corps of judges (rulings of 21 December 1999 and 9 May 2006).

A special institution of judges, provided for in Paragraph 5 of Article 112 of the Constitution, which advises the President of the Republic on the appointment, promotion, and transfer of judges or their release from duties, is an important element of the self-governance of the judiciary as an independent branch of state power. The constitutional powers of the said institution of judges are related to the participation of the judiciary, as the branch of state power formed on a professional basis, and certain members of the corps of judges who implement judicial power and, in accordance with the procedure prescribed under the law, are appointed or elected to the said special institution of judges in adopting decisions on the career of judges (ruling of 9 May 2006). A special institution of judges, which is provided for in Paragraph 5 of Article 112 of the Constitution, is a counterbalance to the President of the Republic as the subject of the executive in the area of the formation of the corps of judges (rulings of 21 December 1999 and 13 December 2004).

In the jurisprudence of the Constitutional Court, among other things, it has been held that the inadmissibility, which stems from the Constitution, to release a judge from his/her duties without the advice of a special institution of judges, which is specified in Paragraph 5 of Article 112 of the Constitution and is provided for by means of a law, is a very important guarantee of the independence of judges and courts and is one of the means that helps judges of all courts with no exception to protect themselves from the interference of state power and governing institutions, the members of the Seimas, as well as other officials, political parties, political and public organisations, and other persons, with the activities of judges or courts (ruling of 9 May 2006).

As it was noted in the Constitutional Court's ruling of 9 May 2006, a special institution of judges, which is specified in Paragraph 5 of Article 112 of the Constitution, is not the only element of the self-governance of the judiciary as an independent branch of state power; under the Constitution, the legislature, while paying regard to the constitutional principle of the independence of judges and courts and other provisions of the Constitution, also has the powers to establish, by means of a law, other self-governance institutions of the judiciary, to establish the procedure of their formation, powers, etc.; moreover, while seeking to ensure the effectiveness of the self-governance of the judiciary and in view of the fact that, under the Constitution, the self-governing judiciary must not be too centralised, certain such other institutions must be formed (first of all, the meeting of judges (or their representatives) without which the self-governance of the judiciary as a fully fledged and independent branch of state power is, in general, impossible); while regulating the relationships related to the formation of such institutions, the legislature has broad discretion.

The protection of the social (material) guarantees of judges, inter alia, the prohibition on reducing the level of these guarantees in cases where the system of the state pensions of judges is reorganised

The Constitutional Court's decision (no KT1-S1/2015) of 14 January 2015

... the state pension of judges, established by means of a law, is one of the types of pensions that are not directly specified in Article 52 of the Constitution; it is linked with a special status of a person – it is granted to judges for their service after their powers cease. It should also be noted that the legislature has a certain degree of discretion to establish the conditions for granting and paying the said pensions and their amounts, inter alia, when the system of pensions is reorganised; however, when doing so, it must pay regard to the Constitution.

In this context, the provisions of the Constitutional Court's ruling of 29 June 2010 that are related to the independence of judges and courts, which is consolidated in the Constitution (inter alia, Article 109 thereof), should also be noted:

- the independence of judges and courts is not a privilege, but one of the most important duties of judges and courts, stemming from the right (guaranteed by the Constitution) of every person, who believes that his/her rights or freedoms have been violated, to have an impartial arbiter of a dispute, who would settle a legal dispute on the merits under the Constitution and laws (rulings of 6 December 1995, 21 December 1999, 12 July 2001, 9 May 2006, and 22 October 2007);

- a judge, who is obligated to consider conflicts arising in society, as well as those between a person and the state, must be not only highly professionally qualified and of impeccable reputation, but also materially independent, and feel secure as to his/her future (rulings of 12 July 2001 and 22 October 2007); the imperative of the constitutional protection of the remuneration and other social (material) guarantees of judges stems from the principle of the independence of judges and courts, which is consolidated in the Constitution (inter alia, Article 109 thereof); through this principle, attempts are made to protect judges administering justice against both any influence of the legislative and executive branches and that of other state establishments and officials, political and public organisations, commercial and economic structures, and other legal and natural persons;

- the social (material) guarantees of the principle of the independence of judges that stem from the Constitution (which, actually, are also consolidated in the law of other democratic states, as well as in various international acts) mean that the state has the duty to ensure such social (material) provision for judges that would be in conformity with the status of judges while they are in office, as well as upon the expiry of their term of office (rulings of 21 December 1999 and 22 October 2007). Under the Constitution, the material and social guarantees established for judges must be such that are in line with the constitutional status of judges and their dignity (decision of 8 August 2006 and the ruling of 22 October 2007);

- the legislature must establish such a legal regulation that would ensure the independence of judges and courts, inter alia, the social (material) guarantees of judges, not only when they are in office, but also after their powers cease; in doing so, the legislature must pay regard to the norms and principles of the Constitution; after the powers of judges cease, the social (material) guarantees of judges may be varied, including, inter alia, periodic payments, one-off payments, etc.; the constitutional basis for establishing such guarantees is the exceptional constitutional status of judges, which is determined by the function of the administration of justice; therefore, the said guarantees may depend only upon such circumstances that are related to the constitutional status of judges, but they may not be regarded as replacing other social (material) guarantees that must be ensured to former judges on other grounds including those that are common to all working persons; the social (material) guarantees of judges after their powers cease must be real and not merely nominal (ruling of 22 October 2007);

– the legislature, while regulating the relationships linked with the state pension of judges, must establish, by means of a law, the grounds and conditions for granting this pension; the legislature must pay regard, inter alia, to the fact that the state pension of judges is a social (material) guarantee of judges after their powers cease, which stems from the Constitution and is defended not only under Article 109 of the Constitution, but also under Article 52 thereof, that this social (material) guarantee must be in line with the constitutional status of judges and their dignity, and that such a constitutional social (material) guarantee of judges must be real and not merely nominal. Otherwise, the essence and purpose of the state pension of judges as a social (material) guarantee of judges after their powers cease, which stems from the Constitution, would be denied; thus, the preconditions for deviating from the requirements arising from the Constitution, inter alia, Paragraph 2 of Article 109 thereof, as well as from the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law, would be created.

Thus, it should be noted that the state pension of judges, which is established by means of a law, is not an objective in itself and, under the Constitution, is not regarded as a privilege; the establishment of such a guarantee is related to the special constitutional status of judges and, in particular, with the requirement of the independence of judges, which is established in the Constitution, inter alia, Article 109 thereof. In other words, the state pension of judges, which is established by means of a law, is one of the social (material) guarantees of the principle of the independence of judges, which is consolidated in the Constitution, i.e. such a social (material) guarantee of judges that is established (applied) after their powers cease and is defended under Article 109 of the Constitution.

It needs to be emphasised that the social (material) guarantees of judges that are established (applied) to judges after their powers cease are one of the measures for ensuring the independence of judges. Only the provision of real rather than nominal social (material) future guarantees (inter alia, the pensions of judges), which are in line with the constitutional status of judges and their dignity, may ensure that, when administering justice, judges are not exposed to any influence of the decisions of the legislative or executive branch of power, or to any interference with their activities by the institutions of state power and governance, or their officials, or other persons; the provision of real social (material) guarantees may also protect judges against such possible decisions of the legislative, the executive, or public administration subjects that could put pressure on the decisions of judges in the course of administering justice; in addition, the provision of the said social (material) guarantees to judges may reduce the risk of corruption.

Consequently, although the state pension of judges, which is established by means of a law, is one of the types of pensions that are not directly specified in Article 52 of the Constitution and the legislature has a certain degree of discretion to establish the conditions for granting and paying the said pensions and their amounts, inter alia, while reorganising the system of pensions, the discretion of the legislature to regulate the state pensions of judges is narrower than the one in respect of other state pensions, since, among other requirements stemming from the Constitution, the legislature is also bound by the principle of the independence of judges and courts, which is consolidated in the Constitution, inter alia, by the imperative of the reality of the social (material) guarantees of judges.

... it should be noted that the prohibition on reducing the level, established by means of a law, of the social (material) guarantees of judges, inter alia, of those which are established (applied) to judges after their powers cease, stems from the principle of the independence of judges and courts, which is consolidated in the Constitution. On the other hand, this prohibition is not absolute: the level of the social (material) guarantees that are established for (applied to) judges after their powers cease may be reduced only by means of a law and it is allowed to do so only on a temporary basis for the period of time when the economic and financial condition in the state is particularly difficult; however, such reduction must not give rise to any preconditions for the violation of the independence of courts by any other state authority institutions and their officials.

It needs to be emphasised that, otherwise, if the level of the social (material) guarantees of judges could be reduced also in other cases, i.e. when there is no particularly difficult economic and financial situation in the state, the independence of judges would be endangered; in other words, the preconditions would be created for exerting influence on judges by means of the decisions of the legislative or executive branch, for interference by the institutions of state power and governance, or their officials, or other persons with the activities of judges, for making those decisions of the legislative, executive, or public administration subjects by means of which the social (material) guarantees of judges would be reduced by putting pressure on the decisions taken in the course of administering justice, as well as for increasing the risk of corruption.

In the light of the foregoing arguments, the conclusion should be drawn ... that, when the legislature reorganises the system of the state pensions of judges, no regulation reducing the level (established by means of a law) of the social (material) guarantees of judges may be established.

Differentiating the amount of the state pensions of judges; the imperative of the reality of the social (material) guarantees of judges

The Constitutional Court's decision (no KT1-S1/2015) of 14 January 2015

... under the Constitution:

– the length of service of judges may be a criterion for differentiating the amount of the pensions of judges; however, such a criterion must not be the only one;

– as in the case of the remuneration of judges, the position held by judges, i.e. in which system of courts and at which level of the system a person held the position of a judge, must also be a criterion for differentiating the amount of the pensions of judges; where, due to the specificity of a court, the constitutional status of judges has certain particularities, they should also be taken into account.

... Consequently, while paying regard to the Constitution and implementing the requirement, stemming therefrom, to differentiate the amount of the pensions of judges according to the positions held by judges (i.e. according to the system of courts and the level of such a system in which a person held the position of a judge), the legislature may provide that the remuneration received by judges, which, as mentioned before, must also depend on the positions of judges (i.e. the system of courts and the level of such a system in which a person held the position of a judge), is one of the criteria for differentiating the amount of the state pensions of judges.

... After the legislature has established such a criterion, regard must ... be paid to the prohibition on differentiating the level of the social (material) guarantees of judges, which are established (applied) upon the expiry of the powers of judges, according to when the respective guarantees started to apply to a person, as well as to the requirement to review, as appropriate, the level of the social (material) guarantees applied to judges whose powers have already ceased if, in a changing economic or social situation, higher guarantees are established to the judges of the courts of the same system and the same level whose powers will expire later; both the said prohibition and requirement stem from the Constitution (inter alia, from the constitutional principle of the independence of judges and courts, the imperative of the reality of the social (material) guarantees of judges, and the equal constitutional status of judges). Otherwise, a situation, prohibited by the Constitution, could arise where only such social (material) guarantees that were established at the moment of the cessation of the powers of judges would be applied to judges whose powers ceased, i.e. in the long term (if an economic or social situation changed), the said guarantees would no longer be real, but nominal.

Consequently, while paying regard to the Constitution, inter alia, the constitutional principle of the independence of judges and courts, the imperative of the reality of the social (material) guarantees of judges, and the equal constitutional status of judges, it is not allowed to establish any such a legal regulation that would create the preconditions for paying the state pensions of a considerably different amount of judges to persons whose length of service as a judge is the same at the same level of the same system of courts, irrespective of when the pension of judges would be granted to them.

In the light of the foregoing arguments, the conclusion should be drawn ... that, after the legislature has provided that remuneration received by judges is one of the criteria for differentiating the amount of the state pensions of judges, the Constitution does not allow any such a legal regulation under which an increase in the remuneration of judges would have no influence on the amount of the granted and paid state pensions of judges.

The right of judges to receive remuneration for participation in projects for international cooperation and democracy promotion where such projects are related to improving the system of justice and the activity of courts

The Constitutional Court's decision of 16 May 2016

... Paragraph 1 of Article 135 of the Constitution consolidates the grounds for international cooperation carried out by the Republic of Lithuania in order to implement the constitutional objectives of foreign policy to ensure national security and independence, the welfare of its citizens, and their basic rights and freedoms, and to contribute to the creation of the international order based on law and justice; when account is taken of the geopolitical orientation of the State of Lithuania, the aforementioned grounds for international cooperation imply such an activity performed by the State of Lithuania, by its institutions, and by individuals employed therein that is aimed at contributing to the partnership of other states with the European Union or with NATO, or at contributing to the integration of the said states into these international organisations by promoting the dissemination of universal and democratic values, as well as the principles of EU law, as, for instance, democracy, the rule of law, transparency, the independence of courts and judges, respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms, and, inter alia, the dissemination of the said values and principles in the spheres of the improvement of the systems of justice and the activity of courts.

... courts are among the institutions exercising state power; the judiciary may fulfil its constitutional obligation and function, which is the administration of justice, only while being autonomous and independent of the other branches of power. In this context, it should be mentioned that the Constitutional Court has held that the autonomy and independence of judicial power does not mean that it and other state powers – legislative power and executive power – may not cooperate, of course, provided that they do not interfere with the exercise of the powers of other branches of power (ruling of 9 May 2006).

This, among other things, means that, under the Constitution, the role of courts is not limited exclusively to the administration of justice; as well as other institutions of state power, courts, within their constitutional competence, either independently or in cooperation with other state institutions, may participate in carrying out the general tasks and functions of the state; inter alia, courts may also participate in the activity of achieving the constitutional objectives of the foreign policy of the Republic of Lithuania and in the activity of fulfilling international obligations and those related to full membership in the European Union and NATO, including the participation in projects for international cooperation and democracy promotion. As mentioned before, this geopolitical orientation, which has been chosen by the Republic of Lithuania and is a constitutional value, also implies such an activity performed by the State of Lithuania, by its institutions, and by individuals employed therein that is aimed at contributing to the partnership of other states with the European Union or with NATO, or at contributing to the integration of the said states into these international organisations by promoting the dissemination of universal and democratic values, as well as the principles of EU law, inter alia, the dissemination of the said values and principles in the spheres of the improvement of the system of justice and the activity of courts.

Thus, it is possible to implement the participation of the State of Lithuania and its institutions, inter alia, courts, in the said activity, among other things, when judges take part in support projects funded by international organisations or foreign states, or in projects financed under the Lithuanian Development Cooperation and Democracy Promotion Programme, where such projects are related to improving the system of justice and the activity of courts.

In the context of this decision, it also needs to be mentioned that the Constitutional Court has noted that the appropriate preparation of judges, the improvement of their knowledge and in-service training are an important precondition for ensuring the proper activity of courts (ruling of 21 December 1999 and the decision of 10 March 2014). The qualification of judges, their professionalism, and their ability to decide cases following not only laws, but also law, are among the factors determining public trust in courts (ruling of 27 November 2006).

It should be noted that one of the preconditions for the effective improvement of the qualification of judges is the possibility for judges who hold higher qualification, have greater work experience as a judge, and possess specific knowledge related to a certain area of law to share their knowledge and experience with other judges, inter alia, on the international level, as, for instance, when judges participate in projects for international cooperation and democracy promotion, thus contributing to the implementation of the aforesaid constitutional objectives of the foreign policy of the Republic of Lithuania, inter alia, to the fulfilment of the international obligations arising from the membership in the European Union and NATO, which include assistance to other states in the processes of their partnership with or integration into the European Union or NATO, as well as to the fulfilment of other international obligations undertaken by the State of Lithuania.

It has been mentioned that, under the Constitution, courts are allowed to participate in the activity of achieving the constitutional objectives of the foreign policy of the Republic of Lithuania and in the activity of fulfilling international obligations and those related to full membership in the European Union and NATO, including the participation in projects for international cooperation and democracy promotion. This means, among other things, that courts and judges may participate in an activity aimed at contributing to the improvement of the qualification of judges, inter alia, judges from other states, and at promoting the dissemination of universal and democratic values, as well as the principles of EU law, inter alia, the dissemination of the said values and principles in the spheres of the improvement of the systems of justice and the activity of courts.

... under Paragraph 1 of Article 113 of the Constitution, judges may not receive any remuneration other than the remuneration established for judges and payment for educational or creative activities. Thus, judges may receive payment for participating in the aforementioned international projects only if they are engaged in educational or creative activities while participating in the said projects.

At the same time, it needs to be noted that ... the constitutional mission of courts is to administer justice. Thus, any other activity of judges, inter alia, their participation in support projects funded by international organisations or foreign states, or in projects financed under the Lithuanian Development Cooperation and Democracy Promotion Programme, where such projects are related to improving the system of justice and the activity of courts, may not interfere with the fulfilment of the main constitutional judicial obligation, arising from the Constitution, inter alia, Article 109 thereof, to administer justice in a proper and effective manner. On the other hand, it should also be noted that judges may participate only in such activity that is in line with the impartiality and independence of judges.

In view of what has been stated above, the conclusion should be drawn that the provision “Judges may receive only the remuneration of a judge paid from the state budget. Judges may not receive any remuneration other than the remuneration established for them and payment for educational or creative activities” ... of the Constitutional Court’s ruling of 12 July 2001 means, inter alia, that judges may receive payment for participating in support projects funded by the European Union, by other international organisations, or by foreign states, or for participating in projects financed under the Lithuanian Development Cooperation and Democracy Promotion Programme, where such projects are related to improving the system of justice and the activity of courts only if they are engaged in educational or creative activities while participating in the said projects ...

The right of judges to hold the duties of a judge of an international court and to receive remuneration for holding such duties

The Constitutional Court’s decision of 16 May 2016

In the Constitutional Court’s ruling of 12 July 2001, a certain provision of which is requested to be interpreted, it was noted that the incompatibility of the office of a judge with another office or employment is determined by the special legal situation of both judges and courts as one of the branches of state power; the established prohibition is aimed at ensuring the independence and impartiality of judges, which are necessary conditions for the implementation of justice.

It is clear from this provision that the prohibition imposed on judges on holding any other elective or appointive office, or working in any private establishments or enterprises, is not an objective in itself – this prohibition is aimed at ensuring the independence and impartiality of judges and the proper administration of justice.

In this context, it should be noted that ... the question whether the prohibition preventing a judge from receiving any remuneration other than that established for judges and payment for educational or creative activities includes the prohibition preventing a judge from receiving remuneration for holding the duties of a judge of an international court (in cases where the duties of a judge of a national court and those of a judge of an international court are combined) must be assessed in the context of the constitutional grounds for the international cooperation of the Republic of Lithuania, which are consolidated in various provisions of the Constitution, inter alia, in Paragraph 1 of Article 135 thereof, as well as in the context of the international obligations undertaken by the State of Lithuania of its own free will.

As mentioned before, in implementing its foreign policy, the Republic of Lithuania follows the universally recognised principles and norms of international law, seeks to ensure national security and independence, the welfare of its citizens, and their basic rights and freedoms, and contributes to the creation of the international order based on law and justice; the Republic of Lithuania participates in international organisations provided that this is not in conflict with the interests and independence of the state; respect for international law, i.e. the observance of international obligations undertaken of its own free will and respect for the universally recognised principles of international law (as well as the principle of pacta sunt servanda) are a legal tradition and a constitutional principle of the restored independent State of Lithuania.

It should also be noted that the general grounds, which are consolidated in the Constitution, for international cooperation carried out by the state are characterised, inter alia, by the establishment of the geopolitical orientation of the State of Lithuania – the membership of the Republic of Lithuania in the European Union and NATO and the necessity to fulfil the international obligations related to the said membership; the geopolitical orientation of the Republic of Lithuania is related to such an activity performed by the State of Lithuania, by its institutions, and by individuals employed therein that is aimed at contributing to the partnership of other states with the European Union or with NATO, or at contributing to the integration of the said states into these international organisations by promoting the dissemination of universal and democratic values, as well as the principles of EU law, as, for instance, democracy, the rule of law, the independence of courts and judges, respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms, inter alia, the dissemination of the said values and principles in the spheres of the improvement of the system of justice and the activity of courts.

As mentioned before, one of the preconditions for the effective improvement of the qualification of judges is the possibility for judges who hold higher qualification, have greater work experience as a judge, and possess specific knowledge related to a certain area of law to share their knowledge and experience with other judges, inter alia, on the international level, as, for instance, when judges participate in projects for international cooperation and democracy promotion, thus contributing to the implementation of the constitutional objectives of the foreign policy of the Republic of Lithuania and to the fulfilment of the international obligations arising from the membership in the European Union and NATO.

... as mentioned before, under the Constitution, the role of courts is not limited exclusively to the administration of justice – they are allowed to participate in the activity of achieving the constitutional objectives of the foreign policy of the Republic of Lithuania and in the activity of fulfilling international obligations and those related to full membership in international organisations, inter alia, in the European Union.

Thus, the fact that the Republic of Lithuania carries out international cooperation and complies with the assumed international obligations may also be interpreted as meaning that the Republic of Lithuania fulfils its international obligations towards the international community in the sphere of the administration of justice, inter alia, its obligation to participate in the activity of international courts. The said obligations imply the duty of the state to appoint suitable and highly qualified representatives (inter alia, judges of national courts) to international institutions or international judicial institutions.

It should be noted that judges of international courts are subject to requirements of high professional qualification, expert knowledge, and/or proficiency in foreign languages. The recognition of the right of a judge of a national court to hold the duties of a judge of an international court (in cases where the duties of a judge of a national court and those of a judge of an international court are combined) means the recognition of high professional qualification held by him/her, as well as his/her ability to properly administer justice both on the national and international level and, thus, to contribute to achieving the constitutional objectives of the foreign policy of the Republic of Lithuania, inter alia, to complying with the international obligations in the sphere of the administration of justice.

Thus, the established requirements for judges relating to high professional qualification and expert knowledge are aimed at ensuring the authority of courts as independent and impartial judicial power, as well as the proper and effective fulfilment of judicial functions.

... Paragraph 1 of Article 113 of the Constitution provides, inter alia, that judges may not hold any other elective or appointive office, or work in any business, commercial, or other private establishments or enterprises. This prohibition is aimed at ensuring the independence and impartiality of judges, as well as the proper fulfilment of the function of the administration of justice, which is attributed to courts under the Constitution, inter alia, Article 109 thereof. It should also be noted that the prohibition preventing judges from working in business, commercial, or other private establishments or enterprises does not apply to their educational, creative, inter alia, scientific, activity in educational or scientific establishments: under the Constitution, the said activity is allowed.

In this context, it should also be mentioned that the Constitution, inter alia, Paragraph 2 of Article 103 and Article 112 thereof, explicitly provides for other positions in courts that may be held only by a judge of a particular court: namely, the positions of the President of the Constitutional Court, the President of the Supreme Court, the President of the Court of Appeal, as well as the presidents of regional, district, and specialised courts.

It should be noted that Paragraph 5 of Article 112 of the Constitution explicitly provides that a special institution of judges, as provided for by means of a law, advises the President of the Republic on the appointment, promotion, and transfer of judges or their release from duties. The Constitutional Court has held that this state institution must be comprised only from judges, since, under the Constitution, no other institution, official, or other person may have the powers to advise the President of the Republic on the appointment, promotion, and transfer of judges or their release from duties (ruling of 9 May 2006).

Thus, under the Constitution, judges may perform certain other judicial duties specified expressis verbis, including duties in judicial self-governance bodies, inter alia, those in a special institution of judges, which is provided for in Paragraph 5 of Article 112 of the Constitution.

It should also be noted that, under Paragraph 4 of Article 111 of the Constitution, the formation and competence of courts is established by the Law on Courts of the Republic of Lithuania. The Constitutional Court has held that the Constitution not only obliges the legislature to lay down, by means of a law, the establishment and competence of all the courts of the Republic of Lithuania (thus, including the status, formation, exercise of powers (activity), and guarantees of courts of general jurisdiction, the status of judges of these courts, etc.), which are specified in Paragraph 1 of Article 111 of the Constitution, but also expressis verbis consolidates the title of this law – the Law on Courts (rulings of 28 March 2006, 9 May 2006, and 22 October 2007 and the decision of 15 May 2009).

Thus, other positions that judges are also allowed to hold may be established in the Law on Courts, which is expressis verbis specified in the Constitution, as, for instance, the deputy president of a court, or the chairperson of a particular division of a court.

... it should be noted that judges of national courts may also perform the duties of judges of international courts (in cases where they combine the duties of a judge of a national court and those of a judge of an international court) if such a possibility is provided for under the obligations consolidated in the international treaties of the Republic of Lithuania to participate in the activity of international courts and implies the duty of the state to appoint highly qualified representatives (inter alia, judges of national courts) to international institutions or international judicial institutions. It should also be noted that the activity of such representatives, where they combine the duties of a judge of a national court and those of a judge of an international court, contributes to the achievement of the constitutional objectives of the foreign policy pursued by the Republic of Lithuania, inter alia, to the fulfilment of the international obligations in the sphere of the administration of justice, as well as to the creation of the international order based on law and justice. In addition, the said activity where the duties of a judge of a national court and those of a judge of an international court are combined must not be continuous – it may be carried out only on a temporary basis

The performance of the duties of a judge of an international court may not be considered the activity of a judge prohibited by Paragraph 1 of Article 113 of the Constitution, since the mission of the duties of a judge of a national court and that of the duties of a judge of an international court is to administer justice: judges are subject to the same requirements of the independence and impartiality of courts and judges, they are granted a special status, inter alia, the term of powers of judges is inviolable and any interference with the activity of judges and courts is prohibited. It should be noted that a judge of a national court, when holding the duties of a judge of an international court (in cases where the duties of a judge of a national court and those of a judge of an international court are combined), may not, solely due to this, lose his/her powers of a national judge. At the same time, it should also be noted that combining the duties of a judge of a national court and those of a judge of an international court in itself does not give rise to doubts as to the impartiality and independence of a judge.

In view of this, it should be held that, under the Constitution, judges are allowed to perform certain other specified duties in courts and in judicial self-governance bodies, whereas international treaties of the Republic of Lithuania may also provide for situations where judges may perform, inter alia, the duties of judges of international courts (in cases where they combine the duties of a judge of a national court and those of a judge of an international court). Such an activity may not interfere with the fulfilment of the main constitutional judicial duty, arising from Article 109 of the Constitution, to administer justice in a proper and effective manner.

It should also be held that the right of judges to perform the duties of judges of international courts (in cases where they combine the duties of a judge of a national court and those of a judge of an international court) also implies their right to receive remuneration for the performance of such duties. At the same time, it needs to be noted that ... according to Paragraph 1 of Article 113 of the Constitution, judges may not receive any remuneration other than the remuneration established for judges and payment for educational or creative activities; therefore, the conclusion should be drawn that, when performing the duties of judges of international courts (in cases where the duties of a judge of a national court and those of a judge of an international court are combined), judges are not allowed to receive the remuneration of a judge of a national court and that of a judge of an international court at the same time.

In view of what has been stated above, the conclusion should be drawn that the provision “Judges may receive only the remuneration of a judge paid from the state budget. Judges may not receive any remuneration other than the remuneration established for them and payment for educational or creative activities” ... of the Constitutional Court’s ruling of 12 July 2001 means, inter alia, that ... judges ... may receive the remuneration of a judge of an international court (in cases where the duties of a judge of a national court and those of a judge of an international court are combined); however, they must not receive the remuneration of a judge of a national court at the same time.

The immunity of judges (Paragraph 2 of Article 114 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court’s ruling of 9 March 2020

As the Constitutional Court held in its ruling of 30 May 2003, one of the constitutionally consolidated guarantees of the independence of judges is the immunity of judges, which is enshrined, inter alia, in Paragraph 2 of Article 114 of the Constitution, under which judges may not be held criminally responsible or be detained, or have their liberty restricted otherwise, without the consent of the Seimas or, in the period between the sessions of the Seimas, without the consent of the President of the Republic. The Constitutional Court has held that immunity means additional guarantees for a person's inviolability, which are necessary and indispensable for the proper performance of the duties of that person (ruling of 8 May 2000).

... under the Constitution, inter alia, Paragraph 2 of Article 114 thereof, interpreted in conjunction with Paragraph 2 of Article 109 of the Constitution, the immunity of judges is not an objective in itself. It needs to be emphasised that the constitutional immunity of judges is functional in nature: its purpose is to guarantee the independence of judges, so that the administration of justice is ensured. Only such a concept of the immunity of judges is compatible with the obligation, stemming from the Constitution, for a democratic state under the rule of law to ensure the security of each person and all society against criminal attempts, inter alia, the duty of the legislature to create, by means of a legal regulation, the preconditions for the speedy disclosure and thorough investigation of criminal acts and other violations of law, as well as the preconditions for the fair solving of the question concerning the legal responsibility of persons having committed these criminal acts or other violations of law. Thus, the immunity of judges, consolidated in Paragraph 2 of Article 114 of the Constitution, is not meant to create the preconditions for judges to avoid criminal or other legal responsibility for criminal acts or other violations of law. A different interpretation of the immunity of judges, including that, purportedly, the legislature may provide for the broader immunity of judges than that consolidated in Paragraph 2 of Article 114 of the Constitution, would be incompatible with the constitutionally consolidated concept of a democratic state under the rule of law, inter alia, it would be incompatible with the constitutional obligation of the state to ensure the security of each person and all society against criminal attempts; the said different interpretation of the immunity of judges would also unreasonably single out judges from society and would imply a privilege, prohibited under Paragraph 2 of Article 29 of the Constitution.

... the requirement, under Paragraph 2 of Article 114 of the Constitution, that judges may not be held criminally responsible or be detained, or have their liberty restricted otherwise, without the consent of the Seimas or of the President of the Republic, is consolidated for the purpose of enabling the maximum protection of judges against unfoundedly being held criminally responsible, being detained, or having their liberty restricted otherwise in cases where it would thereby be sought to influence the decisions of judges.

Interpreting Paragraph 2 of Article 114 of the Constitution, under which a judge, inter alia, may not be held criminally responsible without the consent of the Seimas or, in the period between the sessions of the Seimas, without the consent of the President of the Republic, it should be noted that such consent of the Seimas or the President of the Republic may be given only in cases where, in accordance with the procedure prescribed by means of laws, sufficient data are collected to suspect the judge concerned of having committed a criminal act.

... Paragraph 2 of Article 114 of the Constitution, under which a judge, inter alia, may not be held criminally responsible without the consent of the Seimas or, in the period between the sessions of the Seimas, without the consent of the President of the Republic, should be interpreted in conjunction with Paragraph 1 of Article 20 of the Constitution, according to which human liberty is inviolable, as well as in conjunction with Paragraph 2 of the said article, under which no one may be arbitrarily apprehended or detained; no one may be deprived of his/her liberty otherwise than on the grounds and according to the procedures established by law. The Constitutional Court has held that Paragraph 1 of Article 20 of the Constitution lays down the human right to physical liberty (ruling of 8 May 2000) and that this liberty means, first of all, the protection of an individual against arbitrary apprehension or detention (ruling of 5 February 1999). Paragraph 2 of Article 20 of the Constitution enshrines the principle of the lawfulness of the apprehension of a person: a person must not be deprived of liberty otherwise than on such grounds and in accordance with such procedures as are established by means of a law (ruling of 5 February 1999).

Thus, under Paragraph 2 of Article 114 of the Constitution, which enshrines the functional immunity of a judge, intended to guarantee the independence of a judge in order to ensure the administration of justice, the consent of the Seimas or that of the President of the Republic is required only for such restriction of the physical liberty of a judge that is aimed at providing the preconditions for holding the judge criminally or otherwise legally responsible for having committed criminal acts or other violations of law; inter alia, this consent is required for his/her apprehension, detention, or the deprivation of his/her liberty otherwise. However, under Paragraph 2 of Article 114 of the Constitution, no consent of the Seimas or the President of the Republic is required for such procedural measures provided for by law that, in themselves, do not restrict the physical liberty of a person and are necessary for the speedy disclosure and thorough investigation of criminal acts and other violations of law, inter alia, for collecting evidence and identifying persons having committed criminal acts or other violations of law (inter alia, for carrying out a search, seizure, or inspection).

A different interpretation of Paragraph 2 of Article 114 of the Constitution, including that, purportedly, the consent of the Seimas or that of the President of the Republic is necessary for any procedural measures that, in themselves, do not restrict the physical liberty of a person, but are related to performing the duties of the person prescribed by means of laws in applying these measures, would create the preconditions for persons, inter alia, judges, having committed criminal acts or other violations of law to avoid criminal or other legal responsibility. The requirement to receive the consent of the Seimas or that of the President of the Republic in order for the said procedural measures to be applied to judges would be incompatible with the obligation, stemming from the Constitution, for a democratic state under the rule of law to ensure the security of each person and all society against criminal attempts, inter alia, with the duty of the legislature to create, by means of a legal regulation, the preconditions for the speedy disclosure and thorough investigation of criminal acts and other violations of law, as well as the preconditions for the fair solving of the question concerning the legal responsibility of persons, inter alia, judges, having committed these criminal acts or other violations of law.

It should be noted that the requirement, consolidated under Paragraph 2 of Article 114 of the Constitution, to receive the consent of the Seimas or that of the President of the Republic in order to hold a judge criminally responsible or detain him/her, or to restrict his/her liberty otherwise, must not be interpreted as precluding the apprehension of a judge, in accordance with the procedure prescribed by law and if necessary, where the judge is found in the act of committing a criminal offence or another violation of law. A different interpretation, including that, purportedly, the absence of the consent in question would preclude the restriction of the liberty of a judge where the judge is found in the act of committing a criminal offence or another violation of law would be incompatible with the obligation, stemming from the Constitution, for a democratic state under the rule of law to ensure the security of each person and all society against criminal attempts, since it would create the preconditions for a judge to avoid legal responsibility for the committed criminal act or another violation of law.

It should also be noted that, in cases where a judge is found in the act of committing a criminal offence, under Paragraph 2 of Article 114 of the Constitution, it is necessary, without undue delay, to receive the consent of the Seimas or, in the period between the sessions of the Seimas, the consent of the President of the Republic for holding the judge criminally responsible.

9.1.4. The constitutional status of judges. The appointment of judges, their professional career, and their release from duties. The judicial self-governance institutions

The constitutional status of judges

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 12 July 2001

The specific function of courts and the principle of the independence of judges and courts, which are consolidated in the Constitution, also determine the legal status of judges. It needs to be noted that the judiciary is formed on a professional, but not on a political basis. "According to the duties performed, judges may not be deemed to be state servants. No one may demand that they follow a certain political guideline. The judicial practice (case law) is formed only by courts while applying the norms of law. Judges ensure human rights and freedoms in that they administer justice on the grounds of the Constitution and laws" (ruling of 21 December 1999).

A special institution of judges, which is specified in Paragraph 5 of Article 112 of the Constitution and is provided for by law

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 13 December 2004

Paragraph 5 of Article 112 of the Constitution provides that a special institution of judges, as provided for by law, advises the President of the Republic on the appointment, promotion, and transfer of judges or their release from duties. In its ruling of 21 December 1999, when interpreting the said provision of Paragraph 5 of Article 112 of the Constitution, the Constitutional Court held that: “a special institution of judges, provided for in Paragraph 5 of Article 112 of the Constitution, should be interpreted as an important element of the self-governance of the judiciary, which is an independent branch of state power”; the said institution is “a counterbalance to the President of the Republic as a subject of the executive in the area of the formation of the corps of judges”.

The appointment, promotion, and transfer of judges or their release from duties (Item 11 of Article 84, Paragraphs 2, 3, and 4 of Article 112 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 9 May 2006

Subjects who have the powers to appoint, promote, or release judges from their duties, as well as to transfer judges (change their places of work), are established in the Constitution. Under Paragraph 2 of Article 112 of the Constitution, the justices of the Supreme Court, as well as its President chosen from among them, are appointed and released by the Seimas upon submission by the President of the Republic; the judges of the Court of Appeal, as well as its President chosen from among them, are appointed by the President of the Republic upon the assent of the Seimas (Paragraph 3 of Article 112); the judges and presidents of district, regional, and specialised courts are appointed and their places of work are changed by the President of the Republic (Paragraph 4 of Article 112).

Paragraphs 2, 3 and 4 of Article 112 of the Constitution, which regulate the appointment, promotion, and transfer of judges or their release from duties, are related to Item 11 of Article 84 of the Constitution, under which the President of the Republic, inter alia: proposes candidates for the posts of the justices of the Supreme Court for consideration by the Seimas and, on the appointment of all the justices of the Supreme Court, proposes the candidate from among them for the post of the President of the Supreme Court to be appointed by the Seimas; appoints the judges of the Court of Appeal and, from among them, the President of the Court of Appeal, provided that the Seimas gives its assent to the candidates proposed; appoints the judges and presidents of regional and district courts and changes their places of work; in cases provided for by law, submits that the Seimas release judges from their duties.

In this context, it should be mentioned that, even though Paragraph 3 of Article 112 of the Constitution expressis verbis regulates only the relationships of the appointment of the judges of the Court of Appeal and (after the judges of the Court of Appeal are appointed) the President of this Court, a systemic interpretation of this paragraph (when its provisions are related to Item 11 of Article 84 of the Constitution and to the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law) implies that the judges of the Court of Appeal and the President of this court must be released from their duties under the same procedure as they are appointed, i.e. the President of the Republic has the powers to release them from their duties upon the assent of the Seimas.

It also needs to be mentioned that, under Articles 74 and 116 of the Constitution, certain judges of courts of general jurisdiction, namely the President and justices of the Supreme Court, the President and judges of the Court of Appeal (as well as the President and justices of the Constitutional Court), who grossly violate the Constitution or breach their oath, or are found to have committed a crime, may be removed from office according to the procedure for impeachment proceedings.

It should be held that the Constitution establishes such a procedure for the appointment and release of the judges and presidents of courts of general jurisdiction of various levels where such judges and presidents of courts are appointed and released by the institutions of other branches of state power – executive power and legislative power; thus, they are appointed and released, respectively, by the President of the Republic and the Seimas, i.e. institutions that are formed on a political basis. The President of the Republic appoints and releases the judges and presidents of certain courts of general jurisdiction regarding which he/she does not have to apply to the Seimas; other judges and presidents of courts of general jurisdiction are appointed and released by the President of the Republic in such a manner that he/she must receive the assent of the Seimas beforehand; still, some other judges and presidents of courts of general jurisdiction are appointed and released by the Seimas, upon submission by the President of the Republic. It needs to be emphasised that the Seimas participates only in the appointment and release of the judges and presidents of courts of general jurisdiction of two highest levels and not of exclusively all courts; while the President of the Republic participates (in the ways established in Paragraphs 2, 3, and 4 of Article 112 and Item 11 of Article 84 of the Constitution) in the appointment and release of the judges of courts of general jurisdiction of all levels (from the lowest level – district courts – and until the highest level – the Supreme Court); however, his/her powers regarding judges of different courts of general jurisdiction are different: (1) in order to appoint or release a judge of a district or regional court or the president of a district or regional court, a decision of the President of the Republic is necessary, while the Seimas in this area does not have any powers under the Constitution; (2) in order to appoint or release a judge or the President of the Court of Appeal, the President of the Republic must apply to the Seimas and, if the Seimas gives its assent, he/she may appoint a certain person as a judge or the President of the Court of Appeal or release a certain judge or the President of the Court of Appeal from duties; also, inter alia, if certain circumstances significant for such appointment or release from duties come to light, he/she may decide not to appoint that person as a judge or the President of the Court of Appeal and to propose another candidate to be approved by the Seimas, or not to release a certain judge or the President of the Court of Appeal from duties (if it is not obligatory to release that judge from duties under the Constitution); (3) in order to appoint or release a justice or President of the Supreme Court, the President of the Republic must propose that the Seimas appoint or release such a person, while the final decision on the appointment of the said person as a justice or the President of the Supreme Court or on his/her release from duties is adopted by the Seimas.

Item 11 (provisions on the appointment of judges and their release from duties) of Article 84 and Paragraphs 2, 3, and 4 of Article 112 of the Constitution must be interpreted inseparably from Paragraph 5 of Article 112 of the Constitution, which prescribes that a special institution of judges, as provided for by law, advises the President of the Republic on the appointment, promotion, and transfer of judges or their release from duties.

A special institution of judges, which is specified in Paragraph 5 of Article 112 of the Constitution; the legal consequences of advice given by this institution to the President of the Republic

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 9 May 2006

... the Constitutional Court ... in its rulings of 21 December 1999, 13 December 2004, and 2 June 2005, also revealed certain elements of the status of a special institution of judges, as provided for by law and specified in Paragraph 5 of Article 112 of the Constitution ...

... the official constitutional doctrine that reveals the constitutional status of a special institution of judges, as provided for by law and specified in Paragraph 5 of Article 112 of the Constitution, is also developed in this ruling of the Constitutional Court from the de lege ferenda aspect so that the legislature, when regulating the relationships connected with the appointment, promotion, and transfer of judges or their release from duties, would not diverge from the constitutional concept of a special institution of judges, as provided for by law and specified in Paragraph 5 of Article 112 of the Constitution.

... a special institution of judges, as provided for by law and specified in Paragraph 5 of Article 112 of the Constitution, also participates (thus, also has certain constitutional powers) in forming the corps of judges. In the area of the formation of the corps of judges, this special institution of judges (which ... is an important element of the self-governance of the judiciary, which is an independent state power), is a counterbalance to the President of the Republic, who is a subject of executive power (rulings of 21 December 1999 and 13 December 2004). The fact the judiciary is fully fledged, autonomous, and independent, as well as the constitutional principle of the separation of powers, makes it impossible to interpret the constitutional mission and functions of the said special institution of judges in such a way that its role as a counterbalance to the President of the Republic in the area of the formation of the corps of judges would be denied or ignored. On the other hand, as mentioned before, the checks and balances that the judiciary (institutions thereof) and other state powers (institutions thereof) have with respect to each other may not be treated as the opposition mechanisms of the respective powers; thus, it would be unfair to interpret the constitutional mission of the said special institution of judges as meaning that the said special institution of judges is meant to be exclusively a counterbalance to the President of the Republic in the area of the formation of the corps of judges, because partnership and cooperation between the President of the Republic and this special institution of judges is also necessary while forming the corps of judges (in particular, when regard is paid to the constitutionally justifiable interest of society (which is defended under the Constitution) that the corps of judges be formed fairly and transparently and that persons for the position of a judge be chosen only on the basis of their professional preparation and such personal features and other circumstances that determine their suitability or unsuitability for this activity (for the position of a judge in a certain court)).

It should be emphasised in particular that a special institution of judges, as provided for by law and specified in Paragraph 5 of Article 112 of the Constitution, is a constitutional state institution (even though its exact title is not specified in the Constitution) (ruling of 13 December 2004). The phrase “institution of judges” of Paragraph 5 of Article 112 of the Constitution implies that this institution must be collegial. It is required that such a special institution of judges must be formed; the procedure and basis of its formation must be established by means of a law. The constitutional powers of this special institution of judges may not be taken or seized by any individual official (inter alia, by any judge or another official of judicial power or by the president of any court) or by any other institution. A special institution of judges, as provided for by law and specified in Paragraph 5 of Article 112 of the Constitution, may not be treated as a body working on a pro-bono basis. It may not function in such a manner that the requirements of the due process of law would not be followed (in this special institution of judges itself and in relationships with other state institutions, inter alia, in relationships with the President of the Republic). Its decisions give rise to legal consequences.

In this context, it should be noted that, as the Constitutional Court held in its ruling of 21 December 1999, taking account of the procedure for the formation of courts established in the Constitution, as well as the constitutional regulation of the relationships of the President of the Republic with a special institution of judges, which is provided for by law and is specified in Paragraph 5 of Article 112 of the Constitution, advice given by a special institution of judges, which is specified in Paragraph 5 of Article 112 of the Constitution, gives rise to legal effects: if this special institution of judges does not give advice, the President of the Republic may not adopt decisions on the appointment, promotion, and transfer of judges or their release from duties.

This doctrinal provision means, inter alia, that advice given by a special institution of judges, as provided for by law and specified in Paragraph 5 of Article 112 of the Constitution, must not be interpreted as a recommendation for the President of the Republic that he/she should appoint or not appoint a person as a judge, that he/she should promote or not promote a judge, that he/she should transfer or not transfer a judge, or that he/she should release or not release a judge from duties. Far from it, i.e. if the said advice were only a recommendation, a special institution of judges, as provided for by law and specified in Paragraph 5 of Article 112 of the Constitution, would not perform one of the functions of the counterbalances of judicial power to executive power and, while forming the corps of judges, executive power would dominate judicial power; thus, there would be grounds for stating that certain preconditions are also created for the violation of the independence of judges and courts (violation of the independence of judges and courts is not precluded).

It should be noted that the legal consequences of advice given by a special institution of judges, which is provided for by law and is specified in Paragraph 5 of Article 112 of the Constitution, to the President of the Republic depend on the fact whether the President of the Republic applies to this institution regarding the appointment of a judge or his/her promotion, transfer, or release from duties.

Advice given by a special institution of judges, which is specified in Paragraph 5 of Article 112 of the Constitution, to the President of the Republic on the appointment, promotion, or transfer of judges

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 9 May 2006

In cases where the President of the Republic applies to a special institution of judges, as provided for by law and specified in Paragraph 5 of Article 112 of the Constitution, for advice regarding the appointment, promotion, or transfer of a judge, and this special institution of judges advises the President of the Republic to appoint a person as a judge, to promote a judge, or to transfer him/her, such advice is not binding on the President of the Republic. This means that the President of the Republic (inter alia, if certain circumstances significant for such appointment or release from duties become clear) may decide not to appoint a person as a judge, not to promote a judge, or not to transfer him/her (and, if a judge of the Supreme Court or the Court of Appeal is appointed, promoted, or transferred, the President of the Republic may decide not to propose him/her as a candidate to be approved by the Seimas). Under the Constitution, in such cases, the President of the Republic may apply to a special institution of judges, as provided for by law and specified in Paragraph 5 of Article 112 of the Constitution, for advice regarding the appointment of another person as a judge, or the promotion or transfer of another judge.

Different legal consequences of advice given by a special institution of judges, as provided for by law and specified in Paragraph 5 of Article 112 of the Constitution, to the President of the Republic arise when the President of the Republic applies to this special institution of judges regarding the appointment, promotion, or transfer of a judge and it expressis verbis advises the President of the Republic not to appoint a certain person as a judge, not to promote or not to transfer a certain judge, or the said special institution of judges replies to the President of the Republic that it does not advise him/her to appoint a certain person as a judge, promote a certain judge, or transfer him/her. It should be emphasised that such “non-advice” for the President of the Republic regarding the appointment of a person as a judge, the promotion or transfer of a judge, no matter in what way it is expressed in a particular act of the said special institution of judges, is legally equal to the expressis verbis formulated advice that the President of the Republic should not appoint a person as a judge, should not promote a judge, and should not transfer him/her. Under the Constitution, in such cases, the President of the Republic may not (respectively) appoint a person in question as a judge, or promote or transfer a judge (and, if a judge of the Supreme Court or the Court of Appeal is appointed, promoted, or transferred, the President of the Republic may not propose such a person as a candidate to be approved by the Seimas). A different interpretation (inter alia, such that the President of the Republic may disregard the said advice and still appoint a person in question as a judge, transfer or promote a judge (and, if a judge of the Supreme Court or the Court of Appeal is appointed, promoted, or transferred, the President of the Republic may propose him/her as a candidate to be approved by the Seimas)) of the legal force and legal circumstances of the advice of the said special institution of judges that the President of the Republic should not appoint a person as a judge and should not promote or transfer a judge would mean that a special institution of judges, as provided for by law and specified in Paragraph 5 of Article 112 of the Constitution, which is formed only on a professional basis, is not a counterbalance to the President of the Republic – a political institution of state power – in the area of the formation of the corps of judges; such an interpretation would also be inconsistent with the principle of the independence of judges and courts and with the balance of state powers consolidated in the Constitution.

Advice given by a special institution of judges, which is specified in Paragraph 5 of Article 112 of the Constitution, to the President of the Republic on the release of judges from their duties (Article 115 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 9 May 2006

Still, other different legal consequences of advice given by a special institution of judges, as provided for by law and specified in Paragraph 5 of Article 112 of the Constitution, to the President of the Republic arise when the President of the Republic applies to this special institution of judges for advice on the release of a judge from duties.

Article 115 of the Constitution prescribes:

“The judges of the courts of the Republic of Lithuania shall be released from their duties according to the procedure established by law in the following cases:

- (1) of their own will;
- (2) upon the expiry of the term of powers, or upon reaching the pensionable age established by law;
- (3) due to their state of health;
- (4) upon election to another office, or upon transfer, with their consent, to another place of work;
- (5) when their conduct discredits the name of judges;
- (6) upon the entry into effect of court judgments convicting them.”

While interpreting the legal regulation laid down in Article 115 of the Constitution, it should be held that the grounds for release of a judge from duties are established in the said article (rulings of 22 December 1994 and 6 December 1995). Under this article, judges are released from their duties in the following cases: when a judge himself/herself, without anybody forcing him/her (of his/her own will) requests to be released from duties, i.e. he/she resigns (Item 1 of Article 115 of the Constitution); upon the expiry of the term of powers or upon reaching the pensionable age established by law (Item 2 of Article 115 of the Constitution); when the state of health of a judge is such that he/she cannot perform the duties of a judge (Item 3 of Article 115 of the Constitution); upon election to another office or upon transfer, with his/her consent, to another place of work (Item 4 of Article 115 of the Constitution); when his/her conduct discredits the name of judges (Item 5 of Article 115 of the Constitution); and upon the entry into effect of a court judgment convicting him/her (Item 6 of Article 115 of the Constitution). The cases and grounds for the release of a judge from duties established in Article 115 of the Constitution differ, inter alia, by the fact that some of them (expiry of the term of powers or reaching the pensionable age established by law, as provided for in Item 2 of Article 115 of the Constitution; the entry into effect of a court judgment convicting him/her, as provided for in Item 6 of Article 115 of the Constitution) are related only to the establishment (statement) of the fact of objective nature, while others (resignation – an application to be released from duties, as provided for in Item 1 of Article 115 of the Constitution; the state of health not allowing him/her to perform the duties of a judge, as provided for in Item 3 of Article 115 of the Constitution; election to another office or his/her transfer, with his/her consent, to another place of work, as provided for in Item 4 of Article 115 of the Constitution; and conduct discrediting the name of judges, as provided for in Item 5 of Article 115 of the Constitution) imply not only the establishment (statement) of the respective facts, but also their assessment.

It is clear that, in cases where the President of the Republic applies to a special institution of judges, as provided for by law and specified in Paragraph 5 of Article 112 of the Constitution, so that the said institution of judges would advise him/her on the release of a judge from duties because his/her term of powers has expired or he/she reached the pensionable age established by law, or a court judgment convicting him/her has come into effect, the said special institution of judges must make sure whether the specified facts actually exist and, if they do, it must advise the President of the Republic to release a judge in question from duties. It should be emphasised that, if a special institution of judges, as provided for by law and specified in Paragraph 5 of Article 112 of the Constitution, establishes that the said objective facts really exist, it, under the Constitution, is not allowed not to advise the President of the Republic to release a judge from duties, and the President of the Republic, when he/she receives such advice, must release a judge in question from duties (if a judge to be released from duties is a justice of the Supreme Court, the President of the Republic must propose that the Seimas release such a justice from duties, and if a judge to be released from duties is a judge of the Court of Appeal, the President of the Republic must request assent from the Seimas in order to release him/her from duties). It should be held that, under the Constitution, in such cases, a judge in question must be released from duties.

Meanwhile, in cases where the President of the Republic applies to a special institution of judges, as provided for by law and specified in Paragraph 5 of Article 112 of the Constitution, so that it would advise him/her on the release of a judge from his/her duties, as there is one of the grounds (or several such grounds) provided for in Items 1, 3, 4, and 5 of Article 115 of the Constitution, the said special institution of judges must (accordingly) not only make sure that a judge requests to be released from duties, but also assess whether he/she is doing so of his/her own will and whether he/she is forced to do so (Item 1 of Article 115 of the Constitution), it must not only make sure that a judge has health problems, but also assess in accordance with the procedure established by law whether his/her state of health is such that he/she cannot perform the duties of a judge (Item 3 of Article 115 of the Constitution); the said special institution of judges must not only make sure that a judge has been elected to another office or transferred to another place of work, but also assess whether he/she has been elected to this office or transferred to another place of work with his/her consent (Item 4 of Article 115 of the Constitution), it must not only make sure that a judge has engaged in certain conduct (act), but also to assess whether his/her conduct (act) really discredited the name of judges (Item 5 of Article 115 of the Constitution). If (accordingly) a judge really of his/her own will requests to be released from his/her duties, his/her state of health is really such that he/she may not perform the duties of a judge, he/she has really been elected to another office or transferred to another place of work with his/her consent, or has really discredited the name of judges by his/her conduct, a special institution of judges, as provided for by law and specified in Paragraph 5 of Article 112 of the Constitution, must advise the President of the Republic to release the judge in question from duties. It should be emphasised that, in such cases, the said special institution of judges is not allowed not to advise the President of the Republic to release a judge from duties, and the President of the Republic, after he/she has received such advice, has the powers to release a judge from his/her duties (if a justice of the Supreme Court is released from duties, the President of the Republic has the powers to propose that the Seimas release him/her from duties and, if a judge of the Court of Appeal is released from duties, the President of the Republic has the powers to request assent from the Seimas in order to release him/her from duties); this must be done without delay. But, if a special institution of judges, as provided for by law and specified in Paragraph 5 of Article 112 of the Constitution, holds that (accordingly), even though a judge formally requests to be released from duties of his/her own will, in reality he/she is doing so after he/she has experienced someone's unlawful influence, he/she is under pressure, or is in any other way impermissibly urged by certain persons or organisations (institutions), that, even though a judge has health problems, his/her state of health is not such that he/she would not be able to perform the duties of a judge, that, even though a judge has been elected to another office or transferred to another place of work, it has been done without his/her consent, that, even though a judge has been engaged in certain conduct (act), the said conduct (act) has not discredited the name of judges, the said special institution of judges must not advise the President of the Republic to release the judge in question from duties, and the President of the Republic, when he/she does not receive the advice that such a judge should be released from duties, must not release him/her from duties.

On the other hand, in general, such situations (although, they are very rare) are also possible where, after the President of the Republic has already applied to a special institution of judges, as provided for by law and specified in Paragraph 5 of Article 112 of the Constitution, for advice regarding the release of a judge from duties and after this institution has already advised the President of the Republic to release the judge in question from duties, the grounds on which the said judge must be released from duties disappear. For instance, a judge, after he has stated that he/she intends to resign, may apply to and request the President of the Republic not to release him/her from duties if certain circumstances have changed. In such (exceptional) cases, the President of the Republic has certain freedom of discretion.

It should be emphasised that the impossibility (which arises from the Constitution) for the President of the Republic to release a judge from duties (if a judge to be released from duties is a justice of the Supreme Court, the impossibility for the President of the Republic to propose that the Seimas release him/her from duties and, if a judge to be released from duties is a judge of the Court of Appeal, the impossibility for the President of the Republic to request assent from the Seimas in order to release him/her from duties) without the advice of a special institution of judges, as provided for by law and specified in Paragraph 5 of Article 112 of the Constitution, is a very important guarantee of the independence of judges and courts, and one of the means that helps judges of all courts of general jurisdiction (as well as judges of all specialised courts established under Paragraph 2 of Article 111 of the Constitution) with no exception to protect themselves from the interference of state power and governance institutions, members of the Seimas and other officials, political parties, political and public organisations, and other persons with the activities of judges or courts, since such interference is expressis verbis prohibited (and for such interference the legislature is obliged to provide responsibility) under Paragraph 1 of Article 114 of the Constitution.

A special institution of judges, which is specified in Paragraph 5 of Article 112 of the Constitution, does not have the powers to give advice to the President of the Republic on the release of a judge from duties in cases where he/she is appointed as a justice of the Constitutional Court or as a member of the Government

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 9 May 2006

In its ruling of 21 December 1999, the Constitutional Court held that, taking account of the procedure of the formation of courts that is established in the Constitution, as well as the constitutional regulation of relationships between the President of the Republic and a special institution of judges, as provided for by law and specified in Paragraph 5 of Article 112 of the Constitution, this special institution of judges must advise the President of the Republic on all questions of the appointment of judges, their professional career, as well as on those of their release from duties.

This does not mean that certain exceptions do not stem from the Constitution where it is possible not to apply to this institution on such advice.

When interpreting the quoted provisions of the official constitutional doctrine in the context of other provisions of the Constitution, the Constitutional Court held in its ruling of 2 June 2005 that, under the Constitution, a special institution of judges, as provided for by law and specified in Paragraph 5 of Article 112 of the Constitution, also has no powers to deny or limit the constitutional right of the President of the Republic, the Speaker of the Seimas, and the President of the Supreme Court to present to the Seimas a candidate for the post of a justice of the Constitutional Court and the right of the Seimas to appoint a presented person as a justice of the Constitutional Court or not to appoint him/her, as in such a way the preconditions would be created for impeding the renewal of the Constitutional Court – one of the institutions of state power consolidated in the Constitution. In the said ruling of the Constitutional Court, it was also held that “if such a person is appointed as a justice of the Constitutional Court who holds the office of a judge of a certain court of the Republic of Lithuania at the time of his/her appointment, he/she must be released from his/her duties before his/her oath at the Seimas. If such a person is appointed as a justice of the Constitutional Court who holds the office of a justice of the Supreme Court at the time of his/her appointment, the President of the Republic has the constitutional duty to present that the Seimas release this appointed justice of the Constitutional Court from the office of a justice of the Supreme Court before he/she takes the oath of a justice of the Constitutional Court at the Seimas, while the Seimas has the constitutional duty to release the said person from his/her duties before his/her oath at the Seimas. Otherwise, the appointed justice of the Constitutional Court would be impeded from taking the office of a justice of the Constitutional Court; thus, the reconstitution of the Constitutional Court – an institution of state power consolidated in the Constitution – carried out in accordance with the procedure established in the Constitution would be impeded.” It was also held in the Constitutional Court’s ruling of 2 June 2005 that “under the Constitution, no institution or official has the powers to deny or limit the constitutional right of the Seimas to appoint a nominated person as a justice of the Constitutional Court or not to appoint him/her. ... When the justices of the Constitutional Court are appointed, only the state officials who submit candidates to the Seimas and the Seimas have respective powers. ... a special institution of judges, as provided for by law and specified in Paragraph 5 of Article 112 of the Constitution ... does not have, under the Constitution, any powers to adopt any decisions related to the appointment of the justices of the Constitutional Court. Thus, under the Constitution, this institution does not have the powers to advise on the release of any judge of the Republic of Lithuania from duties in cases where this judge has been appointed as a justice of the Constitutional Court by the Seimas. ... The cited statements that ‘a special institution of judges, specified in Paragraph 5 of Article 112 of the Constitution, must advise the President of the Republic on all questions of the appointment of judges, those of their professional career, as well as those of their release from duties’ and that ‘advice given by this institution gives rise to legal consequences: if this institution does not give advice, the President of the Republic may not adopt decisions on the appointment, promotion, and transfer of judges or their release from duties’ of the Constitutional Court’s ruling of 21 December 1999 may not be interpreted without taking account of the provisions of the Constitution regulating the procedure for the appointment of the justices of the Constitutional Court. ... before adopting a decision on release from duties of any judge of a court of the Republic of Lithuania who is appointed as a justice of the Constitutional Court, the President of the Republic need not, under the Constitution, apply to a special institution of judges, as provided for by law and specified in Paragraph 5 of Article 112 of the Constitution ... for advice, while the said institution, under the Constitution, does not have the powers to give advice to the President of the Republic on this issue. Otherwise, the preconditions would be created for the said special institution of judges ... for impeding an appointed justice of the Constitutional Court from taking the office of a justice of the Constitutional Court; thus, the reconstitution of the Constitutional Court – an institution of state power consolidated in the Constitution – carried out in accordance with the procedure established in the Constitution, as well as the implementation of a resolution of the Seimas on the appointment of a justice of the Constitutional Court, would be impeded.”

On the basis of analogous arguments, it should be held that, under the Constitution, a special institution of judges, as provided for by law and specified in Paragraph 5 of Article 112 of the Constitution, also has no powers to advise the President of the Republic on the release of a judge from duties in such cases where a judge of any court of the Republic of Lithuania is appointed to another office in cases of forming some other state institution established in Paragraph 1 of Article 5 of the Constitution, which executes state power in Lithuania (except courts of general jurisdiction and specialised courts (established under Paragraph 2 of Article 111 of the Constitution) regarding which explicit provisions are consolidated in the Constitution establishing particular powers of the said special institution of judges to give advice to the President of the Republic).

In view of the fact that, under the Constitution, a judge has no right to be elected a member of the Seimas or the President of the Republic as long as such a judge holds a particular office (ruling of 25 May 2004), it should be held that, under the Constitution, a special institution of judges, as provided for by law and specified in Paragraph 5 of Article 112 of the Constitution, does not have the powers to advise the President of the Republic on the release of a judge from duties in cases where a judge who is released from duties is a judge of a certain court of the Republic of Lithuania appointed as a justice of the Constitutional Court, as well as in cases where a judge who is released from duties is a judge of a certain court of the Republic of Lithuania who (when the Government is formed or its composition is changed) is appointed as a member of the Government (Prime Minister or a minister).

A special institution of judges, which is specified in Paragraph 5 of Article 112 of the Constitution, does not have the powers to give advice on the release of a judge from duties through impeachment proceedings

The Constitutional Court’s ruling of 9 May 2006

... under Articles 74 and 116 of the Constitution, for a gross violation of the Constitution or a breach of the oath, or when they are found to have committed a crime, the President and justices of the Supreme Court, as well as the President and judges of the Court of Appeal (as well as the President and justices of the Constitutional Court), may be removed from office according to the procedure for impeachment proceedings.

Under the Constitution, in such cases, a special institution of judges, as provided for by law and specified in Paragraph 5 of Article 112 of the Constitution, does not have any powers to advise the Seimas whether to remove the President or a justice of the Supreme Court, the President or a judge of the Court of Appeal from office according to the procedure for impeachment proceedings. In such cases, the Constitutional Court – an institution of judicial power – is a counterbalance to decisions of the Seimas – a political institution (conclusion of 31 March 2004).

The application of the President of the Republic to a special institution of judges, which is specified in Paragraph 5 of Article 112 of the Constitution, for advice on the appointment, promotion, and transfer of judges or their release from duties

... under the Constitution, advice given by a special institution of judges, as provided for by law and specified in Paragraph 5 of Article 112 thereof, is necessary when appointing, promoting, transferring, or releasing from duties any judge or the president of a court of general jurisdiction (as well as a judge of a specialised court, established under Paragraph 2 of Article 111 of the Constitution), save the ... exceptions, which stem from the Constitution, when the President of the Republic need not apply for such advice because a judge is released from duties due to the fact that he/she is appointed as a member of the Government (Prime Minister or a minister) or as a justice of the Constitutional Court, as well as when the President or a justice of the Supreme Court and the President or a judge of the Court of Appeal is removed from office according to the procedure for impeachment proceedings. Thus, the President of the Republic must receive such advice also in cases where a judge (of a district or regional court) is appointed or released from duties only by a decision of the President of the Republic, when the Seimas does not participate in general, and in such cases where the President of the Republic applies to the Seimas for assent concerning the appointment or release from duties of a judge or the President of the Court of Appeal, and in such cases where the President of the Republic proposes that the Seimas appoint or release from duties a justice or the President of the Supreme Court. In all these cases (save the discussed exceptions, which stem from the Constitution itself), advice given by a special institution of judges, as provided for by law and specified in Paragraph 5 of Article 112 of the Constitution, is obligatory for the President of the Republic – this is an inseparable, constitutionally obligatory part of the procedure for appointment, promotion (i.e. appointment as a judge of higher level while releasing from previous duties or appointment to a leading or higher post at the same court), transfer (change of the place of work) of judges, and their release from duties. If the President of the Republic has not received such advice, he/she may not appoint or release from duties a judge or President of a district or regional court, may not apply to the Seimas for assent concerning the appointment or release from duties a judge or the President of the Court of Appeal, and may not propose that the Seimas appoint or release from duties a justice or the President of the Supreme Court.

It needs also to be emphasised that the constitutional institution consolidated in Paragraph 5 of Article 112 of the Constitution – the application of the President of the Republic to a special institution of judges, as provided for by law and specified in the same paragraph, for advice concerning the appointment, promotion, and transfer of judges or their release from duties means not only that the President of the Republic has the duty to apply to a special institution of judges, specified in this paragraph, for the respective advice when there is a need to appoint, promote, or transfer a judge or release him/her from duties, but also that this special institution of judges, when it receives an application of the President of the Republic, has the constitutional duty to consider such an application and to advise the President of the Republic (accordingly) to appoint a person as a judge of a district or regional court, to promote or transfer a judge of a district or regional court or release him/her from duties, to apply to the Seimas for assent concerning the appointment, promotion, and transfer of a judge or the President of the Court of Appeal or his/her release from duties, to submit that the Seimas appoint, promote, or transfer a justice of the Supreme Court or release him/her from duties, or to submit that the Seimas appoint or transfer the President of the Supreme Court or release him/her from duties, or to advise the President of the Republic not to appoint a person as a judge of a district or regional court, not to promote or not to transfer a judge of a district or regional court, or not to release him/her from duties, not to apply to the Seimas for assent concerning the appointment, promotion, and transfer of a judge or the President of the Court of Appeal or his/her release from duties, or not to submit that the Seimas appoint, promote, or transfer a justice of the Supreme Court or release him/her from duties, or not to submit that the Seimas appoint or transfer the President of the Supreme Court or release him/her from duties. When such advice must be given, it is necessary to strictly follow the requirements of the due process of law and to assess the professional preparation of certain persons and such personal qualities (as well as other circumstances) that determine their suitability or unsuitability for the respective position (or for work as a judge in general).

It should be noted that the Constitution does not provide and does not tolerate any such a situation where a special institution of judges, as provided for by law and specified in Paragraph 5 of Article 112 thereof, does not give any advice to the President of the Republic after he/she applies to this special institution of judges for advice concerning the appointment, promotion, and transfer of judges or their release from duties, or when it advises the President of the Republic not on the issue concerning which the President of the Republic has applied; under the Constitution, the said special institution of judges must clearly and unambiguously advise the President of the Republic (accordingly) to appoint a person as a judge, promote or transfer a judge or release him/her from duties (and, if a justice of the Supreme Court or a judge of the Court of Appeal is released from duties, the said special institution of judges must advise the President of the Republic to submit that the Seimas appoint or release him/her from duties) or to advise not to appoint a person as a judge, not to promote or not to transfer him/her, or not to release him/her from duties (and, if a justice of the Supreme Court or a judge of the Court of Appeal is appointed, promoted, transferred, or released from duties, the said special institution of judges must advise the President of the Republic not to submit that the Seimas appoint or release him/her from duties).

It should also be noted that, under the Constitution, also such legal situations are impossible where a special institution of judges, as provided for by law and specified in Paragraph 5 of Article 112 of the Constitution, advises the President of the Republic concerning the appointment of a certain person as a judge, the promotion or transfer of a judge, or his/her release from duties on its own initiative, even though the President of the Republic has not applied to it on such an issue. The said institution may implement the powers established in Paragraph 5 of Article 112 of the Constitution only when (after) the President of the Republic applies to it for advice.

Attention must also be paid to the fact that, under the Constitution, it is not allowed to establish any such a legal regulation where the President of the Republic, before he/she applies to a special institution of judges, as provided for by law and specified in Paragraph 5 of Article 112 of the Constitution, for advice concerning the appointment, promotion, and transfer of judges or their release from duties would have to coordinate such application with a certain state institution, a certain state official, another institution, or any other person. Under the Constitution, decisions of state institutions, state officials, other institutions, or any other persons may not become binding, nor are they binding, on the application of the President of the Republic to the said special institution of judges for advice.

It is also not allowed to establish, by means of a law, any such a legal regulation whereby, while applying to a special institution of judges, as provided for by law and specified in Paragraph 5 of Article 112 of the Constitution, for advice concerning the appointment of a person as a judge, or the promotion or transfer of a judge, the President of the Republic would be obliged to submit to this special institution of judges not one, but more candidates for the same vacancy, and where the said special institution of judges would have to and/or be able to choose from persons submitted by the President of the Republic and to advise the President of the Republic concerning the appointment of such a person as a judge, or his/her promotion or transfer.

... the Constitution does not imply the possibility of establishing any such a legal regulation whereby persons who pass the required examination or examinations and are included in the list of candidates for the post of a judge would be somehow rated, their priority or different lists would be drawn, etc., which would be binding on the President of the Republic when he/she would apply to a special institution of judges, as provided for by law and specified in Paragraph 5 of Article 112 of the Constitution, for advice concerning the appointment of judges. It also needs to be emphasised that the President of the Republic may choose persons concerning the appointment of whom as judges he/she applies to a special institution of judges, as provided for by law and specified in Paragraph 5 of Article 112 of the Constitution, only from those who have passed the required examination or examinations and are included in the list of candidates for the post of a judge, or from other persons who may hold the office of a judge without examinations if this is constitutionally justifiable.

As, under the Constitution, only the President of the Republic may apply for advice to a special institution of judges, as provided for by law and specified in Paragraph 5 of Article 112 thereof, the President of the Republic, before applying for the said advice, after he/she has made use of the possibilities established by law (inter alia, after the President of the Republic has demanded the respective information from state institutions (officials)), must verify and assess all significant circumstances, inter alia, the fact whether a person who is proposed to be appointed as a judge, or a judge proposed to be transferred or promoted meets the requirements established for a judge (as well as for a judge of a court of the same system of courts or of a court of the same level), whether he/she has qualification necessary for particular work, is of impeccable reputation, and whether there are any other circumstances due to which a person may not be appointed as a judge, or may not be promoted or transferred (or may not be appointed namely as a judge of the court specified by the President of the Republic, may not be promoted by appointing him/her namely to the specified court, or may not be transferred namely to the specified court).

Under Article 85 of the Constitution, the President of the Republic, implementing the powers vested in him/her, issues acts-decrees. The constitutional powers of the President of the Republic to apply to a special institution of judges, as provided for by law and specified in Paragraph 5 of Article 112 of the Constitution, for advice concerning the appointment, promotion, and transfer of judges or their release from duties are implemented by issuing the respective decree of the President of the Republic. In such a decree of the President of the Republic, the time period within which advice must be received may also be specified. If such a time period is specified in a decree of the President of the Republic, a special institution of judges, as provided for by law and specified in Paragraph 5 of Article 112 of the Constitution, must observe the said time period.

The transparency requirement for the activity of a special institution of judges, which is specified in Paragraph 5 of Article 112 of the Constitution

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 9 May 2006

... a special institution of judges, provided for by law specified in Paragraph 5 of Article 112 of the Constitution, is a counterbalance to the President of the Republic – a political institution of state power – in the area of the formation of the corps of judges. This implies that the activity of this special institution of judges must be transparent so that neither the President of the Republic nor society would have reasoned doubts regarding the formed corps of judges, as then public trust in law and in the legal system of the state would in general decrease; thus, advice given by the said special institution of judges to the President of the Republic must be rationally argued and reasons due to which it advises the President of the Republic to appoint a certain person as a judge, promote or transfer a judge, or release him/her from duties or not to appoint a person as a judge, not to promote, not to transfer a judge, and not to release a judge from duties (and, if a justice of the Supreme Court or a judge of the Court of Appeal is appointed, promoted, transferred, or released from duties, the said special institution of judges advises the President of the Republic to propose or not to propose him/her as a candidate to be approved by the Seimas) must be set out clearly. No advice (or other decisions) of the said special institution of judges may be based on assumptions, subjective prejudice, or opinions of members of the said special institution of judges, it is necessary to ground such advice only upon established (elucidated) facts after assessing the professional preparation of certain persons and such personal qualities (as well as other circumstances) that determine their suitability or unsuitability for the respective position (or for work as a judge in general). In this context, it should be noted that, taking account of the fact that public trust in law and in the legal system of the state virtually depends on the activity and decisions of the said special institution of judges, the legislature, while regulating relationships linked to the activity of the said special institution of judges, as provided for by law and specified in Paragraph 5 of Article 112 of the Constitution, may also establish such a legal regulation whereby, if the said special institution of judges irresponsibly implemented the powers established for it in the Constitution, its composition could be changed in essence; the establishment of such a legal regulation implies that the procedure for settling disputes that may arise due to particular decisions must also be established; when establishing the said legal regulation, the legislature must pay regard to the Constitution.

Constitutional requirements for the formation, activity, and work organisation of a special institution of judges, which is specified in Paragraph 5 of Article 112 of the Constitution

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 9 May 2006

Taking account of the mission and constitutional status of a special institution of judges, as provided for by law and specified in Paragraph 5 of Article 112 of the Constitution, as well as of an exclusive role of the said institution in the procedure of the formation of the corps of judges, it needs to be held that certain requirements stem from the Constitution concerning the activity of this state institution and the organisation of its work.

For instance, before advising the President of the Republic on the appointment, promotion, and transfer of a judge of a certain court of general jurisdiction or a specialised court, established under Paragraph 2 of Article 111 of the Constitution, or on releasing him/her from duties, the said special institution of judges has the duty to elucidate and assess all significant circumstances, inter alia, the fact whether a person who is proposed to be appointed as a judge, or a judge proposed to be transferred or promoted meets requirements established for a judge (as well as for a judge of a court of the same system of courts or a court of the same level), whether he/she has qualification necessary for particular work, whether he/she is of impeccable reputation, and whether there are any other circumstances due to which a person may not be appointed as a judge or may not be promoted or transferred (or may not be appointed namely as a judge of the court specified by the President of the Republic, or may not be promoted by appointing him/her namely to the specified court, or may not be transferred namely to the specified court). The legislature has the duty to establish such a legal regulation that the said special institution of judges would have the powers to receive all necessary information from state and municipal institutions (officials thereof) that would allow verifying and assessing all significant circumstances. Responsibility for giving advice to the President of the Republic falls namely on the said special institution of judges to which the President of the Republic applies for advice. The fact that, as it has been held in this ruling of the Constitutional Court, the President of the Republic, before applying to this special institution of judges for advice, must make use of the possibilities established by law and verify and assess all significant circumstances does not relieve the said special institution of judges from this duty and responsibility.

It is clear that the members of a special institution of judges, as provided for by law and specified in Paragraph 5 of Article 112 of the Constitution, must verify and assess all significant circumstances, inter alia, the fact whether a person who is proposed to be appointed as a judge, or a judge proposed to be transferred or promoted meets requirements established for a judge (as well as for a judge of a court of the same system of courts or of a court of the same level), whether he/she has qualification necessary for particular work, whether he/she is of impeccable reputation, and whether there are any other circumstances due to which a person may not be appointed as a judge, or promoted and transferred (or appointed namely as a judge of a court specified by the President of the Republic, promoted appointing him/her namely to a specified court, transferred him/her namely to a specified court) only when they receive in advance all information necessary in order to consider a certain question, have the possibility of investigating it attentively, may demand additional information if necessary, etc. The work of the said special institution of judges may not be organised in such a way that certain information concerning a considered question would be provided not on time and not in advance, but only at a meeting of this special institution of judges, as well as that certain information concerning a considered question would be provided not to all members of this special institution of judges, but only to some of them (selectively), for example, only to those members of this special institution of judges who participate in that meeting. In this context, particularly taking account of the fact that, under the Constitution, the President of the Republic must receive advice namely from a special institution of judges, as provided for by law and specified in Paragraph 5 of Article 112 of the Constitution, as a collegial state institution, and not from part of it (i.e. a group of judges) concerning the appointment, promotion, and transfer of a judge or his/her release from duties, it should be noted that, in general, it would not be possible to consider the activity of the said special institution of judges, which, as it has been held in this ruling of the Constitutional Court, is a state institution provided for in the Constitution and not a certain body working on a pro-bono basis, as fully conforming to its constitutional mission if a large number of its members did not participate in its meetings. It should also be noted that the work of the said special institution of judges must be organised in such a way that voting on every advice to the President of the Republic during a meeting would take place, that, after such voting is over, every member of this special institution of judges would know how every other member of this special institution of judges voted, and that the results of voting would not raise any doubts regarding their reliability. Failure to pay regard to the said provisions would mean that the requirements of the due process of law, which are binding in a state under the rule of law, are deviated from in essence.

It should be particularly emphasised that the mission and constitutional status of a special institution of judges, as provided for by law and specified in Paragraph 5 of Article 112 of the Constitution, an exclusive role of the said institution in the procedure of the formation of the corps of judges, as well as the transparency requirement for its activity, imply the publicity of the activity of this special institution of judges. The fact that the activity of the said special institution of judges must be public means that, in addition to other things, society (as well as the legal community) must be informed in advance (it should be publicly announced) about all questions on the appointment, promotion, and transfer of a judge or his/her release from duties to be considered by this special institution of judges. It has been held in this ruling of the Constitutional Court that advice given by the said special institution of judges to the President of the Republic must be argued rationally and reasons must be set out clearly due to which it advises the President of the Republic to appoint a certain person as a judge, to promote or transfer a judge, or to release him/her from office or not to appoint a person as a judge, not to promote, or not to release a judge from duties (and, if a justice of the Supreme Court or a judge of the Court of Appeal is appointed, promoted, or transferred or released from duties, the said special institution of judges advises the President of the Republic to propose or not to propose him/her as a candidate to be approved by the Seimas). These arguments and reasons must be set out clearly. Society must be informed about adopted decisions (about advice to the President of the Republic). It should also be emphasised that, when the President of the Republic applies for advice, each member of the said special institution of judges must declare his/her position on each question clearly and unambiguously.

Only the following powers of a special institution of judges, as provided for by law and specified in Paragraph 5 of Article 112 of the Constitution, are explicitly consolidated in the Constitution (Paragraph 5 of Article 112 thereof): when the President of the Republic applies to the said institution, it must advise him/her on the appointment, promotion, and transfer of judges or their release from duties, i.e. as held in the Constitutional Court's ruling of 21 December 1999, "concerning all questions of the appointment of judges, those of their professional career, as well as those of their release from duties", save (as held in the Constitutional Court's ruling of 2 June 2005 and in this ruling of the Constitutional Court) the exceptions that stem from the Constitution itself (of which there are very few). It should be emphasised that no other institution, official, or any other person may exercise these powers; the said powers may not be transferred to anybody by a special institution of judges itself, which is provided for by law and is specified in Paragraph 5 of Article 112 of the Constitution. If this were the case and if the legislature also restricted the powers explicitly assigned to such a special institution of judges in the Constitution, then not only Paragraph 5 of Article 112 of the Constitution, but also Paragraph 2 of Article 5 of the Constitution, under which the scope of powers is limited by the Constitution, as well as the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law, would be violated.

It should be emphasised that the interpretation of the meaning of the phrase “a special institution of judges shall advise” of Paragraph 5 of Article 112 of the Constitution may not be based only on the verbal and literal interpretation of the notions used therein; this phrase should be interpreted by taking account of the procedure for the formation of the corps of judges, which is consolidated in various articles (paragraphs thereof) of the Constitution, under which different powers are established for state power institutions and other institutions that participate in the formation of the corps of judges: the Seimas or the President of the Republic – political institutions – appoint judges and release them from their duties, while an institution of the judiciary, i.e. an autonomous and self-governing institution of independent state power, which, as judicial power in general, is not political, but only professional, gives advice to the President of the Republic on the appointment, promotion, and transfer of judges or their release from duties.

Thus, the phrase “a special institution of judges shall advise” of Paragraph 5 of Article 112 of the Constitution means that, firstly, the said state institution must be composed for the purpose specified in this paragraph – to advise the President of the Republic on the appointment, promotion, and transfer of judges or their release from duties; secondly, this state institution must be composed only of judges. It should be held that, under the Constitution, no other institution, official, or any other person may have the powers to advise the President of the Republic on the appointment, promotion, and transfer of judges or their release from duties; in addition, under the Constitution, the institution specified in Paragraph 5 of Article 112 of the Constitution may be composed not of any persons (members), but only of judges; otherwise, i.e. if this institution were composed not of judges or not exclusively of judges, the constitutional concept (that, during the formation of the corps of judges, the said special institution of judges is a counterbalance to the President of the Republic – a political institution) of the state institution – a special institution of judges – that is consolidated in this paragraph would be disregarded; under the Constitution, such an institution may not have the powers specified in Paragraph 5 of Article 112 of the Constitution to advise the President of the Republic on the appointment, promotion, and transfer of judges or their release from duties. Only an institution that is formed on a professional basis, i.e. a special institution of judges, may properly assess whether the professional qualification of a person is such that he/she may be appointed as a judge, whether a person who already is a judge may be promoted, etc. Only an institution formed on a professional basis, i.e. a special institution of judges, may be a counterbalance to the President of the Republic – a subject of executive power and a political institution – in the formation of the corps of judges. Only such an institution may ensure the independence of judges and courts, inter alia, from the aspect that judges of all courts with no exception would be protected from interference by state power and government institutions, members of the Seimas and other officials, political parties, political and public organisations in the activity of judges or courts (... such interference is expressis verbis prohibited by Paragraph 1 of Article 114 of the Constitution). The phrase “a special institution of judges shall advise” may not be interpreted expansively as meaning that it also does not prohibit the establishment of such a legal regulation whereby it would be possible to include not exclusively judges to this institution of judges, because such an expansive interpretation of the constitutional expression “a special institution of judges shall advise” and the legal regulation based on it would create the preconditions for disregarding the principle of the independence of courts (which also includes the self-governance of judicial power), which is consolidated in the Constitution, inter alia, from the aspect that the President of the Republic would be advised on the appointment, promotion, and transfer of judges or their release from duties by an institution that would be composed not only of judges, but also of other persons (even politicians), which would be unable to assess from the professional point of view whether persons aspiring to become judges meet requirements established for a judge, inter alia, whether such persons have professional qualification necessary for the office of a judge, whether a judge has sufficient professional qualification in order to be promoted, etc. By such a legal regulation where a special institution of judges, as provided for by law and specified in Paragraph 5 of Article 112 of the Constitution, would be composed not only of judges but also other persons, not only the constitutional concept of a special institution of judges, as provided for by law and specified in Paragraph 5 of Article 112 of the Constitution, but also Paragraph 2 of Article 5 of the Constitution, in which it is prescribed that the scope of powers is limited by the Constitution, as well as the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law, would be disregarded.

The phrase “a special institution of judges, as provided for by law” of Paragraph 5 of Article 112 of the Constitution means that the legislature has broad discretion to regulate in one or another way the formation, powers, and activity of this state institution – a special institution of judges provided for in this paragraph (of course, paying regard to the Constitution, inter alia, the constitutional concept of the said special institution of judges). ...

It has been mentioned that, under the Constitution, the legislature has the powers to establish the procedure for the formation of a special institution of judges, as provided for by law and specified in Paragraph 5 of Article 112 of the Constitution. Such a procedure must be established in the Law on Courts. While establishing such a procedure, the legislature may not disregard, inter alia, the circumstance that no official of judicial power may be treated as the head of whole judicial power or as a representative thereof in relationships with other state powers and that, under the Constitution, self-governing judicial power may not be too centralised in general. The independence of judges, which is consolidated in the Constitution, implies the equal legal status of all judges while administering justice: it is not allowed to establish different guarantees of the independence of judges when they administer justice (decide cases); while administering justice, no judge is or may be subordinate to any other judge or the president of any court (inter alia, of a court where he/she works, as well as of a court of higher level or instance). It is also necessary to pay regard to the circumstance that the self-governance of the judiciary as an independent state power and the equal legal status of judges also imply, inter alia, the fact that, in judicial self-governance institutions, all judges have an equal legal status; thus, in self-governance institutions of judicial power they are equal and not subordinate to any other judge (or to a judge or the president of a court of higher level or instance). Thus, in self-governance institutions of judicial power, no judge may have more rights than any other judge. Thus, under the Constitution, the legislature may not consolidate any such a legal regulation that a certain judge ex officio (by virtue of his/her office) could become the head of a special institution of judges, which is provided for by law and is specified in Paragraph 5 of Article 112 of the Constitution. It should be held that the Constitution tolerates only such election procedure of the head (person holding chairmanship) of a special institution of judges, as provided for by law and specified in Paragraph 5 of Article 112 of the Constitution, where the head (person holding chairmanship) of this special institution of judges is elected by members of this institution themselves or at a democratically convened meeting of judges (or representatives thereof) (which may also elect members of this special institution of judges). A different legal regulation, i.e. such that a certain judge (president of a certain court) is ex officio the head of a special institution of judges, as provided for by law and specified in Paragraph 5 of Article 112 of the Constitution, would not be in line, inter alia, with the principle of self-governance of the judiciary as one of state powers consolidated in the Constitution, as well as with the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law.

In this context, it should be noted that also the rotational heading (chairmanship) of the said special institution of judges would be in line with the principle of self-governance of the judiciary as one of state powers consolidated in the Constitution and with the decentralisation of self-governing judicial power.

The possibility of certain judges ex officio to be members of a special institution of judges, as provided for by law and specified in Paragraph 5 of Article 112 of the Constitution, should be assessed in a slightly different way.

The said constitutional imperatives (the decentralisation of self-governing judicial power, the independence of judges, the equal status of all judges who administer justice, the non-subordination of a judge to any other judge or the president of any other court while administering justice, etc.) imply a democratic procedure for the formation of this special institution of judges. Thus, under the Constitution, members of this special institution of judges, at least an absolute majority of them, must be democratically elected by judges (representatives thereof) themselves; the procedure for an election must be such that it must be organised and executed in such a manner that would create no preconditions for doubting the democratic nature of this election, inter alia, the fact whether during an election of the said special institution of judges some judges were treated unequally with respect to others, etc.

It also needs to be noted that such a legal regulation that some judges (comparatively small part of the members thereof), namely the Presidents of the Supreme Court of Lithuania, the Court of Appeal of Lithuania, and specialised courts (established under Paragraph 2 of Article 111 of the Constitution) would ex officio become members of the said special institution of judges would not be in conflict with the Constitution. Such a legal regulation that members of the said special institution of judges would be judges elected by a rather large social organisation of judges, which unites judges of courts of the Republic of Lithuania, would not be in conflict with the Constitution, either; however, it should be emphasised that such judges must compose only a comparatively small part of members of the said special institution of judges; in this case, the procedure for the election must be such and the election must be organised in such a manner that would create no preconditions for doubting the democratic nature of this election. Such a legal regulation that a comparatively small part of members of this special institution of judges would be appointed by the President of the Republic and/or the Minister of Justice would not be in conflict with the Constitution, either (ruling of 21 December 1999).

In this context, it should be emphasised that the fact that some members of a special institution of judges may be appointed by the President of the Republic and/or the Minister of Justice may in no way be interpreted as meaning that these judges are representatives or proxies of the President of the Republic or of the Minister of Justice in the specified special institution of judges: under the Constitution, it is not allowed to establish such a legal regulation that such judges would, in some way, have to give an account for their activities in a special institution of judges, as provided for by law and specified in Paragraph 5 of Article 112 of the Constitution, to the President of the Republic and/or Minister of Justice so that the President of the Republic and/or the Minister of Justice would give them any assignments, orders, etc. If the Law on Courts established such a legal regulation that the President of the Republic and/or the Minister of Justice appoints some members of a specified special institution of judges, the said judges, when they become members of this special institution of judges not by election, but by the said appointment, must still remain absolutely independent from the President of the Republic and/or the Minister of Justice who appointed them. A different legal regulation, i.e. such where judges who became members of a special institution of judges, as provided for by law and specified in Paragraph 5 of Article 112 of the Constitution, not by election, but they were appointed by the President of the Republic and/or the Minister of Justice, would be treated as representatives or proxies of these state officials in the specified special institution of judges, would be incompatible, inter alia, with the principle of self-governance of the judiciary as one of state powers consolidated in the Constitution, as well as with the constitutional principle of the separation of powers and the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law.

The powers of a special institution of judges, as provided for by law and specified in Paragraph 5 of Article 112 of the Constitution, where such powers are indicated in this paragraph, imply such a procedure for the formation of this special institution of judges where judges of courts of general jurisdiction of various levels and of specialised courts (at present – administrative courts), established under Paragraph 2 of Article 111 of the Constitution, would be its members. This would be ensured by such a legal regulation that a certain number of positions in the specified special institution of judges would be provided for to every level of courts of general jurisdiction and to every level of specialised courts (at present – administrative courts), established under Paragraph 2 of Article 111 of the Constitution, and that particular members of this special institution of judges (having regard to the number established for that level of courts) would be elected by judges of namely a court (courts) of a particular level.

The fact that a special institution of judges, as provided for by law and specified in Paragraph 5 of Article 112 of the Constitution, has the constitutional powers to advise the President of the Republic, inter alia, on the promotion of judges (as well as on the appointment of judges, their transfer, or their release from duties) means that this special institution of judges also has the powers to assess the qualification of judges. It has been mentioned that advice must be given to the President of the Republic only after the professional preparation of certain persons has been assessed. Whether judges of courts of lower level have such qualification and are professionally prepared in such a way that they could be promoted (inter alia, could be appointed as judges of courts of higher level) may be best decided by judges (undoubtedly, not exclusively by them) of namely such courts that are the highest instance of appeal and the highest instance of cassation. Thus, such a legal regulation whereby such a number of positions would be established in a special institution of judges, as provided for by law and specified in Paragraph 5 of Article 112 of the Constitution, for judges of every level of courts of general jurisdiction, as well as for judges of specialised courts (at present – administrative courts), established under Paragraph 2 of Article 111 of the Constitution, where judges of the Supreme Court of Lithuania, the Court of Appeal of Lithuania, and those of the highest instances of specialised courts, established under Paragraph 2 of Article 111 of the Constitution (at present, in the system of administrative courts – judges of the Supreme Administrative Court of Lithuania) would comprise the majority of members of this special institution of judges would be constitutionally justifiable.

It has been mentioned that a special institution of judges, as provided for by law and specified in Paragraph 5 of Article 112 of the Constitution, must be composed only of judges. The constitutional status of this special institution of judges implies that certain high requirements may and must be established for its members: only judges who have high qualification, who are sufficiently experienced in their work as a judge, and who earned authority in the professional community of judges may be its members. It has been held in this ruling of the Constitutional Court that the procedure for the election of the said special institution of judges must be such and the election must be organised in such a manner that would create no preconditions for doubting the democratic nature of this election.

The powers of a special institution of judges, which is specified in Paragraph 5 of Article 112 of the Constitution

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 9 May 2006

As such, the fact that only the powers of a special institution of judges, as provided for by law and specified in this paragraph, to advise the President of the Republic on the appointment, promotion, and transfer of judges or their release from duties when he/she applies to it are explicitly consolidated in the Constitution (Paragraph 5 of Article 112 thereof) does not mean that the said special institution of judges may have only the powers explicitly specified in Paragraph 5 of Article 112 of the Constitution and may not have other powers established for it by the legislature in the Law on Courts.

In this context, it should be noted that the constitutional powers of a special institution of judges, which is specified in Paragraph 5 of Article 112 of the Constitution, are related to the participation in adopting decisions on the career of judges where such decisions are adopted by the judiciary as the branch of state power formed on a professional basis and by certain members of the corps of judges, who implement judicial power and, in accordance with a procedure prescribed by law, are appointed or elected to the said special institution of judges. This also implies the right of the legislature to establish such powers of the said special institution of judges that are not expressis verbis established in the Constitution (Paragraph 5 of Article 112 thereof), but arise from the constitutional powers of this special institution of judges, which are related to advising the President of the Republic on the appointment, promotion, and transfer of judges or their release from duties, i.e. the powers related to the participation of the judiciary, as state power formed on a professional basis, in adopting decisions on the career of judges, as well to ensuring the possibilities of persons to pursue the career of a judge. For instance, the Constitution does not prohibit stipulating, by means of a law, that this special institution of judges has the powers to initiate disciplinary actions against judges, the powers to appoint members of the examination commission of judges, etc. (ruling of 21 December 1999).

The judicial self-governance institutions

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 9 May 2006

... it is clear from the official constitutional doctrine of the judiciary formed in previous constitutional justice cases of the Constitutional Court that a special institution of judges, which is specified in Paragraph 5 of Article 112 of the Constitution, is not the only element of the self-governance of the judiciary as an independent state power. Under the Constitution, the legislature, while paying regard to the constitutional principle of the independence of judges and courts and other provisions of the Constitution, also has the powers to establish, by means of a law, other self-governance institutions of the judiciary, to establish the procedure of their formation, powers, etc. Moreover, while seeking to ensure the effectiveness of the self-governance of the judiciary and in view of the fact that, as it has been held in this ruling of the Constitutional Court, under the Constitution, the self-governing judiciary must not be too centralised, certain such other institutions must be formed (first of all, a meeting of judges (or their representatives), provided for by law, must be democratically convened, without which the self-governance of the judiciary as a fully fledged and independent branch of state power is, in general, impossible). While regulating the relationships related to the formation of such institutions, the legislature has broad discretion.

However, it needs to be noted that, if the legislature chose such a model of the self-governance of the judiciary where, along with a democratically convened meeting of judges (or representatives thereof), provided for by law, there would be only one self-governance institution of judges implementing, inter alia, the powers established in Paragraph 5 of Article 112 of the Constitution to advise the President of the Republic on the appointment, promotion, and transfer of judges or their release from duties, together with the legal (inter alia, procedural) mechanisms prohibiting the excessive centralisation of the self-governing judiciary, this would not in itself mean that the concept of the judiciary as independent and self-governing state power, which is consolidated in the Constitution, would be deviated from.

It should be noted that after the legislature has consolidated various self-governance institutions of the judiciary as an independent state power in the Law on Courts (i.e. after the legislature has chosen such self-governance model of the judiciary under which there are several mentioned institutions), it (particularly taking account of the necessity to ensure public trust in judicial power, law, and the legal system of the state) may also establish, by means of a law, such a legal regulation that the said other self-governance institutions of courts would include not only judges, but also other persons. In itself, this should not be regarded as the denial of the self-governance and independence the judiciary, nor should this be regarded as the denial of the fact that the judiciary is fully fledged. However, in such a case, judges must also form an absolute majority of members of such self-governance institutions of the judiciary as an independent state power; moreover, the heads (persons holding chairmanship) of such institutions must also be exclusively judges.

... it should be particularly emphasised that, if a law established such a legal regulation that certain self-governance institutions of the judiciary would include not only judges, but also other persons, under the Constitution, such institutions would be unable to exercise the powers specified in Paragraph 5 of Article 112 of the Constitution, i.e. to advise the President of the Republic on the appointment, promotion, and transfer of judges or their release from duties, since Paragraph 2 of Article 5, Paragraph 5 of Article 112 of the Constitution, and the principle of a state under the rule of law would be violated. As it has been mentioned in this ruling of the Constitutional Court, the said powers exclusively belong to a special institution of judges, which is specified in Paragraph 5 of Article 112 of the Constitution, i.e. such an institution that, under the Constitution, is composed only of judges (and that is, first of all, formed for the purpose specified in this paragraph).

The right of a judge released from duties to apply to a court

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 9 May 2006

... a judge who believes that he/she has been released from duties groundlessly and unlawfully has the right, under the Constitution, to apply to a court regarding the defence of his/her violated right. The Constitutional Court has held in its acts more than once that the right of a person who believes that his/her rights or freedoms are violated to apply to a court is an absolute one, that this right may not be artificially restricted or its implementation may not be unreasonably impeded, that it is not permitted to deny this right, as well as that, under the Constitution, the legislature has the duty to establish such a legal regulation whereby all disputes regarding any violation of the rights or freedoms of persons may be decided in a court.

The legal regulation governing the formation of the corps of judges and their professional careers

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 9 May 2006

Under the Constitution, the legislature has the powers (while paying regard to the norms and principles of the Constitution) to establish selection criteria for persons who wish to become judges, as well as to establish how the corps of candidates for the position of a judge is formed, the corps of candidates for the positions of judges of courts of higher level is formed, etc. The legal regulation establishing this may be differentiated, inter alia, according to the level of a court in which a person seeks to become a judge. The Constitution also does not prohibit establishing such a procedure for forming the corps of persons aspiring to become judges where persons who have university higher education in law and aspire to become judges must pass a special examination or examinations in which it is assessed whether a person has sufficient professional knowledge in order to hold the office of a judge. ...

It should also be emphasised that, even though the dominant principle of the formation of the corps of judges of courts of higher level is the principle of the professional career of judges (where judges are promoted after they are released from previous duties and appointed as judges of courts of higher level), under the Constitution, it is not permitted to establish any such a legal regulation whereby exclusively judges would be able to become judges of courts of higher level. The establishment of such a legal regulation and treating the principle of the professional career of judges unreservedly would create the preconditions for the system of courts to become too closed, to become subjected to a routine, etc.

The powers of the presidents of courts

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 9 May 2006

... under the Constitution, the presidents of all levels of courts of general jurisdiction, as well as of specialised courts (at present – administrative courts), established under Paragraph 2 of Article 111 of the Constitution, have no other powers except those that are assigned to them as judges of a particular court, who must administer justice – decide cases, as well as the powers arising from the Constitution and laws to organise the activity of a particular court, which are assigned to them as the heads of institutions – particular courts. Inter alia, such powers of the presidents of courts of higher level as the initiation of disciplinary cases (other cases of a similar nature) against judges and the presidents of the respective courts of lower level arise from the institutional system of courts, which is consolidated in the Constitution, as well as from the hierarchy thereof. However, in relationships with other state institutions or other state officials, the Constitution does not give rise to any such powers of the president of any court of general jurisdiction, without excluding the Supreme Court or specialised courts (at present – administrative courts), established under Paragraph 2 of Article 111 of the Constitution, that would determine decisions adopted by other state institutions or officials thereof or on which the said decisions would essentially depend.

Extending the powers of judges

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 9 May 2006

... the Constitution does not in essence prevent such a legal regulation established by means of a law where a judge, despite the fact that his/her term of powers expires or he/she reaches the pensionable age established by law, may still hold his/her office for a certain period of time until the consideration of certain cases is finished (until final decisions therein are adopted) where the consideration of the said cases is not finished at the time (on the day) when the term of powers of that judge expires or when he/she reaches the pensionable age established by law. Such an exceptional legal regulation would be constitutionally justifiable, since, otherwise, i.e. without establishing such a legal regulation, the decision of particular cases – the administration of justice – would slow down; thus, the preconditions would be created for injuring the rights and legitimate interests of persons and certain constitutional values would be violated. However, it should be emphasised that, in every case on such extension of the powers of a judge, which is allowed only in exceptional cases, a certain legal act – a decree of the President of the Republic or (if the powers of a justice of the Supreme Court are extended) a resolution of the Seimas – must be passed. In every such a case, advice given by a special institution of judges, as provided for by law and specified in Paragraph 5 of Article 112 of the Constitution, on the extension of powers is necessary (and if the powers of a judge of the Court of Appeal are extended, the assent of the Seimas is also necessary); such advice given by the said special institution of judges to extend the powers of a judge also means its advice to release the judge from duties as soon as the respective legal fact happens – the consideration of particular cases is finished; thus, the advice of the said special institution of judges to extend the powers of a judge also means that the powers of a judge must be discontinued in accordance with the established procedure when the respective legal fact related to the extension of the powers of a judge happens – the consideration of particular cases is finished. ... when this legal fact related to the extension of the powers of a judge happens, the President of the Republic need not once again apply to a special institution of judges, as provided for by law and specified in Paragraph 5 of Article 112 of the Constitution, on the release of the said judge from duties when his/her powers expire or when he/she reaches the pensionable age established under the law (since the respective advice has already been received).

Regard must also be paid to the fact that the said constitutionally reasoned exception to the general constitutional prohibition on extending the powers of a judge when they expire or when a judge reaches the pensionable age may not be interpreted as, purportedly, meaning that the powers of the presidents of courts or the chairpersons of divisions of courts may be extended on any similar basis.

Such a legal regulation where the possibility of extending the term of powers of judges upon their expiry (irrespective of the term for which the powers of the judge are extended and of the level of a court the powers of a judge of which are extended) is provided may create the preconditions for other persons to try to influence a judge directly or indirectly in order that he/she, when seeking the extension of his/her powers, would make certain decisions in cases considered by him/her; such a legal regulation should be regarded as enabling someone to induce a judge to consider cases and adopt decisions in them not only by obeying the law, as required by the Constitution (Paragraph 3 of Article 109), but also by bearing in mind the fact how decisions adopted in cases considered by him/her will influence the possibility of extending his/her powers in the future. In other words, such a legal regulation would create the preconditions for a judge for adopting such decisions in cases considered by him/her that would correspond not to his/her concept of justice, but would correspond to the concept of justice as understood by other persons.

Thus, such a legal regulation that provides for the possibility of extending the powers of judges upon their expiry, save the exceptions allowed by the Constitution itself, is incompatible with the principle of the independence of judges and courts, which is consolidated in the Constitution, with Paragraph 2 of Article 109 of the Constitution, whereby, when administering justice, judges and courts are independent, with Paragraph 3 of this article, which prescribes that, while considering cases, judges obey only the law, and with the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law.

The prohibition on extending the powers of the presidents of courts (chairpersons of divisions of courts and other judges fulfilling administrative duties)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 9 May 2006

The concept of the professional career of judges also includes such cases where a judge is appointed as the president of a certain court, as the chairperson of a division of a certain court, etc. If judges are appointed as the said presidents of courts, chairpersons of divisions of courts, or as ones that must fulfil certain other administrative duties for a certain time period established by law, after the said time period is over, they must be released from their duties; therefore, as well as when appointing them to that office, the respective individual law-applying act on their release from duties must be adopted. The powers of the presidents of courts, the chairpersons of divisions of courts, and other judges who fulfil administrative duties in courts may not be extended by means of a law or by any other legal act establishing general norms – in general, such powers may not be extended as, after the term of powers expires, such powers cease (i.e. an individual law-applying act must be adopted concerning this issue), and then, in accordance with a procedure prescribed by law, it must be decided anew whether the same judge (if laws provide for such a possibility) or another person must be appointed as the president of a court, the chairperson of a division of a court, etc.

The constitutional status of judges

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 22 October 2007

The function of the administration of justice determines an exceptional constitutional status of judges, which is revealed in various constitutional provisions that consolidate the independence of judges and courts when administering justice (Paragraph 2 of Article 109 of the Constitution), the impossibility for a judge to hold any other elective or appointive office, to work in any business, commercial, or other private establishments or enterprises, to receive any remuneration other than the remuneration established for judges and payment for educational or creative activities, and to take part in the activities of political parties and other political organisations (Article 113 of the Constitution), the prohibition on interfering with the activity of a judge and the inviolability of the person of a judge (Article 114 of the Constitution), etc. Under Article 104 of the Constitution, the limitations established on work and political activities for the judges of courts also apply to the justices of the Constitutional Court (Paragraph 3); the justices of the Constitutional Court have the same rights concerning the inviolability of their person as the members of the Seimas (Paragraph 4).

The grounds for releasing judges from duties (cessation of powers) and the influence of such grounds on establishing and applying the social guarantees of judges after their powers cease (Articles 108 and 115 of the Constitution)

See 9.1.3. The independence of judges and courts and the guarantees of their independence, the ruling of 22 October 2007.

Requirements for the professional qualification (education) of judges (applicants for the positions of judges) (on requirements for the professional qualification of lawyers, see 2. The constitutional status of persons, 2.4. Economic, social, and cultural rights, 2.4.1. Economic rights, 2.4.1.2. The right to work, 2.4.1.2.2. Professional competence requirements; as regards the official constitutional doctrine related to higher education in law, see 2.4.3. Cultural rights, 2.4.3.1. The right to education, 2.4.3.1.2. The right to seek higher education)

... Since, in a state under the rule of law, when deciding cases (settling disputes) in which parties to a case are, as a rule (and, in complex cases, virtually always), represented by professional lawyers, the last word always belongs to the court, it is no coincidence that in countries of mature legal culture it is recognised that the activity of judges draws guidelines to the entire legal profession and the legal practice in that country. Therefore, there must be no doubts as to the fact that, in a state under the rule of law (and the Constitution of the Republic of Lithuania consolidates expressis verbis the striving for a state under the rule of law), the highest possible professional qualification requirements, as well as those of legal education, may and must be imposed on persons who seek to become judges (even if such highest professional qualification requirements are not imposed on other representatives of the legal profession); the failure to impose such highest professional qualification requirements on applicants for positions of judges would result in the preconditions for the loss of effectiveness in the work of courts and for the deterioration of the quality of such work, as well as for a violation of rights, freedoms, and legitimate interests of persons and various values, which are consolidated, defended, and protected by the Constitution; in general, the said failure would result in the preconditions for situations where justice only formally administered by courts whose judges are persons without necessary qualification would not be the justice that is consolidated in and protected and defended by the Constitution. Consequently, under the Constitution, the legislature has the powers to consolidate also such a requirement in laws whereby applicants for positions of judges are required to have acquired university higher education in law, which is related, in the western legal tradition, with the acquisition of the highest professional qualification of a lawyer.

... “higher education in law” is a constitutional notion; it is used in Paragraph 3 of Article 103 of the Constitution, in which the requirements for candidates for the post of the justices of the Constitutional Court are described. The Constitution does not contain any explicit provisions defining requirements for judges of the courts specified in Paragraphs 1 and 2 of Article 111 of the Constitution (save the provision of Paragraph 1 of Article 112 of the Constitution, whereby, in Lithuania, only citizens of the Republic of Lithuania may be judges). If such a legal regulation established in the Constitution is interpreted in the context of other provisions of the Constitution, inter alia, the constitutional principles of a state under the rule of law, justice, the independence of judges and courts, and the constitutional right of a person to apply to a court, it should be held that the requirement of higher education in law for judges, thus, also for applicants for positions of judges, stems from the Constitution; the said requirement applies to all said applicants, no matter the judges of which court these persons would aspire to become.

The requirement of higher education in law for applicants for positions of judges and the fact that laws may impose the requirement of namely university higher education in law on such persons stem from the provisions of the official constitutional doctrine of the judiciary as the only state power that is formed on a professional basis and is exclusively entrusted with the administration of justice; various aspects of this doctrine are broadly revealed in the Constitutional Court’s rulings of 6 December 1995, 19 December 1996, 5 February 1999, 21 December 1999, and 12 July 2001, the conclusion of 31 March 2004, the rulings of 16 January 2006, 28 March 2006, 9 May 2006, and 6 June 2006, the decision of 8 August 2006, the rulings of 27 November 2006 and 22 October 2007, as well as in other acts of the Constitutional Court.

... under the Constitution, it is impermissible to establish any such a legal regulation whereby lower professional requirements would be raised for persons who wish to hold the position of a judge, inter alia, they would be required lower education and/or lower qualification than persons who intend to engage in other legal professions (advocate, prosecutor, notary, bailiff). Otherwise, this would lead to the preconditions for denying not only the exceptional constitutional status of judges, but also the constitutional concept of the administration of justice.

[...]

Taking account of the importance of the profession of a judge in a state under the rule of law (inter alia, taking account of the fact that, as mentioned before, when cases are decided (disputes are settled) in which parties to a case are, as a rule (and, in complex cases, virtually always), represented by professional lawyers, the last word always belongs to the court, and that the activity of judges draws guidelines to the entire legal profession and the legal practice in that country), it should be held that it is not enough that a person who wishes to hold the position of a judge completes only the basic studies provided for in legal acts of the Republic of Lithuania, i.e. the first-cycle studies in the field of law designated for the provision of only the theoretical grounds of the profession and the formation of necessary professional skills; the requirement (which arises from the Constitution) for high professional qualification of a judge implies that persons who wish to become judges are required to have acquired such university higher education in law that can only be ensured by two-cycle university sequential studies in the field of law (i.e. the qualification degrees of bachelor of law and master of law) or integrated studies in the field of law (both of which are provided for in legal acts of the Republic of Lithuania) where university first- and second-cycle studies are related by sequence.

On the other hand, although, as such, the first-cycle (undergraduate) studies in law cannot ensure the level of education sufficient for the work of a judge, these studies are necessary and may not be eliminated from fully fledged university higher education in law necessary for persons who wish to become judges, since, as it has been mentioned before, namely the first-cycle studies in law are intended to provide the basis for the profession and to form professional skills necessary for independent work. A different interpretation, specifically that the first-cycle studies in law may be eliminated from fully fledged university higher education in law necessary for persons who wish to become judges, would not only deny the constitutional concept of the profession of a judge, but also the concept of master studies in the field of law and of the qualification degree of master of law, which is consolidated in legal acts (first of all, laws) of the Republic of Lithuania, since ... master studies and the qualification degree of master is related to the acquisition of higher professional qualification and preparation for independent research or artistic activities or activities for which deeper scientific knowledge and greater capacity are required, and only such a student of law can pursue “higher professional qualification” who has the theoretical bases of the legal profession and professional skills necessary for independent work, and that only such a student of law can pursue “deeper scientific knowledge and greater capacity” who has basic scientific knowledge and capacity necessary in the respective area of law. A different interpretation would deny the meaning of the first-cycle (undergraduate) studies in the field of law and that of single-cycle studies in the field of law; this would mean that persons with unequal legal education are allowed to compete for the position of a judge.

... the requirement that persons who wish to become judges have fully fledged university higher education in law (that they are subject to the requirement to have finished single-cycle (integrated) studies in the field of law where university first-cycle and second-cycle studies are related by sequence, or to have the qualification degrees of bachelor of law and master of law) applies to all persons who wish to hold the position of a judge, as well as to those who have completed the third cycle of studies in the field of law, doctoral studies, which are provided for in legal acts of the Republic of Lithuania, and have acquired the scientific degree of doctor.

It has been held in this ruling of the Constitutional Court that, taking account of the principles of legal certainty and legal security, which are consolidated in the Constitution, the fact that a person has completed university studies in the field of law leads to the presumption that such a person is eligible for a position for which university higher education in law is necessary (if he/she meets all the conditions that need not be limited only to the requirement of university higher education in law, but may also include the requirements for a certain work period as a lawyer, the practice performed, etc.); the same can be said as regards, inter alia, persons who wish to apply for the position of a judge. It should also be held that the programmes of university studies in the field of law of schools of higher education must be such that the theoretical preparation and practical abilities (acquired during the time of the studies) of persons who have completed these studies would raise no doubts, while the professional qualification acquired by them would allow them to aspire to positions (professions) in order to hold which (in order to engage in which) university higher education in law is needed.

Consequently, it is impermissible to establish any additional verification with regard to persons who wish to become judges and who have acquired fully fledged university higher education in law in order to ascertain whether such persons have really completed all requirements raised before fully fledged university higher education in law. Their diplomas of higher education testifying either single-cycle university education or the qualification degrees of bachelor of law and master of law should be regarded as sufficient proof that these persons have university higher education in law that is necessary in order to hold the position of a judge.

This does not deny the possibility for the legislature to establish the verification of the knowledge and abilities of applicants for the position of a judge (inter alia, by examining such applicants) where the said knowledge and abilities are necessary for the work of a judge.

Extending the powers of judges

The Constitutional Court's decision of 30 June 2010

Such a legal regulation that provides for the possibility of extending the powers of judges upon their expiry, save the exceptions allowed by the Constitution itself, is incompatible with the principle of the independence of judges and courts, which is consolidated in the Constitution, with Paragraph 2 of Article 109 of the Constitution, whereby, when administering justice, judges and courts are independent, with Paragraph 3 of this article, which prescribes that, while considering cases, judges obey only the law, and with the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law (ruling of 9 May 2006).

The official constitutional doctrine related to the extension of the powers of judges was developed in the Constitutional Court's ruling of 22 October 2007, wherein the following is held: as long as the consideration of such cases where the extension of the powers of a judge is related to completing such consideration is not finished, the said judge is a fully fledged judge; while administering justice (deciding cases), he/she has the same powers as other judges of the same court, his/her status as a judge is indivisible, the same restrictions on activity and limitations on remuneration, which stem from the Constitution, are applied to him/her, he/she has the same responsibility and immunities as other judges; thus, he/she must have the same workload (inter alia, because of the fact that, in the said court, the position of a judge who must carry out an important constitutional function – to administer justice – is not yet vacant) as other judges of the same court, and he/she must be paid the same remuneration as other judges of the same court, he/she also has the same social (material) guarantees that the judges of the same court have.

... under the official constitutional doctrine formulated, inter alia, in the Constitutional Court's rulings of 9 May 2006 and 22 October 2007, the Constitution only allows the establishment, by means of a law, of an exceptional legal regulation governing the extension of the powers of judges. In this context, it needs to be noted that, as mentioned before, when being appointed, a judge must know the term of his/her powers (either until the time established under the law or until he/she reaches the pensionable age established under the law). Therefore, the work of a judge (inter alia, the assignment of cases for his/her consideration) must be organised in such a manner that, on the day of the expiry of the powers of a judge, he/she would have the possibility of having finished the consideration of cases assigned to him/her.

... the extension of the powers of judges is allowed only in exceptional cases, i.e. when, upon the expiry of the term of powers of a judge or upon reaching the pensionable age established by law, deciding certain cases – the administration of justice – would slow down and, thus, this may create the preconditions for injuring the rights and legitimate interests of persons and violating certain constitutional values if the powers of such a judge were not extended. For example, deciding cases would slow down if the powers of a judge were not extended, inter alia, in cases where, on the day of the expiry of powers, a judge is finishing the consideration of complicated cases wherein most procedural actions have been completed and some time is required for the completion of certain final actions, inter alia, adopting a final decision (drawing up and pronouncement thereof).

... a judge whose powers have been extended must, for a certain period of time (as long as the term of the extension of his/her powers has not expired), still receive the same workload as other judges of the same court, i.e. such a judge may also consider (as long as the term of the extension of his/her powers has not expired) such cases the consideration of which is started after his/her powers have been extended upon the expiry of the term of his/her powers or upon reaching the pensionable age established by law.

In view of the foregoing arguments, the conclusion should be drawn that ... a judge whose powers have been extended must receive the same workload as other judges of the same court and, during the period of the extension of powers, he/she may also administer justice as a fully fledged judge (inter alia, act as a judge, a judge rapporteur, and a member of a panel) in other cases that are assigned to him/her after his/her powers are extended.

... a judge must be released from duties when the legal fact to which the extension of his/her powers is related happens, i.e. when he/she finishes the consideration of cases the consideration of which was not finished at the time (on the day) when the term of powers of that judge expired or when he/she reached the pensionable age established by law, where the powers of such a judge were extended for the purpose of completing the consideration of such cases. The powers of a judge must be discontinued in accordance with the established procedure as soon as the aforementioned legal fact happens – the consideration of cases to the consideration of which the term of the extension of the powers of a judge is related is finished. Consequently, such a judge must be released from duties and he/she may no longer consider any other cases (inter alia, including such cases that were assigned to him/her as a fully fledged judge during the period of the extension of his/her powers and the consideration of which is not finished on the day when the consideration of the cases to the consideration of which the term of the extension of his/her powers is related is finished).

In view of the foregoing arguments, the conclusion should be drawn that ... a judge whose powers have been extended may also administer justice as a fully fledged judge (inter alia, act as a judge, a judge rapporteur, and a member of a panel) in other cases (which are assigned to him/her after his/her powers are extended) but only until completing the consideration of certain cases the consideration of which was not finished at the time (on the day) when the powers of that judge were extended.

Professional and ethical requirements imposed on judges

The Constitutional Court's decision of 10 March 2014

The qualification of judges is one of the guarantees that judges will administer justice in a proper manner: only persons with high legal qualification and experience of life may be appointed as judges; this means that judges must meet special professional requirements (ruling of 21 December 1999 and the decision of 3 July 2013). The appropriate preparation of judges, the improvement of their knowledge and in-service training are an important precondition for guaranteeing the proper activities of courts (ruling of 21 December 1999).

Judges must meet very strict ethical and moral requirements; their reputation must be impeccable (ruling of 27 November 2006 and the decision of 3 July 2013); they must protect the honour and prestige of their profession (ruling of 21 December 1999). The Constitutional Court has also held that judges must bear great responsibility for how they administer justice, i.e. perform the obligation established for them in the Constitution (ruling of 21 December 1999 and the decision of 3 July 2013).

The assessment of the qualification and work of judges; the disciplinary responsibility of judges; releasing judges from duties when their conduct discredits the name of judges (Item 5 of Article 115 of the Constitution)

... a special institution of judges, which is specified in Paragraph 5 of Article 112 of the Constitution and takes part in the adoption of decisions on the career of judges (which advises the President of the Republic on the appointment, promotion, and transfer of judges or their release from office) and, as noted in the Constitutional Court's ruling of 9 May 2006, as a result of this, has the powers to assess the qualification of judges, must also assess, in certain aspects, the work of judges done in the consideration of cases – this is an important precondition for guaranteeing the proper activity of courts. However, it needs to be emphasised that the assessment of the work of judges done in the consideration of cases, where such assessment could create the preconditions for undermining the independence of judges and courts, would be incompatible with the Constitution, inter alia, Paragraph 2 of Article 109 thereof. The work of judges should be assessed in accordance with pre-established criteria while taking account, inter alia, of the circumstances such as the amount of work done in a court in question, the workload of a judge, the complexity and particularity of cases, and the duration and course of court proceedings.

In addition, it needs to be noted that, in view of the fact that, under the Constitution, the self-governing judiciary may not be too centralised and that the legislature has the broad discretion to establish, by means of a law, the system of the self-governance institutions of the judiciary, the powers to assess the work of judges done in the consideration of cases, as well as the qualification of judges, may also be conferred, by means of a law, on a self-governance judicial institution other than that provided for in Paragraph 5 of Article 112 of the Constitution.

... judges must bear great responsibility for how they administer justice, i.e. perform the obligation established for them in the Constitution ... the system of the guarantees of the independence of judges and courts does not create any preconditions on the grounds of which a judge could evade the proper fulfilment of his/her duties and investigate cases in a negligent manner. Thus, the constitutional principle of the independence of judges and courts is far from meaning that disciplinary responsibility may not be imposed on a judge who performs his/her duties in an improper manner (inter alia, considers cases in a negligent manner) or evades performing them without a justifiable reason.

... the system of self-regulation and self-governance of the judiciary must ensure that judges perform their duties properly and that every unlawful or unethical conduct of a judge be properly assessed. However, as held in the Constitutional Court's ruling of 21 December 1999, the application of disciplinary measures to judges must be organised in such a manner that the actual independence of judges would not be violated.

It should be noted that this means, among other things, that, while applying disciplinary responsibility measures, the balance between the independence and responsibility of judges may not be violated; the said measures may not create any preconditions for interfering with the activities of judges undertaken in the consideration of cases and the adoption of decisions; nor may the said measures violate the actual procedural independence of judges. Disciplinary responsibility measures may be applied to judges for their certain conduct by which they commit misconduct while implementing their powers as a judge (for evading the performance of their duties or for their improper performance, inter alia, the negligent consideration of cases), as well as for the conduct of a judge that is not related to the implementation of the powers of a judge. Disciplinary responsibility measures that are applied to judges, the grounds and conditions for their application must be established by means of a law. When deciding whether certain behaviour of a judge is to be recognised as misconduct for which responsibility must be imposed, it is necessary to assess all circumstances related to its commitment.

Under Item 5 of Article 115 of the Constitution, judges are released from their duties according to the procedure established by law when their conduct discredits the name of judges. Thus, under the Constitution, release from duties is the strictest disciplinary responsibility measure applicable to a judge whose conduct discredits the name of judges.

The Constitutional Court has held that the Constitution does not expressis verbis establish what types of conduct of a judge are categorised as those discrediting the name of judges; the phrase "conduct discrediting the name of judges" is broad; it includes not only the conduct of a judge by which a judge, while implementing his/her powers as a judge, discredits the name of judges, but also the conduct that discredits the name of judges with no relation to the implementation of the powers of a judge; under the Constitution, the legislature, as well as self-governance judicial institutions, have the discretion to establish what types of conduct of a judge are categorised as those by which the name of judges is discredited; however, neither laws nor decisions of self-governance judicial institutions may establish any thorough (exhaustive) list of types of conduct by which a judge discredits the name of judges; every time the fact whether the conduct of a judge is that by which the name of judges is discredited must be decided after all circumstances related to the said conduct and significant for the case are assessed (rulings of 27 November 2006 and 16 January 2007).

The conduct provided for in Item 5 of Article 115 of the Constitution by which the name of judges is discredited implies not only the establishment (statement) of the relevant facts of objective nature, but also their assessment (ruling of 27 November 2006). Thus, in cases where the President of the Republic applies to a special institution of judges, as provided for by law and specified in Paragraph 5 of Article 112 of the Constitution, so that it would give advice, inter alia, on releasing from duties a judge whose conduct has discredited the name of judges, the said institution of judges must not only make sure that a judge has engaged in certain conduct (act), but also assess whether this conduct (act) really discredited the name of judges (rulings of 9 May 2006 and 27 November 2006).

... the procedural independence and autonomy of judges in deciding all issues related to a case under consideration is a necessary condition for the impartial and fair consideration of the case; only a court itself decides on how it should consider a case; a judge is not bound by the obligation to account for cases considered by him/her to any state institution or officials; while administering justice, no judge is or may be subordinate to any other judge or to the president of any court (inter alia, of the court where he/she works, as well as of a court of a higher level or instance); decisions adopted by a judge may be reviewed and altered or rescinded only by a court of higher instance in accordance with the procedure provided for in procedural laws; the purpose of the instance system of courts is to remove any errors of fact (i.e. of the establishment and assessment of legally significant facts) or those of law (i.e. of the application of law) made by courts of lower instance, and not to permit the administration of injustice; justice is administered by always leaving the possibility of correcting any possible error.

Thus, while fulfilling his/her constitutional obligation to administer justice and adopt reasoned and substantiated decisions, a judge considers cases independently and decides all issues related to a case under consideration at his/her own discretion, by following law, relying on a comprehensive and objective assessment of facts, his/her knowledge, inner conviction, and ethical requirements. A judge is not bound by the obligation to account for the consideration of cases and the validity of the adopted decisions; the arguments and reasoning of a judge are set out in the adopted decisions.

... it should be emphasised that the mere fact that a court of higher instance, having reviewed, in accordance with the procedure prescribed in procedural laws, a decision adopted by a court of lower instance, altered it or rescinded it due to errors in the interpretation and/or application of law and breaches of procedural laws that were made while adopting it, may not serve as a basis for imposing disciplinary responsibility on the judge who adopted that decision. Judges of courts of higher instance who consider cases concerning decisions adopted by courts of lower instance also rely on their knowledge and inner conviction; therefore, the adoption of another decision may also be determined by different perception, a different assessment of facts, and/or a different interpretation of law. The fact that errors in the interpretation and/or application of law and breaches of procedural laws that were made, while adopting a decision, by a judge of a court of lower instance who considered a case in an independent and impartial manner are corrected by a court of higher instance, first of all, shows that the instance system of courts functions according to its intended purpose; however, this does not show that a judge who adopted a decision that has been altered or rescinded performed his/her duties in a negligent manner or lacked necessary professional qualification. When a court of higher instance reviews and alters or rescinds a decision adopted by a court of lower instance, the qualification or activities (work) of a judge (performed in the consideration of cases) who has adopted it is not assessed; (a) self-governance judicial institution(s), which has (have) the respective powers, assesses (assess) this and applies (apply) disciplinary responsibility measures in accordance with the procedure prescribed by means of laws.

Thus, a decision adopted by a judge, even if altered or rescinded by a court of higher instance due to errors in the interpretation and/or application of law and breaches of procedural laws that were made while adopting it, may not serve as a basis for initiating the procedure for disciplinary responsibility, for recognising that the conduct of a judge discredited the name of judges and, under Item 5 of Article 115 of the Constitution, for releasing him/her from duties. The possibility of applying certain measures with negative effects to judges for specific decisions adopted by them (for the assessment of facts and the interpretation of law in those decisions) would deny the essence of the instance system of courts and would create the preconditions for undermining the procedural autonomy of judges in deciding all issues related to a particular case under consideration, as well as for interfering with actions of a judge or a court in administering justice; thus, it would violate the constitutional principle of the independence of judges and courts.

It has been mentioned that the system of self-regulation and self-governance of the judiciary must ensure that judges perform their duties properly and that every unlawful or unethical conduct of a judge be properly assessed; however, the application of disciplinary measures to judges must be organised in such a manner that the actual independence of judges would not be undermined.

... it should be noted that the constitutional principle of the independence of judges and courts does not deny the possibility of imposing disciplinary responsibility on a judge for evading the performance of his/her duties without a justifiable reason and for inappropriate performance of the assigned duties (inter alia, for negligence in considering cases). (A) self-governance judicial institution(s), which has (have) the powers to assess the activities of judges (i.e. how a judge, while administering justice, performs his/her duties), to examine misconduct committed by judges, and to impose disciplinary sanctions on them, must, on a case-by-case basis, assess all circumstances related to the performance of the duties of a judge. If a judge, when considering cases, performs his/her duties in a negligent manner (inter alia, considers cases in haste and superficially or, on the contrary, unjustifiably slowly, commits evident breaches of the requirements provided for in procedural laws and does not go into the substance of the material of a case, and considers cases in a slipshod manner), disciplinary responsibility should be imposed on him/her for the misconduct committed.

However, it needs to be emphasised that (a) self-governance judicial institution(s), which has (have) the powers to assess the activities of judges and apply disciplinary responsibility measures, may not decide to apply such measures for errors in the interpretation and/or application of law and breaches of procedural laws that are made by a judge while adopting a decision and are detected, as well as corrected, later by a court of higher instance, also where such breaches are detected by means of the review of an adopted decision not by a court of higher instance, but where such breaches are established during the administration of courts or during the assessment of the activities of judges by the aforementioned institution(s). If (a) self-governance judicial institution(s) were given such powers, i.e. the possibility of imposing disciplinary responsibility on judges for a specific adopted decision were provided for, this would mean that this (these) institution(s) is (are) assigned to carry out control over the decisions of judges and assess their content; thus, the essence of the instance system of courts would be denied, the preconditions for interfering with the activities of a judge in administering justice would be created, and the constitutional principle of the independence of judges and courts would be violated.

... it should also be noted that if decisions of a judge of a court of lower instance are altered or rescinded by courts of higher instance very often, gross and evident errors in the interpretation and/or application of law, as well as gross and evident breaches of procedural laws, are repeatedly made therein, this may mean that, while administering justice, a judge performs his/her duties in an improper manner (inter alia, considers cases in a negligent manner, does not go into the substance of the material of a case) and/or that a judge does not meet the requirements of professional qualification established for him/her. The improper and negligent conduct of a judge that reveals evident lack of competence and results in the continual adoption of such decisions in which errors in the interpretation and/or application of law, as well as breaches of procedural laws, are made is incompatible with the requirements established for a judge; therefore, the said conduct serves as a basis for applying disciplinary responsibility measures to a judge, inter alia, for recognising that the conduct of a judge discredits the name of judges. It should also be noted that if recurrent gross and evident errors in the interpretation and/or application of law, as well as recurrent gross and evident breaches of procedural laws, are detected not after a court of higher instance reviews the decisions adopted by a judge, but during the administration of courts or during the assessment of the activities of a judge by (a) self-governance judicial institution(s), this also serves as a basis for assessing accordingly the conduct of a judge and applying disciplinary responsibility measures to him/her, inter alia, for recognising that a judge discredits the name of judges and, under Paragraph 5 of Article 115 of the Constitution, for releasing him/her from duties.

After all significant circumstances are assessed, every time it must be decided whether the conduct of a judge in making the detected errors and breaches is the one that discredits the name of judges. The constitutional principle of the independence of judges and courts implies that the system of self-regulation and self-governance of the judiciary must function in such a manner that the preconditions would be created for releasing a judge who discredits the name of judges from his/her duties.

In the light of the foregoing, the conclusion should be drawn that the provisions [the guarantees of the independence of judges and courts do not create any preconditions on the grounds of which judges could evade the proper fulfilment of their duties and investigate cases in a negligent manner; judges must protect the honour and prestige of their profession; the system of judicial self-governance must ensure that judges perform their duties properly and that every unlawful or unethical behaviour of a judge is properly assessed] ... of the Constitutional Court's ruling of 21 December 1999, inter alia, mean that:

– the constitutional principle of the independence of judges and courts does not deny the possibility of imposing disciplinary responsibility on judges for evading the performance of their duties without a justifiable reason and for the inappropriate performance of duties (inter alia, for the negligent consideration of cases); however, the mere fact that a court of higher instance, having reviewed, under the procedure provided for in procedural laws, a decision adopted by a judge, altered it or rescinded it due to errors in the interpretation and/or application of law or breaches of procedural laws that were made while adopting it, does not mean that this may serve as a basis for imposing disciplinary responsibility on the judge and, under Item 5 of Article 115 of the Constitution, for releasing him/her from duties upon recognising that his/her conduct has discredited the name of judges;

– recurrent gross and evident errors in the interpretation and/or application of law, as well as recurrent gross and evident breaches of procedural laws that were made by a judge while adopting decisions, serve as a basis for (a) self-governance judicial institution(s), which has (have) the respective powers, to assess the conduct of a judge as the inappropriate performance of duties (inter alia, the negligent consideration of cases) and as a lack of necessary professional qualification, to impose disciplinary responsibility on the judge, and to recognise that his/her conduct discredits the name of judges; the system of self-regulation and self-governance of the judiciary must function in such a manner that would create the preconditions for dismissing from duties a judge whose conduct discredits the name of judges.

9.1.5. The powers of courts related to the administration of justice

The duty of a court, if it has doubts, to apply to the Constitutional Court concerning the constitutionality of a legal act applicable in a case considered by that court (Article 110 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 30 December 2003

... Article 110 of the Constitution consolidates the prohibition on applying a law that is in conflict with the Constitution and establishes the constitutional duty of a court investigating a case, if it faces doubts about whether a law or another legal act that must be applied in a concrete case is in conflict with the Constitution, to suspend the consideration of the case and apply to the Constitutional Court, requesting it to decide whether the law or another legal act in question is in compliance with the Constitution. Such a constitutional regulation seeks to ensure that a legal act (part thereof) that is in conflict with the Constitution would not be applied, that no anticonstitutional legal consequences of the application of such a legal act (part thereof) would arise, that the rights of a person would not be violated, and that a person in respect of whom a legal act inconsistent with the Constitution or a law is applied would not unreasonably acquire, due to this, any rights or a legal status that does not belong to him/her.

The duty of courts to ensure that legal acts that are in conflict with higher-ranking legal acts would not be applied (Article 110 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 28 March 2006

... one of essential elements of the principle of a state under the rule of law, which is consolidated in the Constitution, is the principle whereby a legal act that is in conflict with a higher-ranking legal act must not be applied.

Paragraph 1 of Article 110 of the Constitution prescribes that judges may not apply any laws that are in conflict with the Constitution; Paragraph 2 of the same article stipulates that, in cases when there are grounds to believe that a law or another legal act that should be applied in a concrete case is in conflict with the Constitution, the judge suspends the consideration of the case and applies to the Constitutional Court, requesting that it decide whether the law or another legal act in question is in compliance with the Constitution. If a court, after it has faced doubts about the compliance of a legal act applicable in a case with the Constitution, did not suspend the consideration of the case and did not apply to the Constitutional Court so that those doubts would be removed, and if the legal act whose compliance with the Constitution is doubtful were applied in the case, such a court would take the risk of adopting a decision that would not be a just one (ruling of 16 January 2006).

It needs to be emphasised that, under the Constitution, the Constitutional Court decides on the compliance of not all legal acts (parts thereof) with the Constitution (other higher-ranking legal acts), but ... only whether legal acts (part thereof) passed by the Seimas, the President of the Republic, or the Government or adopted by referendum are in conflict with a higher-ranking legal act, inter alia (and, first of all), with the Constitution.

On the other hand, as the Constitutional Court held in its decision of 20 September 2005, under the Constitution, such legal situations are impermissible where it would not be possible to verify in a court whether legal acts (parts thereof), inter alia, legal acts passed by ministers, other lower-ranking legal acts, as well as legal acts issued by municipalities, the review of which in terms of their compliance with the Constitution does not fall within the jurisdiction of the Constitutional Court, are in conflict with the Constitution and laws.

When executing this constitutional imperative, under the Constitution, the legislature has the duty to establish, by means of a law, in which courts (of general jurisdiction or specialised ones, established under Paragraph 2 of Article 111 of the Constitution) and under which procedure it is necessary to investigate and decide whether such legal acts (parts thereof) (inter alia, legal acts passed by ministers, other substatutory lower-ranking legal acts, as well as legal acts passed by municipal institutions) the review of which in terms of their compliance with the Constitution is not assigned to the jurisdiction of the Constitutional Court under the Constitution are in conflict with the Constitution and laws.

However, if the legislature has not carried out this constitutional duty for certain reasons (though the Constitution does not tolerate this), still, courts, under Paragraph 1 of Article 110 of the Constitution, may not apply any such legal acts that are in conflict with the Constitution. Thus, in cases of failure to establish, by means of a law, any such a legal regulation under which it would be clearly established, following, inter alia, the principle of expressio unius est exclusio alterius, in which courts and under which procedure it is necessary to investigate and decide whether the said legal acts (parts thereof) are in conflict with higher-ranking legal acts, inter alia (and, first of all), with the Constitution, it should be held that: first, under the Constitution (Article 110), any court, as mentioned before, which may not apply a legal act whose compliance with the Constitution (another higher-ranking legal act) it doubts, although it may not apply to the Constitutional Court concerning the compliance of such a legal act with the Constitution, because the review of such a legal act in terms of its compliance with the Constitution (another higher-ranking legal act) is not assigned to the jurisdiction of the Constitutional Court under the Constitution, has the powers arising directly from the Constitution to declare ad hoc a particular legal act in conflict with the Constitution (another higher-ranking legal act) and not to apply it; second, such ad hoc declaration of the legal act in conflict with the Constitution (another higher-ranking legal act) is the constitutional control of inter partes model, which is established by the Constitution only under the said exceptional circumstances, i.e. if the legislature, for certain reasons, has not carried out this constitutional duty to establish, by means of a law, in which courts and under which procedure it is necessary to investigate and decide whether such legal acts (parts thereof) the review of which in terms of their compliance with the Constitution is not assigned to the jurisdiction of the Constitutional Court under the Constitution are in conflict with higher-ranking legal acts, inter alia, with the Constitution.

It should be held that, at present, such a legal regulation is established [by means of] laws whereby a decision on the compliance of legal acts passed by other law-making subjects (thus, not those passed by the Seimas, the President of the Republic, or the Government and not those adopted by referendum) with higher-ranking legal acts, inter alia (and, first of all), with the Constitution, is assigned to the jurisdiction of administrative courts. If an administrative court rules such a legal act to be in conflict with the Constitution (another higher-ranking legal act), then, under the Constitution and laws, such a decision of the said court has erga omnes impact on the whole practice of the application of the respective legal acts (parts thereof).

... an investigation into whether legal acts (parts thereof) passed by other law-making subjects (thus, which were not passed by the Seimas, the President of the Republic, or the Government or were not adopted by referendum) are in conflict with higher-ranking legal acts, inter alia (and, first of all), with the Constitution, and the adoption of the respective decisions imply the necessity for an administrative court that decides a case to ascertain whether those higher-ranking legal acts (parts thereof) themselves are in conflict with legal acts of an even higher level, inter alia (and, first of all), with the Constitution, and, if there are doubts, to take measures provided for in the Constitution and laws in order to remove the said doubts, certainly, without interfering with the powers assigned to the Constitutional Court. If this were not done, there would be the risk of adopting such a decision that would not be a just one, i.e. there would be the risk of applying a certain legal act (part thereof) based on such a higher-ranking legal act that would be declared in conflict with a legal act of an even higher level, or even with the Constitution itself, if a proper investigation were carried out, or there would be the risk of not applying a certain legal act (part thereof) declared in conflict with a higher-ranking legal act by the administrative court, even though that higher-ranking legal act would be declared in conflict with a legal act of an even higher level, or even with the Constitution itself, if a proper investigation were carried out. If this happened, the preconditions would be created for violating the values (inter alia, the constitutional rights of a person) that are consolidated, protected, and defended by the Constitution.

In this respect, an investigation into the compliance of legal acts (parts thereof) passed by other law-making subjects (thus, which were not passed by the Seimas, the President of the Republic, or the Government or were not adopted by referendum), with higher-ranking legal acts, except the Constitution itself, where such an investigation is assigned to the jurisdiction of administrative courts [by means of laws], implies the initiation of the respective constitutional justice case at the Constitutional Court, thus, also the duty of administrative courts to apply in such cases to the Constitutional Court with the respective petition if an administrative court has doubts about the compliance of a higher-ranking legal act (part thereof) passed by the Seimas, the President of the Republic, or the Government or that adopted by referendum with a legal act of an even higher level, inter alia (and, first of all), with the Constitution.

Interpreting Paragraph 2 of Article 6 and Paragraph 1 of Article 30 of the Constitution in the context of Paragraph 1 of Article 109 and Article 110 of the Constitution, as well as in the context of the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law, it needs to be noted that the right of each person to defend his/her rights on the basis of the Constitution and the right of a person whose constitutional rights or freedoms are violated to apply to a court also imply that each party to a case considered by a court, when such a party has doubts over the compliance of a law or another legal act (part thereof) with the Constitution (with another higher-ranking legal act), where such a law or another legal act (part thereof) may be applied in that case and where an investigation into the compliance of which with the Constitution (with another higher-ranking legal act) falls under the jurisdiction of the Constitutional Court (i.e. when such a party doubts the compliance of a certain act (part thereof) of the Seimas, the President of the Republic, or the Government or an act (part thereof) adopted by referendum with the Constitution (with another higher-ranking legal act)), has the right to apply to a court of general jurisdiction or specialised court (established under Paragraph 2 of Article 111 of the Constitution) that considers the respective case, requesting such a court to suspend the consideration of the case and to apply to the Constitutional Court with the petition to investigate and to decide whether the legal act (part thereof) that was passed by the Seimas, the President of the Republic, or the Government or adopted by referendum and is applicable in the same case is in conflict with a higher-ranking legal act, inter alia (and, first of all), with the Constitution.

This is also mutatis mutandis applicable to those legal situations where a party to a case considered by a court has doubts over the compliance of a legal act (part thereof) with the Constitution (with another higher-ranking legal act) where such a legal act (part thereof) may be applied in that case and where an investigation into the compliance of which with the Constitution (with another higher-ranking legal act) does not fall under the jurisdiction of the Constitutional Court (i.e. the said act has not been passed by the Seimas, by the President of the Republic, or by the Government and it has not been adopted by referendum) – the said party, under the Constitution ... has the right to apply to the respective administrative court regarding the compliance of such a legal act (part thereof) with the Constitution (with another higher-ranking legal act).

The particularities of application by courts to the Constitutional Court

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 28 March 2006

... application by courts (those of general jurisdiction and specialised ones) to the Constitutional Court, compared with application to the Constitutional Court by other subjects specified in Article 106 of the Constitution, with a petition requesting an investigation into and a decision on whether a legal act (part thereof) passed by the Seimas, the President of the Republic, or the Government or that adopted by referendum is in conflict with a higher-ranking legal act, inter alia (and, first of all), with the Constitution, shows that application by courts is also special, because courts, having doubted about the compliance of a legal act (part thereof) passed by the Seimas, the President of the Republic, or the Government or that adopted by referendum with a higher-ranking legal act, inter alia (and, first of all), with the Constitution, not only may, but also must, apply to the Constitutional Court.

In this context, it should be noted that, under the Constitution, a court of general jurisdiction or a specialised court (established under Paragraph 2 of Article 111 of the Constitution) may apply to the Constitutional Court with a petition requesting an investigation into and a decision on whether not any constitutional law (part thereof) is in conflict with the Constitution, but only such a constitutional law that must be applied in the respective case considered by that court, also whether not any law (part thereof) (as well as the Statute of the Seimas (part thereof)) is in conflict with the Constitution and constitutional laws, but only the one that must be applied in the respective case considered by that court, also whether not any substatutory legal act (part thereof) of the Seimas is in conflict with the Constitution, constitutional laws, laws, as well as with the Statute of the Seimas, but only the one that must be applied in the respective case considered by that court, also whether not any act (part thereof) of the President of the Republic is in conflict with the Constitution, constitutional laws, and laws, but only the one that must be applied in the respective case considered by that court, as well as whether not any act (part thereof) of the Government is in conflict with the Constitution, constitutional laws, and laws, but only the one that must be applied in the respective case considered by that court.

Such a requirement is also applicable to the court decisions to apply to the respective administrative court with a petition requesting an investigation into and a decision on whether a legal act (part thereof) that is applicable in a case and whose verification in terms of its compliance with higher-ranking legal acts (inter alia (and, first of all), with the Constitution) is assigned to the jurisdiction of administrative courts is in conflict with the Constitution (another higher-ranking legal act).

It should be noted that the Constitution does not tolerate any such situations where a certain court that, in a case considered by it, must apply a legal act (part thereof) concerning whose compliance with a higher-ranking legal act, inter alia (and, first of all), with the Constitution, another petitioner (for example, another court) has already applied to the Constitutional Court neither (if it doubts the compliance of the said legal act (part thereof) with a higher-ranking legal act, inter alia (and, first of all), with the Constitution) suspends the consideration of the respective case and applies to the Constitutional Court in order that these doubts would be removed nor (if it does not doubt the compliance of the said legal act (part thereof) with a higher-ranking legal act, inter alia (and, first of all), with the Constitution) applies this legal act (part thereof), but once it has the information that another petitioner (for example, another court) has already applied to the Constitutional Court concerning the compliance of that legal act (part thereof) with a higher-ranking legal act, inter alia (and, first of all), with the Constitution, suspends the consideration of the case and does not decide the case on the merits until the Constitutional Court completes the consideration of the respective case following the petition of the said another petitioner.

The powers of courts to fill legal gaps ad hoc

The Constitutional Court's decision of 8 August 2006

The removal of legal gaps (without excluding a legislative omission) is a matter of the competence of the respective (competent) law-making subject. However, it is also possible, to a certain extent, to fill legal gaps that are in lower-ranking legal acts in the course of the application of law (inter alia, by making use of legal analogy, by applying general legal principles, as well as higher-ranking legal acts, first of all, the Constitution), thus, also in the course of the interpretation of law (inter alia, when this is done by courts of general jurisdiction and specialised courts (established under Paragraph 2 of Article 111 of the Constitution), which administer justice and decide, within their competence, individual cases and must interpret law so that they would be able to apply it). At the same time, it needs to be emphasised that a court can fill a legal gap that is in a lower-ranking legal act only ad hoc, i.e. by this way of the application of law, a legal gap is removed only as regards the particular social relationship due to which a concrete dispute is decided in the respective case investigated by that court. On the other hand, the judicial (ad hoc) removal of legal gaps creates the preconditions for developing the uniform case law in deciding cases of a certain category – the law consolidated in judicial precedents; the law consolidated in judicial precedents can be changed or modified later by the legislature (or another competent law-making subject), when it regulates certain social relationships by means of a law (or another legal act), thus removing a particular legal gap already not ad hoc, but by the prospective legal regulation of a general nature.

Thus, it is possible to completely remove legal gaps (as well as legislative omissions) only when the law-making institutions issue the respective legal acts. Courts cannot do this. They can fill the legal gaps that are in lower-ranking legal acts only ad hoc, since courts administer justice, but they are not legislative institutions (in the positive and broadest sense of this term); such a limitation on the possibilities of courts in this area is especially evident when gaps in substantive law are confronted. However, in all cases there is an undeniable possibility for courts to fill ad hoc a legal gap that is in a lower-ranking legal act. If such powers of courts were denied or not recognised, if the possibilities of courts to apply law, first of all, supreme law – the Constitution – depended on whether a certain law-making subject did not leave gaps in the legal regulation (legal acts) adopted by it, and if courts were able to decide cases only after these legal gaps are filled by way of lawmaking, then it would have to be stated that courts, when they decide cases, apply not law, not, first of all, supreme law – the Constitution – but only a law (in the general sense of this term), that they administer justice not according to law, but only formally apply articles (parts thereof) of legal acts, that constitutional values, inter alia, the rights and freedoms of a person, may be injured (and may be neither compensated nor redressed) only because the respective law-making subject has not legally regulated certain relationships (or has legally regulated them, but not intensively enough), i.e. that although certain values are consolidated in the Constitution, they, under the Constitution, are not properly defended and protected. This would not be in line with the social and constitutional mission of courts. Besides, this would mean that law is treated only as its textual form and is identified with its textual form.

It has been held in this decision of the Constitutional Court that legal gaps (including legislative omissions) that are in lower-ranking legal acts may be filled ad hoc when courts, within their competence, decide cases concerning an individual social relationship and when they apply (and interpret) law. Therefore, in cases where, instead of the legal regulation that was declared by the Constitutional Court in conflict with a higher-ranking legal act, inter alia, with the Constitution, the respective law-making subject has not passed a legal act (acts) (parts thereof) that would establish a new (different) legal regulation harmonised with the said higher-ranking legal acts, inter alia, with the Constitution, courts have the constitutional duty to ensure the rights and freedoms of a person who applies to a court regarding the violation of his/her rights or freedoms and they must ensure other constitutional values; thus, courts have the powers, which stem from the Constitution, to apply, inter alia, the general principles of law, as well as higher-ranking legal acts, and, first of all, the Constitution – supreme law; otherwise, it would have to be held that the Constitution itself prohibits courts from administering justice, but this would absolutely be unjustifiable from the constitutional standpoint. In the course of the application of law, also in cases where, instead of a legal regulation ruled by the Constitutional Court to be in conflict with a higher-ranking legal act, inter alia, the Constitution, the respective law-making subject has not passed a legal act (acts) (parts thereof) that would establish a new (different) legal regulation harmonised with the said higher-ranking legal acts, inter alia, the Constitution, courts must follow inter alia, the constitutional concept of human rights and freedoms, the maxim recognising the innate nature of human rights and freedoms consolidated in the Constitution, the constitutional principles of a state under the rule of law, justice, legal certainty and legal security, proportionality, the due process of law, and of the equality of the rights of persons, as well as the constitutional principle of legitimate expectations (which, as held in the Constitutional Court's ruling of 13 December 2004, implies that, in certain exceptional cases, it is also necessary to protect such acquired rights of a person arising from legal acts ruled later in conflict with the Constitution (or in conflict with the Constitution and/or laws where the said legal acts are substatory) that, if not defended or protected, would result in greater harm to the person, other persons, society, or the state than harm inflicted in cases of the [total] or partial defence or protection of the said rights). If, in cases where, instead of a legal regulation ruled by the Constitutional Court to be in conflict with a higher-ranking legal act, inter alia, the Constitution, the respective law-making subject has not passed a legal act (acts) (parts thereof) that would establish a new (different) legal regulation harmonised with the said higher-ranking legal acts, inter alia, the Constitution, courts evaded for certain reasons implementing their constitutional powers to apply, inter alia, the general principles of law, as well as higher-ranking legal acts, first of all, the Constitution – supreme law – and, thus, evaded ensuring human rights and freedoms, it would have to be held that courts do not carry out their constitutional purpose of the administration of justice, that they ignore the constitutional principles of a state under the rule of law and justice, the general legal principle of ubi ius, ibi remedium, the provision of Paragraph 1 of Article 6 of the Constitution, whereby the Constitution is an integral and directly applicable act, also that a person might sustain damage and remain unprotected, his/her rights and freedoms, as well as legitimate interests and legitimate expectations, might be non-secured only because a certain law-making subject, i.e. a state institution, has not performed its constitutional duty – where, instead of a legal regulation ruled by the Constitutional Court to be in conflict with a higher-ranking legal act, inter alia, the Constitution, the respective law-making subject has not passed a legal act (acts) (parts thereof) that would establish a new (different) legal regulation harmonised with the said higher-ranking legal acts, inter alia, the Constitution. This would not only shatter the trust of that person in the state and law in substance, but also, if such practice became widespread, might create the preconditions for the thriving of such arbitrariness of state power where it does not act in the way it is obliged to act, as well as for legal nihilism and, in the long run, for distrust by an increasingly greater part of society or even entire society in the state and its law.

However, it needs to be emphasised once again that, when courts exercise these constitutional powers, legal gaps are not removed for good – they are only filled ad hoc; still, this allows ensuring the protection of the rights and freedoms of a person who applies to a court regarding the defence of his/her violated rights precisely in that individual social relationship due to which the respective case is considered in a court of general jurisdiction or in a specialised court, established under Paragraph 2 of Article 111 of the Constitution. This should also motivate a competent law-making subject to remove, more speedily and in a proper manner, an existing legal gap, i.e. to establish a missing legal regulation instead of the one ruled to be in conflict with the Constitution.

The right of a judge to become familiar with a state secret or other classified information (Articles 109 and 117 of the Constitution) (on the protection of a state secret (other classified information) in court proceedings, see 9.1.6. Court proceedings and court decisions, the ruling of 15 May 2007)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 15 May 2007

Paragraph 1 of Article 109 of the Constitution, whereby, in the Republic of Lithuania, justice is administered only by courts, gives rise to the duty of courts to consider cases justly and objectively, as well as to adopt reasoned and substantiated decisions; therefore, there may not be any such a legal situation where a court would not be able to have access to such case material that contains information constituting a state secret (or other classified information). In its ruling of 19 December 1996, the Constitutional Court held that “the right of a judge who investigates a case to have access to information that is considered a state secret is based on Article 109 of the Constitution ... as well as on Article 117 of the Constitution” and that “the right of a judge to have access to information that is considered a state secret and is necessary for the investigation of a case is determined by the function of a court as a state institution to administer justice, but not by entering the position of a judge on the list of certain positions”.

The continuity of the jurisprudence of courts (court precedents)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 24 October 2007

The constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law implies the continuity of jurisprudence. The instance system of courts of general jurisdiction, which is consolidated in the Constitution, must function in such a way that would create the preconditions for developing the uniform (coherent, consistent) case law of courts of general jurisdiction, i.e. such that would be based on the principles of a state under the rule of law, justice, and the equality of all persons before the law (and other constitutional principles), which are enshrined in the Constitution, as well as on the maxim (inseparably linked with the said principles and arising from them) that the same (analogous) cases must be decided in the same way, i.e. they must be decided not by creating new court precedents, competing with the existing ones, but by taking account of the already consolidated ones. When ensuring the uniformity (coherence, consistency) (which arises from the Constitution) of the case law of courts of general jurisdiction and, thus, the continuity of jurisprudence, the following factors (along with other important factors) are also of crucial importance: courts of general jurisdiction, when adopting decisions in cases of certain categories, are bound by their own precedents – decisions in analogous cases; courts of general jurisdiction of lower instance, when adopting decisions in cases of certain categories, are bound by decisions of courts of general jurisdiction of higher instance – precedents in cases of the same categories; courts of general jurisdiction of higher instance, while reviewing decisions of courts of general jurisdiction of lower instance, must assess these decisions by always following the same legal criteria; these criteria must be clear and known ex ante to subjects of law, inter alia, to courts of general jurisdiction of lower instance (thus, the jurisprudence of courts of general jurisdiction must be predictable). The already existing precedents in cases of certain categories that were created by courts of general jurisdiction of higher instance are not only binding on courts of general jurisdiction of lower instance that adopt decisions in analogous cases, but also on courts of general jurisdiction of higher instance that created those precedents (inter alia, the Court of Appeal of Lithuania and the Supreme Court of Lithuania). Courts must follow such a concept of the content of particular provisions (norms, principles) of law (including such a concept of the application of such provisions of law) that was formed and was followed when applying these provisions (norms, principles) in previous cases, inter alia, when previously deciding analogous cases. Disregarding the maxim that the same (analogous) cases must be decided in the same way, which arises from the Constitution, would also mean disregarding the provisions of the Constitution on the administration of justice, that of the constitutional principles of a state under the rule of law, justice, the equality of people before the court, and other constitutional principles. The case law of courts of general jurisdiction in cases of particular categories must be modified and new court precedents in cases of the same categories may be created only when this is unavoidably and objectively necessary and when this is constitutionally reasoned and justified. Such modification of the case law of courts of general jurisdiction (deviation from previous precedents, which was binding on courts until then and the creation of new precedents) must in all cases be properly (clearly and rationally) argued in the respective decisions of courts of general jurisdiction. Neither creating new court precedents nor arguing (substantiating) court precedents may be such volitional acts that are not rationally and legally motivated. No creation or reasoning of a new court precedent may be determined by accidental (from the aspect of law) factors. It is such modification – only when this is unavoidably and objectively necessary, and when this is properly (clearly and rationally) argued in all cases – of the case law of courts of general jurisdiction (deviation from previous precedents that were binding on courts by then and the creation of new precedents) that must be respectively ensured by the Court of Appeal of Lithuania and the Supreme Court of Lithuania within their competence. If the said requirements arising from the Constitution are disregarded when court decisions are adopted, this would create the preconditions for the incompatibilities and incoherence both in the case law of courts of general jurisdiction and in the legal system, the jurisprudence of courts would become less predictable, and there would be grounds for doubts as to whether particular courts of general jurisdiction are impartial when adopting decisions, and whether such decisions are subjective in other aspects. The instance system of courts of general jurisdiction, which stems from the Constitution, may not be interpreted as restricting the procedural independence of courts of general jurisdiction of lower instance: even though ... under the Constitution, when adopting decisions in cases of certain categories, courts of general jurisdiction of lower instance are bound by decisions of courts of general jurisdiction of higher instance – precedents in cases of the said categories, courts of general jurisdiction of higher instance (and their judges) may not interfere in cases considered by courts of general jurisdiction of lower instance or give them any instructions, either obligatory or recommendatory, on how certain cases must be decided, etc.; from the aspect of the Constitution, such instructions (whether obligatory or recommendatory) given by certain courts (judges) would be regarded as acting ultra vires. Under the Constitution, case law is formed only when courts decide cases themselves. The imperatives (which stem from the Constitution and are discussed in this ruling of the Constitutional Court) of both the activity of courts of general jurisdiction and the legal regulation governing such activity are also mutatis mutandis applicable to the activity of specialised courts (established under Paragraph 2 of Article 111 of the Constitution) and the legal regulation governing their activity.

Thus, court precedents are sources of law – auctoritate rationis; the reference to the precedents is a condition for uniform (coherent, consistent) case law, as well as that of the implementation of the principle of justice, which is consolidated in the Constitution. Therefore, it is not permitted to unreasonably ignore court precedents. In order to perform this function properly, precedents themselves should be clear. Court precedents may not be in conflict with the official constitutional doctrine.

On the other hand, it is not permitted to overestimate, let alone make absolute, the significance of court precedents as sources of law. Court precedents must be invoked with particular care. It needs to be emphasised that, in the course of the consideration of cases by courts, only those previous decisions of courts have the power of precedent that were created in analogous cases, i.e. a precedent is applied only in those cases whose factual circumstances are identical or very similar to the factual circumstances of a case in which the respective precedent was created and with regard to which the same law should be applied as in the case in which such a precedent was created. In a situation where there is the competition of precedents (i.e. when there are several differing court decisions adopted in analogous cases), it is necessary to follow a precedent that was created by a court of higher instance (higher level). Also, account should be taken of the time of the creation of a precedent and of other significant factors as, for instance: the fact whether a certain precedent reflects the established court practice or whether it is a single occurrence; whether the reasoning of a decision is convincing; the composition of a court that adopted the respective decision (whether such a decision was adopted by a single judge, or by a panel of judges, or whether by the enlarged panel of judges, or whether by a court (its chamber) in its entire composition); whether there were any separate opinions of judges expressed; the possible significant (social, economic, etc.) changes that took place after the adoption of the respective court decision that has the significance of a precedent, etc. As mentioned before, in cases where the modification of case law is unavoidably and objectively necessary, courts may deviate from previous precedents that were binding on courts until then, and create new precedents; however, this must be done by properly (clearly and rationally) arguing it. It needs to be especially emphasised that, when deviating from its previous precedents, a court must not only properly argue an adopted decision (i.e. a created precedent) itself, but it also must clearly set out the reasoning and arguments substantiating the necessity to deviate from a previous precedent.

One of the necessary conditions for ensuring the uniformity (coherence, consistency) of case law and, thus, also the continuity of jurisprudence is the accessibility of precedents of courts of general jurisdiction of all levels and of all specialised courts, established under Paragraph 2 of Article 111 of the Constitution, where the said accessibility is determined by the creation of the respective information systems and ensuring the organisational and technical possibilities for courts (judges) to have access to decisions (precedents) previously adopted by courts in analogous cases.

The duty of a court, if it has doubts, to apply to the Constitutional Court concerning the constitutionality of a legal act applicable in a case considered by that court (Article 110 of the Constitution); application by a court to the Constitutional Court with a petition requesting the interpretation of a final act passed by the Constitutional Court

Paragraph 1 of Article 110 of the Constitution prescribes that judges may not apply any laws that are in conflict with the Constitution; Paragraph 2 of the same article stipulates that, in cases where there are grounds to believe that a law or another legal act that should be applied in a concrete case is in conflict with the Constitution, the judge suspends the consideration of the case and applies to the Constitutional Court, requesting that it decide whether the law or another legal act in question is in compliance with the Constitution. If a court, after it has faced doubts about the compliance of a legal act applicable in a case with the Constitution, did not suspend the consideration of the case and did not apply to the Constitutional Court so that those doubts would be removed, and if the legal act whose compliance with the Constitution is doubtful were applied in the case, such a court would take the risk of adopting such a decision that would not be a just one (rulings of 16 January 2006 and 28 March 2006).

Under the Constitution, the grounds for initiating a constitutional justice case at the Constitutional Court are doubts faced by a court (judge) that is considering a concrete case as to the conformity of a legal act applicable in that case with the Constitution (another higher-ranking legal act): such doubts must be removed so that the said court could adopt a just decision (another final court act) in that case. It is only the Constitutional Court that may remove such doubts (i.e. deny or confirm their reasonableness) within its competence (ruling of 24 October 2007).

In its ruling of 28 March 2006, the Constitutional Court held the following:

- if a petitioner – a court considering a case – applies to the Constitutional Court, requesting an investigation into and a decision on whether a legal act (part thereof) passed by the Seimas, the President of the Republic, or the Government or that adopted by referendum, where the said legal act is applicable in that case, is in conflict with a higher-ranking legal act, inter alia (and, first of all), with the Constitution, and, if the Constitutional Court does not decide this question on the merits, the doubts of the said court about whether the respective law or another legal act (part thereof) is in conflict with a higher-ranking legal act, inter alia (and, first of all), with the Constitution, will not be removed and, if it applies such a law or another legal act (part thereof), the values, inter alia, the constitutional rights of a person, which are consolidated, defended, and protected by the Constitution, could be violated;

- application by courts (those of general jurisdiction and specialised ones) to the Constitutional Court, compared with application to the Constitutional Court by other subjects specified in Article 106 of the Constitution, with a petition requesting an investigation into and a decision on whether a legal act (part thereof) passed by the Seimas, the President of the Republic, or the Government or that adopted by referendum is in conflict with a higher-ranking legal act, inter alia (and, first of all), with the Constitution, shows that application by courts is also special because courts, having doubted about the compliance of a legal act (part thereof) passed by the Seimas, the President of the Republic, or the Government or that adopted by referendum with a higher-ranking legal act, inter alia (and, first of all), with the Constitution, not only may, but also must, apply to the Constitutional Court;

– under the Constitution, a court considering a certain case where such a court, under the Constitution, not only may, but also (if it has certain doubts) must, apply to the Constitutional Court with a petition requesting a decision on whether the respective legal act (part thereof) passed by the Seimas, the President of the Republic, or the Government or that adopted by referendum is in conflict with a higher-ranking legal act, inter alia (and, first of all), with the Constitution, also has the constitutionally justifiable interest to receive a particular answer from the Constitutional Court and that such an answer will be given; a different interpretation of the respective provisions of the Constitution could create the preconditions for a court considering a case to apply such a law or another legal act (part thereof) whose compliance with the Constitution (with another higher-ranking legal act), in the opinion of the said court, is doubtful.

In its acts, the Constitutional Court has held more than once that the purpose of the institution of the interpretation of rulings and other final acts of the Constitutional Court is to reveal the content and meaning of certain provisions of a ruling or another final act of the Constitutional Court more broadly and in more detail where this is necessary so that the proper execution of that ruling or another final act would be ensured and the said ruling or another final act of the Constitutional Court would be followed.

Thus, if a court considering a case applies to the Constitutional Court with a petition requesting the interpretation of certain provisions of a ruling or another final act of the Constitutional Court, and if the Constitutional Court does not interpret such provisions of its ruling or another final act and does not reveal the content and meaning thereof more broadly and in more detail where this is necessary in order to ensure the proper execution of that ruling or another final act of the Constitutional Court so that the said ruling or another final act of the Constitutional Court would be followed, the values, inter alia, the constitutional rights of a person consolidated, defended, and protected by the Constitution could be violated, which would mean that justice would not be administered.

... the right of the Constitutional Court, which is consolidated in ... the Law on the Constitutional Court, to officially interpret its ruling, inter alia, on its own initiative, means that the Constitutional Court interprets its rulings or other final acts, i.e. reveals the content and meaning of these acts more broadly and in more detail where this is necessary in order to ensure the proper execution of the respective ruling or another final act of the Constitutional Court and in order to ensure that the respective ruling or another final act of the Constitutional Court would be not formally, but properly followed and that justice consolidated, protected, and defended by the Constitution would be administered. The ex officio powers of the Constitutional Court to interpret its rulings or other final acts also mean that the Constitutional Court may interpret its rulings or other final acts where this is necessary so that acts adopted by the Constitutional Court would be followed properly while administering justice irrespective of the fact whether the respective petition of the subjects indicated in the Law on the Constitutional Court is present.

In view of the said circumstances, it needs to be held that, having established the constitutionally justifiable interest of the petitioner – a court considering a case – to remove doubts regarding the proper execution of rulings or other final acts (provisions thereof) of the Constitutional Court in order that justice would be properly administered in a case considered by that court, the Constitutional Court may accept requests to interpret certain provisions of a ruling or another final act of the Constitutional Court and investigate these requests in the manner prescribed by law, as well as pronounce a decision on such interpretation.

The powers of courts to interpret notions used in legal acts

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 18 April 2012

... the Constitutional Court has held that such questions of the application of law that have not been decided by the legislature may be decided by courts when they consider disputes regarding the application of the respective legal acts (parts thereof). Thus, when applying laws and other legal acts, courts must interpret notions employed therein in the course of deciding cases under their consideration.

The right of a court (judge) to have access to all case material and/or material significant for a case (inter alia, material constituting a state secret or other classified information) (Articles 109 and 117 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's decision of 3 July 2013

... the purpose and constitutional competence of the judiciary is to administer justice; courts have the duty to consider cases in a fair and objective manner, as well as to adopt reasoned and substantiated decisions; the adoption of a just court decision constitutes a constitutional value; every final court act must be based on legal arguments (reasoning); the rights of a person must be defended not in a perfunctory manner, but in reality and effectively; the justice administered by a court in a perfunctory manner is not the justice that is consolidated, protected, and defended by the Constitution.

It needs to be noted that, in order for a court to properly fulfil its constitutional obligation to administer justice, inter alia, in reality and effectively, and not to defend the violated rights and freedoms of a person only in a perfunctory manner, under the Constitution, such a legal regulation must be established that could ensure the right of a court (judge) that considers a case to have access to all case material and/or material significant for the case.

Thus, under the Constitution, no such situation is allowed where, in the course of the fulfilment of its constitutional obligation to administer justice and, having the duty to consider a case justly and objectively, a court would be forced to adopt a decision without having any possibility of access to all case material and/or the material significant for the case, inter alia, material constituting a state secret or other classified information, irrespective of the fact whether the court has permission, which is issued under the [law], to work with or have access to classified information. If a court had to adopt a decision without a comprehensive assessment of all case material and/or material significant for the case, inter alia, material constituting a state secret or other classified information, the adopted decision could not be substantiated properly and the preconditions would be created for the adoption of an unjust decision. It would mean that, in the name of the Republic of Lithuania, the court implemented not the justice that is consolidated in the Constitution, but, according to the Constitution, no justice at all. In such a way, the constitutional concept of a court as an institution implementing justice in the name of the Republic of Lithuania would also be denied.

... the duty of the state to guarantee the protection of the secrecy of information constituting a state secret (or other classified information) and the possibility for a court to adopt a just decision may not be opposed.

... certain requirements are imposed on persons who are granted the right to have access to information that constitutes a state secret; such requirements are related to the reliability and loyalty of such persons to the State of Lithuania; the said requirements should be linked with the trust of the state in that person.

In this context, it needs to be noted that, as the Constitutional Court has held on more than one occasion, judges are subject to special professional requirements; a judge must feel greatly responsible for how he/she administers justice – performs the obligation established for him/her in the Constitution; only the persons with high legal qualification and having experience of life may be appointed as judges (ruling of 21 December 1999); judges must meet very strict ethical and moral requirements: their reputation must be impeccable (ruling of 27 November 2006).

Consequently, the fact that a person is appointed as a judge and is entrusted with the administration of justice in the name of the Republic of Lithuania shows the trust of the state in that person; thus, it is presumed that there is no ground for doubting his/her reliability and loyalty to the State of Lithuania.

In view of the foregoing arguments, the conclusion should be drawn that ... courts (judges) considering a case have the right in all cases to have access to case material and/or material significant for the case where such material constitutes a state secret (or other classified information), irrespective of whether they have permission, which is issued under [the law], to handle or have access to classified information.

The duty of a court to follow European Union law and apply it properly and, in the event of doubts regarding the interpretation or validity of the provisions of European Union law, to refer to the Court of Justice of the European Union for a preliminary ruling

... the duty of a court, stemming from Paragraph 1 of Article 109 of the Constitution and the constitutional principle of justice, to adopt a fair decision, inter alia, implies the duty of a court to follow law and apply it properly when examining a case.

... under Paragraph 2 of the Constitutional Act of the Republic of Lithuania on Membership of the Republic of Lithuania in the European Union, which is a constituent part of the Constitution, the norms of European Union law are a constituent part of the legal system of the Republic of Lithuania; where it concerns the founding Treaties of the European Union, the norms of European Union law are applied directly, while in the event of the collision of legal norms, they have supremacy over the laws and other legal acts of the Republic of Lithuania. In view of this, it should be noted that the duty, stemming from Paragraph 1 of Article 109 of the Constitution and the constitutional principle of justice, for a court to follow law and apply it properly also includes the duty to follow European Union law and apply it properly.

The full participation of the Republic of Lithuania, as a Member State, in the European Union is a constitutional imperative based on the expression of the sovereign will of the Nation; full membership of the Republic of Lithuania in the European Union is a constitutional value (rulings of 24 January 2014 and 19 November 2015 and the decision of 16 May 2016); the constitutional imperative of full participation by the Republic of Lithuania in the European Union also implies the constitutional obligation of the Republic of Lithuania to properly implement the requirements of European Union law (decision of 20 December 2017).

Article 1 of the Constitutional Act on Membership of the Republic of Lithuania in the European Union, which is a constituent part of the Constitution, is relevant in this respect: "The Republic of Lithuania as a Member State of the European Union shall share with or confer on the European Union the competences of its state institutions in the areas provided for in the founding Treaties of the European Union and to the extent it would, together with the other Member States of the European Union, jointly meet its membership commitments in those areas, as well as enjoy membership rights."

... the Constitution, inter alia, Paragraph 1 of Article 109 thereof, the constitutional principle of justice, the constitutional imperative of full participation by the Republic of Lithuania in the European Union, as well as Articles 1 and 2 of the Constitutional Act on Membership of the Republic of Lithuania in the European Union, give rise to the duty of a court, in order to properly interpret the provisions of European Union law that are applicable in a case under its consideration, to refer to the Court of Justice of the European Union with a request for a preliminary ruling in the event of doubts regarding the interpretation or validity of the said provisions of European Union law.

The duty of a court to fairly resolve the issue of the distribution of costs between the parties

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 14 December 2018

... the duty of a court, stemming from Paragraph 1 of Article 109 of the Constitution and the constitutional principle of justice, to adopt a fair decision implies, inter alia, the duty to fairly resolve the issue of the distribution of costs between the parties.

It should be noted in this context that the prohibition, arising from Paragraph 1 of Article 109 of the Constitution and the constitutional principles of justice and a state under the rule of law, for the legislature to establish such a legal regulation that would deny the powers of a court to administer justice, inter alia, means that the legislature must not establish such a legal regulation that would preclude a court from resolving the issue of the distribution of costs between the parties in a fair manner by taking into account all circumstances of the case.

It should also be noted that the fair distribution of costs between the parties depends on the good faith of the parties, the reasonableness and necessity of the costs incurred by them, the extent to which their claims have been satisfied after the court has settled the case, and other significant circumstances, inter alia, where the cause of certain incurred costs is the fact that the court, in order to adopt a fair, reasoned, and well-grounded decision in the case, has fulfilled its constitutional duty to apply to the Constitutional Court or another court having jurisdiction over the compliance of the legal act applicable in the case with higher-ranking legislation, or its constitutional duty to refer to the Court of Justice of the European Union for a preliminary ruling. When deciding on the fair distribution of costs incurred by the parties due to the fact that the court has fulfilled the said constitutional duty, the court may take into account the fact that its application to the Constitutional Court or another court having jurisdiction over the compliance of the legal act applicable in the case under consideration with higher-ranking legislation, or its reference to the Court of Justice of the European Union, is aimed not only to examine the particular case in a fair manner, but also to ensure the supremacy of the Constitution and the constitutional imperative of the rule of law in the legal system, as well as the constitutional obligation of the Republic of Lithuania to properly implement the requirements of European Union law. In view of the importance for the legal system of such an application by a court to the Constitutional Court or another court having jurisdiction over the compliance of the legal act applicable in the case under consideration with higher-ranking legislation, or in view of the importance for the legal system of such a reference by a court to the Court of Justice of the European Union, the legislature may provide that the necessary and reasonable costs (or part thereof) incurred by the parties as a result of such an application or reference by the court are compensated from the state budget.

The investigation of the factual circumstances on which an individual substatory legal act is based falls within the competence of a court applying to the Constitutional Court for the assessment of the constitutionality of the said legal act

... the investigation of the factual circumstances and data that form the basis of individual substatory legal acts, as well as the assessment of the reasonableness and sufficiency of data, primarily falls within the competence of the courts considering the respective cases (inter alia, the rulings of 13 August 2007 and 2 March 2018).

9.1.6. Court proceedings and court decisions

The administration of justice in criminal cases (Paragraph 1 of Article 109 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 16 January 2006

... The administration of justice is a function of courts and it determines both the place of the judiciary in the system of institutions of state power and the status of judges. Neither any other state institution nor any other state official may exercise this function (rulings of 21 December 1999 and 13 May 2004).

Under the Constitution, inter alia, Article 109 thereof, and under the principles of a state under the rule of law and justice, in the course of criminal proceedings, a court has the duty to make use of all possibilities in order to establish the objective truth in a criminal case and to adopt a just decision in respect of a person who is accused of committing a criminal act. A court of first instance also has such a duty. The Constitutional Court has held that, in criminal procedure law, the provision of Paragraph 1 of Article 109 of the Constitution, whereby justice is administered only by courts, means that, inter alia, during a trial, a court of first instance, when carrying out this function, must thoroughly, fully, and objectively investigate all circumstances of a criminal case and decide the case on its merits (ruling of 5 February 1999).

Under Paragraph 1 of Article 111 of the Constitution, the courts of the Republic of Lithuania are the Supreme Court of Lithuania, the Court of Appeal of Lithuania, regional courts, and district courts. These courts constitute the system of courts of general jurisdiction. Paragraph 2 of Article 111 of the Constitution provides that, for the consideration of administrative, labour, family, and cases of other categories, specialised courts may be established. Thus, the instance system of courts is established in the Constitution, inter alia, in the said provisions of Paragraphs 1 and 2 of Article 111 of the Constitution. The purpose of the instance system of courts is to remove the possible mistakes of courts of lower instances, to prevent any execution of injustice, and, thus, to protect the rights and legitimate interests of a person, society, and the state.

The legislature must, by means of a law, establish such powers (jurisdiction) of all courts of general jurisdiction of all instances and of all specialised courts, established under Paragraph 2 of Article 111 of the Constitution, that would be constitutionally justifiable. In this context, it needs to be noted that the constitutional concept of the administration of justice also implies that courts must decide cases only by strictly adhering to the procedural and other requirements established in laws, without overstepping the limits of their jurisdiction, and not exceeding their other powers.

... the necessity to protect the rights and legitimate interests of a person, also the fact that a court is a state institution that, when administering justice, helps the state ensure the security of a person and all society from criminal attempts, determine certain powers of a court in criminal proceedings. In criminal proceedings, a court must be an impartial arbiter, who objectively assesses the data (evidence) in a criminal case regarding the circumstances of committing a criminal act and who adopts a fair decision concerning the guilt of a person accused of having committed the said criminal act; at the same time, in order to establish the objective truth, a court must take an active part in criminal proceedings – a court must define the limits of the consideration of a criminal case, must perform certain procedural actions, must ensure that persons participating in court proceedings do not abuse their rights or powers, and must resolve other issues related to the consideration of a criminal case in a court. While considering a criminal case, a court must act in such a way that the objective truth is established in a criminal case and the question of the guilt of a person accused of having committed a criminal act is fairly resolved. A court must also be equally just to all persons who participate in criminal proceedings.

Thus, the norms and principles consolidated in the Constitution, inter alia, the right of persons to a public and fair hearing of their case by an independent court, as consolidated in Paragraph 2 of Article 31 of the Constitution, as well as the principles of a state under the rule of law and justice, imply the model of a court as an institution administering justice where a court may not be understood as a “passive” observer of court proceedings and where the administration of justice may not depend solely on the material submitted to a court. Seeking to investigate all circumstances of a case objectively and comprehensively and to establish the truth in a case, a court has the powers either to perform procedural actions by itself or to assign certain institutions (officials), inter alia, prosecutors, to perform such actions.

In this context, it needs to be noted that the principle of the separation of powers, which is consolidated in the Constitution, determines the relationships of a court with other state institutions or officials and the nature of its actions in criminal proceedings. Courts are the only state institution that administers justice. Justice is administered by a court following a certain procedural order, which is regulated by law. It also needs to be mentioned that the constitutional function of a court – the administration of justice – is essentially different from being in charge of the pretrial investigation of a case, control over this investigation, upholding charges on behalf of the state, etc. When administering justice, a court considers a case that is already prepared, solves the issue of the guilt of a defendant and either imposes punishment on him/her or acquits him/her (rulings of 5 February 1999 and 8 May 2000).

The powers of a court in criminal proceedings to assign a pretrial investigation or separate procedural actions

See 3. Legal responsibility, 3.2. Criminal proceedings, the ruling of 16 January 2006.

The limits of the consideration of criminal cases at the court of appeal instance; the possibility for a court to overstep the limits of an appeal in the course of defending the public interest

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 21 September 2006

... as such, the principle of tantum devolutum quantum appellatum does not imply that the court of appeal instance must be restricted by the limits of an appeal when its decision could be essentially unjust and when this could violate constitutional values.

[...]

... as such, the general rule that the court of appeal instance may not overstep the limits defined in an appeal (which expresses the principle of tantum devolutum quantum appellatum) may not be regarded as groundless or unjust, as it ensures not only the speed of civil proceedings, but also the fact that there will be no intervention by the court in such areas of life where there is no dispute among private persons or such a dispute has already been solved in the court of first instance and the decision was not appealed in accordance with the procedure prescribed by law. There are no arguments that would allow stating that this general rule could in any aspect be in conflict with any provision of the Constitution, inter alia, with Paragraph 1 of Article 29 or Article 109 of the Constitution. Quite to the contrary, this rule helps to ensure the autonomy of an individual, in particular, of a private person when a court administers justice, as well as the fact that the legitimate expectations and interests of a person will not be denied.

[...]

However ... under the Constitution, the establishment of any such a legal regulation to the effect that a court, having received an application, would not be able to defend the public interest or where a court, while deciding a case, would be forced to adopt a decision that would itself violate the public interest and, thus, also a certain value (inter alia, a person's right or freedom) consolidated, defended, and protected by the Constitution, is not allowed. If a court adopted such a decision, that decision would be unjust. This would mean that, in the name of the Republic of Lithuania, such a court would administer not the justice that is consolidated in the Constitution, but, under the Constitution, no justice at all. In such a way, the constitutional concept of a court as an institution implementing justice in the name of the Republic of Lithuania would also be denied.

... it is not allowed to establish, by means of a law, any final list of cases where a court (also a court of appeal instance) is permitted to defend the public interest (inter alia, by overstepping the limits of an appeal) or any final list of cases where a court is not permitted to defend the public interest (inter alia, by overstepping the limits of an appeal).

On the other hand, it should be emphasised that the possibility for a court of appeal instance, which stems from the Constitution, to overstep the limits of an appeal while defending the public interest may not be interpreted as its purely discretionary right: such a court may overstep the said limits only when there is a constitutional basis for this, i.e. when, without overstepping them, a certain value consolidated, defended, and protected by the Constitution would be violated and, thus, a decision adopted by the court of appeal instance in the respective case would be unjust. In all cases, such a court must provide reasons for that.

Requirements for a legal regulation governing civil proceedings

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 21 September 2006

... in general, no prohibition arises from the Constitution to establish such a legal regulation governing civil proceedings whereby, in cases where a party to proceedings withdraws from the participation in the consideration of a civil case of its own will and refuses to cooperate in the consideration of the case, a court would have the powers to consider such a civil case and adopt a decision also where a party to the proceedings has withdrawn of its own will and does not cooperate with the court. Quite to the contrary, civil proceedings must be regulated by means of a law in such a manner that no preconditions would be created for delaying the consideration of cases, the adoption and execution of decisions, thus, participants to civil proceedings (including parties to proceedings) would be prevented from abusing their procedural and other rights and the rights of, inter alia, a party to proceedings that participates in the consideration of a civil case in good faith would not be violated. ...

At the same time, it needs to be noted that the legislature, when regulating the respective relationships by means of a law, must pay regard to the Constitution, inter alia, the constitutional principles of a state under the rule of law, the equality of rights, the public and fair consideration of cases, the impartiality and independence of judges. It is necessary to establish, in laws, such a legal regulation whereby jurisdictional institutions and other law-applying institutions would be independent and impartial, that they would seek to establish the substantive truth in a case and adopt all decisions on the grounds of law, as well as that regard would be paid to the constitutional right of a person to the due process of law, which is derived from, inter alia, the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law and is inseparably related to it.

Thus, under the Constitution, civil procedure relationships must be regulated by means of a law in such a manner that would create the legal preconditions for a court to investigate all circumstances important for a case and to adopt a just decision in such a case. And, on the other hand, it is not allowed to establish any such a legal regulation that would not permit a court, after it takes account of all important circumstances of a case and follows law, without violating the imperatives of justice and reasonableness, which arise from the Constitution, to adopt a just decision in a case and, thus, to administer justice. Otherwise, the powers of a court to administer justice, which arise from, inter alia, Article 109 of the Constitution, would be limited or even denied and the constitutional concept of a court as the institution that administers justice in the name of the Republic of Lithuania, as well as the constitutional principles of a state under the rule of law and justice, would be deviated from.

Under the Constitution, when civil procedure relationships are regulated, the right of a party to proceedings to participate in the consideration of a case directly or through a representative may not be denied, either, providing it itself has not self-removed from such participation. A party to the proceedings must be properly notified about the consideration of a case, while a court, at the beginning of the consideration of the case, must ascertain whether it has been informed about any valid reasons due to which a party to the proceedings is not participating (it has not submitted its position in writing as regards the dispute, it does not request the extension of the time limit for the submission of its position, it fails to appear at a court hearing, etc.).

The constitutional obligation of a court to decide a case justly implies that, where the court believes that, if after one party to proceedings has self-removed from participating in the consideration of the case, it will not be able to consider that case justly or to adopt a just decision, it must take all possible measures in order to ensure the participation of such a party in the consideration of the case.

It also needs to be noted that, under the Constitution, the legal regulation of civil procedure relationships must be such that those participants to proceedings that have the same legal status would be treated equally. Thus, they must also have the same rights and duties, unless there are differences of such a nature and scope that unequal treatment would be objectively justified. Otherwise, the constitutional principles of a state under the rule of law and the equality of the rights of persons would be deviated from.

The Constitution also implies certain requirements that must be complied with by the legislature when it regulates appeals against court decisions adopted after a case is considered.

For instance, in its ruling of 16 January 2006, the Constitutional Court held that, under the Constitution, a law must establish such a legal regulation that would make it possible to file an appeal with a court of at least one higher instance against a final act adopted by a court of general jurisdiction or specialised court (established under Paragraph 2 of Article 111 of the Constitution) of first instance. ... when civil procedure relationships are regulated by means of a law, also such a legal regulation must be established whereby it would be possible to file an appeal with a court of at least one higher instance against any final act that was adopted in a case by a court of first instance. It needs to be emphasised that a law must establish not only the right of a party to proceedings to file an appeal with a court of at least one higher instance against a final act that was adopted in a case by a court of first instance, but it must also establish such a procedure for filing the said appeal that would allow correcting the possible mistakes made by a court of first instance. Otherwise, the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law would be deviated from and the constitutional right of a person to the due process of law would be violated.

At the same time, it needs to be noted that the Constitution does not prevent regulating civil proceedings in such a manner that would create no legal preconditions for parties to proceedings to abuse their right to appeal against a decision adopted in their case and, thus, to delay the proceedings.

... courts must pay regard to the principles and norms of civil procedure law. It needs to be emphasised that this duty of a court may not be interpreted as allowing raising the principles and norms of civil procedure law or those of civil law above the principles and norms of the Constitution, or as permitting the interpretation of the principles and norms of civil procedure law or those of civil law in such a manner that would distort or ignore the meaning of the provisions of the Constitution.

It needs to be noted that, when account is taken of the objectives, essence, and nature of the adoption of a decision in absentia as a specific institution of civil procedure law and, especially, of the fact that such an institution is aimed at preventing both the abuse of the rights by parties and the delay of proceedings and at creating the legal preconditions for, inter alia, the protection of the rights and legitimate interests of honest parties to proceedings, certain limitations on reviewing a decision adopted in absentia are possible. Such limitations may be justified when a party to proceedings withdraws from the participation in the consideration of a civil case of its own will and when a court that is deciding whether to review a decision adopted in absentia is not provided with evidence confirming that the respective court decision is clearly unjust.

However, such legal situations are also possible where a court that is deciding whether to review a decision adopted in absentia is provided with such evidence that confirms that a certain court decision was clearly unjust and that the said decision clearly violated the rights of a person.

Requirements imposed on final court acts and on the publication thereof (inter alia, the requirement that an entire final court act (all arguments thereof) must be drawn up before it is officially passed and publicly pronounced)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 21 September 2006

... the legislature must regulate court proceedings by means of laws in such a manner that the rational organisation of court work would be ensured.

When interpreting Article 109 of the Constitution in the context of other provisions of the Constitution, inter alia, that of the constitutional principles of a state under the rule of law, justice, the due process of law, legal clarity, legal certainty, and the publicity of law, in its ruling of 16 January 2006, the Constitutional Court held that:

“The constitutional imperatives that only courts administer justice, that law must be public, as well as the requirement, stemming from the Constitution, that a case must be considered in a fair manner, also imply that every court judgment (or another final court act) must be based on legal arguments (reasoning). The argumentation must be rational: a court judgment (or another final court act) must contain as many arguments as necessary in order that it would be sufficient to substantiate such a court judgment (or another final court act). In this context, it needs to be noted that the requirement of legal clarity, which arises from the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law, means, inter alia, that a court judgment (or another final court act) may not contain any concealed arguments or any non-specified circumstances that are important for adopting a fair court judgment (or another final court act). Court judgments (other final court acts) must be clear for the persons participating in a case and for other persons. If this requirement is disregarded, then this is not the administration of justice that is consolidated in the Constitution.

While interpreting Article 109 of the Constitution in the context of the requirements of legal clarity, legal certainty, and legal publicity, as well as the requirement that human rights and freedoms, which arise from the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law, must be ensured, it needs to be noted that the administration of justice also implies that a court judgment (or another final court act) is an integral legal act in which the operative part is based on the arguments set out in the part of reasoning. This means, inter alia, that when a court judgment (or another final court act) is officially published, it must contain all arguments upon which it is based, that the arguments (or part thereof) of a court judgment (or another final court act) may not be submitted by a court after the official publication of such a court judgment (or another final court act), and that, after the official publication of a court judgment (or another final act of the court), such a court may not change or otherwise modify its arguments.

In this context, it needs to be noted that, if such a court judgment (or another final court act) were published officially that would not be based on legal arguments or would be based only on a certain part of such arguments, while the remaining part of the arguments would be made public after the official publication of such a court judgment (or another final court act), justice would not be administered – there would always be a reasonable doubt that such arguments only seek to justify such a court judgment (or another final court act) that was adopted a priori.

Under the Constitution, the legislature has the powers to establish reasonable time limits within which a reasoned court judgment (or another final court act) must be published and, if necessary, to establish exceptions to the establishment of the general rules.

It needs to be emphasised that the said requirements concerning a judgment (or another final court act), its reasoning, publication, and time limits are mutatis mutandis applicable not only to criminal proceedings, but also to other types of legal proceedings.”

... it needs to be emphasised that no cited doctrinal provision of the Constitutional Court’s ruling of 16 January 2006 may be interpreted as the one that constitutionally obligates a court not only to draw up its final act (decision, judgment, order, ruling) before it is adopted and published, but also to pronounce it in the courtroom by reading aloud the entire text of that final act (which sometimes may be very long).

At the same time, it needs to be noted that the legislature, while seeking to ensure the rational organisation of court work and by taking account of the particularities of individual kinds of proceedings, may provide, by means of a law, certain specially discussed exceptions when a final court act need not be read aloud in the courtroom; in such cases, a final court act must be pronounced publicly in another way. It needs to be emphasised that, when the said exceptions are established by means of a law, no preconditions may be created by which the rights and freedoms of a person and other constitutional values would be violated.

Of course, while paying regard to the constitutional imperative of the publicity of law, the introductory and operative parts of an adopted final court act, which is signed by the judges, must be pronounced publicly by reading them aloud in the courtroom (save the said exceptions). As regards reading aloud other parts of a final court act in the courtroom, the legislature may also establish a different legal regulation; such a legal regulation would most appropriately conform to various provisions of the Constitution (inter alia, the requirement of the publicity of law) where a court would be able in each case to decide, at its discretion, as to which part or parts of its final act must be pronounced publicly by reading them aloud in the courtroom, save the introductory and operative parts, which must always be read aloud in the courtroom (save the said exceptions). If a final court act is adopted and signed by all judges who have considered the respective case, the non-reading aloud of part of the act should not be regarded as deviation from justice, the publicity of law, and other constitutional imperatives. The most important thing here is not that an entire final court act (inter alia, all arguments substantiating it – the reasoning of its adoption) should be read aloud in the courtroom, but that it all would be drawn up before that final court act is adopted, i.e. before the judges vote on it and sign it, and before such a final court act is publicly pronounced, also that, straight after the court hearing in which the respective final court act is pronounced, immediately, i.e. within the reasonable and shortest possible time, the said final court act (its copy) would be accessible to the parties to the case, to other participants of the proceedings with respect to whom such a final court act directly gives rise to certain legal effects, as well as to institutions that must execute the respective court decisions.

By means of each final court act, justice is administered in a particular case. A final court act adopted in a certain case is one act of the application of law, whereby that case is completed. Thus, a final court act is one legal act, one document, but not several legal acts (documents), let alone not several legal acts (documents) that are drawn up and signed at a different time. A final court act must be an integral act. As an integral legal act, it must be signed by all judges who have considered the respective case. A final court act must not be ambiguous; it must be clear and comprehensible already at the time when a decision on the merits of the considered issue is adopted and publicly pronounced, but it must not be such an act that would make the parties and other participants to the proceedings guess why and due to what actual reasons precisely this court decision in question and not a different court decision was adopted.

It needs to be especially emphasised that the requirement for the integrity of a final court act (by which justice is administered in a particular case) expresses such a characteristic of the said act without which this act would not be an act of the administration of the justice that is provided for in the Constitution; thus, under the Constitution, it would not be an act of the administration of justice.

The requirement of the integrity of a final court act, which arises from the Constitution, also means that the operative part of such an act must always, without exceptions, be substantiated by the circumstances and arguments that are expressis verbis set out in the fact-finding part and/or the reasoning part (if, according to laws, there must be a separate fact-finding part or a separate reasoning part). Thus, a final court act may not, under any circumstances, be “stitched” from separate fragments (separate documents), which are drawn up at a different time.

It needs to be held that the requirement of the integrity of a final court act, which arises from the Constitution, and the constitutional imperative that a court adopts decisions in the name of the Republic of Lithuania, that a final court act, regardless of whether it is pronounced in its entirety (by reading it aloud) in the courtroom, or whether only its introductory and operative parts are pronounced, or whether it is made public in another way (if this is one of the exceptions discussed in this ruling of the Constitutional Court, which is constitutionally allowed), must always be signed by all the judges who have considered the case. If such a court decision is not confirmed by the signatures of the judges (or if some of its fragments as separate documents are signed by the judges, while other fragments are not or are signed by not all of the judges), it should not be regarded as a final court act and its reasonableness and lawfulness may be questioned.

A law must establish such a legal regulation that would effectively guarantee that decisions that have not been signed by judges will not be adopted or pronounced and that, where such decisions are still adopted, there must be the possibility of challenging them.

... it needs to be especially emphasised that the drawing up of any final court act (decision, judgment, order, ruling) before its official adoption (i.e. before the judges vote on it and sign it) and its official pronouncement is not an objective in itself; rather, it is a means allowing ensuring that all circumstances important for the case will be established precisely before a certain final court act is officially adopted and publicly pronounced, that all important arguments will be assessed and all of them weighed properly before that final court act is officially adopted, that legal acts will be properly applied, etc. The fact is of no less importance that the drawing up of a final court act before it is officially adopted and publicly pronounced is one of the means making it possible to achieve such a situation where all judges of the panel (in cases where a case is considered not by one judge, but by a panel of judges) will equally understand all the arguments substantiating a final court act (even if they will interpret and assess these arguments differently), because only after the arguments – the reasoning of its adoption – substantiating a final court act are drawn up, it is possible to verify and ascertain that they are not inconsistent or that they do not conflict with one another and are without other faults and, if this is so – to modify these arguments; therefore, it is necessary that such arguments be drawn up before a final court act is officially adopted and pronounced.

Thus, the drawing up of a final court act before its official adoption and public pronouncement is one of the legal guarantees that justice will be administered in the respective case; if it were otherwise, i.e. if a final court act were not substantiated by legal arguments or were substantiated only by a certain part of arguments, while the other part of arguments were drawn up and made public later, after the public pronouncement of the respective final court act, justice would not be administered, since there would always be a reasonable doubt whether such arguments drawn up later seek to justify a final court act adopted a priori; thus, there would also be a doubt as to whether such a final court act is actually substantiated solely by arguments (reasoning) that are formally drawn up therein.

At the same time, it needs to be noted that the legislature has the unquestionable powers to establish, by means of a law, a structure of a final court act, inter alia, the fact that in a final court act there should be a separate part or parts where certain circumstances of a case, arguments, etc. must be set out. In addition, the legislature, while taking account of the variety of types of considered cases, the particularities of legal proceedings in consideration of cases of certain categories, and other important factors, may also establish, by means of a law, a different structure of final court acts for cases of certain categories and/or for certain courts.

However, under the Constitution, it is not permitted to establish any such a legal regulation whereby a court must or could adopt, at its discretion, let alone adopt and publicly pronounce, its final acts not in their entirety, but only a certain part or parts thereof, inter alia, their operative part, which is not substantiated by arguments drawn up, i.e. set out expressis verbis, or by circumstances specified in that final act, and whereby such arguments could be drawn up and the relevant circumstances could be specified after some time.

As mentioned before, a final court act must be clear and comprehensible already at the time when a decision on the merits regarding the considered issue is adopted and publicly pronounced, but it must not be such an act that would make the parties and other participants to the proceedings guess why and due to what actual reasons precisely this court decision in question and not a different court decision was adopted.

In this context, it needs to be mentioned that, if a final court act is drawn up not in its entirety before it is officially adopted and publicly pronounced, especially when its operative part is pronounced before the arguments substantiating the final court act – the reasoning of adopting it – are drawn up, then during the whole time until these arguments (reasoning) are drawn up, there will always be the possibility that a certain judge or judges of the panel that has considered the case and adopted the decision on the merits (which was set out in the operative part of the respective final court act), due to certain circumstances in life, from which no one is immune, which are always possible and may fall upon any individual (for example, sickness, an accident, or even death), will not be able to continue his/her participation in drawing up the arguments substantiating the said court decision (its operative part) that had already been adopted and publicly pronounced. Consequently, in such cases, a final court act in general will not be able to be drawn up; although publicly pronounced (i.e. although its operative part has been pronounced), it will remain unfinished and not fully fledged, or the said arguments will be drawn up (will be signed) not by all judges of the panel, but only by some of them; in other words, the composition of the court will not be exactly the same. While, if a case was investigated not by a panel of judges, but by a single judge, the said circumstances in life, should they occur, would lead to a situation where there would be no one who could draw up the arguments substantiating a final court act – the reasoning of adopting it – after its operative part is adopted and publicly pronounced. It is clear that, in such cases, justice would be administered only formally; thus, in reality, it would not be administered.

Summing up, it needs to be held that the Constitution does not tolerate any such a legal and factual situation where a final court act (decision, judgment, order, ruling) is officially adopted and publicly pronounced not in its entirety, inter alia, when the operative part (in which a decision on the merits is set out) is officially adopted and publicly pronounced, while the arguments substantiating the operative part (i.e. a court decision set out in the operative part) – the reasoning of adopting such a final court act – are drawn up later, post factum.

Under the Constitution, such final court acts are not regarded as acts of the administration of justice, which, under the Constitution, are adopted in the name of the Republic of Lithuania; quite to the contrary, such final court acts themselves can create the preconditions for violating the rights and freedoms of a person and other values consolidated, defended, and protected by the Constitution.

The protection of state secrets (other classified information) in court proceedings; the right of a judge to have access to a state secret or other classified information (Articles 109 and 117 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 15 May 2007

When revealing the content of the constitutional institution of a state secret, it should ... be noted that the Constitution consolidates the grounds for the protection of information that is not subject to publication, inter alia, a state secret, when courts consider and decide cases: Paragraph 1 of Article 117 of the Constitution provides that, "In all courts, the consideration of cases shall be public" and that "A closed court hearing may be held in order to protect the secrecy of private or family life, or where the public consideration of the case might disclose a state, professional, or commercial secret". Thus, the constitutional principle of the public consideration of cases in courts is not absolute or without exceptions, inter alia, as regards the fact that there can be a closed court hearing if publicity posed the threat that a state secret might be disclosed.

Paragraph 1 of Article 109 of the Constitution, whereby, in the Republic of Lithuania, justice is administered only by courts, gives rise to the duty of courts to consider cases justly and objectively, as well as to adopt reasoned and substantiated decisions; therefore, there may not be any such a legal situation where a court would not be able to have access to such case material that contains information constituting a state secret (or other classified information). In its ruling of 19 December 1996, the Constitutional Court held that "the right of a judge who investigates a case to have access to information that is considered a state secret is based on Article 109 of the Constitution ... as well as on Article 117 of the Constitution" and that "the right of a judge to have access to information that is considered a state secret and is necessary for the investigation of a case is determined by the function of a court as a state institution to administer justice, but not by entering the position of a judge on the list of certain positions".

The possibilities for parties to a case considered by a court to have access to information that constitutes a state secret (as well as other classified information), where the court decides that this information may be regarded as evidence in the case, must be defined in laws; it is necessary to establish such a legal regulation that would create the conditions for a court considering a case to protect state secrets (as well as other classified information) from such disclosure that could inflict harm on the public interest protected by the Constitution.

In view of the fact that, on the one hand, the necessity to protect information constituting a state secret (or other classified information) is a public interest and, on the other hand, it is necessary to ensure the right of a person to judicial protection, a law must establish the grounds, procedure, and conditions for access to information constituting a state secret (or other classified information) in the course of the consideration of a case by a court, provided the court decides that information in question may be regarded as evidence in the case; it is also necessary to establish such a legal regulation governing the respective procedural actions that would ensure the compliance with the constitutional principle of proportionality and would maintain a balance between the two said constitutional values – the protection of a state secret (or other classified information) as a public interest and the rights and freedoms of a person that are defended by the said person in a court. It is necessary to establish such a legal regulation whereby a court could administer justice without denying any of these values.

Consequently, a law must establish such a legal regulation whereby, on the one hand, a party to a case may request the court to declare certain information that constitutes a state secret (or other classified information) to be evidence in the said case (if such information, in the opinion of the said party, has an evidential value) and, on the other hand, the court must every time decide whether such a request is a justified one and whether it may be granted (either in its entirety or in part) according to the law, whether, in the case where it is granted (either in its entirety or in part), the public interest (to ensure the protection of a state secret (or other classified information)), as well as the values consolidated, defended, and protected by the Constitution, inter alia, the rights and freedoms of other persons, as well as international obligations of the Republic of Lithuania, will be harmed. As such, the said right of a party to a case to request the court to declare such information that constitutes a state secret (or other classified information) to be evidence in the respective case does not imply that the court must grant such a request (either in its entirety or in part) or that the said party must have access to information constituting a state secret (or other classified information); the fact that certain information constituting a state secret (or other classified information) could be evidence in a certain case depends on many factors that must be taken into account by the court. In this context, it should be mentioned that, as it has been held by the Constitutional Court, the public interest is dynamic and subject to change (rulings of 8 July 2005 and 21 September 2006); the public interest is very varied; therefore, it is virtually impossible to say a priori in which spheres of life, due to which legal disputes may arise or in which the need may arise to apply law, threats may occur to the public interest (inter alia, the protection of secrets that must be protected under the international obligations of the Republic of Lithuania) or the need may arise to ensure the public interest by means of interference by public power institutions or officials. Thus, it is impossible to define (enumerate) a priori all situations where information that constitutes a state secret (or other classified information) may not be declared to be evidence by a court decision and, thus, parties to a case may not have access to such information. However, obviously, if a court deems that, in order to adopt a decision in the case before it and to administer such justice as consolidated in the Constitution, there is enough such evidence (material) that is not information constituting a state secret (or other classified information), then information not to be disclosed should not, in order to protect the public interest, be evidence in that case and the parties to the case may not have access to it.

It needs to be emphasised that special responsibility falls upon a court that considers a case where it decides whether certain information constituting a state secret (or other classified information) may be declared to be evidence in the respective case.

At the same time, it needs to be emphasised that no court decision may entirely be substantiated by information constituting a state secret (or other classified information), which is unknown to the parties (one party) to the case.

It also needs to be emphasised that court decisions, inter alia, decisions whereby certain information constituting a state secret (or other classified information) is not evidence in the respective case, may be appealed against in accordance with the procedure prescribed in laws.

It needs to be noted that the legal regulation governing the discussed legal relationships may have certain particularities determined by the fact whether cases are considered according to criminal procedure, civil procedure, or administrative procedure.

Filing a complaint against a final act of a court of first instance (initiating the review of such an act); the prohibition preventing courts of higher instances from assessing the lawfulness or reasonableness of such orders of courts of lower instances by which they apply to the Constitutional Court

... as held in the Constitutional Court's ruling of 21 September 2006, under the Constitution, civil procedure relationships must be regulated by means of a law in such a way that would create the legal preconditions for a court to investigate all circumstances that are important for a case and to adopt a just decision in such a case and that would make it possible to file an appeal with a court of at least one higher instance against any final act that was adopted at a court of first instance. In the same ruling, the Constitutional Court also held that a law must establish not only the right of a party to proceedings to file an appeal with a court of at least one higher instance against a final act that was adopted in a case by a court of first instance, but it must also establish such a procedure for filing the said appeal that would allow correcting the possible mistakes made by a court of first instance; otherwise, the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law would be deviated from and the constitutional right of a person to the due process of law would be violated. It was also held in the same ruling of the Constitutional Court that, "by each final court act, justice is administered in a particular case” and that “a final court act adopted in a certain case is one act of the application of law, whereby that case is completed”.

In the context of the necessity (which arises from the Constitution) to provide for the possibility of filing an appeal with a court of at least one higher instance against any final act that was adopted in a case by a court of first instance, it needs to be noted that, until the adoption of a final act by a court in a case, the court has to adopt the procedural decisions of a varied form and nature, by which such a case is not completed. Such procedural court decisions are not final acts of a court. The Constitution does not require that the possibility be ensured, by means of a law, to file a complaint against any procedural decision of a court (i.e. not a final act) adopted in a case; various exceptions are possible in this area. Attention should be paid to the fact that, as held in the Constitutional Court’s ruling of 21 September 2006, the Constitution does not prevent regulating civil proceedings in such a manner that would create no legal preconditions for parties to proceedings to abuse their right to appeal against a decision adopted in their case and, thus, to delay the proceedings.

In this context, it should be noted that the phrase “filing a complaint with a court of at least one higher instance against a final act that was adopted in a case by a court of first instance” is used in the jurisprudence of the Constitutional Court (as well as in this ruling of the Constitutional Court) in its constitutional legal meaning, but not in the manner that this phrase could be used (is used) in ordinary law. The legislature, while regulating civil procedure relationships, has a certain degree of discretion to establish various grounds and time limits for filing such a complaint, as well as various judicial institutions with which it is allowed to file a complaint against final acts of a court of first instance, and to consolidate separate institutions in civil procedure laws. In exceptional cases and only if it is possible to substantiate it constitutionally (inter alia, by the fact that it is not allowed to create any such legal preconditions that could permit parties to proceedings to abuse their right to file a complaint against a decision adopted in their case and, thus, to delay the proceedings), a law may establish (without creating any legal preconditions for violating the rights of a person or other constitutional values or for deviating from the requirements of the due process of law) such a legal regulation that would make it possible to file a complaint against certain final acts adopted by a court of first instance not with a court of higher instance, but with the court that adopted the respective final act (every such situation could be subject to constitutional review). In this respect, the notion “filing a complaint” (which, as mentioned before, is used not in the ordinary, but constitutional legal sense) encompasses not only filing the respective complaint (of appeal or cassation level) provided for in civil procedure laws, by means of which attempts are made to initiate the review of this final act (also to renew the consideration of the case), but also other situations of filing a complaint against a final act adopted by a court of first instance. In defining such situations, civil procedure laws may consolidate various notions (not only the notion “filing a complaint”), which reflect the respective separate institutions of civil procedure. However, the Constitution does not allow establishing any such a legal regulation whereby, in cases of a certain category, it would be altogether impossible in all situations to seek to initiate a review of a final act adopted by a court of first instance in the respective case, since, thus, the possibility of correcting the possible mistakes made by the court, applying law justly, and administering justice would be denied; upon establishing such a legal regulation, the constitutional concept of justice would be limited only to formal and nominal justice administered by a court and only to the appearance of justice administered by a court, but it would not mean the justice that is consolidated, protected, and defended by the Constitution; a legal regulation laid down in civil procedure laws (i.e. in ordinary law) would be placed above the principles and norms of the Constitution.

It needs to be emphasised that a court, while suspending the consideration of a case because of the application to the Constitutional Court or an administrative court, does not decide such a case on its merits, but only creates the preconditions for adopting a just final act in the said case after receiving an answer from the Constitutional Court or the administrative court. ... in cases where a court considering a case faces doubts whether a law (another legal act) applicable in the case is in conformity with the Constitution, it must apply to the Constitutional Court and request it to decide whether that law (another legal act) is in compliance with the Constitution and, until the Constitutional Court decides this issue, the consideration of the case in that court must not be continued, i.e. it must be suspended. Thus, the application to the Constitutional Court or an administrative court and the suspension of a case in which it was decided to apply to the Constitutional Court or an administrative court are procedural actions, which are inseparably interrelated.

... since a court order by which the consideration of a case is suspended and the court applies to the Constitutional Court or an administrative court does not complete the case, such an order is not a final act of the court and the Constitution does not guarantee the possibility of filing a complaint against such an order with a court of at least one higher instance.

On the other hand, the fact that the Constitution does not require that the possibility be ensured by means of a law to file a complaint against any court procedural decision (i.e. not a final act) adopted in a case does not mean that a court, while adopting such a decision, may disregard the requirements established for acts and, in particular, final acts adopted by courts. The requirements established (inter alia, regarding argumentation, clarity, and comprehensiveness) for final acts of courts are also applicable to decisions adopted by courts of general jurisdiction or by specialised courts (established under Paragraph 2 of Article 111 of the Constitution) to apply or (even though this is requested by a party to a case before that court) not to apply to the Constitutional Court with a petition requesting an investigation into and a decision on whether a legal act (part thereof) passed by the Seimas, the President of the Republic, or the Government or that adopted by referendum, where the said legal act (part thereof) must be applied in the case before the court, is in conflict with a higher-ranking legal act, inter alia (and, first of all), with the Constitution (ruling of 28 March 2006 and the decision of 5 July 2007).

It needs to be emphasised that, under the Constitution, the grounds for initiating a constitutional justice case at the Constitutional Court are doubts faced by a court (judge) considering a concrete case regarding the conformity of a legal act applicable in that case with the Constitution (another higher-ranking legal act): such doubts must be removed so that the said court could adopt a just decision (another final act) in that case. It is only the Constitutional Court that may remove such doubts (i.e. deny or confirm their reasonableness) within its competence. Thus, no court of general jurisdiction or specialised court (established under Paragraph 2 of Article 111 of the Constitution) of higher instance has the powers to assess the lawfulness and/or reasonableness of an order of a court of lower instance to suspend the consideration of a case and to apply to the Constitutional Court regarding the compliance of a legal act (part thereof) with the Constitution (another higher-ranking legal act), since, otherwise, the preconditions would be created for violating the exclusive competence of the Constitutional Court, which is established in Paragraph 1 of Article 102 of the Constitution, as well as for virtually denying the powers of a court (judge) (which are established in Paragraph 2 of Article 110 and Paragraphs 1, 2, and 3 of Article 106 of the Constitution) to suspend the consideration of a case and apply to the Constitutional Court.

The prohibition (which stems from the Constitution) preventing courts of higher instance from assessing the lawfulness and/or reasonableness of an order of a court of lower instance to suspend the consideration of a case and to apply to the Constitutional Court regarding the compliance of a legal act (part thereof) with the Constitution (another higher-ranking legal act) is also mutatis mutandis applied to the orders of courts on applying to the respective administrative court with a petition requesting an investigation into whether a legal act (part thereof) that must be applied in the particular case and the review of which in terms of its compliance with higher-ranking legal acts, inter alia (and, first of all), with the Constitution, is assigned to the jurisdiction of administrative courts, but not the Constitutional Court, is in conflict with the Constitution (another higher-ranking legal act).

The right to file an appeal against a final act of a court of first instance

... as it has been held by the Constitutional Court, the constitutional right of a person to apply to a court and the instance system of courts imply that a law must establish such a legal regulation that would make it possible to file an appeal with a court of at least one higher instance against a final act adopted by a court of general jurisdiction or specialised court (established under Paragraph 2 of Article 111 of the Constitution) of first instance (rulings of 16 January 2006, 28 March 2006, 21 September 2006, 27 November 2006, and 24 January 2007). Justice is always administered by leaving the possibility of rectifying a possible mistake or changing a judgment in the light of new circumstances (ruling of 9 December 1998). The Constitutional Court has held that a law must establish not only the right of a party to the proceedings to file an appeal with a court of at least one higher instance against any final act that was adopted in a case by a court of first instance, but also it must establish such a procedure for filing the said appeal that would allow a court of higher instance to correct the possible mistakes made by a court of first instance; otherwise, the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law would be deviated from and the constitutional right of a person to the due court process would be violated (rulings of 21 September 2006 and 24 October 2007); the said correction of mistakes made by courts of lower instance and the related prevention of injustice is the conditio sine qua non for the trust of parties to the respective proceedings and society in general not only in the court of general jurisdiction that considers the respective case, but also in the whole system of courts of general jurisdiction (ruling of 28 March 2006).

... the purpose of the institution of filing an appeal against a final act of a court of first instance is not only the defence and protection of the rights of a person (convict) who has been brought to legal responsibility, but also the defence and protection of the rights and legitimate interests of other persons, inter alia, a victim, as well as the defence and protection of the public interest and the legal order of the state.

Facts established by a court decision are res judicata

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 13 May 2010

Facts established by an effective court decision are res judicata and ... they are not proved anew.

The principle of the public consideration of cases in a court (Paragraph 1 of Article 117 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 6 December 2012

Paragraph 1 of Article 117 of the Constitution prescribes: "In all courts, the consideration of cases shall be public. A closed court hearing may be held in order to protect the secrecy of private or family life, or where the public consideration of the case might disclose a state, professional, or commercial secret."

Paragraph 1 of Article 117 of the Constitution consolidates the principle of the public consideration of cases in courts, stipulates that a closed court hearing may be held in certain circumstances, and provides for a list of such circumstances (ruling of 19 September 2000).

... the provision "in all courts" of Paragraph 1 of Article 117 of the Constitution embraces the courts of all systems, the courts of all levels, and the courts of all instances.

[...]

The principle of the public consideration of cases in a court, as consolidated in Paragraph 1 of Article 117 of the Constitution, the interest of the public to be informed, which stems from the Constitution (inter alia, from Article 25 thereof), Paragraph 5 of Article 25 of the Constitution, under which citizens have the right to receive, according to the procedure established by law, any information held about them by state institutions, as well as the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law, inter alia, the requirement for legal clarity, imply the duty of the legislature to regulate, by means of a law, the relationships of the consideration of cases in a court in such a way that would create the conditions both for the participants of proceedings and for the public, inter alia, to be aware of cases considered in courts, the composition of courts considering cases, disputes resolved in such cases, and the adopted decisions.

It needs to be noted that, under the Constitution, the public consideration of cases is not an objective in itself. The public consideration of cases is one of the conditions for administering and ensuring justice. The public consideration of cases in a court creates the preconditions for ensuring the implementation of the law expressed in the Constitution, in laws, and in other legal acts, for guaranteeing the supremacy of law, and for protecting the rights and freedoms of persons. While ensuring the principle of the public consideration of cases in a court, the legislature is obliged to pay regard to the norms and other principles of the Constitution and not to create the preconditions for violating the values (inter alia, the rights and freedoms of persons) that are consolidated, defended, and protected by the Constitution.

It also needs to be noted that the principle of the public consideration of cases in a court is not absolute. Paragraph 1 of Article 117 of the Constitution, in which the said principle is consolidated, provides both for certain exceptions to the publicity of the consideration of cases and for situations where a closed court hearing may be held: in order to protect the secrecy of private or family life, or where the public consideration of a case may disclose a state, professional, or commercial secret. Thus, under Paragraph 1 of Article 117 of the Constitution, the publicity of proceedings is limited for the purposes of protecting the private or public interest. The principle of the public consideration of cases in a court may also be limited by means of a law with a view to protecting other constitutional values. For instance, the principle of the independence of judges and courts, which is consolidated, inter alia, in Article 109 of the Constitution, gives rise to the requirement for the secrecy of deliberation by judges when adopting a decision. In addition, in order to protect human dignity, the inviolability of private life (Article 22 of the Constitution), and other values, the protection of which stems from the Constitution, it is permitted to limit, by means of a law, the publicity of separate elements of the process of the consideration of cases, inter alia, the public pronouncement of a final act of a court, and the publicity of the material of a case.

The constitutional principle of the public consideration of cases in a court likewise determines the publicity of a court hearing in which a case is considered. With a view to ensuring the publicity of a court hearing as an element of the consideration of cases in a court, the legislature must regulate the procedure for court hearings in order that the conditions are created to ensure the right of the participants of proceedings to express their opinion on all the issues that are decided in the respective case, as well as the interest of the public to be informed about court proceedings and about the adopted decisions. Paragraph 1 of Article 117 of the Constitution and other norms of the Constitution give rise to the duty of the legislature to establish such forms of a court hearing that would create the conditions for ensuring the implementation of the right of the participants of proceedings to public court proceedings, as well as the interest of the public to be informed; at the same time, the aforesaid forms of a court hearing may not create any preconditions for violating the values (inter alia, the rights and freedoms of a person) consolidated, defended, and protected by the Constitution.

The administration of justice in criminal cases (Paragraph 1 of Article 109 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 15 November 2013

... in criminal procedure law, the provision of Paragraph 1 of Article 109 of the Constitution that justice is administered only by courts, inter alia, means that, during a trial, a court of first instance, while performing this function, must thoroughly, fully, and objectively investigate all circumstances of a criminal case and decide such a case on its merits. ... courts and judges, in the course of the administration of justice, are not bound by evidence obtained during the pretrial investigation of a case: the constitutional obligation of a court is a comprehensive, thorough, and objective investigation into all material of a case and the adoption of a just decision (inter alia, the rulings of 5 February 1999 and 8 May 2000).

Under Paragraph 1 of Article 109 of the Constitution and the constitutional principles of a state under the rule of law and justice, courts have the duty not only to investigate all circumstances of criminal cases in an exhaustive and impartial manner, but also to correctly apply criminal laws, inter alia, to properly classify a criminal act committed by the accused person. A court must investigate whether a criminal act specified in the indictment was committed in the substantial circumstances specified precisely in the said indictment with the exception of the situations where the prosecutor, the private prosecutor, or the victim submit the request that the factual circumstances specified in the indictment be changed to circumstances that are different in substance. ...

... under the Constitution, inter alia, Paragraph 2 of Article 31 and Paragraph 1 of Article 109 thereof, and under the constitutional principles of a state under the rule of law and justice, the possibilities must be created for a court considering a criminal case to change, on its own initiative, the factual circumstances specified in the indictment to circumstances that are different in substance. While implementing this right, a court must inform the accused and other participants of the court trial about such a possibility, must ensure the right to be informed about the accusation, the right to defence, and the implementation of other constitutional principles of the due process of law.

The administration of justice in criminal cases (Paragraph 1 of Article 109 of the Constitution); the correction of mistakes made by courts of lower instance in establishing and assessing legally significant facts

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 26 June 2017

Paragraph 1 of Article 109 of the Constitution prescribes: "In the Republic of Lithuania, justice shall be administered only by courts."

When interpreting Article 109 of the Constitution, the Constitutional Court has held on more than one occasion (inter alia, in the rulings of 21 December 1999, 9 May 2006, and 8 May 2014) that, in the course of administering justice, courts must ensure the implementation of the law expressed in the Constitution, laws, and other legal acts, must guarantee the supremacy of law, and must protect human rights and freedoms. The constitutional concept of the administration of justice also implies that courts must decide cases only by strictly adhering to the procedural and other requirements established in laws, without exceeding the limits of their jurisdiction and without exceeding their other powers (inter alia, the rulings of 16 January 2006 and 15 November 2013). Paragraph 1 of Article 109 of the Constitution gives rise to the duty of courts to consider cases in a fair and objective manner and to adopt reasoned and well-founded decisions (inter alia, the rulings of 15 May 2007, 31 January 2011, and 8 May 2014). The principle of justice consolidated in the Constitution, as well as the provision that justice is administered by courts, means that not the adoption of a decision as such in a court, but, rather, the adoption of a just court decision, constitutes a constitutional value; the constitutional concept of justice implies not perfunctory and nominal justice administered by a court, not an outward appearance of justice administered by a court, but such court decisions (other final court acts) that are not unjust by their content; justice administered by a court only in a perfunctory manner is not the justice that is consolidated, protected, and defended by the Constitution (inter alia, the rulings of 21 September 2006, 25 September 2012, and 8 May 2014).

The Constitutional Court has noted in its jurisprudence on more than one occasion that it is not allowed to establish such a legal regulation that would prevent a court from adopting a just decision in a case and, thus, from implementing justice where the court takes into account all significant circumstances of the case, follows law, and does not violate the imperatives of justice and reasonableness stemming from the Constitution; otherwise, the powers of a court to administer justice, which stem, inter alia, from Paragraph 1 of Article 109 of the Constitution, would be limited or even denied, and the constitutional concept of courts as the institutions administering justice in the name of the Republic of Lithuania, as well as the constitutional principles of a state under the rule of law and justice, would be deviated from (inter alia, the rulings of 21 September 2006 and 6 December 2013).

The Constitutional Court held in its ruling of 16 January 2006 that the necessity to protect the rights and legitimate interests of a person, also the fact that a court is a state institution that, when administering justice, helps the state to ensure the security of a person and all society against criminal attempts, determine certain powers of a court in criminal proceedings; in criminal proceedings, a court must also be an impartial arbiter, which objectively assesses the data (evidence) in a criminal case regarding the circumstances of committing a criminal act and adopts a fair decision concerning the guilt of a person accused of having committed the criminal act; at the same time, in order to establish the truth, a court must take an active part in criminal proceedings: a court must define the limits of the consideration of a criminal case, must perform certain procedural actions, must ensure that persons participating in court proceedings do not abuse their rights or powers, and must resolve other issues related to the consideration of a criminal case before the court; while considering a criminal case, a court must act in such a way that the truth is established in the criminal case and the question of the guilt of a person accused of having committed a criminal act is fairly resolved. Under Paragraph 1 of Article 109 of the Constitution and the constitutional principles of a state under the rule of law and the right to the due court process, courts have the duty not only to investigate all circumstances of criminal cases in an exhaustive and impartial manner, but also to correctly apply criminal laws, inter alia, to properly qualify a criminal act committed by the accused (ruling of 15 November 2013).

... in view of the fact that such situations are possible where a court considering a criminal case under the appeal procedure, having examined new evidence or evidence already examined by the court of first instance, in cases where an assessment of the said evidence could lead to the conclusion that the factual circumstances are essentially different from those established by the court of first instance and that this could result in the worsening of the situation of the convicted or acquitted person, or the situation of the person against whom the case has been dismissed, is restricted ... by the legal principles of criminal procedure [non reformatio in peius (under which, while considering a case following an appeal of a convicted or acquitted person, or a person against whom the case has been dismissed, the court is prohibited from worsening the legal situation of the appellant) and tantum devolutum quantum appellatum (under which the court must verify and assess the lawfulness and reasonableness of only that part of the decision of the court of first instance regarding which the appeal has been filed)] and cannot itself correct the mistakes made by the court of first instance in establishing and/or assessing legally significant facts, it should be noted in the context of the constitutional justice case at issue that the powers of courts to administer justice, stemming from the Constitution, inter alia, Paragraph 1 of Article 109 thereof, imply that a law must establish the powers of the court of appeal instance to refer in such a situation the case back to the court of first instance for reconsideration.

[...]

... under the Constitution, a court has the duty not only to investigate all the circumstances of a case that would allow the court to adopt a fair and reasonable decision, but also to deliver this decision within the shortest possible time. The said duty implies that, having investigated and assessed evidence leading to the conclusion that the factual circumstances essentially differ from the circumstances established by the court of first instance, the court considering the criminal case under the appeal procedure should annul the judgment of the court of first instance and refer the case back to it for reconsideration only in such a case where the situation of the convicted or acquitted person, or the situation of the person against whom the case has been dismissed, could be worsened in substance.

... the legislature has broad discretion to regulate criminal procedure relationships and may establish various models for considering criminal cases before the court of appeal. However, the legislature may not establish such a legal regulation that would preclude a court of higher instance, having regard to all the circumstances of the case and following law and the imperatives of justice and reasonableness, which stem from the Constitution, from adopting a fair decision in the case and effectively ensuring the constitutional right of the person to proper and fair criminal proceedings.

Therefore, in order to ensure the right of a person to a trial within the shortest possible time, as well as to the adoption of a fair and reasonable court decision based on the circumstances of the case, and to the rights of defence, and having regard to the chosen model of the consideration of criminal cases in a court of appeal instance, the legislature can also establish other ways to remove, in the courts of higher instance, any mistakes that may be made due to some reasons by a court of lower instance in establishing and assessing legally significant facts; inter alia, the legislature can provide for the right of a prosecutor, private prosecutor, victim, or civil claimant to file (or supplement) an appeal in cases where, upon investigating and assessing the evidence in the court of appeal instance, the conclusion could be reached that the factual circumstances are essentially different from those established by the court of first instance and this can result in the worsening of the situation of the convicted or acquitted person, or the situation of the person against whom the case has been dismissed.

At the same time, it needs to be noted that ... the right of a person to a well-founded (reasoned) decision is an integral part of the constitutional right to a fair trial, which implies the need for a higher court, inter alia, a court of appeal instance, to have all procedural possibilities of adequately examining the received appeals and adopting just and well-founded (reasoned) decisions; in addition, correcting mistakes made by courts of lower instance and the related prevention of injustice is a necessary precondition for guaranteeing and encouraging trust in the judicial system by parties to a case and society in general.

The execution of effective court decisions

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 25 November 2019

... effective court decisions are binding on all institutions of state power and governance and all legal and natural persons (decision of 13 November 1997 and the ruling of 24 September 1998). By adopting and executing court decisions in the state, justice is implemented, the stability of the legal relationships established and confirmed by effective court decisions is guaranteed, and the trust of the subjects of law in the state authorities and laws is strengthened (decision of 13 November 1997). The facts established by an effective court decision are res judicata and they are not proved anew (ruling of 13 May 2010). Consequently, under the Constitution, inter alia, Article 109 thereof, according to which only courts administer justice, as well as under the constitutional principles of justice and a state under the rule of law, failure to execute effective court decisions in the absence of constitutionally justifiable grounds cannot be tolerated.

9.2. THE PROSECUTION SERVICE

The constitutional status of prosecutors (Article 118 (wording of 20 March 2003) of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 13 May 2004

Under the Constitution, the prosecution service of the Republic of Lithuania is a centralised state institution with specific authoritative powers; it is not categorised as belonging to the institutions that are indicated in Paragraph 1 of Article 5 of the Constitution, which execute state power. The prosecution service of the Republic of Lithuania is not a constituent part of judicial power.

Article 118 of the Constitution consolidates the functions of prosecutors: a pretrial investigation is organised and directed, and charges on behalf of the state in criminal cases are upheld by prosecutors (Paragraph 1); in cases established by law, prosecutors defend the rights and legitimate interests of the person, society, and the state (Paragraph 2). Paragraph 3 of Article 118 of the Constitution provides that, when performing their functions, prosecutors are independent and obey only the law.

Thus, a prosecutor is a state official that has specific authoritative powers. Under the Constitution, no one else but a prosecutor may organise a pretrial investigation and be in charge of it; also, under the Constitution, no one else but a prosecutor may uphold charges on behalf of the state in criminal cases. At the same time, it needs to be noted that, under the Constitution, the functions of a prosecutor are different from the administration of justice.

A pretrial investigation

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 16 January 2006

... the institutions of a pretrial investigation and of upholding charges on behalf of the state in criminal cases, which are consolidated in the Constitution, imply such a general constitutional model of criminal procedure according to which a pretrial investigation and the consideration of criminal cases in a court are different stages in criminal procedure.

... during a pretrial investigation, the necessary information is collected and assessed in order to decide whether the pretrial investigation must be continued and whether, after it has been completed, the respective criminal case must be referred to a court; in addition, the said information is collected and assessed in order to consider a case referred to a court and to decide it in a fair manner.

While regulating, by means of a law, a pretrial investigation and conducting such an investigation, it is necessary to follow the norms and principles of the Constitution, which, inter alia, consolidate the equality of the rights of persons, the inviolability of freedom of an individual, the prohibition on degrading human dignity, the inviolability of the human person, the inviolability of private life, the inviolability of the home of a human being, the presumption of innocence, the right of a person to judicial protection, and the right to an advocate.

A pretrial investigation must be carried out objectively, in a qualified manner, impartially, and comprehensively and such amount of information must be collected during this investigation that would be sufficient in order to decide a criminal case in a court in a fair manner.

A pretrial investigation may not be such that its deficiencies would hinder a court in its efforts to justly decide the issue of the guilt of a person in committing a criminal act. The legislature, while paying regard to the Constitution, must establish such a legal regulation whereby, in cases where a pretrial investigation is performed in a non-qualified manner, not comprehensively, or has other faults, it would be possible to carry out a pretrial investigation (or its separate actions) repeatedly.

It needs to be especially emphasised that decisions adopted during a pretrial investigation must be clear and based on legal arguments. The clarity of these decisions and the substantiation of such decisions with legal arguments is an important guarantee of the constitutional rights and freedoms of a person, inter alia, the right to fair legal proceedings, as well as the right to judicial protection.

Under the Constitution, it is impermissible to establish any such a legal regulation that would preclude the possibility of filing a complaint with a court against decisions adopted during a pretrial investigation.

... in itself, the constitutional consolidation of the ... general model of criminal procedure does not remove the possibility of regulating criminal procedure relationships in such a manner that, in certain cases (especially when account is taken of the nature, dangerousness (gravity), scale, other features of criminal acts, as well as other important circumstances), a pretrial investigation is not conducted. However, the legislature, when consolidating such a legal regulation whereby a pretrial investigation is not conducted when criminal cases of individual categories are investigated may not create any legal preconditions for burdening the administration of justice or for violating the interests of a person and society from the aspect that the right of a person and of all society, which arises from the Constitution, to security from criminal attempts is denied. In such a case, the legislature is under the duty to provide for other legal measures ensuring the possibility of collecting all information necessary in order to adopt a just court decision. ... the legislature, while regulating criminal procedure relationships, under the Constitution, is not permitted to consolidate any such a legal regulation that would prevent carrying out a pretrial investigation or separate procedural actions in order to establish the person who is suspected of committing a criminal act or the circumstances of committing such an act if it is impossible to achieve this without carrying out a pretrial investigation or performing certain procedural actions. Otherwise, the imperatives of the protection of a person and all society from criminal attempts and the right of a person to the due process of law, which arise from the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law, would be disregarded.

Under the Constitution, a pretrial investigation is organised and directed by prosecutors.

The function of prosecutors to organise and direct a pretrial investigation (Paragraph 1 of Article 118 (wording of 20 March 2003) of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 16 January 2006

Under the Constitution, no one else but prosecutors may organise and direct a pretrial investigation (ruling of 13 May 2004). The provision of Paragraph 1 of Article 118 of the Constitution, whereby a pretrial investigation is organised and directed by prosecutors, obliges the legislature to establish the powers of prosecutors in organising and directing a pretrial investigation. While regulating this, the legislature has rather broad discretion: taking account of the nature, dangerousness (gravity), scale, and other features of criminal acts, as well as of other important circumstances, the legislature may establish various forms of the organisation and direction of a pretrial investigation, certain powers of prosecutors in this procedure, etc. However, in this case, the legislature is bound by the norms and principles of the Constitution, inter alia, by the obligation, stemming from the Constitution, to ensure the security of each person and all society against criminal attempts. The said provision of Paragraph 1 of Article 118 of the Constitution gives rise to the duty of prosecutors to organise and direct a pretrial investigation in such a manner that objective and comprehensive information would be collected about a criminal act and a person who is suspected of committing this act, which, inter alia, would create the legal preconditions for a court to establish the objective truth in a criminal case and adopt a just decision concerning the guilt of a person accused of committing a criminal act.

The function of prosecutors to uphold charges on behalf of the state in criminal cases (Paragraph 1 of Article 118 (wording of 20 March 2003) of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 16 January 2006

Under the Constitution, no one else but prosecutors may uphold charges on behalf of the state in criminal cases (ruling of 13 May 2004). ... the provision of Paragraph 1 of Article 118 of the Constitution, whereby prosecutors uphold charges on behalf of the state in criminal cases, inter alia, means that, in the course of criminal procedure, charges on behalf of the state are upheld in a court and that upholding criminal charges on behalf of the state is a function of the state that can be implemented only through certain officials – prosecutors. However, the said provision of the Constitution does not prevent the legislature, when it takes account of whose interests have been violated, of the nature, dangerousness (gravity), scale, and other features of criminal acts, the will of a victim, as well as of other circumstances of importance, etc., from establishing such a legal regulation whereby, in certain cases provided for by means of a law, charges on behalf of the state are not upheld during the consideration of the case in a court. However, every case where it is stipulated that charges on behalf of the state are not upheld must be constitutionally justifiable, inter alia, no preconditions may be created that would unreasonably burden the implementation of the constitutional rights and freedoms of a person or deny them altogether. Thus, under the Constitution, the legislature may establish such a legal regulation whereby private persons (their representatives), but not prosecutors, uphold charges in certain criminal cases; in itself, such a legal regulation does not create any preconditions for violating the rights of a person to judicial protection. However, there may not be any such legal situations in which a prosecutor would not have the duty to uphold charges on behalf of the state in cases where private persons (their representatives), when upholding charges in a criminal case, are not able to efficiently defend their rights and legitimate interests (or those of the persons they are representing).

The independence of prosecutors

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 16 January 2006

The Constitutional Court has noted that the independence of prosecutors in organising a pretrial investigation and being in charge of it, as well as in upholding charges on behalf of the state in criminal cases, is a constitutional value; under the Constitution, it is not permitted to establish any such a legal regulation whereby this constitutional value would be denied or the independence of prosecutors would otherwise be restricted when they organise a pretrial investigation and direct it and when they uphold charges on behalf of the state in criminal cases (ruling of 13 May 2004). However, the independence of prosecutors, as consolidated in the Constitution, may not be interpreted as meaning that, during criminal proceedings, prosecutors are not obliged to follow laws and/or the instructions of a court (judge).

The function of prosecutors to defend the rights and legitimate interests of the person, society, and the state (Paragraph 2 of Article 118 (wording of 20 March 2003) of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 16 January 2006

... the provision of Paragraph 2 of Article 118 of the Constitution, under which, in cases established by law, prosecutors defend the rights and legitimate interests of the person, society, and the state, gives rise to the duty of the legislature to establish such situations where prosecutors must defend the rights and legitimate interests of persons, society, and the state. Also, such legal situations are possible where the rights and legitimate interests of persons, society, and the state are defended without the participation of a prosecutor. However, under the Constitution, there may not be any such legal situations where a person whose rights and legitimate interests have been or are violated, as well as if attempts are made to violate them, would not be able to defend his/her rights in courts, or with the assistance of prosecutors, or by means of any other legal instruments. Thus, the Constitution, inter alia, Paragraph 2 of Article 118 thereof, implies the duty of the legislature to establish such a legal regulation whereby, in all cases where the rights or legitimate interests of persons, society, or the state are violated, or where attempts are made to violate them, the efficient defence and protection of such rights and legitimate interests, inter alia, against criminal attempts, would be ensured.

... the provisions of Paragraphs 1 and 2 of Article 118 of the Constitution imply that a prosecutor, when defending the rights and legitimate interests of persons, society, and the state, must organise a pretrial investigation and direct it, as well as uphold charges on behalf of the state in criminal cases. Under the Constitution, the legislature has the duty to establish, by means of a law, such a legal regulation whereby prosecutors and the prosecution service of the Republic of Lithuania would be able to efficiently implement this constitutional obligation.

The prohibition precluding prosecutors from participating in the activity of political parties (Paragraph 3 of Article 118 (wording of 20 March 2003) of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 14 April 2006

... the provision of Paragraph 3 of Article 118 of the Constitution, according to which, when performing their functions, prosecutors are independent and obey only the law, also implies the prohibition precluding prosecutors from being members of political parties and political organisations and from participating in their activities ...

The independence of prosecutors (Paragraph 3 of Article 118 (wording of 20 March 2003) of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's decision of 16 January 2014

... Paragraph 3 of Article 118 (wording of 20 March 2003) of the Constitution consolidates expressis verbis the principle of the independence of prosecutors. Under the Constitution, prosecutors, when performing their functions, are independent and obey only the law. Consequently, prosecutors, while performing their functions, act independently and the institutions of legislative power and executive power, inter alia, the Seimas and the President of the Republic, who participate in the process of appointing and releasing the Prosecutor General, may not interfere with the performance of the functions of prosecutors, give prosecutors any obligatory instructions as to the performance of their functions, or control the work of prosecutors while they are performing their functions.

[...]

Thus, under the Constitution, it is not permitted to establish any such a legal regulation that would deny or restrict the independence of prosecutors in organising and directing a pretrial investigation, in upholding charges on behalf of the state in criminal cases, or in defending the rights and legitimate interests of persons, society, and the state.

[...]

Consequently, under the Constitution, the Seimas is not permitted to establish any such a legal regulation that would oblige prosecutors to submit the accounts of the performance of their constitutional functions to legislative power or executive power, inter alia, any such a legal regulation that would oblige the Prosecutor General to submit the said accounts of the activity of the prosecution service of the Republic of Lithuania, which would subsequently need to be approved by the Seimas, the President of the Republic, or the Government. The establishment of the aforesaid duty would mean interference with the activities of prosecutors, who perform the functions provided for in the Constitution, and the restriction of the independence of prosecutors in performing the functions provided for in the Constitution.

... the constitutional requirement that the power of the State of Lithuania should be organised in a democratic way and that the democratic political regime must be in place in the country is inseparable from the provision of Paragraph 3 of Article 5 of the Constitution, whereby state institutions serve the people, as well as from the provision of Paragraph 2 of the same article, whereby the scope of powers is limited by the Constitution.

The principle of the balance of the values consolidated in the Constitution and the duty of the legislature to reconcile different interests and to ensure the balance of constitutional values oblige the legislature to bring the constitutional provision that state institutions serve the people in line with the constitutional principle of the independence of prosecutors. Bringing in line these constitutional values would be ensured if the Prosecutor General were obliged, by means of a law, to submit to society, as well as the Seimas and the President of the Republic, who participate in the process of the appointment and release of the Prosecutor General, information (public reports) about the implementation of the priorities of the penal policy, the defence of the public interest, the organisation of the work of the prosecution service, the directions of the activity of the prosecution service, the organisation of cooperation between the Lithuanian and foreign establishments of pretrial investigation or other institutions, time limits for the investigation of criminal acts, certain problems arising in the course of the work of the prosecution service, etc.

The independence of prosecutors; submitting information about the activity of the prosecution service to the Seimas (Paragraph 3 of Article 118 (wording of 20 March 2003) of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 30 December 2015

... under the Constitution, when implementing the possibility implied by the Constitution to regulate, by means of a law, the regular obtaining of information from a state institution (except for courts), inter alia, in the form of reports, which is significant for the implementation of its functions, the Seimas may establish that the Prosecutor General regularly, under the general procedure, submits information on the activity of the prosecution service, inter alia, an annual activity report, to the Seimas; however, it may not establish such a legal regulation under which the Prosecutor General would be obliged to provide the Seimas or the President of the Republic with information not on the summarised aspects of the activity of the prosecution service as a whole, but specifically on the fact how prosecutors of the Office of the Prosecutor General and those of territorial prosecutor's offices implement their constitutional functions.

Thus, in general, the Constitution permits accounting by the Prosecutor General ... for the activity of the prosecution service, inter alia, to the Seimas (which participates in the procedure of the appointment and release of the Prosecutor General); the Constitution also permits such a form of accounting to the Seimas as the annual activity report (its submission) of the prosecution service. However, the implementation (application) of such ... accounting and submission of the annual activity report of the prosecution service ... may not create any preconditions for violating the principle of the independence of prosecutors, which is consolidated in Paragraph 3 of Article 118 (wording of 20 March 2003) of the Constitution.

Releasing the Prosecutor General from his/her duties (Item 11 (wording of 20 March 2003) of Article 84 and Paragraphs 5 and 6 of Article 118 (wording of 20 March 2003) of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 30 December 2015

Paragraph 5 of Article 118 (wording of 20 March 2003) of the Constitution prescribes that the Prosecutor General is appointed and released by the President of the Republic upon the assent of the Seimas, whereas Paragraph 6 thereof provides that the procedure for the appointment and release of prosecutors, as well as their status, is established by law. In addition, Article 84 of the Constitution provides, inter alia, that the President of the Republic “shall, upon the assent of the Seimas, appoint and release the Prosecutor General of the Republic of Lithuania” (Item 11 (wording of 20 March 2003)).

The Constitutional Court has held that the legislature, while implementing its constitutional powers to establish the entities who appoint and release prosecutors, also to establish the length of the term of the powers of prosecutors, the procedure for their appointment and release from duties, and the grounds for their release from duties, is bound by the Constitution and, thus, also by the principle of a state under the rule of law consolidated therein, which implies legal certainty, stability, and the protection of legitimate expectations; after having established the term of the powers of the Prosecutor General, the legislature does not have the right to provide for any grounds for the release of the Prosecutor General from his/her duties before the expiry of the term of the powers of the Prosecutor General; under the Constitution, the legislature may establish only such grounds for the release of the Prosecutor General from his/her duties before the expiry of his/her powers due to which the Prosecutor General may not hold his/her office on the whole (e.g. due to such legal facts as the age provided for in the law, transference to another place of work, or the loss of citizenship of the Republic of Lithuania) (ruling of 24 January 2003).

It should be noted that, in the aforementioned Constitutional Court’s decision of 16 January 2014, the Constitutional Court also interpreted the provisions of the Constitutional Court’s rulings of 30 March 2000 and 24 January 2003 linked with the legal regulation of the release of prosecutors from their duties.

In its decision of 16 January 2014, the Constitutional Court noted the following:

- Paragraph 6 of Article 118 (wording of 20 March 2003) of the Constitution stipulates that the procedure for the appointment and release of prosecutors and their status are established by means of a law; consequently, under the Constitution, the procedure for the appointment and release of the Prosecutor General may be established exclusively in a law;

- Paragraph 5 of Article 118 (wording of 20 March 2003) of the Constitution provides that the Prosecutor General is appointed and released by the President of the Republic upon the assent of the Seimas; the law establishing the procedure for the appointment and release of the Prosecutor General must provide that the sole subject appointing and releasing the Prosecutor General is the President of the Republic, who may act so upon the assent of the Seimas;

- under Article 76 of the Constitution, the Seimas itself has the right to establish its structure and the procedure for its work; the Seimas, while referring to the Constitution, has the right to decide by itself the questions of the formation of its structural subunits and those of their competence and organisation of their work; no other state institution may interfere with these constitutional powers of the Seimas; consequently, the Statute of the Seimas must establish the procedure under which the Seimas decides on whether or not to give its assent to the proposal of the President of the Republic to appoint or release the Prosecutor General; when establishing, in the Statute of the Seimas, under what procedure the Seimas gives or does not give its assent to the proposal of the President of the Republic to appoint or release the Prosecutor General, the Seimas may not provide for any grounds for the release of the Prosecutor General from duties, since, as mentioned before, the grounds for the release of the Prosecutor General from duties may be established exclusively in a law;

- the Prosecutor General is not an official appointed or elected by the Seimas; the Prosecutor General is appointed to office and released from duties by the President of the Republic upon the assent of the Seimas; consequently, the procedure for dismissing an official upon a motion of no confidence, which is provided for in Article 75 of the Constitution and is related to the assessment of the activity of the official concerned, may not be applied to the Prosecutor General.

In its decision of 16 January 2014, the Constitutional Court [interpreted] that ... the grounds and procedure for the release of the Prosecutor General from duties must be established exclusively in a law; the Statute of the Seimas may establish, inter alia, the procedure under which the Seimas adopts a decision on whether or not to give its assent to the proposal of the President of the Republic to appoint or release the Prosecutor General.

... under the constitutional principle of the independence of prosecutors in performing the functions provided for in the Constitution, which is prescribed in the Constitution, inter alia, Paragraph 3 of Article 118 (wording of 20 March 2003) thereof, the legislature is prohibited from establishing such a legal regulation of accounting by the Prosecutor General (inter alia, the submission of the annual activity report of the prosecution service) to the Seimas under which a resolution of the Seimas on refusing to approve an annual activity report of the prosecution service would constitute a ground for the Seimas to decide to put forward the proposal to dismiss the Prosecutor General.

At the same time, it should be noted that, in general, under the Constitution, such a legal regulation is possible under which the Seimas, which participates in appointing and releasing the Prosecutor General, could propose that the President of the Republic release the Prosecutor General from his/her duties on the grounds provided for in a law.

10. LOCAL SELF-GOVERNMENT AND GOVERNANCE

10.1. STATE GOVERNANCE AND LOCAL SELF-GOVERNMENT AS TWO SYSTEMS OF PUBLIC POWER

The territorial administrative units of the State of Lithuania (Article 11 and Chapter X of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 18 February 1998

Article 10 of the Constitution states that the territory of the State of Lithuania is integral and is not divided into any state-like formations. It is this provision that contains the constitutional consolidation of the unitary state system and expresses the idea of the united and indivisible state.

However, for reasons of organising governance in a rational manner, the territories of all states, including those of unitary ones, have their own internal structure, i.e. they are divided into certain administrative units where the respective state institutions are formed. This is also provided for in Article 11 of the Constitution: "The territorial administrative units of the State of Lithuania and their boundaries shall be established by law." It is worth noting that these constitutional norms are specified and further developed by the norms of Chapter X entitled "Local Self-Government and Governance". First, the said chapter establishes not less than two levels of administrative units. Second, different systems of governance are established for administrative units of different levels: the Constitution guarantees the right of self-government for lower-level (i.e. first-level) units, while governance is organised by the Government at higher-level (i.e. second-level) administrative units.

The principle of balancing the interests of municipalities and those of the state

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 18 February 1998

... self-government implies certain freedom and autonomy of activities, as well as independence from state power institutions. Such freedom, however, is not limitless, while autonomy does not mean that it is allowed to ignore state interests. Therefore, the principle of balancing the interests of municipalities and those of the state is of utmost importance. In certain cases, this is expressed by the state in supporting municipalities in various ways and forms; in other cases, joint actions are coordinated when significant social objectives are sought; or, in still other cases, the state supervises municipal activities in the form prescribed by means of a law.

It should be noted that, in Lithuania, the self-government model is based on the centuries-old European tradition of the culture of self-government, which was later supplemented with the institution of administrative supervision that was formed on the basis of local (regional) state governance.

State governance and local self-government as two systems of public power; the principle of balancing the interests of municipalities and those of the state

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 24 December 2002

... the constitutional foundations of local self-government are established in Chapter X of the Constitution, which is entitled "Local Self-Government and Governance", as well as in other provisions of the Constitution.

When interpreting, in a systemic manner, the said provisions of the Constitution and the provisions thereof in which the constitutional grounds for the functioning of state power are established, it becomes clear that the Constitution distinguishes two systems of public power: state governance and local self-government.

Under Article 11 and Item 17 of Article 67 of the Constitution, the Seimas establishes, by means of a law, the territorial administrative units of the State of Lithuania and their boundaries. At higher-level administrative units, governance is organised by the Government according to the procedure established by law (Paragraph 1 of Article 123 of the Constitution); while the right to self-government is guaranteed to the administrative territorial units of the state, which are provided for by law (Paragraph 1 of Article 119 of the Constitution). ...

Local self-government is the power of the territorial communities of administrative units provided for by law; such power of territorial communities is formed and functions on the constitutional grounds that are different from those of state power. The Constitution does not identify self-government with state governance (ruling of 14 January 2002). State governance and local self-government, as two systems of the implementation of public power, are related; however, each of the said systems implements the functions that are characteristic of it alone.

As such, the fact that the Constitution does not identify local self-government with state governance does not mean that there is no interaction between state governance and local self-government.

It has been mentioned that Paragraph 1 of Article 119 of the Constitution provides that the right to self-government is guaranteed to the administrative territorial units of the state, which are provided for by law. Paragraph 1 of Article 123 of the Constitution provides that, at higher-level administrative units, governance is organised by the Government according to the procedure established by law. The observance of the Constitution and laws and the execution of the decisions of the Government by municipalities are supervised by the representatives appointed by the Government (Paragraph 2 of Article 123 of the Constitution). Paragraph 4 of Article 123 of the Constitution provides that, in cases and according to the procedure provided for by law, the Seimas may temporarily introduce direct rule in the territory of a municipality.

It also needs to be noted that, under Paragraph 1 of Article 120 of the Constitution, the state supports municipalities.

Thus, centralised state governance in administrative territorial units is combined with decentralisation by consolidating, by means of laws, cooperation between central state institutions and municipalities (ruling of 22 October 1996). The principle of balancing the interests of municipalities and those of the state manifests itself not only in the fact that the state supports municipalities in various ways and forms or in the fact that the state supervises, in the forms prescribed by law, the activities of municipalities, but also in the coordination of joint actions where important social objectives are sought (ruling of 18 February 1998).

It needs to be noted that, when defining, by means of a law, the competence of municipalities and organising state governance in the territory of a municipality, regard must be paid to the constitutional principles of freedom and independence of the activities of municipalities within their competence defined by the Constitution and laws, as well as to the principles of balancing the interests of municipalities and those of the state. Therefore, it is not permitted to create opposition between, on the one hand, the principle of balancing the interests of municipalities and those of the state, which is consolidated in the Constitution, and, on the other hand, the constitutional principles of freedom and independence of the activities of municipalities within their competence defined by the Constitution and laws.

It has been mentioned that the Constitution does not identify local self-government with state governance. State governance is implemented through state power establishments and other state institutions indicated in the Constitution and laws. The right of self-government is implemented through self-government institutions – municipal councils; municipal councils form bodies that are accountable to them. The constitutional principles upon which the organisation of state power and the organisation of self-government are based overlap only in part.

State governance and local self-government as two systems of public power; interaction between state governance and local self-government

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 8 July 2005

The Constitutional Court, when interpreting Paragraph 2 of Article 120 of the Constitution in the context of other provisions of the Constitution (inter alia, those that consolidate the constitutional concept of local self-government), has held in its rulings that state governance and local self-government are two systems of public power, which are established in the Constitution. They are not identical. In the Constitution, local self-government is consolidated as a local system of public administration, which functions, within the competence defined in the Constitution and laws, on discretionary grounds and is not under direct jurisdiction of institutions of state power, i.e. local self-government is consolidated as the self-administration and discretion of the territorial communities of administrative units established in laws. Local self-government is the power of the territorial communities of administrative units, which is formed and functions on the constitutional grounds that are different from those of state power. Each aforementioned system of public power performs its own specific functions. On the other hand, a self-governing territorial community constitutes part of the entire national community – the civil Nation; therefore, it is not allowed to create opposition between the public interest of municipalities – territorial communities and the public interest of the entire national community, which must be guaranteed by state institutions within their competence. There is interaction between state governance and local self-government, which manifests itself, inter alia, in the following ways: centralised state governance in territorial administrative units is combined with decentralisation; laws consolidate cooperation between the institutions of central power and municipalities; the state supports municipalities in various ways and forms; and the state supervises (in forms defined by means of laws) the activity of municipalities and coordinates the joint actions of the state and municipalities when important social objectives are sought (rulings of 18 February 1998, 13 June 2000, 28 June 2001, 14 January 2002, 24 December 2002, 30 May 2003, and 13 December 2004).

10.2. LOCAL SELF-GOVERNMENT

The constitutional foundations of local self-government*The Constitutional Court's ruling of 24 December 2002*

The constitutional foundations of local self-government are established in Chapter X of the Constitution, which is entitled “Local Self-Government and Governance”, as well as in other provisions of the Constitution.

When interpreting the concept of local self-government, which is established in the Constitution, it needs to be noted that, under Paragraph 1 of Article 119 of the Constitution, the right to self-government is guaranteed to the administrative territorial units of the state, which are provided for by law, and this right is implemented through the respective municipal councils; under Paragraph 2 (wording of 20 June 2002) of the same article, the members of municipal councils are elected for a four-year term, as provided for by law, from among the citizens of the Republic of Lithuania and other permanent residents of the respective administrative units by the citizens of the Republic of Lithuania and other permanent residents of these administrative units on the basis of universal, equal, and direct suffrage by secret ballot; under Paragraph 3 of the same article, the procedure for the organisation and activities of self-government institutions are established by law; under Paragraph 4 of the same article, for the direct implementation of the laws of the Republic of Lithuania, as well as the decisions of the Government and the municipal council, the municipal council forms executive bodies accountable to it.

Various aspects of the constitutional concept of self-government are established not only in Article 119 of the Constitution, but also in the provisions of other articles of the Constitution: the provision of Article 11, whereby the territorial administrative units of the State of Lithuania and their boundaries are established by law; the provision of Item 17 of Article 67, whereby the Seimas establishes the administrative division of the Republic; the provision of Paragraph 1 of Article 120, whereby the state supports municipalities; the provision of Paragraph 2 of the same article, whereby municipalities act freely and independently within their competence defined by the Constitution and laws; the provision of Paragraph 1 of Article 121, whereby municipalities draft and approve their budgets; the provision of Paragraph 2 of the same article, whereby municipal councils have the right, within the limits and according to the procedure provided for by law, to establish local levies and may provide for tax and levy concessions at the expense of their own budgets; the provision of Article 122, whereby municipal councils have the right to apply to a court regarding the violation of their rights; the provision of Paragraph 2 of Article 123, whereby the observance of the Constitution and laws and the execution of the decisions of the Government by municipalities are supervised by the representatives appointed by the Government; the provision of Paragraph 3 of the same article, whereby the powers of the representatives of the Government and the procedure for the execution of their powers are established by law; the provision of Paragraph 4 of the same article, whereby, in cases and according to the procedure provided for by law, the Seimas may temporarily introduce direct rule in the territory of a municipality; the provision of Article 124, whereby the acts or actions of municipal councils or of their executive bodies or officials that violate the rights of citizens or organisations may be appealed against before a court; the provision of Paragraph 1 of Article 127, whereby the budgetary system of the Republic of Lithuania consists of the independent state budget of the Republic of Lithuania and independent municipal budgets; the provision of Article 141, whereby persons performing actual military service or alternative service, as well as the officers of the national defence system, the police, and the interior, non-commissioned officers, re-enlistees, and other paid officials of paramilitary and security services who are not retired to the reserve, may not be members of municipal councils, etc.

The concept of local self-government

... Under the Constitution, local self-government is self-administration and discretion exercised, within their competence defined by the Constitution and laws, by the communities (i.e. territorial or local communities) of the state administrative units provided for by law, where such territorial communities are composed of permanent residents of the said units (citizens of the Republic of Lithuania and other permanent residents). The said territorial communities are the subject of the right to self-government and are referred to in the Constitution as municipalities (or local municipalities).

Thus, a municipality is the territorial community of an administrative unit of the state, which is provided for by means of a law; such a community has the right to self-government, which is guaranteed by the Constitution. In its ruling of 18 February 1998, the Constitutional Court held that the Constitution consolidates local self-government as a local system of public administration, which operates on discretionary grounds and is not directly subordinate to state power institutions. The system of municipalities is decentralised.

The freedom and independence of the activities of municipalities (Paragraph 2 of Article 120 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 24 December 2002

The provision of the Constitution that municipalities act freely and independently within their competence defined by the Constitution and laws should be regarded as a guarantee for the participation of these local communities in governing these territories (ruling of 28 June 2001).

[...]

The independence of municipalities and freedom of their activities within their competence defined by the Constitution and laws are constitutional principles. In its ruling of 13 June 2000, the Constitutional Court held that the norm of Paragraph 2 of Article 120 of the Constitution that municipalities act freely and independently may not be dissociated from the provision established in the same paragraph of the same article that the freedom and independence of municipalities are bound by the competence defined by the Constitution and laws.

Paragraph 2 of Article 120 of the Constitution provides that municipalities act freely and independently within their competence defined by the Constitution and laws. Under the Constitution, it is not permitted to establish any such a legal regulation whereby the possibility for municipalities to realise their competence directly established in the Constitution would be denied.

The constitutional provision that municipalities act freely and independently within their competence defined by the Constitution and laws also means that, if certain functions are assigned to municipalities by the Constitution or laws, municipalities perform such functions within the assigned limits. This means that a certain part of the competence of municipalities must be implemented directly and that the implementation of decisions adopted by municipal councils within the limits of their competence must not be bound by decisions (permissions, consents, etc.) of certain state institutions or officials. However, it needs to be emphasised that even the functions that exclusively belong to municipalities are regulated by means of a law. None of these functions mean that municipalities are absolutely independent in a certain area.

Funds allocated to municipalities for the fulfilment of the functions transferred to municipalities by the state

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 24 December 2002

In addition to the functions that belong exclusively to municipalities, they may be assigned to perform certain state functions; thus, more effective interaction between state power and citizens, as well as the democracy of governance, is ensured. In fulfilling these functions, the activities of municipalities are bound by the respective decisions of state power institutions and/or officials. Under the Constitution, such state functions must be transferred to municipalities by law.

In its ruling of 14 January 2002, while interpreting the provision of Paragraph 2 of Article 120 of the Constitution, whereby municipalities act freely and independently within their competence defined by the Constitution and laws, together with the provision of Paragraph 1 of Article 121 of the Constitution, under which municipalities draft and approve their budgets, and the provision of Paragraph 1 of Article 127 of the Constitution, whereby the budgetary system of the Republic of Lithuania consists of the independent state budget of the Republic of Lithuania and independent municipal budgets, the Constitutional Court held that the constitutional independence of the activities of municipalities within the limits of their competence defined in the Constitution and laws implies that, if state functions are transferred by law to municipalities, or if they are given duties by means of laws or other legal acts, funds must be provided for the implementation of these functions (duties); in addition, if, before the end of a budget year, additional state functions are transferred (duties are established) to municipalities, funds must also be allocated for this purpose. Under the Constitution, municipalities must execute laws, thus, including the laws by which municipalities are obligated to perform the state functions that are transferred to them. Municipalities would be unable to perform such duties unless their performance is guaranteed by financial means. Funds allocated to municipalities in order to fulfil the functions transferred to municipalities by the state must be provided for in the law on the state budget. The constitutional independence of the activities of municipalities within their competence defined by the Constitution and laws and the constitutionally prescribed support of the state for municipalities, as well as balancing the interests of municipalities and those of the state, imply that funds (municipal revenues and their sources) must be provided for in the state budget, necessary for ensuring the fully fledged functioning of self-government and for implementing the functions of municipalities.

The concept of a municipality

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 24 December 2002

It has been mentioned that the Constitution names the territorial communities of state administrative units (territorial communities) as municipalities (or local municipalities). On the other hand, the right of self-government is inseparable from the institutions through which the said right is implemented and/or from the organisation and the activities of the institutions that are accountable to them.

Therefore, it is not a coincidence that the Constitution employs the notion of a municipality not only in the sense of the territorial community of an administrative unit, but also in the sense of local self-government institutions and/or the institutions that are accountable to them (e.g. Paragraph 1 of Article 73, Paragraph 2 of Article 120, Paragraph 1 of Article 121, and Paragraph 2 of Article 123).

Municipal councils (Article 119 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 24 December 2002

Municipal councils as self-government institutions are directly provided for in the Constitution; the Constitution does not indicate any other self-government institutions. ... the notion “self-government institutions” expresses the constitutional mission of the respective institutions of the territorial communities of administrative units: they are institutions through which the right of self-government of the respective communities is implemented.

The implementation of the right of self-government is impossible without democratic representation. As self-government institutions, municipal councils are representative institutions. When forming municipal councils, regard must be paid to the principles of the election of municipal council members, which are established in Paragraph 2 of Article 119 of the Constitution, as well as to other requirements of the Constitution.

The active and passive electoral rights of the permanent residents of an administrative unit in the elections of municipal councils (Paragraph 2 (wording of 20 June 2002) of Article 119 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 24 December 2002

Under Paragraph 2 of Article 119 of the Constitution, the members of municipal councils are elected by the citizens of the Republic of Lithuania and other permanent residents of these administrative units on the basis of universal, equal, and direct suffrage by secret ballot; the same paragraph also provides that the members of municipal councils are elected as provided for by law. Thus, the legislature has the constitutional competence to regulate, by means of a law, the procedure for the elections of municipal council members. The discretion of the legislature in regulating the procedure for the elections of municipal council members is limited by the Constitution.

Paragraph 2 of Article 119 of the Constitution links the active electoral right of persons in the election of the members of municipal councils with the legal fact – the permanent residence of persons in the respective administrative unit. This means that the legislature has the constitutional duty to establish, by means of a law, such a procedure for determining the fact of the permanent residence of a person in the respective administrative unit that would ensure that municipal council members are elected only by persons who could reasonably be deemed permanent residents of the respective administrative units. Otherwise, the constitutional concept of local self-government would be deviated from.

Under Paragraph 2 of Article 119 of the Constitution, citizens of the Republic of Lithuania and other permanent residents of administrative units may stand for election as members of the respective municipal council.

Paragraph 2 of Article 119 of the Constitution links the passive electoral right of persons in the election of the members of municipal councils with the legal fact – the permanent residence of persons in the respective administrative unit. This means that the legislature has the constitutional duty to establish, by means of a law, such a procedure for determining the fact of the permanent residence of a person in the respective administrative unit that would ensure that municipal council members are elected only from persons who could reasonably be deemed permanent residents of the respective administrative units. Otherwise, the constitutional concept of local self-government would be deviated from.

The incompatibility of the office of a member of a municipal council with another office and the principle of the prohibition of a dual mandate

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 24 December 2002

The limitations on the passive electoral right in the election of municipal council members are established in the Constitution.

Under Article 141 of the Constitution, persons performing actual military service or alternative service, as well as the officers of the national defence system, the police, and the interior, non-commissioned officers, re-enlistees, and other paid officials of paramilitary and security services who are not retired to the reserve, may not be members of municipal councils.

[...]

The same persons may not perform the functions in implementing state power and, at the same time, be members of municipal councils, through which the right of self-government is implemented. The Constitution consolidates the principle of the prohibition of a dual mandate. Besides, it needs to be noted that, in order that they might be able to perform the functions prescribed for them in the Constitution in the course of implementing state power, the Constitution provides for a special legal status for the President of the Republic, the members of the Seimas, the members of the Government and judges, which, inter alia, includes limitations on work, remuneration, and political activities, as well as a special procedure for removal from office or for the revocation of the mandate and/or immunities, i.e. the inviolability of the person and the special procedure for applying criminal and/or administrative responsibility. Members of municipal councils, under the Constitution, do not enjoy the aforesaid immunities; therefore, under the Constitution, there may not be any such a legal situation where persons who have the said immunities are members of municipal councils. Under the Constitution, members of municipal councils must be equal in their legal status.

Under the Constitution, state officials who, according to the Constitution and laws, have the powers to control or supervise the activities of municipal councils, may not be members of municipal councils, either.

The said requirements of the Constitution do not mean that the aforementioned persons do not have the right to seek to stand for election as members of municipal councils (i.e. this does not mean that they do not have the passive electoral right in the election of members of municipal councils), but that, when there occurs a legal situation where a person indicated in Article 141 of the Constitution or a person performing the functions of state power, or a state official who, under the Constitution and laws, has the powers to control or supervise the activities of municipalities is elected a member of a municipal council, he/she, before the newly elected municipal council convenes to the first sitting, must decide whether to remain in his/her previous office or to be a member of the municipal council.

The executive bodies accountable to municipal councils (Paragraph 4 of Article 119 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 24 December 2002

Under the Constitution, decisions adopted by municipal councils are inseparable from the execution of these decisions.

Under Paragraph 4 of Article 119 of the Constitution, for the direct implementation of laws, as well as the decisions of the Government and the municipal council, the municipal council forms executive bodies accountable to it. The formation of such executive bodies is a constitutional duty of municipal councils. Decisions of municipal councils are directly implemented by the executive bodies that are accountable to them and are an inseparable part of the self-government mechanism.

The Constitution does not establish any types of executive bodies (collegial, one-person bodies) that are accountable to municipal councils or the procedure for their formation, their names, and interrelations; the functions and competence of the said bodies are established only in general terms: under Paragraph 4 of Article 119, the executive bodies accountable to municipal councils are formed for the direct implementation of the laws, the decisions of the Government, and those of municipal councils. The functions and competence of the executive bodies accountable to municipal councils are left to be established by the Seimas by means of a law. When regulating, by means of laws, the formation, functions, and competence of the executive bodies accountable to municipal councils, regard must be paid to the principles of local self-government, which are established in the Constitution: representative democracy, the accountability of executive bodies to the representation, the supremacy of municipal councils over the executive bodies that are accountable to them, etc.

The phrase “the municipal council shall form executive bodies”, which is used in Paragraph 4 of Article 119 of the Constitution, also implies that the legislature has the discretion to establish by means of a law which procedure – an election procedure or a different procedure – must be applied in order to form the said executive bodies, which of the said bodies are collegial bodies and which are one-person bodies, as well as the type of their interrelations. The legislature also has the discretion to establish, by means of a law, the structure of collegial executive bodies and the number of their members, or to leave it, under the law, to be established by municipal councils.

The principle of the accountability of executive bodies to the representation also implies that the executive bodies accountable to municipal councils must be formed for the term of office of the municipal council.

It needs to be noted that the executive bodies indicated in Paragraph 4 of Article 119 of the Constitution are institutions that are established for the direct implementation of laws, the decisions of the Government, and those of the municipal council. The said executive bodies are not the internal structural units (subunits) of municipal councils that have to ensure the work of municipal councils.

It has been mentioned that the Constitution consolidates the principle of the supremacy of municipal councils over the executive bodies that are accountable to them. Municipal councils have the powers to control the executive bodies that are formed by municipal councils and are accountable to them.

Thus, under the Constitution, the executive bodies accountable to municipal councils may not be formed from among the members of the municipal councils that establish the said bodies.

It has also been mentioned that, under the Constitution, decisions adopted by municipal councils are inseparable from the execution of these decisions and the executive bodies that are accountable to municipal councils are an inseparable part of the self-government mechanism. It needs to be noted that it is clear from the provisions of Article 141 of the Constitution and other provisions of the Constitution that military, paramilitary, and security services are separated from civil service. Thus, the persons specified in Article 141 of the Constitution, i.e. persons performing actual military service or alternative service, as well as the officers of the national defence system, the police, and the interior, non-commissioned officers, re-enlistees, and other paid officials of paramilitary and security services who are not retired to the reserve, may be neither members of municipal councils nor officials or employees of the executive bodies that are established by municipal councils and are accountable to them.

Under the Constitution, persons who perform the functions of the implementation of state power, as well as state officials who, according to the Constitution and laws, have the powers to control or supervise the activities of municipal councils, may not be officials or employees of the aforesaid executive bodies, either.

It needs to be emphasised that executive bodies that are accountable to municipal councils may not be treated as ones through which the right of self-government is implemented by territorial communities, i.e. as self-government institutions, since, under Paragraph 1 of Article 119 of the Constitution, the right of self-government is implemented through municipal councils. It has been mentioned that municipal councils have the constitutional competence to control the said executive bodies. Therefore, the said executive bodies may not replace municipal councils, or bring municipal councils under their control, or dictate them. The powers of the executive bodies may not be dominant with respect to the powers of municipal councils. It is not permitted to establish any such a legal regulation whereby executive bodies accountable to municipal councils would be equated to the municipal councils that have formed them, let alone such a legal regulation whereby the powers of the executive bodies established by municipal councils and accountable to them would restrict the powers of municipal councils, or whereby municipal councils would lose the possibility of exercising control over the executive bodies established by municipal councils and accountable to them.

The provision of Paragraph 4 of Article 119 of the Constitution, according to which, for the direct implementation of the laws of the Republic of Lithuania, as well as the decisions of the Government and the municipal council, the municipal council forms executive bodies accountable to it, also means that all decisions of the said executive bodies must be based on laws, as well as on decisions of the Government and/or those of the respective municipal councils. Under the Constitution, the executive bodies accountable to municipal councils do not have the right to adopt such decisions that are not based on laws, decisions of the Government, and/or the respective municipal councils; the said bodies also may not adopt such decisions the legal force of which would be equated to that of decisions passed by municipal councils.

It has been mentioned that the Constitution consolidates the principle of the supremacy of municipal councils over the executive bodies that are accountable to them. Consequently, under the Constitution, it is not permitted to establish any such a legal regulation whereby decisions on the issues categorised expressis verbis by the Constitution as belonging to municipalities would be adopted not by municipal councils, but by the executive bodies established by municipal councils and accountable to them.

It has been held in this ruling of the Constitutional Court that the functions and competence of the executive bodies accountable to municipal councils are left to be established by the Seimas by means of a law. However, as mentioned before, the principles of the accountability of executive bodies to the representation and of the supremacy of municipal councils over the executive bodies that are accountable to them, both of which are established in the Constitution, imply that municipal councils have the powers to control the executive bodies that are established by municipal councils and are accountable to them. Under the Constitution, the right of self-government is implemented through municipal councils; thus, all decisions adopted by the executive bodies accountable to municipal councils on the issues assigned to the competence of municipalities are subordinated to decisions of the respective municipal councils.

[...]

... When establishing, by means of a law, the competence of executive bodies accountable to municipal councils, it is necessary to observe the following provisions of the constitutional concept of local self-government: a municipal council is a municipal representative institution; a municipal council is superior over the executive bodies that are formed by it and are accountable to it; the executive bodies are formed for the realisation of the interests of municipalities, the direct implementation of laws, decisions of the Government, and those of municipal councils; municipal councils have the powers to control the executive bodies that are formed by municipal councils and are accountable to them.

The exclusive constitutional competence of municipal councils (Paragraph 1 of Article 40, Paragraph 2 of Article 41, Paragraph 4 of Article 119, Paragraphs 1 and 2 of Article 121, and Article 122 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 24 December 2002

... the competence of municipalities is expressis verbis defined in the following articles of the Constitution: Paragraph 1 of Article 40, which, inter alia, indicates municipal establishments of teaching and education; Paragraph 2 of Article 41, which, inter alia, indicates municipal schools of general education, vocational schools, and schools of further education ... Paragraph 4 of Article 119, which provides that, for the direct implementation of the laws of the Republic of Lithuania, as well as the decisions of the Government and the municipal council, the municipal council forms executive bodies accountable to it; Paragraph 1 of Article 121, which provides that municipalities draft and approve their own budgets; Paragraph 2 of Article 121, which provides that municipal councils have the right, within the limits and according to the procedure provided for by means of a law, to establish local levies and that municipal councils may provide for tax and levy concessions at the expense of their own budgets; Article 122, which provides that municipal councils have the right to apply to a court regarding the violation of their rights.

The adoption of the decisions on the municipal issues indicated in Paragraph 1 of Article 40, Paragraph 2 of Article 41, Paragraph 2 of Article 47, Paragraph 4 of Article 119, Paragraphs 1 and 2 of Article 121, and Article 122 of the Constitution is the exclusive constitutional competence of municipal councils. Under the Constitution, it is not permitted to establish any such a legal regulation that would create the legal preconditions for the executive bodies accountable to municipal councils to interfere with the exclusive constitutional competence of municipal councils in the adoption of decisions on the issues specified in Paragraph 1 of Article 40, Paragraph 2 of Article 41, Paragraph 2 of Article 47, Paragraph 4 of Article 119, Paragraphs 1 and 2 of Article 121, and Article 122 of the Constitution.

The incompatibility of the office of a member of a municipal council with the office of a state official who has the powers to control and supervise the activities of municipalities

The Constitutional Court's decision of 11 February 2004

... the statement “state officials who ... have the powers to control or supervise the activities of municipalities may not be members of municipal councils” ... of the Constitutional Court’s ruling of 24 December 2002 means, inter alia, that state officials (servants and other persons irrespective of how they are referred to in laws) who, under the Constitution and laws, have the powers to adopt decisions upon which the adoption and implementation of the decisions of municipal councils within their competence defined by the Constitution and laws depend may not be municipal council members at the same time; this statement does not mean that state officials who have the powers to conduct only organisational, technical, etc. control or supervision over the executive bodies accountable to municipal councils, as well as over municipal establishments or enterprises, may not be municipal council members at the same time.

Establishing municipal functions and the competence of municipal institutions

The Constitutional Court's decision of 11 February 2004

Under the Constitution, municipal functions and competence may be established only by means of a law.

It needs to be noted that certain competence of municipal councils is expressis verbis established in the Constitution itself. Decisions on these issues may be adopted only by municipal councils. This is the exclusive constitutional competence of municipal councils because: (1) the legislature may not stipulate that decisions on these issues are adopted not by municipal councils, but by the executive bodies accountable to them or by other municipal institutions; (2) municipal councils themselves may transfer the right to adopt such decisions neither to the executive bodies accountable to municipal councils nor to any other municipal institutions, while the legislature may not establish any such a legal regulation under which municipal councils would be permitted to transfer the right to adopt such decisions to the executive bodies accountable to municipal councils or other municipal institutions.

It was held in the Constitutional Court’s ruling of 24 December 2002 that the functions and competence of the executive bodies accountable to municipal councils are left to be established by the Seimas by means of a law. Thus, as regards the issues whereby the competence of municipal councils is not expressis verbis established in the Constitution (where such issues do not fall under the exceptional constitutional competence of municipal councils), the legislature, under the Constitution, has the powers to stipulate which decisions fall under the competence of municipal councils and which decisions are within the competence of the executive bodies accountable to municipal councils or other municipal institutions. In cases where laws provide that certain decisions are adopted by municipal councils, municipal councils may transfer the right to adopt such decisions neither to the executive bodies accountable to municipal councils nor to other municipal institutions. However, the legislature, under the Constitution, may also establish, by means of a law, such a legal regulation under which certain decisions are adopted by municipal councils, but municipal councils may transfer the right to adopt such decisions to the executive bodies accountable to them; however, in such cases, the following conditions must be met: (1) the powers of municipal councils to transfer the right to adopt certain decisions to the executive bodies accountable to municipal councils must be established expressis verbis in a law; (2) the said powers may not be transferred to such municipal institutions that, according to the law, are not executive bodies accountable to municipal councils. Still, in other cases, the legislature may, by means of a law, directly stipulate which decisions are adopted by executive bodies accountable to municipal councils.

... under the Constitution, a legal regulation established by means of a law where such a legal regulation provides that, in certain cases, municipal councils may transfer the right to adopt certain decisions to the executive bodies accountable to municipal councils may not be such that would create the preconditions for a legal situation in which the executive bodies accountable to municipal councils would replace municipal councils, or would subordinate such councils to them, or would make such bodies equal to municipal councils, or would impose the will of such bodies on municipal councils, or would make the powers of the executive bodies dominant over those of municipal councils; the said legal regulation may not be such whereby the powers of municipal councils would be restricted by those of the executive bodies established by them and accountable to them or whereby municipal councils would lose the possibility of controlling these executive bodies. If such a legal regulation were adopted, it would also violate the principle of the supremacy of municipal councils over the executive bodies that are accountable to them, which is consolidated in the Constitution and stated in the Constitutional Court's ruling of 24 December 2002; such a legal regulation would also distort both the constitutional concept of local self-government and the essence of the self-government rights of territorial communities, which implement the said rights through municipal councils.

The incompatibility of the office of a member of a municipal council with the office of the heads or officials of the establishments or enterprises that are accountable to the municipal council

The Constitutional Court's decision of 13 February 2004

Municipalities act freely and independently within their competence defined by the Constitution and laws (Paragraph 2 of Article 120 of the Constitution).

When implementing the right of self-government guaranteed by the Constitution, municipal councils, under the laws, may found municipal institutions, establishments, and enterprises.

In its decision of 11 February 2004, the Constitutional Court held that the legislature has the discretion to stipulate, by means of a law, who (whether municipal councils or executive bodies accountable to them) has the right to adopt decisions concerning the appointment of the heads of municipal establishments and enterprises, and concerning the supervision of these establishments and enterprises: the legislature has the right to stipulate that these decisions are adopted by municipal councils, or that they are adopted by executive bodies accountable to municipal councils, or that these decisions are adopted by municipal councils, or that municipal councils may transfer the right to adopt such decisions to the executive bodies accountable to municipal councils; in such a case, the powers of municipal councils to transfer the said rights to the executive bodies accountable to municipal councils must be directly indicated in a law. After a law establishes the powers of municipal councils to adopt decisions concerning the transfer of supervision over municipal establishments and enterprises to the executive bodies accountable to municipal councils, the right of municipal councils to supervise these establishments and enterprises may not be denied.

If laws provide that heads or officials of municipal establishments and enterprises are accountable to municipal councils for the activities of their or other establishments and enterprises, such heads or officials may not be members of the said municipal councils at the same time. Otherwise, the right of municipal councils (as the representation of territorial communities) to supervise the activity of the establishments and enterprises (their heads and officials) that are accountable to them would be distorted, since this would give rise to a legal situation where the heads or officials of the establishments and enterprises accountable to municipal councils would supervise themselves (their own activity) and would be accountable to themselves.

The freedom and independence of the activities of municipalities (Paragraph 2 of Article 120 of the Constitution); functions performed by municipalities

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 8 July 2005

... the content of the ... provision of Paragraph 2 of Article 120 of the Constitution, under which municipalities act freely and independently within their competence defined by the Constitution and laws, may not be interpreted separately from other provisions of the Constitution that consolidate the constitutional concept of local self-government, inter alia, the constitutional foundations of the functioning of local self-government as a system of public power and the constitutional foundations of relationships between local self-government and state governance. The majority of these provisions are set out in Chapter X “Local Self-government and Governance” of the Constitution (Articles 119–124).

In its ruling of 24 December 2002, the Constitutional Court held that, under the Constitution, certain functions are vested exceptionally in municipalities (respective competence of municipalities is directly provided for in the Constitution); moreover, municipalities may also be assigned by means of laws with the performance of certain state functions. In this regard, the concept “functions of municipalities” is a generalising one; it comprises all functions performed by municipalities according to the Constitution and laws, including those that are performed by municipalities due to the fact that, under the Constitution, these functions are assigned exceptionally to them, and those the performance of which, under the Constitution, must be guaranteed by the state, but which are performed, under laws, by municipalities or with certain participation of municipalities for which (to their institutions or officials) the respective competence (powers) is (are) established. Thus, when deciding in constitutional justice cases whether such a legal regulation that is established by means of laws and under which the performance of certain functions is transferred to municipalities is in conflict with Paragraph 2 of Article 120 of the Constitution, and whether such a legal regulation that is established by means of laws and/or substatutory legal acts of the Government and under which municipalities (their institutions or officials) are vested with certain competence (powers) required in order to perform certain functions transferred to municipalities under laws is in conflict with Paragraph 2 of Article 120 of the Constitution, account must be taken of those norms and principles of the Constitution that establish the constitutional foundations of the legal regulation of the respective social relationships; in addition, consideration should be given to the interrelations between these norms and principles, on the one hand, and the provisions of the Constitution that consolidate the constitutional concept of local self-government, on the other hand. ...

In its rulings, the Constitutional Court has held ... more than once that the provision of Paragraph 2 of Article 120 of the Constitution, whereby municipalities act freely and independently within their competence defined by the Constitution and laws, is the guarantee of the participation of local communities in governing the respective territories.

It was mentioned that, under to the Constitution, certain functions are vested exceptionally in municipalities; moreover, it is also allowed to transfer, by law, certain state functions to municipalities. It should be noted that the possibility, which stems from the Constitution, to transfer by law certain state functions to municipalities also means that the aforementioned functions may be assigned by means of a law to municipalities to a full extent or only to a certain extent. In that case, it is especially necessary to stress the requirement, which stems from the Constitution, for the clarity of a legal regulation: a legal regulation that is established by means of a law must be such where it would be clear to what extent municipalities perform a particular function and to what extent the performance of this function is left to the state.

... the performance of certain state functions, speaking objectively, must, at least to a certain extent, be transferred to municipalities, as, without doing so, it would be impossible to guarantee the effective performance of such functions.

It should be stressed that, under the Constitution, the functions of municipalities may be established only by means of a law; this may not be done by means of a substatutory legal act.

In the area regarding the legal regulation of local self-government relationships, the legislature has broad discretion. This discretion comprises not only the right of the legislature to stipulate by means of a law which functions (to a full extent or to a certain extent) are transferred to municipalities, but also to differentiate these functions, inter alia, according to freedom of decision making and, on this basis, to set the types of the functions that are transferred to municipalities. The level of the independence of municipalities when performing various functions that are established by means of laws may differ: when performing some functions, municipalities may have more independence; whereas, when performing certain other functions, freedom of the activities of municipalities is restricted by the respective decisions of state institutions and/or officials (ruling of 24 December 2002).

It should also be stressed that, when establishing the functions of municipalities and their types, the legislature must pay regard to the independence of municipalities and freedom of their activity within their competence defined by the Constitution and laws, to the principles of balancing the interests of municipalities and those of the state, as well as to the constitutional concept of local self-government.

In this context, mention should be made of the fact that, as held by the Constitutional Court in its rulings of 24 December 2002 and 13 December 2004, the constitutional provision that municipalities act freely and independently within their competence defined by the Constitution and laws also means that, provided that certain functions are assigned to municipalities by the Constitution or laws, then, to the extent that such functions are assigned to them, municipalities perform them (both the ones that are performed by them due to the fact that these functions, under the Constitution, are assigned exceptionally to municipalities and the ones the performance of which, according to the Constitution, must be guaranteed by the state; however, in order to guarantee, inter alia, more effective interaction between state power and citizens, as well as the democracy of governance, all of such functions or some of them to a certain extent are transferred by law to municipalities). However, none of these functions mean absolute independence of municipalities in a particular area; all such functions are regulated by means of a law.

The Constitutional Court has held that self-government institutions may be assigned only such functions that the said institutions would be able to perform (ruling of 14 January 2002) and that, if certain state functions are delegated to municipalities by means of laws or if laws and other legal acts create certain duties for municipalities, it is also necessary to allocate funds required for performing these functions (duties) (ruling of 24 December 2002). It was held in the Constitutional Court's rulings of 14 January 2002, 24 December 2002, and 13 December 2003 that, according to the Constitution, municipalities must execute laws, including the laws by which municipalities are obliged to perform state functions that are assigned to them, and that funds required in order to ensure the fully fledged functioning of self-government and the performance of municipal functions must be provided for in the state budget. It should be held that the Constitution (inter alia, the provision of Paragraph 1 of Article 120 of the Constitution, according to which the state supports municipalities) gives rise to the duty of the legislature to establish, by means of laws, such a legal regulation where funding to municipal functions would be ensured by taking account of the resources and material and financial capacity of the state and society, as well as other important factors. On the other hand, the constitutional duty of the legislature to establish such a legal regulation where funding for municipal functions would be ensured by taking account of the resources, material and financial capacity of the state and society, as well as other important factors, does not deny the duty of municipalities (their institutions or officials), within the competence defined by the Constitution or laws, to adopt the respective decisions so that the funds needed for performing their functions would be collected and these funds would be used in a proper manner; the aforesaid constitutional duty of the legislature does not deny the responsibility of municipalities (their institutions or officials) to properly carry out the functions transferred to them. In this context, it should be mentioned that, according to the Constitution, municipalities draft and approve their budgets (Paragraph 1 of Article 121 of the Constitution), municipal budgets are independent (Paragraph 1 of Article 127), municipal councils have the right, within the limits and according to the procedure provided for by means of a law, to establish local levies, and municipal councils may provide for tax and levy concessions at the expense of their own budgets (Paragraph 2 of Article 121 of the Constitution).

It should be noted that, according to the Constitution, there may be no such legal regulation where, having established certain functions of municipalities by means of a law, municipal institutions, and/or officials through which these functions should be performed would have no respective competence (powers). Otherwise, it would have to be stated that the functions that were transferred to municipalities by means of a law are the ones that municipalities are not able to perform.

The public interest that must also be guaranteed by local self-government as one of the systems of public power provided for in the Constitution, as well as particular tasks that are faced within a particular period by all society, the state, and territorial communities, is dynamic and subject to change. Therefore, the legislature may and, in certain cases, even must, by means of a law, change (expand, narrow, or modify otherwise) the scope and content of functions that are transferred to municipalities; it must transfer new functions that were not performed previously to municipalities and/or must stipulate that municipalities cease to perform certain functions that were performed before; the legislature may and, in certain cases, even must also correspondingly modify the competence (powers) of municipalities (their institutions or officials) needed in order to perform the functions transferred to municipalities. In doing so, the legislature must pay regard to the norms and principles of the Constitution, inter alia, the imperative, which stems from the Constitution, to establish, by means of a law, such a legal regulation where funding for municipal functions would be ensured by taking account of the resources and material and financial capacity of the state and society, as well as other important factors; moreover, if the scope of functions transferred to municipalities is changed (expanded, narrowed, or modified otherwise), the legislature may and, in certain cases, even must correspondingly modify (increase or reduce) the funding for municipal functions. It should be noted in this context that, as already held in the Constitutional Court's rulings of 14 January 2002, 24 December 2002, and 13 December 2004, if additional state functions are transferred (other duties are assigned) to municipalities prior to the end of the budgetary year, funds must also be allocated for the performance of the said functions (duties).

It should especially be stressed that, under the Constitution, it is allowed only by means of a law to change (expand, narrow, or modify otherwise) the scope and content of functions that are transferred to municipalities, to transfer new functions that were not performed previously to municipalities, and/or to stipulate that municipalities cease to perform certain functions that were performed before; this may not be done by means of a substatutory legal act.

Municipal institutions

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 8 July 2005

Municipalities perform all their functions (both the ones that are performed by them due to the fact that these functions, under the Constitution, are assigned exceptionally to municipalities and the ones the performance of which, according to the Constitution, must be guaranteed by the state; however, in order to guarantee, inter alia, more effective interaction between state power and citizens, as well as the democracy of governance, all of such functions or some of them to a certain extent are transferred by law to municipalities) and implement their competence (powers) through self-government institutions – municipal councils – the members of which have the mandate of territorial community, through executive bodies that are founded by and accountable to municipal councils, and through other institutions accountable to municipal councils (municipal establishments or enterprises). In its rulings of 24 December 2002, 17 March 2003, and 13 December 2004, the Constitutional Court held that municipal institutions are established in order to realise municipal interests and to directly implement laws, resolutions of the Government, and decisions of the municipal council; thus, under the Constitution, municipal councils, executive bodies that are accountable to them, and other institutions established by municipal councils should also be considered municipal institutions. The concept “municipal institutions” expresses the subordination of the respective institutions to a certain municipality.

In this context, it should be mentioned that the Constitution directly consolidates the grounds and procedure for forming (electing) self-government institutions – municipal councils (Paragraph 2 of Article 119 of the Constitution); moreover, the Constitution expressis verbis requires that municipal councils form executive bodies accountable to them (Paragraph 4 of Article 119 of the Constitution). In its ruling of 13 December 2004, the Constitutional Court held that, in cases under the Constitution and laws, municipal councils (representative institutions) and executive bodies accountable to them (executive institutions) are granted authoritative powers and that such municipal institutions are institutions of municipal authority and public administration.

It should be stressed that, under the Constitution, municipal councils, i.e. institutions through which the right of self-government of territorial communities is implemented, have the right to found various institutions accountable to them – municipal establishments, enterprises – that are needed in order to perform functions transferred to municipalities, whereas in cases provided for by means of a law they must found such institutions (municipal establishments or enterprises). Paragraph 2 of Article 120 of the Constitution, wherein it is established that municipalities act freely and independently within their competence defined by the Constitution and laws, and Paragraph 3 of Article 119 of the Constitution, wherein it is established, inter alia, that the procedure for the organisation and activities of self-government institutions is established by law, also imply that the legislature has the duty to lay down, by means of a law, the procedure for founding municipal establishments or enterprises, whereas municipal councils must found municipal establishments or enterprises according to the requirements set in laws.

... the legislature, while paying regard to the Constitution, may establish, by means of a law, certain conditions and/or procedures that must be followed by municipalities when implementing their rights of the founder of the establishments or enterprises founded by them; it is also allowed to establish, by means of a law, other limitations that, to a certain extent, restrict the rights of municipalities as founders of certain establishments or enterprises.

Transferring the function of supporting and protecting culture to municipalities

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 8 July 2005

It has been mentioned that certain state functions may also be transferred by law to municipalities, and that the legislature has wide discretion to stipulate, by means of a law, which functions (all or some of them to a certain extent) are assigned to municipalities. It has also been mentioned that the performance of certain state functions, speaking objectively, must, at least to a certain extent, be transferred to municipalities as, without doing so, it would be impossible to guarantee the effective performance of such functions.

... the support and protection of culture is precisely such a state function. The fact that the aforementioned state function must be transferred, at least to a certain extent, to municipalities is caused by the nature of both this function and local self-government as the self-administration and discretion, within the competence defined in the Constitution and laws, of the territorial communities of administrative units provided for in laws. The spread of culture is, first of all, its spread in the closest environment, in territorial surroundings among those who live in a particular area on whose territory certain cultural objects are located; access to culturally valuable objects implies, first of all, their accessibility to the members and residents of the respective community on whose territory particular cultural objects are located; cultural establishments (museums, theatres, libraries, concert organisations, etc.) function in certain administrative territorial units, localities; cultural monuments and other objects of culture are also located on certain territories; the local authorities (their institutions or officials) that administer such territories may not avoid the respective obligations related to the maintenance of these monuments, the ensuring of their accessibility, etc.; creators are also members of territorial communities; associations of creators function in particular administrative territorial units, thus, state support to creators and their associations may be rational and efficient only if account is taken of the local conditions in which creators act and their associations function, etc. Moreover, the state support and development of culture as a constitutionally protected and defended value would be impossible if culture were not developed in regions, separate parts of the territory of the state, separate self-governing territorial communities, which form part of the entire national community – the civil Nation.

The extent to which the performance of the function of supporting and protecting culture should be transferred to municipalities is subject to the state cultural policy. The legislature has wide discretion in this sphere. However, it must pay regard to the independence of municipalities and freedom of their activity within their competence defined by the Constitution and laws, the principles of balancing the interests of municipalities and those of the state, as well as the constitutional concept of local self-government.

At the same time, it should be noted that the fact that the support and protection of culture as a state function must, to a certain extent, be transferred to municipalities does not mean that the state (its institutions) may opt out from the performance of this function. ... an interaction exists between state governance and local self-government, which manifests itself, inter alia, in the following ways: centralised state governance in territorial administrative units is combined with decentralisation; laws consolidate cooperation between institutions of central power and municipalities; the state supports municipalities in various ways and forms; and the state supervises (in forms defined by means of laws) the activities of municipalities and coordinates the joint actions of the state and municipalities where important social objectives are sought. Thus, under the Constitution, no matter to what extent the performance of the aforementioned function is transferred to municipalities, the state still has the duty to ensure that this function is performed properly.

... under the Constitution, the functions of municipalities may be established only by means of a law; this may not be done by means of a substatutory legal act. In this context, it should also be mentioned that the support and protection of culture is not consolidated expressis verbis in the Constitution as a function that is assigned exceptionally to municipalities (respective competence of municipalities is not directly consolidated in the Constitution). Thus, the duty of municipalities to perform (to a certain extent) the function of supporting and protecting culture may be established only by means of a law; it is also allowed to establish the respective competence of municipalities only by means of a law. Such laws are subject to the legal clarity requirements, which stem from the Constitution: the legal regulation established therein must be such where it would be clear to what extent municipalities perform this function and to what extent the performance of this function is left to the state.

Due to the fact that, under the Constitution, it is not allowed to assign to self-government institutions any such functions that they would not be able to perform, the legislature is under the duty to establish, by means of a law, such a legal regulation that, taking into account the resources, material and financial capacity of the state and society, as well as other important factors, would ensure (to a certain extent) the financing (inter alia, from the state budget) of the function of supporting and protecting culture when the said function is transferred to municipalities. Municipalities (their institutions or officials), whose councils have the powers, under the Constitution, to draw up and approve independent budgets, also have the duty to adopt decisions within their competence defined by the Constitution and laws so that funds necessary for performing their functions are raised and used in a proper manner; they are responsible for a proper performance of functions transferred to them. However, it should be held that the constitutional consolidation of culture as a national value of universal importance does not permit placing on municipalities alone the burden of providing funds to the institutions that contribute to the development of culture.

In order to perform (to the established extent) the function of supporting and protecting culture, which is transferred to them, and to implement their competence in this area, municipalities may and, in certain cases, must have particular institutions that contribute to the development of culture (inter alia, institutions or enterprises that provide public cultural services), which are founded, reorganised, restructured in any other way, or liquidated by municipalities (their institutions) in line with requirements established in laws.

When paying regard to the Constitution, the legislature may establish, by means of a law, certain conditions and/or procedure that must be followed by municipalities in implementing their rights of the founder of institutions or enterprises (inter alia, the establishments or enterprises that provide public cultural services) that are founded by them and contribute to the development of culture; in addition, the legislature may establish, by means of a law, other limitations that restrict to a certain extent the rights of municipalities as the founders of particular establishments or enterprises and ensure that municipalities would properly perform the function of supporting and protecting culture, which is transferred to them (to the established extent).

The state cultural policy must be dynamic ... its formation and implementation are modified by taking various factors into account. Therefore, the content of the function of supporting and protecting culture, which is transferred to municipalities by means of a law, may be changed by means of a law, and the extent of the performance of this function, which is assigned to municipalities, may be extended or reduced by means of a law. In the context of the case at issue, it should be held that, in order to ensure the interests of municipalities more efficiently, to better take into consideration the local conditions of the localities in which creators and their associations act, to bring the spread of culture closer to territorial communities, to decentralise the administration of culture, as well as on the basis of other reasons (first of all, expediency), it is allowed to assign municipalities by means of a law with the performance of the function of supporting and protecting culture to a greater extent – the performance of this function (to a certain extent) may be transferred from the national level to the municipal level. At the same time, the reverse process when the performance of the aforementioned functions (to a certain extent) is transferred from the municipal level to the national level is, in general, also possible.

When transferring the performance (to a certain extent) of the function of supporting and protecting culture from the national level to the municipal level, regard must be paid to the constitutional concept of local self-government, the independence of municipalities and freedom of their activity, as entrenched in the Constitution, within their competence defined by the Constitution and laws, the principles of balancing the interests of municipalities and those of the state, and the interests of municipalities; it is not allowed to establish for municipalities any such obligations that they would be unable to fulfil; if necessary, the funding for the functions of certain municipalities must be modified (increased or reduced).

The aforementioned transfer of the performance of the functions (to a certain extent) of the support and protection of culture from the national level to the municipal level may be related to the change in the subordination of certain state institutions (establishments or enterprises) the purpose of which is to take care of the development of culture (inter alia, the establishments or enterprises that provide public cultural services), where the administration of such establishments is transferred from the system of state administration to local self-government. When paying regard to the Constitution, the legislature may, by means of a law, establish certain conditions and/or procedure that must be followed by municipalities in implementing their rights of the founder of institutions or enterprises (inter alia, the establishments or enterprises that provide public cultural services) that are transferred to them and contribute to the development of culture; in addition, the legislature may, by means of a law, establish other limitations that would restrict to a certain extent the rights of municipalities as the founders of particular establishments or enterprises and that would ensure that municipalities would properly perform the function of supporting and protecting culture, which is transferred to them (to the established extent).

It has been held that the assignment of any state establishment or enterprise to municipality (inter alia, the transfer of rights of the founder of this establishment or enterprise) must be based on a law and that this requirement stems from the Constitution. Thus, the change in the subordination of state institutions (establishments or enterprises) the purpose of which is to take care of the development of culture (inter alia, the establishments or enterprises that provide public cultural services) must be based on a law; this requirement also stems from the Constitution. The constitutional requirements for legal clarity and legal certainty are applicable to the legal regulation according to which a certain state institution has the powers to issue legal acts on the basis of which the respective state institution (establishment or enterprise) the purpose of which is to take care of the development of culture (inter alia, an establishment or enterprise that provides public cultural services) is assigned to a municipality (inter alia, the rights of the founder of this establishment or enterprise are transferred): such a legal regulation must make it clear whether the rights of the respective municipality as the holder (sole holder or holder in partnership with other subjects, inter alia, state institutions) of the rights of the founder of the respective establishment or enterprise are restricted to any extent or whether no such restrictions have been established; moreover, the said legal regulation must make it clear whether particular establishments or enterprises are financed or supported in any other way by the municipality or by the state (its institutions), whether the burden of financing is divided in any way between the municipality and the state (its institutions), whether the powers of control or supervision over these establishments or enterprises are vested in the municipality (its institutions or officials) or in the state (its institutions or officials), or both in the municipality (its institutions or officials) and in the state (its institutions or officials), etc. Municipalities must be informed about the upcoming transfer of the aforementioned institutions to them.

... when the respective state institution transfers the cultural establishment or enterprise to the municipal level (inter alia, when the rights of the founder are transferred to a municipality), the state may and, in certain cases, must establish, by means of a law, various restrictions applicable to the municipality and such restrictions must be followed by the municipality when exercising the rights of the founder, inter alia, when adopting decisions on the reorganisation, liquidation, or any other restructuring of the establishments or enterprises that are transferred to municipalities. In certain cases, if the state establishes no such restrictions applicable to municipalities, the performance of the function of supporting and protecting culture where the said function is transferred to the municipal level would become more difficult or municipalities could even refuse, to a certain extent, the performance of the function of supporting and protecting culture where such their function is set by means of a law. This restriction of the independence of municipalities stems from the Constitution and, as such, should not be considered the disregard of the interests of municipalities; the said restriction, stemming from the Constitution, ensures balancing the interests of municipalities and those of the state.

The discretion of the legislature to choose a system of elections to municipal councils (Article 34 and Paragraphs 2 and 3 of Article 119 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 9 February 2007

Paragraph 1 of Article 34 of the Constitution provides that citizens who, on the day of the election, have reached 18 years of age have the electoral right; Paragraph 2 of the same article states that the right to stand for election is established by the Constitution of the Republic of Lithuania and by the election laws. It should be noted that the legislature has very broad discretion when implementing the powers, which arise from Article 34, Paragraphs 2 and 3 of Article 119, and other provisions of the Constitution, to establish a system of elections to municipal councils.

The Constitution does not establish any requirements for the legislature as regards choosing a system of elections to municipal councils. It does not prohibit any changes to the chosen system of elections to municipal councils, either. ... state governance and local self-government, as two systems of public power, are formed and function on different constitutional grounds. Thus, the legislature may establish different systems of elections to the Seimas and to municipal councils. According to the Constitution, the system of elections to municipal councils should not necessarily be designed by following the model of the system of elections to the Seimas.

For example, a law may establish exclusively proportional, or exclusively majoritarian system of elections to municipal councils, or a system which combines both the proportional and majoritarian systems; as such, a proportional electoral system, or a majoritarian electoral system, or a different electoral system, inter alia, a mixed electoral system, which combines both the proportional and majoritarian electoral systems, may not be regarded as violating the constitutional principle of direct elections, which demands that members of municipal councils be elected by voters instead of any "intermediary" institutions (electoral colleges, etc.) formed on the basis of the votes cast by voters. In addition, as such, a proportional electoral system, or a majoritarian electoral system, or a different electoral system, inter alia, a mixed electoral system, which combines both the proportional and majoritarian electoral systems, may not be regarded as creating the preconditions for violating the requirements of free and democratic elections, universal and equal suffrage, secret ballot, or other standards of elections in a democratic state under the rule of law.

Whichever electoral system is chosen by the legislature, it must establish such a legal regulation that would ensure at the municipal institutions the democratic representation of permanent residents of the administrative units of the territory of the Republic of Lithuania, the proper implementation of the right of self-government, and the functioning of municipal institutions, and would not create any preconditions for the unpredictability, instability, or non-efficiency of the activity of municipal councils. Otherwise, the expectations of the voters would be denied and a threat would arise that the constitutional principle of responsible governance will be violated.

The passive electoral right in the elections of municipal councils (requirement that, after the legislature chooses exclusively the proportional system of elections to municipal councils, permanent residents of administrative units must have the possibility of standing for election to municipal councils even where they are included in the lists of candidates that are drawn up by entities other than political parties)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 9 February 2007

The constitutional concept of local self-government implies the broadest possibilities possible for all members of the respective territorial community to participate in the decision-making process related to the administration of affairs of the particular location (territorial community); thus, the said concept implies the broadest possibilities possible to compete for a mandate in the council of the respective municipality.

Elections, including elections to municipal councils, are a political process. The electoral rights (both active and passive ones) are closely related to the right of citizens of the Republic of Lithuania to participate in the governance of their state, as consolidated in Article 33 of the Constitution, as well as to the right of citizens to freely form political parties, as consolidated in Article 35 of the Constitution, provided that the aims and activities thereof are not contrary to the Constitution and laws. It should be noted that the aims of establishing political parties and their activity are inseparable from seeking public power, thus, as well as from participating in elections to the representative institutions of public power, inter alia, municipal councils. Under the Constitution, whichever system of elections to municipal councils (exclusively proportional, or exclusively majoritarian, or such a system which combines certain elements of proportional and majoritarian systems) is chosen by the legislature, it is not allowed to establish any such a legal regulation that would prevent political parties or candidates nominated or supported by them from participating in elections to municipal councils (elections of their members). It has been held in this ruling of the Constitutional Court that, in itself, the proportional system of elections does not create any preconditions for violating the constitutional principle of direct elections, the requirements for free and democratic elections, universal and equal suffrage, secret ballot, or other standards of a democratic state under the rule of law.

Consequently, under the Constitution, such (proportional) system of elections to municipal councils where candidates included in the lists of political parties compete for mandates of members of municipal councils is permissible.

On the other hand, that fact that, under the Constitution, such (proportional) system of elections to municipal councils where candidates included in the lists of political parties compete for mandates of members of municipal councils is permissible does not mean that it is constitutionally justifiable to limit the lists of candidates only to the lists formed by political parties after exclusively proportional system of elections to municipal councils (i.e. a system where individuals not included in the list of candidates may not be nominated as candidates in the elections to municipal councils) is chosen.

... it needs to be stressed that the ... constitutional guarantee that protects a person from belonging to any political party against his/her will also means that a person may not be directly or indirectly compelled to become related to any political party by any relationships that are other than formal membership.

Thus, the legislature, when regulating, by means of a law, the relationships of elections to municipal councils, is bound by the requirement, which stems from the Constitution, not to establish any such a legal regulation where a person who wishes to use his/her passive electoral right in an election of members of municipal councils would be compelled to seek membership in a political party or to become bound with a certain political party by relationships that are other than those of formal membership.

This implies the necessity to ensure that, if exclusively the proportional system of elections to municipal councils (i.e. a system where individual persons who are not included in the lists of candidates may not be nominated as candidates in elections to municipal councils) is chosen, members of territorial communities – permanent residents of administrative units of the territory of the Republic of Lithuania (citizens of the Republic of Lithuania and other permanent residents) – should have the possibility of standing for election to the councils of the respective municipalities even without support of any political party while being included as candidates for members of municipal councils in some non-political-party list. Having chosen such (proportional) system of elections to municipal councils, it is necessary to ensure the possibility for the members of territorial communities to implement their passive electoral right by being included in other lists, not only those of political parties (and individually, if the legislature so decides). Such unions (associations) that must have, under the law, the right to draw up the said lists may be formed for the period of particular elections to municipal councils, but they may also operate continuously if this is established by means of a law.

The legislature has broad discretion to establish the requirements that should be met by the said lists drawn up not by political parties, inter alia, to stipulate how many persons must be included in such lists, whether anyone should support such lists in order to register them for an election to municipal councils and if so, how many persons must do that, the time when such lists must be submitted for registration, under what procedure this must be done, etc.

... the legislature, when stipulating, by means of a law, that members of territorial communities may exercise their passive electoral right of electing members of municipal councils by being included in non-political-party lists, must pay regard to the obvious circumstance that elections are a political process. Therefore, a legal regulation where not every union (established not for any type of objectives) (inter alia, not every association, public organisation, community) is allowed to make a list of candidates for members of municipal councils and submit it for registration for an election to municipal councils would be constitutionally justifiable. In this context, it is worth noting that the Constitution consolidates not only the institution of political parties, but also that of political organisations (Paragraph 3 of Article 35, Paragraph 2 of Article 44, Paragraph 2 of Article 83, Paragraph 2 of Article 113, Paragraph 1 of Article 114, and Article 141 of the Constitution); although the notions “political party” and “political organisation” are close, they are not identical.

The legislature, when paying regard to the Constitution, may also establish, by means of a law, certain criteria related to the territory of activity of unions (which are not political parties) that draw up particular lists and submit them for registration to an election to municipal councils (for example, that the said activity should cover the respective administrative units of the territory of the Republic of Lithuania).

The representatives of the Government; the discretion of the legislature to establish the powers of the representatives of the Government and the requirements for persons who wish to hold the office of a representative of the Government (Paragraphs 2 and 3 of Article 123 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 13 August 2007

The duties of the representative of the Government are expressis verbis enshrined in the Constitution. Paragraph 2 of Article 123 of the Constitution prescribes that the observance of the Constitution and laws and the execution of the decisions of the Government by municipalities are supervised by the representatives appointed by the Government, and Paragraph 3 of this article prescribes that the powers of the representatives of the Government and the procedure for the execution of their powers are established by means of a law. The Constitutional Court held that, under Article 123 of the Constitution, the representative of the Government is a subject who exercises supervision over municipalities, acts in the name of the Government, and is subordinate to it (ruling of 18 February 1998). The establishment of the powers of the representative of the Government is left for the legislature (of course, in doing so, the legislature must pay regard to the Constitution, inter alia, the mission of the constitutional institution of the representatives of the Government and the functions of the representatives of the Government, which are consolidated in the Constitution); in this area, the legislature has broad discretion, it may establish very varied powers of the representative of the Government (ruling of 14 April 2006).

The legislature that has wide discretion to regulate the status and powers of the representative of the Government also has the discretion to establish the general and special requirements for the persons who seek this office.

However, it needs to be emphasised that the legislature not only may, but also must establish such a legal regulation that would permit verifying the reliability – loyalty to the State of Lithuania, reputation, etc. – of those persons who seek to hold office in state service.

In this context, it needs to be noted that the jurisprudence of the Constitutional Court has always been based on the principled position that the government representative must have the confidence of the Government; if the representative of the Government loses the confidence of the Government, he/she may be dismissed from office (ruling of 14 April 2006).

Internal structural subunits of municipal councils (Paragraphs 1 and 4 of Article 119 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 31 March 2010

... under the Constitution, inter alia, Paragraphs 1 and 4 of Article 119 thereof, municipal councils, when implementing the right of self-government guaranteed by the Constitution, may form their internal structural subunits.

In this context, it needs to be noted that, under the Constitution, internal structural subunits of municipal councils may not be treated as ones through which the right of self-government is implemented by territorial communities; therefore, the legislature, while regulating the relationships of local self-government, is not allowed to establish any such a legal regulation under which internal structural subunits of municipal councils or individual municipal officials would be equated to municipal councils or would replace municipal councils, inter alia, in the aspect that they would take over the execution of certain powers assigned to the competence of municipal councils as representations of the residents of particular territories. Internal structural subunits of municipal councils must help to ensure the work of municipal councils by presenting recommendations to municipal councils on the issues assigned to the competence of municipal councils, etc.; however, they may not adopt final decisions on the issues assigned to the competence of municipal councils.

... under the Constitution, internal structural subunits of municipal councils may not be treated as the executive bodies accountable to municipal councils, nor may they be treated as other municipal institutions that are established by municipal councils and have authoritative powers.

The discretion of the legislature to choose the manner of establishing the results of elections to municipal councils and of distributing mandates, as well as to consolidate electoral thresholds

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 11 May 2011

The legislature, when regulating the relationships connected with the elections of municipal council members, has broad discretion to choose the methods for establishing the results of elections to an elective representative institution and for distributing mandates, and to consolidate the so-called election thresholds with respect to subjects implementing the passive electoral right, i.e. to stipulate that they may participate in the distribution of mandates only after polling a certain number of votes that is set by means of a law, where the said number of votes may be expressed as a particular percentage (known in advance) of the votes of the voters participating in an election or as a certain number of votes that is determined after calculating the votes of the voters who have participated in an election to a representative institution; as a rule, an election threshold is established in order to avoid a serious fragmentation into small groups in an elected representative institution and to ensure its stability. However, the said discretion of the legislature is not absolute; the legislature must pay regard to the provisions – norms and principles – of the Constitution, inter alia, the constitutional concept of local self-government, as well as the principles of universal, equal, and direct suffrage, which stem from Paragraph 2 of Article 119 of the Constitution. The election threshold set by the legislature for electing a representative institution must not be too high, so that it does not create the preconditions for not reflecting the interests of different voters and for violating their right to participate in deciding questions of self-government through democratically elected representatives; the fundamental differences of election participants may not be ignored and the same election threshold for essentially different subjects implementing the passive electoral right may not be fixed, as well as a different election threshold for essentially analogous subjects implementing the passive electoral right may not be established, since, otherwise, inter alia, the principle of equal suffrage, consolidated in Paragraph 2 of Article 119 of the Constitution, would be violated.

The right of persons to stand for election as members of municipal councils; the right of the electorate to receive significant information about candidates for members of municipal councils, inter alia, about the fact that a candidate was found by a court to be guilty of a criminal act (Article 25, Paragraph 2 of Article 34, Paragraphs 2 and 3 of Article 119 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 17 November 2011

In interpreting the provisions of Paragraph 2 of Article 34 of the Constitution, the Constitutional Court has held that the right of a person, which is guaranteed by the Constitution, to stand for election as a member of a municipal council under the conditions provided for by means of a law is an important constitutional right of a person (ruling of 11 May 2011); the provision “The right to stand for election shall be established ... by the election laws” of Paragraph 2 of Article 34 of the Constitution means that, under the Constitution, the legislature has the powers to establish in the election laws such requirements (conditions) for a person who may stand for election that are constitutionally justifiable (ruling of 25 May 2004).

It needs to be noted that the right of a person to stand for election as a member of the municipal council under the conditions provided for in the law is also consolidated in Article 119 of the Constitution. Paragraph 2 of Article 119 of the Constitution provides, inter alia, that members of municipal councils are elected on the basis of universal, equal, and direct suffrage, whereas the provision of Paragraph 3 of the same article, whereby the procedure for the organisation and activities of self-government institutions are established by means of a law, also means that the legislature is under the duty to lay down, by means of a law, the grounds and procedure for organising elections; the formation of the political representative institutions that are provided for in the Constitution is subject to special requirements; the legislature is under the duty to establish such a legal regulation that would ensure the transparency of the electoral process, which is a necessary precondition for the trust of voters in the representative institution (ruling of 11 May 2011).

Elections, including elections to municipal councils, are a political process. The electoral rights (both active and passive ones) are closely related to the right of citizens of the Republic of Lithuania, entrenched in Article 33 of the Constitution, to participate in the governance of their state (ruling of 9 February 2007), which is implemented, inter alia, by participating in forming political representative institutions (ruling of 11 May 2011).

... the provision of Paragraph 2 of Article 34 of the Constitution, whereby the right to stand for election is established by the election laws, the provision consolidated in Paragraph 2 of Article 119 of the Constitution, whereby the members of municipal councils are elected on the basis of universal, equal, and direct suffrage, and the provision consolidated in Paragraph 3 of the same article, whereby the procedure for the organisation and activities of self-government institutions are established by law, give rise to the duty of the legislature to establish, by means of a law, the procedure for elections of municipal councils, inter alia, such a procedure that would define what information must be made public to voters by persons seeking to stand for election as members of municipal councils, as well as the concrete requirements how such information must be provided so that voters would be informed in a proper way.

It also needs to be noted that, in order to ensure the right of citizens to participate in the governance of their state, as consolidated in Paragraph 1 of Article 33 of the Constitution, inter alia, through democratically elected representatives, the legislature must create the preconditions for reflecting the will of voters, inter alia, the preconditions for ensuring the transparency of the electoral process and fair competition among subjects exercising their passive electoral right, as well as the publicity of the information, important to voters, regarding these subjects.

... one of the foundations of an open, just, and harmonious civil society and a state under the rule of law is the constitutional right to receive information, which is consolidated in Article 25 of the Constitution.

The Constitution guarantees and protects the interest of the public to be informed (inter alia, the rulings of 8 July 2005, 19 September 2005, 29 September 2005, and 21 December 2006). The constitutional right to receive information is an important precondition for implementing various rights and freedoms of a person, which are consolidated in the Constitution (ruling of 21 December 2006).

Thus, when interpreting the provisions of Paragraph 2 of Article 34 and Paragraph 2 of Article 119 of the Constitution in conjunction with the right of the public to receive information, which is entrenched, inter alia, in Article 25 of the Constitution, it needs to be noted that the interest of the public to be informed assumes especial importance in the process of elections to political representative institutions, inter alia, elections to municipal councils. During the electoral process, real possibilities must be created for persons implementing the active electoral right, who decide on the eligibility of a candidate to be a member of the municipal council, to receive information about the major facts of such person's life, which may be of significance when representing the interests of voters and handling public affairs. The information about the fact that a person seeking to stand for election as a member of the municipal council by an effective court judgment (decision) was found guilty of a criminal act should also be viewed as information significant to the electorate.

It needs to be noted that, when consolidating the duty of a candidate to make it public if he/she was found by a court to have been guilty of a criminal act, the legislature should set concrete requirements as to how such information must be presented in a proper manner and by not misleading voters, inter alia, that a candidate must indicate when, as a result of which precisely criminal act, and by an effective court judgment (decision) of which country he/she was found guilty.

The fact that the act, as a result of committing which a person had been found guilty by a court, was later, under the criminal laws of the Republic of Lithuania, declared not criminal (was decriminalised) does not mean that such a person may be regarded as having not committed any criminal act in the past. It also needs to be noted that, in cases where a person was found guilty, by a court of a foreign state, of an act that is not and was never regarded as a criminal one under the law of the Republic of Lithuania, or in cases where the fact that persons are held criminally liable for such an act is deemed political persecution, this means that the circumstance that such a person was found guilty of such an act is an important fact of his/her life.

Thus, the information about the fact that persons seeking to stand for election as members of municipal councils were found by a court to have been guilty of the aforementioned criminal acts – even in cases where such acts were later decriminalised, as well as in cases where such acts, as a result of which such persons were found guilty by a court of a foreign state, are not and were never regarded as criminal ones under the law of the Republic of Lithuania, or where the fact that persons are held criminally liable for such acts is deemed political persecution – is important to voters in deciding on the eligibility of the candidates for elective positions, as this gives the possibility of being aware of important facts of the life of the candidates, which may be of significance when representing the interests of voters and handling public affairs. ...

... when interpreting the provisions of Paragraph 2 of Article 34 of the Constitution, the Constitutional Court has also held that, under the Constitution, in the course of regulating electoral relationships by means of a law, inter alia, an equal passive electoral right of all candidates must be ensured ...

... when fulfilling its duty, which stems from the provisions consolidated in Paragraph 2 of Article 34, Paragraphs 2 and 3 of Article 119 of the Constitution, to lay down, by means of a law, the grounds and procedure for organising elections to municipal councils, the legislature has broad discretion, inter alia, to stipulate what information regarding candidates for members of municipal councils must be provided for voters by institutions organising elections and in what way the said information must be presented.

However, this discretion of the legislature is not absolute. When stipulating what information regarding candidates must be provided by institutions organising elections and in what way that information must be presented, the legislature is obliged to ensure the imperatives stemming from the Constitution, inter alia, an equal passive electoral right, the principle of fair competition in elections among subjects implementing the passive electoral right, as well as the principles of transparency of the electoral process and justice. Thus, when consolidating the duty of institutions organising elections to provide for voters the information about the fact that a candidate was found guilty of a criminal act, the legislature should stipulate how such information must be properly presented so that voters could decide on the eligibility of the candidate concerned.

... the legislature must stipulate that voters must be informed about the especially important facts of the life of a candidate for a member of a municipal council (inter alia, that such a person was found by a court guilty of an act that, under the law of the Republic of Lithuania, is regarded as criminal), which may be of essential significance to voters in deciding on the eligibility of the candidate for the elective position, by, inter alia, respectively indicating such facts on the poster of a candidate or on the poster with a list of candidates issued by the electoral commission.

[...]

It needs to be noted that there is an essential difference between, on the one hand, the criminal acts that were later decriminalised, the criminal acts that are regarded under the law of a foreign state as criminal, but are not and were never regarded as criminal under the law of the Republic of Lithuania, or the fact that persons are held criminally liable for such acts is deemed political persecution, and, on the other hand, the acts that are regarded as criminal under the law of the Republic of Lithuania. Therefore, it is not allowed to establish the duty for institutions organising elections to present on the poster of a candidate or on the poster with a list of candidates the aforementioned essentially different information in the same manner in order not to create the preconditions for misleading the voters, since, otherwise, the said essentially different information regarding candidates could create an equally negative impression about the candidates concerned; this would impede the possibility for voters to decide rightly on the eligibility of the candidate for the elective position.

The incompatibility of the office of a member of a municipal council with another office

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 17 November 2011

... the Constitution, inter alia, the principles of the organisation and activities of self-government institutions, which are laid down in Paragraphs 1 and 4 of Article 119 thereof, gives rise to the duty of the legislature to stipulate that members of municipal councils may not take up in the respective municipal institutions such positions while holding which they would have the powers to decide the questions related to the adoption and implementation of decisions of the municipal council, would be accountable to the municipal council and/or directly subordinate to certain members of the municipal council as, for example, the mayor. Otherwise, the principles of the equality of the legal status of the members of municipal councils, the accountability of municipal institutions to the municipal council that forms them, and the supremacy of municipal councils over the municipal institutions that are accountable to them, which are entrenched in Paragraphs 1 and 4 of Article 119 of the Constitution, would be violated.

The autonomy of municipal budgets

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 11 June 2015

Paragraph 1 of Article 121 of the Constitution prescribes that municipalities draft and approve their budgets.

In its ruling of 14 January 2002, the Constitutional Court held that, under the Constitution, the autonomy of municipal budgets is an important aspect of the constitutional principle of the independence of municipalities within the limits of their competence defined by the Constitution and laws and that the independence of municipalities in the sphere of the budget is not absolute.

Financing the functions performed by municipalities

... the legislature has the discretion to choose the priorities in funding municipalities, as well as the ways and forms by which the state supports municipalities, including the way of the calculation of the funds of the state budget meant for municipalities and the manner of the allocation of such funds; however, in doing so, the legislature must pay regard to the Constitution, inter alia, the imperatives (consolidated in Article 120 and Paragraph 1 of Article 121 of the Constitution) of ensuring the funding required for a fully fledged functioning of self-government and for the implementation of municipal functions, and must observe the constitutional principles of responsible governance and proportionality, according to which the funding of municipal functions must be adequate to the extent of such functions. These constitutional imperatives give rise to the duty of the legislature to establish such a legal regulation whereby, in proportion to the requirement for funding the functions performed by municipalities, funds for financing municipal functions would be allocated, inter alia, by transferring certain taxes (share thereof) to municipalities, where account is taken of the resources, as well as the material and financial capacity of the state and society.

After the legislature imposes the personal income tax as one of the sources for fulfilling the functions of the state (municipality) and decides that this tax (share thereof) is allocated to municipalities in order to fund their activities, Article 120 and Paragraph 1 of Article 212 of the Constitution, as well as the constitutional principles of responsible governance and proportionality, give rise to the duty of the legislature to establish such a legal regulation by which the funds received from the personal income tax, as well as all from other funds allocated for financing municipal functions, would be distributed in proportion to the extent of the functions performed by municipalities.

The Constitutional Court has noted that, if the extent of the functions assigned to municipalities is changed, the legislature may and, in some cases, even must correspondingly amend (either increase or decrease) the funding of municipal functions (ruling of 8 July 2005).

... the Constitution, inter alia, Article 120 and Paragraph 1 of Article 121 thereof, gives rise to the duty of the legislature to establish such a legal regulation whereby the funding of municipal functions could be correspondingly amended (either increased or decreased) not only in the cases where the extent of municipal functions is changed, but also when the need for funds undergoes changes due to other objective reasons as, for instance, demographic or economic changes.

... under the Constitution, inter alia, under Article 120 and Paragraph 1 of Article 121 thereof, as well as the constitutional principle of the equality of the rights of persons, the legislature, in an effort to ensure the funding required for a fully fledged functioning of self-government and the implementation of municipal functions and by taking into account the differences in the social and economic development of regions, may choose a model for equalising the financial capacity of municipalities and establish a mechanism for such equalisation. In doing so, the legislature must pay regard to the Constitution, inter alia, the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law, whereby the legal regulation laid down in laws and other legal acts must be clear, comprehensible, and coherent, and must observe the constitutional principle of responsible governance, by which the state institutions and officials must properly exercise the powers conferred on them according to the Constitution and laws.

According to Article 120 and Paragraph 1 of Article 121 of the Constitution, when they are interpreted in conjunction with the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law, which encompasses the requirements of legal certainty, legal clarity, legal security, and the protection of legitimate expectations, and in conjunction with the constitutional principle of responsible governance, the legislature must establish a clear procedure for calculating the funds allocated to municipalities, where such a procedure would ensure the funding required for a fully fledged functioning of self-government and for the fulfilment of municipal functions, and would also ensure the independence and freedom of the activities of municipalities within their competence defined by the Constitution and laws.

The legal regulation governing the remuneration of municipal politicians (Paragraph 1 of Article 48 and Paragraph 3 of Article 119 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 29 May 2019

... the provision "Everyone ... shall have the right ... to receive fair pay for work" of Paragraph 1 of Article 48 of the Constitution should be interpreted in conjunction with Paragraph 3 of Article 119 of the Constitution. Under Paragraph 3 of Article 119 of the Constitution, the procedure for the organisation and activities of self-government institutions is established by law.

It should be noted that, under Paragraph 3 of Article 119 of the Constitution, while regulating the procedure for the organisation and activities of municipal councils as political representative self-government institutions, the legislature also has the discretion to establish the legal regulation governing the organisation of the work and the system of the remuneration of municipal council members who are elected, inter alia, to organise the activity of the respective municipal councils, implement the related powers, and represent the respective municipalities (as, for instance, persons holding the office of mayor or deputy mayor as provided for by law). When the amount of the remuneration of mayors (deputy mayors) is established by means of a legal regulation, regard must be paid to the imperative of fair pay for work, as laid down in the Constitution, inter alia, Paragraph 1 of Article 48 thereof, as well as to the circumstances leading to the necessity to differentiate the amount of this remuneration.

The Constitutional Court has noted that, in addition to the number of residents living in their territory, municipalities can, inter alia, considerably vary in their size and the scope of issues assigned to their competence due to the significance and complexity of these issues; thus, the scope of the activity of municipal politicians and the extent of their responsibility may also vary due to the particularities of the municipality concerned; therefore, if the amount of the remuneration of mayors (deputy mayors) is differentiated by means of a legal regulation, account must also be taken of this specific nature of their activity (ruling of 30 April 2013).

... the imperative of fair pay for work, as consolidated in Paragraph 1 of Article 48 of the Constitution, gives rise to the requirement for the legislature, when differentiating the amount of the remuneration of municipal council members who are elected, inter alia, to organise the activity of the respective municipal councils, implement the related powers, and represent the respective municipalities (as, for instance, persons holding the office of mayor or deputy mayor as provided for by law), to draw on the clear and objective criteria laid down by means of a law, which constitute an essential element of the right to receive fair pay for work. Regulating the system of remuneration paid to these persons, the legislature has broad discretion to choose and lay down, in laws, the criteria for differentiating the amount of their remuneration. The amount of the remuneration of municipal mayors and deputy mayors may be differentiated in view of the number of municipal residents; however, the differentiation of the amount of the said remuneration according to this sole criterion may not violate the constitutional imperative of fair pay for work. In exercising its discretion and taking into account the particularities and differences that exist among municipalities and have influence on the scope of the activity of mayors and deputy mayors and on the extent of their responsibility, the legislature may also provide for other objective criteria determining the amount of the remuneration of municipal mayors and deputy mayors.

Thus, under the Constitution, inter alia, Paragraph 1 of Article 48 thereof, exercising its discretion, granted under Paragraph 3 of Article 119 of the Constitution, to establish the system of remuneration paid to municipal council members who are elected, inter alia, to organise the activity of the respective municipal councils, implement the related powers, and represent the respective municipalities (as, for instance, persons holding the office of mayor or deputy mayor as provided for by law), inter alia, to regulate the amount of their remuneration, the legislature is not allowed to establish such a legal regulation under which the amount of the remuneration of municipal mayors (deputy mayors) would be the same despite the fact that the complexity of their functions, the scope of their activity, the nature of their work, and the extent of their responsibility for carrying out the said functions considerably differ due to the particularities of the municipalities concerned, inter alia, differences in their size and the number of their residents, as well as their legal status.

10.3. LOCAL GOVERNANCE

Local governance is the performance of the functions of state governance in particular localities (Paragraph 1 of Article 123 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 18 February 1998

The constitutional provisions on state governance in particular localities are formulated in Paragraph 1 of Article 123 of the Constitution: "At higher-level administrative units, governance shall be organised by the Government according to the procedure established by law."

Local governance is the fulfilment of the functions of state governance (i.e. the functions of executive power) in particular localities, i.e. the respective administrative units. The functions of local governance are, as a rule, performed by officials appointed by the central authority (or by institutions formed by the said officials) who most generally act in the name or on the instructions (authorisation) of the central authority.

11. THE STATE BUDGET AND FINANCES

11.1. THE STATE BUDGET. THE PROPERTY LIABILITIES OF THE STATE. TAXES

The constitutional duty to pay taxes; the competence of the Seimas to establish legal responsibility for violations of tax laws (Item 15 of Article 67 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 6 December 2000

... under Item 15 of Article 67 of the Constitution, the Seimas “shall establish state taxes and other compulsory payments”. The said norm of the Constitution also implies the constitutional duty of taxpayers to pay the established taxes in due time. Taxes are a necessary condition of the functioning of the state; therefore, the constitutional duty to pay taxes established in laws is consolidated in laws as a requirement by the state for all taxpayers. Taxpayers must transfer part of their property, which is expressed as a certain amount of money, into the state (municipal) budget as, otherwise, the public interest and the rights and interests of other persons protected by law would be infringed.

It needs to be noted that, in an attempt to ensure the fulfilment of the duty to pay taxes, the state is entitled to establish legal responsibility for violations of tax laws, types of such responsibility, particular penalties, as well as fines, which may be imposed on natural and legal persons who violate tax laws.

Although, under the Constitution, the Seimas is granted competence to establish state taxes and legal responsibility for violations of tax laws, however, this does not mean that the legislature may establish any type of legal responsibility or any type of penalties or fines of any amount for violations of tax laws. When establishing the amounts of fines for violations of tax laws, the legislature is bound by the constitutional principles of justice and a state under the rule of law, as well as other constitutional requirements.

... conforming to the constitutional principles of justice and a state under the rule of law, the fines established in laws for violations of tax laws must be of such amounts that are necessary to achieve the legitimate and generally important objective – to ensure the fulfilment of the constitutional duty to pay taxes.

The budgetary system of Lithuania; the state budget

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 14 January 2002

Paragraph 1 of Article 127 of the Constitution prescribes: “The budgetary system of the Republic of Lithuania shall consist of the independent State Budget of the Republic of Lithuania and independent municipal budgets.”

Paragraph 1 of Article 121 of the Constitution prescribes: “Municipalities shall draft and approve their budgets.”

Paragraph 1 of Article 131 of the Constitution prescribes: “The draft State Budget shall be considered by the Seimas and shall be approved by law before the start of the new budget year.”

Thus, according to the Constitution, the state budget and municipal budgets are independent. Together they form the budgetary system of Lithuania.

It is generally recognised that the state budget is a plan of the state revenue and expenditure for a specific period, i.e. a financial plan of the state, according to which public funds are redistributed. Similarly, municipal budgets are municipal plans of revenue and expenditure for a specific period. Under Article 129 of the Constitution, this period is a budget year lasting from 1 January until 31 December. Legally, the state budget is a law that approves the state budget, i.e. the plan of revenue and expenditure for a certain budget year.

According to the constitutional concept of the state budget, the state revenue and expenditure planned for the budget year must be provided for in the state budget approved by means of a law.

Paragraph 2 of Article 127 of the Constitution prescribes that the revenue of the state budget is raised from taxes, compulsory payments, levies, income from state-owned property, and other income, and Paragraph 3 of the same article prescribes that taxes, other payments to the budgets, and levies are established by the laws of the Republic of Lithuania.

Under Item 4 of Article 94 of the Constitution, the Government prepares a draft state budget and submits it to the Seimas. Article 130 of the Constitution provides that the Government draws up a draft state budget and presents it to the Seimas not later than 75 days before the end of the budget year, Item 14 of Article 67 of the Constitution prescribes that the Seimas approves the state budget, and Paragraph 1 of Article 131 thereof states that the draft state budget is considered by the Seimas and is approved by law before the start of the new budget year.

Paragraph 2 of Article 131 of the Constitution prescribes that, during the consideration of the draft budget, the Seimas may increase expenditure provided that it specifies financial sources for the additional expenditure. The expenditure established by means of laws may not be reduced as long as these laws are not altered.

Paragraph 2 of Article 132 of the Constitution provides that, during the budget year, the Seimas may change the budget. It is changed according to the same procedure according to which it is drawn up, adopted, and approved. When necessary, the Seimas may approve an additional budget.

The constitutional concept of the state budget implies that the drafting (forming) of the state budget, its consideration at the Seimas and its approval by means of a law, as well as its execution, are separate steps of the budgetary process.

The powers of the Seimas and the Government in the sphere of the state budget

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 14 January 2002

In drafting (forming) a draft state budget, as well as in considering and approving the state budget, the powers of the Seimas as a legislative body and the powers of the Government as an executive body are separated; the constitutional principle of the separation of powers must be ensured in this area.

Under the Constitution, only the Government has the right and duty to prepare (form) a draft state budget. Once the Government has prepared a draft state budget, it presents it to the Seimas for approval following the terms provided for in the Constitution. Under the Constitution, during the budget year the budget may also be changed only on the proposal of the Government. An additional budget is also approved by means of a law on the proposal of the Government. Drafting (forming) a state budget and presenting it to the Seimas belong to the sphere where the Government adopts decisions regarding state governance, as prescribed by the Constitution. Therefore, a draft state budget is presented to the Seimas by a resolution of the Government.

The Government has not only the constitutional right, but also the constitutional duty to provide for specific revenue sources in a draft state budget, to indicate their amounts, and the specific amounts intended for financing the needs of the state and society.

When submitting a draft budget to the Seimas, the Government must substantiate the revenue and allocations indicated therein with the evaluation of the needs and possibilities of the state and society. This information must be public. A draft state budget prepared by the Government must provide for funds necessary for the implementation of laws.

Only the Seimas has the prerogative to consider a draft state budget presented by the Government and to approve it by means of a law. According to the Constitution, the adoption of the law on the state budget constitutes the final step in the formation of the budget.

During the consideration of the draft budget, the Seimas may increase the expenditure provided that it specifies financial sources for the additional expenditure (Paragraph 2 of Article 131 of the Constitution). If the state budget is not approved on time, in such cases, at the beginning of the budget year, the budget expenditure each month may not exceed 1/12 of the expenditure of the state budget of the previous budget year (Paragraph 1 of Article 132 of the Constitution).

According to the Constitution, the budget year coincides with a calendar year. The Seimas must approve the state budget for a budget year, but not for some other period of time. Each budget year, the Seimas must form the state budget for the following budget year taking into consideration the existing social and economic situation, the needs and possibilities of society and the state, the available or potential financial resources and the liabilities of the state, as well as a number of other important factors. When passing the law on the state budget, the Seimas must pay attention to the striving for a just and harmonious society enshrined in the Constitution.

By approving the state budget by means of a law, the Seimas approves the revenue and allocations of the state budget, based on the evaluation of the needs and possibilities of society and the state. The constitutional concept of the budgetary process implies that all income sources of the state budget, planned revenue and expenditure of the state budget, the amount of such funds, and the subjects to whom allocations from the state budget are given must be specified in the law on the state budget.

Establishing the entities eligible for the allocations from the state budget falls solely within the competence of the Seimas. The Seimas may not waive or transfer such competence to another institution, while the latter may not accept it. Otherwise, the competence of the Seimas to form the state budget would be denied: the said competence would become shared with the executive. This would in turn deny the constitutional principle of the separation of powers. Acts issued by executive bodies can only deal with the execution of the state budget and they may not compete with or change the law on the state budget.

Once approved by the Seimas, the state budget becomes a law. Under Item 4 of Article 94 of the Constitution, the Government executes the state budget. The provision of Item 4 of Article 94 of the Constitution, whereby the Government executes the state budget, means that the Government has the duty to ensure that the budget receives the specified revenue and that these funds are transferred to the subjects specified in the law on the state budget. The Constitutional Court has previously held that, under the Constitution, the Government has to execute the approved state budget according to its purpose and to the extent prescribed by the budget law, and that it does not have the right to change the amounts of the allocations or their possessors established in the budget law (ruling of 3 June 1999).

The expenditure established by means of laws may not be reduced as long as these laws are not altered (Paragraph 2 of Article 131 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 14 January 2002

Paragraph 2 of Article 131 of the Constitution provides, inter alia, that the expenditure established by law may not be reduced as long as these laws are not altered.

When interpreting the provision of Paragraph 2 of Article 131 of the Constitution, it should be noted that, if certain laws provide for certain expenditure, then the Government must follow and execute these laws in the course of drafting (forming) a draft state budget. Under the Constitution, the Government has the duty to submit to the Seimas such a draft state budget that would be consistent with the provisions of such laws pertaining to state expenditure.

The Constitutional Court has held that, in the course of drafting and adopting legal acts, state institutions must adhere to the principle of the state under the rule of law, which is enshrined in the Constitution, and that the provision, contained in Paragraph 2 of Article 5 of the Constitution, that the scope of powers is limited by the Constitution means that the Seimas, as the legislator of laws and other legal acts, is independent inasmuch as its powers are not limited by the Constitution (ruling of 12 July 2001).

Under the Constitution, the Seimas is bound by its own laws. Thus, if certain laws provide for certain expenditure, the Seimas must follow such laws during the deliberation and approval of the state budget. Under Paragraph 2 of Article 131 of the Constitution, during the process of the approval of the state budget, the expenditure established by law may not be reduced as long as these laws are not altered.

It follows from the constitutional concept of the state budget, namely from the provision of Article 129 of the Constitution, whereby the budget year starts on 1 January and ends on 31 December, that laws providing for certain expenditure may not establish such a legal regulation that would deny the constitutional right and duty of the Government to draw up the state budget for a budget year and the constitutional right and duty of the Seimas to approve the state budget for a budget year. Such laws may not change the law on the state budget. The provision of Paragraph 2 of Article 131 of the Constitution, whereby the expenditure established by law may not be reduced as long as these laws are not amended, must not be interpreted as making it possible to provide for such funding of certain needs that is not included in the law on the state budget of a given year.

It needs to be emphasised that the laws specified in Paragraph 2 of Article 131 of the Constitution, which provide for certain expenditure, are not laws that may substitute for or change the law on the state budget. These are laws making it possible to ensure the succession of the relationships connected with the state budget each budget year and the financial continuity when the persistent pursuit of certain (special, long-term, strategic) public and state objectives requires more funds than it is possible to allocate in one budget year.

Thus, the laws specified in Paragraph 2 of Article 131 of the Constitution, which provide for certain expenditure, are an exception rather than a rule. It should be stressed that such laws can only provide for the expenditure necessary in order to achieve a defined and universally important objective over a certain period established by means of a law, provided these needs cannot be satisfied in one budget year. Such laws may not provide for funds necessary for the execution of routine functions of the state or for funds necessary to finance everyday needs of society. Otherwise, the constitutional concept of the state budget would be distorted: the constitutional institution of the budget year would lose its purpose, the constitutional right and duty of the Government to prepare a draft state budget and the constitutional right and duty of the Seimas to approve it for the budget year by taking into consideration the existing social and economic situation, the needs and possibilities of society and the state, the available or potential financial resources, the liabilities of the state, as well as a number of other important factors, would be denied. This would also result in the preconditions for violating the constitutional imperative of social justice and social harmony.

The constitutional duty to pay taxes (Article 127 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 17 November 2003

The provisions of Article 127 of the Constitution, which establish the budgetary system of Lithuania and indicate the sources of forming the revenue of the state budget and municipal budgets, also consolidate the constitutional duty to pay taxes.

In its ruling of 10 July 1997, the Constitutional Court noted that, when taxes are not paid or are overdue, the state (municipal) budget does not receive part of its revenue, and the possibilities for the state (municipality) to perform the functions established for it are limited. Furthermore, at the time when part of subjects of economic activity do not pay taxes, the other subjects – honest taxpayers – find themselves at a disadvantage; thus, the essential principles of a free market based on fair competition are violated.

The legal regulation of tax relationships (Item 15 of Article 67 and Paragraph 3 of Article 127 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 2 September 2004

Paragraph 3 of Article 127 of the Constitution states that taxes, other payments to the budgets, and levies are established by the laws of the Republic of Lithuania.

Under Item 15 of Article 67 of the Constitution, the Seimas establishes state taxes and other compulsory payments.

When interpreting Paragraph 3 of Article 127 of the Constitution, the Constitutional Court has held on more than one occasion in its rulings that the said paragraph consolidates the form (type) of a legal act by which taxes are established: taxes may be established only by means of a law.

When interpreting Item 15 of Article 67 of the Constitution, the Constitutional Court has held in its rulings that state taxes are established exclusively by the Seimas.

Thus, under the Constitution, it is only the Seimas that may establish taxes and this may be done only by means of a law. When establishing state taxes, the principles and norms of the Constitution must be complied with.

In its rulings, the Constitutional Court has held on more than one occasion that such essential elements of tax as the object of tax, the subjects of tax relationships, their rights and duties, the sizes (rates) of tax, the time limits of payment, tax exceptions and tax concessions, fines and late payment interest should be established by means of a law.

In order to ensure the proper payment and collection of taxes, it is not sufficient only to establish taxes as the duty to the state – it is also essential to regulate the procedure of their payment, which would, inter alia, comprise the procedures of tax administration, the methodology of calculation of taxes, etc. The legal regulation of tax relationships is not only the establishment of taxes by means of a law, but also the establishment of the procedure for implementing tax laws. It is not required in the Constitution to establish exclusively by means of a law the procedure of implementing tax laws: under the Constitution, the procedure for implementing tax laws, as well as the procedure for calculating a particular payable tax established by means of a law, may be established not only by means of a law, but also by means of a substatutory act (rulings of 15 March 2000 and 17 November 2003).

The Constitutional Court has also held that the substatutory acts establishing the procedure for implementing tax laws may not contain any norms laying down a legal regulation that would be different from the one established by means of a law or would compete with the norms of a law (ruling of 17 November 2003).

The legal regulation of tax relationships (establishing late payment interest on the non-payment or undue payment of taxes) (Item 15 of Article 67 and Paragraph 3 of Article 127 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 26 September 2006

Taxes, other payments to the budgets, and levies are established by the laws of the Republic of Lithuania (Paragraph 3 of Article 127 of the Constitution). The Seimas establishes state taxes and other compulsory payments (Item 15 of Article 67 of the Constitution).

When interpreting the provisions of the Constitution concerning taxes and other compulsory payments, the Constitutional Court has formed the relevant official constitutional doctrine in its acts. ... under the Constitution, taxes, as an obligation, may be established (introduced) only by means of a law; it is necessary to establish such a legal regulation that would ensure that taxes would be paid properly and on time; for that reason, when paying regard to the Constitution (inter alia, the constitutional principles of justice, proportionality, legal certainty and clarity), various measures may be chosen such as fines, late payment interest, interest, etc. Such essential elements of tax as the object of tax, the subjects of tax relationships, their rights and duties, the sizes (rates) of tax, the time limits of payment, tax exceptions and tax concessions, fines and late payment interest must be established by means of a law. The procedure for implementing tax laws may also be established by means of substatutory acts.

... when establishing, by means of a law, particular coercive measures for failure to implement tax obligations, inter alia, late payment interest on the non-payment or undue payment of taxes, the legislature has a certain degree of discretion. For instance, the legislature may choose whether to establish absolute amounts of certain late payment interest on the non-payment or undue payment of taxes or to establish, by means of a law, such a legal regulation where the amounts of the established late payment interest on the non-payment or undue payment of taxes would depend on certain indicators and could be subject to change. It needs to be emphasised that, after having chosen such a way of a legal regulation where the amounts of late payment interest on the non-payment or undue payment of taxes depend on certain indicators specified in the law and are subject to change, the legislature must establish, by means of a law, not only the subject (state institution, official) who has the powers to state the existence of the said indicators, upon which, according to the law, such amount of late payment interest depends, and to establish the amounts of such late payment interest according to these indicators, but also the criteria in the law that must be followed by the said subject when establishing the said amounts of late payment interest.

The powers of the legislature to establish taxes (Articles 67 and 127 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 22 December 2006

The establishment of taxes is the exceptional constitutional competence of the legislature (Articles 67 and 127 of the Constitution). Taxable objects may be very varied. The legislature that has the powers, which arise from the Constitution, to establish what is taxed also has the discretion to decide whether to tax various benefits received from foreign states, inter alia, pensions. Taking account of the Constitution, the legislature also has the right to amend the established legal regulation on taxes. In imposing taxes, the legislature must pay regard to the norms and principles of the Constitution, inter alia, the constitutional principles of justice, reasonableness and proportionality. When establishing taxes, the legislature is also bound by the state obligations arising from the international treaties of the Republic of Lithuania (inter alia, from the bilateral and multilateral treaties for the avoidance of double taxation of income and/or capital), as well as by the requirements arising from membership of Lithuania in the European Union.

The features characteristic of taxes and other compulsory payments (except levies) (Item 15 of Article 67 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 12 February 2010

... the ... provisions of the official constitutional doctrine that have been formulated by the Constitutional Court when it interpreted the features characteristic of taxes and other compulsory payments (except levies) [are as follows]:

- taxes are compulsory and unrequited payments of a certain amount established by means of a law and paid to the state (municipal) budget by legal and natural persons in due time (ruling of 24 January 2006); taxes are paid providing there exists a permanent taxable object (ruling of 15 March 1996);

- state taxes and other compulsory payments are a pecuniary obligation of legal subjects to the state; according to the Constitution, only the Seimas may establish state taxes and other compulsory payments and it may establish them only by means of a law, which is an important guarantee of the protection of the rights of a person (ruling of 3 June 2002);

- economic and social processes are regulated, useful economic efforts are encouraged, and priorities of economic development are supported by means of taxes (rulings of 9 October 1998 and 17 November 2003); taxes are characterised by the fact that they are paid regularly at specified intervals and they are not of a directly reimbursable nature, i.e. after they are paid to the state institution that accepts the said tax, the aforementioned institution is under no obligation to perform any actions for or render any particular service to taxpayers (ruling of 15 March 1996); tax relationships are a matter of regulation by public law; tax relationships are legal relations of an authoritative nature between taxpayers and the institutions of executive power of the state (ruling of 17 November 2003); therefore, the method of an administrative legal regulation is applied first of all for their realisation (ruling of 10 July 1997).

The constitutional concept of levies (Paragraphs 2 and 3 of Article 127 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 12 February 2010

When interpreting the provision “The revenue of the State Budget shall be raised from taxes, compulsory payments, levies, income from state-owned property, and other income” of Paragraph 2 of Article 127 of the Constitution, the Constitutional Court held in its ruling of 15 March 1996, inter alia, that “... according to the Constitution, five legal forms of the revenue of the state budget may be singled out: regular taxes, other compulsory payments, levies, income from state-owned property, and other income. They are specified in particular laws”. Thus, in the sense of Paragraphs 2 and 3 of Article 127 of the Constitution, levies are one of the legal forms of the revenue of the state budget.

It needs to be mentioned that, in the ruling of 15 March 1996 ... the Constitutional Court noted, inter alia, that ... a levy ... has a two-way character, as the subjects of the legal relationships that occur after [it] has been paid have particular rights and obligations; there are two essentials of paying compulsory levies: the object subject to taxation and the actions performed or services rendered by competent state institutions to legal and natural persons; as a rule, most levies are voluntary payments, i.e. a person who desires to get some service or a particular action from a state establishment consents to pay a levy before the actions are performed or documents bearing legal force are granted and, on such grounds, he/she becomes entitled to demand that the requested actions be performed or the documents be granted.

... both taxes and state levies are established by means of a law and are paid to the state (municipal) budget; however, in the sense of Item 15 of Article 67 of the Constitution, state taxes are characterised by the fact that they are compulsory, unrequited, and unilateral; tax relationships are legal relations of an authoritative nature between taxpayers and the state institutions Meanwhile, a levy in the sense of Paragraphs 2 and 3 of Article 127 of the Constitution is a compulsory payment to the state budget for actions performed or services rendered by the competent institutions of the state to legal and natural persons.

The duty of the state institutions that form and execute state economic and financial policies to prepare for possible particularly difficult economic and financial situations

The Constitutional Court's decision of 20 April 2010

Under the Constitution, inter alia, under the constitutional principles of a state under the rule of law and responsible governance, the state institutions forming and pursuing state economic and financial policies must also assess the fact that, due to special circumstances (economic crisis etc.), there may arise a particularly difficult economic and financial situation in the state. Therefore, the state institutions must take all possible measures in order to predict the tendencies in the economic development of the state and to prepare for the possible emergence of such particularly difficult economic and financial situations.

Revising the state budget upon the emergence of a particularly difficult economic and financial situation in the state

The Constitutional Court's decision of 20 April 2010

In its acts, the Constitutional Court has noted the following on more than one occasion: neither the Government, which, under the Constitution, has the powers to execute the state budget, nor the Seimas which, under the Constitution, approves the state budget by means of a law, may refrain from reacting to such an essential change in the economic and financial condition of the state where, due to special circumstances (economic crisis, a natural disaster, etc.), a particularly difficult economic and financial situation occurs in the state; in such cases, due to objective reasons, there may be a lack of funds for the performance of state functions and for the satisfaction of public interests; under such circumstances, the respective legal regulation may be subject to change; upon the emergence of a particularly difficult economic and financial situation in the state, there may be difficulties in collecting the revenue provided for in the law on the state budget (and on municipal budgets); thus, the required funds are not obtained for financing certain needs provided for in the law on the state budget (and on municipal budgets); in such cases (but, certainly, not in such cases exclusively), the state budget may be amended before the end of the budget year; such an option is expressis verbis provided for in Paragraph 2 of Article 132 of the Constitution; upon amending the state budget (and municipal budgets), the expenditure (allocations) may be reduced (rulings of 28 March 2006, 22 October 2007, and 11 December 2009 and the decision of 13 November 2007).

The state budget is formed for a budget year; the duty of the legislature, before approving the state budget for a subsequent year, to reassess the actual economic and financial situation in the state

The Constitutional Court's decision of 20 April 2010

When disclosing the constitutional concept of the state budget, the Constitutional Court has held that, under the Constitution, the budget year coincides with a calendar year; the Seimas must approve the state budget for a budget year, but not for some other period of time; each budget year, the Seimas must form the state budget for the following budget year taking into consideration the existing social and economic situation, the needs and possibilities of society and the state, the available or potential financial resources and the liabilities of the state, as well as a number of other important factors; when adopting the law on the state budget, the Seimas must pay regard to the striving for a just and harmonious society, which is enshrined in the Constitution (ruling of 14 January 2002).

In this context, it needs to be noted that the constitutional concept of the state budget, inter alia, the constitutional institution of a budget year, implies that, in cases where there is an extreme situation in the state (economic crisis etc.) due to which the economic and financial situation in the state has changed to the extent that, inter alia, it is impossible to ensure the accumulation of the funds necessary for the payment of the remuneration for work of officials and state servants of the institutions that are funded from state and municipal budgets (remuneration for work of other employees who are remunerated for work from the funds of state and municipal budgets) or to ensure the accumulation of the funds necessary for the payment of pensions and where, due to this, the respective legal regulation has to be modified by reducing the remuneration and pensions of the said persons, it is allowed to reduce the remuneration and pensions for no longer than one budget year. The constitutional institution of a budget year gives rise to the duty of the legislature, in the course of deliberating and approving the state budget for a subsequent year, to reassess the actual economic and financial situation in the state and to decide whether the said situation is still a particularly difficult one, inter alia, whether the collection of the revenue of the state budget is still disordered to the extent that, due to this, the state is unable to perform the obligations undertaken by it and, therefore, whether it is also necessary to establish for the subsequent budget year such a legal regulation whereby the reduced remuneration and pensions would have to be paid.

The powers of the legislature to postpone the performance of the financial obligations undertaken by the state upon the emergence of a particularly difficult economic and financial situation in the state

... upon the emergence of a particularly difficult economic and financial situation in the state where, inter alia, the collection of the revenue of the state budget is disordered to the extent that, due to this, the state is unable to perform (inter alia, when exercising its discretion) certain undertaken financial obligations within the established time limits, the legal regulation related to the performance of the said obligations could be modified, inter alia, by postponing the performance of such obligations. In doing so, the legislature must observe the requirements stemming from the Constitution, inter alia, the principles of justice, reasonableness, and a state under the rule of law.

The law on the state budget and municipal budgets is a law of time-limited validity and time-limited application

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 15 February 2013

Paragraph 1 of Article 131 of the Constitution prescribes that the draft state budget is considered by the Seimas and is approved by means of a law before the start of the new budget year. In its ruling of 14 January 2002, the Constitutional Court noted that, when approving the state budget by means of a law, the Seimas approves the state budget revenue and expenditure (allocations).

The Constitutional Court has held that every law on the state budget and municipal budgets is a law of time-limited validity and time-limited application; the financing of the administrators of allocations from the funds of the state budget and of municipal budgets of given years is completed when a given budget year ends, i.e. on 31 December of that year; after this date, the law on the state budget and on municipal budgets may not be applied at all, inter alia – it needs to be particularly emphasised – after the said date, the transfer of allocations of the previous budget year to any administrator of allocations is impossible in such a way that would create the impression that the said transfer was made in the previous budget year, since a new budget year has started; therefore, even if it were established that the impugned legal regulation was in conflict with the Constitution, no intervention of the law-making subjects (Seimas and the Government respectively) in that legal regulation is possible, since the relevant legal acts were intended for the regulation of the relationships that are over and, thus, they no longer exist; such an intervention would be meaningless and irrational, since this would mean that particular law-making subjects try to regulate the past; consequently, this would mean that they attempt to change the past (decision of 13 November 2007 and the ruling of 29 June 2012).

... when the respective legal act is not only invalid, but also must not be applied at all, the Constitutional Court has the discretion to decide on an investigation into the constitutionality of such a legal act. When doing so, it must assess not only the fact whether this law is intended for a certain budgetary period only, but also other important circumstances, inter alia, the fact whether such an investigation could be significant for the adoption of the budget laws of subsequent years.

The assessment whether the state budget provides for sufficient or insufficient funds for certain needs (objectives)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 15 February 2013

The question whether certain needs (objectives) are allocated sufficient or insufficient funds from the state budget is not about the compliance of the state budget with the Constitution, but about budget planning, the evaluation of the needs of society and the state, their balance with the possibilities of society and the state, and, consequently, social and economic expediency (rulings of 14 January 2002 and 21 December 2006). The Constitutional Court does not decide these questions except the cases where the law on the state budget establishes such a legal regulation in which it is clear from the start that the said law clearly provides for insufficient funds or no finance for certain needs (objectives) by not providing at the same time for any other (alternative) sources of financing, where the said sources of financing, under the Constitution, may be provided for certain needs, and where such insufficient financing or the absence of such financing is clearly in conflict with the welfare of the nation, the interests of society and the State of Lithuania, and clearly denies the values consolidated, defended, and protected by the Constitution (ruling of 21 December 2006).

The concept of the state budget; the powers of the Seimas and the Government in the sphere of the state budget; requirements for the adoption and entry into force of laws affecting the revenue and expenditure of the state budget (inter alia, the requirement that amendments to laws affecting the revenue and expenditure of the state budget be adopted before the Seimas approves the state budget and the requirement that a sufficient vacatio legis be envisaged)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 15 February 2013

... the state budget is an important constitutional institution. The grounds for drafting and approving the state budget are consolidated in the Constitution, inter alia, in Item 14 of Article 67 and Articles 127, 129–132 thereof.

The requirements arising from Paragraph 1 of Article 69 of the Constitution and the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law are inseparable from the constitutional concept of the state budget and the constitutional imperatives established for drafting, considering, and approving the state budget.

The state budget is a plan of the state revenue and expenditure (allocations) for a specific period, i.e. a financial plan of the state, according to which public funds are redistributed; in the legal sense, the state budget is a law, by means of which a plan of the state revenue and expenditure (allocations) for a budget year is approved (ruling of 14 January 2002 and the decision of 13 November 2007). According to the constitutional concept of the state budget, the state revenue and expenditure planned for the budget year must be provided for in the state budget approved by means of a law (ruling of 14 January 2002). Article 129 of the Constitution provides that the budget year starts on 1 January and ends on 31 December.

The revenue of the state budget is raised from taxes, compulsory payments, levies, income from state-owned property, and other income (Paragraph 2 of Article 127 of the Constitution). Taxes – compulsory and unrequited payments established by means of a law and paid to the state budget by legal and natural persons at a fixed time – are one of the main sources of the revenue of the state budget (ruling of 17 November 2003); they are established by means of laws (Item 15 of Article 67 and Paragraph 3 of Article 127 of the Constitution).

Under the Constitution, the Seimas approves the state budget and supervises its execution (Item 14 of Article 67). The budgetary function of the Seimas is its classical function; when account is taken of the essential influence of the situation of public finances on the implementation of state functions, the budgetary function is one of the most important functions of the parliament of a democratic state under the rule of law. Paragraph 1 of Article 131 of the Constitution prescribes that the draft state budget is considered by the Seimas and is approved by law before the start of the new budget year.

Drafting the state budget is the exceptional competence of the Government: under the Constitution, the Government draws up a draft state budget and presents it to the Seimas not later than 75 days before the end of the budget year (Item 4 of Article 94 and Article 130). The Government and no one else has the powers to estimate in the draft budget of the state how much revenue will be received and from which sources, how much funds must be allocated and for what purposes, etc. (ruling of 11 July 2002). All planned revenue and expenditure of the state budget must be specified sufficiently clearly by concretely indicating the state revenue sources and the estimated sums of funds that could be received from those sources, the purpose of the expenditure for financing various spheres, the precise sums of the allocated funds and the subjects to which those funds would be allocated. Otherwise, no conditions would be created for implementing the real and effective parliamentary supervision over the execution of the state budget.

Under the Constitution, the Government has the exceptional powers to execute the state budget (Item 4 of Article 94). As noted in the Constitutional Court's ruling of 14 January 2002, the provision of Item 4 of Article 94 of the Constitution, whereby the Government executes the state budget, means that the Government has the duty to ensure that the budget receives the specified revenue and that these funds are transferred to the subjects specified in the law on the state budget.

As mentioned before, the Government, while implementing its powers to prepare a draft state budget, is bound by the constitutional requirement to submit it to the Seimas not later than 75 days before the end of the budget year, i.e. not later than on 17 October, whereas the Seimas is under the obligation to consider this draft and approve it by means of a law for the next budget year before its beginning, i.e. not later than on 31 December. The deadlines, consolidated expressis verbis in the Constitution, for presenting a draft state budget to the Seimas and for its approval mark the limits that may not be overstepped by the Government and the Seimas; however, the said deadlines do not imply that a draft state budget should be prepared, considered, and approved only just before the expiry of those deadlines. In this context, it needs to be mentioned that, under Paragraph 1 of Article 64 of the Constitution, the autumn session of the Seimas begins on 10 September; thus, a draft state budget may be submitted to the Seimas and the Seimas may start considering it much earlier than the deadline for its submission provided for in Article 130 of the Constitution.

Paragraph 1 of Article 132 of the Constitution provides that, if the state budget is not approved on time, in such cases, at the beginning of the budget year, the budget expenditure each month may not exceed 1/12 of the expenditure of the state budget of the previous budget year. Consequently, under the Constitution, if the Seimas does not approve the state budget before the beginning of a budget year, the application of the provisions of the state budget of the previous year would in fact be prolonged. At the same time, it needs to be emphasised that this constitutional provision may and must be understood only as one providing for a certain way out in a situation where the Seimas, in exceptional circumstances, does not approve the state budget within the time specified in Paragraph 1 of Article 131 of the Constitution; however, the said provision must not be interpreted as allowing the Seimas to disregard the established time limit.

The constitutional concept of the state budget and the constitutional principle of responsible governance mean that the state budget must be realistic and that the revenue and expenditure provided for therein must be based on an assessment of the needs and possibilities of society and the state. The Constitutional Court has held that the constitutional imperative of an open, just, and harmonious civil society, as well as the necessity to ensure the constitutional rights and freedoms of persons and to protect other values consolidated in the Constitution, implies the duty of the Government, in the course of preparing a draft state budget, and the duty of the Seimas, in the course of considering and approving the state budget, to take into consideration the state functions established in the Constitution, the existing economic and social situation, the needs and possibilities of society and the state, the available and potential financial resources and state obligations (inter alia, international ones), as well as other important factors (ruling of 11 July 2002). In this context, it also needs to be mentioned that, under the Constitution, inter alia, under the constitutional principle of responsible governance, the state institutions forming and pursuing state economic and financial policies must take all possible measures in order to predict the tendencies in the economic development of the state and to prepare for the possible emergence of particularly difficult economic and financial situations (decision of 20 April 2010).

The Constitutional Court has also held that the question whether certain needs (objectives) are provided with sufficient or insufficient funds from the state budget is not about the compliance of the state budget with the Constitution, but about budget planning, the evaluation of the needs of society and the state, their balance with the possibilities of society and the state, and, consequently, social and economic expediency (rulings of 14 January 2002 and 21 December 2006); however, this official constitutional doctrinal provision may not be interpreted as also including the cases where the law on the state budget establishes such a legal regulation in which it is clear from the start that the said law clearly provides for insufficient or no finance for certain needs (objectives) by not providing at the same time for any other (alternative) sources of financing, where the said sources of financing, under the Constitution, may be provided for certain needs, and where such insufficient financing or the absence of such financing is clearly in conflict with the welfare of the nation, the interests of society and the State of Lithuania, and clearly denies the values consolidated, defended, and protected by the Constitution (ruling of 21 December 2006).

The Constitutional Court has held in its acts on more than one occasion that the Seimas is bound not only by the Constitution, but also by its own laws. Thus, while considering and approving a draft state budget, the Seimas must follow the laws that imply a certain amount of estimated state revenue and expenditure, i.e. it must follow the tax laws and other laws that create the preconditions for planning and collecting the revenue of the state budget, as well as the laws determining state financial obligations and the respective planned state budget expenditure. The Constitutional Court has noted that, under the Constitution, the legislature, when passing a law or another legal act the implementation of which requires funds, must provide for the funds necessary for implementing such a law or another legal act; under the Constitution, the legislature may not create any such a legal situation where, after passing a law or another legal act the implementation of which requires funds, such funds are not allocated or the allocation thereof is not sufficient (rulings of 13 December 2004, 21 December 2006, and 29 June 2010).

The Government executes laws (Item 2 of Article 94 of the Constitution); therefore, it is evident that, while preparing a draft state budget, it must also invoke the laws that affect the amount of planned state revenue and expenditure. As held in the Constitutional Court's ruling of 14 January 2002, a draft state budget prepared by the Government must provide for funds necessary for the implementation of laws.

Since the Government, when preparing a draft state budget, and the Seimas, when considering and approving it, are bound by valid laws that affect the amount of planned state revenue and expenditure and, at the same time, have the duty to predict the tendencies in the development of the economy of the state, to assess the needs and possibilities of society and the state, it may become necessary to amend such laws correspondingly. It needs to be noted that, if amendments to such laws established certain duties or limitations with respect to persons, regard must be paid to the constitutional requirement to provide for a sufficient vacatio legis, i.e. enough time should be left before the entry into force of those amendments (beginning of the application thereof) so that the interested persons could properly prepare for them. In this context, it needs to be mentioned that, in the course of making amendments (establishing new taxes, increasing the existing ones, etc.) exerting a decisive influence on the state budget revenue, this fact is of special importance, since a sufficient vacatio legis in the sphere of tax law is an important guarantee that persons (first of all, taxpayers) would be able not only to familiarise themselves with new requirements of tax laws in advance, but also to adapt their property interests and perspectives of economic activity to the said requirements. Thus, while preparing a draft state budget and considering it, it is necessary, among other things, to assess whether, prior to the approval of the state budget at the Seimas, the respective amendments should be made to tax laws and other laws that affect state revenue and expenditure where the constitutional requirement for a sufficient vacatio legis is applicable to the entry into force of such laws.

All this implies that, when account is taken of the constitutional principle of responsible governance, the preparation of a draft state budget should be started on the day that would make it possible, if need arises, to adopt the necessary amendments of the aforesaid laws on time. A deviation from these requirements might be allowed only in exceptional circumstances if this is justified by an important public interest.

The expenditure established by means of laws may not be reduced as long as these laws are not altered (Paragraph 2 of Article 131 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 15 February 2013

In the course of preparing, considering, and approving a draft state budget, the requirements stemming from the prohibition, which is consolidated in Paragraph 2 of Article 131 of the Constitution, against reducing the expenses provided for by means of laws as long as the said laws are not amended, and from the constitutional concept of such laws, are also binding on the Government and the Seimas.

In its ruling of 14 January 2002, when interpreting Paragraph 2 of Article 131 of the Constitution, the Constitutional Court, inter alia, held the following:

- the state revenue and expenditure planned for the budget year must be provided for only in the state budget approved by means of law; the provision that the expenditure established by means of laws may not be reduced as long as these laws are not amended may not be interpreted as making it possible to provide for such funding of certain needs that is not included in the law on the state budget of the given year;

- the laws specified in Paragraph 2 of Article 131 of the Constitution, which provide for certain expenditure, are not laws that may substitute for or change the law on the state budget; the aforesaid laws are not allowed to regulate the relationships that the Constitution permits regulating only by the law on the state budget; the aforesaid laws create the obligation to ensure the succession of the relationships connected with the state budget each budget year and the financial continuity when the persistent pursuit of certain public objectives (special, long-term, strategic) requires more funds than it is possible to allocate in one budget year;

- the laws specified in Paragraph 2 of Article 131 of the Constitution, which provide for certain expenditure, are an exception rather than a rule; non-state-budget laws can provide only for expenditure necessary in order to achieve a defined, generally important objective over a certain period of time established by means of a law, provided these needs cannot be satisfied in one budget year; however, such laws may not provide for funds necessary for the execution of routine functions of the state or for funds necessary to finance the everyday needs of society.

The process of the state budget in the year of the election of the Seimas

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 15 February 2013

... under the Constitution, the Seimas considers the draft state budget prepared by the Government and approves it by means of a law before the start of the new budget year. It needs to be noted that, under the Constitution, members of the Seimas are elected for a four-year term (Paragraph 1 of Article 55); a regular election to the Seimas is held on the year of the expiry of the powers of the members of the Seimas on the second Sunday of October (Paragraph 1 of Article 57 (wording of 13 July 2004)); the term of powers of the members of the newly elected Seimas is begun to be counted from the beginning of its first sitting, whereas the term of powers of the previously elected members of the Seimas expires (Paragraph 1 of Article 59); the Government returns its powers to the President of the Republic after the election of the Seimas (Paragraph 4 of Article 92) and later, after a new Government is formed, resigns (Item 4 of Paragraph 3 of Article 101); a new Government receives the powers to act after the Seimas gives assent to its programme (Paragraph 5 of Article 92); the Government is jointly and severally responsible to the Seimas for the general activities of the Government (Paragraph 1 of Article 96 of the Constitution).

Thus, the constitutional regulation of the state budget process and the constitutional regulation of the time of the election of the Seimas creates the preconditions, in the year when the election to the Seimas takes place, for a newly elected Seimas and the Government, which is responsible to the Seimas and receives the powers to act after the Seimas gives assent to its programme, to engage in the state budget process that has already started.

When the provision of Item 14 of Article 67 of the Constitution, whereby the Seimas approves the state budget, and the provision of Paragraph 1 of Article 131 thereof, whereby the Seimas considers and approves the draft state budget by means of a law before the start of the new budget year, are interpreted in conjunction with the provision of Paragraph 1 of Article 57 (wording of 13 July 2004) thereof, according to which a regular election to the Seimas is held in the year of the expiry of the powers of the members of the Seimas on the second Sunday of October, it needs to be noted that it is necessary to establish in laws and the Statute of the Seimas such a legal regulation that, in the year when a new Seimas is elected, would create the conditions for implementing the constitutional powers of the Seimas to consider and approve the draft state budget, thus securing the possibility for the political forces that have won the election to the Seimas to implement, in reality, their programmes, which acquire the legal meaning only when the Seimas approves the programme of the Government by its resolution.

In addition, the Constitution, inter alia, Paragraph 1 of Article 57 (wording of 13 July 2004), Item 7 of Article 67, Paragraph 5 of Article 92, Item 4 of Article 94, and Paragraph 1 of Article 131 thereof, means that a legal regulation should also create the conditions for the new Government in order that it would implement its constitutional powers to draft the state budget.

... the Government, when implementing its constitutional competence, must present a draft state budget to the Seimas not later than 75 days before the end of the budget year. Thus, there can also arise such a situation where a draft state budget for the subsequent year would be prepared and approved before the beginning of the new term of office of the Seimas (thus, also before the new Government is granted the powers to act); however, even in such a case, it is necessary to ensure the possibility for the Seimas of the new term of office and the new Government responsible to the Seimas to implement their constitutional powers related to preparing, considering, and approving the state budget, thus securing the possibility for the political forces that have won the election to the Seimas to implement, in reality, their programmes, which acquire the legal meaning after the Seimas approves the programme of the Government by its resolution.

Deviations from the constitutional requirements for the adoption and entry into force of laws affecting the revenue and expenditure of the state budget upon the emergence of a particularly difficult economic and financial situation in the state; the duty of the legislature, before approving the state budget for a subsequent year, to reassess the actual economic and financial situation in the state

The Constitutional Court has noted that neither the Government, which, under the Constitution, has the powers to execute the state budget, nor the Seimas, which, under the Constitution, approves the state budget by means of a law, may refrain from reacting to such an essential change in the economic and financial condition of the state where, due to special circumstances (economic crisis, a natural disaster, etc.), a particularly difficult economic and financial situation occurs in the state; upon the emergence of a particularly difficult economic and financial situation in the state, there may be difficulties in collecting the revenue provided for in the law on the state budget (and on municipal budgets); thus, the required funds would not be obtained for financing certain needs provided for in the law on the state budget (and on municipal budgets) (inter alia, the decision of 13 November 2007, the ruling of 11 December 2009, and the decision of 20 April 2010).

It needs to be noted that possible deviations from the constitutional requirements established for the adoption and entry into force of the laws that affect the state budget and its revenue and expenditure, inter alia, from the constitutional principles of a state under the rule of law and responsible governance, inter alia, from the requirement that the amendments of the laws that affect the state budget and its revenue and expenditure be adopted before the Seimas approves the state budget, and from the requirement for providing for a sufficient vacatio legis, may be constitutionally justifiable on the grounds of the aim to ensure an important public interest – to guarantee the stability of public finances, not to allow the rise of an excessive budget deficit in the state due to a particularly difficult economic and financial situation because of the economic crisis – determining the necessity of urgent and effective decisions.

The Constitutional Court has held that the constitutional institution of a budget year gives rise to the duty of the legislature, in the course of deliberating and approving the state budget for a subsequent year, to reassess the actual economic and financial situation in the state and to decide whether the said situation is still a particularly difficult one, inter alia, whether the collection of the state budget revenue is still disordered to the extent that, due to this, the state is unable to perform the obligations undertaken by it (decision of 20 April 2010 and the ruling of 6 February 2012). While submitting a draft budget to the Seimas, the Government must substantiate the revenue and allocations indicated therein with the evaluation of the needs and possibilities of the state and society; this information must be public (ruling of 14 January 2002). Among other things, this means that society must be presented with concrete criteria upon which the assessment of the economic and financial situation of the state is based, determining the planning of the state budget revenue and expenditure and a possible need correspondingly to amend the laws that affect the revenue and expenditure, especially the laws establishing obligations of and limitations upon persons.

In this context, it needs to be noted that, under the Constitution, if a particularly difficult economic and financial situation in the state is long-term and continues for more than one year, there is no tolerance for the fact that, in the course of adopting the laws that affect the state budget revenue and expenditure, the aforementioned requirements, which arise from the Constitution, for the adoption and entry into force of these laws would be disregarded by justifying this by the necessity to adopt urgent decisions in order to handle the consequences of the economic crisis.

The constitutional duty to pay taxes

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 15 February 2013

The duty to pay taxes is a constitutional duty (inter alia, the rulings of 10 July 1997 and 24 January 2006). It needs to be noted that, when establishing such a duty by means of a law, regard must be paid to the Constitution, inter alia, the constitutional principles of justice, proportionality, legal certainty, and the protection of the legitimate expectations of persons.

... the persons who, under the Constitution, must pay taxes established by means of a law have the right to reasonably expect that, in the course of establishing or changing taxes, regard should be paid to the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law, inter alia, the principles of legal certainty, legal security, and the protection of legitimate expectations, which implies the duty of the state to ensure the stability of the legal regulation by which taxes are established, as well as to protect and respect the legitimate interests and legitimate expectations of taxpayers.

The reduction of the financing of the areas funded from the funds of the state budget and municipal budgets upon the emergence of a particularly difficult economic and financial situation in the state

... the constitutional imperatives of a state under the rule of law, justice, proportionality, the equality of rights, and social solidarity mean, inter alia, that the burden of an economic and financial crisis should be evenly and proportionately shared by all society (ruling of 6 February 2012). As a rule, in the event of a particularly difficult economic and financial situation, the budgetary financing of all institutions exercising state power, as well as the financing of various areas financed from the funds of the state budget and municipal budgets, should be revised and reduced (rulings of 28 March 2006 and 22 October 2007).

The concept of the state budget

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 5 July 2013

The state budget is a plan of the state revenue and expenditure (allocations) for a specific period, i.e. a financial plan of the state, according to which public funds are redistributed; in the legal sense, the state budget is a law, by means of which a plan of the state revenue and expenditure (allocations) for a budget year is approved (inter alia, the ruling of 14 January 2002 and the decision of 13 November 2007). The funds of the budget of the state, as the organisation of all society and as the organisation that is obliged to act in the interests of all society so that social harmony is ensured, must be allocated for the performance of various functions of the state and the provision of public services (ruling of 16 May 2013).

Taxes; the powers of the legislature to establish taxes, tax exceptions, and tax concessions

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 22 September 2015

The Constitutional Court has held that taxes form an essential part of the financial system of the state and that they constitute the main part of the revenue of the state budget (inter alia, the rulings of 15 March 2000 and 5 July 2013) and are one of the primary conditions for the existence of the state (rulings of 9 October 1998 and 5 July 2013). The establishment of taxes is aimed at receiving revenue to perform the functions of the state (municipality) and to meet the public needs of both society and the state (rulings of 17 November 2003 and 5 July 2013). When taxes are not paid or are overdue, the state (municipal) budget does not receive part of its revenue and the possibilities for the state (municipality) to perform the functions established for it are limited (rulings of 10 July 1997, 17 November 2003, and 5 July 2013). By means of taxes, economic and social processes are regulated, useful economic efforts are encouraged, and the priorities of economic development are supported (ruling of 17 November 2003). Tax relationships are a matter of regulation by public law; tax relationships are legal relations of an authoritative nature between taxpayers and state institutions; the decisions (orders) adopted by state institutions are obligatory to taxpayers (rulings of 17 November 2003 and 12 February 2010).

The Constitutional Court also noted in its acts that taxes and other compulsory payments are compulsory and unrequited payments of a certain size that are established by means of a law and made by legal and natural persons to the state (municipal) budget in due time (inter alia, the rulings of 24 January 2006 and 3 April 2015). State taxes and other compulsory payments are a pecuniary obligation of legal subjects to the state; under the Constitution, only the Seimas may establish state taxes and other compulsory payments and it may establish them only by means of a law, which is an important guarantee of the protection of the rights of persons (rulings of 3 June 2002 and 3 April 2015). When imposing taxes, the legislature must pay regard to the norms and principles of the Constitution, inter alia, the constitutional principles of justice, reasonableness, and proportionality (ruling of 22 December 2006). The Constitutional Court has held on more than one occasion that such essential elements of tax as the object of tax, the subjects of tax relationships, their rights and duties, the sizes (rates) of tax, the time limits of payment, tax exceptions and tax concessions, fines and late payment interest should be established by means of a law.

In the context of the constitutional justice case at issue, it should be noted that the establishment of tax exceptions or tax concessions is a matter of social and economic expediency that is within the competence of the legislature. Under the Constitution, the legislature has the discretion to establish, by means of a law, tax exceptions or tax concessions by taking account of the resources of the state and society, the material and financial possibilities, and the priorities of economic and social policy and by paying regard to other important factors. In doing so, the legislature may not violate the norms or principles of the Constitution.

In this ruling of the Constitutional Court, it has been mentioned that such essential elements of tax as the object of tax, the subjects of tax relationships, their rights and duties, the sizes (rates) of tax, the time limits of payment, tax exceptions and tax concessions should be established by means of a law.

Consequently, all conditions for imposing a certain tax should be established by means of a law. The law providing for the conditions of a certain tax must not contain any provisions granting the discretion to the state institutions administering taxes to decide whether a concrete taxpayer has to pay the tax or may be exempted from it even when certain circumstances are taken into account, as, for instance, the financial situation of the family of the taxpayer, the ability of such a family to pay, the number of under-age children raised in the family, etc. Otherwise, should the state institutions administering taxes have such discretion, the essence of a tax as a law-established unrequited compulsory payment by legal and natural persons during the established period to the state budget would be denied.

Decisions concerning the basic property liabilities of the state are adopted by the Seimas (Paragraph 1 of Article 128 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 29 September 2015

In the Constitutional Court's ruling of 15 February 2013, it is noted that, under the Constitution, while preparing a draft state budget, the Government and, while considering and approving a draft state budget, the Seimas must follow the laws that presuppose a certain amount of estimated state revenue and expenditure, including the laws determining state financial obligations.

In this context, it should be emphasised that, under Paragraph 1 of Article 128 of the Constitution, decisions concerning the basic property liabilities of the state are adopted by the Seimas upon the proposal of the Government.

... under the Constitution, inter alia, Paragraph 1 of Article 128 thereof, the decisions that have an essential influence on the amount of the expenditure of the state provided for in the state budget must be adopted and consolidated in laws by the Seimas. Otherwise, if decisions affecting a significant part of the expenditure of the state budget were consolidated in acts adopted by other state institutions, the preconditions would be created for the emergence of the situations where the Seimas, being incapable of changing such situations, would have to approve the state budget without being able to affect its content to particular significant extent. This would mean that the possibilities of the Seimas to efficiently fulfil its constitutional budgetary function are restricted and that its role in forming the state budget is a mere formality and this would not be in line with the purpose and essence of the constitutional powers of the Seimas in the sphere of state finances.

In view of the fact that the funds of the state (municipal) budget allocated for the pay for work of the employees of establishments through which various functions of the state are implemented and which are financed from that budget represent a significant part of the expenditure of the state (municipal) budget, it should be held that the financial liabilities of the state that determine the said expenditure and are linked to the work pay of these employees must be considered the basic property liabilities of the state and, under Paragraph 1 of Article 128 of the Constitution, decisions concerning these liabilities must be adopted by the Seimas upon the proposal of the Government. Therefore, the most important elements (which have essential influence on the amount of the expenditure of the state (municipal) budget) of the work pay of the employees of establishments financed from the said funds must be established by means of a law.

The powers of the Seimas to supervise the execution of the state budget (Item 14 of Article 67 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 16 May 2019

... Item 14 of Article 67 of the Constitution prescribes that the Seimas, inter alia, supervises the execution of the state budget. In its ruling of 13 May 2004, the Constitutional Court held that this provision of Item 14 of Article 67 of the Constitution is concretised in Item 4 of Article 94 of the Constitution, which, inter alia, provides that the Government submits to the Seimas a report on the execution of the budget; thus, under the Constitution, the Seimas has the powers to approve this report.

It should be noted that, under the Constitution, the Government has the exclusive powers to execute the state budget (Item 4 of Article 94). As noted in the Constitutional Court's ruling of 14 January 2002, the provision of Item 4 of Article 94 of the Constitution, whereby the Government executes the state budget, means that the Government has the duty to ensure that the state budget receives the specified revenue and that these funds are transferred to the entities specified in the law on the state budget. It should also be noted that, under the Constitution, the Seimas exercises parliamentary control over the Government (ruling of 24 December 2002).

Thus, the powers of the Seimas, consolidated in Item 14 of Article 67 of the Constitution, to supervise the execution of the state budget mean not only that the Seimas, pursuant to Item 4 of Article 94 of the Constitution, approves a report on the execution of the budget, but also that the Seimas supervises the execution of the state budget through the forms of parliamentary control over the Government, which are established by the Constitution.

In this context, it should be noted that the National Audit Office is a state institution exercising economic and financial control, which supervises the lawfulness of the possession and use of state-owned property and the execution of the state budget; it is accountable directly to the Seimas, which exercises parliamentary control over this institution (ruling of 6 December 1995). Thus, the powers of the Seimas, consolidated in Item 14 of Article 67 of the Constitution, to supervise the execution of the state budget also mean that the Seimas supervises the execution of the state budget through the forms of parliamentary control over the State Audit Office, which are established by the Constitution.

It should also be noted that, in exercising its powers under Item 14 of Article 67 of the Constitution to supervise the execution of the state budget, the Seimas, having regard to the Constitution, inter alia, the constitutionally consolidated principles of responsible governance and a state under the rule of law, may also exercise parliamentary control over the institutions that have been founded by means of laws, are accountable to the Seimas, and are independent managers of state budget appropriations.

11.2. THE POSSESSION, USE, AND DISPOSAL OF STATE-OWNED PROPERTY.
PROPERTY THAT BELONGS BY RIGHT OF EXCLUSIVE OWNERSHIP TO THE REPUBLIC OF LITHUANIA

The constitutional grounds for possessing, using, and disposing of state-owned property (Paragraph 2 of Article 128 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 30 September 2003

Paragraph 2 of Article 128 of the Constitution provides that the procedure for the possession, use, and disposal of state-owned property is established by law.

The content of the provisions of Paragraph 2 of Article 128 of the Constitution should be interpreted in a systemic manner, in the context of the entire constitutional regulation, by taking account, inter alia, of the following: Paragraph 2 of Article 23 of the Constitution, according to which the rights of ownership are protected by law; Paragraph 1 of Article 46, which provides that the economy of Lithuania is based on the right of private ownership, freedom of individual economic activity, and economic initiative;

Paragraph 3 of the same article, which states that the state regulates economic activity so that it serves the general welfare of the nation; Paragraph 4 of the same article, which stipulates that the law prohibits the monopolisation of production and the market, and protects freedom of fair competition; the provisions of Article 47 of the Constitution, which consolidate the right of exclusive ownership of the state of certain objects and establish what objects may belong to foreign subjects by right of ownership; and the provision of Paragraph 1 of Article 134 of the Constitution, whereby the National Audit Office supervises the lawfulness of the possession and use of state-owned property and the execution of the state budget.

The provisions of Paragraph 2 of Article 128 of the Constitution are inseparable from the provisions of the Constitution that consolidate such constitutional values as the independence of the state and the integrity of its territory, the security of the state, the welfare of the nation, public order and justice. They are also inseparable from the provisions of the Constitution that lay down various constitutional obligations of the state: family, motherhood, fatherhood, and childhood are under the protection and care of the state (Article 38 of the Constitution); the state takes care of families raising and bringing up children at home, and renders them support according to the procedure established by law (Article 39 of the Constitution); education at state and municipal schools of general education, vocational schools, and schools of further education is free of charge (Paragraph 2 of Article 41 of the Constitution); citizens who are good at their studies are guaranteed education at state schools of higher education free of charge (Paragraph 3 of Article 41 of the Constitution); the state supports culture and science, and takes care of the protection of Lithuanian historical, artistic, and other cultural monuments, as well as other culturally valuable objects (Paragraph 2 of Article 42 of the Constitution); ethnic communities are provided support by the state (Paragraph 2 of Article 45 of the Constitution); the state guarantees its citizens the right to receive old-age and disability pensions, as well as social assistance in the event of unemployment, sickness, widowhood, the loss of the breadwinner, and in other cases provided for by law (Article 52 of the Constitution); the state takes care of the health of people and guarantees medical aid and services for a person in the event of sickness (Paragraph 1 of Article 53 of the Constitution); the state promotes the physical culture of society and supports sport (Paragraph 2 of Article 53 of the Constitution); the state takes care of the protection of the natural environment, wildlife and plants, individual objects of nature, and areas of particular value, and supervises the sustainable use of natural resources, as well as their restoration and increase (Paragraph 1 of Article 54 of the Constitution); the state takes care of and provides for servicemen who lose their health during military service, as well as for the families of servicemen who lose their lives or die during military service (Paragraph 1 of Article 146); the state also provides for citizens who lose their health while defending the state, as well as for the families of citizens who lose their lives or die in defence of the state (Paragraph 2 of Article 146 of the Constitution); as well as other provisions of the Constitution.

Paragraph 2 of Article 128 of the Constitution should also be interpreted while taking account of the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law and the provision of Paragraph 2 of Article 5 of the Constitution, whereby the scope of powers is limited by the Constitution.

Ownership includes obligations (rulings of 21 December 2000 and 14 March 2002). This constitutional imperative is addressed not only to the subjects of the private ownership right, but also to the state and self-government institutions and officials that have the powers to adopt decisions concerning the possession, use, and disposal of property that belongs to the state by right of ownership. Consequently, it is not permitted to establish such a legal regulation according to which property that belongs to the state by right of ownership would be possessed, used, and disposed of in such a manner that the interests of only one social group or separate persons would be satisfied and where this property would not serve the public interest, the need of society, or the welfare of the nation. This welfare may not be understood only in the material (or financial) sense (rulings of 13 February 1997 and 6 October 1999).

State-owned property is not an objective in itself – it should give benefit to society. The social function of state-owned property should be emphasised. While acting in the interests of society, state institutions must serve the common good of the nation. According to Paragraph 1 of Article 134 of the Constitution, state-owned property must be possessed and used lawfully; this is supervised by the National Audit Office.

In the context of the case at issue, it needs to be noted that the provision of Paragraph 2 of Article 23 of the Constitution, whereby the rights of ownership are protected by law, also means that laws must protect the rights of all owners; thus, laws must also protect the right of ownership of the state as the organisation of all society.

The striving for an open, harmonious, and just civil society, which is consolidated in the Preamble to the Constitution, the constitutional principle that ownership includes obligations, Paragraph 2 of Article 23 of the Constitution, according to which the rights of ownership are protected by law, the provision of Paragraph 2 of Article 128 of the Constitution, whereby the procedure concerning the possession, use, and disposal of state-owned property is established by law, as well as other provisions of the Constitution, give rise to the requirement that state-owned property must be used sparingly and not wasted. Such property must be managed rationally.

Under the Constitution, the legislature is obligated to establish, by means of laws, such a legal regulation governing the possession, use, and disposal of state-owned property that would ensure that this property would be used for the needs of society, as well as would serve the public interest and the welfare of the nation. When establishing the said legal regulation, the legislature must observe the Constitution and not violate the constitutional rights of the state as a subject of the right of ownership or the rights of other persons.

The fact that, under the Constitution, state-owned property must be used sparingly and not wasted does not mean that such property may not be transferred into the ownership of other subjects (except ownership objects that belong to the Republic of Lithuania by right of exclusive ownership).

The transfer of property (including its privatisation) that belongs by right of ownership to the state into the ownership of other subjects may be constitutionally justified only if this gives more benefit to society and seeks to satisfy significant and constitutionally justifiable needs/interests of society. Such transfer, both repayable and free of charge, would be constitutionally unjustified if the said transfer inflicted evident harm on society and violated the rights of other persons.

The provision of Paragraph 2 of Article 128 of the Constitution, under which the procedure for the possession, use, and disposal of state-owned property is established by law, means that the transfer of property that belongs by right of ownership to the state into the ownership of other subjects must be based on laws, that laws must, inter alia, establish which state institutions have the powers to adopt decisions concerning the transfer of property that belongs by right of ownership to the state into the ownership of other subjects, and that laws must establish the powers of these institutions to transfer the said property, as well as the conditions and procedure for the transfer of the said property. It is not permitted to establish any such a legal regulation according to which property that belongs to the state by right of ownership would be transferred into the ownership of other subjects in order to satisfy the interests or needs of only one social group, or those of individual persons, if this does not comply with the need of society, the public interest, or does not serve the welfare of the nation. On the other hand, the legal regulation governing the transfer of state-owned property into the ownership of other subjects may not be such that limitations on the right of state institutions to dispose of this property would interfere with the implementation of the functions established for them.

It also needs to be noted that the legislature, while observing the Constitution and taking account of various factors, may establish the regime (conditions and procedure for the use) of property that is subject to transfer into the ownership of other subjects in order to further ensure the interests of society, the welfare of the nation and to implement the values consolidated in the Constitution.

It has been mentioned that the Constitution gives rise to the requirement that state-owned property must be used sparingly, not wasted, and managed rationally.

It needs to be noted that such situations may also arise where, for certain reasons, the state temporarily in fact possesses and uses such property that does not belong to it by right of ownership.

Therefore, if there arises such an objective situation where the state temporarily in fact possesses and uses property that does not belong to it by right of ownership, this property must also be possessed and used by observing the same constitutional requirements when possessing and using property that belongs to the state by right of ownership, i.e. it must also be used sparingly, not wasted, and managed rationally.

This constitutional imperative is also applicable to such property that is temporarily in fact possessed and used by the state where the said property was illegally nationalised or expropriated in other unlawful ways by the occupation government and the rights of ownership to which may be restored according to the law.

The right of exclusive ownership of the Republic of Lithuania; cultural objects of state importance; the nationalisation of cultural objects of national importance (Paragraph 1 of Article 47 (wording of 23 January 2003) of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 8 July 2005

The provision of Paragraph 2 of Article 128 of the Constitution, whereby the procedure for the possession, use, and disposal of state-owned property is established by law, should also be interpreted in the context of the provision of Paragraph 1 of Article 47 of the Constitution, under which the subsurface, as well as the internal waters, forests, parks, roads, and historical, archaeological, and cultural objects of state importance, belong by right of exclusive ownership to the Republic of Lithuania.

It should be noted that, despite several amendments to Article 47 of the Constitution, the aforementioned provision was contained in the Constitution all the time (Paragraph 3 of Article 47 of the Constitution (wording of 25 October 1992), Paragraph 4 of Article 47 of the Constitution (wording of 20 June 1996), and Paragraph 1 of Article 47 of the Constitution, which is in force at present (wording of 23 January 2003)) and it has not been amended.

... while paying regard to the constitutional concept of culture (comprising ... quite diverse values held and fostered by the Nation and separate communities), the notion of cultural objects of state importance, which is used in Paragraph 1 of Article 47 of the Constitution, is general; it also comprises historical and archaeological objects of state importance, but it is not limited to them; the said notion is much broader. This notion comprises diverse property – real property, movable property, property that is categorised as belonging to the cultural heritage and declared that of state importance according to the established procedure. Moreover, the other objects specified in Paragraph 1 of Article 47 of the Constitution (for example, parks of state importance) may also be considered cultural objects of state importance.

Culture (when this notion is used in its constitutional sense) is always related to valuable objects. The Constitution does not create the preconditions for declaring every cultural object that could be categorised as belonging to the cultural heritage, even when such a cultural object is certainly of great value, as one of state importance. It is allowed to declare not any cultural objects categorised as belonging to cultural heritage to be cultural objects of state importance, but only such cultural objects whose continuous value and importance is so great and the necessity to preserve them for future generations is so pressing that failure to declare them to be of state importance would pose a threat to their preservation and would not ensure access to them for the public.

It should be noted that declaring cultural objects to be of state importance implies a special regulation of the relationships connected with the maintenance, protection, and use of such cultural objects. When taking account of the special continuous value of the said cultural objects, of the importance and necessity to preserve them to the posterity, a special, individual legal regime must be established by means of a law in connection with such cultural objects if compared with other objects.

... freedom of access to culturally valuable objects – freedom of every individual to use the existing culturally valuable objects – is consolidated in the Constitution. Therefore, the legal regime established with regard to cultural objects of state importance must be such that would ensure access to the aforementioned cultural objects for the public and, at the same time, would not inflict damage on these valuable objects or deny other constitutional values.

The legal regime (established by means of a law) of cultural objects of state importance may comprise, inter alia, various prohibitions, obligations, other restrictions or limitations related to the possession, use, or disposal of these cultural objects. This legal regime may be differentiated by taking account of the character (inter alia, the fact whether the respective cultural objects are real property or movable property), features, and other factors of cultural objects.

The state (its institutions or officials) has the duty to control how the aforementioned legal regime is observed.

The provision of Paragraph 1 of Article 47 of the Constitution, whereby the subsurface, as well as the internal waters, forests, parks, roads, and historical, archaeological, and cultural objects of state importance, belong by right of exclusive ownership to the Republic of Lithuania, means that the specified objects may belong by right of ownership solely to the state, save the exceptions that stem directly from the Constitution. The state (its institutions or officials) may not adopt any such decisions that could become the basis for transferring these objects from the ownership of the state into the ownership of other subjects (save the exceptions permitted by the Constitution).

... the provision of Paragraph 1 of Article 47 of the Constitution, whereby the subsurface, as well as the internal waters, forests, parks, roads, and historical, archaeological, and cultural objects of state importance, belong by right of exclusive ownership to the Republic of Lithuania, should also be interpreted in the context of Article 23 of the Constitution. ...

The Constitution, which consolidates the human rights and freedoms (inter alia, freedom of culture and the right of ownership) and recognises their innate nature, tolerates a situation where the objects of culture of even the greatest continuous value and obviously having state or national importance belong by right of ownership not only to the state, but also to other subjects, of course, provided that these other subjects have legally acquired particular cultural objects.

There are different ways how the aforementioned cultural objects of state importance (and various other objects indicated in Paragraph 1 of Article 47 of the Constitution, except the subsurface) may become the ownership of other persons, but not that of the state. A person (artist) may create them himself/herself and become their owner. A person may acquire such cultural objects by means of transactions from another person – their legal owner; besides, the other party of such a transaction need not necessarily be subject to the jurisdiction of the Republic of Lithuania. It should also be mentioned that, after the restoration of the independence in Lithuania, the process of restitution was launched (and is not over yet) – the existing real property that was nationalised and expropriated in any other unlawful manner by the occupation government is still being restituted to the former owners; thus, cases are possible where such property (for example, buildings) that could be categorised as belonging to cultural objects of state importance is also subject to restitution to the former owners. Also, such situations are possible where certain property that legally belongs by right of ownership not to the state, but to another legal or natural person, due to its great permanent value and importance for future generations, is or will be declared a cultural object of state importance in accordance with the established procedure. According to the Constitution, in all these and other cases where cultural objects of state importance belong by right of ownership not to the state, but to other persons, the state (its institutions or officials) must tolerate this. Otherwise, the constitutional imperative of an open, just, and harmonious civil society would be disregarded and the innate human rights and freedoms, as well as other values consolidated, protected, and defended by the Constitution, would be violated.

On the other hand, the institution of expropriation (eminent domain) is also consolidated in the Constitution. Under Paragraph 3 of Article 23 of the Constitution, property may be taken only for the needs of society according to the procedure established by law and must be justly compensated for. The Constitutional Court, when interpreting, in the context of the problem of the ownership of cultural objects of state importance, Paragraph 4 of Article 47 of the Constitution (wording of 20 June 1996), the text of which corresponds to the text of the current Paragraph 1 of Article 47 of the Constitution (wording of 23 January 2003), has held: the Constitution does not reject the possibility of bringing separate cultural objects of state importance into the ownership of the state; this would depend on the public significance and value of particular objects, as well as on the necessity to guarantee the possibility of its endurance and preservation for future generations; such nationalisation of valuables of culture must be carried out only pursuant to the requirements of Paragraph 3 of Article 23 of the Constitution (ruling of 16 March 1999). It should be stressed that the nationalisation of cultural objects is possible only after declaring them to be of state importance in accordance with the established procedure. It should be noted that the nationalisation of such cultural objects of state importance that belong by right of ownership not to the state, but to other subjects, should be regarded as an exceptional measure.

When taking account of the special continuous value and significance of cultural objects of state importance, as well as the need to preserve them for future generations, the state has the constitutional duty to take care of these objects and to protect them. It should be noted that the provision of Paragraph 2 of Article 42 of the Constitution, whereby the state supports culture and science, and takes care of the protection of Lithuanian historical, artistic, and other cultural monuments, as well as other culturally valuable objects, implies that, in cases where certain cultural objects of state importance (and various other objects indicated in Paragraph 1 of Article 47 of the Constitution, except the subsurface) belong by right of ownership not to the state, but to other persons, the state is not relieved from the duty to ensure the protection of the said objects and to take care of them.

In this context, it needs to be emphasised that the constitutional status of cultural objects of state importance implies the duty of the state to keep records of cultural objects of state importance, inter alia, the duty of the legislature to set, by means of a law, a list of cultural objects of state importance and to mark separately which cultural objects of state importance belong to the state and which of them belong to other owners. If necessary, such a list must be revised in accordance with the established procedure by taking into account the fact whether the need exists during a particular phase of the development of society and the state to include additional cultural objects in the said list (and/or the need exists to exclude certain cultural objects from the aforementioned list). It should be stressed that the inclusion of cultural objects of state importance in the aforementioned list may not depend on the fact whether particular cultural objects belong by right of ownership to the state or to other legal or natural persons. It should also be stressed that the recognition that particular cultural objects that belong by right of ownership not to the state, but to other persons, are of state importance does not mean their nationalisation.

The specified requirements that stem from the Constitution and are related to keeping records of cultural objects of state importance and the duty of the state to take care of cultural objects of state importance and to ensure their protection (irrespective of the fact whether the aforementioned cultural objects belong by right of ownership to the state or to other legal or natural persons) are also mutatis mutandis applicable to the other objects indicated in Paragraph 1 of Article 47 of the Constitution.

[...]

The state (its institutions or officials), when exercising, under the Constitution, the powers to control how the legal regime established in regard to cultural objects of state importance is observed, also has the powers to control how the owners to whom these objects belong by right of ownership and the state or municipal institutions that possess these objects by right of trust or by other (non-property) right observe this legal regime.

[...]

... the material basis for performing the function of supporting and protecting culture, which is transferred to municipalities (to the established extent), is comprised of both the property needed for the performance of this function where such property belongs by right of ownership to municipalities and the property that belongs by right of ownership to the state, but is possessed by right of trust or by other (non-property) right by municipalities.

It should be noted that property that belongs by right of ownership to a certain municipality or property that belongs by right of ownership to the state but is possessed by right of trust by a municipality may be a cultural object of state importance or may become (be declared) such a cultural object in future. Such cultural objects must be included in a list (approved by means of a law) of cultural objects of state importance and such cultural objects may become subject to the legal regime established by means of a law with regard to cultural objects of state importance; the said legal regime may include, inter alia, various prohibitions, obligations, other restrictions, or limitations concerning the possession, use, and disposal of these cultural objects.

It needs to be emphasised that, in order to more efficiently guarantee the function of supporting and protecting culture, which is consolidated in Paragraph 2 of Article 42 of the Constitution, it is possible, by paying regard to the Constitution, to nationalise cultural objects of state importance that belong to municipalities by right of ownership.

The exclusive ownership of the Republic of Lithuania (objects of nature of state importance) (Paragraph 1 of Article 47 (wording of 23 January 2003) of the Constitution) (also see 2. The constitutional status of persons, 2.2. Civil (individual) rights and freedoms, 2.2.5. The right of ownership, 2.2.5.3. Special objects of ownership, and 2.4. Economic, social, and cultural rights, 2.4.2. Social rights, 2.4.2.3. The right to a healthy environment)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 14 March 2006

Under Paragraph 4 (wording 20 June 1996) of Article 47 of the Constitution and Paragraph 1 (wording 23 January 2003) of Article 47 of the Constitution, inter alia, internal waters, forests, and parks of state importance belong by right of exclusive ownership to the Republic of Lithuania.

This constitutional provision means that the specified objects can belong by right of ownership only to the state, save the exceptions that stem from the Constitution itself; the state (its institutions, officials) may not adopt any decisions that could become the basis for transferring these objects from the ownership of the state into the ownership of other subjects (save the exceptions permitted by the Constitution) (ruling of 8 June 2005).

On the other hand, the fact that, under the Constitution, certain objects of state importance belong by right of exclusive ownership to the Republic of Lithuania does not mean that particular objects that belonged by right of ownership to certain persons and were later declared to be of state importance must necessarily be taken into state ownership. In this context, it should be mentioned that, under Paragraph 3 of Article 23 of the Constitution, property may be taken only for the needs of society according to the procedure established by law and must be justly compensated for.

It needs to be emphasised that not every object (inter alia, an object of nature) that belongs by right of ownership to the state should be declared that of state importance. In addition, it needs to be noted that it is allowed to declare not any internal waters, forests, and parks as internal waters, forests, and parks of state importance, but only those whose continuous value is so high and the necessity to preserve them to the posterity is so pressing that, if they were not declared to be of state importance, a threat to their preservation would arise.

When taking account of the special continuous value of internal waters, forests, and parks of state importance and the necessity to preserve them to the posterity, the state is under the constitutional obligation to take care of these objects and preserve them.

The recognition that land, forests, parks, or water bodies, as well as those that are located in areas of particular value, are of state importance, implies a special legal regulation of the relationships connected with the supervision, protection, and use of such objects. When taking account of the special continuous value of the said objects and of the importance and necessity to preserve them to the posterity, a special and individual legal regime may be established by means of a law in connection with such objects if compared with other objects.

The protection of state-owned objects of nature that are located in areas of particular value (Paragraph 2 of Article 23, Paragraph 1 of Article 54, and Paragraph 2 of Article 128 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 14 March 2006

The provision of Paragraph 2 of Article 128 of the Constitution, whereby the procedure for the possession, use, and disposal of state-owned property is established by law, the principle of a state under the rule of law, which is consolidated in the Constitution, the constitutional principle that ownership includes obligations, Paragraph 2 of Article 23 of the Constitution, whereby the rights of ownership are protected by law, and other provisions of the Constitution give rise to the requirement that state property must be used sparingly and not wasted. State-owned property must be managed rationally.

Relating the said constitutional principles with the state duty, which is consolidated in Article 54 of the Constitution, to take care of the protection of the natural environment, individual objects of nature, and areas of particular value, it should be held that, if the objects of nature that are located in areas of particular value belong by right of ownership to the state, then, regardless of whether or not they are declared to be objects of state importance, they may be transferred into the ownership of other persons only in cases (and only in such a manner) where this is constitutionally justifiable. It needs to be mentioned that, inter alia, such a legal regulation whereby land, forests, parks, or water bodies that are located in areas of particular value and belong by right of ownership to the state may be transferred into the ownership of certain other subjects for no consideration or for an unreasonably small price, as well as such a legal regulation whereby land, forests, parks, or water bodies that are located in areas of particular value and belong by right of ownership to the state may be transferred into the ownership of other persons when the rights of ownership are restored to them in equivalent kind, i.e. when a person who did not have the ownership right to an object – land, forest, a park, or a water body – that is located in an area of particular value receives as ownership precisely such an object in kind, would lack the said constitutional grounds.

On the basis of the provision of Paragraph 2 of Article 23 of the Constitution, whereby the rights of ownership are protected by law, the provision of Paragraph 2 of Article 128 thereof, under which the procedure for the possession, use, and disposal of state property is established by law, the provision of Article 54 thereof, according to which the state takes care of the protection of the natural environment, wildlife and plants, individual objects of nature, and areas of particular value, as well as on the basis of other provisions of the Constitution, the conclusion should be drawn that the respective measures of protection, including all limitations and prohibitions regarding the right of ownership, must be established by means of a law.

The possession, use, and disposal of state-owned property

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 30 October 2008

Under the Constitution, the state is a subject of the right of ownership (rulings of 27 May 2002 and 30 September 2003). The Constitutional Court has held on more than one occasion that the state is the organisation of all society. When performing its functions, the state must act in the interests of society (rulings of 4 March 2003 and 13 December 2004).

The property that belongs to the state by right of ownership should be managed in such a way that it would serve the general welfare of the nation and the interest of society at large; state-owned property is one of the means for guaranteeing the public interest and social harmony; institutions of state power and other state institutions that are empowered to adopt decisions concerning the possession, use, and disposal of property that belongs to the state by right of ownership are not themselves the owners of that property – such property belongs to the entire state; therefore, all the state institutions that have the powers to adopt decisions concerning the possession, use, and disposal of property that belongs to the state by right of ownership must observe the norms and principles of the Constitution (ruling of 30 September 2003).

It needs to be noted that state institutions, when adopting decisions regarding the possession, use, and disposal of property that belongs to the state by right of ownership must follow the norms and principles of the Constitution and may not act ultra vires, i.e. by exceeding their powers, under any circumstances. If state institutions or officials act ultra vires, such acts may not be identified, without reservations, with acts of the state itself. ... if state officials, when acting ultra vires, commit a crime, this does not mean that such a criminal act committed by them may be identified with the action of (or the failure to act by) the state itself and that the state, as the owner, may not recover the property that has been lost as a result of a crime committed by a state official.

The possession, use, and disposal of state-owned property (inter alia, the investment of state assets) (Paragraph 2 of Article 128 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 2 March 2009

Paragraph 2 of Article 128 of the Constitution provides that the procedure for the possession, use, and disposal of state-owned property is established by law. When interpreting this provision, the Constitutional Court has held that the transfer of property that belongs by right of ownership to the state into the ownership of other subjects must be based on laws, that laws must, inter alia, establish which state institutions have the powers to adopt decisions concerning the transfer of property that belongs by right of ownership to the state into the ownership of other subjects, and that laws must establish the powers of these institutions to transfer the said property, as well as the conditions and procedure for the transfer of the said property (rulings of 30 September 2003, 8 July 2005, 23 August 2005, 23 May 2007, and 23 November 2007). This is also applicable to the Government, which does not have the discretion to decide not to apply the provisions of a certain law regulating particular relationships, unless the non-application of a certain provision of such a law is expressis verbis provided for in laws (ruling of 23 May 2007).

It needs to be noted that the provision “the transfer of property that belongs by right of ownership to the state into the ownership of other subjects must be based on the law” of the official constitutional doctrine may not be interpreted as meaning that all relationships connected with the transfer of state-owned property into the ownership of other subjects should be regulated only by means of a law – the Government and other subjects of lawmaking, according to their competence, may also regulate these relationships by means of substatutory legal acts that are based on laws and do not compete with them (ruling of 23 November 2007).

When interpreting Paragraph 2 of Article 128 of the Constitution, the Constitutional Court has also held that state-owned property is not an objective in itself, but that it should give benefit to society, that it should be used sparingly, not wasted, and managed rationally; laws must protect the rights of ownership of all owners, including those of the state as the organisation of all society; under the Constitution, no such legal regulation is permissible whereby state-owned property is possessed, used, and disposed of in such a way that the interests or needs of only one social group or individual persons would be satisfied and this property would not serve the public interest, the needs of society, or the welfare of the Nation (where welfare may not be understood only in the material and financial sense) (rulings of 30 September 2003, 8 July 2005, 5 July 2007, 23 November 2007, and 20 March 2008). These constitutional imperatives are also applicable in the situations of the investment of state assets.

... under Paragraph 2 of Article 128 of the Constitution, the investment of state assets must be based on a law that must consolidate the following: the criteria and conditions for investing state assets as well as the subjects that have the right to adopt decisions on the investment of state assets. The establishment of the criteria of the investment of state assets is not an objective in itself – such criteria must be established that would ensure the public interest and the observance of the imperatives that stem from the Constitution, inter alia, Paragraph 2 of Article 128 thereof. The legislature is under the duty to establish such criteria of the investment of state assets that would permit, inter alia, differentiating the investment of state assets by taking account of the specificity of the invested assets and their significance for the general welfare of the nation, as well as of other constitutionally important circumstances. The fact that the criteria and conditions for investing state assets, as well as the subjects that have the right to adopt decisions on the investment of state assets, must be established only by means of a law does not mean that the Government and other law-making subjects may not, within their competence, also regulate the relationships connected with state property by means of substatutory legal acts (for example, establish the arrangements and procedures for investing state assets) that are based on laws and do not compete with them. The legislature may establish various ways of the investment of state assets. The Constitution also does not prohibit establishing such a way of the investment of state assets where the investment of state assets is made together with other persons (person), inter alia, with a private person. When choosing the ways of investing state assets, the state must take account of the fact whether, upon choosing a certain way, the important and constitutionally justifiable needs and interests of society will be satisfied. The investment of state assets would be constitutionally unjustified if such investment inflicted evident harm on society or if the rights of other persons were violated. When regulating the relationships connected with the investment of state assets, the legislature must establish such a legal regulation that would ensure that the imperative of fair competition, which stems from Paragraph 4 of Article 46 of the Constitution, would not be violated or that no preconditions would be created for abuse in the course of investing state assets and administering invested state assets.

Privatising state (municipal) property

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 24 October 2012

... when concluding an agreement on the sale and purchase of a privatisation object that belongs to the state (municipality), the said agreement must provide for such conditions of this agreement and measures ensuring its implementation where the said conditions and measures would guarantee such a privatisation process that would be efficient and rational, would give benefit to society, and would ensure compliance with the principles of the equality of rights, the inviolability of property, proportionality, and the protection of legitimate expectations.

The transfer of state-owned property into the ownership of other subjects (inter alia, privatisation)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 2 April 2013

Under the Constitution, the state, when regulating economic activity, must ensure that state property is managed in such a manner that there would be no contradiction to the requirement, consolidated in Paragraph 3 of Article 46 of the Constitution, that the state must regulate economic activity so that it serves the general welfare of the nation (rulings of 24 January 1996 and 2 March 2009).

The Constitutional Court has held on more than one occasion that it is not permitted to establish any such a legal regulation according to which property that belongs to the state by right of ownership would be transferred into the ownership of other subjects in order to satisfy the interests or needs of only one social group or separate persons where this would not serve the public interest, the needs of society, or the welfare of the nation (rulings of 30 September 2003, 8 July 2005, 5 July 2007, 23 November 2007, and 20 March 2008).

In the Constitutional Court's jurisprudence, it has been held on more than one occasion that the implementation of the public interest, as an interest of society recognised by the state and protected by law, is one of the most important conditions for the existence and evolution of society itself (inter alia, the rulings of 6 May 1997, 13 May 2005, 21 September 2006, and 6 January 2011).

The transfer of state-owned property into the ownership of other subjects (including privatisation) may be constitutionally justified only when this may provide larger benefits to society, when the purpose of such transfer is the satisfaction of important and constitutionally justifiable needs and interests of society; such transfer (both repayable and non-repayable) would be constitutionally unjustified if it inflicted evident harm on society and violated the rights of other persons (rulings of 30 September 2003, 8 July 2005, and 23 November 2007).

The legislature, when paying regard to the Constitution and taking account of various factors, may establish the regime (conditions and procedure for the use) of the property that is transferred into the ownership of other subjects in order to continue to ensure the interests of society and the welfare of the nation and to implement the values consolidated in the Constitution (rulings of 30 September 2003 and 8 July 2005).

Not only laws adopted by the legislature for regulating the transfer of state-owned property into the ownership of other subjects (inter alia, the privatisation of such property), but also the decisions of executive power regarding the implementation of these laws, must serve the public interest and the general welfare of the nation.

... the legislative and executive state powers, when amending the regulation of economic activity related to privatisation, are not allowed to deny the public interest and the requirements stemming from Article 46 of the Constitution (inter alia, Paragraph 3 thereof, under which the state regulates economic activity so that it serves the general welfare of the nation), as well as the constitutional principle of responsible governance.

The regulation of economic activity in cases where, inter alia, legal acts related to privatisation are adopted may be linked to the implementation of the rights and legitimate interests of various economic subjects, shareholders, or creditors. The Constitution, inter alia, Article 46 thereof, as well as the constitutional principle of responsible governance, gives rise to the duty of the legislature, when it regulates the relationships connected with privatisation, to precisely define the powers of employees and officials of state and municipal institutions and to determine their responsibility. Decisions adopted by institutions of executive power in the area of privatisation (especially those through which certain previous decisions establishing particular obligations are amended) must be rationally reasoned and the impact of such decisions on, inter alia, the economy of this country and the finances of the state must be properly assessed. The said decisions may not be arbitrary.

It needs to be emphasised that such practice of adopting resolutions by the Government is defective that ignores the requirements (stemming with respect to the institutions of executive power from Article 46 of the Constitution and the constitutional principle of responsible governance) that decisions adopted in the area of privatisation (particularly those by which certain previous decisions establishing particular obligations are amended) must be rationally reasoned and that the impact of such decisions on, inter alia, the economy and finances of the state must be properly assessed. No cases may be tolerated where the said government resolutions perfunctorily approve such privatisation agreements (amendments thereto) the content of which is not known to the public and which fail to concretely specify any circumstances ...

The procedure for the possession, use, and disposal of state-owned property must be established by law (Paragraph 2 of Article 128 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 24 February 2015

Paragraph 2 of Article 128 of the Constitution provides that the procedure for the possession, use, and disposal of state-owned property is established by law.

In interpreting the said provision, the Constitutional Court has held that it means that the legislature is entrusted with the regulation of issues concerning the activities of state enterprises, the management of shares held by the state in joint-stock companies, and other issues related to the possession, use, and disposal of state property; the legislature may choose legal instruments for this regulation to the extent not contrary to the Constitution; the stipulation of how to regulate the possession, use, or disposal of state property is a right of the legislature that is consolidated in the Constitution and only the Constitution defines the limits of this right (ruling of 24 January 1996). The Constitutional Court has also held that “relationships that arise when possessing, using, and disposing of state property must be regulated only by means of a law” (ruling of 24 January 1996), that “it is only the legislature that may establish the form of using state funds” (ruling of 28 February 1996), and that “it is only the legislature that may establish the manner and conditions for disposing of state property ...” (ruling of 22 October 1996). The competence of the Government in this area is defined by means of laws (ruling of 17 June 1997). Thus, the provision “the procedure for the possession, use, and disposal of state property is established by law” of Paragraph 2 of Article 128 of the Constitution gives rise to the duty of the legislature to establish, by means of a law, all key elements of the possession, use, and disposal of state property (ruling of 23 August 2005).

It should be noted that the said provisions of the official constitutional doctrine may not be interpreted as meaning that all relationships of the possession, use, and disposal of property belonging to the state by right of ownership must be regulated only by means of a law – the Government and other law-making subjects may also regulate, within their competence, these relationships by means of substatutory legal acts that are based on a law and do not compete with it. However, under Paragraph 2 of Article 128 of the Constitution, only the legislature may establish the key elements of the content of the rights to possess, use, and dispose of state property.

The subsurface as a special object of the natural environment that belongs by right of exclusive ownership to the state (Paragraph 1 of Article 47 (wording of 23 January 2003) of the Constitution) (on the issue of regulating economic and other activity related to the use of the subsurface, see 2.4.2. Social rights, 2.4.2.3. The right to a healthy environment, the ruling of 16 December 2015 (“The duty of the state, when regulating economic and other activity related to the use of the subsurface, to ensure the protection of the subsurface and other objects of the natural environment (land, water, air, plants, wildlife) and human health, as well as the rational use of natural resources”))

The Constitutional Court’s ruling of 16 December 2015

... under Paragraph 1 of Article 47 (wording of 23 January 2003) of the Constitution, the subsurface belongs by right of exclusive ownership to the Republic of Lithuania. The subsurface is a special object of the natural environment; it belongs by right of exclusive ownership to the state and may by no means become anyone else’s property. The fact that the subsurface is under the exclusive ownership of the state provides the constitutional ground for establishing a special and specific legal regime of the protection and exploitation of the subsurface compared with other objects of nature.

The legal regulation of forestry management in order to ensure the rational maintenance and use of state-owned forests (Paragraph 2 of Article 128 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court’s ruling of 16 April 2019

... forests that belong to the state by right of ownership are state property. Under Paragraph 2 of Article 128 of the Constitution, the procedure for the possession, use, and disposal of state property is established by law.

Interpreting Paragraph 2 of Article 128 of the Constitution, the Constitutional Court has noted that state-owned property is not an objective in itself, but that it must give benefit to society, must be used sparingly, not wasted, and managed rationally (inter alia, the rulings of 30 September 2003 and 20 March 2008); the duty arises for the legislature to establish, by means of a law, all the most important elements of the relationships connected with the possession, use, and disposal of state property (ruling of 23 August 2005). Moreover, the Constitutional Court has held in its rulings on more than one occasion that it is only the legislature that may establish the ways and conditions for the disposal of state property (rulings of 22 October 1996 and 23 August 2005).

... the Constitution, inter alia, Articles 46 and 54 and Paragraph 2 of Article 128 thereof, and the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law give rise to the duty of the legislature to establish, by means of a law, the essential conditions for forestry management; the legislature must establish a clear and reasoned model of forestry management, inter alia, the respective subjects responsible for the management of forests belonging to the state by right of ownership, or the criteria for determining such subjects. It should also be noted that, while establishing the legal regulation governing forestry management, the legislature must observe, inter alia, the duty, which stems from Paragraph 3 of Article 46 of the Constitution, for the state to regulate economic activity so that it serves the general welfare of the people, by, at the same time, implementing the requirements, which stem from Article 54 and Paragraph 2 of Article 128 of the Constitution, inter alia, to ensure the proper protection of forests, as well as the rational management and use of forests as state-owned property.

11.3. THE BANK OF LITHUANIA

The status of the Bank of Lithuania; the obligation of the Republic of Lithuania to participate in the integration of the member countries into the economic and monetary union by adopting the euro (Article 125 of the Constitution, the Constitutional Act on Membership of the Republic of Lithuania in the European Union)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 24 January 2014

The basis of the constitutional institution of the Bank of Lithuania is the provision of Paragraph 1 of Article 125 of the Constitution, according to which, in the Republic of Lithuania, the Bank of Lithuania is the central bank, which belongs to the State of Lithuania by right of ownership. ...

... Paragraph 2 of Article 125 of the Constitution (wording of 25 October 1992) defined the exclusive powers of the Bank of Lithuania to issue currency. It should be noted that these powers were annulled by the ... Law Amending Article 125 of the Constitution.

According to Paragraph 3 of Article 125 of the Constitution (wording of 25 October 1992), the procedures for the organisation and activities of the Bank of Lithuania, as well as its powers, had to be established by the Seimas by means of a law. It should be noted that, pursuant to the ... Law Amending Article 125 of the Constitution, the former Paragraph 3 of Article 125 of the Constitution became Paragraph 2 of Article 125 and was supplemented with the provision that the law should also establish the status of the Chairperson of the Board of the Bank of Lithuania, as well as the grounds of his/her dismissal.

Some other provisions of the Constitution are related to Article 125 of the Constitution.

Item 2 of Article 67 of the Constitution establishes the powers of the Seimas to pass laws. Thus, this provision of the Constitution also gives rise to the powers of the Seimas to regulate the activities of the Bank of Lithuania by means of a law, inter alia, to regulate, by means of a law, the procedure of the organisation of the Bank of Lithuania and its powers, the status of the Chairperson of the Board of the Bank of Lithuania, as well as the grounds of his/her release from duties.

Item 11 of Article 67 of the Constitution establishes the powers of the Seimas to appoint and dismiss, inter alia, the Chairperson of the Board of the Bank of Lithuania, whilst Item 13 of Article 84 establishes the powers of the President of the Republic to propose a candidate for the post of the Chairperson of the Board of the Bank of Lithuania for consideration by the Seimas or to submit that the Seimas express no confidence in him/her. These provisions of the Constitution presuppose the procedure of the appointment and dismissal of the Chairperson of the Board of the Bank of Lithuania according to which the Chairperson of the Board of the Bank of Lithuania is appointed and dismissed by the Seimas on the proposal of the President of the Republic.

In this context, it should be mentioned that, according to Article 75 of the Constitution, the officials appointed or elected by the Seimas, with the exception of the persons specified in Article 74 of the Constitution, are dismissed from office when the Seimas expresses no confidence in them by a majority vote of all the members of the Seimas.

It should be noted that the content of the constitutional legal regulation of the institution of the Bank of Lithuania changed upon the adoption of the Constitutional Act on Membership of the Republic of Lithuania in the European Union, which is a constituent part of the Constitution and by means of which ... membership of the Republic of Lithuania in the European Union was constitutionally confirmed.

... according to the preamble to the said Constitutional Act, the Seimas adopted it in order to execute "the will of the citizens of the Republic of Lithuania, as expressed in the referendum on membership of the Republic of Lithuania in the European Union, held on 10–11 May 2003", and in order to seek to ensure, inter alia, the full participation of the Republic of Lithuania in the European integration. It has also been mentioned that the full participation of the Republic of Lithuania, as a member of the European Union, in the European Union is a constitutional imperative based on the expression of the sovereign will of the Nation and that the full membership of the Republic of Lithuania in the European Union is a constitutional value.

It should be emphasised that the constitutional imperative of the full membership of the Republic of Lithuania in the European Union implies that the constitutional value is precisely full membership in the European Union, i.e. fully fledged, rather than partial, participation in the activities of this Union and in the integration of its Member States.

... the Constitutional Act on Membership of the Republic of Lithuania in the European Union establishes, inter alia, the constitutional foundations of membership of the Republic of Lithuania in the European Union. If such constitutional foundations were not consolidated in the Constitution, the Republic of Lithuania would not be able to be a full member of the European Union: inter alia, Article 1 of this Constitutional Act enshrines the principle that the Republic of Lithuania as a Member State of the European Union shares with or confers on the European Union the competences of its state institutions in the areas provided for in the founding Treaties of the European Union and to the extent it would, together with the other Member States of the European Union, jointly meet its membership commitments in those areas as well as enjoy the membership rights.

... one of the areas where, under Article 1 of the Constitutional Act on Membership of the Republic of Lithuania in the European Union, the Republic of Lithuania, as a Member State of the European Union, shares with and confers on the European Union the competences of its state institutions is the economic and monetary union, the currency of which is the euro, as specified in Paragraph 4 of Article 3 of the Treaty on European Union. It should also be noted that, pursuant to Paragraph 2 of Article 119 of the Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union, activities of the Member States and the Union in the area of economic and monetary policy shall include a single currency – the euro, and the definition and conduct of a single monetary policy and exchange-rate policy; according to Paragraph 1c of Article 3 of the same treaty, the Union shall have exclusive competence in the area of monetary policy for the Member States whose currency is the euro. It needs to be emphasised that, by virtue of Article 1 of the Constitutional Act on Membership of the Republic of Lithuania in the European Union, the Republic of Lithuania shares with and confers the competences of its state institutions in the area of economic and monetary policy in order to jointly meet, together with the other Member States of the European Union, its commitments of full membership in the European Union and to enjoy the full membership rights in the European Union in this area.

It should be noted further that one of the basic tasks to be carried out through the European System of Central Banks (hereinafter also referred to as the ESCB) is to define and implement the monetary policy of the Union (Paragraph 2 of Article 127 of the Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union). According to Article 8 of the Protocol on the Statute of the European System of Central Banks and of the European Central Bank, the ESCB shall be governed by the decision-making bodies of the European Central Bank (hereinafter also referred to as the ECB); according to Paragraph 3 of Article 14 of the same protocol, the national central banks are an integral part of the ESCB and shall act in accordance with the guidelines and instructions of the ECB; according to Paragraph 1 of Article 10 of the same protocol, the governors of the national central banks are members of the Governing Council of the ECB.

It should also be noted that:

– according to Article 128 of the Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union, the European Central Bank shall have the exclusive right to authorise the national central banks, inter alia, to issue euro banknotes (Paragraph 1), and Member States may issue euro coins subject to approval by the ECB of the volume of the issue (Paragraph 2);

– Article 130 of the Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union and Article 7 of the Protocol on the Statute of the European System of Central Banks and of the European Central Bank establish the principle of independence of the ECB and the national central banks according to which, inter alia, neither a national central bank nor any member of its decision-making bodies shall take instructions from the government of a Member State or from any other body; in this regard, it should be noted that, according to Paragraph 2 of Article 14 of the Protocol on the Statute of the European System of Central Banks and of the European Central Bank, the Governor of the national central bank may be relieved from office only if he no longer fulfils the conditions required for the performance of his duties or if he has been guilty of serious misconduct.

Accordingly, having regard to Article 1 of the Constitutional Act on Membership of the Republic of Lithuania in the European Union, on the basis whereof the Republic of Lithuania participates, inter alia, in the economic and monetary union, shares with or confers on the European Union the competences of its state institutions, inter alia, in the area of economic and monetary policy, it should be noted that the constitutional status of the Bank of Lithuania is defined as the status of the central bank of the Republic of Lithuania, whose competence is partly conferred on the ECB and which is an integral part of the ESCB; thus, the corresponding independence guarantees should be applied to the Bank of Lithuania and to the Chairperson of the Board of the Bank of Lithuania according to the Constitution, inter alia, in observance of the constitutional principle of pacta sunt servanda.

It should be noted further that, having regard to such a constitutional status of the Bank of Lithuania and the Chairperson of the Board of the Bank of Lithuania, the powers of the President of the Republic established in Item 13 of Article 84 of the Constitution to submit that the Seimas express no confidence in the Chairperson of the Board of the Bank of Lithuania should only be related to the possibility of expressing no confidence in the Chairperson of the Board of the Bank of Lithuania under such circumstances the nature of which prevent the Chairperson of the Board from performing his/her duties in general.

In this context, it should be noted further that, according to the Constitution, the legislature, when regulating the activities of the Bank of Lithuania, inter alia, defining the grounds and procedure for the dismissal of the Chairperson of the Board of the Bank of Lithuania, must pay regard to the constitutional status and the corresponding independence guarantees of the Bank of Lithuania, as the integral part of the ESCB. This means, inter alia, that it is not allowed to establish any such a legal regulation to the effect that:

- the preconditions would be created for the legislature and the executive to exert influence on the Bank of Lithuania, inter alia, the obligation would be created for the Chairperson of the Board of the Bank of Lithuania to submit reports on the performance of his/her functions subject to the approval by the Seimas, the President of the Republic, or the Government; it should be noted that the constitutional provision that state institutions serve the people implies the obligation of the legislature to establish the legal regulation to the effect that the Chairperson of the Board of the Bank of Lithuania would have the obligation to inform the public, the Seimas, the President of the Republic, and the Government about the activities of the Bank of Lithuania;

- such grounds would be established for the dismissal of the Chairperson of the Board of the Bank of Lithuania before the expiry of the term of his/her powers established by law where the said grounds would not be related to the non-fulfilment of the conditions, established by means of a law, required for the performance of his/her duties or to the fact that he/she has been guilty of serious misconduct.

To sum up, it should be noted that the aforementioned constitutional imperative of the full participation of the Republic of Lithuania in the European Union and its fully fledged membership in the European Union, as a constitutional value, also implies the constitutional obligation of the Republic of Lithuania to participate, as a fully fledged Member State, inter alia, in the integration of the member countries into the economic and monetary union, inter alia, by adopting the common currency of this union – the euro – and conferring on the European Union the exclusive competence in the area of monetary policy. It should be noted that such a constitutional obligation of the State of Lithuania is concurrently an obligation arising from its membership in the European Union, which the State of Lithuania is obliged to fulfil while observing its geopolitical orientation consolidated in the Constitution and the constitutional principle of pacta sunt servanda.

It should also be noted that, in order to implement the said constitutional obligation of the Republic of Lithuania for its membership in the European Union, the competence of the Bank of Lithuania in the area of monetary policy, inter alia, the issuing of currency, must be conferred on the European Central Bank.

In the constitutional justice case at issue, it has been held that the Law Amending Article 125 of the Constitution, in view of the manner of its adoption, is in conflict with Paragraph 1 of Article 147 of the Constitution. This means that, as from the day of the official publication of this ruling, the Law Amending Article 125 of the Constitution, inter alia, including Paragraph 2 of Article 125 of the Constitution, may not be applied.

In view of the overall constitutional legal regulation, inter alia, the constitutional status of the Bank of Lithuania, it needs to be emphasised that the recognition that the Law Amending Article 125 of the Constitution is in conflict with the Constitution does not mean that the wording of Article 125 of the Constitution that was valid prior to the entry into force of the said law will become effective again. Thus, it should be noted that the Constitution does not provide for the exclusive right of the Bank of Lithuania to issue currency.

It needs to be emphasised that the legislature, when it regulates the activities of the Bank of Lithuania, inter alia, the procedure of the organisation of the Bank of Lithuania and its powers, the status of the Chairperson of the Board of the Bank of Lithuania, as well as the grounds of his/her dismissal, is bound by the Constitution.

The legislature must pay regard to the constitutional status of the Bank of Lithuania, according to which a certain part of the competence of the Bank of Lithuania has been conferred on the ECB and the Bank of Lithuania is an integral part of the ESCB. In this context, it should be noted that such a constitutional status of the Bank of Lithuania implies that its competence in the monetary policy has been conferred on the ECB and that the Bank of Lithuania and ... the Chairperson of its Board have the corresponding guarantees; as mentioned before, the Constitution does not provide for the exclusive right of the Bank of Lithuania to issue currency.

... the legislature, inter alia, must establish such grounds of the dismissal of the Chairperson of the Board of the Bank of Lithuania before the expiry of the term of his/her powers (where the said term is established by means of a law) that would only be related to the non-fulfilment of the conditions, established by means of a law, required for the performance of his/her duties or to the fact that he/she has been guilty of serious misconduct; in addition, it must establish the legal regulation to the effect that the Bank of Lithuania would not have the exclusive right to issue currency as from the day of the adoption of the euro in the Republic of Lithuania.

12. THE NATIONAL AUDIT OFFICE

The independence of the National Audit Office (Article 134 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 6 December 1995

... Chapter XII of the Constitution determines the functions and framework of the activities of the National Audit Office – a state institution exercising economic financial control, which supervises the lawfulness of the possession and use of state-owned property and the execution of the state budget. It is accountable directly to the Seimas, which exercises parliamentary control over this institution.

[...]

Article 134 of the Constitution prescribes: “The National Audit Office shall supervise the lawfulness of the possession and use of state-owned property and the execution of the State Budget. The Auditor General shall submit a conclusion to the Seimas concerning the report on the annual execution of the budget.” ...

To enable the National Audit Office to fulfil all functions vested in it objectively, the independence of this institution must be safeguarded.

The incompatibility of the office of the Auditor General with the office of a member of a municipal council (Paragraph 2 of Article 133 and Paragraph 1 of Article 134 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 30 May 2003

Paragraph 1 of Article 134 of the Constitution provides that the National Audit Office supervises the lawfulness of the possession and use of state-owned property and the execution of the state budget. The National Audit Office is headed by the Auditor General (Paragraph 2 of Article 133 of the Constitution).

As the Auditor General is empowered to control and supervise the activities of municipal councils, he/she may not simultaneously be a member of a municipal council.

The legal regulation according to which the same person could be both the Auditor General and a member of a municipal council at the same time would be in conflict with Paragraph 1 of Article 119, Paragraph 2 of Article 120 and Paragraph 1 of Article 134 of the Constitution.

The constitutional mission and autonomy of the National Audit Office and its powers to carry out state audits (Paragraph 1 of Article 134 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 16 May 2019

... Chapter XII of the Constitution provides for the institution of national audit.

Under Paragraph 1 of Article 134 of the Constitution, the National Audit Office supervises the lawfulness of the possession and use of state-owned property and the execution of the state budget.

As stated by the Constitutional Court in its ruling of 6 December 1995, under the Constitution, the National Audit Office is an institution of economic and financial control, supervising the execution of the state budget; it is accountable directly to the Seimas, which exercises parliamentary control over this institution; to enable the National Audit Office to objectively fulfil all the functions assigned to it, this institution must be autonomous.

In its ruling of 30 September 2003, the Constitutional Court held that state-owned property is not an objective in itself, it should benefit society; while acting in the interests of society, state institutions must serve the common good of the people; according to Paragraph 1 of Article 134 of the Constitution, state-owned property must be possessed and used lawfully; this is supervised by the National Audit Office. In this context, the Constitutional Court also held that the provision of Paragraph 2 of Article 23 of the Constitution, under which the rights of ownership are protected by law, also means that laws must protect the rights of all owners; thus, laws must also protect the right of ownership of the state as the organisation of all society; the striving for an open, harmonious, and just civil society, which is consolidated in the Preamble to the Constitution, the constitutional principle that ownership includes obligations, Paragraph 2 of Article 23 of the Constitution, under which the rights of ownership are protected by law, the provision of Paragraph 2 of Article 128 of the Constitution that the procedure concerning the possession, use, and disposal of state-owned property is established by law, as well as other provisions of the Constitution, give rise to the requirement that state-owned property must be used sparingly and not wasted; this property must be managed rationally.

Thus, Paragraph 1 of Article 134 of the Constitution, according to which the National Audit Office supervises the lawfulness of the possession and use of state-owned property and the execution of the state budget, interpreted in the context of the other provisions of the Constitution, inter alia, Paragraph 2 of Article 23 and Paragraph 2 of Article 128 thereof, gives rise to the powers of the National Audit Office to verify the lawfulness and effective use of state-owned property, inter alia, state budget funds, i.e. whether state-owned property is used to serve the common good of the people, inter alia, whether it is used sparingly and not wasted, and whether it is managed rationally and effectively. In other words, under Paragraph 1 of Article 134 of the Constitution, the National Audit Office has the powers to carry out a state audit, i.e. to inspect state assets, inter alia, state budget appropriations and the activities of the managing and using entities, inter alia, in terms of economy, efficiency, and effectiveness, among other things, the National Audit Office has the powers to assess the lawfulness of the management and use of state assets, as well as, inter alia, the compliance of the management and use of state assets with the objectives set in the Constitution and/or laws.

It should be noted that the constitutional mission of the National Audit Office and the constitutional principles of a state under the rule of law and the separation of powers imply the constitutional requirement for the National Audit Office to exercise its powers, arising from Paragraph 1 of Article 134 of the Constitution, inter alia, to carry out a state audit, independently from other state authorities, inter alia, from the Seimas, the President of the Republic, or the Government. Therefore, the fact that, under the Constitution, the National Audit Office is accountable to the Seimas does not mean that the Seimas may, inter alia, by exercising parliamentary control over the National Audit Office, take over the constitutional powers of the National Audit Office or otherwise interfere with their implementation, inter alia, even if it assigns the National Audit Office the task of carrying out the state audits of entities managing and using state assets, inter alia, state budget appropriations.

13. FOREIGN POLICY AND NATIONAL DEFENCE

13.1. FOREIGN POLICY

On the legal force of international and EU law in the legal system of Lithuania, see 1. The foundations of the constitutional order, 1.8. The foundations of lawmaking and of the application of law, 1.8.4. The hierarchy of legal acts, 1.8.4.3. International and EU law.

The State of Lithuania recognises the principles and norms of international law (Paragraph 1 of Article 135 and Paragraph 3 of Article 138 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 9 December 1998

Paragraph 1 of Article 135 of the Constitution states that, in implementing its foreign policy, the Republic of Lithuania follows the universally recognised principles and norms of international law, seeks to ensure national security and independence, the welfare of its citizens, and their basic rights and freedoms, and contributes to the international order based on law and justice.

Paragraph 3 of Article 138 of the Constitution provides that international treaties ratified by the Seimas of the Republic of Lithuania are a constituent part of the legal system of the Republic of Lithuania.

Interpreting these articles of the Constitution, it needs to be noted that the State of Lithuania, while recognising the principles and norms of international law, may not apply essentially different standards to the people of this country. Holding that it is a full member of the international community, the State of Lithuania, of its own free will, adopts and recognises these principles and norms, the customs of the international community, naturally integrates itself into the world culture, and becomes its natural part.

The Republic of Lithuania observes the international obligations undertaken by it and respects the universally recognised principles of international law (Paragraph 1 of Article 135 and Paragraph 3 of Article 138 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 14 March 2006

... the observance of international obligations undertaken of its own free will and respect for the universally recognised principles of international law (as well as the principle of pacta sunt servanda) are a legal tradition and a constitutional principle of the restored independent State of Lithuania.

... the principle consolidated in the Constitution that the Republic of Lithuania observes international obligations undertaken of its own free will and respects the universally recognised principles of international law implies that, in cases where national legal acts (inter alia, laws or constitutional laws) establish such a legal regulation that competes with the one established in an international treaty, the international treaty is to be applied.

The constitutional foundations of international cooperation carried out by the state; the geopolitical orientation of the state (on international cooperation on military matters, see 13.2. National defence; the ruling of 15 March 2011)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 15 March 2011

The general constitutional foundations for international cooperation carried out by the state where such cooperation is related, inter alia, to national defence are consolidated in various provisions of the Constitution.

Paragraph 1 of Article 135 of the Constitution provides that, in implementing its foreign policy, the Republic of Lithuania follows the universally recognised principles and norms of international law, seeks to ensure national security and independence, the welfare of its citizens, and their basic rights and freedoms, and contributes to the creation of the international order based on law and justice (Paragraph 1); in the Republic of Lithuania, war propaganda is prohibited (Paragraph 2).

Article 136 of the Constitution states that the Republic of Lithuania participates in international organisations provided that this is not in conflict with the interests and independence of the state.

Article 138 of the Constitution provides that the Seimas ratifies or denounces the following international treaties of the Republic of Lithuania: (1) on the alteration of the boundaries of the State of the Republic of Lithuania; (2) on political cooperation with foreign states; mutual assistance treaties; as well as treaties of a defensive nature related to the defence of the state; (3) on the renunciation of the use of force or threatening by force; as well as peace treaties; (4) on the presence and status of the armed forces of the Republic of Lithuania on the territories of foreign states; (5) on the participation of the Republic of Lithuania in universal international organisations and regional international organisations; (6) multilateral or long-term economic treaties (Paragraph 1); the same article provides that laws, as well as international treaties, may also provide for other cases when the Seimas ratifies international treaties of the Republic of Lithuania (Paragraph 2); and that international treaties ratified by the Seimas of the Republic of Lithuania are a constituent part of the legal system of the Republic of Lithuania (Paragraph 3).

The Constitutional Act on Membership of the Republic of Lithuania in the European Union, which was adopted while “seeking to ensure the fully fledged participation of the Republic of Lithuania in the European integration, as well as the security of the Republic of Lithuania and welfare of its citizens” (Preamble), provides, inter alia, that the Republic of Lithuania as a Member State of the European Union shares with or confers on the European Union the competences of its state institutions in the areas provided for in the founding Treaties of the European Union and to the extent it would, together with the other Member States of the European Union, jointly meet its membership commitments in those areas, as well as enjoy membership rights (Paragraph 1); the norms of European Union law are a constituent part of the legal system of the Republic of Lithuania; where it concerns the founding Treaties of the European Union, the norms of European Union law are applied directly, while in the event of the collision of legal norms, they have supremacy over the laws and other legal acts of the Republic of Lithuania (Article 2).

Thus, the general constitutionally consolidated foundations for international cooperation carried out by the state where such cooperation is related, inter alia, to the defence of the state are characterised, inter alia, by the consolidation of the geopolitical orientation of the State of Lithuania – the participation of the state in European integration as a Member of the European Union and the striving of the state to ensure national independence and security by contributing to the creation of the international order based on law and justice.

... the geopolitical orientation of the State of Lithuania – the participation of the state in European integration – is inseparable from other international obligations of the Republic of Lithuania arising from the membership of Lithuania in other international organisations, inter alia, the United Nations and the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation; this membership provides Lithuania not only with additional security guarantees, but also implies the necessity to observe the international obligations undertaken by it.

... the power of the Seimas, which is consolidated in Paragraph 1 of Article 142 of the Constitution, to adopt the decision to use the armed forces when the need arises to defend the Homeland or to fulfil the international obligations of the State of Lithuania also includes such a decision to use the armed forces when it is necessary to fulfil the international obligations of the Republic of Lithuania under international treaties of the Republic of Lithuania.

The geopolitical orientation of the state

... the fundamental constitutional values consolidated in Article 1 of the Constitution – the independence of the state, democracy, the republic – are closely interrelated with the geopolitical orientation of the State of Lithuania, which is consolidated in the Constitution and implies European and transatlantic integration pursued by the Republic of Lithuania. As the Constitutional Court noted in its ruling of 7 July 2011, the geopolitical orientation of the State of Lithuania means the membership of the Republic of Lithuania in the EU and NATO, as well as the necessity to fulfil the respective international obligations related to the said membership. It should also be noted that such geopolitical orientation of the State of Lithuania is based upon the recognised and protected universal constitutional values that are common with the values of other European and North American states.

The geopolitical orientation of the State of Lithuania is expressed in the text of the Constitution both in the negative and positive aspects. The negative aspect of the geopolitical orientation of the State of Lithuania is expressed in the Constitutional Act on the Non-Alignment of the Republic of Lithuania to Post-Soviet Eastern Unions, whereas the positive aspect is consolidated in the Constitutional Act on Membership of the Republic of Lithuania in the European Union. These constitutional acts are a constituent part of the Constitution.

Non-Alignment to Post-Soviet Eastern unions (Constitutional Act on the Non-Alignment of the Republic of Lithuania to Post-Soviet Eastern Unions) as the negative aspect of the geopolitical orientation of the State of Lithuania

The Constitutional Act on the Non-Alignment of the Republic of Lithuania to Post-Soviet Eastern Unions lays down the limits that may not be overstepped by the Republic of Lithuania in the processes of its participation in international integration and consolidates the prohibition on joining any new political, military, economic, or other unions or commonwealths of states formed on the basis of the former USSR. It is clear from the preamble to this constitutional act that it was adopted by invoking “the 16 February 1918 and 11 March 1990 Acts on the Restoration of the Independent State of Lithuania and acting upon the will of the entire Nation, as expressed on 9 February 1991”. Thus, the basis of the provisions of this constitutional act is the same fundamental principle of the state, which is based on the declaration of the sovereign will of the Nation and consolidated in Article 1 of the Constitutional Law on the State of Lithuania: i.e. the State of Lithuania is an independent democratic republic. Therefore, under the Constitution, the provisions of the Constitutional Act on the Non-Alignment of the Republic of Lithuania to Post-Soviet Eastern Unions should enjoy the same protection as the provision “The State of Lithuania shall be an independent democratic republic”, which is stipulated in Article 1 of the Constitution and Article 1 of the Constitutional Law on the State of Lithuania. In view of this, it needs to be held that, although Article 148 of the Constitution does not explicitly regulate the procedure for the alteration of the constituent parts of the Constitution, inter alia, the procedure for the alteration of the Constitutional Act on the Non-Alignment of the Republic of Lithuania to Post-Soviet Eastern Unions, the requirement stems from the very essence of the provisions of the Constitutional Act on the Non-Alignment of the Republic of Lithuania to Post-Soviet Eastern Unions to amend those provisions under the procedure that is the same for the alteration of the constitutional provision “The State of Lithuania shall be an independent democratic republic”, i.e. under the same procedure as established in Article 2 of the Constitutional Law on the State of Lithuania.

... the imperative stems from Paragraph 1 of Article 6 of the Constitution to the effect that no amendments to the Constitution may violate the harmony of the provisions of the Constitution or the harmony of the values consolidated by them. In view of this, it should be noted that, under the Constitution, no amendments may be made to the Constitution that would deny the provisions of the Constitutional Act on the Non-Alignment of the Republic of Lithuania to Post-Soviet Eastern Unions, with the exception of the cases where certain provisions of this constitutional act would be altered in the same manner as provided for in Article 2 of the Constitutional Law on the State of Lithuania.

Membership in the European Union (Constitutional Act on Membership of the Republic of Lithuania in the European Union) as the positive aspect of the geopolitical orientation of the State of Lithuania (for more on the obligation of the Republic of Lithuania to participate in the integration of the member countries into the economic and monetary union by adopting the euro, see 11. The state budget and finances; 11.3. The Bank of Lithuania; the ruling of 24 January 2014)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 24 January 2014

The membership of the Republic of Lithuania in the European Union was constitutionally confirmed by means of the Constitutional Act on Membership of the Republic of Lithuania in the European Union. The preamble to this Constitutional Act makes it clear that the Seimas adopted it in order to execute “the will of the citizens of the Republic of Lithuania, as expressed in the referendum on membership of the Republic of Lithuania in the European Union, held on 10–11 May 2003” and while “expressing its conviction that the European Union respects human rights and fundamental freedoms and that Lithuanian membership in the European Union will contribute to the more efficient securing of human rights and freedoms”, “noting that the European Union respects the national identity and constitutional traditions of its Member States”, and “seeking to ensure the fully fledged participation of the Republic of Lithuania in the European integration, as well as the security of the Republic of Lithuania and welfare of its citizens”.

Thus, it needs to be emphasised that the full participation of the Republic of Lithuania, as a Member of the European Union, in the European Union is a constitutional imperative based on the expression of the sovereign will of the Nation and that the full membership of the Republic of Lithuania in the European Union is a constitutional value.

It should be noted that the Constitutional Act on Membership of the Republic of Lithuania in the European Union establishes, inter alia, the constitutional foundations of the membership of the Republic of Lithuania in the European Union. If such constitutional foundations were not consolidated in the Constitution, the Republic of Lithuania would be unable to be a full member of the European Union: the Republic of Lithuania as a Member State of the European Union shares with or confers on the European Union the competences of its state institutions in the areas provided for in the founding Treaties of the European Union and to the extent it would, together with the other Member States of the European Union, jointly meet its membership commitments in those areas, as well as enjoy membership rights (Article 1); the norms of European Union law are a constituent part of the legal system of the Republic of Lithuania; where it concerns the founding Treaties of the European Union, the norms of European Union law are applied directly, while in the event of the collision of legal norms, they have supremacy over the laws and other legal acts of the Republic of Lithuania (Article 2). It needs to be emphasised that these constitutional foundations of membership of the Republic of Lithuania in the European Union were consolidated in the Constitution so as to execute the will of the Nation that the Republic of Lithuania could be a member of the European Union.

In view of this, it needs to be held that those foundations themselves and the expression of the sovereign will of the Nation, as the source of these foundations, determine the requirement that the provisions of Articles 1 and 2 of the Constitutional Act on Membership of the Republic of Lithuania in the European Union be altered or annulled only by referendum.

It has been mentioned that the geopolitical orientation of the State of Lithuania means, inter alia, the membership of the Republic of Lithuania in the EU, as well as the necessity to fulfil the respective international obligations related to the said membership ... amendments to the Constitution may not violate the harmony of the provisions of the Constitution or the harmony of the values consolidated by them. In view of this, it should be noted that, under the Constitution, as long as the aforesaid constitutional foundations for membership of the Republic of Lithuania in the European Union, which are consolidated in Articles 1 and 2 of the Constitutional Act on Membership of the Republic of Lithuania in the European Union, have not been annulled by referendum, any amendments to the Constitution that would deny the obligations of the Republic of Lithuania arising from its membership in the European Union are not permitted.

It should be emphasised that the constitutional imperative of the full membership of the Republic of Lithuania in the European Union implies that the constitutional value is specifically full membership in the European Union, i.e. fully fledged, rather than partial, participation in the activities of this Union and in the integration of its Member States.

[...]

... the constitutional imperative of the fully fledged participation of the Republic of Lithuania in the European Union and its full membership in the European Union, as a constitutional value, also implies the constitutional obligation of the Republic of Lithuania to participate, as a full Member State, inter alia, in the integration of the member countries into the economic and monetary union, inter alia, by adopting the common currency of this union – the euro – and conferring on the European Union the exclusive competence in the area of monetary policy. It should be noted that such a constitutional obligation of the State of Lithuania is concurrently an obligation arising from its membership in the European Union, which the State of Lithuania is obliged to fulfil while observing its geopolitical orientation consolidated in the Constitution and the constitutional principle of pacta sunt servanda.

The principle of respect for international law (Paragraph 1 of Article 135 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 24 January 2014

Respect for international law, which is also a constitutional value, is related to the geopolitical orientation of the State of Lithuania, which is consolidated in the Constitution.

It should be noted that, under Paragraph 1 of Article 135 of the Constitution, in implementing its foreign policy, the Republic of Lithuania follows the universally recognised principles and norms of international law. The constitutional principle of respect for international law, i.e. the principle of pacta sunt servanda, as consolidated in this provision, means the imperative of fulfilling in good faith the obligations assumed by the Republic of Lithuania under international law, inter alia, international treaties.

As the Constitutional Court has noted, the observance of international obligations undertaken of its own free will and respect for the universally recognised principles of international law (as well as the principle of pacta sunt servanda) are a legal tradition and a constitutional principle of the restored independent State of Lithuania (rulings of 14 March 2006 and 5 September 2012). It should be noted that respect for international law is an inseparable part of the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law; the essence of the said principle is the rule of law.

... amendments to the Constitution may not violate the harmony of the provisions of the Constitution or the harmony of the values consolidated by them. In view of this, it should be noted that the Constitution does not permit any such amendments to the Constitution that would deny the international obligations of the Republic of Lithuania (inter alia, the obligations of the Republic of Lithuania arising from its membership in NATO where such obligations are preconditioned by the ... geopolitical orientation of the Republic of Lithuania) and, at the same time, would deny the constitutional principle of pacta sunt servanda, as long as the said international obligations have not been renounced in accordance with the norms of international law.

The principle of respect for international law (Paragraph 1 of Article 135 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 18 March 2014

... As noted by the Constitutional Court in its ruling of 24 January 2014, under Paragraph 1 of Article 135 of the Constitution, the Republic of Lithuania is obliged to follow the universally recognised principles and norms of international law; the said provision consolidates the constitutional principle of respect for international law, i.e. the principle of pacta sunt servanda, which means the imperative of fulfilling in good faith the obligations assumed by the Republic of Lithuania under international law, inter alia, international treaties.

It should be noted that the constitutional principle of pacta sunt servanda also means the imperative of fulfilling in good faith the international obligations arising from the universally recognised norms of international law (general international law) that prohibit international crimes.

... It should be noted that respect for international law is an inseparable part of the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law; the essence of the said principle is the rule of law (ruling of 24 January 2014).

In the context of the constitutional justice case at issue, it should be noted that, under Paragraph 1 of Article 135 of the Constitution and the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law, the Republic of Lithuania is obliged to fulfil, in good faith, its international obligations arising under the universally recognised norms of international law (general international law), inter alia, under the jus cogens norms that prohibit international crimes and are consolidated, inter alia, in the international treaties of the Republic of Lithuania ratified by the Seimas, which, as stipulated in Paragraph 3 of Article 138 of the Constitution, are a constituent part of the legal system of the Republic of Lithuania.

In this context, it should be noted that, in its ruling of 9 December 1998, in interpreting Paragraph 1 of Article 135 of the Constitution, under which, in implementing its foreign policy, the Republic of Lithuania follows the universally recognised principles and norms of international law, seeks to ensure national security and independence, the welfare of its citizens, and their fundamental rights and freedoms, and contributes to the creation of the international order based on law and justice, as well as Paragraph 3 of Article 138, which stipulates that international treaties ratified by the Seimas of the Republic of Lithuania are a constituent part of the legal system of the Republic of Lithuania, the Constitutional Court held that the State of Lithuania, recognising the principles and norms of international law, may not apply substantially different standards to the people of this country; holding that it is a full member of the international community, the State of Lithuania, of its own free will, adopts and recognises these principles and norms, the customs of the international community, naturally integrates itself into the world culture, and becomes its natural part.

It has been mentioned that respect for international law is an inseparable part of the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law; the essence of the said principle is the rule of law. As the Constitutional Court has mentioned on more than one occasion, this constitutional principle also embodies the striving for an open, just, and harmonious civil society and a state under the rule of law, as consolidated in the Preamble to the Constitution (rulings of 19 September 2002, 17 November 2003, and 13 December 2004). ... respect for international law is also linked to the striving for an open, just, and harmonious civil society, which is expressed through the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law and implies, inter alia, openness to universal democratic values and integration into the international community based on these values.

Thus, in the context of the constitutional justice case at issue, it should also be noted that, in order to be in line with the commitment of the Republic of Lithuania, as prescribed in Paragraph 1 of Article 135 of the Constitution, to fulfil, in good faith, its international obligations arising under the universally recognised norms of international law (general international law), inter alia, under the jus cogens norms that prohibit international crimes, the criminal laws of the Republic of Lithuania that are related to responsibility for international crimes, inter alia, genocide, may not establish any such standards that would be lower than those established under the universally recognised norms of international law. Disregard for the said requirement would be incompatible with the striving for an open, just, and harmonious civil society and a state under the rule of law, as consolidated in the Preamble to the Constitution and expressed through the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law.

The constitutional foundations of international cooperation carried out by the State of Lithuania

The Constitutional Court's decision of 16 May 2016

... the provisions of the official constitutional doctrine that are related to the general constitutional foundations of international cooperation carried out by the State of Lithuania are as follows:

– the general constitutional foundations of international cooperation carried out by the state are consolidated in various provisions of the Constitution, inter alia, in Paragraph 1 of Article 135 thereof; the said paragraph states that, in implementing its foreign policy, the Republic of Lithuania follows the universally recognised principles and norms of international law, seeks to ensure national security and independence, the welfare of its citizens, and their basic rights and freedoms, and contributes to the creation of the international order based on law and justice; the aforementioned constitutional foundations are also consolidated in Article 136 of the Constitution, whereby the Republic of Lithuania participates in international organisations provided that this is not in conflict with the interests and independence of the state (ruling of 15 March 2011); under Paragraph 3 of Article 138 of the Constitution, international treaties ratified by the Seimas of the Republic of Lithuania are a constituent part of the legal system of the Republic of Lithuania; respect for international law, i.e. the observance of international obligations undertaken of its own free will, and respect for the universally recognised principles of international law (as well as the principle of pacta sunt servanda) are a legal tradition and a constitutional principle of the restored independent State of Lithuania (ruling of 14 March 2006);

– respect for international law is an inseparable part of the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law; the essence of the said principle is the rule of law (rulings of 24 January 2014 and 18 March 2014); respect for international law is also linked to the striving for an open, just, and harmonious civil society, which is expressed through the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law and implies, inter alia, openness to universal democratic values and integration into the international community based on these values (ruling of 18 March 2014);

– the general constitutionally consolidated foundations for international cooperation carried out by the state are characterised, inter alia, by the consolidation of the geopolitical orientation of the State of Lithuania (ruling of 15 March 2011); the geopolitical orientation of the State of Lithuania means the membership of the Republic of Lithuania in the EU and NATO, as well as the necessity to fulfil the respective international obligations related to the said membership (rulings of 24 January 2014 and 19 November 2015); such geopolitical orientation of the State of Lithuania is based upon the recognised and protected universal constitutional values that are common with the values of other European and North American states (ruling of 24 January 2014); the fully fledged participation of the Republic of Lithuania, as a member of the European Union, in the European Union is a constitutional imperative based on the expression of the sovereign will of the Nation; the full membership of the Republic of Lithuania in the European Union is a constitutional value (ruling of 24 January 2014).

... Paragraph 1 of Article 135 of the Constitution consolidates the foundations of international cooperation carried out by the Republic of Lithuania in order to implement the constitutional objectives of foreign policy to ensure national security and independence, the welfare of its citizens, and their fundamental rights and freedoms, and to contribute to the creation of the international order based on law and justice; when account is taken of the geopolitical orientation of the State of Lithuania, the aforementioned foundations of international cooperation imply such an activity performed by the State of Lithuania, by its institutions, and by individuals employed therein that is aimed at contributing to the partnership of other states with the European Union or with NATO, or at contributing to the integration of the said states into these international organisations by promoting the dissemination of universal and democratic values, as well as the principles of EU law, as, for instance, democracy, the rule of law, transparency, the independence of courts and judges, respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms, and, inter alia, the dissemination of the said values and principles in the spheres of the improvement of the systems of justice and the activity of courts.

The constitutional obligation of the Republic of Lithuania to properly implement the requirements of European Union law (Constitutional Act on Membership of the Republic of Lithuania in the European Union)

The Constitutional Court's decision of 20 December 2017

The Constitutional Court has held that full participation by the Republic of Lithuania, as a Member State, in the European Union is a constitutional imperative based on the expression of the sovereign will of the Nation; full membership of the Republic of Lithuania in the European Union is a constitutional value (rulings of 24 January 2014 and 19 November 2015 and the decision of 16 May 2016).

The Constitutional Court has noted that the Constitutional Act on Membership of the Republic of Lithuania in the European Union, inter alia, establishes the constitutional foundations for membership of the Republic of Lithuania in the European Union; if these constitutional foundations were not consolidated in the Constitution, the Republic of Lithuania could not be a full member of the European Union: the Republic of Lithuania, as a Member State of the European Union, shares with or confers on the European Union the competences of its state institutions in the areas provided for in the founding Treaties of the European Union and to the extent it would, together with the other Member States of the European Union, jointly meet its membership commitments in those areas, as well as enjoy membership rights (Article 1); the norms of European Union law are a constituent part of the legal system of the Republic of Lithuania (Article 2) (rulings of 24 January 2014 and 14 July 2014 and the decision of 20 October 2017). The Constitutional Court has noted on more than one occasion that the jurisprudence of the European Court of Human Rights, as a source of interpretation of law, is also important for the interpretation and application of Lithuanian law.

Thus, the constitutional imperative of full participation by the Republic of Lithuania in the European Union also implies the constitutional obligation of the Republic of Lithuania to properly implement the requirements of European Union law; European Union law is a source of interpretation of the law of the Republic of Lithuania, inter alia, the Constitution, in those areas in which, under Article 1 of the Constitutional Act on Membership of the Republic of Lithuania in the European Union, the Republic of Lithuania shares with or confers on the European Union the competences of its state institutions. ... there are no grounds for interpreting the provisions of the Constitution ... related to the areas assigned to [the shared competence between the European Union and the Member States] in a manner different from that in which these areas are regulated under European Union law.

13.2. NATIONAL DEFENCE

The constitutional foundations of national defence (Paragraph 2 of Article 3 and Paragraph 1 of Article 139 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 24 September 2009

Paragraph 2 of Article 3 of the Constitution provides that the Nation and each citizen have the right to resist anyone who encroaches on the independence, territorial integrity, and constitutional order of the State of Lithuania by force.

Article 139 of the Constitution prescribes: the defence of the State of Lithuania against a foreign armed attack is the right and duty of each citizen of the Republic of Lithuania (Paragraph 1); the citizens of the Republic of Lithuania must perform military or alternative national defence service according to the procedure established by law (Paragraph 2).

The provisions of Articles 3 and 139 of the Constitution ... consolidate the principles of the defence of the State of Lithuania, the defence of its independence and territorial integrity, the defence of the constitutional order and national defence, as well as the related rights and duties of citizens. These provisions of the Constitution are interrelated and, together with other provisions and principles of the Constitution, compose the integral system of the constitutional regulation of national defence; therefore, they must also be interpreted in a systemic manner, inter alia, in the context of the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law.

As mentioned before, Paragraph 2 of Article 3 of the Constitution consolidates the right of each citizen to resist anyone who encroaches on the independence, territorial integrity, and constitutional order of the State of Lithuania by force.

In its ruling of 23 November 1999, the Constitutional Court held the following: "The constitutional order of the Republic of Lithuania is based on the priority of the rights and freedoms of individuals and citizens as the ultimate value, as well as on the principles establishing the sovereignty of the Nation, the independence and territorial integrity of the state, democracy, the republic as the form of government, the separation of powers, their independence and balance, local self-government, etc. The protection of the constitutional order means that it is not permitted that the social, economic, and political relationships established in the Constitution, which constitute the foundations of the life of individuals, society and the state, be encroached upon."

The Constitutional Court has held on more than one occasion that the state is the organisation of all society (rulings of 25 November 2002, 4 March 2003, 30 September 2003, 3 December 2003, and 30 December 2003). ...

... there is a special legal link between the state and its citizens. ... Citizenship determines the legal status of a person; the fact that a certain person holds citizenship constitutes the precondition for that person to exercise all rights and freedoms consolidated in the Constitution and laws, as well as to perform the established duties ... Under the Constitution, only citizens of the Republic of Lithuania ... have certain duties: the duty to defend the State of Lithuania against a foreign armed attack (Paragraph 1 of Article 139 of the Constitution) and the duty to perform military or alternative national defence service (Paragraph 2 of Article 139 of the Constitution).

The following constitutional provisions and principles are linked with national security, with the protection of sovereignty and the constitutional order, and with the national foreign and defence policy, inter alia: the Lithuanian Nation, having for centuries staunchly defended its freedom and independence, adopts and proclaims the Constitution (Preamble to the Constitution); the State of Lithuania is an independent democratic republic (Article 1); the State of Lithuania is created by the Nation; sovereignty belongs to the Nation (Article 2); no one may restrict or limit the sovereignty of the Nation or arrogate to himself/herself the sovereign powers belonging to the entire Nation (Paragraph 1 of Article 3); in implementing its foreign policy, the Republic of Lithuania follows the universally recognised principles and norms of international law, seeks to ensure national security and independence, the welfare of its citizens, and their basic rights and freedoms, and contributes to the creation of the international order based on law and justice (Paragraph 1 of Article 135); the Republic of Lithuania participates in international organisations provided that this is not in conflict with the interests and independence of the state (Article 136); there may not be any weapons of mass destruction and foreign military bases on the territory of the Republic of Lithuania (Article 137); the main issues of national defence are considered and coordinated by the State Defence Council, which consists of the President of the Republic, the Prime Minister, the Speaker of the Seimas, the Minister of National Defence, and the Commander of the Armed Forces (Paragraph 1 of Article 140); the Seimas shall impose martial law, announce mobilisation or demobilisation, or adopt the decision to use the armed forces when the need arises to defend the Homeland or to fulfil the international obligations of the State of Lithuania (Paragraph 1 of Article 142); in the event of an armed attack threatening the sovereignty of the State or its territorial integrity, the President of the Republic immediately adopts a decision on defence against the armed aggression, imposes martial law throughout the state or in its separate part, or announces mobilisation, and submits these decisions for approval at the next sitting of the Seimas, or immediately convenes an extraordinary session in the period between sessions of the Seimas (Paragraph 2 of Article 142); the state takes care of and provides for servicemen who lose their health during military service, as well as for the families of servicemen who lose their lives or die during military service (Paragraph 1 of Article 146); the state provides for citizens who lose their health while defending the state, as well as for the families of citizens who lose their lives or die in defence of the state (Paragraph 2 of Article 146); all these constitutional provisions and principles imply the conclusion that the independence of the state, its territorial integrity, and its constitutional order are among the most important constitutional values, the protection of which is the priority obligation of the state authorities and all citizens. Ensuring the performance of this duty is a guarantee of national security. In order that the citizens, who have the constitutional duty to defend the state against a foreign armed attack, could properly implement this duty, they must be well-prepared for that. Such preparation is ensured, inter alia, by military service.

Thus, the constitutional duty of citizens to perform military or alternative national defence service, which is consolidated in Paragraph 2 of Article 139 of the Constitution, is not an objective in itself – it is directly related to the duty, which is consolidated in Paragraph 1 of Article 139 of the Constitution, to defend the state against a foreign armed attack, as well as, in a certain aspect, to the right of citizens, which is consolidated in Paragraph 2 of Article 3 of the Constitution, to resist anyone who encroaches on the independence, territorial integrity, and constitutional order of the state.

Military service

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 24 September 2009

In its ruling of 13 December 2004, the Constitutional Court held that some functions of the state are fulfilled, primarily or mainly, through civil state (and municipal) institutions, whereas others are performed through military and/or paramilitary state institutions. It has also been held that, under the Constitution, state service is service to the State of Lithuania and the civil Nation; therefore, state service should be loyal to the State of Lithuania and its constitutional order; the Constitution does not tolerate such situations where a certain level of the system of state service, a certain state or municipal institution or individual state servants act contrary to the interests of the State of Lithuania or violate the constitutional order of the State of Lithuania. In the said ruling, it was also held that the constitutional imperative of the loyalty of state service to the State of Lithuania also raises special requirements for state service: state servants not only must not violate the Constitution and laws themselves, but also have the duty to take all necessary positive actions when protecting the constitutional order of the State of Lithuania.

... the independence of the state, its territorial integrity, and its constitutional order are among the most important constitutional values the protection of which is the priority obligation of the state authorities and all citizens. Therefore, the function of national defence, where such a function gives priority to the protection of constitutional values, requires a separate institutional system, which is composed of military and paramilitary state institutions. Service in this system constitutes one of the forms of the constitutional institution of state service, as service to the State of Lithuania and its civil Nation; this form of the constitutional institution of state service also includes military service, which directly ensures the performance of the function of national defence. Therefore, service in paramilitary and military institutions is subject to the basic constitutional requirements applicable to state service, inter alia, the requirement of loyalty to the state.

In this context, it needs to be noted that, even though the constitutional concept of state service includes military service, nevertheless, in view of the constitutional importance of the function of national defence (carried out by military service), which, as mentioned before, includes the protection of the priority constitutional values, military service is separated from the system of civil service.

The Constitutional Court has held that, under the Constitution, civil service is regarded as separate from military service, paramilitary service, or security service; the Constitution consolidates a differentiated concept of civil state institutions, on the one hand, and military and paramilitary state institutions, on the other hand; the said concept creates the legal preconditions for establishing, by means of legal acts, a differentiated regulation of relationships connected with the activities of civil state institutions and military and paramilitary state institutions, as well as for establishing such a legal status of persons working in civil and military and paramilitary state institutions that is distinguished by certain particularities (rulings of 24 December 2002 and 13 December 2004).

In this context, it needs to be noted that, under Article 140 of the Constitution, the main issues of national defence are considered and coordinated by the State Defence Council, which consists of the President of the Republic, the Prime Minister, the Speaker of the Seimas, the Minister of National Defence, and the Commander of the Armed Forces. The State Defence Council is headed by the President of the Republic (Paragraph 1); the President of the Republic is the Commander-in-Chief of the Armed Forces of the State (Paragraph 2); the Government, the Minister of National Defence, and the Commander of the Armed Forces are responsible to the Seimas for the administration and command of the armed forces of the State (Paragraph 3); the Minister of National Defence may not be a serviceman who is not yet retired to the reserve (Paragraph 3). It also needs to be noted that, under Article 141 of the Constitution, persons performing actual military service or alternative service, as well as the officers of the national defence system, the police, and the interior, non-commissioned officers, re-enlistees, and other paid officials of paramilitary and security services who are not retired to the reserve, may not be members of the Seimas or members of municipal councils, nor may they hold any elective or appointive office in civil state service.

The ... constitutional provisions and principles linked with national security, with the protection of sovereignty and the constitutional order, with the national foreign and defence policy, with organising the system of national defence, as well as the aforementioned statements of the official constitutional doctrine related to the interpretation of the constitutional concept of state service, imply the constitutional concept of military service where this concept includes the following most important aspects: military service is intended for carrying out the functions of national defence; therefore, it is one of the types of state service, but it is separated from civil service; military service guarantees the protection of the constitutional values of the utmost importance – the independence, territorial integrity, and constitutional order of the state – and the defence of the state against a foreign armed attack; the subjects of military service have a specific legal status; however, they are subject to special requirements and prohibitions; inter alia, Article 141 of the Constitution prohibits the said subjects from being members of the Seimas or members of municipal councils and from holding an elective or appointive office in civil state service; the legal regulation governing military service, which is one of the foundations of the national defence system, is the constitutional prerogative of the legislature consolidated in Paragraph 3 of Article 139 of the Constitution.

The duty of citizens to perform actual military service or alternative national defence service and to defend the state against a foreign armed attack; the legal regulation governing the organisation of the national defence system (inter alia, military service) and the defence of the state against a foreign armed attack (Article 139 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 24 September 2009

... Paragraph 2 of Article 139 of the Constitution provides for the duty to perform military or alternative national defence service; however, the Constitution does not expressis verbis establish all possible types of military service, or the forms of mandatory military service, or requirements for the subjects of military service. ... the Constitution also does not expressis verbis consolidate the duty to perform such mandatory military service that is named in laws as initial mandatory military service. The Constitution assigns the legislature to establish the organisation of the national defence system. Thus, the Constitution consolidates the prerogative of the legislature to establish, while paying regard to the norms and principles of the Constitution, the regulation governing the national defence system, inter alia, the regulation governing military service.

In this context, it needs to be noted that the constitutional concept of mandatory military service, which is consolidated in Paragraph 2 of Article 139 of the Constitution, may not be identified with the notion of actual military service, which is used in Article 141 of the Constitution. The grounds for the organisation of actual military service may be very varied ones. ... actual military service may be organised on the grounds of professional military service or on the grounds of voluntary and mandatory military service (or several said types of service). It is the discretion of the legislature to establish the legal regulation governing the organisation of actual military service. However, no matter how actual military service is organised, the legislature must establish the legal regulation to the effect that the constitutional mission of such service – ensuring the preparedness to defend and the defence of the state against a foreign armed attack – would not be denied.

While regulating, by means of laws, the relationships linked with the organisation of the national defence system, inter alia, the organisation of military service, the legislature has rather broad discretion. For example, it may, by means of a law, establish certain types of military service, the forms of mandatory military service, requirements in connection with age or health, and other requirements for the subjects of military service, the procedure for performing military service, the conditions of exemption from mandatory military service linked with the circumstances due to which citizens may not perform such service (age, the state of health, etc.).

However, when implementing the said discretion, the legislature must pay regard to the norms and principles of the Constitution. Inter alia, Paragraph 2 of Article 5 of the Constitution, which provides that the scope of powers is limited by the Constitution, and the constitutional principle of a state under the rule of law give rise to such a requirement.

... while implementing the discretion, which is established in Paragraph 3 of Article 139 of the Constitution, to regulate the organisation of national defence, the legislature must pay regard to the norms and principles of the Constitution – the legislature must, by means of laws, establish such a regulation of the organisation of the national defence system, inter alia, that of the organisation of military service (including mandatory military service), that would ensure the protection of the main constitutional values – the independence, territorial integrity, and constitutional order of the state – and the adequate defence of the state against a foreign armed attack.

... the Constitution, inter alia, the provisions of Articles 3, 139, 141, and 142 thereof, gives rise to the duty of the legislature to establish such a legal regulation under which the Republic of Lithuania must have a regular and well-organised army, capable of performing its constitutional functions, inter alia, its obligation to defend the state against a foreign armed attack. However, in regulating the relationships in connection with the organisation of national defence, inter alia, the organisation of the armed forces, the legislature has rather broad discretion. ... when paying regard to the norms and principles of the Constitution, the legislature may choose various models of the armed forces and the forms of military service. The Constitution does not prohibit establishing such a legal regulation under which the Lithuanian armed forces, whose mission is to protect and defend the state and its citizens from an armed attack, would be organised on the grounds of professional and voluntary military service. Article 139 of the Constitution may not be interpreted as meaning that the armed forces must be organised only on the grounds of mandatory military service and that every citizen has the duty to perform such obligatory military service that is named in laws as initial mandatory military service.

It also needs to be noted that the legislature, having consolidated, in a law, such a model of the organisation of the armed forces under which the armed forces are organised on the basis of professional and voluntary military service, must pay regard to the provisions of the Constitution, inter alia, to the imperative, which is consolidated in Paragraph 1 of Article 139 of the Constitution, that the defence of the State of Lithuania against a foreign armed attack is the right and duty of each citizen of the Republic of Lithuania. In this context, it needs to be emphasised that the formation of the armed forces organised on the basis of professional and voluntary military service does not deny the constitutional obligation of citizens to defend the State of Lithuania against a foreign armed attack; at the same time, the legislature is not exempted from the duty to establish such a legal regulation that would create the legal preconditions for the adequate training of citizens so that they could fulfil this constitutional obligation.

... the phrase “The citizens of the Republic of Lithuania must perform military ... service”, which is consolidated in Paragraph 2 of Article 139 of the Constitution, may not be interpreted in the same way as ordinary law interprets the concept of mandatory military service. While interpreting this phrase, which is consolidated in the Constitution, regard must be paid to the constitutional meaning and mission of the institution of military service. As mentioned before, the constitutional mission of military service, inter alia, mandatory military service, is to ensure the preparedness to defend the state against a foreign armed attack and its defence. Mandatory military service is necessary so that the citizens would be prepared to defend the state; however, this does not mean that this preparedness may be carried out only in one way – by performing initial mandatory military service and that each citizen has the duty to perform namely initial mandatory military service. The constitutional duty of citizens to perform military service and to prepare for the defence of the state against a foreign armed attack may be fulfilled in various forms, the variety of which is implied, inter alia, by the variety of the means of national defence. Therefore, the legislature, while regulating the relationships linked with military service, must pay regard to the constitutional mission of this service and establish such a legal regulation that would ensure the implementation of the constitutional purposes of military service, i.e. the adequate training of citizens for the defence of the state against a foreign armed attack. In this context, it needs to be noted that, as mentioned before, while regulating the relationships of military service, the legislature may establish, inter alia, the conditions for exemption from mandatory military service linked with the objective circumstances due to which citizens may not perform such service, i.e. age, the state of health, etc.

The Constitution, inter alia, Article 142 thereof, consolidates the institution of mobilisation. The concept of mobilisation is universally interpreted as meaning the preparation of the systems of state governance and economy, as well as of the armed forces, for martial law, inter alia, by calling up the citizens of the state to the armed forces when there is a threat of an armed attack against the state or a war begins. Under the Constitution, inter alia, Articles 139 and 142 thereof, the purpose of mobilisation is to organise the defence of the state against a foreign armed attack. One of the means to ensure mobilisation is the call-up of citizens to perform mandatory military service. In this context, it needs to be noted that the legislature has the constitutional duty to regulate, by means of laws, the procedure of performing mandatory military service in the event of mobilisation where the said procedure would ensure the defence of the state against armed aggression. In addition, the legislature must also establish such a legal regulation that would create the legal preconditions for the adequate training of citizens in advance so that, when mobilisation is announced, they could properly fulfil their constitutional duty to defend the state. Therefore, in the state, there must be not only regular armed forces, but also the necessary number of citizens properly trained to defend the state.

While regulating the institution of mandatory military service, the legislature must take into consideration not only the provisions of Paragraph 2 of Article 139 of the Constitution, which consolidates, inter alia, certain constitutional grounds of mandatory military service, but also other provisions of the Constitution, constitutional values and constitutional principles, inter alia, the constitutional principles of the State of Lithuania, its independence, territorial integrity, the defence of the constitutional order, and national defence. The protection of the said constitutional values is ensured, inter alia, by establishing the system including both military service and the preparedness of citizens to defend the state; the said system also covers the institution of mandatory military service. Therefore, in regulating the legal relationships of the national defence system, inter alia, the relationships of military service, the legislature must pay regard to the constitutional provisions and principles that give rise to the obligation to ensure the adequate national defence. Thus, such a legal regulation must be established by taking account of the geopolitical situation and other factors that influence national security. The legislature must assess possible threats to national security, long-term political processes, the participation of the state in the organisations of mutual assistance of states, the international obligations of the state in security missions, peacekeeping missions, etc.

Only such a legal regulation governing the national defence system, inter alia, the legal regulation governing military service, would not be in conflict with the Constitution where the said legal regulation would be established by taking account of possible threats to national security and would ensure the defence of the state against a foreign armed attack, inter alia, would ensure the adequate training of citizens for the defence of the state against a foreign armed attack.

In this context, it needs to be noted that the notion of the training of citizens to defend the state is rather broad, including not exclusively the training of citizens to defend the state against a foreign armed attack by means of arms. The preparedness to defend the state may not be understood only as service for gaining military training. The needs and means of national defence may be very diverse, including not only the expansion of the armed forces and of armaments in order to strengthen the military power of the state, but also the informational-technological, industrial, and other means of a similar nature, which are not directly related to armed defence but, from a certain aspect, help strengthen the military power of the state. This diversity also determines the diversity of the specific ways of training citizens for national defence.

... such preconditions must be created for citizens who fulfil their constitutional duties, inter alia, the duty to defend the state against a foreign armed attack, that would enable them to prepare adequately to fulfil this duty. Otherwise, i.e. without the adequate training of citizens to fulfil their constitutional duty to defend the state against a foreign armed attack, there would be, inter alia, not only an unreasonably big threat to the health and/or life of citizens who, while being not adequately trained, are called up to defend their country against a foreign armed attack, but also such citizens would, in general, be unable to perform the duty, which arises from the Constitution, to defend their state; therefore, the duty consolidated in Paragraph 1 of Article 139 of the Constitution would be denied.

Consequently, the discretion of the legislature to establish the legal regulation of the organisation of the national defence system, inter alia, of the organisation of military service and national defence against a foreign armed attack (where national defence would also, in certain cases, be carried out by way of mobilisation, which is provided for in the Constitution), must be exercised by taking account of the constitutional rights of a citizen, of the right of a citizen to fulfil his/her duty to defend the state (inter alia, to perform mandatory military service in the event of mobilisation) while being adequately trained to do so.

Thus ... when the legislature reorganises the national defence system, inter alia, by switching to the armed forces organised on the grounds of professional and voluntary military service and providing for the additional grounds for the postponement of initial mandatory military service, the Constitution, inter alia, the constitutional principles of a state under the rule of law, the separation of powers, responsible governance, the protection of legitimate expectations, legal clarity, and other principles give rise to the duty of the legislature to establish such a legal regulation governing the military service system that would lay down efficient means (which are different from initial mandatory military service, for example, mandatory military training, participation in the activity of organisations that are assigned to the national defence system, general events organised by the national defence system, etc.) of the training of citizens who have the duty to perform mandatory military service to defend the state – the means that would ensure the adequate training of citizens so that they could fulfil the constitutional duty to defend the state against a foreign armed attack (inter alia, in the event of mobilisation).

... when adopting the legal acts ... that provide that the national defence system should be reorganised by switching to the armed forces organised on the grounds of professional and voluntary military service, the legislature must assess the geopolitical situation of the state from the point of view of reality and the possibilities of national defence.

[...]

... the Republic of Lithuania, while seeking to protect the values that are expressis verbis consolidated in the Constitution – the independence, territorial inviolability, and constitutional order of the state, must organise the national defence system, inter alia, military service, so that the state would have well-prepared regular military units that would be ready to react rapidly to threats to national security and would be formed on the basis of military service. They may be armed forces formed on the basis of both voluntary military service and mandatory military service or on the basis of professional military service (or on the basis of the said several types of military service) where such armed forces would be able to carry out the functions of national defence. Under the Constitution, inter alia, Paragraph 2 of Article 139 thereof, a concrete model of the armed forces must be established by the legislature.

[...]

As mentioned before, when the organisation of military service is regulated by means of laws, the institution of military obligation (mandatory military service), which is provided for in Paragraph 2 of Article 139 of the Constitution, must be ensured; the forms of the said institution are not expressis verbis defined in Paragraph 2 of Article 139 of the Constitution. ...

... it also follows from the provisions of the Constitution, consolidated, inter alia, in Paragraph 1 of Article 139 and Article 142, that, in cases where mobilisation is announced in accordance with the procedure established by law, inter alia, in the event of a foreign armed attack, the constitutional duty arises for citizens to perform mandatory military service. The legislature has the constitutional obligation to regulate, by means of laws, the procedure of performing mandatory military service in the event of mobilisation where the said procedure would ensure the defence of the state against armed aggression. Taking account of this, it also needs to be noted that the legislature must establish such a legal regulation whereby the legal preconditions would be created for the proper preparation of citizens for mobilisation.

... The Constitution, inter alia, Paragraph 2 of Article 3 and Article 139 thereof, gives rise to the duty of the legislature, when reorganising the system of military service and the structure of the armed forces, to establish such a legal regulation that would ensure the proper organisation of the armed forces, the continuous performance of the functions of the armed forces linked with the ensuring of national defence, and the adequate training of citizens to defend the state against a foreign armed attack, inter alia, by the efficient means of preparation that are other than initial mandatory military service, by providing, in laws, for the concrete methods of the training of citizens, the procedure of implementing the said methods, etc.

The constitutional foundations of national defence

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 15 March 2011

The general constitutional foundations of state defence are consolidated in various provisions of the Constitution.

Article 3 of the Constitution provides that no one may restrict or limit the sovereignty of the Nation or arrogate to himself/herself the sovereign powers belonging to the entire Nation (Paragraph 1); the Nation and each citizen have the right to resist anyone who encroaches on the independence, territorial integrity, and constitutional order of the State of Lithuania by force (Paragraph 2).

Article 8 of the Constitution prescribes that the seizure of state power or state institutions by force is considered anti-constitutional actions, which are unlawful and invalid.

Article 139 of the Constitution provides that the defence of the State of Lithuania against a foreign armed attack is the right and duty of each citizen of the Republic of Lithuania (Paragraph 1); the citizens of the Republic of Lithuania must perform military or alternative national defence service according to the procedure established by law (Paragraph 2); the organisation of national defence is established by law (Paragraph 3).

Article 140 of the Constitution states that the main issues of national defence are considered and coordinated by the State Defence Council, which consists of the President of the Republic, the Prime Minister, the Speaker of the Seimas, the Minister of National Defence, and the Commander of the Armed Forces. The State Defence Council is headed by the President of the Republic. The procedure for its formation and activities, as well as its powers, must be established by law (Paragraph 1); the President of the Republic is the Commander-in-Chief of the Armed Forces of the State (Paragraph 2); the Government, the Minister of National Defence, and the Commander of the Armed Forces are responsible to the Seimas for the administration and command of the armed forces of the State; the Minister of National Defence may not be a serviceman who is not yet retired to the reserve (Paragraph 3).

Item 20 of Article 67 of the Constitution, wherein the list of the constitutional powers of the Seimas is consolidated, provides that "The Seimas ... shall impose ... martial law, declare states of emergency, announce mobilisation, and adopt a decision to use the armed forces".

The powers of the Seimas established in Item 20 of Article 67 of the Constitution, which are related to the use of the armed forces, are particularised in Paragraph 1 of Article 142 of the Constitution, wherein it is prescribed that "The Seimas shall impose martial law, announce mobilisation or demobilisation, or adopt the decision to use the armed forces when the need arises to defend the Homeland or to fulfil the international obligations of the State of Lithuania".

Article 84 of the Constitution consolidates the list of the constitutional powers of the President of the Republic; Item 16 of this article provides that "The President of the Republic ... shall, in the event of an armed attack threatening the sovereignty of the State or its territorial integrity, adopt decisions concerning defence against the armed aggression, the imposition of martial law, as well as mobilisation, and submit these decisions for approval at the next sitting of the Seimas".

The powers of the President of the Republic consolidated in Item 16 of Article 84 of the Constitution are particularised in Paragraph 2 of Article 142 of the Constitution, wherein it is established: "In the event of an armed attack threatening the sovereignty of the State or its territorial integrity, the President of the Republic shall immediately adopt a decision on defence against the armed aggression, impose martial law throughout the State or in its separate part, or announce mobilisation, and submit these decisions for approval at the next sitting of the Seimas, or immediately convene an extraordinary session in the period between sessions of the Seimas. The Seimas shall approve or overrule the decision of the President of the Republic."

... under the legal regulation established in Paragraph 2 of Article 142 of the Constitution, in the event of an armed attack that threatens the sovereignty of the state or its territorial integrity, a decision immediately adopted by the President of the Republic on the defence against the armed aggression, on the imposition of martial law throughout the state or in its separate part, or on the announcement of mobilisation acquires legal force from the moment of its adoption; however, the President of the Republic must submit this decision for approval at the next sitting of the Seimas (in the period between sessions of the Seimas, an extraordinary session of the Seimas must be convened immediately for this purpose); whereas the Seimas has the right to approve or overrule the decision of the President of the Republic.

In this context, it needs to be noted that Paragraph 2 of Article 140 of the Constitution, wherein it is prescribed that the President of the Republic is the Commander-in-Chief of the Armed Forces of the State, gives rise to the specific constitutional powers of the President of the Republic that are related, inter alia, to those established in Paragraph 2 of Article 142 of the Constitution. Under the Constitution, inter alia, the provision of Paragraph 2 of Article 5 thereof, whereby the scope of powers is limited by the Constitution, these specific constitutional powers of the President of the Republic as the Commander-in-Chief of the Armed Forces of the State may not be granted to any other subject by means of a law or another legal act.

... the legislature may also establish such powers of the President of the Republic that, though not expressis verbis specified in the Constitution, are in line with the constitutional legal status of the President of the Republic as the Commander-in-Chief of the Armed Forces of the State.

Article 94 of the Constitution consolidates the provision that the Government of the Republic of Lithuania protects the territorial inviolability of the Republic of Lithuania and guarantees state security.

Consequently, under the Constitution, inter alia, Article 140 thereof, in the course of deliberating and deciding national defence issues, various state institutions and officials take part, inter alia, the State Defence Council, which considers and coordinates the main issues of state defence (which consists of the President of the Republic, the Prime Minister, the Speaker of the Seimas, the Minister of National Defence, and the Commander of the Armed Forces), the Government, the Minister of National Defence, and the Commander of the Armed Forces, who are responsible to the Seimas for the administration and command of the armed forces of the state; however, decisions on the main issues of national defence are taken by two state institutions: the Seimas and the President of the Republic. The Seimas is empowered to adopt final decisions on the imposition of martial law, on the announcement of mobilisation and demobilisation, and on the adoption of the decision to use the armed forces when the need arises to defend the Homeland or to fulfil the international obligations of the State of Lithuania; whereas the President of the Republic, in the event of an armed attack threatening the sovereignty of the state or its territorial integrity, has the powers to immediately adopt such decisions (concerning defence against the armed aggression, the imposition of martial law throughout the state or in its separate part, and the announcement of mobilisation) that are submitted for approval at the next sitting of the Seimas.

It should be noted that the Seimas, while implementing its constitutional power, which is consolidated in Paragraph 2 of Article 142 of the Constitution, to approve or overrule a decision of the President of the Republic concerning defence against armed aggression, the imposition of martial law, as well as the announcement of mobilisation in the event of an armed attack threatening the sovereignty of the state or its territorial integrity, is bound by the values consolidated in the Constitution and constitutionally important objectives, inter alia, by the independence of the state and the fulfilment of international obligations.

In this context, it should be noted that, as mentioned before, Article 139 of the Constitution provides that the defence of the State of Lithuania against a foreign armed attack is the right and duty of each citizen of the Republic of Lithuania (Paragraph 1); the citizens of the Republic of Lithuania must perform military or alternative national defence service according to the procedure established by law (Paragraph 2); the organisation of national defence is established by law (Paragraph 3).

When interpreting these provisions of the Constitution, as well as other provisions of the Constitution related to the said provisions, in its ruling of 24 September 2009, the Constitutional Court held:

– the Constitution, inter alia, the provisions of Articles 3 and 139 thereof, gives rise to the duty of the legislature to establish such a legal regulation under which the Republic of Lithuania must have a regular and well-organised army, capable of performing its constitutional functions, inter alia, its obligation to defend the state against a foreign armed attack;

– under the Constitution, a legal regulation governing national defence must be established by taking account of the geopolitical situation and other factors that influence national security; the legislature must assess possible threats to national security, long-term political processes, the participation of the state in the organisations of mutual assistance of states, the international obligations of the state in security missions, peacekeeping missions, etc.;

– the Republic of Lithuania, while seeking to protect the values that are expressis verbis enshrined in the Constitution – the independence, territorial inviolability, and constitutional order of the state, as well as while fulfilling the constitutionally justifiable obligations arising from international treaties, must organise the national defence system, inter alia, military service, so that the state would have well-prepared regular military units that would be ready to react rapidly to threats to state security, would be able to participate in collective defence operations and peacekeeping missions, and would be formed on the basis of military service.

In this context, it also needs to be noted that the Constitution, inter alia, the constitutional requirement that Lithuanian state power be organised in a democratic manner, the constitutional imperative of an open, just, and harmonious society, and the constitutional principle of responsible governance, means that military state institutions may not have priority over civil state institutions, that decisions made by military state institutions and officials must be based on decisions adopted by civil state institutions, and that military state institutions must be accountable to civil state institutions and must be controlled by them. Democratic civil control over military state institutions (armed forces) is a necessary precondition for civil democratic governance and, thus, also for a state under the rule of law.

... the general constitutionally consolidated foundations of international cooperation carried out by the state where such cooperation is related, inter alia, to the defence of the state, are characterised, inter alia, by the consolidation of the geopolitical orientation of the State of Lithuania – the participation of the state in European integration as a Member of the European Union and the striving of the state to ensure national independence and security by contributing to the creation of the international order based on law and justice.

... the geopolitical orientation of the State of Lithuania – the participation of the state in European integration – is inseparable from other international obligations of the Republic of Lithuania arising from the membership of Lithuania in other international organisations, inter alia, the United Nations and the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation; this membership provides Lithuania not only with additional security guarantees, but also implies the necessity to observe the international obligations undertaken by it.

In this context, it needs to be noted that the provisions of the Constitution whereby the general constitutional foundations of national defence and international cooperation (foreign policy) are consolidated are related, inter alia, to the fact that, under Paragraph 1 of Article 138 of the Constitution, the Seimas ratifies the international treaties of the Republic of Lithuania on political cooperation with foreign states, mutual assistance treaties, as well as treaties of a defensive nature related to the defence of the state (Item 2), on the renunciation of the use of force or threatening by force, as well as peace treaties (Item 3), on the presence and status of the armed forces of the Republic of Lithuania on the territories of foreign states (Item 4), and on the participation of the Republic of Lithuania in universal international organisations and regional international organisations (Item 5). The power of the Seimas, which is consolidated in Paragraph 1 of Article 142 of the Constitution, to adopt the decision to use the armed forces when the need arises to defend the Homeland or to fulfil the international obligations of the State of Lithuania also includes such a decision to use the armed forces when it is necessary to fulfil the international obligations of the Republic of Lithuania under international treaties of the Republic of Lithuania.

The aforesaid provisions of the Constitution imply that the ensuring of the independence and security of the state, inter alia, by using the armed forces, may, under the Constitution, be carried out both on the national and international scale (level).

... when the law provides for ensuring the independence and security of the state on the international scale (level), it is necessary to pay regard, inter alia, to the rule, established in Article 142 of the Constitution, according to which two state institutions are constitutionally empowered to adopt decisions on the main issues of national defence, i.e. the Seimas adopts final decisions, whereas the President of the Republic immediately (in the event of a threat) adopts such decisions that are submitted for approval at the next sitting for the Seimas. While paying regard to this rule of the delimitation and coordination of the powers of the Seimas and the President of the Republic in the area of national defence, which is consolidated in Article 142 of the Constitution, the legislature, under Paragraph 2 of Article 140 of the Constitution, wherein it is stipulated that the President of the Republic is the Commander-in-Chief of the Armed Forces of the State, may also establish a legal regulation under which the President of the Republic would be empowered to immediately adopt a decision on the defence against armed aggression not only in the event of an armed attack threatening the sovereignty of the state or its territorial integrity, as provided for in Item 16 of Article 84 and Paragraph 2 of Article 142 of the Constitution, but also in the event (as provided for in a collective defence treaty ratified by the Seimas) of an armed attack against the Republic of Lithuania and a state that is its ally in cases where such a decision must immediately be submitted for approval at the next sitting of the Seimas.

... under the Constitution, inter alia, Articles 135 and 136 thereof, the legislature, while regulating the implementation (fulfilment) of the rights and obligations that could arise or arise from the international treaties of the Republic of Lithuania, inter alia, a collective defence treaty ratified by the Seimas, and while paying regard to the powers (related to the use of the armed forces) of the Seimas and the President of the Republic, as established in Article 142 of the Constitution, has the discretion to determine also other state institutions that may adopt decisions on the participation of the units of the armed forces in international military exercises.

In this context, it should be noted that, as mentioned before, under Paragraph 3 of Article 140 of the Constitution, the Government, the Minister of National Defence, and the Commander of the Armed Forces are responsible to the Seimas for the administration and command of the armed forces of the State.

Thus, under the Constitution, the legislature may also establish such a legal regulation under which the Seimas, the Government, and the Minister of National Defence are granted the powers to send military units (of a certain size) of the Republic of Lithuania to another state for participation in international military exercises or other international military events.

The constitutional foundations of international cooperation carried out by the state in relation, inter alia, to national defence

See 13.1. Foreign policy, the ruling of 15 March 2011 (“The constitutional foundations of international cooperation carried out by the state; the geopolitical orientation of the state”).

There may not be any foreign military bases on the territory of the Republic of Lithuania (Article 137 of the Constitution); there may be no military bases or army units of Russia, or the Commonwealth of Independent States or its constituent states, on the territory of the Republic of Lithuania (Article 3 of the Constitutional Act on the Non-Alignment of the Republic of Lithuania to Post-Soviet Eastern Unions)

The Constitutional Court’s ruling of 15 March 2011

... in the course of implementing the constitutional provisions on national defence and international cooperation related thereto, it is not allowed, inter alia, to disregard the prohibitions established in Article 137 of the Constitution and the Constitutional Act on the Non-Alignment of the Republic of Lithuania to Post-Soviet Eastern Unions.

Article 137 of the Constitution provides that there may not be any weapons of mass destruction and foreign military bases on the territory of the Republic of Lithuania.

The Constitutional Act on the Non-Alignment of the Republic of Lithuania to Post-Soviet Eastern Unions, which is a constituent part of the Constitution and was adopted while “invoking the 16 February 1918 and 11 March 1990 Acts on the Restoration of the Independent State of Lithuania and acting upon the will of the entire Nation, as expressed on 9 February 1991” (Preamble), consolidates the principled provision “To develop mutually advantageous relations with each state that was formerly a component of the USSR, but never join, in any form, any new political, military, economic, or other unions or commonwealths of states formed on the basis of the former USSR” (Article 1). In addition, the Constitutional Act provides that any activities seeking to draw the State of Lithuania into the unions or commonwealths of states specified in the first article of this Constitutional Act are regarded as hostile to the independence of Lithuania, and responsibility for them is established by law (Article 2); there may be no military bases or army units of Russia, or the Commonwealth of Independent States or its constituent states, on the territory of the Republic of Lithuania (Article 3).

... the provision of Article 137 of the Constitution that there may not be any foreign military bases on the territory of the Republic of Lithuania, inter alia, means that on the territory of the Republic of Lithuania there may not be any such military bases that are directed and controlled by foreign states. Such a prohibition, inter alia, does not mean that on the territory of the Republic of Lithuania there may not be any such military bases that, under the international treaties of the Republic of Lithuania, inter alia, a collective defence treaty ratified by the Seimas, are directed and controlled by the Republic of Lithuania jointly (together) with its states-allies.

... Article 3 of the Constitutional Act on the Non-Alignment of the Republic of Lithuania to Post-Soviet Eastern Unions stipulates the imperative that there may be no military bases or army units of Russia, the Commonwealth of Independent States, or its constituent states, on the territory of the Republic of Lithuania, i.e. the said article establishes:

- the constitutional prohibition on the presence of any military bases of Russia, the Commonwealth of Independent States, or its constituent states on the territory of the Republic of Lithuania; this prohibition means, inter alia, that, on the territory of the Republic of Lithuania, there may not be any such military bases that are directed or controlled by Russia, the Commonwealth of Independent States, or its constituent states;

- the constitutional prohibition on the presence of any army units of Russia, the Commonwealth of Independent States, or its constituent states on the territory of the Republic of Lithuania. This prohibition means, inter alia, that, on the territory of the Republic of Lithuania, there may not be any such army units the presence (deployment, use) of which is directed or controlled by Russia, the Commonwealth of Independent States, or its constituent states. Such a prohibition does not mean that, under the international treaties of the Republic of Lithuania, inter alia, a collective defence treaty ratified by the Seimas, and in accordance with the laws adopted for the purpose of the implementation of these treaties, any such short-term presence of the limited-size military units of Russia, the Commonwealth of Independent States, or its constituent states in international military exercises held on the territory of the Republic of Lithuania and directed and controlled by the Republic of Lithuania jointly (together) with its states-allies is not allowed. The said constitutional prohibition also does not mean that, under the international treaties of the Republic of Lithuania and in accordance with the laws adopted for the purpose of the implementation of these treaties, it would not be allowed to invite any limited-size military units of Russia, the Commonwealth of Independent States, or its constituent states for a short time to participate in international measures to help to remove the consequences of catastrophes, epidemics, natural or other calamities on the territory of the Republic of Lithuania, where the grounds, purpose, and nature of such an invitation for help are clear and constitutionally justifiable and where such measures are directed and controlled by the Republic of Lithuania.

Thus, under the Constitution, inter alia, the provisions of Articles 135, 136, and 138 thereof, while paying regard to the limitations and prohibitions consolidated in the Constitutional Act on the Non-Alignment of the Republic of Lithuania to Post-Soviet Eastern Unions, the international treaties of the Republic of Lithuania and the laws adopted for the purpose of the implementation of those treaties may provide for various measures for ensuring state independence and security on the international scale (level), inter alia, collective and/or other joint international defence, strengthening international peace and security, other international cooperation of military nature where the grounds, purpose, and nature of the said cooperation are clear and constitutionally justifiable.

In this context, it needs to be noted that, under the Constitution, inter alia, Article 135 thereof, the legislature, while paying regard to the limitations and prohibitions consolidated in the Constitutional Act on the Non-Alignment of the Republic of Lithuania to Post-Soviet Eastern Unions, may also establish such a legal regulation designed for the implementation of the international treaties of the Republic of Lithuania, inter alia, a collective defence treaty ratified by the Seimas, that would provide, inter alia, for the short-term participation of strictly limited-size military units of Russia, the Commonwealth of Independent States, or its constituent states in the exercises of the defence treaty Parties and of other states arranged on the territory of the Republic of Lithuania where such exercises are directed and controlled by the Republic of Lithuania jointly (together) with its states-allies, as well as the invitation of such military units in international measures to help to remove the consequences of catastrophes, epidemics, natural or other calamities on the territory of the Republic of Lithuania, where the grounds, purpose, and nature of such an invitation for help are clear and constitutionally justifiable and where such measures are directed and controlled by the Republic of Lithuania.

... under the Constitution, the legislature, while paying regard to the constitutional norms and principles, inter alia, the limitations consolidated in the Constitutional Act on the Non-Alignment of the Republic of Lithuania to Post-Soviet Eastern Unions, which is a constituent part of the Constitution, may provide for such a manner of implementing the rights and obligations of the Republic of Lithuania under a collective defence treaty where the said manner would entail the arrival of military units of the states-allies of the Republic of Lithuania in the Republic of Lithuania and their use for the purposes of a collective defence operation.

[...]

However, the Constitution, inter alia, Article 3 of the Constitutional Act on the Non-Alignment of the Republic of Lithuania to Post-Soviet Eastern Unions, prohibits the establishment of such a legal regulation whereby the short-term participation of limited-size army units of Russia, the Commonwealth of Independent States, or its constituent states in international military events taking place on the territory of the Republic of Lithuania is provided for, but no clear and constitutionally justifiable grounds, purposes, and nature of such participation are established.

Paramilitary (statutory) state institutions; the particularities of statutory state service (Article 141 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 27 February 2012

... the paramilitary services pointed out in Article 141 of the Constitution may not be identified with the military institutions of national defence, nor may the officials of the paramilitary services be identified with the servicemen of the national defence system, since the constitutional mission of paramilitary services is related not precisely with the defence of the state against aggression and the fulfilment of international defence obligations, but rather with other areas that are important to the security of the state and society (guarding and control of the state border, ensuring public order, the investigation of crimes, the protection of state secrets, etc.); on the other hand, in time of war, while fulfilling their main functions, such paramilitary services may also be commissioned to protect the state as part of the armed forces or to help the army to implement other tasks related to national defence and the international obligations of the state.

Thus, the constitutional mission of such paramilitary services determines the necessity to organise their activities on the basis of statutory relationships.

Consequently, the notion “paramilitary ... services” of Article 141 of the Constitution should be interpreted as including such statutory state institutions that are not categorised as belonging to the national defence system. These institutions are the police, interior service, and security service (i.e. police authorities, the bodies of interior service and security service), which are expressis verbis mentioned in Article 141 of the Constitution. The said statutory state institutions also include other state institutions whose activity, with respect to their mission and functions, should be organised on the basis of statutory relationships.

Article 141 of the Constitution implies that the officials of statutory state institutions perform statutory state service, which is a specific type of state service and is different from other (civil) state service and military service. The concept of statutory state service gives rise to the following features specific of this service: a special legal regulation establishing the particularities of the respective service by means of legal acts (statutes); the statutory relationships of strict hierarchical subordination, characterised, inter alia, by a specific regime of the performance of service (inter alia, the performance of service duties, the period of service, the particularities of official subordination, the system of special service ranks (grades) marking the career of the officials and their place in the hierarchy of statutory relationships, and the specificity of official (disciplinary) liability); special requirements for the officials of statutory state institutions (inter alia, those related to their loyalty to the State of Lithuania and their reliability, education, age, the state of health, etc.); specific powers vested in those officials (inter alia, with respect to persons not subordinate to them, as well as those related to the use of coercive measures); as well as special social and other guarantees.

It needs to be noted that Article 141 of the Constitution does not give an exhaustive list of paramilitary (statutory) state institutions; therefore, in regulating the relationships of state service, the legislature may also provide not only for police authorities, the bodies of interior service and security service (inter alia, customs authorities), but also for other state institutions the activity of which, with respect to their mission and functions, should be organised on the basis of statutory relationships, i.e. for such institutions in which statutory state service would be performed.

It also needs to be noted that statutory state service cannot be the same due to the variety of functions performed by it; therefore, the status of officials of the police, the interior service, the security service, and other state statutory institutions (inter alia, customs) must be differentiated and have the particularities established in the respective statutes.

Limitations on activities carried out by the officials of statutory state institutions (Paragraph 1 of Article 33 and Article 141 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 27 February 2012

Article 141 of the Constitution establishes special limitations on activities carried out by the officials of state statutory institutions. These limitations are aimed at ensuring the depoliticisation of statutory state institutions: the officials of statutory state institutions may not be members of the Seimas and members of municipal institutions, may not hold elective or appointive office in civil state service (i.e. service that is not categorised as statutory service); nor may they take part in the activities of political parties and organisations (inter alia, they may not be members of these parties and organisations or candidates for state or public office proposed or nominated by such parties and organisations). Such limitations express the constitutional principle of civil democratic control over state military and paramilitary institutions. Such limitations, inter alia, include special limitations on other work of officials of statutory state institutions – the prohibition on holding a position in civil (non-statutory) state service and in political parties and political organisations.

It needs to be noted that Article 141 of the Constitution does not explicitly establish any other limitations on activities carried out by the officials of state statutory institutions. However, this article, in establishing greater limitations on activities carried out by the officials of statutory state institutions than limitations that stem from Paragraph 1 of Article 33 of the Constitution on activities carried out by persons holding positions in civil (non-statutory) state service, as well as the mission and nature of statutory state service, implies that the legislature, while regulating the limitations imposed on the officials of state statutory institutions in connection with holding a position other than the one pointed out in Article 141 of the Constitution, not only must establish limitations that stem from Paragraph 1 of Article 33 of the Constitution, but also other limitations on another occupation if the necessity to establish such limitations is implied by the functions of statutory state institutions stemming from the constitutional mission of the respective statutory state institutions and/or the status of the officials of statutory state institutions. In establishing such limitations, the legislature has broad discretion, inter alia, to establish additional criteria, which must be taken into consideration while deciding whether another occupation held by the officials of statutory state institutions would be compatible with the functions of the respective statutory state institution and the status of its officials, also to establish an exhaustive list of activities prohibited for the officials of the respective statutory state institution, by indicating in it the areas of economic activity and/or occupation and positions incompatible with the performance of functions by the respective statutory state institution and/or incompatible with the status of its officials.

The particularities of military service

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 4 November 2015

... the Constitution gives rise to the mission of military service, inter alia, that of professional military service, to ensure the preparedness to defend the state against a foreign armed attack and to ensure the defence of the state. This mission implies certain specific particularities characteristic of this service, as, for instance: the necessity to constantly maintain combat readiness, as well as the related special regime governing the performance of service (inter alia, the particularities related to the period of military service, also to the uninterrupted continuity and mobility of military service; the relationships of strict hierarchical subordination among servicemen; the system of military ranks; the specificity of disciplinary responsibility); the special legal status of servicemen, which includes certain specific powers (related, inter alia, to the use of military force), the specific requirements that apply to servicemen performing this service (inter alia, requirements related to their loyalty to the State of Lithuania, their age, state of health, education, physical fitness, moral character, etc.), certain limitations and prohibitions, as well as special social and other guarantees; and a special legal regulation established by means of legal acts (statutes) providing for the procedure and conditions applicable to the performance of military service.

Limitations on activities carried out by professional military servicemen (Paragraph 1 of Article 33 and Article 141 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 4 November 2015

... in regulating limitations on the activity of professional military servicemen, the constitutional requirements, specified in the Constitutional Court's ruling of 13 December 2004, for the legal regulation governing the right of state servants to have another occupation must be complied with. These limitations stemming from Paragraph 1 of Article 33 of the Constitution must be such that a conflict between public and private interests would be avoided in professional military service, that this service would not be used in pursuit of self-interest, that professional military servicemen would not be precluded from performing their duties, that the authority of professional military service would not be undermined, that no discredit would be brought upon service, and that professional military servicemen would not work in such enterprises, establishments, or organisations in which they have the powers of management or in which they control or supervise the activity of, or adopt any other decisions related to, such enterprises, establishments, or organisations.

... under Article 141 of the Constitution, persons performing actual military service or alternative service, as well as the officers, non-commissioned officers, re-enlistees of the national defence system who are not retired to the reserve may not be members of the Seimas or members of municipal councils and may not hold any elective or appointive office in civil state service or participate in the activities of political parties or political organisations.

Thus, Article 141 of the Constitution expressis verbis imposes certain special limitations on the activity of servicemen; such limitations aim to ensure the depoliticisation of military state institutions and reflect the constitutional principle of civil democratic control over military state institutions.

... in implementing its discretion, consolidated in Paragraph 3 of Article 139 of the Constitution, to regulate the organisation of the national defence system, the legislature must establish, by means of laws, such a regulation of the organisation of the national defence system, inter alia, the organisation of military service, that would ensure the protection of the constitutional values of utmost importance – the independence, territorial integrity, and constitutional order of the state, as well as the adequate defence of the state against a foreign armed attack; the Constitution gives rise to the duty of the legislature to establish such a legal regulation under which the Republic of Lithuania would have a regular and well-organised army, capable of performing the constitutional functions of national defence; in regulating relationships in connection with the national defence system, inter alia, military service, the legislature must take account of the geopolitical situation and other factors that have influence on national security; the legislature must also assess potential threats to national security, as well as long-term political processes, the participation of the state in the organisations of mutual assistance between states, and the international obligations of the state in security missions, peacekeeping missions, etc.

Thus ... it should be held that, under the Constitution, when regulating relationships in connection with the imposition of limitations on the activity of professional military servicemen, the legislature must pay regard to Article 141 of the Constitution, which expressis verbis imposes certain special limitations on the activity of servicemen, and to Paragraph 1 of Article 33 thereof, which gives rise to limitations on the work of professional military servicemen other than that specified in Article 141 of the Constitution. The constitutional mission of military service, the particularities of the status of servicemen, a special nature of this service, as well as other important circumstances related to ensuring national defence and national security and related to the fulfilment of international obligations undertaken by the state, also imply the discretion of the legislature to establish other limitations on the activity of professional military servicemen.

At the same time, it needs to be emphasised that the legislature, in implementing its discretion to establish other limitations [i.e. other than those expressis verbis consolidated in Article 141 of the Constitution and arising from Paragraph 1 of Article 33 thereof] on the activity of professional military servicemen, inter alia, to impose the prohibition on work under an employment contract or on self-employment, must lay down such a legal regulation governing the work remuneration of professional military servicemen that would ensure the possibility for these servicemen to perform their constitutional obligation fully and with dignity.

In this context, attention should be drawn to the fact that ... work under an employment contract and self-employment constitute activity forms that are similar in terms of both their continuous nature and the aim of persons engaged in these activities to generate income, but differ in their nature: employment relationships are characterised by the subordination of an employee with respect to the employer, whereas self-employment is characterised by independence. Therefore, in implementing its discretion to establish limitations on the activity of professional military servicemen other than the limitations imposed expressis verbis under Article 141 of the Constitution and those deriving from Paragraph 1 of Article 33 thereof, the legislature may take into account, among other things, the particularities of the said types of activity.

The constitutional duty of citizens to perform military or alternative national defence service; the requirements for the legal regulation of the relationships connected with the organisation of national defence (Article 139 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 4 July 2017

Article 139 of the Constitution prescribes:

“The defence of the State of Lithuania against a foreign armed attack shall be the right and duty of each citizen of the Republic of Lithuania.

The citizens of the Republic of Lithuania must perform military or alternative national defence service according to the procedure established by law.

The organisation of national defence shall be established by law.”

Thus, under this article of the Constitution, each citizen of the Republic of Lithuania has the right and duty to defend the State of Lithuania against a foreign armed attack, as well as the duty to perform military or alternative national defence service according to the procedure established by law. As held in the Constitutional Court’s ruling of 24 September 2009, under the Constitution, only citizens of the Republic of Lithuania have the duty to defend the State of Lithuania against a foreign armed attack (Paragraph 1 of Article 139 of the Constitution) and the duty to perform military or alternative national defence service (Paragraph 2 of Article 139 of the Constitution). It is worth noting that these duties are the only duties of a citizen to the state that are expressis verbis consolidated in the Constitution and these duties arise from the citizenship of the Republic of Lithuania as a special legal interrelationship between the state and its citizens.

In its ruling of 24 September 2009, the Constitutional Court held the following:

- ensuring the implementation of the priority duty of state authorities and all citizens to protect such most important constitutional values as the independence, territorial integrity, and constitutional order of the state is a guarantee of the security of the state;

- in order that the citizens who have the constitutional duty to defend the state against a foreign armed attack could properly implement this duty, they must be well-prepared for that; such preparation is ensured, inter alia, by military service;

- the constitutional duty of citizens to perform military or alternative national defence service, which is consolidated in Paragraph 2 of Article 139 of the Constitution, is not an objective in itself – it is directly related to the duty, consolidated in Paragraph 1 of Article 139 of the Constitution, to defend the state against a foreign armed attack, as well as, in a certain respect, to the right of citizens, consolidated in Paragraph 2 of Article 3 of the Constitution, to resist anyone who encroaches on the independence, territorial integrity, and constitutional order of the state.

In its rulings of 24 September 2009 and 4 November 2015, when interpreting the provisions of Article 139 of the Constitution, the Constitutional Court also held that the Constitution assigns the legislature to establish the organisation of the national defence system; regulating the relationships in connection with the organisation of national defence, the legislature has rather broad discretion; however, in exercising this discretion, the legislature must pay regard to the norms and principles of the Constitution; laws must establish such a regulation of the organisation of the national defence system, inter alia, that of the organisation of military service, that would ensure the protection of the constitutional values of the utmost importance such as the independence, territorial integrity, and constitutional order of the state, as well as the proper defence of the state against a foreign armed attack, inter alia, the proper training of citizens for the defence of the state against a foreign armed attack.

In its ruling of 24 September 2009, the Constitutional Court also noted that the notion of the preparedness of citizens to defend the state is rather broad, including not only the preparedness of citizens to defend the state against a foreign armed attack by means of arms; the preparedness to defend the state cannot be understood only as service in order to gain military training; the needs and means of national defence may be very diverse, including not only the expansion of the armed forces and armaments in order to strengthen the military power of the state, but also the informational-technological, industrial, and other means of a similar nature, which are not directly related to armed defence but, in a certain respect, lead to the strengthening of the military power of the state; this diversity also determines the diversity of the specific ways of training citizens for national defence.

It should be noted that, according to Paragraph 2 of Article 139 of the Constitution, alternative national defence service may be assigned instead of military service. The establishment of the constitutional institution of alternative national defence service is linked, inter alia, to the constitutionally guaranteed freedom of thought, religion, and conscience.

Thus, under Paragraph 2 of Article 139 of the Constitution, interpreted in conjunction with Article 26 thereof, which establishes freedom of thought, religion, and conscience, persons who are not able to perform military service due to their religious or other convictions have the right to perform alternative national defence service instead of military service in accordance with the procedure established by law. In regulating the organisation of national defence, the legislature is obliged to provide for the conditions for implementing this constitutional right of citizens, inter alia, the length of alternative national defence service and the procedure for its performance. In doing so, the legislature has broad discretion but must not provide for any such conditions for performing alternative national defence service that would render this service ineffective or inconsistent with its essence; the legislature must also establish such a procedure for assigning citizens to perform alternative national defence service that would allow assessing the requests of citizens to perform this service in terms of their reasonableness; otherwise, the constitutional right and duty of citizens to defend the state against a foreign armed attack and to prepare well for such defence by performing military service could be denied.

In this context, it should be pointed out that, in view of its content, Article 26 of the Constitution is linked to Articles 27 and 28 thereof, under which the convictions, practised religion, or belief of a person may not serve as a justification for a crime or failure to observe laws (Article 27) and, while implementing his/her rights and exercising his/her freedoms, everyone must observe the Constitution and laws and must not restrict the rights and freedoms of other people (Article 28). Among other things, this means that, on the grounds of his/her convictions, practised religion, or belief, no one may refuse to fulfil the constitutionally established duties, inter alia, the duty of a citizen to perform military or alternative national defence service, or demand the exemption from these duties.

Interpreting Paragraph 2 of Article 139 of the Constitution in its ruling of 24 September 2009, the Constitutional Court held that a law may establish such conditions for exemption from mandatory military service that are related to objective circumstances due to which the citizens cannot perform this service (age, state of health, etc.).

... under Paragraph 2 of Article 139 of the Constitution, a law may not establish such conditions for exemption from the constitutional duty of citizens to perform military service or alternative national defence service that would be unrelated to objective circumstances due to which the citizens cannot perform this duty; failure to comply with this requirement could deny the said constitutional duty of citizens and, at the same time, no preconditions would be created for the proper fulfilment of the constitutional right and duty of each citizen to defend the state against a foreign armed attack.

It should be noted that, under Paragraph 2 of Article 139 of the Constitution, the legislature may provide for the possibility of deferring the fulfilment of the constitutional duty of citizens to perform military or alternative national defence service in cases where the citizen is temporarily unable to perform this service due to the important reasons specified in the law or in cases where the important interests of the person, family, or society might be injured if such service were not deferred at the given time. Once the reasons for deferring service are no longer applicable, the citizen must perform military or alternative national defence service.

It should also be noted that, in regulating the relationships connected with military or alternative national defence service, inter alia, the assignment to perform alternative national defence service instead of military service, exemption from the duty to perform military or alternative national defence service, and deferral of the fulfilment of this constitutional duty, the legislature must observe the requirements stemming from the Constitution, inter alia, the constitutional principles of the equality of the rights of persons, proportionality, reasonableness, and justice.

In the context of the constitutional justice case at issue, it should be noted that the neutrality and secularity of the state also mean that, under the Constitution, the religion professed by a person does not constitute a basis for exempting the person from the constitutional duties of a citizen to the state, inter alia, from the duty to perform military or alternative national defence service, consolidated in Paragraph 2 of Article 139 of the Constitution.

The special guarantees for citizens who have completed military service (Paragraph 3 of Article 139 of the Constitution)

The Constitutional Court's ruling of 6 June 2018

... as held by the Constitutional Court in its ruling of 24 September 2009, in implementing its discretion, consolidated in Paragraph 3 of Article 139 of the Constitution, to regulate the organisation of the national defence system, the legislature must establish, by means of laws, such a regulation of the organisation of the national defence system, inter alia, the organisation of military service, that would ensure the protection of such constitutional values of utmost importance as the independence, territorial integrity, and constitutional order of the state, as well as the proper defence of the state against a foreign armed attack. These powers of the legislature, stemming from Paragraph 3 of Article 139 of the Constitution, among other things, imply that, taking into account the constitutional importance of military service and seeking to establish the effective organisation of military service, inter alia, to ensure the necessary number of citizens properly trained to defend the state, the legislature may provide for the special guarantees for citizens who have completed military service and, by these guarantees, inter alia, encourage the performance of military service and facilitate the social and economic integration of citizens who have completed it.

On the other hand ... in regulating the relationships connected with state service, the legislature must pay regard to the requirement, stemming from Paragraph 1 of Article 33 of the Constitution, to ensure equal competition for persons entering state service, which implies that persons entering state service must be selected on the basis of their knowledge and skills necessary to perform the respective duties of a state servant and that regard must be paid to the imperatives, which stem from Article 29 of the Constitution, in relation to the equality of the rights of persons and non-discrimination and non-granting of privileges on the grounds expressis verbis specified in the Constitution or other constitutionally unjustifiable grounds. This means that, when regulating the relationships connected with entering state service, the legislature must take into account, inter alia, Paragraph 2 of Article 139 of the Constitution, which provides that a law may lay down the grounds for exemption from the duty to perform the military obligation in relation to objective circumstances, which prevent citizens from performing this obligation (inter alia, due to the state of health or age), as well as where citizens are exempt from this obligation on the grounds of gender; in addition, under Paragraph 2 of Article 139 of the Constitution, a law may lay down the grounds for the deferment of mandatory military service and alternative national defence service, or the grounds for early release from such service, where such grounds are related to the state of health of the person or other important personal, family, or social circumstances. In view of this, under the Constitution, compared to citizens who have completed the military or alternative national defence service established by means of a law, less favourable conditions may not be created by means of a law to enter state service for those citizens who are exempt from the military obligation due to objective circumstances on the grounds laid down by means of a law, nor may such less favourable conditions be created for those for whom mandatory military service or alternative national defence service has been deferred or who were released early from the said service due to the state of health or other important personal, family, or social circumstances on the grounds laid down by means of a law.
